NOTES.

Sir Frederick Sykes on Dominion Status:—The Governor of Bombay has observed a strict reticence hitherto in regard to the present political situation. In dealing with the day to day incidents connected with the civil disobedience movement, he has kept himself in the back-ground, though we, at least, have all along believed that His Excellency's personal influence was steadily exerted on the side of forbearance and moderation. In a speech which he made to the Sardars of the Dekhan last week, there occurred a passage which, because of Sir Frederick's high reputation for discretion, has attracted wide attention in the country. "Once Indians of all castes, and creeds and communities" said His Excellency, "have made up their minds what they really want and at the same time are prepared to shoulder all the responsibility which Dominion Status implies, you may rest assured that the British nation will heartily co-operate in their efforts to reach the goal." This is a great advance on the previous pronouncements even of the Viceroy, inasmuch as it is an acknowledgment that the future constitution is to be determined not arbitrarily by the British Parliament but by the Indian people. Sir Frederick's words contain the assurance that the pre-amble to the Government of India Act will be readily changed as soon as the Indian people agree to shoulder the burden of responsible Government. Lord Acton, in the long but very relevant passage which Mr. Ramamurthy has sent us and which is published elsewhere, said that the Americans fought against a pre-amble. This is to a large extent true of the present struggle. As regards all castes, creeds and communities being united, His Excellency, we are sure, does not think it practicable to require every man, woman and child to sign a joint statement of their requirement. All that can be reasonably asked is that no caste or community should have reasonable grounds for apprehending any loss or injury to itself arising out of the operation of the new constitution. There is one matter in which there is substantial unanimity among Indians, and Government may begin by taking action in it as an earnest of its desire to concede what India unitedly requests. We refer to the question of Prohibition. Mr. Frederick Grubb's article reviewing Indian Excise policy brings out the fact that the Government's attitude is wholly opposed to the tradition and sentiment of the Indian people. In this single instance, let Government show that it means to be guided by Indian opinion whenever and wherever it is reasonably agreed in regard to any matter.

The Cost of Repression:—The Government of Bombay recently issued a Press Note pointing out that the financial position of the Presidency is fraught with much danger. Retrenchment is one of the most efficacious means of reducing expenditure, but when a local newspaper announced that Government had decided to reduce all salaries above a minimum by 10 or 15 per cent, a Press Note was issued officially contradicting the statement and declaring that not only was it not in contemplation to make any reduction in salaries but that there will be no stoppage even of increments which may fall due for the appointments which are regulated by a time-scale. And what is more, Government have been announcing increases of salaries and allowances from time to time to Police officers and men employed in places where the civil disobedience movement is particularly strong. By way of contrast, we may refer to an announcement by the Tata Iron and Steel Company last week, that all its employees have voluntarily agreed to a 10 per cent. cut in their salaries owing to the depression through which the Company is passing. We suggest that Government should seriously consider why it is that their employees do not come forward with a similar voluntary offer at a financial crisis like the present? On the contrary, they find themselves obliged, notwithstanding the severe financial stringency, to make increased allowances to their servants, which they would not think of doing if they were not afraid that otherwise they may lose their services and may not be able to get others to take their places in sufficient numbers and as quickly as necessary. No business man would think of giving increases to his staff when his business is very much on the down-grade. Government, of course, lay the blame on the civil disobedience movement, but when, carefully analysed, it will be found that that movement is less responsible for officials requiring more pay and allowances than the policy of Government in dealing with it. We do not wish to go deeper into the question just now. We will only say that no British Government in India can afford to overlook the fact that it cannot function except through a large body of Indian officials, that these officials are bound by ties of blood, race, religion and patriotism to the people, that a policy which violently antagonises the people cannot but react upon the zeal and efficiency of its Indian officers, and that, in fact, their zeal and efficiency will be in direct proportion to the contentment and satisfaction which the policies and measures of Government produce among the people. In the old days, a high Indian official was regarded by the people as their champion with Government and as the protector of their rights and interests. This, we are sorry to say, is rarely the case now. The consequent loss in the estimation of the people cannot adequately be compensated for by an increase of allowances, and a point is bound to be reached, unless the present policy is radically changed, when even very highly paid officials may come to ask themselves how does it profit them to gain the whole world if they have to lose their souls in the process.

Dewan Bahadur Acharya's Scheme:—In a striking article which we reprint from the Hindustan Review, Dewan Bahadur C. Vijayaraghavacharya—Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya and Sir Dinshaw Wacha, are the only other surviving original members of the National Congress, as also its ex-Presidents,—points out that the Indian constitutional problem can and must be solved at once. Dominion Status he pithily defines to be "that the Government of the country should be responsible, not to the people of Great Britain and Northern Ireland through Parliament, but to the people of the country for which it is constituted, subject only to the suzerainty of the Crown of England" This, he says, can be established at once by the King by an Order in Council, while the Round Table Conference is needed only to work out the details and must be held in this country. The recent constitutional changes in Ceylon were introduced by an Order in Council. The Dewan Bahadur is a careful student of constitutional law and procedure, and we have no doubt that he is right when he says that the same method may be applied to the case of India. As for the questions of minorities and Indian States, he in the ultimate resort will refer them to the League of Nations and abide by its decisions. The idea of utilising the League of Nations for settling disputed points in Indian constitutional reform was first mooted by the Dewan Bahadur himself, and it deserves to receive more consideration than it has received so far.

A Bishop's Resignation:—The Rev. Frederick B. Fisher, one of the most liberal-minded Christian Missionaries who have worked in India, resigned some time back the office of a Bishop of the American Methodist Church, which he had held for several years with distinction in this country. A Bishop is a bishop for life and most Bishops hold on to office as long as they can. Robert Browning wrote an interesting poem with the title "Bishop Blougram's Apology." The poem, which is a long one, is the answer of a cynical and self-sufficient Bishop to the question why he, who had very few beliefs, clung to his office. Bishop Fisher is evidently a different type of man from Bishop Blougram. His reasons for resigning may be summed up in a single sentence. He preferred freedom for his soul to "the privileges, emoluments, pension and opportunities for service" which the big office brought to him. We are grateful to him for specifically mentioning India amongst the reasons which led him to renounce the position. "For instance," he says, "it proved impossible to identify myself completely with Indian aspirations because I represented foreign powers which threatened economic and other reprisals unless certain policies determined by some supporting foreign society were carried out to the letter on Indian soil." Men of quick spiritual sensibility will find it increasingly difficult to proclaim religious truths on the distinct understanding that they shall not seek to apply those truths to a very large part of the conditions around them.

A Disingenuous Plea:—A section of the European community has, writes the Hindu, jumped at the pretext offered by the unfortunate bombing and shooting outrages in Bengal to urge that the Congress should be scotched. The absolute failure to establish any connection between the two does not worry them in the least. Nor do they appear to have realised the significance of the clause in the weekly official review which says that, "as the failure (of Civil Disobedience) becomes more pronounced, the activities of those who favour violence are likely to increase." But such an attitude seems to be too much even for those who are prone to lend a sympathetic ear to reactionary bogey-mongers. The Times admitted the other day that it was clear that the Congress neither instigated nor encouraged violence. And The Observer's Bombay correspondent, in a despatch to his paper, points out that Gandhiji's movement was designed to eliminate violence and that "where the Congress is strong there is less likelihood of terrorist activity." This conclusion is fully borne out by the facts and the powers that be, if they are really anxious to secure lasting peace, should not pin their faith to repression but do their utmost to enlist the co-operation of just those forces which have so far afforded the greatest guarantee against violence.

The Keithahn Case:—A Missionary friend writes in the course of a letter not intended for publication: "It is incorrect to say that all missionaries give an undertaking to the Government. This is again emphasised in your issue of August 15th when discussing Mr. Keithahn. Had Mr. Keithahn stood to his convictions I have not the slightest doubt of the support he would have received. Did he even ask his Missionary Council to face the question?" The answer to that question has been published. The Madras Government in the course of a communication has stated that at a meeting of the American Mission at Madura, held on July 10, they passed the following resolution unanimously:—"Whereas as all American members of the American Madura Mission, before being allowed to proceed to India for residence and work, are required to give a pledge that they will maintain as to all political movements an attitude of neutrality and whereas the Rev. R. B. Keithahn, a member of the American Madura Mission, has not observed this pledge it is therefore resolved that we as the American Madura Mission desire publicly and unanimously to dissociate ourselves from such of its activities as have constituted a breach of this privilege."

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, SEPTEMBER 6, 1930.

NON-VIOLENCE IN DANGER.

On Monday the 25th August, a bomb was thrown at the car in which the Commissioner of Police of Calcutta, Sir Charles Tegart, was driving to his office at about 11 A.M. Sir Charles escaped unhurt. Next day there were two bomb explosions near Police stations in Calcutta. On the 30th August two bombs were reported to have been thrown at the houses of two Indian officers in Mymensingh, one an Inspector in the Detective Department, named Pabatkumar Bose, and the other, Tejeschandra Guha, employed as Excise Sub-Inspector. Neither of the officers was injured. On the morning on Friday the 29th August, Mr. Francis J. Lowman, Inspector-General of Police, Bengal, and Mr. E. Hodson, Superintendent of Police, Dacca, were shot as they were coming out of the local Hospital by a young person, described in the Press reports as a young Bengali, who came walking towards them and fired from a distance of about 50 feet. Mr. Lowman died in the hospital on Sunday morning, while Mr. Hodson, whose wounds at first seemed to be the more serious, has been progressing favourably. Dacca has recently been the scene of a serious communal riot attended by grave excesses. The Poet, Tagore, in a letter to the Spectator, London, refers to the attitude of the Police during the riots. Reuter cabled a summary of the letter, which we reprint in our news columns. It may also be mentioned that Mr. Lowman, as Inspector-General, has been active in the detection of those concerned in the armed raid in Chittagong in May last, and that one of the men who recently surrendered addressed a personal letter to Mr. Lowman by name, declaring that he had ample resources and men and that it was only for private reasons of his own that he was giving himself up to the Police. In the July session of the Legislative Assembly, Mr. K. C. Neogy who sat for the Dacca Division, made an impassioned speech, which evoked much non-official sympathy, describing the sufferings of the people of Contai, which had been raided by the Police.

It seems in view of these facts probable that these most deplorable outrages are the outcome of special conditions in East Bengal rather than of the Civil Disobedience movement as the Anglo-Indian semi-official press is desperately anxious to make out. We were recently told by a high Congress authority that the civil disobedience movement, which is based on the principle of non-violence, was rapidly gaining ground in Bengal though it had been rather late in starting. This was a surprise to us as from other sources we had gathered that the Congress party in Bengal has ceased to function owing to quarrels between the leaders. If the later information, however, is correct, the recent shootings and bombings may be properly regarded as the last desperate efforts of the violence cult to assert itself. However that may be, the outrages in Dacca and the attempts in Calcutta and Mymensingh, are a warning and a challenge to those who hold non-violence to be the sheet-anchor of Indian Nationalism. It is to its non-violent character that Indian Nationalism owes the respect and sympathy which it so largely enjoys in other countries including England. This inter-national sympathy is a valuable asset to our cause. Anti-Indian propagandists have fully realised this, and are, therefore, moving heaven and earth to make out that the non-violent movement is only a cloak for violence. Violence in every form retards the progress of India to self-government, and it is, therefore, the duty of every one who wants to see India self-governing and respected among nations, to take his stand publicly and unequivocally against the use of the bomb, the pistol and other murderous weapons in the struggle for freedom.

Apart from its value as an international influence, non-violence is vital to Indian Nationalism as the greatest and most certain safeguard of the interests of minorities. If violence were permitted, might will be right and a peaceful minority will be in constant danger of being trampled upon by an unscrupulous majority or even by another aggressive minority. It is their instinctive recognition of this fact that has rallied to the Satyagraha movement in such large numbers members of the minority communities, women and even children. From this point of view, non-violence is truly the sheet anchor of the national movement, and the least departure from it, is an act of gross disloyalty to that movement. The happenings in Bengal are a greater danger to nationalism than even the temporary continuance of the present bureaucratic system though that system itself is a good deal responsible for fostering the faith in violence as against non-violence. If but the responsible authorities in England and India make up their minds to abjure violence in dealing with non-violence, they will at once find the doors open wide to a peaceful and righteous settlement of the Indian problem. God alone is judge of motives and we do not presume to usurp His suaction. But from a purely practical point of view we deeply deplore and strongly condemn the killing of Mr. Lowman and the attempts on Tegart, Hudson, Bose and Guha; and if our advice carries any weight with the leaders of the violence party, we earnestly ask them to pause and leave the field free to the non-violence movement, which has already achieved great results, to secure India's freedom. Violence is always born of violence and never of non-violence.

THE ROUND TABLE CONFERENCE.

A few days back the Leader of Allahabad threw out the suggestion that the Round Table Conference might with advantage be postponed. The two main reasons which our contemporary gave for the suggestion were, the severe cold of England in November and the non-completion of the peace proposals. In support of the former, the Leader quoted from an article by an American publicist who attributed the failure of last year's Five Power Naval Conference to the chilliness of London in November when it sat. This consideration is by no means a negligible one. Many of those who will attend the Conference are men past the middle age. Some are old men. The younger generation, as a whole, has foresworn the Conference. A cynical friend, who claimed to know the co-operating section of politicians well, was seriously perturbed by the messages relating to the organization of hospitality in London to the Indian delegates. "Well", he said, "I know what will happen. Our friends in England are experts in social functions. They will so fill the time of our delegates with dinners, dances and what not, that they will hardly be able to go to bed before 3 o'clock in the morning. Then at 5 o'clock, punctually, their kind hosts will present, ready drafted, what they wish to be the conclusions of the Conference, and which in their lively appreciation of the over-night hospitality and half-awake condition, they can hardly refuse to sign." Our friend added that, in deference to the national policy of prohibition, we would do well to insist that hospitality to the Indian delegates should, on no account, include liquor. The chilliness of November, he would have said, would only add to the confusion of the mind of the delegates. This friend is totally opposed to the conference being held in London. He is strongly of the opinion that it should be held in India and nowhere else. For quite other reasons, Pandit Malaviya first made the same suggestion. Dewan Bahadur C. Vijayaraghavacharya, also an old Congressman and ex-President of the National Congress, advances the same view in a striking article in the current number of the Hindustan Review. There is a considerable body of opinion in support of holding the Conference in India where the delegates will be in contact with the currents of feeling among their own people and alive to the absolute need of having Indian public opinion behind them. Some sort of conference in London may be necessary later. The original idea of a Round Table Conference has been considerably whittled down, first, by agreeing to the admission of representatives of the British Opposition parties, and secondly, by the decision of the Prime Minister and the leaders of the Conservative and Liberal parties not to attend the Conference. As originally proposed, the Conference was to be presided over by the Prime Minister, and was to be between the British Government and the Indian delegates. With the changes now adopted, its character as an authoritative body has been considerably lowered and the chances of its coming to acceptable or even definite decisions made more remote. It is quite probable also that Sir John Simon will have to be allowed a prominent seat at the Conference. Mr. Ramsay Macdonald stated his objections to the inclusion of the chairman of the Statutory Commission in a guarded and tentative manner. The difficulty is due to the precarious position of his Cabinet. A postponement of the Conference to April, may remove the uncertainty in this respect, besides affording a more genial climate in which the delegates may carry on their solemn duties. Meanwhile, a Conference may be advantageously held in India to settle the main lines of a scheme which the Indians may present for acceptance to the British Government and Parliament. Absolutely nothing has been done so far to accommodate the different points of view among Indians. A glance at the probable lists of delegates from the several provinces, published in the papers, shows them to be more remarkable for their omissions than for their inclusions. There is also the probability that during the coming months the political situation here will also crystallize and all sections of opinion may be represented at the Conference.

MRS. HANSA MEHTA.

Mrs. Hansa Mehta, President of the Bombay Provincial Congress Committee and a member of the All-India Working Committee of the Indian National Congress, who has been sentenced to three months' imprisonment for publishing the Congress Bulletin, is the eldest daughter of Sir Manubhai Mehta, Chief Minister to the Maharaja of Bikaner, and wife of Dr. Jivraj Mehta, Dean of the Goverdhandas Sunderdas Hospital in Bombay. While yet an undergraduate in the Baroda College, she gave proof of the possession of considerable powers of organisation. She was mainly instrumental in starting the Bombay Presidency Students' Federation of which she was elected first President. In 1919, she went to England and studied Journalism in London University. In 1920, she attended the Women's International Suffrage Alliance at Geneva as an Indian delegate. In 1921, she was in America and represented India at several social and educational conferences. She was in Japan in 1923 and experienced the horrors of the terrible earthquake there. In India she has taken prominent part in the All-India Women's Conference, the Rashtriya Stree Sabha and other women's associations. Mahatma Gandhi entrusted to her, among others, the task of organising the women's side of the satyagraha movement in Bombay. She threw herself heart and soul into the boycott of foreign cloth movement and herself picketed the shops and persuaded the merchants to refrain from dealing in imported goods. Last month she was elected president of the Bombay "War Council" in the place of Mr. Dhirajlal Modi who had been imprisoned, and, according to all accounts, she greatly exerted herself to direct the activities of that body in constructive channels. It is a thousand pities that she should be cut off from her public activities on a merely technical charge.

THE LIGHT THAT CAME OVER THE OCEAN.

(By MR. KOPARGAM RAMAMURTI).

In view of the fierce struggle that is now raging in this country between the forces of loyalty and obedience on the one hand and the newly awakened sense of political duty on the other, and apropos of the keen and earnest controversy, still happily in the academic stage, which is engaging the national mind in India as to the comparative merits of the British connection and "Complete Independence" in ensuring true political freedom for the people, the following passages relating to the American War of Independence, taken from Lord Acton's "Lectures on the French Revolution" seem to hold much valuable instruction for all parties concerned :

"The primitive fathers of the United States began by preferring abstract moral principle to the letter of the law and the spirit of the Constitution. But they went farther. Not only was their grievance difficult to substantiate at law, but it was trivial in extent. The claim of England was not evidently disproved, and even if it was unjust, the injustice practically was not hard to bear. The suffering that would be caused by submission was immeasurably less than the suffering that must follow resistance, and it was more uncertain and remote. The utilitarian argument was loud in favour of obedience and loyalty. But if interest was on one side, there was a manifest principle on the other—a principle so sacred and so clear as imperatively to demand the sacrifice of men's lives, of their families and their fortune. They resolved to give up everything, not to escape from actual oppression, but to honour a precept of unwritten law. That was the transatlantic discovery in the theory of political duty, the light that came over the ocean. It represented liberty not as a comparative release from tyranny, but as a thing so divine that the existence of society must be staked to prevent even the least constructive infraction of its sovereign right. 'A free people,' said Dickinson, 'can never be too quick in observing nor too firm in opposing the beginnings of alteration either in form or reality, respecting institutions formed for their security. The first kind of alteration leads to the last. As violations of the rights of the governed are commonly not only specious, but small at the beginning, they spread over the multitude in such a manner as to touch individuals but slightly. Every free state should incessantly watch, and instantly take alarm at any addition being made to the power exercised over them.'

Who are a free people? Not those over whom government is reasonably and equitably exercised, but those who live under a government so constitutionally checked and controlled that proper provision is made against its being otherwise exercised. The contest was plainly a contest of principle, and was conducted entirely on principle by both parties. 'The amount of taxes proposed to be raised,' said Marshall, the greatest of constitutional lawyers, 'was too inconsiderable to interest the people of either country.' I will add the words of Daniel Webster, the great expounder of the constitution, who is the most eloquent of the Americans, and stands, in politics, next to Burke: "The Parliament of Great Britain asserted a right to tax the Colonies in all cases whatsoever; and it was precisely on this question that they made the Revolution turn. The amount of taxation was trifling, but the claim itself was inconsistent with liberty, and that was in their eyes enough. It was against the recital of an act of Parliament, rather than against any suffering under its enactment, that they took up arms. They went to war against a preamble. They fought seven years against a declaration. They saw in the claim of the British Parliament a seminal principle of mischief, the germ of unjust power.'

The object of these men was liberty, not independence. Their feeling was expressed by Jay in his address to the people of Great Britain: 'Permit us to be as free as yourselves, and we shall ever esteem a union with you to be our greatest glory and our greatest happiness.'

Before 1775, there was no question of separation!
(Pages 24-26).

The close applicability of the above facts and principles to the present situation in India is strikingly obvious. It is sad to think that the normal citizen is not safeguarded in India by constitutional checks of a kind indispensable to a "free people."

THE DRINK TRAFFIC IN INDIA.

(By MR. FREDERICK GRUBB.)

(Concluded from the last issue.)

Public protestations against the continuance of the liquor traffic are entirely in harmony with the above pronouncement. In addition to frequent debates in the Provincial Legislative Councils, wherein popular opinion has found free expression, various bodies which are not primarily concerned with the Temperance Movement have warmly supported the programme of the Anglo-Indian Temperance Association and the Prohibition League of India. The Indian National Congress has repeatedly expressed itself in favour of this policy. Its most distinguished leader, Mahatma Gandhi, declared :

I am an out-and-out believer in total abstinence and total prohibition for India. I believe that the habit of Drink is one of the greatest curses that has descended upon mankind. I would rather see India bankrupt than coquet with Satan to square her account.

Last year's Congress President, Dr. M. A. Ansari (a leading Moslem), in his address from the chair said that the growing evil of Drink threatened to undermine not only the public health of the country, but its entire social structure. "Forbidden by his religion to the Mussulman and held pernicious by the Hindu," he said, "the evil of Drink would not have been spread so rapidly and extensively had the Government taken a sympathetic attitude towards those who were endeavouring to stop it."

The Congress (Nationalist) Party in its electoral programme has pledged itself to "a most active and advanced policy of Temperance reform. Total Prohibition will be its aim, and it will seek to achieve it by means of permissive legislation, vesting in the inhabitants of local areas the option to demand Prohibition." (The phrasing of this plank in the platform should be familiar to members of the United Kingdom Alliance.)

It is the same with the Liberal, or Moderate Party. They have repeatedly declared in favour of Local option as a means to ultimate Prohibition. The National Social Conference and the Women's Organisations have made similar declarations. The attitude of the labouring classes in the large cities has been set forth in resolutions of hostility to the Drink traffic on several occasions. The All-India Industrial Welfare Conference representing many workers' unions, resolved in 1922:

This Conference is of opinion that all welfare work will continue to be hampered till the complete removal of the Drink evil is secured by the immediate closing of all liquor shops in industrial areas.

POSITION IN THE INDIAN STATES.

The Indian States, which comprise one-third of the Peninsula, are nominally independent as regards the control of their domestic affairs, but most of them conduct their Excise administration on lines similar to those of the adjacent British Provinces. It is for this reason hardly surprising, perhaps, that the cause of Temperance has not made more rapid progress in the territories of the Ruling Princes. Bhopal has unfortunately gone back upon the measure of Prohibition adopted as an experiment six years ago. This, however, cannot be adduced as an argument against Prohibition in British India. On the contrary, it is one more reason for supporting it, because the temporary failure in Bhopal was largely due to the fact that the State is surrounded by "wet" districts. The enforcement of Prohibition in Bhopal led to increase in the Excise revenue of the adjoining British districts to the disadvantage of Bhopal itself. Far from detracting from the strength of the case for Prohibition, Bhopal's experience confirms the view of abolitionists that the experiment, if it is to be successful, must be made upon as wide a scale as possible, including in its scope the Indian States, most of which would only be too glad to co-operate. Baroda, Travancore, Bhavnagar, Jashan, Mysore, Palitana, Kashmir, and Cochin are among those which have already begun to advance towards the Prohibition ideal.

LIMITED LOCAL OPTION.

A Local Option Act was passed a few years ago in the Punjab, but it is a very unsatisfactory measure. Under this Act Municipal Committees and District Boards may prescribe the maximum number of licensed premises within their respective areas—such number not to be less than one-third in towns and one-half in rural districts of the number licensed on March 31st, 1923. A local body may, however, pass a resolution in favour of Prohibition but this cannot take effect until a two-thirds majority of the registered electors have approved by a referendum. Nor would such a resolution be really binding on the Collector of Revenue, because the Act provides that if this official is of opinion that illicit distillation has been carried on or connived at within the three previous years, he may refuse to make it operative. The Act does not give the power of prohibition or local option in regard to shops where imported liquors are sold, nor does it apply to clubs, hotels, restaurant bars, and railway refreshment rooms.

The Punjab is not the only area in regard to which the Central Government has issued an edict that the Provincial Legislature must not pass legislation affecting the sale of foreign spirits, this being a subject reserved to the Government of India. It is the contention of Temperance reformers that the local legislatures should be entitled to pass legislation affecting alcoholic liquor of all kinds. It is manifestly not in the public interest that an advantage should be given to the imported article as against liquor produced in India. If such a preference is maintained it will be a serious bar to all restrictions on the sale of Drink. The importance of this question will be seen from the fact that about 1,320,000 gallons of foreign spirit (half of which comes from the United Kingdom) are unloaded upon India every year.

It was clearly not the intention of Parliament to differentiate between different classes of liquor when it passed the Government of India Act, 1919, for in Schedule 11 of the Rules (list of transferred subjects) the following paragraph is included:

Excise—that is to say, the control of production, manufacture, possession, transport, purchase and sale of alcoholic liquors and intoxicating drugs, and the levying of Excise duties and licence fees on or in relation to such article, etc.

The contention of the Government of India in this matter ought not to be sustained. If allowed to stand it means the placing of a formidable obstacle in the way of Temperance Reform, as the imposition of restrictions on the sale of country liquor alone would naturally stimulate the consumption of foreign spirits, which, as I have shown, has already assumed serious dimensions. As the Government of India is responsible only to Parliament through the Secretary of State it would appear that the power exercised by the Provincial Legislatures for dealing with the liquor traffic are to a large extent illusory.

In this connection it is of interest to recall that Lord Meston, in his evidence before the Joint Parliamentary Committee which considered the Act of 1919 predicted that any heroic Excise policy initiated by the Provincial Ministers in charge of the transferred departments would be vetoed by the officials in control of finance, a reserved subject—a prediction which has been verified by subsequent events.

WHAT ABOUT THE REVENUE?

Considerations of revenue have been allowed to stand too long in the way of India's moral progress. Many official authorities seem to be obsessed with the idea that if Drink disappears from the country the Government would be reduced to insolvency. The Taxation Inquiry Committee, which reported two years ago, was one of the bodies which fell foul of Prohibition because it was discovered that such a measure would involve the loss of 18 per cent. of the total tax revenues of India. These people overlook the fact that the loss would be only temporary as the increasing prosperity of the country, consequent upon Prohibition, would soon make good the shortage. Moreover, no one will contend that the stoppage of Drink would lessen the wealth of India. On the contrary it would prevent an enormous waste. How then could it reduce the taxable capacity of the country?

There is another line of investigation to be recommended to these official objectors. Bearing in mind that India is one of the poorest countries in the world, let it be ascertained which classes of the population provide most of the Drink revenue of India at the present time; what are their existing economic conditions; and what would become of the money now spent on intoxicating liquors if Prohibition were enacted? If an honest enquiry were made into all the factors it would soon be proved that Prohibition pays.

CEYLON.

It will be of interest to add a few words about Ceylon, although that progressive Colony is not part of the Indian political system. Substantial progress towards Prohibition has been made in recent years. Local Option prevails in Ceylon and many polls have taken place, the great majority resulting in the closure of taverns. Licensed premises numbered 2,138 in 1918, but these have now been reduced to 1,032. During the decade shops for the sale of indigenous spirits have been reduced from 690 to 159, and toddy taverns from 737 to 164, while licences to sell imported spirits have remained almost stationary—711 to 709. Although the local option ballots show that the people of Ceylon are opposed to the Drink traffic, it cannot be said that there has been a commensurate reduction in the consumption of liquor. Temperance reformers in Ceylon are dissatisfied with the measures taken by the Government to deal with illicit sales. They also urge that the quantity of country spirits produced under Government contract should be diminished in proportion to the number of shops closed, which has not hitherto been done.

The Ceylon Excise Commission, appointed in 1923 to inquire into the Local Option Rules and to report "what steps, if any, are required to control the rising consumption of foreign liquor," has recommended that all retail licences should be liable to poll, except those whose holders already possess wholesale licences for the same premises. It was also considered desirable that restaurant and rest house licences should be brought unrestrictedly within the scope of Local Option. As regards the percentages required to carry Prohibition in any given area, the Commission recommended that these should remain as they are, namely, in Colombo 51 per cent. and outside that town 60 per cent. of the number of those entitled to vote.

A NEW DAY BREAKING.

To sum up, it may be stated with confidence that there is in India to-day a strong and well-informed public opinion behind the demand for drastic measures of restriction leading to Prohibition. There is abundant cause for satisfaction in the successes already won, but Indians themselves realise that final victory can only be achieved by persistent personal effort and continued pressure upon all legislative bodies and local authorities. Happily, a new day is breaking, when Indians will become masters in their own house. They will have to face conditions which must make their task a difficult one. The loosening of caste restrictions, the weakening of social and domestic discipline, the impact of Western civilisation, and the assumption by the rising generation of individual liberty in regard to many customs formerly decided by communal action, all tend towards an extension of the Drink habit in a country like India.

On the other hand, the growing enlightenment of the people and the united determination of all creeds and parties to emancipate their country from every enslaving influence are important factors on the side of Temperance. All well-wishers of India may rest assured that in the exercise of that national self-government which cannot long be withheld, she will speedily deliver herself from a traffic which is alien to her genius and the continuance of which is a standing menace to her moral and material well-being.

DOMINION STATUS FOR INDIA : NOW OR NEVER.

Dewan Bahadur C. Vijayaraghavachariar writes in the Hindustan Review :—

I think the time is now ripe for a settlement. Unless statesmanship rises to the occasion, India will be lost to the Empire. Opinion in India is unanimous that Dominion Status should be immediately established. No postponement of that will ever be acceptable to the people. It is no good arguing difficulties. There is no political problem in the world which is free from difficulties.

HINDU-MUSLIM QUESTION.

The question of minorities is not peculiar to India. The Muslim minority is not the only minority in the world which has sought to take unreasonable advantage of troubled times. But they will all be reasonable the moment they know that they have to co-exist with the other great communities of the country, depending for their peace and progress upon the good-will of their neighbours, and not on the ministrations of a foreign, exploiting Power. The leaders among the Hindus and Muhammadans should make a fresh attempt to reduce their differences to a practicable and just compromise. If they are unable to agree, the only other method of settlement would be to place the whole matter for the adjudication of the League of Nations, which is the fairest tribunal we can think of. The League is also competent to decide the question by reason of its great experience of the minorities' problems during the last decade.

THE POSITION OF THE STATES.

The next difficulty is the one connected with the Indian States. The problem is complex, but the solution is not above the reach of statesmanship. It is inevitable that, within a very short time, the States will have to come into a scheme of India Irredenta. An organic political and constitutional relation between British India and the Indian States has to be provided for, so that the entire Nation may benefit by the change. If the Ruling Princes think that they could impede the progress of British India towards full freedom by pleading absurd difficulties, they are endangering their very existence. Some imagination is necessary to visualize the future when a self-conscious and determined people is up to break its ridiculous chains. The Rulers have to come to some understanding with the leaders of British India. Even here, the friendly assistance of experts of the League of Nations may be availed of to frame suitable provisions for determining the relations of British India and the Indian States in a manner that would secure the rights and fix the obligations of each towards the other.

BRITISH INTERESTS.

Whatever might be our difficulties, there is no argument by which Britain could hold the real power in the country. All that she is entitled to ask for is that her interests in the country be respected. The leaders of India should give a guarantee immediately that, in accordance with equity and justice, they will respect the interests that British and other foreigners have secured for themselves in the country. Here also they should be prepared to accept the arbitration of the League of Nations in case they are unable to agree and in so far as these issues are justifiable.

DOMINION STATUS BY KING'S PROCLAMATION.

The proper province of the Round Table Conference is to discuss these issues. The Round Table Conference is not required to establish a Dominion Constitution for the country. The essence of Dominion Status is that the Government of the country should be responsible, not to the people of Great Britain and Northern Ireland through Parliament, but to the people of the country for which it is constituted, subject only to the suzerainty of the Crown of England. As regards the internal mechanism of the Constitution, it is for our people to frame it. For the purpose of establishing Dominion Status, all that is required is that Parliament should withdraw its control over the Government of India. The control will automatically pass to the people of India. Through what agencies the great Indian people will exercise that control is a matter for their own decision. The decision cannot be made in a day, nor without consultation among the various sections among themselves. There is a mechanism now in India, which with easy adjustments is capable of functioning as Responsible Government. The Indian people demand that Parliamentary control be immediately transferred to the Central Legislature in India and that the Viceroy become a constitutional head of Government. This is political Swaraj in essence. It is my humble view that this change can be effected by proclamation of His Majesty in Council without immediate recourse to Parliament. I include the full set of rights possessed by the Dominions as against the Imperial Parliament among those which should be immediately transferred to the Indian Legislature. Safeguards and reservations are capable of defeating Responsible Government, and we must not give a chance to reactionaries to taunt us later with a vulgar "I told you so!"

CONFERENCE SHOULD MEET IN INDIA.

In this view, I think that the Round Table Conference should meet in India. Its duty will be to examine the Minorities question, the Indian States question and the problem of the mechanism of Indian Government. There is no need for our people to go to England to settle these questions, as there is no need for a Round Table Conference to establish Dominion Status for India. We have nothing to discuss with our English friends on that issue. The matter is well beyond the stage of discussion. We invite their help and co-operation to discuss and determine our National problems in some of which they are also deeply interested. As soon as the provisional Dominion Status Constitution is established on the lines I have endeavoured to indicate, this Conference should meet, and should also, if necessary, avail itself of the assistance of the League of Nations for its various problems. This is the only way of preserving for the Crown of England its brightest gem.

I am a believer in the value and goodness of the British connection. It is as a humble friend that I counsel her statesmen to rise equal to the supreme and historic situation. A friendly India would be England's chief asset.

BISHOP FISHER ON HIS RESIGNATION.

The Rev. Frederick B. Fisher writes in the Christian Century:—When I reached the final decision to seek release from the administrative, judicial and technical duties of the modern Methodist episcopacy, it did not occur to me that the act would create any sensation or even discussion. Perhaps I had lived too long in contact with the older churches. During the century and a half of American Methodism no active bishop had ever voluntarily sought release, except for reasons of broken health. Perhaps this made it seem to some inconceivable that a man on the sunny side of middle life, with apparent health, good standing, and normal success, should voluntarily step out of a life position that carried with it privileges, emoluments, pension, and opportunities for service.

The Roman, Greek, and Anglican episcopal churches have had many instances of this kind in their longer histories. Even the hierarchical heads of Roman orders have returned to brotherhood ranks with honor and approval. Greek bishops have been assigned to the rectorship of educational institutions and to parochial tasks. Recent Anglican examples include the scholarly Bishop Gore, who resigned from the see of Oxford at the height of his powers; Archbishop Welldon, formerly Metropolitan of India, now the Dean of an English cathedral, and Bishop Fakenham-Walsh who resigned from the Bishopric of Assam to become the principal of a theological seminary in Calcutta. Scores of precedents, ancient and modern, could be cited in the older ecclesiasticisms. It seems probable that the only reason my own case produced so much stir in our denomination was because of its novelty. The future will doubtless take care of that.

DISTRESS, GRIEF AND SLAVERY.

But why did I do it? Let my soul speak its irresistible subjective urge. There were, of course, specific objective reasons, but these were inextricably interwoven into the personal spiritual fabric. The simple truth is that technical obligations, incessant travel, judicial trials, ecclesiastical umpiring, responsibility for the actual destiny of fellow ministers, financial and temporal management, with other kindred burdens, brought distress, grief and slavery.

To allow my soul full play of expression in times of crises in church or state became embarrassing to a large organism which looked upon my official self as its conservator rather than as a prophetic spokesman. For instance, it proved impossible to identify myself completely with Indian aspirations because I represented foreign powers which threatened economic and other reprisals unless certain policies determined by some supporting foreign society were carried out to the letter on Indian soil. In spite of all the justly modifying explanations which any of us can make, I was expected to be a calm supporter and a diplomatic advocate of policies, provisions, regulations, and laws determined largely by foreign customs, management and support. If missions need anything in this new day it is complete spiritual emancipation from an ubiquitous imperialism that is racial, political and economic.

This patent situation makes a spirit such as mine a constant source of irritation and confusion. Peace could come by two methods: I could yield, or withdraw. The former would bring outward success but inward surrender. The latter meant self-respect and soul freedom. I took the sweet leap out into the unofficial ministry where I hope to find joy in liberty.

DANGER IN WIELDING POWER.

I would not be guilty of the slightest implication that everybody else is wrong. That would be unfair to beloved friends. Hundreds think as I do, and yet believe it best to struggle within the machine instead of jumping out of it. Thousands are conscientious in their support of things as they are. Each soul must face the issue for himself and follow his own divine leading.

Let me now come to matters less controversial. Power is a strange thing. Those who wield it are in constant danger. It affects not only those who are ruled, but the ruler himself. Several years ago I took a personal vow that if and when I found myself taking any pride in power I would renounce it forthwith. I gradually became conscious of the almost unparalleled power of our episcopacy, not at all in prestige, but in administrative fact. Most officers have strong convictions in principle or policy. If one is in a minority he is impelled almost unconsciously to augment his personal influence by the application of official power. He wins many a victory, but often loses inwardly by weakening his holy dependence upon the free expression of truth buttressed by logic and persuasion. Especially is this true in moral, spiritual, and educational vocations.

At my age, had I remained in the episcopal office until normal retirement, I would have had twenty-six more years of power. It was simply unthinkable. Adaptation or release became imperative. I could not afford to drift, nor to fight. If freedom could not come by remaining within the organism and becoming increasingly loyal to it, then the only honorable and Christian thing to do was to withdraw from it.

All-Asian Women's Conference.—An attractive and informative Bulletin has been issued by the promoters of the All-Asian Women's Conference. It calls for the enrolment of Members of the All-India Reception Committee and Patrons giving details of their duties, fees, etc. All interested are requested to write for the Bulletin to Mrs. Cousins, Pantheon Gardens, Egmore, Madras, S. India. Replies have been received to date from Syria, Palestine, Indo-China, Siam, Malaya, Nepal, Ceylon, Japan, Iraq, and Hawaii.

THE ALL-INDIA WOMEN'S CONFERENCE.

Bangalore gave a hearty and hospitable welcome last month to the members of the Standing Committee of the All-India Women's Conference, who gathered there for the Half-yearly Meeting of this Committee. They were hard at work for two whole days on points which had come up for settlement during the past six months and on matters of routine. Dr. Muthulakshmi Ammal was unanimously elected to be President of the coming Lahore Conference. Labour questions are to be made the speciality of the Social Section and the Training of Teachers of the Educational Section. A Resolution was passed recording the very deep sense of loss which the Conference has sustained by the absence of its President, Mrs. Naidu, Mrs. Kamaladevi and other members, and by the interruption of their work for the Conference. Congratulations were sent to Gwalior and Mysore States for their State promotion of khaddar and indigenous industries. It was decided to compile from the works of famous writers, a book of poems and prayers of a universal kind to suit all kinds of functions and especially for school purposes. The Railway companies have now made the Railway concessions permanent for Delegates to the Conference and Standing Committee Meetings, but not for Visitors, and not for less than 2nd Class fares. After full discussion of all points the dates settled for the Lahore Conference were fixed as from the 12th to the 19th January.

A mandate was sent to the Council of State to stand by their former vote on the Sarda Act and to keep the Act intact and unamended. A protest was sent to the Government on its action in giving facilities for the possibility of whittling down the Act.

An extremely enjoyable Garden Party, and an hour's speeches, given by Lady Mirza and the Ladies' Recreation Club, closed the proceedings. Miss Lazarus and Miss Nanjamma are to be congratulated on the efficiency of the arrangements they made for the comfort of their all-Indian guests. Stri Dharma.

THE SIMON COMMISSION AND WOMEN.

"M. E. C." writes in Stri Dharma:—It has taken weeks to get one's hands on the two volumes of the Simon Report, and what was our surprise to find that the Women's Indian Association gets a place of high recognition in it for its history-making activity! So the W. I. A. will be embalmed along with the Report! Evidently the Simon Seven had been, soon after their arrival, impressed with the unexpected (by them) efficiency and capability and freedom of Indian women, so early in the first volume there are five pages devoted to women. The writer as much as says there were no women before the Montague-Chelmsford Report era! Now there can never be an era in which they can be omitted and in his final paragraph he states "The Women's Movement in India holds the key to progress. It is not too much to say that India cannot reach the position to which it aspires in the world until its women play their due part as educated citizens." What more do these men want from Indian women than they are doing to-day? They do notice a woman as Deputy President of a Legislative Council and gave her a patronising pat, but they were ignorant of the hundreds of Indian women who have been acting as Municipal Councillors, Senators, J.P.'s, Hon. Magistrates, members of every kind of Local Government Board, and of all the professions also. These women have given demonstration fully of their high quality. It is only the lack of money and facilities which makes the numbers small. That is due to Britain's faulty educational administration as the Simonites confess in another section. But if the date on which India is to achieve her aspiration is when her women play their due part as educated citizens then to-day is the Day. This section of the Report is hopelessly superficial and ill-informed. The Commissioners did not trouble to polish or oil their "key" very much. Perhaps that is the reason why men as well as women find the Report just a colossal tragic waste of money.

The new era is famous for statistics, so we find a few facts leaping to the eyes from these pages. There are over nine million more men than women in India; the number of women voters is as one woman to ten men in Madras Presidency where the proportion is highest, in some parts it is as one to one hundred. In Madras of a total of voting of 48 per cent. there is noted that the women's vote was 19 per cent. It is calmly stated that "it is clear that the enfranchisement of women has slightly retarded the general rate of improvement" (in rate of voting). This is surely inaccurate.

The Commission was concerned that the proportion of women voters was so low, so it recommends that wives of men who possess the property qualification should also be registered as voters. We women see a much wiser and juster way—improve the inheritance laws for women. Then in their own right they can be citizens, not as appendages to husbands. Marriage to a propertied husband is not a worthy new qualification for women voters in any land. It is long since that veteran student of Indian life and history, Dr. Annie Besant, showed that the British property qualification for representation was utterly foreign to Indian conditions and unsuited for adoption in whole or in part for either men or women here.

Perhaps the best part of the Report is the Chapter on Education, but the true picture is not given without the background of the old days when general learning was a fact and when Sir H. Munro told us that every village had its free school. In 1900 Gokhale had proved that there was, after a hundred years of British rule, only one primary school for every six villages. Everywhere throughout the Report the conclusions are vitiated through being arrived at from too short an angle of time.

The scheme for burdening India with more and not less taxes for military expenditure women will sweep on one side as unworthy of the era of the Pact of Paris, or the universal hunger for disarmament, and the specially peaceful nature of the Indian people. Shades of Asoka! Such a proposition could only be made by the Anglo-Saxon race!

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Silver Wedding Fund:—The Silver Wedding Fund disbursed during the year 1929 was Rs. 1,35,773 on scholarships as against Rs. 1,51,242 in 1928. The distribution of scholarships by principal provinces is as follows:—Madras, Rs. 13,032; Bombay, Rs. 19,768; Bengal, Rs. 907; United Provinces, Rs. 39,605 and Punjab Rs. 1,519. A sum of Rs. 10, 80 was granted to the Indian Soldiers' Board for the relief of widows of Indian officers holding the Viceroy's Commission. The Silver Wedding Fund is intended for the education and assistance of children and dependants of Indian officers and soldiers (including non-combatants) who rendered military service under the Crown during the Great War or took part or may hereafter take part in subsequent warlike operations. With this object in view the Fund provides scholarships, makes payment of money to set up in life the scholars of the said Fund after completion of their studies and lastly assists widows of Indian officers who are not in receipt of pensions or widows whose pensions are inadequate. Applications for assistance by way of scholarships should normally be addressed to the Director of Public Instruction, Bombay Presidency, Poona, while in the case of applicants residing in the Indian States these should be sent to the Political Officers concerned. Applications for assistance to widows of Indian officers should be addressed to the Secretary, Indian Soldiers' Board, Delhi.

A Gracious Act of Lord Irwin:—On the Feast of the Assumption, writes a correspondent, there was installed in the new Catholic Cathedral at Simla a carving in relief of Our Lady, which has been restored to Catholic worship by a gracious act of the Viceroy, as is related in the following note placed with the image: "Our Lady of Bastein." This carving of Our Lady of the Assumption was brought from Portugal in the beginning of the 17th century and placed in the Cathedral of Bastein (Bombay) where it remained till 1739, when the city was sacked by the Maharattas. Their leader, Mulhar Rao Holkar, took it to Chandore in the Nasik district where it was venerated in a Hindu temple until 1924, when it was brought to the Palace at Indore. In 1930 the Maharaja of Indore presented it to His Excellency the Viceroy, Lord Irwin, who in turn presented it to His Grace the Archbishop of Simla, who placed it in this Cathedral, August 15th, 1930.

Servants of People Society Members in Jail:—12 prominent members of the Servants of the People Society, founded by Lala Lajpat Rai in the Punjab with its headquarters in Lahore, are now in jail undergoing various terms of imprisonment for participation in the civil disobedience movement. They are:—Sjts. Parushottam Das Tandon, Algu Bai, Baldev Ohaube, Harihar Nath, Mohanlal Gantan, Mohan Lal, Jagan Nath, Chhabil Das, Balvantrai O. Mehta, Achint Ram, Raja Ram and Shanti Swarup.

Tagore on Dacca Atrocities:—Poet Rabindranath Tagore in a letter to the Spectator, comments on the "strange and ominous silence" of British press regarding communal rioting at Dacca, in which he says, enormous damage was done and unapeakable atrocities occurred with police standing idly by. He says that if a single Englishman had been injured or comforts of English residents menaced, such silence would hardly have been kept. "Is it any wonder then that we are led to regard ourselves as of no interest and importance in the eyes of British people, who have taken upon themselves the gratuitous task of our trusteeship?" Poet Tagore concludes with a statement that his own correspondence prove that the events in Dacca have alienated, more than anything else in Bengal, sympathies of those still clinging to their faith in British justice. Other happenings have shaken public confidence but this has struck at its very foundations.

Gandhi's Gun.—Scene—A seepport somewhere between Natal in South Africa and Hamadan in Persia. Arrival of Indian steamer. All first and second class passengers—all Europeans—have disembarked, and the customs' officials were delightfully obliging, and Memsahebs giggling as soon as out of the customs' barrier. The turn of the "third class,"—mostly Indians—has now come. The customs' staff have started rummaging their baskets, beddings, and boxes for contraband opium, cocaine, and other such things. Arrives Mr. Anthony Pillai of Dindigul, suitcase in hand, with Mrs. Pillai with a baby in arms, and Master Pillai with a charkha on his shoulder. The appraiser has passed it free as a toy in the hands of a child, but as ill luck would have it Anthony just wished "Good Morning, sar" and the official raised his head and looked up, reading from the permit, "wooden toy composed of one wheel in a frame." "Well what is it?" "This is my wife's, sar, she use charka." "Well, what is a charkha?" "This charkha sar, Indian Charkha for wife spinning." "Well your wife spins, then this is a hand machine, it has to pay duty at 50% ad valorem." Anthony flabbergasted could only blab out, "This Charkha sar, Gandhi use Charkha sar, this no machine." "What this, Gandhi's charka? Well let me see. This Gandhi charkha! This Gandhi's gun upsetting the British Empire! This dangerous weapon! Classification. Table X, CI. XI, Sec XII, duty 300 per cent advalorem. Price not known, customs assessment Rs. 50, duty Rs. 150/- please." Mrs. Anthony pledged her bangles and paid the duty, and the charkha is singing merrily in a happy family and is making converts.—Behar Herald.

FIRE INSURANCE.

KILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

THE PEACE NEGOTIATIONS.

No apology is needed for reproducing in full in this issue of the Reformer the documents which have been published relating to the peace negotiations which ended last week. Apart from their immediate political interest which, of course, is considerable, the documents comprising the record are of intense human interest. The personalities concerned in this drama are these: the Viceroy and Mahatma Gandhi, as the principal protagonists, Mr. M. R. Jayakar and Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, as intermediaries, and Pandit Motilal Nehru and Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, as secondary characters. Sarojini Naidu, Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel, Mr. Jairamdas Daulatram and Dr. Syed Mahmud are also in the picture. Their opinions, no doubt, influenced the course of the discussion. Another figure which does not appear in the group but exerted much influence behind the scenes in the penultimate and final acts, is Mr. A. Rangaswami Aiyangar, the able and tactful Editor of the Hindu newspaper.

THE MAHARAJA OF BIKANER'S FORECAST.

We recently read somewhere a review of a remarkable book by an American writer. Unfortunately, we did not note down the names of the book and the author and have been since trying to find them. In it, the author, we gathered, maintains that Time runs not only forward, but backward as well, and that what we call "consequence" is often really the "cause," and what we call "cause," the "consequence." That is to say, a certain thing takes place in order that some other thing might take place. The former act has really no other raison d'être than the second act. We are tempted to apply the theory to the peace negotiations. The "failure" of these negotiations was, paradoxical as it seems, the cause of their origin. The negotiations, in other words, were expected to fail. Their failure was counted upon and its effect calculated before-hand, at least in one important quarter. The Maharaja of Bikaner is not one to speak on such a matter without the book and this is what his Highness said in a remarkable speech on the day on which the negotiations were announced as imminent:

"The only point I disagree with them (Mr. Jayakar and Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru) is where they have modestly stated that if they fail in their attempts, the responsibility will be theirs, for I make bold to say that they will leave no stone unturned, and if their attempts now fail the responsibility for the failure of such private negotiations will solely rest on the shoulders of those Congress leaders who might take up an impossible position or are found to be obdurate, and such unreasonable attitude must surely result in rallying once again on the side of the British Government the Liberal and moderate leaders as well as the commercial community and many others who would indeed be justified in the circumstances in coming to the conclusion that the Congress leaders were merely bent on destruction all round."

The Maharaja's bias is evident from his assumption that if the negotiations failed it could only be owing to the obstinacy of the Congress leaders. Mr. Jayakar and Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru were evidently embarrassed by the Maharaja's intervention as they had made it perfectly plain that they had not taken up the negotiations with any such ulterior object. And, to do them justice, they did what they could to emphasise that the responsibility for the negotiations was entirely their own. "I can only say," Mr. Jayakar told the Hindu's representative, "I am making the effort in a spirit of humble service. If I succeed, the gain will be my countrymen's, if I fail the misfortune is mine." The Liberal leaders have, as the Maharaja foretold, rallied round the Government, and they have signalled the fact by hastening to lay the blame of the failure of the negotiations, as the Maharaja did by anticipation, on the Congress leaders. They had committed themselves previously to the view that no Round Table Conference would be useful without Mahatma Gandhi. The failure of the Sapru-Jayakar endeavour is evidently felt to have absolved them from that conviction. Its success would have left them cold.

MR. BOMANJI AND THE ELEVEN POINTS.

The starting point of the negotiations, according to the papers now published, was the interview which Pandit Motilal Nehru, when last in Bombay, gave to Mr. George Slocombe, the special correspondent of the Daily Herald then in this country. But really the first opening for negotiations was offered by Mahatma Gandhi when he enunciated his eleven points in Young India. Mr. S. R. Bomanji, in a statement published in the Bombay Chronicle on Monday, has given the origin of these eleven points. They were, he says, given to him in January by Mahatma Gandhi at his request; for placing before Mr. Ramsay Macdonald as "terms on which it was possible to suspend the idea of immediately launching Civil Disobedience and establish contact with the Government." Mr. Bomanji met the Prime Minister and Mr. Wedgwood Benn at 10, Dowling street, on the 27th February. "The eleven points of Mahatmaji," writes Mr. Bomanji, "were considered. Both Mr. Macdonald and Mr. Benn expressed their inability to deal with the enormous amount of matter comprised in the eleven Points and the Premier promised that if these terms would have the backing of Lord Irwin, he would try to persuade the Cabinet to agree to them." Mr. Bomanji is an extremely well-meaning gentleman but he is a business man and not a politician and it may be that the Prime Minister did not take him seriously. Mr. Benn, however, is sure to have mentioned the incident to the Viceroy in his weekly letters even if the latter had not seen the terms in Young India. Lord Irwin did not take that opportunity of responding to Mahatmaji's public offer.

THE SLOCOMBE INTERVIEWS.

There was a second opportunity. Mr. George Slocombe had his famous interview with Mahatma Gandhi in Yerravda Jail. How that interview came about, is still a mystery. We had a version from an important Indian public man but it was so obviously intended to enhance the importance of a publicist, with whom he was then on intimate terms, that only one very inexperienced in public affairs would have given credence to it. Mr. Slocombe's interview was published in India as well as in England. It called forth strong criticisms from the Imperialist Press and the Secretary of State for India apologised in Parliament for the mistake of Mr. Slocombe having been allowed to interview Mahatmaji and undertook that it would not happen again. Lord Irwin was evidently frightened by the criticism in England and when Mr. Slocombe went up to Simla, to follow up his mediatory effort, he could not obtain an interview with his Excellency. He had, therefore, to come back disappointed to Bombay and here he met Pandit Motilal. The papers now published start at this point. It is not, however, clear from the prefatory note to these papers, whether the idea of approaching the Viceroy came from Mr. Slocombe, Mr. Jayakar or Pandit Motilal. No doubt, the Pandit will have something to say on this and other matters arising out of these documents as soon as he is well enough to do so. The possibility, too, of the suggestion having come from a higher quarter should not be dismissed lightly.

THE PATTANI EPISODE.

It is known that Mr. Jinnah was trying to induce one or two people to seek an interview with Mahatma Gandhi, assuring them that he had the very best authority to offer acceptable terms. It may be recalled that the Evening News of India categorically stated that Sir Prabhaskar Pattani had visited Mahatmaji in jail on a mission from the Government of India and that the Times of India had to withdraw and express regret for the statement the next day as Sir Prabhaskar absolutely denied having been even near Poona. Many people thought at the time—ourselves among them—that while Sir Prabhaskar's denial must be accepted, there was something behind the Evening News' statement. The veteran diplomatist of Bhavnagar is an old personal friend of Mahatmaji's, and no better intermediary could be chosen for the delicate task of a political negotiation. Was he asked by any one to see Mahatmaji? We have heard it said that he was but, being an old hand at the game, Sir Prabhaskar demanded that he should first satisfy himself whether he would, in Mahatmaji's position, consider the terms without sacrificing the objects for which he stood, before he could agree to act in the matter as, otherwise, he would be placing Mahatmaji in a false position.

THE TURNING POINT.

We now come to the Sapru-Jayakar negotiations. They seem to have gone on alright until, presumably, on instructions, the two negotiators suggested that the Congress leaders should admit that civil disobedience was wrong and that they had made a mistake in having had recourse to it. On no other hypothesis can the protest in their letter of the 15th August to Mr. Jayakar and his colleague be explained. The passage runs:

Needless to mention that we do not share in any way your view or the Viceroy's that civil disobedience has harmed the country or that it is ill-timed or unconstitutional. English history teems with instances of bloody revolts whose praises Englishmen have sung unstintingly and taught us to do likewise. It, therefore, ill becomes the Viceroy or any Englishman to condemn a revolt that is in intention and that has overwhelmingly remained in execution peaceful.

The Viceroy in his letter of the 28th August pointed to this "blank refusal to recognise the grave injury to which the country has been subjected by the Congress policy, not the least in the economic field" and added: "I do not think any useful purpose would be served by my attempting to deal in detail with the suggestions made and I must frankly say that I regard discussion on the basis of the proposals impossible." If it was a condition precedent to any settlement that the Congress leaders should confess that they were foolish in starting civil disobedience, it should have been made clear to them at the very outset instead of in the middle of the negotiations. Most probably, the negotiations would not have taken place, if that had been done. We cannot think it was quite fair to call upon Mahatma Gandhi and his colleagues to go down upon their knees and to admit that, in starting civil disobedience, they made the biggest mistake of their lives. It started a new issue and led to the spirit of recrimination in a discussion which should have been entirely free from it. It inevitably led to the failure of the negotiations.

A DIGRESSION.

At the risk of digressing, it is necessary to point out, in view of Lord Irwin's observations, the place of civil disobedience in the national movement. Our own opinion of civil disobedience, we have repeatedly expressed. A State or society can only exist on the principle of willing obedience, which, however, must depend largely on the extent to which the policy and measures of the State safeguard the rights and liberties of the people. Laws which can only be enforced by frequent lathi charges, call for prompt modification. A State in which the people have no constitutional means of changing the laws, must promptly provide such means, if it wishes to avert the risk of civil disobedience. In the abstract, therefore, civil disobedience is the only means by which autocracies and bureaucracies can be apprised of the need for reform. In the present instance, it has been our view that the Congress has been too precipitate and that a chance should have been given to the Viceroy and the Labour Government to carry out constitutional reforms on the lines promised by them. This was also the view of Dr. Ansari and some other Congress leaders. The civil disobedience movement, at the beginning, was far from popular. It was the use of force, in several cases utterly unconscionable, against unresisting, unarmed people, that brought about a change in public opinion, and brought to the movement the support of many who do not hold with civil disobedience. Lord Irwin has refused to listen to the representations made by responsible members of the Legislative Assembly and Liberal leaders, including Mr. Jayakar himself. On this point, therefore, the Congress leaders have scored easily over the Government. His Excellency speaks of the results of civil disobedience in the economic sphere. Indian opinion strongly holds that it is the disastrous economic policy of Government which paved the way to civil disobedience. Apart from that, does a nation live by bread alone? Are the beneficial effects of the movement in the moral and social spheres, of no account? Under the touch of the satyagraha sun, the dry bones of the valley have become instinct with life. Is that nothing?

CONGRESS LEADERS' MISTAKE.

We are far from thinking that the Congress leaders made no mistakes during the negotiations. Mahatma Gandhi's position that he was not in living touch with actual conditions in the country, was perfectly right. He should have asked that the principal leaders at least should be released and have some time to acquaint themselves with the conditions, before they could negotiate. That he did not do so, shows that he was really anxious to come to a settlement and did not wish to interpose any obstacles in the way of the negotiations. This was a mistake. But it was not the only one. The subsequent addition of the right of secession and the adjustment of financial obligations, was ill-advised. Mr. Srinivasa Sastry started this idea and he may be left to pursue it in his own style at the R. T. Conference. The debt business, too, would have been more appropriately raised at the Round Table Conference. In either case, the addition was a mistake as it certainly gave the impression of trying to extend the scope of the negotiations beyond their original limits. Yet another mistake was Mahatmaji's shoving of the responsibility for the final decision on the immature shoulders of Pandit Jawharlal Nehru. It would have been well if Mahatma Gandhi had stuck to the terms of his first note and kept the negotiations in his own hands. The world regards him as the leader of India in this movement, and it was a grave error to have handed over the negotiations to Pandit Jawharlal Nehru. The Pandit's letter to Mahatmaji shows that he does not want peace because "warfare" makes him feel that he is alive. The best proof of good health, is that you do not feel that you have a body to think of. Life is not normally self-conscious, and when it seeks to become so, there is something wrong with one's spiritual, if there is nothing wrong with one's physical, condition. However that may be, the danger which we pointed out last week to the non-violent movement from the side of violence is a very serious one, and for that, if for no other reason, a truce must be called to the civil disobedience movement. The movement has become a dead routine, and there are signs of fraying at its edges. The position is full of possibilities which it is the part of prudence as well as of patriotism to avert. A peaceful settlement, even if it does not give us all we want at once, is far preferable to a settlement after a prolonged struggle even though it promises to give us all we want—which it seldom does. The last war is the best proof that victory is often more disastrous than defeat.

Pandit Motilal Nehru:—Pandit Motilal Nehru's health having broken down completely in Jail, Government have felt obliged to release him unconditionally. This is an act which in every civilized country would be regarded as a matter of routine, but such is the rigid administrative system in this country, that it is hailed as an act of statesmanship on the part of the Viceroy, though the order of release emanates from the Provincial Government. Even the politically-minded amongst Indians cannot visualise right and humanity and justice except as emanations from a super-virtuous mind, instead of being, as it should be, the normal functioning of every civilised brain. It was a gross blunder to have arrested the Pandit at all, and a heavy responsibility rests upon the Jail authorities for not having taken sufficient care of him when in their custody.

JAYAKAR-SAPRU NEGOTIATIONS.

The two peace negotiators, Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and Mr. M. R. Jayakar, remained at the Yeravda prison for about an hour on the 5th instant. When they came out, they made the following statement:—

“We regret to announce that the present negotiations have failed. We are releasing the correspondence in the course of to-night or to-morrow.

HOW THEY BEGAN.

Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and Mr. Jayakar made the following statement embodying the correspondence that has passed between them and the Congress leaders in jail in the course of the last two months:—

The facts connected with the efforts which we have been making for over two months for the restoration of peaceful conditions in the country are as follows:—

On June 20, 1930 Pandit Motilal Nehru gave an interview to Mr. Slocombe, special correspondent of the Daily Herald (London) with regard to his views about attending the Round Table Conference. This interview has already appeared in India. Shortly thereafter Mr. Slocombe had a conversation with Pandit Motilal Nehru in Bombay as a result of which certain terms were drafted by Mr. Slocombe and submitted to Pandit Motilal Nehru and approved by him at a meeting in Bombay at which Pandit Motilal Nehru, Mr. Jayakar and Mr. Slocombe alone were present. One copy of these terms was sent to Mr. Jayakar by Mr. Slocombe as agreed upon by Pandit Motilal Nehru as the basis of his (Mr. Jayakar's) or any third party's approach to the Viceroy. Mr. Slocombe likewise addressed a letter to Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru at Simla forwarding a copy of these terms. In the course of this letter Mr. Slocombe said that Pandit Motilal Nehru had agreed to our acting as intermediaries for the purpose of approaching the Viceroy on the basis of these terms. We give below the full text of this document.

PANDIT MOTILAL'S STATEMENT.

Statement submitted to Pandit Motilal Nehru in Bombay on June 25, 1930, and approved as the basis of an informal approach to the Viceroy by a third party: “If in certain circumstances the British Government and the Government of India, although unable to anticipate the recommendations that may in perfect freedom be made by the Round Table Conference or the attitude which the British Parliament may reserve for such recommendations, would nevertheless be willing to give a private assurance that they would support the demand for full responsible Government for India subject to such mutual adjustments and terms of transfer as are required by the special needs and conditions of India and by her long association with Great Britain and as may be decided by the Round Table Conference, Pandit Motilal Nehru would undertake to take personally such an assurance or the indication received from a responsible third party that such an assurance would be forthcoming—to Mr. Gandhi and to Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. If such an assurance were offered and accepted it would render possible a general measure of conciliation which should entail the simultaneous calling off of the civil disobedience movement, the cessation of Government's present repressive policy and a generous measure of amnesty for political prisoners and would be followed by the participation of the Congress in the Round Table Conference on terms to be mutually agreed upon.”

LETTER TO LORD IRWIN.

On the basis of this document we interviewed the Viceroy at Simla more than once in the early part of July last and explained to him the situation in the country and ultimately wrote him the following letter:—

Dear Lord Irwin,

We would beg leave to draw your Excellency's attention to the political situation in the country which, in our opinion, makes it imperative that some steps should be taken without any loss of time to restore normal conditions. We are alive to the dangers of the civil disobedience movement with which neither of us has sympathised nor has been associated but we feel that in the contest between the people and the Government which has involved the adoption of a policy of repression and consequent embitterment of popular feeling, the true and abiding interests of the country are apt to be sacrificed.

We think it is our duty to our country and to the Government that we should make an endeavour to ameliorate the present situation by discussing the question with some of the leaders of the movement in the hope and belief that we may be able to persuade them to help in the restoration of normal conditions.

If we have read Your Excellency's speech a right we think that, while Your Excellency and Government feel compelled to resist the civil disobedience movement you are not less anxious to explore every possibility of finding an agreed solution of the constitutional problem. We need scarcely say that we believe that with the cessation of the movement there will be no occasion for the continuance on the part of the Government of the present policy and those emergency measures which have been passed by the Government to implement that policy.

We therefore approach Your Excellency with the request that you may be pleased to permit us to interview Mr. Gandhi, Pandit Motilal Nehru and Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru so that we may put our points of view before them and urge them in the interests of the country to respond to our appeal and enable the big issue of constitutional advance being solved in a calm atmosphere.

We desire to make it plain that in going to them we shall be going on our own behalf and we do not profess to represent either the Government or any party in taking this step. If we fail in our attempt the responsibility will be ours. Should Your Excellency be pleased to grant us permission to see these gentlemen in jail we shall request you to issue the necessary orders to the local Governments concerned to allow us the necessary facilities. We further request that if the necessary permission is granted to us we may be allowed to talk to them privately without there being any officer of the Government present at our interview. We further submit that in our opinion it is desirable that we should see them at the earliest possible date. The reply to this letter may be sent to Mr. Jayakar at the Hotel Cecil.

Your Sincerely,

(Sd.) TEJ BAHADUR SAPRU.

(Sd.) M. R. JAYAKAR.

THE VICEROY'S REPLY.

To the above letter the Viceroy made the following reply:—

Simla, July 16.

Dear Mr. Jayakar,

I have received your letter of the 13th July. You and Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru state your desire to do all in your power to bring about a return of peaceful condition in the country and ask for permission to approach Mr. Gandhi, Pandit Motilal Nehru and Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru with this object.

I have had occasion in my address to the Legislature on 9th July to define the attitude of myself and of my Government both to civil disobedience movement and to the constitutional issues. We consider that the civil disobedience movement is doing unmixed harm to the cause of India and many important communities, classes and parties hold the same view. With their help, therefore, the Government must continue to oppose it by all the means in their power, but you rightly recognise that we are not the less anxious to see the achievement of the solution of the constitutional problem by agreement among all the interests concerned.

It is evidently not possible for me to anticipate the proposals that will be made by the Government of India after they have had time to consider the Statutory Commission's report or by the Round Table Conference and still less the decisions of Parliament, but I made it plain in my speech that it remains my earnest desire as it is that of my government and I have no doubt also that of His Majesty's Government, to do everything that we can in our respective spheres, to assist the people of India to obtain as large a degree of the management of their own affairs as can be shown to be consistent with making provision for these matters in regard to which they are not at present in a position to assume responsibility.

What those matters may be and what provisions may best be made for them will engage the attention of the Conference but I have never believed that with mutual confidence on both sides it should be impossible to reach an agreement. If, therefore, you believe that by the action proposed you may be able to assist in the restoration of normal conditions in the country it would not be right for me or my Government to interpose any obstacles to your efforts, nor do I think that those who have stood side by side with my Government in steadily opposing the civil disobedience movement and whose co-operation I so much value would wish me to do so. On hearing from you, I will accordingly ask the local Governments concerned to issue the necessary instructions which will enable you to make your public-spirited attempt in the cause of peace in India.

Yours Sincerely,

(Sd.) IRWIN.

MHATMA GANDHI'S MEMORANDUM.

With these two documents we interviewed Mr. Gandhi at Yeravda Jail in Poona on the 23rd and 24th July 1930. During the interview we explained to Mr. Gandhi the whole situation and gave him the substance of our conversation with the Viceroy. Mr. Gandhi gave us the following note and letter to be handed over to Pandits Motilal Nehru and Jawaharlal Nehru at Naini Jail, Allahabad:—

“CONSTITUTIONAL ISSUE.”

“(1) So far as this question is concerned, my personal position is that if the Round Table Conference is restricted to a discussion of the safeguards that may be necessary in connection with full self-Government during the period of transition, I should have no objection, it being understood that the question of independence should not be ruled out if anybody raised it. I should be satisfied, before I could endorse the idea of Congress attending the Conference, about its whole composition.

“(2) If the Congress is satisfied as to the Round Table Conference, naturally civil disobedience would be called off, that is to say, disobedience of certain laws for the sake of disobedience—but (1) peaceful picketing of foreign cloth and liquor shops will be continued, unless the Government themselves can enforce the prohibition of liquor and foreign cloth, and (ii) the manufacture of salt by the populace will have to be continued and the penal clauses of the Salt Act should not be enforced.

There will be no raids on the Government salt depots or private depots. I will agree even if this clause is not made a clause in these terms, but is accepted as an understanding in writing.

“(3) (a)—Simultaneously with the calling off of civil disobedience, all Satyagrahi prisoners and other political prisoners, convicted or under trial, who have not been guilty of violence or incitement to violence should be ordered to be released;

(b) properties confiscated under the Salt Act, Press Act and Revenue Act and the like should be restored; (c) Fines and securities taken from convicted Satyagrahis or under the Press Act should be refunded; (d) all officers including village officers, who have resigned or who may have been dismissed during the civil disobedience movement and who may desire to rejoin Government service, should be restored—N. B. The foregoing should refer also to the non-co-operation period; (e) The Viceregal Ordinances should be repealed.

"This opinion of mine is purely provisional because I consider that a prisoner has no right to pronounce any opinion upon the political activities of which he cannot possibly have a full grasp while he is shut out of personal contact. I, therefore, feel that my opinion is not entitled to the weight I should claim for it if I was in touch with the movement. Mr. Jayakar and Dr. Sapru may show this to Pandit Motilal Nehru, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel and those who are in charge of the movement.

"Nothing is to appear in the press. This is not to be shown to the Viceroy at this stage.

"Even if the foregoing terms are accepted I should not care to attend the Conference unless in the event of my going out of prison I gained the self-confidence which I have not at present and unless among those Indians who would be invited there was a preliminary conversation and agreement as to the minimum by which they should stand under all circumstances. I reserve to myself the liberty, when the occasion arrives of testing every Swaraj scheme by its ability to satisfy the object underlying the eleven points mentioned in my letter to the Viceroy.

Yeravda Central Prison, (Sd.) M. K. Gandhi.
23-7-30.

MAHATMA GANDHI'S LETTER TO PANDIT MOTILAL.

The following is Mr. Gandhi's covering letter to Pandit Motilal Nehru:—

"My position is essentially awkward. Being temperamentally so built, I cannot give a decisive opinion on matters happening outside the prison walls. What I have therefore given to our friends is the roughest draft of what is likely to satisfy me personally. You may not know that I was disinclined to give anything to Mr. Slocombe and wanted him to discuss things with you but I could not resist his appeal and let him publish the interview before seeing you.

"At the same time I do not want to stand in the way of an honourable settlement if the time for it is ripe. I have grave doubts about it but after all, Jawaharlal's must be the final voice. You and I can only give our advice to him. What I have said in my memorandum given to Sir Tej Bahadur and Mr. Jayakar is the utmost limit to which I can go, but Jawaharlal and, for that matter also you may consider my position to be inconsistent with the intrinsic Congress policy or the present temper of the people.

"I should have no hesitation in supporting any stronger position up to the letter of the Lahore resolution. You need therefore attach no weight to my memorandum unless it finds an echo in the hearts of you both. I know that neither you or Jawahar were enamoured of the eleven points brought out in my first letter to the Viceroy. I do not know whether you still have the same opinion. My own mind is quite clear about them. They are to me the substance of independence. I should have nothing to do with anything that would not give the nation power to give immediate effect to them. In restricting myself to the three only in the memorandum I have not waived the other eight. But the three are now brought out to deal with civil disobedience. I would be no party to any truce which would undo the position at which we have arrived to-day.

Yeravda Mandir,
23-7-30.

Yours Sincerely,
(Sd.) M. K. Gandhi.

NEHRUS INTERVIEWED AND THEIR REPLY.

Accordingly on the 27th and 28th July we saw Pandits Motilal Nehru and Jawaharlal Nehru at Naini Jail, Allahabad, and after a review of the entire position in the light of the Viceroy's letter and Mr. Gandhi's note and the letter referred to above, Pandits Motilal Nehru and Jawaharlal Nehru gave us the following two documents to be taken to Mr. Gandhi at Yeravada, Poona.

Memorandum dated 28th July 1930 by Pandits Motilal Nehru and Jawaharlal Nehru, Central Prison, Naini, Allahabad.

"We have had long conversations with Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and Mr. Jayakar and they have informed us of the various events which led to their seeking interviews with Gandhiji and with us in our respective prisons in order, if possible, to terminate or suspend the present hostilities between the people of India and the British Government. We appreciate their earnest desire for peace and would gladly explore all avenues which might lead to it, provided such a peace was an honourable one for the people of India who have already sacrificed so much in the national struggle and meant freedom for our country. As representatives of the Congress, we have no authority to alter in any material particular its resolutions, but we might be prepared under certain circumstances to recommend a variation in the details, provided the fundamental position taken up by the Congress was accepted.

"We are, however, faced with an initial difficulty. Both of us are in prison and for sometime past have been cut off from the outside world and the national movement. One of us for nearly three months was not allowed any daily newspaper. Gandhiji has also been in prison for several months. Indeed, almost all our colleagues of the original Working Committee of the Congress are in prison and the Committee itself has been declared an illegal organisation. Of the 300 members of the All India Congress Committee, which is the final authority in the National Congress, probably 75 per cent. are in prison. Cut off, as we are, from the national movement, we cannot take upon ourselves the responsibility of taking a definite step without the fullest consultation with our colleagues and especially with Gandhiji.

"As regards the Round Table Conference we feel that it is unlikely to achieve anything unless an agreement on all vital matters is previously arrived at. We attach great importance to such an agreement which must be definite and there must be no room for misunderstanding or misinterpretation.

"Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and Mr. Jayakar have made it very clear and Lord Irwin has also stated in his published letter to them that they are acting on their own behalf and cannot commit him or his Government. It is, however, possible that they may succeed in paving the way to such an agreement between the Congress and the British Government. As we are unable to suggest any definite terms for truce without consulting Gandhiji and other colleagues, we refrain from discussing the suggestions made by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and Mr. Jayakar and by Gandhiji in the note of his dated 23rd July which has been shown to us. We might however, say that we agree generally with Mr. Gandhi's 2nd and 3rd points. But we should like to discuss with him any other details of those points and specially his point (1) before we can finally make our suggestions. We suggest that this note of ours be treated as confidential and be shown only to such persons as see Mr. Gandhi's note dated 23-7-30."

PANDIT JAWAHARLAL'S LETTER.

Letter dated 23-7-30 from Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, Central Prison, Naini, Allahabad to Mr. Gandhi, Yeravda Jail, Poona:—

"Central Prison, Naini, 28-7-30.

"My dear Bapuji,

"It is a delight to write to you again after a long interval even though it will be from one prison to another. I would like to write at length, but I am afraid I cannot do so at present. I shall, therefore, confine myself to the matter in issue. Dr. Sapru and Mr. Jayakar came yesterday and had a long interview with father and me. To-day they are coming again. As they have already put us in possession of all facts and shown us your note and letter, we felt we could discuss the matter between us two and arrive at some decision even without waiting for the second interview. Of course, if anything new turns up at the 2nd interview we are prepared to vary any previously formed opinion. Our conclusions for the time being are given in a note which we are giving to Dr. Sapru and Mr. Jayakar. This is more or less brief, but it will, I hope, give you some idea of how our minds are working. I might add that father and I are in full agreement in regard to what our attitude should be.

"I might confess that your point (1) regarding the constitutional issue has not won me over nor does father fancy it. I do not see how it fits in with our position or our pledges or with the realities of to-day. Father and I entirely agree with you that we can be 'no parties to any truce which would undo the position at which we have arrived to-day.' It is because of this that the fullest consideration is essential before any final decision is arrived at. I must confess I do not see an appreciable advance yet from the other side and I greatly fear a false or weak move on our part. I am expressing myself moderately. For myself, I delight in warfare. It makes me feel that I am alive. The events of the last four months in India have gladdened my heart and have made me prouder of Indian men and women and even children than I have ever been, but I realise that most people are not warlike and like peace, so I try hard to suppress myself and take a peaceful view.

"May I congratulate you on the new India you have created by your magic touch. What the future will bring I know not, but the past has made life worth living and our prosaic existence has developed something of epic greatness in it. Sitting here in Naini Jail I have pondered on the wonderful efficacy of non-violence as a weapon and have become a greater convert to it than ever before. I hope you are not dissatisfied with the response of the country to the non-violence creed. Despite occasional lapses, the country has stuck to it wonderfully, certainly far more grimly than I had expected.

"I am afraid I am still somewhat of a protestant regarding your eleven points, not that I disagree with any one of them; indeed, they are important. Yet I do not think that they take the place of independence; but I certainly agree with you that 'we should have nothing to do with anything that would not give the nation the power to give immediate effect to them.' Father had been unwell for the last eight days ever since he took an injection. He has grown very weak. This long interview last evening tired him out.

(Sd. JAWAHARLAL.

Please do not be anxious about me. It is only a passing trouble and I hope to get over it in two or three days. Love, (Sd.) MOTILAL NEHRU.

"We have had another talk with Dr. Sapru and Mr. Jayakar. At their desire, we have made some alterations in our note, but they do not make any vital difference. Our position is quite clear and I have no doubt whatever about it. I hope you will appreciate it."

SECOND INTERVIEW WITH MR. GANDHI.

Accordingly Mr. Jayakar alone saw Mr. Gandhi on July 31 and August 1 and 2 when Mr. Gandhi dictated to him the following note:—

"(1) No constitutional scheme would be acceptable to Mr. Gandhi which did not contain a clause allowing India the right to secede from the Empire at her desire and another clause which gave the right and power to India to deal satisfactorily with his eleven points.

"(2) The Viceroy should be made aware of this position of Mr. Gandhi in order that the Viceroy should not consider later that these views of Mr. Gandhi had taken him by surprise when they were urged at the Round Table Conference.

"(3) The Viceroy should also be made aware that Mr. Gandhi would insist at the Round Table Conference on the clause giving India the right to have examined by an independent tribunal all British claims and concessions given to Britishers in the past."

CONFERENCE WITH CONGRESS LEADERS AT YERAVDA.

After that a joint interview took place at Yeravda Jail, Poona, on the 13th, 14th and 15th August between us on the one hand and Mr. Gandhi, Pandits Motilal Nehru and Jawaharlal Nehru, Vallabhbhai Patel, Dr. Mahmood, Mr. Jairamdas Daulatram and Mrs. Naidu on the other. As a result of our conversations with them on these occasions the Congress leaders gave us a letter with permission to show it to the Viceroy. This letter is set out below:—

LEADERS' LETTER TO THE NEGOTIATORS.

"Yeravda, Central Prison,
15-8-30.

Dear friends,

"We are deeply grateful to you for having undertaken the duty of trying to effect a peace settlement between the British Government and the Congress. After having perused the correspondence between yourselves and His Excellency the Viceroy and having had the benefit of protracted talks with you and having discussed among ourselves, we have come to the conclusion that the time is not yet ripe for securing a settlement honourable for our country.

Marvellous as has been the mass awakening during the past five months and great as have been the sufferings of the people among all grades and classes representing different creeds, we feel that the sufferings have been neither sustained enough nor large enough for the immediate attainment of the end.

"Needless to mention that we do not in any way share your view or the Viceroy's that civil disobedience has harmed the country or that it is ill-timed or unconstitutional. English history teems with instances of bloody revolts whose praises Englishmen have sung unstintingly and taught us to do likewise. It, therefore, ill becomes the Viceroy or any intelligent Englishman to condemn a revolt that is in intention and that has overwhelmingly remained in execution, peaceful. But we have no desire to quarrel with condemnation, whether official or unofficial, of the present civil disobedience campaign. The wonderful mass response to the movement is, we hold, its sufficient justification.

"What is, however, to the point here is the fact that we gladly make common cause with you in wishing, if it is at all possible, to stop or suspend civil disobedience. It can be no pleasure to us needlessly to expose men, women and even children of our country to imprisonment, lathi charges, and worse. You will, therefore, believe us when we assure you and through you the Viceroy, that we would leave no stone unturned to explore any and every channel for an honourable peace.

"But we are free to confess that as yet we see no such sign on the horizon. We notice no symptom of the conversion of the English official world to the view that it is India's men and women who must decide what is best for India. We distrust the pious declarations of good intentions, often well meant, of officials. The age-long exploitation by the English of the people of this ancient land has rendered them almost incapable of seeing the ruin, moral, economic and political, of our country which this exploitation has brought about. They cannot persuade themselves to see that the one thing needful for them to do is to get off our backs and do some reparation for the past wrongs by helping us to grow out of the dwarfing progress that has gone on for a century of British domination.

"But we know you and some of our learned countrymen think differently. You believe a conversion has taken place, at any rate, sufficient to warrant participation in the proposed Conference. In spite, therefore, of the limitation we are labouring under, we would gladly co-operate with you to the extent of our ability.

"The following is the utmost response it is possible for us, circumstanced as we are to make to your friendly endeavour. We feel the language used by the Viceroy in the reply given to your letter about the proposed Conference is too vague to enable us to assess its value in the terms of the national demand framed last year at Lahore; nor are we in a position to say anything authoritative without a reference to a properly constituted meeting of the Working Committee of the Congress and, if necessary, to the A. I. C. C.

"But we can say that, for us individually, no solution will be satisfactory unless (a) it recognises in as many words the right of India to secede at will from the British Empire, (b) it gives to India a complete national government responsible to her people, including control of defence forces and economic control, and covers all the eleven points raised in Gandhiji's letter to the Viceroy, and (c) it gives to India the right to refer, if necessary, to an independent tribunal such British claims, concessions and the like, including the so-called public debt of India, as may seem to the National Government to be unjust or not in the interest of the people of India. NOTE:—Such adjustments as may be necessitated in the interests of India during the transference of power to be determined by India's chosen representatives.

"If the foregoing appears to be feasible to the British Government and a satisfactory declaration is made to that effect, we should recommend to the Working Committee the advisability of calling off civil disobedience, that is to say, disobedience of certain laws for the sake of disobedience. But peaceful picketing of foreign cloth and liquor will be continued unless the Government themselves can enforce prohibition of liquor and foreign cloth. The manufacture of salt by the people will have to be continued and the penal clauses of the Salt Act should not be enforced. There will be no raids on Government or private salt depots.

Simultaneously with the calling off of the civil disobedience (a) all Satyagrahi prisoners and other political prisoners, convicted or under trial, who have not been guilty of violence or incitement to violence, should be ordered to be released; (b) Properties confiscated under the Salt Act, Press Act, Revenue Act and the like should be restored; (c) Fines and securities taken from convicted Satyagrahis or under the Press Act should be refunded; (d) All officers, including village officers who have resigned or who may have been dismissed during the civil disobedience movement and who may desire to rejoin Government service, should be reinstated. Note:—The foregoing sub-clauses refer also to the non-co-operation period; (e) All Viceregal Ordinances should be repealed.

“The question of the composition of the proposed Conference and of the Congress being represented at it can only be decided after the foregoing preliminaries are satisfactorily settled.

Yours sincerely,

MOTILAL NEHRU.	VALLABHBHAI PATEL.
M. K. GANDHI.	JAIRAMDAS DAULATRAM.
SAROJINI NAIDU.	SYED MAHOMED.

JAWAHARLAL NEHRU.
NEGOTIATORS, REPLY.

We sent them the following reply from Winter Road, Malabar Hill, Bombay, on 16-8-30:—

“Dear friends,

“We desire to express our thanks to you all for the courteous and patient hearing which you have been good enough to give us on several occasions on which we visited you either at Poona or Allahabad. We regret we should have caused you so much inconvenience by these prolonged conversations and we are particularly sorry Pandit Motilal Nehru should have been put to the trouble of coming down to Poona at a time when his health was so bad. We beg formally to acknowledge receipt of the letter which you have handed us and in which you state the terms on which you are prepared to recommend to the Congress to call off the civil disobedience and to participate in the Round Table Conference.

“As we have informed you we took up this work of mediation on the basis of (1) the terms of the interview given by Pandit Motilal Nehru, then Acting President of the Congress, to Mr. Slocombe in Bombay on 20-6-30 and particularly, (2) the terms of the statement submitted by Mr. Slocombe to Pandit Motilal Nehru in Bombay on 25-6-30 and approved by him (Pandit Motilal Nehru) as the basis of an informal approach to the Viceroy by us. Mr. Slocombe forwarded both the documents to us and we thereupon approached His Excellency the Viceroy for permission to interview Mahatma Gandhi and Pandits Motilal Nehru and Jawaharlal Nehru in order to explore possibilities of settlements. Copy of second document referred to above has been taken by you from us.

“We now find the terms embodied in the letter you gave us on 14th instant are such that, as agreed between us, it must be submitted to His Excellency the Viceroy for his consideration, and we have to await his decision. We note your desire that material documents relating to these peace negotiations, including your said letter to us, should be published and we shall proceed to do this after His Excellency the Viceroy has considered your letter.

“Before we conclude, you will permit us to say we had reasons to believe as we told you, that with the actual calling off of the civil disobedience movement, the general situation would largely improve, non-violent political prisoners would be released, all Ordinances with the exception of those affecting the Chittagong and Lahore Conspiracy Cases would be recalled and the Congress would get representation in the Round Table Conference larger than that of any other single political party.

“We need scarcely add that we emphasised also that, in our opinion, there was substantially no difference between the point of view adopted by Pandit Motilal Nehru in his interview and the statement sent us by Mr. Slocombe with Pandit Motilal's approval and His Excellency the Viceroy's letter to us.

Yours sincerely,

Sd. T. B. SAPRU.
M. R. JAYAKAR.

VICEROY'S REPLY.

Thereafter, Mr. Jayakar alone took the letter of the Congress leaders to Simla on 21st August and had conversations with the Viceroy. Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru joined him on the 25th. We then had several interviews with the Viceroy and some members of his Council between 25th and 27th August. As a result of the same the Viceroy gave us a letter to show to Congress leaders at Allahabad and Poona. The following is a text of that letter.—

Viceregal Lodge, Simla, 28-8-30.

“Dear Sir Tej Bahadur,

“I have to thank you for informing me of the results of conversation held by Mr. Jayakar and yourself with the Congress leaders now in prison and for sending me copies of their joint letter of 15th August and of your reply thereto. I should wish you and Mr. Jayakar both to know how great has been my appreciation of the spirit in which you have pursued your self-imposed public-spirited task of endeavouring to assist in restoration of normal conditions in India.

"It is worth recalling the conditions under which you entered upon your undertaking. In my letter of 16th July, I assured you it was the earnest desire of myself, my Government and I had no doubt also of His Majesty's Government to do everything we could to assist the people of India to obtain as large a degree in the management of their own affairs as could be shown to be consistent with making provision for those matters in regard to which they were not at present in a position to assume responsibility. It would be among the functions of the Conference to examine in the light of all material available what those matters might be and what provision might best be made for them. I previously made two other points plain in my speech to the legislature on 9th July first that those attending the conference would have the unfettered right of examining the whole constitutional problem in all its bearings, and secondly that any agreement at which the conference was able to arrive would form the basis of the proposals which His Majesty's Government would later submit to Parliament.

"I fear, as you will no doubt recognise, that the task you had voluntarily undertaken has not been assisted by the letter you have received from the Congress leaders.

"In view both of the general tone by which that letter is inspired and of its contents as also of its blank refusal to recognise the grave injury to which the country has been subjected by the Congress policy, not the least in the economic field, I do not think any useful purpose would be served by my attempting to deal in detail with the suggestions there made and I must frankly say I regard discussion on the basis of the proposals contained in the letter as impossible.

"I hope, if you desire to see the Congress leaders again, you will make this plain.

"There is one further comment I must make upon the last paragraph of your reply to them dated 16th August. When we discussed these matters I said, if civil disobedience movement was in fact abandoned, I should not desire to continue the Ordinances (apart from those connected with the Lahore Conspiracy Case and Chittagong) necessitated by a situation which "ex hypothesi" would no longer exist. But I was careful to make it plain that, I was unable to give any assurance, if and when the civil disobedience movement ceases that Local Governments would find it possible to release all persons convicted or under trial for offences in connection with the movement not involving violence and that, while I should wish to see a generous policy pursued in this matter, the utmost that I could promise would be to move all the Local Governments to consider with sympathy all cases individually on their merits.

"Upon the point of your reference to the representation of the Congress at the Conference, in the event of their abandoning the civil disobedience movement and desiring to attend, my recollection is that you explained that the demand of the Congress was not for a predominant, in the sense of majority, representation of the whole Conference and that I expressed the view that I should anticipate little difficulty in recommending to His Majesty's Government to secure that the Congress should be adequately represented. I added, if events so developed I should be ready to receive a panel of names from leaders of the Congress Party of those whom they would regard as suitable representatives.

"I feel that you and Mr. Jayakar would desire to be clearly informed of the position of myself and my Government as it may be desirable that the letters should be published at an early date in order that the public may be fully informed of the circumstances in which your efforts have failed to produce the result you hoped and they so certainly deserved.

"Yours sincerely,
Sd. IRWIN."

ELUCIDATION OF THE VICEROY'S OFFER.

The Viceroy also permitted us to mention to the Congress leaders the result of our conversations with him on certain specific points raised by us in connection with the letter of the Congress leaders. We left Simla on 28th August and interviewed Pandits Motilal Nehru and Jawaharlal Nehru and Dr. Mahmood in Naini jail, Allahabad on 30 and 31st August. We showed them the said letter of the Viceroy and placed before them the result of our conversations. We explained to them with reference to the several points raised in their letter to us of 15th August and not covered in the Viceroy's letter of 23rd August, that we had reason to believe from the conversations we had with the Viceroy that a settlement was possible on the following basis:—

(a) On the constitutional question the position would be as stated in the 4 fundamental points in Para 2 of the Viceroy's letter to us of 28th August.

(b) With reference to the question whether Mr. Gandhi would be allowed to raise at the Round Table Conference the question of India's right to secede from the Empire at will, the position was as follows:—"As the Viceroy had stated in his said letter to us, the Conference was a free conference and therefore any one could raise any point he liked. But the Viceroy thought it would be very unwise for Mr. Gandhi to raise the question now. If, however, he faced the Government of India with such a question, the Viceroy would say the Government were not prepared to treat it as an open question. If, in spite of this, Mr. Gandhi desired to raise the question the Government would inform the Secretary of State of his intention to do so at the Round Table Conference."

(c) As regards right to raise at the Round Table Conference, the question of India's liability to certain financial burdens and to get them examined by an independent tribunal, the position was that the Viceroy could not entertain any proposition amounting to total repudiation of all debts; but it would be open to anyone to raise at the Round Table Conference any question as to any financial liability of India and to call for an examination.

(D) As regards granting relief against the Salt Act, the position of the Viceroy was that (i) Salt tax was going to be provincialised, if the recommendation of the Simon Commission in that behalf was accepted; and (ii) there had already been a great loss of revenue and therefore the Government would not like to forego this source. But if the Legislature was persuaded to repeal the Salt Act and if any proposal was put forward to make good the loss of revenue occasioned by such a repeal, the Viceroy and his Government would consider the question on its merits. It was not, however, possible for the Viceroy to condone open breaches of the Salt Act as long as it was law. When goodwill and peace were restored and if Indian leaders desired to discuss with the Viceroy and his Government how best economic relief could be given to the poorer classes, His Excellency the Viceroy would be glad to call a small conference of Indian leaders.

(E) With reference to picketing, the position was that, if picketing amounted to a nuisance to any class of people or was coupled with molestation or intimidation or use of force, the Viceroy reserved to the Government the right of taking such action as the law allowed or taking such legal powers as might be necessary to meet any emergency that might arise. Subject to the above, when peace was established, the Ordinance against picketing would be withdrawn.

(F) With regard to the re-employment of officers who resigned or had been dismissed during the civil disobedience campaign, the position was: This matter was primarily a question for the discretion of the Local Governments. Subject, however, to there being vacancies and as long as it did not involve dismissing men who had been employed by the Government during the period of their trouble and had proved loyal, the Local Governments would be expected to re-employ men who had thrown up their appointments in a fit of excitement or who had been swept off their feet.

(G) As for the restoration of printing presses confiscated under the Press Ordinance, there would be no difficulty.

(H) As regards the restoration of fines and properties confiscated under the revenue law, that required closer definition. As to properties confiscated and sold under such law, there might be rights of third parties involved. As to refunding of fines there were difficulties. In short, all that the Viceroy could say was that the Local Government would exercise their discretion with justice and take all circumstances into consideration and try to be as accommodating as they could.

SECOND INTERVIEW WITH NEHRU.

"We made clear to Pandit Motilal Nehru and Dr. Mahmood during their said two interviews with us that, though the time before us was limited, further progress with our negotiations was possible on the lines indicated above. They, however, expressed their unwillingness to accept any settlement on this basis and gave us a note for Mr. Gandhi which is as follows:—

"Naini Central Prison, 31-8-30.

"We have had further interviews with Mr. Jayakar and Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru yesterday and to-day and have had the advantage of long talks with them. They have given us copy of the letter dated 28th August, addressed to them by Lord Irwin. In this letter it is stated clearly that Lord Irwin regards discussion on the basis of the proposals contained in our joint letter of 15th August to Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and Mr. Jayakar as impossible and under the circumstances he rightly concludes that their efforts have failed to produce any result.

"This joint letter, as you know, was written after full consideration by the signatories to it and represented the utmost they were prepared to go in their individual capacities. We stated there that no solution would be satisfactory unless it fulfilled certain vital conditions and that a satisfactory declaration to that effect was made by the British Government. If such a declaration was made, we would be prepared to recommend to the Working Committee the advisability of calling off civil disobedience, provided simultaneously certain steps indicated in our letter were taken by the British Government in India. It was only after a satisfactory settlement of all these preliminaries that the question of composition of the proposed London Conference and of the Congress being represented at it could be decided.

"Lord Irwin, in his letter, considers even a discussion on the basis of these proposals as impossible. Under the circumstances, there is, or can be, no common ground between us. Quite apart from the contents and tone of the letter the recent activities of the British Government in India clearly indicate that the Government has no desire for peace. The proclamation of the Working Committee as an illegal body in the Delhi Province soon after the meeting of it was announced to be held there and the subsequent arrest of most of its members can have that meaning and no other.

"We have no complaint against these arrests or other activities of the Government, uncivilised and barbarous as we consider some of these to be. We welcome them, but we feel we are justified in pointing out that desire for peace and aggressive attack on the very body which is capable of giving peace and with which it is sought to treat, don't go well together. The proscription of the Working Committee all over India and the attempt to prevent its meetings must necessarily mean that the national struggle must go on, whatever the consequences, and that there will be no possibility of peace, because those who may have some authority to represent the people of India will be spread out in British prisons all over India.

Lord Irwin's letter and the action taken by the British Government make plain that the efforts of Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and Mr. Jayakar have been in vain. Indeed, the letter and some of the explanations that have been given us take us back in some respects even from the position that was previously taken. In view of this great hiatus that exists between our position and Lord Irwin's it is hardly necessary to go into details. But we should like to point out to you certain aspects of his letter. The first part of the letter is practically a repetition of his speech in the Assembly and of the phrases used in his letter dated July 16 addressed to Mr. Jayakar and Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru. As we pointed out in our joint letter, this phraseology is too vague for us to assess its value. It may be made to mean anything or nothing. In our joint letter, we have made it clear that complete national government responsible to the people of India, including the control of defence forces and economic control, must be recognised as India's immediate demand. There is no question of what are usually called safeguards or any delay. Adjustments there necessarily must be for transference of power, and in regard to these we stated that they were to be determined by India's chosen representatives. With regard to India's right to secession at will from the British Empire and her right to refer British claims and concessions to an independent tribunal all we are told is that the Conference will be a free Conference and any point can be raised there. This is no advance on the previous statement made.

"We are further told, however, that if the British Government in India were definitely faced with the possibility of the former question being raised, Lord Irwin would say that they were not to treat it as an open question. All they could do was to inform the Secretary of State of our intention to raise the question at the Conference. With regard to the other proposition, we are told that Lord Irwin could only entertain the idea of a few individual financial transactions being subjected to scrutiny. While such scrutiny may take place in individual cases its scope will have to extend to the whole field of British claims, including, as we have stated, the so-called public debt of India. We consider both these questions as of vital importance and previous agreement as mentioned in our joint letter seems to us essential.

"Lord Irwin's reference to the release of prisoners is very restricted and unsatisfactory. He is unable to give an assurance that all of non-violent civil disobedience prisoners even will be discharged. All he proposes to do is to leave the matter in the hands of Local Governments. We are not prepared to trust in such a matter to the generosity or sympathy of Local Governments or local officials; but apart from this, there is no reference in Lord Irwin's letter to other non-violent prisoners. There is a large number of Congressmen and others who were sent to prison for political offences prior to the civil disobedience movement. We might mention in this connection the Meerut Case prisoners also who have already spent a year and a half as under trials. We have made it clear in our joint letter that all those should be released.

Regarding Bengal and Lahore Case ordinances, we feel that no exception should be made in their favour as suggested by Lord Irwin. We have not claimed the release of those political prisoners who may have been guilty of violence not because we would not welcome their release, but because we felt that as our movement was strictly non-violent we would not confuse the issue; but the least we can do is to press for an ordinary trial for these fellow-countrymen of ours and not by an extraordinary court constituted by an Ordinance which denies them the right of appeal and the ordinary privileges of an accused. Amazing events, including brutal assaults that have occurred even in the open court during the so-called trial, make it imperative that the ordinary procedure should be followed. We understand that some of the accused, in protest for the treatment accorded to them, have been on hunger strike for a long period and are now at death's door.

"The Bengal Ordinance, we understand, has been replaced by an Act of the Bengal Council. We consider this Ordinance and any Act based on it most objectionable and the fact that an unrepresentative body like the present Bengal Council has passed it does not make it any the better.

"With regard to further picketing of foreign cloth and liquor shops, we are told that Lord Irwin is agreeable to the withdrawal of the Picketing Ordinance, but he states that if he thinks it necessary, he will take fresh legal powers to combat picketing. Thus he informs us that he might re-enact the Ordinance or something similar to it whenever he considers it necessary.

"The reply regarding the Salt Act and certain other matters referred to in our joint letter is also wholly unsatisfactory. We need not deal with it at any length here as you are an acknowledged expert on salt.

"We would only say that we see no reason to modify our previous position with regard to these matters. Thus Lord Irwin has declined to agree to all the major propositions and many of the minor ones laid down in our joint letter. The difference in his outlook and ours is very great, indeed fundamental. We hope you will show this note to Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel and Mr. Jairamdas Daulatram and in consultation with them, give your reply to Mr. Jayakar and Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru. We feel that the publication of the correspondence must no longer be delayed and we are not justified in keeping the public in the dark. Even apart from the question of publication, we are requesting Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and Mr. Jayakar to send copies of all the correspondence and relevant papers to Mr Chaudhri Khaliq-uz-Zaman, the Acting President of the Congress. We feel that we ought to take no steps without immediate information being sent to the Working Committee, which happens to be functioning.

“(Sd.) MOTILAL, Syed MAHMOUD, JAWAHARLAL.”

FINAL INTERVIEW WITH MR. GANDHI.

We accordingly saw Mr. Gandhi and other Congress leaders in Yeravda Jail, Poona on 3rd, 4th and 5th September, gave them the said letter and discussed the whole question with them. As a result of such conversations, they gave us the statement which is reproduced below:—

“Yeravda Central Prison, September 5. 1930.

Dear friends:—

We have very carefully gone through the letter written to you by His Excellency the Viceroy dated 28-8-30. You have kindly supplemented it with a record of your conversations with the Viceroy on the points not covered by the letter. We have equally carefully gone through the notes signed by Pandit Motilal Nehru, Dr. Syed Mohmud and Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and sent by them through you. This note embodies their considered opinion on the said letter and conversations. We gave two anxious nights to these papers and we had the benefit of full and free discussion with you on all the points arising out of these papers. And as we have told you, we have all arrived at a definite conclusion.

“We see no meeting ground between the Government and the Congress as far as we can speak for the latter, being out of touch with the outside world.

We unreservedly associate ourselves with the opinion contained in the note sent by the distinguished prisoners in Naini Central Prison, but these friends expect us to give in our own words our view of the position finally reached in the negotiations for peace which you with patriotic motives have carried on during the past two months at considerable sacrifice of your own time and no less inconvenience to yourselves. We shall, therefore, allude as briefly as possible to the fundamental difficulties that have stood in the way of peace being achieved.

The Viceroy's letter dated 16-7-30, is, we have taken, intended to satisfy so far as may be, the terms of the interview Pandit Motilal gave to Mr. Slocombe on June 20 last and the statement submitted by Mr. Slocombe to him on June 25 and approved by him. We are unable to read in the Viceroy's language in his letter of July 16 anything like satisfaction of the terms of the interview or the said statement. Here are the relevant parts of the interview and the statement:—

In the Interview:—“If the terms of the Round Table Conference are to be left open and we are expected to go to London to argue the case for Dominion Status, I should decline. If it was made clear, however, that the Conference would meet to frame a constitution for a free India subject to such adjustments of our mutual relations as are required by the special needs and conditions of India and our past association, I for one would be disposed to recommend to the Congress to accept the invitation to participate in the Conference. We must be the masters of our house-hold but we are ready to agree to reasonable terms for the period of transfer of power from a British administration in India to a responsible Indian government. We must meet the British people to discuss these terms as a nation to a nation and on equal footing.’

*The statement.—*The Government would ‘give a private assurance that they would support the demand for full responsible government for India subject to such mutual adjustments and terms for the period of transfer as are required by the special needs and conditions of India and by her long association with Great Britain and as may be decided by the Round Table Conference.’

And here is the relevant part of the Viceroy's letter:—‘It remains my earnest desire, as it is that of my Government and, I have no doubt, also that of His Majesty's Government to do everything we can in our respective spheres to assist the people of India to obtain as large a degree of management of their own affairs as can be shown to be consistent with making provision for those matters in regard to which they are not at present in a position to assume responsibility. What those matters may be and what provisions may best be made for them will engage the attention of the Conference, but I have never believed that with mutual confidence on both sides it should be impossible to reach an agreement.’

We feel that there is a vast difference between the two positions. Where Pandit Motilalji visualises a free India enjoying a status different in kind from the present as a result of the deliberations of the proposed Round Table Conference, the Viceroy's letter merely commits him, his Government and the British Cabinet to an earnest desire to assist Indians to obtain as large a degree of management of their own affairs as can be shown to be consistent with making provision for those matters in regard to which they are not at present in a position to assume responsibility. In other words the prospect held out by the Viceroy's letter is one of getting at the most something more along the lines of reforms commencing with those known to us as Lansdowne Reforms. As we had a fear that our interpretation was correct, in our letter of 15-3-30 signed also by Pandit Motilal Nehru, Dr. Syed Mahmud and Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru we put our position negatively and said what would not in our opinion satisfy the Congress. The letter you have now brought from his Excellency reiterates the original position taken up by him in his first letter and we are grieved to say, contemptuously dismisses our letter as unworthy of consideration and regards discussion on the basis of proposals contained in the letter as impossible. You have thrown further light on the question by telling us that if Mr. Gandhi definitely faced the Government of India, with such a question (i. e., the right of secession from the Empire at India's will) the Viceroy would say they were not prepared to treat it as an open question. We on the other hand regard the question as the central point in any free constitution that India is to secure and one which ought not to need any argument. If India is now to attain full responsible government or full self-government or whatever other term it is to be known by, it can be only on an absolutely voluntary basis leaving each party to sever the partnership or association at will. If India is to remain no longer part of the Empire but is to become an equal and free partner in the Commonwealth, she must feel the want and warmth of that association and never otherwise. You will please observe this position is clearly brought out in the interview already alluded to by us. So long, therefore, as the British Government or the British people regard this position as impossible or untenable, the Congress must, in our opinion, continue the fight for freedom.

The attitude taken up by the Viceroy over the very mild proposal made by us regarding the salt tax affords further painful insight into the Government mentality. It is as plain as day light to us that from the dizzy heights of Simla the rulers of India are unable to understand or appreciate the difficulties of the starving millions lying in the plains whose incessant toil makes Government from such giddy heights at all possible. If the blood of innocent people spilt during the past five months against the monopoly of a gift of nature next in importance to the poor people only to air and water, has not brought home to the Government the conviction of its utter immorality, no conference of Indian leaders as suggested by the Viceroy can possibly do so. The suggestion that those who ask for a repeal of the monopoly should show a source of equivalent revenue adds insult to injury. This attitude is an indication that if the Government can help it the existing crushingly expensive system shall continue to the end of time. We venture further to point out that not only does the Government here but Government all the world over openly condone breaches of measures which have become unpopular but which for technical or other reasons cannot straightaway be repealed.

We need not now deal with many other important matters in which too there is no adequate advance from the Viceroy to the popular position set forth by us. We hope we have brought out sufficiently weighty matters in which there appears at present to be an unbridgeable gulf between the British Government and the Congress. There need, however, be no disappointment for the apparent failure of the peace negotiations. The Congress is engaged in a grim struggle for freedom. The nation has resorted to a weapon which the rulers being unused to it will take time to understand and appreciate. We are not surprised that a few months' suffering has not converted them. The Congress desires to harm no single legitimate interest by whomsoever acquired. It has no quarrel with Englishmen as such. But it resents and will resent with all the moral strength at its command the intolerable British domination. Non-violence being assured to the end, we are certain of an early fulfilment of the national aspirations. This we say in spite of the bitter and often insulting language used by the powers that be in regard to civil disobedience.

Lastly, we once more thank you for the great pains you have taken to bring about peace, but we suggest that the time has not arrived when any further peace negotiations should be carried on. With those in charge of the Congress organisation as prisoners, we labour under an obvious handicap. Our opinion based as it must be on second hand evidence, runs the risk of being faulty. It would be naturally open to those in charge of the Congress organisation to see any of us. In that case and when Government itself is equally desirous for peace, they have no difficulty in having access to us.

NEGOTIATIONS END.

We content ourselves with publishing for the information of the public the material facts and documents and in strict conformity with our duties and obligations as intermediaries we refrain in this statement from putting our own interpretation or offering our own comments on the facts and documents set out above. We may mention that we have obtained the consent of his Excellency the Viceroy and the Congress leaders to the publication of the documents above set out.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Palestine:—For seven years Mrs. Ginsberg, the wife of the Registrar of the Hebrew University at Jerusalem, has been fighting for the right to practise in the Palestine Courts. In 1922 a letter from the British Government urged that the question of admitting women to the Palestine Bar must be "postponed," and Mrs. Ginsberg, later, through her counsel, sought an order compelling the Chief Justice to allow her to sit for admittance to the Bar. Her counsel pleaded strongly against her disqualification, citing Egypt and Turkey as countries where women are allowed to practise at the Bar. On February 15th this year, the Supreme Court of Palestine, consisting of three judges, two of whom were British and one Arab, ruled that nothing in the Ottoman law or in legislation since the British occupation, excludes women from this right. Mrs. Ginsberg has thus opened the way for women to practise in the Palestine Courts, after the Lower Courts had held that it would be contrary to Moslem tradition to allow a woman to appear in the Courts.—Siri Dharma, Madras.

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum NOW without any help whatever from you. The woman who has been "All the Wife and Mother" is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

Peaceful Picketing of Liquor Shops:— We shall soon have an authoritative High Court decision as to the lawfulness or otherwise, under the Picketing Ordinance, of the peaceful picketing of liquor shops. A Magistrate in Ahmedabad held it was not an offence unless accompanied by actual molestation, but the District Judge has dissented and has ordered the Magistrate to make a fresh enquiry. Meanwhile, the District Judge of Thana has, of his own motion, taken up the case of Mrs. Lakhmani, to which we have more than once called attention, and referred it to the High Court explaining that in his view the conviction is wrong and must be set aside. Mr. Sanjana points out that the Viceroy's Ordinance does not penalise social work of which Temperance propaganda is an important part. What is made punishable by Section 4 of the Ordinance, he observes, is molestation and this molestation does not occur, as that word is defined by the preceding Section, until the person charged therewith loiters near the shop of another with a view to cause such other person to abstain from doing or to do any act which he has a right to do or to abstain from doing. When people are dissuaded from frequenting a liquor shop, no doubt the business of the shop-keeper is to that extent affected and he suffers in his gains. But, says the Judge, because that is one of its results, it should not be presumed, in the absence of any additional circumstances pointing to the contrary, that the dissuading was done with a view to compel the shop-keeper to give up his business. And, unless it was done with that as its direct primary and principal object, dissuading people from frequenting the shop would not be an offence under the Ordinance. The High Court has ordered Mrs. Lakhmani to be released on her own cognisance, pending its decision which is awaited with interest.

Bombay Elections:— On the day first fixed for the general elections in Bombay, Varuna, the god of rain, took charge of the polling booths. A record downpour of 22 inches in fourteen hours, put picketers and police out of action, and Government was obliged to fix another day for what in the circumstances is a meaningless formality. The elections came off on Thursday. There were four candidates for three seats. A week previously the candidates for the Bombay Mussalman constituency preferred the sensible course of drawing lots among themselves to putting the police and the Congress "War Council" to the trouble of staging a lathi-play round the polling booth. The non-Mahomedan electorate is a mixed affair of Hindus, Christians, Parsis, Jews and others, except Europeans and Mussalmans, and the lottery device did not commend itself to the candidates. So the election had to take place. The lady President of the "War Council," Mrs. Ramiben Kamdar, vowed that she would mobilise 500 women picketers and reduce the election to a farce; and she was as good as her word. Out of over 60,000 voters scarcely 1500 voted, and for this meagre result nearly 400 women picketers had to be locked up for the day and some hundreds of the public subjected to lathi charges to keep the place clear for the handful of voters who defied the exhortations and abjurations of the enthusiastic Sevikas. One of the candidates was so overcome by the sight of the Sevikas being arrested that he agreed to withdraw his candidature after the election had been in progress for about three hours, two of the other candidates showing their appreciation of his humanity by, it is said, placing at his disposal Rs. 5000 to be handed over to any charity he may choose. Half of this amount he is said to have promptly paid over to the Congress as a sort of solatium, we suppose, for its trouble in organising the picketing so effectively. The Government of India in their last weekly summary to London say that the Congress is losing its influence. Sir Frederick Sykes who was in Bombay on Thursday is not likely to agree with that opinion.

The Late Mr. Joseph Baptista:— The sudden death from heart failure of Mr. Joseph Baptista on Thursday, snaps another of the few remaining links between the old and the new schools of Indian politics. Mr. Baptista himself was too individualistic to belong to any party, though during the latter part of his political career, he was chiefly associated with the late Lokamanya Tilak. He was a man of independent and often sound views, and was an effective platform speaker. What came in the way of his attaining leadership, was his inveterate tendency to interlard his speeches with humorous asides. The public which appreciates political witticisms more than political wisdom, virtually forced upon Mr. Baptista the role of a sort of Indian Mark Twain, entirely ignoring his contributions to current politics, which were by no means inconsiderable. Whenever he appeared on the platform, he was expected to entertain his audiences with some of his feats of verbal legerdemain, and Mr. Baptista was too polite to disappoint them: Thus it came about that in course of time he came to be invested with the title of "Kaka", the universal uncle of all parties whose parentage was obscure. During the last few days, Mr. Baptista became involved in a controversy with the new Indian Nationalist Christian party. The older East Indians who used to regard him as a firebrand, put him forward as their champion against the young Christian nationalists. His last appearance in public was to preside at a meeting of Bombay Catholics a few days ago to dissociate themselves from the Mangalore Catholics who passed a resolution demanding separate electorates for the Indian community at the Round Table Conference. May his soul rest in peace!

India and Religious Toleration:—Religious toleration has been the key-note of Indian life from time immemorial. The Vedas said there is One alone which men worshipped by different names. Hinduism never professed to be the only true religion. This spirit is derived from the very air we breathe and the water we drink in this land. Indian Mahomedanism and Indian Christianity, in so far as they have become indigenous, fully share this spirit, and violations of it can generally be traced to some temporary, foreign influence. As an instance in point, we have much pleasure in quoting the extremely broad-minded remarks of the Bombay East Indian, a devout Catholic Weekly, on the recent attempt to prevent resident Hindu students from observing the Ganpati festival in the St. Xavier's College Hostel. "If" writes our contemporary, "Hindus are admitted in a Catholic Hostel of a College and separate dining rooms are provided for them it would appear that it would be reasonable for Hindus to expect that they should be at liberty to practise their religion and worship their idols as good religious Hindus usually do. To forbid it would amount to Hindus in the Hostel being constrained to abstain from religious practices within the premises during residence. The alternative appears to be to admit no non-Catholic student into the College Hostel." This is precisely what we said when a similar ban was placed on the worship of Sarasvati by Hindu students in the Brahma City College at Calcutta.

Proselytising Hinduism:—Among our news items this week, will be found the report of a case before the Madras High Court, in which Mr. Justice Pandalay refused to interfere with the acquittal by a lower court of a Catholic convert to Hinduism of the offence of bigamy for marrying a Hindu wife when his Catholic wife was living. Commenting on this decision, the Catholic Leader observes:—"The generally accepted theory is that a Hindu is born and not made and yet a born Catholic is declared lawfully converted to Hinduism. He takes with impunity a second wife during the lifetime of the first and the Court sees no reason to convict him of bigamy, just because, for reasons of convenience, he became a Hindu. Now, what is to happen to his first wife—the only lawful one—who belongs to the Catholic religion, which is wholly opposed to bigamy? She can never remarry during the lifetime of her husband. Such decisions evidently are a source of real hardship to the Catholic party." "Hinduism is not bound by any "generally accepted theories" of Catholic journalists. As a matter of fact, this particular theory is wrong, because non-Hindus have in the past been freely absorbed by Hinduism. In the present case, the man was excommunicated by the Catholic Church, because he made speeches in praise of the Hindu religion. No Hindu has ever been excommunicated for praising Jesus Christ or the Prophet of Islam! Instead of seeking absolution for the sin of seeing some good in his ancestral faith, from which he had been ousted by the act of his father or grandfather, from the Catholic hierarchy, the man became a Hindu and married his cousin who also became a Hindu. The Catholic paper objects to Hinduism accepting converts from Catholicism, but has no objection to Catholicism making converts from Hinduism. If a Hindu becomes a Catholic, it is according to conviction but if a Catholic becomes a Hindu it is for convenience! As for the deserted Catholic wife, while we deeply sympathise with her position, it is no worse than that of thousands of Hindu wives whose husbands had been converted to Christianity. If anything, the position of the Hindu wife of an apostate husband is harder, as a Hindu marriage is irrevocable under any circumstances whatsoever—even death does not dissolve it—whereas Catholic marriages can be annulled, and have been annulled, by the council of the Pope, which deals with matrimonial matters.

Electricity and Village Industries:—Electricity has a great advantage over steam power. The former can be brought to any place and in any quantity, small or large, while the latter has to be produced and utilised in large factories. With the general use of electricity instead of steam-power, crowded cities with their slums will be a thing of the past, as electricity can be carried to villages and be utilised for developing village industries. The charkha and the hand-loom worked by electricity would rapidly increase production of khaddar besides providing a better income for the village women than the hand-worked implements. Some parts of Mysore are particularly well-suited for an experiment in this direction. In inaugurating an electric installation at Mandya on the 14th instant, the Dewan incidentally referred to the hand-loom weaving industry at Kodiyala about six miles from Mandya, which, he said, would be improved and expanded by the introduction of power looms. Improving hand-loom weaving by the introduction of power looms, which the Dewan expected, means the application of power to the hand-loom. If there is any scheme for the purpose of electrifying the hand-loom industry without depriving it of its cottage environment, it will be interesting to have particulars of it. One of the main reasons which militate against the popularity of the charkha among educated people is its monotony. An electric charkha, from this point of view, will, therefore, be a welcome improvement.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1930.

LORD IRWIN'S DISCLAIMER.

Lord Irwin has written a letter to Mr. Jayakar and Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru on the statement which they published relating to their negotiations with Congress leaders. It is printed in another column. The Viceroy writes with his accustomed suavity which, however, does not hide the fact that the letter is virtually a censure—an entirely undeserved censure—of the negotiators for making public the purport of their conversations with him, intended to be private. And although his Excellency has thought it necessary to correct their statement in only a single particular, he makes it clear that it is not the only point and that there are others in regard to which a mistaken impression has been conveyed by the negotiators as to his attitude and that of his Government. The one point which His Excellency has specially selected for correction, namely, that relating to the public debt, did not stand in need of correction. If anybody was likely to misunderstand the Viceroy's attitude on this matter as conveyed to the Congress leaders, it was obviously the latter themselves. But they did not misunderstand it to mean that Lord Irwin agreed even to a partial repudiation of debt. In their letter of the 31st August, they say, "we are told that Lord Irwin could only entertain the idea of a few financial transactions being subjected to scrutiny. While such scrutiny may take place in individual cases, its scope will have to extend to the whole field of British claims, including, as we have stated, the so-called public debt of India." The Viceroy could not have failed to note the fact that the Congress leaders had rightly understood his meaning. The negotiators had conveyed to the Congress leaders precisely what the Viceroy intended, and that, after all, is the main thing. Though the use of the word "wholesale" by Sir Tej Bahadur and Mr. Jayakar in their prefatory note is superficially open to misapprehension, yet no one who reads the whole correspondence will be in doubt as to what they meant. There was no need, therefore, so far as that was concerned, to issue a public disclaimer of a possible misapprehension by an imaginary individual of the Viceroy's meaning.

As remarked above, Lord Irwin's letter suggests that there are other points also in which his meaning has been loosely interpreted by the negotiators. It leaves the public to infer that the statements of the negotiators, as a whole, should not be taken to be correct so far as it represents the Viceroy to have accepted or rejected anything. Mr. Jayakar and Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru could not have been under any illusions as to the thankless nature of the task which they were undertaking but they could scarcely have expected that the unkindest cut of all would come from Lord Irwin. The Viceroy complains that he was not shown the statement before it was released for publication. He knew that all the letters were to be published and that as his own letters were couched in general terms, important details could only be explained by reference to what the negotiators gathered at private interviews. It was, therefore, impossible to give any intelligent account of the proceedings, without referring to them. Lord Irwin himself does not seem to have given the negotiators an opportunity of stating their views on his letter before issuing it to the Press. The Viceroy knows that whatever they may have to say for themselves, their innate Indian courtesy to the head of the Government will absolutely prevent the two gentlemen from publicly saying it. If His Excellency felt that the correction was absolutely necessary, it would have been more considerate to the negotiators if he had privately suggested to them that they should themselves explain to the public what they had in their mind to convey. For, it is perfectly plain that the error was a mere slip on their part.

Nor would His Excellency seem to have considered what effect the publication of his letter would have on the position of the Congress leaders. The Congress leaders might well ask, if the Viceroy thinks that Mr. Jayakar and Sir Tej Bahadur did not correctly express his sentiments, how could they have agreed to a settlement on the basis of their representation? Further, if two leading lawyers like them cannot be trusted to convey the purport of the Viceroy's conversation with accuracy, what chances are there of anybody else doing so? The Viceroy's letter, the Congress leaders may claim, fully justifies their refusal to come to a settlement without more definite and categorical assurances. Then, again, His Excellency's opinion that all that has passed may now be wiped off the slate, is hardly tenable. Any new settlement, whether with Congress leaders or without them, must necessarily start from where these negotiations left off. It is impossible to think that Lord Irwin was prepared to offer terms by way of a bargain to political dissenters which he cannot concede in a spirit of goodwill to political conformists. It is difficult to resist a feeling on reading Lord Irwin's letter that these two gentlemen, whose gallant attempt is so lavishly acknowledged, and one of whom was stricken down by a cruel domestic affliction when he bravely stepped into the breach, have been used so long as there was a chance of success and quietly put aside when they had to acknowledge that they had failed. The letter may be perfectly correct but it cannot be said to be inspired by a chivalrous spirit.

THE DEPRESSED CLASSES AND THE REFORMS.

By PROFESSOR HARI CHARAN MUKERJI,
MIDNAPORE COLLEGE.

Dr. Ambedkar in his remarkable address at Nagpore discusses the present position of his community, how far they have been benefited by British rule and under what sort of constitution their grievances may be redressed and they can come into their own. This speech marks a great advance from the state when his community assured Mr. Montagu that they would oppose tooth and nail any attempt at transference of power from the bureaucracy to the people. This is one of the most healthy signs and unmistakably shows how the idea of nationality is gaining ground and how the different elements composing the nation are being welded into one compact mass. The speaker's analysis of the advantages derived by his community under British rule, is a very trenchant one and his suggestion of the remedy to be applied bespeaks his courage and freedom from communal bias which has blurred the vision of so many of us. It is also in many respects an advance on the suggestions of Mr. M. C. Rajah contained in his memorandum attached to the Central Committee's Report. No claim has been advanced for separate communal electorates which seemed to have obsessed the mind of the Rao Bahadur. But in spite of this undoubted courage that he has displayed Dr. Ambedkar has not been able to give his blessings to the Nehru Report whose suggestions if adopted in their entirety can alone remove the grievances from which his community is suffering. The Simon Commission also, to give them their due, have recommended substantial increase in representation far in excess of what they are likely to get under the Central Committee's proposals and a considerable lowering of the franchise. According to their proposals 10 per cent of the entire population i. e. 20 per cent of the adults are to be enfranchised at once. They further propose that after 15 years a second Franchise Committee is to be appointed to review the situation and further accelerate the rate of enfranchisement if, by that time, 20 per cent of the entire population has not got the vote. Secondly, in the interests of the depressed classes and other backward communities they recommend that the Franchise Committee that is now to be appointed, should see to it that the same proportion of voters to population in different communities are at once enfranchised. But this recommendation runs counter to their express opinion that different qualifications and tests should not be adopted for different communities in the same province. This undoubtedly is quite reasonable but it is likely to stand in the way of the speedy enfranchisement of the depressed classes. Under these circumstances, however, the franchise may be lowered. These classes are not likely to be benefited to any large extent for the vast majority of them will not enjoy the privilege of exercising the vote which in itself has a great educative value. But the most reactionary part, of the recommendations of the Simon Commission is as regards the method of representation. In spite of the unanimous opinion of the accredited leaders of the depressed classes, they recommend that nomination should play a large part and even in cases where election should be resorted to, the nominees after being adopted by the depressed class associations must have to be approved by the Governor. This will be the very negation of popular representation. This is an attempt at buttressing the autocratic power which seems to be tottering to its fall. Moreover, as has been wisely pointed out by Mr. M. C. Rajah, it will lead to the birth of mushroom associations all over the country claiming to speak on behalf of the depressed classes. The only remedy seems to lie in the introduction of adult suffrage, as recommended in the Nehru Report, which will enfranchise the whole depressed class population and give them the right of choosing their own representatives. But in addition to this, reservation of seats on the population basis in joint electorates for a certain number of years must be resorted to till the distinction between the caste Hindus and the depressed classes is completely obliterated by both following a common national programme. In order to guard against the not unnatural fear that, in a joint electorate where the depressed classes will be in a minority, their representatives may not be real representatives but nominees of the caste Hindus and may be returned by a majority of caste Hindu votes and so may not care to safeguard their communal interests, the plan of Major Attlee may be adopted. This will necessitate a double election of the representatives of the depressed classes first in their own constituencies and then by the general constituency. The practical difficulties will not be great, for, in any case, separate electoral rolls for the different minority communities must have to be maintained. This provision, if incorporated in the Nehru Report, is likely to give entire satisfaction to them and to remove all their misgivings.

But these reforms by themselves will not go a great way in redressing their grievances. These seem to be mostly social and economical rather than political though they are all inter-related, and political amelioration is likely to lead to their social and economic advancement. But the grievances call for urgent redress and there is no provision in the Simon Report to bring about this much-needed reform. It is in the Nehru Report as well as the Central Committee's Report that we find the provision of introducing in the constitution a declaration of fundamental rights guaranteeing equal treatment by the Government of the members of the different communities in the matter of admission into schools and hospitals maintained wholly or in part by public funds and the use of public thorough-fares, wells or places of public resort or admission in Government service. But even more important than these seems to be the amendment to the Report carried by the All Parties

Conference requiring the Commonwealth Parliament to make laws ensuring fair rent and fixity and permanence of tenure to agricultural tenants, 90 per cent of whom happens to be the members of these depressed classes. This is the very thing which has been so much emphasised by Mr. M. C. Rajah in his memorandum. Another admirable feature of the Nehru Report is the set of provisions introduced in the Fundamental Rights safeguarding the position of the labouring classes, making statutory provision for securing them a living wage and the introduction of all sorts of welfare schemes. These also are calculated to benefit the depressed classes amongst the Hindus who, like agricultural labourers, form the majority of the workers. These recommendations, if given effect to, will secure to those classes all the advantages which if left to legislative enactment would otherwise take many decades. It is to be highly deplored that Dr. Ambedkar though otherwise blessed with a clear vision and boldness of outlook, should be blind to the obvious advantages of the Nehru Report in spite of the sincere effort that has been made there to build up a great national fabric consistent with justice to all concerned. He should have known that statutory provision for these privileges would go a great way in removing the corresponding disabilities. Moreover the Nehru Report is not the last word and changes may be suggested to bring it up-to-date and to allay all suspicions and to effectively safeguard all interests.

"VENGEANCE IS MINE; I WILL REPAY," SAITH THE LORD.

The American Issue, an organ of the prohibition movement, prints on the front page of its current number the following lines of John Hay.

[John Hay, while still a very young man, was private secretary to Abraham Lincoln. Later on he was Secretary of State under Theodore Roosevelt. Probably few men in their lifetime have seen strength and weakness more strongly delineated in human character than Hay had been permitted to see and to know in his lifetime.]

Saith the Lord, "Vengeance is mine";
 "I will repay", saith the Lord;
 Ours be the anger divine,
 Lit by the flash of His sword.
 How shall His vengeance be done?
 How, when His purpose is clear?
 Must He come down from the throne?
 Hath he no instruments here?
 Sleep not in imbecile trust,
 Waiting for God to begin;
 While, growing strong in the dust,
 Rests the bruised serpent of sin.
 Right and wrong—both cannot live
 Death-grappled. Which shall we see?
 Strike! Only justice can give Safety to all that shall be.
 Shame! To stand faltering thus,
 Tricked by the balancing odds;
 Strike! God is waiting for us,
 Strike! For the Vengeance is God's.

CHRISTIANITY AND CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE.

By THE REV. JAMES KELLOCK.

Is the method of Civil Disobedience compatible with the Christian point of view? This question has been raised in a stimulating fashion by Father Elwin in his pamphlet entitled, "Christ and Satyagraha." The question has much theoretical interest, and, in India today, much practical interest. We propose therefore to discuss the views put forward in the pamphlet.

Father Elwin begins by adverting to the tradition which has persisted throughout the centuries "that Christians are bound to obey and support the de facto Government under all circumstances." He says that there has been such a tradition, but maintains that it has sprung from a literal reading of certain passages of Scripture, interpreted without consideration of the historical circumstances in which they were written, and from a belief in the Divine nature of the State.

We agree that the isolated text method of argument is out of date. No competent scholar would now use it. Every passage of Scripture must be interpreted in the light of its historical context. The universal and eternal has to be disengaged from the local and the transient. The fact, for example, that Jesus said, "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's," does not settle the problem of civil disobedience for us. The words may have been a brilliant evasion of the trap that his opponents had set for him. Or they may have been meant to suggest that those who used Caesar's coins, and took benefits from his regime should not refuse to pay his taxes. Or they may have been intended to indicate that the payment of Caesar's taxes were an irrelevant detail in view of the Messianic Kingdom with which Jesus was concerned. Father Elwin shows clearly that Jesus did not encourage revolutionary activity against the established Government, suggesting as reasons, spiritual strategy, and because it was not his vocation to lead a movement against Imperialism. But he contrives to leave the impression that Jesus, though he did not advocate the disobeying of the State authority, and did not practice it, would yet have done so, had it not been for the special circumstances of his time and vocation.

Now we venture to suggest that there is confusion of thought here. Father Elwin says that Jesus did not condemn the existing ecclesiastical, moral and social order of things out of hand, but that he tested them, gave them a chance, and then rose up and overthrew them; and that it was only the considerations already mentioned that prevented him from adopting the same attitude to the political and national order of things. But surely to inculcate a righteousness that should exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees is not to overthrow them in the sense in which a successful civil disobedience movement would overthrow a government. To go the second mile, to swear not at all, to love your enemies, to do your alms in secret—that was to reform things from within. The method of Jesus does indeed overthrow evil ecclesiastical systems and immoral and unsocial conditions. But it can hardly be made an authority for civil disobedience, unless we are going to identify every reform movement in the world with that name.

Moreover there is this further thing to be said. The ecclesiastical, moral and social departments of life fall within the sphere of custom where deliberate enactment is not of the essence of the matter. The law and order of the State on the other hand are those customs which it is supposed necessary in the common interests to make obligatory and only to change by definite enactment. (In ancient societies—Hebrew, Hindu, Roman, Islam, the sovereign did not make laws, only interpreted them. This distinction is modern. Ed. I. S. R.). They are the necessary framework which holds together the sphere in which the ecclesiastical, moral and social order of things can operate. It is therefore a doubtful argument, when Father Elwin says that when Jesus criticised the Law of Moses, he assailed an authority far more venerable and august than that of Caesar, and then leaves us to infer that Jesus would have assailed the law and the authority of the State, but for the special reasons arising from the necessity of preventing a premature clash with the Roman power, and the necessity of spiritualising the current Messianic hope.

The facts of the situation, roughly stated, seem to be as follows:—Jesus had continually before his vision the realisation of the Messianic Kingdom, whose coming was imminent, and in the light of which the ordinary political questions were of small account. His great concern was to prepare men and women for this kingdom; to bring about the change of heart that it called for; and to inculcate the ethics of the Kingdom. The Kingdom as conceived by Jesus was a Messianic Kingdom which was to be established, not by the political effort of men but by the transcendent power of God. Jesus' portrayal of the Kingdom, though having this transcendent character, has nevertheless become a great fount of inspiration and quickening for mankind in efforts to reform and improve the actual social and political arrangements. But the inspiration and guidance obtained is necessarily the inspiration and guidance of principles—moral and religious principles.

To the question regarding civil disobedience there is no cut and dried answer to be obtained from the teaching of Jesus. (Cromwell and the Puritans believed otherwise. They cut a King's head off with texts of the Bible on their lips. Ed. I. S. R.). There is only the more difficult and strenuous guidance of general principles. We get from Jesus the great principles,—“Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbour as thyself.” We get these principles from Jesus not in the form of bare, abstract generalisations, but illustrated, explicated and illumined in a hundred ways by his parables, his deeds, his attitudes, his life and his death. So the two great principles become a living power in the hearts and minds of those who open their hearts and minds to Jesus. Guidance by principle involves, in the case we are considering, the mental toil of endeavouring to apply the principle to the complicated situation of India's present political and social conditions. It calls therefore for strenuous endeavour to find out what lines of action are required in order that justice and equity may be achieved in Indian affairs, and that the highest and truest interests of the Indian people may be advanced. The guidance of the principle, in such a case, can be no easy affair, for it must involve the strenuous effort of true political thinking.

Father Elwin also says that the Christian tradition of obedience to the de facto government springs from a belief in the Divine nature of the State; but that this basis is removed, since governments are no longer clothed with a religious sanction or founded on a divine right to govern. He seems therefore to acquiesce in the conclusion that a modern State must base its authority merely upon might. (Or popular consent. Ed. I. S. R.).

Now here again there seems to be some confusion of thought. The fact that in ancient times the authority of the Ruler was regarded as coming direct from God, or that it was clothed with religious sanctions, and that in modern times such is not the case, would not prove that the State is a less valid institution in modern times than in ancient times. Validity is not to be confused with origin. The same reality may be there, though the ways in which it is expressed may be different. The sun was as beneficial to the man who thought it was a god driving across the heavens in a chariot, as to the man who regards its apparent motion as due to the circling of the earth around it. Besides, what is Father Elwin's exact point here? Does he mean that the might exercised by a State which was regarded as based upon a divine right was essentially different from the might exercised by a State not so regarded? And were the States of ancient or Mediaeval times less based upon might than modern States? Modern States are very far from being perfect institutions, but there seems to be no real ground for the assertion that the moment the “divine-right” idea goes “the authority of the State is undermined, and it must clutch at something which is no longer right, but might.” (Quoted by Father Elwin from Dr. Orchard's Christianity and World Problems). The power and authority of the State are based upon the fact that it is an essential organ of the good human life, and the power and authority enjoyed by it are those regarded as necessary for the carrying out of its function in maintaining the conditions of the good life. All rights, personal or corporate, have this same ultimate origin. The conclusion therefore that we must surely come to is that in the degree to which it is performing the function of maintaining the conditions of the good life, the State has divine sanction. (The Government of India does not claim to rest on Divine sanction but on a parliamentary statute. Ed. I. S. R.) The good human life is of course an infinite ideal, and our human selves and institutions only imperfectly realise it. So we are ever driven onwards by the Divine discontent. If any institution, even the State itself, has become an obstacle to the good life, instead of an organ of it, then it must be dealt with. It must be removed if it has become a mere obstacle. It must be reformed so that it becomes entirely helpful to the good life, if it has become maladjusted, or inadequate for its function. (Who is to judge? Ed. I. S. R.)

With regard to the teaching of St. Paul, Father Elwin makes two main points, 1. That St. Paul's inculcation of loyalty to the Roman Empire (in the Epistle to the Roman Chap. xiii vv. 1-7 & the 1st. Epistle to Timothy chap. ii vv. 1-2) was conditioned by his personal position and by his conviction of the nearness of the Parousia; 2. That St. Paul himself practised a quiet civil disobedience.

Father Elwin is on solid ground when he argues that directions given in view of one set of historic circumstances are not necessarily valid for a different set of circumstances. We quite agree with that. What we must try to get at is the principle that was being applied. We may, I think, gather from p. 24 of the pamphlet that Father Elwin regards St. Paul's underlying principle to be the principle of "good citizenship and loyalty to law and order as such." We can therefore agree to the conclusion on p. 26,—"Because St. Paul refused to oppose a good government in the first century is no reason why people should not oppose a bad government in the twentieth."—without however accepting all that might be implied by way of innuendo in the words "good" and "bad." Was the Roman rule such a good thing for the subject States of that day? The Jewish patriots did not seem to think so! (On the contrary the Jews' charge against Jesus was He preached against Caesar and paying taxes to him. Ed. I. S. R.)

As a minor point of criticism, it might be pointed out that in trying to account for St. Paul's attitude of loyalty to Rome, Father Elwin puts the matter in a way that seems to do less than justice to St. Paul. There was rarely in St. Paul an element of fervid Jewish patriotism. He could declare that he was an Hebrew of the Hebrews; he could yearn over his native land (see Epistle to Romans Ch.9). It is suggested in the pamphlet that St. Paul's attitude to the Roman Empire was determined by such considerations as these; that it had often protected him against mob-violence; that it was a convenient institution for one who had to travel so much as he had to travel; that he felt a sense of pride and satisfaction in the fact that he was a free man in this Empire that wielded such stupendous power and that stood for so much. But somehow these arguments do not sound like St. Paul! St. Paul was assuredly no Time-Server, and it needs something more than expediency and pride to account for his attitude. (St. Paul said that all things were lawful for him but not expedient. Ed. I. S. R.)

MAHATMA GANDHI'S ELEVEN POINTS.

MR. S. R. BOMANJI'S STATEMENT.

In our leading article on the Peace negotiations last week, we referred to the statement of Mr. S. R. Bomanji in the "Bombay Chronicle" as to how Mahatma Gandhi came to formulate the famous Eleven points. We reproduce the statement below:—

Mr. S. R. Bomanji who returned from Europe and America last week gave a representative of the "Bombay Chronicle" the opportunity of releasing for publication the correspondence that passed between Mahatma Gandhi and himself. This correspondence throws interesting side-light on the genesis of Mahatma Gandhi's famous Eleven Points and on his desire to do all he can to secure peace with honour. It appears that Mr. Bomanji, when he was in India in January last, met Mr. V. J. Patel at New Delhi. As a result of consultation with the latter, Mr. Bomanji requested Mahatma Gandhi to give him, for placing before Mr. MacDonald, the terms on which it was possible to suspend the idea of immediately launching of Civil Disobedience and establishing contact with the Government. Mahatma Gandhi, after careful consideration sent to Mr. Bomanji the following letter, almost on the eve of the latter's departure for Europe:—

THE ELEVEN POINTS.

Sabarmati,

Dated the 26th Jan. 30.

Dear Friend,

You want to know on what basis it is possible to suspend the idea of immediate civil disobedience and to establish contact with the Government. Here is the basis in the baldest language possible. It would be dangerous to clothe my thoughts in courteous language. There is no going back upon the Independence mentality. If Independence can be had in substance now, it is possible to wait for the necessary legislation for some time in order to prepare British public opinion for its reception. This is what I mean by Independence in substance:—

- (a) The ratio must revert to 1s. 4d.
- (b) Salt tax must be wholly abolished.
- (c) Land revenue legislation which is admittedly most unfair to the toiling millions must be remodelled so as to be reduced at least by one half and should be under the control of the popular legislatures.
- (d) There should be immediate total prohibition.
- (e) The British as well as Indian garrison should be reduced at least by one half.
- (f) A thoroughly representative committee should be appointed to consider the question of public debt and concessions to foreigners.
- (g) The Haji Coastal Traffic Reservation Bill should be fathered by the Government of India.
- (h) There should be a frankly protective tariff on all foreign cloth.

(i) All political prisoners, save those who are convicted of murder or attempts to murder, should be immediately discharged and all political exiles should be permitted to return. Similarly all pending political prosecutions save for murder or attempt to murder should be withdrawn and no prosecution under section 124 A should be undertaken without the consent of a committee of five popularly elected members of the Legislative Assembly.

(j) The C. I. D. should be abolished or should be placed under popular control.

(k) Disarmament legislation should be immediately remodelled and granting of licenses to hold arms should vest in the hands of popular committees appointed in each district.

This list may not be treated as exhaustive, though it is really illustrative and it is highly likely that some important points may have escaped me.

ATMOSPHERE NOT RIPE.

I have written this without consultation with any of my coworkers. I must confess that I entertain no hope of the basis set forth here being accepted by Mr. MacDonald or his Cabinet. I think that the atmosphere is not ripe for its acceptance even though individual members of his Cabinet might be inclined to look at it with more or less favour. No honourable settlement is possible until responsible British representatives appreciate the Indian National viewpoint that the present treatment of India amounts to bare-faced spoliation of the masses in a variety of ways. But you are an optimist like me. You are at liberty to make whatever legitimate use you wish, of this letter. Please, however, understand that it is binding only on me. But, of course, if the unexpected happens and the terms of my letter prove acceptable, I should use the whole of my energy and influence towards establishment of cordial contact with the Government with a view to arriving at a permanent honourable settlement.

Yours Sincerely,
Sd. M. K. GANDHI.

Sjt. S. B. Bomanji,
Taj Mahal Hotel,
Bombay.

NO DIPLOMACY REQUIRED.

Mr. Bomanji protesting against the publication in "Young India" of that portion of Mahatma Gandhi's letter which related to the terms of peace as embodied in the Eleven points, Mahatma Gandhi sent the following reply which Mr. Bomanji received in Paris :—

Satyagraha Ashram, Sabarmati,
22-2-30.

Dear Friend,

I have your letter. I had thought that if Mr. MacDonald meant to do anything my public mention of the points would prepare the ground. I do not want to think of anything new that I may not make use of in public. The matter is far too great to be disposed of in a hole-and-corner manner. For, any substantial reform would mean previous educating of public opinion, both here and in England. No diplomacy, therefore, is required. The straightest dealing alone can bring us near a solution.

Yours sincerely,
Sd. M. K. GANDHI.

S. R. Bomanji, Esq.,
69, Boulevard Lannes,
Paris.

INTERVIEW WITH PREMIER.

Meanwhile in reply to his request Mr. Bomanji received a wire from Mr. MacDonald's secretary at Cape Antibes (Rivera) dated the 19th February saying that the Prime Minister would be glad to see him when he came to London. Mr. Bomanji met Mr. MacDonald on 27th February at 10 Downing Street. At the interview Mr. Benn was also present. The Eleven Points of Mahatma Gandhi were considered. Both Mr. MacDonald and Mr. Benn expressed their inability to deal with the enormous amount of matter comprised in the Eleven Points and the Premier promised that if these terms would have the backing of Lord Irwin, he would try to persuade the Cabinet to agree to them. Mr. Bomanji says that "I regret to have to say that I found Mr. MacDonald a very different man from what I had known him to be for the past many years. He seemed to have lost all his idealism and I could hardly see any difference between him and a Tory Cabinet Minister with strong Imperialistic leanings.

THE TRUE PROPAGANDA.

Mr. Bomanji informed Mahatmaji about the failure of his interview with the Premier and received in New York the following letter written by Mahatma Gandhi during his march to Dandi :—

Dear Friend,

I got your letter in the midst of my march of which you have heard everything. Surely you had no difficulty in realising that they had no intention of yielding the points mentioned by me. The thing for you to do is not to listen to the honied words but to go on with what propaganda you can make. The true propaganda is the power I am generating among the people.

My regards to Mrs. Bomanji.

Sd. M. K. GANDHI.
15th March 1930.

Anti-caste Census Campaign.—Under the auspices of Jat Pat Torak Mandal, Lahore, a strong and influential All India Jat Pat Torak Census Committee is being organised, to discourage the registration of Caste in the Returns of the coming Census. Membership is open to the public and all those who are in favour of the abolition of caste among Hindus are cordially invited to join. The well-known leaders and social reformers of India are being approached to join the Committee. Among others the following have already given their consent to serve on the Committee: Mr. Nadkarni (N. Kanara) Mahatma Hans Raj, B. A., R. S. Ganga Ram (Simla) Bhai Parmanand M. A., L. Gian Chand (Delhi), Dr. Gokal Chand, M. L. O., L. Gobind Ram, B. A., LL. B., Prof. Ruchi Ram, M. A., Bhai Parkash Lal B. A. B. T., Dr. Sir H. S. Gour, M. L. A., L. Tirath Ram (Kasur), Dr. B. R. Ambedkar, M. L. O., (Bombay), R. S. Ch. Gian Singh, M. Krishnas, B. A., (The Partap) Mr Jang Bahadur Singh, Mr. K. Natrajan (Social Reformer) Mr. Roshan Lal (Sports Ltd.) Dr. Mola Ram, I. M. S., Mr. Mal Raj, B. A., B. T., Mr. E. V. Ramsami, (Madras) Dr. K. B. Patel, Mr. Chaud Mathur, Bar-at-Law, Dr. Herish Chandra (Simla) R. S. Dr. Shyam Sarup, (Bareilly) Prof. Ramesh Chandra Baurji (Calcutta). Forms etc. of membership can be had from the Secretary Jat Pat Torak Mandal, Lahore.

LORD IRWIN'S LETTER.

Lord Irwin sent the following letter to Mr. M. R. Jayakar, on Thursday the 11th instant:—

"You will no doubt have received my telegram thanking you and Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru for the courageous efforts you have made in the cause of peace. Though they have not resulted in success which we all should so sincerely have welcomed, I know that everybody who has the true interests of the country at heart will feel, nothing but sincere admiration for the gallant endeavours which you have made.

"I sent you a telegram on Saturday expressing my surprise that you should have made public a reference to the private conversations we had in Simla and I have since seen the full text of the Note you gave to the press. As you will remember, the understanding was that, while I had no objection to your informing the general position of the Government, I regarded our conversations as confidential. I understand, however, that, as the Congress leaders referred in their letters of August 31 and September 5 to some matters touched upon in our conversation you considered it right that the public should be more fully informed of their character.

"While I readily appreciate your motives, I regret that I had not the opportunity of approving the Note before it was published, as it contains points in regard to which a mistaken impression might, though quite unintentionally on your part, be conveyed of the attitude of myself and my Government.

"For the most part, these are not now of practical concern, since the unfortunate conclusion of the conversations deprives them of the interest they might otherwise have possessed and renders it less necessary to re-state them more precisely.

NO REPUDIATION AT ALL.

"There is, however, one matter of great importance in regard to which it appears to be essential to remove any possible cause of misapprehension. I refer to the passage in which it is said that I could not entertain any proposition amounting to a total repudiation of all debts, but that it would be open to anyone to raise at the Round Table Conference any question as to any financial liability of India and to call for an examination.

This might be misinterpreted as indicating that I and my Government, while rejecting any idea of total repudiation, might be prepared to entertain the idea of a partial repudiation. This, of course, would be entirely remote from the truth, since we could not conceivably contemplate repudiation in any form or in any degree.

"Although I am confident that you did not foresee the possibility of any misinterpretation of this kind when you gave your Note to the press, the matter is of such vital importance to the credit of India that you will, I am sure, agree with me that the public should not remain under any possibility of misapprehension in regard to it. I am, therefore, sending a copy of this letter to the press on Sunday evening.—Sd. Irwin."

THE JUNIOR RED CROSS.

For many years there has been health and hygiene teaching in schools. But until the Junior Red Cross was introduced there was never any attempt to do the thing indicated. It is not the teaching of health as an academic subject which will attain the object desired. It is the actual practice of health habits, the living of the healthy life. The Junior Red Cross has been always a "doing" order. It began in war days as a means of having children "do their bit" for the men at front. With the end of the world struggle and the organization of a permanent League of Red Cross Societies the Junior Red Cross also took its place as a world body with a definite object. Organized in the interests of "Health, Service and Good Citizenship" for individual, community, national and international activities the order has grown by leaps and bounds. Today there are eleven millions of the Juniors in forty-one countries, connection being maintained among them through the international correspondence passing continuously from and to Junior school children in these lands. In Canada seven thousand teachers have voluntarily organized Junior Red Cross in their classrooms. There are 200,000 Juniors throughout the Dominion and an average increase of twenty thousand a year.

The first duty of the Juniors is the daily observance of the Twelve Rules of Health. These cover all the well known fundamentals in the simple healthy life, such as eating plenty of cereals, fresh fruit and vegetables, drinking milk and water but no tea or coffee, sleeping with open windows or in the open air, regular elimination, playing out of doors, holding the body straight at play or work, keeping the body and teeth clean with particular attention to the hands when touching food, use of handkerchiefs when coughing or sneezing and the prohibition of spitting. In addition, as will be made clear later, the Juniors have a wide programme of "doing" with regard to sick or disabled children, and community health.

But the first and last habit of thought impressed on the Juniors at all times bears definitely on the dictum of Dr. Wilson quoted above, that "the seeds of disease are most lavishly sown within the frame and are diffused over communities by the hand of man himself." So that to every member of this order the handkerchief becomes a symbol and the open sneeze a social crime. Indeed, the intense earnestness of the Juniors in these matters sometimes takes amusing forms.

Recently, Her Majesty, Queen Mary, made a surprise visit to the Women's Settlement in Canning Town when a special celebration was in progress in honour of its president, Lady Aberdeen. Part of the programme was in the hands of the Junior Red Cross children of the settlement, who, with a neatly bandaged row of "patients" and twelve little enunciators of the Health Rules, preceded unabashed with their "piece." For it is one of the best features of the Junior Red Cross that its members are given self-confidence, through doing, learn self poise and are unselfconscious, fearless speakers. All went well. But when one small girl, looking very steadfastly in the face of the Queen, said firmly, "Breathe through your nose," it was too much for even the Royal dignity and the Queen enjoyed a hearty laugh, though she later commented appreciatively on the profound earnestness of the children.

Just what this means may be best gathered from a knowledge of some of the facts touching the problems presented in the many countries where Junior Red Cross is now an organized, working body.

When it is realized, for instance, that Japan has over a million Juniors enrolled; Italy a million and a half, the Philippines a million, that among the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes there are 200,000 Juniors; in Czecho-Slovakia 350,000; in Latin America 62,500; Greece, 116,000; Poland 115,000, and in Canada and the United States no less than seven millions, it will be seen that there must be something fundamentally sound in a cult which makes universal an appeal in these or other lands where living conditions, temperament and people are of so many varieties.

Miss Elsie Benedict, a former Director-General of the Junior Red Cross Societies of the world, with headquarters in Paris, has written of the difficulties encountered in Southern and Central Europe when the order was first introduced in countries where sanitary and medical sciences were merely names insofar as the lives of the common people were concerned.

"How to teach the children to sleep with open windows when the double panes were putting tight by their elders! How to free heads from lice when, as in Albania and Macedonia, lice have been regarded as sacred symbols of life for the naive reason that vermin leave the dead! How to make it understood in such countries as Greece that the anopheles mosquito is the instigator of malaria when they believe that this scourge comes from eating blackberries! How to have children take a bath once a week when, even in that magnificent centre of art and culture, Vienna, some children were found who had been sewed into their flannels in November and cut out of them in March! Yet the ardent young Juniors, inspired by their ideals of a sound body have solved these and harder problems with success, as many a report in the Secretariat of the League of Red Cross Societies in Paris, as well as hundreds of others in national headquarters can testify."

The Greek Juniors, for example, after learning of the ravages of the malaria-bearing mosquito, went forth in veritable swarms to help in the discovery of breeding pools, to destroy larvae and to assist when old enough, to clean and straighten many meandering streams. For their services then and subsequently they have been officially thanked by the Greek government on several occasions.

In Siam, where dead animals floating in streams were formerly regarded with complacency, the deceased dog has become a community educator since the Juniors came into being, no Junior will tolerate a dead dog in his vicinity, and as he is taught to consider the other fellow as well as himself, dead dogs or other animals now receive decent burial. The Juniors begin with health habits in themselves, but inevitably, in this or other countries "the little child shall lead" and the area of action as well as interest touches eventually the whole community.

In the United States during the past four or five years New York Juniors have raised annually $50,000 to spend on providing eye glasses and medical attention for children in need of such care but unable to pay for it, while in Japan and Italy so outstanding have been the contributions of the Juniors to the whole sum of public health that they are being officially encouraged by the governments in those countries as a means for raising standards among all the people.

Nor is Canada behind when it comes to accomplishments of Juniors. Medical, surgical and hospital care have been provided by them in recent times for 6,399 crippled children in all provinces. The Children's Hospital in Calgary which has been in beneficent operation for years was built by money they earned for the purpose; the new wing of the Edmonton University Hospital was well started on its way by ten thousand dollars contributed by Alberta Juniors and in these two institutions over a thousand small sufferers have been treated, some of whom were brought from the remotest settlements by the Juniors to be cured of crippling disabilities.

In British Columbia the Juniors interest themselves in many individual cases of crippled children, raise hundreds of dollars a year for the funds and take a deep interest in the workings of the Solarium near Victoria where tuberculous children are given sun treatment.—Social Welfare, Toronto.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Round Table Conference.—The Bombay correspondent of the "Hindu" wires to that paper that a Simla report says the Round Table Conference will be presided over partly by Lord Sankey and partly by Mr. MacDonald. He further states that Simla was consulted by Whitehall whether Dominion representatives should also be invited for the Conference. Lord Irwin in turn consulted a few Indian leaders and the latter suggested the presence of people like General Hertzog and Mr. MacKenzie King would be desirable as they could give the benefit of their experience in settling the minorities question in their Dominions. This opinion was forwarded to Whitehall and it is almost certain that General Hertzog, Mr. MacKenzie King and others will attend the Conference for the first few days at least.

Remarriage of a Convert.—An interesting criminal revision petition was argued on 4th September before Mr. Justice Pandalai in the Madras High Court by Mr. K. S. Jayarama Iyer, Advocate. The petitioner was a Catholic lady named Ganamratham and her case was as follows: Eleven years ago she married according to the rites of the Holy Catholic Church one Sami Ayia alias Antony Muthu, Catholic-born, and lived with him at Valam in the Tanjore district, and other places. Her husband earned his living by delivering discourses on subjects pertaining to Hindu mythology and Hindu religion. Because of this it was alleged, he was ex-communicated from the Catholic fold, and subsequently he came under the influence of a Brahmin priest. He then, in the presence of this Brahmin priest and under his directions, took a series of plunges into the river Cauvery and went through a ceremony of purification which concluded with a visit to a Hindu temple. Afterwards he called himself a Hindu, discarded the petitioner and married his cousin, a Catholic lady, whom he persuaded to go through a ceremony of purification similar to the one he had gone through. The petitioner on learning of her husband's marriage prosecuted him for bigamy but the Sub-Divisional Magistrate who tried the case acquitted him. It was against this acquittal that the present revision petition was filed. It was argued for the petitioner that a Hindu was born and not made, and the lower Court should not have held that the accused had been lawfully converted to Hinduism and, therefore, could with impunity take a second wife in the life-time of his first wife, who belonged to the Christian faith and which was sternly opposed to bigamy and plurality of wives. His Lordship remarked to Counsel that the High Court very rarely interfered in revision against acquittal. He was not satisfied that the present was a fit case in which he could exercise his discretion in favour of the petitioner. His Lordship therefore, dismissed the petition.—The Madras Mail

Gandhi Cap and Takli in America:—A friend sends us the following cutting from the New York Times:—An interesting display of a Gandhi cap and Takli (spinning instrument) is attracting attention to The Times window today. The Gandhi cap and the spinning instrument were given to The Times for display by George M. Gray to whom they were sent by M. C. Modi of Bombay, India. The Gandhi cap is now barred in most places in India and especially at such places as Sholapur. Merchants have been imprisoned for ten years and fined from $200 to $3600 for the wearing of the cap. The Gandhi cap has come to suggest that the wearer accepts the creed and policy of Mahatma Gandhi, and especially his creed of "non-violence." The wearer is presumed to be a truthful and straightforward person, one who is prepared to put in his every effort to win freedom for his country, one who has simplified his habits of life and is prepared to be known as one of the masses than of the classes. The wearer is assumed to have imbibed the spirit of Satyagraha or absolute adherence to truth and self-suffering without inflicting any violence or injury to his opponent. He is absolutely unarmed and receives blows in mute silence without raising even a finger. A Gandhi cap wearer is believed to be gentle, helpful, tolerant and incorruptible. Against these caps a crusade has been launched by the government and the wearer is penalized. The caps cost about ten cents, and are easily washable, being pure white, light, cool, and refreshing. In Bombay today out of a total male population of 6,000,000 more than 400,000 people are wearing Gandhi Caps. The Takli is a small instrument used to spin yarn. It is easily handled. Most of the Indian mass population has taken to hand spinning. India has determined to oust all English cloth and make up for the shortage of yarn and cloth it is enjoined by the Indian National Congress on every member to spin at least 125 yards every day. In Bombay today 600,000 are spinning on the Takli.

Caste and The Coming Census.—It has been learnt from a reliable source that His Highness the Maharaja of Chamba State (Punjab) has issued a circular to his Census Staff to the effect that they should not compel a person to have his caste registered in the Census papers if he does not want to do so. The evil caste system is a great obstacle in the way of the progress of the Hindu society and we congratulate the Maharaja Sahib for this advanced step. As we know there is a large number of such persons who do not believe in the utility of caste as such, we hope his example will be followed by the other States as well.

The Late Mr. Joseph Baptista:—We regret to announce the death from heart failure of Mr. Joseph Baptista, leader of the Indian Christian community in Bombay and ex-President of the Bombay Municipal Corporation, at about noon to-day. Mr. Baptista complained of severe pain in the region of the heart last night when the family doctors were summoned and all medical aid rendered. He, however, passed away on Thursday at about 12-5 p.m. without recovering from the attack. He was conscious all the while and told members of his family that they should be prepared for his end. To the last minute he was conversing with his relatives and advising them as to how best they should conduct themselves in life. Mr. Baptista was about 66 years old at the time of his death. Mr. Joseph Baptista was born in Bombay at Matharpacady on the 17th of March 1864 of East Indian parents. East Indians are Mahrattas whose ancestors embraced Christianity four hundred years ago during the Portuguese rule. Their homelands are situated within the vanished Portuguese Province of the North comprising the islands of Bombay, Salsette and of Bassein. He earned the affectionate sobriquet of Kaka (Uncle Joe) by his strenuous advocacy of the cause of Labour. He was a familiar figure among politicians throughout India known for his sturdy independence, wit and wisdom. He was an outstanding personality in his own community, and at the time of his death, President of the Bombay East Indian Association, representing the community, which number about 80,000.

"Fight must go on."—Chowdhury Khaliquzzaman, new Congress President, interviewed, says that the boycott will be still continued and will be the principal item of work before the country. The result so far achieved is greatly encouraging but there is scope for stiffening. Whether there are peace negotiations or not, there is no question of slackening the efforts. The Congress must continue to pulsate a vigorous life and the fight must be carried on, whatever peace talks might go on behind the prison bars. He is confident that India's great leaders in jail, who are considering peace terms, will at some stage or other take the country into their confidence. It will then be the time to dispute whether the operations would cease or go on. But that stage has not arrived yet and the fight must proceed. He is grateful to the numerous people who from every corner of India offered their services to the Working Committee, but regretted that he has to disappoint them all. It is, however, great pleasure to him, he says, to find his Muslim brethren coming now in such large numbers to join the Nation's momentous struggle.

NOTES.

Marriage Law Reform:—One of the urgent needs in social legislation is a law to put an end to polygamy. Both the Hindu and the Mahomedan laws permit polygamy which, tolerable though it might have been to women in the past, is intolerable to educated women of the present day. So far as Muslim wives are concerned, they have the right of divorce though it has in practice become considerably restricted in its application. This right, however, exists and it may be utilised to ensure against polygamy. Mrs. Hamid Ali, in a letter to the Sind Observer which we reprint, quotes the opinion of Mr. Faiz Tyebji, a recognised authority and the author of a standard work on Mahomedan law, that a Muslim marriage can be made monogamous by the simple device of inserting a clause in the marriage contract to the effect that if the husband takes a second wife during the lifetime of the first, the latter will be entitled to a divorce. Mr. Tyebji, therefore, holds that there is no need of legislation so far as Mahomedans are concerned in this respect. This, of course, applies only to particular cases and can, besides, be enforced only by litigation. Amongst caste Hindus, of course, there is no marriage contract. Even if the husband has given an agreement not to remarry during his wife's life time, says Dr. H. S. Gour, such agreement is invalid being opposed to the policy of the Hindu law. As a matter of fact, both the Shastric and the Koranic laws strictly limit the right of a husband to take more than one wife by severe conditions, but the British Indian courts have ignored the conditions and accorded an unrestricted right of polygamy in both communities. The only way of correcting this anomaly at this stage, is to have recourse to legislation which, to begin with, may be permissive, enabling husbands to bind themselves not to marry a second wife when one wife is living. Breach of the condition will give the wife the option of living apart from her husband with their children, if any, the cost of maintenance being borne by him, or of having a divorce if she prefers to remarry.

The Round Table Conference:—Two Mahomedan leaders, both members of the Legislative Assembly, have in statements to the Press strongly advocated the postponement of the Round Table Conference. Both avow that they are supporters of the Conference idea and it is because they wish it to succeed that they recommend its being put off. Maulvi Mahomed Yakub, who was many years Deputy President and was elected last July to succeed Mr. Vithalbai Patel as President of the Legislative Assembly, in a judicious statement points out that the work of the Conference is not likely to be finished during the short time now available and that it may be possible to have a more representative Indian delegation next May. He recommends the immediate release of Mahatma Gandhi, Pandit Jawharlal Nehru, Mr. Vithalbai Patel, Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, Dr. Ansari and Mrs. Sarojini Naidu. His idea is that they with Pandit Motilal Nehru, who is already free, should meet the delegates to the Round Table Conference as well as members of the Viceroy's Executive Council in conference at which a settlement, he believes, is likely to be reached. The Viceroy, he thinks, should not attend this conference; he should only be asked to fix the seal of his approval when a decision is reached. The Moulvi Sahab does not say what the London Conference in May is to do. Dr. A. Suhrawardy who was a member of the Indian Central Committee which the Simon Commission had associated with itself in its enquiries, criticises with some acrimony the personnel of the Indian delegation to London. Dr. Suhrawardy is particularly severe on the choice of the Mahomedan lady delegate. He calculates that in terms of Muslim law and position assigned to women the four Muslim representatives of the Punjab really resolve themselves into two or one and half (a woman being counted half of man in values). He declares that conservative Muslim opinion would not relish the inclusion of a Muslim woman for the purpose of protecting women's interests. "I may add" says he, "that orthodox Islam resents the idea of its cause being championed by the wife of a supporter of the Sarda Act." All this is, of course, nonsense, though in the choice of women, as in that of men, delegates Lord Irwin has paid no heed whatever to their record of social service. Apart from the calibre or representative character of the delegates, the circumstances in which they have to set about their task, make it impossible to expect any conclusive results from the Round Table Conference in November. The only thing that it can do is to meet and adjourn in order to make way for a larger and more representative body in India.

Happenings at Bardoli:—The Times of India published the following regarding happenings in

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

Bardoli in its issue of the 20th instant: "Agriculturists in Bardoli Taluka, it is reported, are resorting to a "Hijrat" (wholesale migration) from their villages, many of them having already removed all their moveable property. Cultivators in the taluka, it will be remembered, had resolved not to pay land revenue until Mr. Gandhi and Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel gave them permission to do it. Any stringent measures by Government for the collection of land revenue, the villagers stated, would be defied and rendered nugatory by the latter taking the bold step of migrating into the territories of the adjoining Indian States. Information has just reached here from Bardoli that the people residing in almost all the villages of the Taluka have resolved on a "Hijrat," true to their challenge to Government. It is further stated that the inhabitants of Sarbhon, Kadod, Vankaner and Valod have begun to evacuate their villages and migrate into other places, taking with them the remnants of their moveable belongings. It is difficult to ascertain how many families have so far left their homes. Unless the cultivators vacate the villages in large numbers one can hardly determine if they have left their homes for good or only temporarily or it is merely a gesture. The villagers have taken this step, it is alleged, as the result of the activities of Mr. Ismail K. Desai, Deputy Superintendent of Police, who has been specially appointed for political offences." In its issue of the 23rd, the same paper published the following from its correspondent in Poona where the Government of Bombay now is: "The report of wholesale migration of the people of Bardoli into surrounding Indian States has not so far become known in Government circles in Poona, but it is well-known that many of the people are removing all their valuables and even their household goods in order to avoid their attachment for non-payment of land revenue. The local authorities have been making such reports for some time, and there is no doubt that such a move is in keeping with their avowed intention to defy all attempts to secure revenue from them before they are instructed by the Congress leaders to pay. It has also been reported that in one or two cases women and children have been removed, but it is generally considered very unlikely that the cultivators themselves should leave now and go to Indian States on the borders of Bardoli, such as Baroda, Rajpipla, Bansda and Dharampur, where they would not be very welcome, particularly in view of the fact that in a few weeks their crops will be ripe for harvest." A reliable gentleman in Bombay told us the other day that he was getting private information to the effect that the exodus is due to the villagers not trusting themselves to remain non-violent under the provocations to which they were exposed. Some of the Bombay representatives to the Round Table Conference would do well to pay a flying visit to Bardoli to ascertain the actual truth before leaving India.

A District Magistrate's Ordinance:—We noticed last week the reference made by the District Judge of Thana to the Bombay High Court in regard to the conviction and sentence passed on Mrs. Lakhmani for picketing a liquor-shop in Chembur by the Magistrate of Kurla. We reprint the Judge's observations in another page. The High Court has called upon the District Magistrate of Thana to show cause why the sentence should not be set aside. While the matter is yet pending, the District Magistrate of the same district of Thana has issued an Order of his own under the District Police Act practically anticipating the decision of the High Court. The order is said to be under Section 39 (1) (m) of the Bombay District Police Act, and forbids persons to loiter in the streets and open-spaces in front of liquor, toddy, opium and intoxicating drugs shops, whether for the purpose of preventing or dissuading members of the public from entering the shops "or otherwise." The order extends to all the towns and villages of the Thana District and is to be in force for a period of two months from the date of order. The "or otherwise" is excellent. It leaves the Police perfect freedom to arrest whoever happens to be near a liquor shop.

Mr. Thakkar's case:—The District Judge of Thana, Mr. Sanjana, in his reference to the Bombay High Court has brought out the points in Mrs. Lakhmani's case which should have been considered by the Magistrate who convicted her for picketing a liquor shop. An even more noteworthy case is that of Mr. A. V. Thakkar, a senior member of the Servants of India Society, founded by the late Mr. Gokhale, who was sentenced last week to six months' imprisonment by the Magistrate of Kaira for a like offence. Mr. Thakkar told the Magistrate that he was not picketing but was present only to see if the complaints he had heard regarding the treatment of pickets were true. The case was postponed and when it was resumed, Mr. Thakkar told the Court that he would not further defend himself as he did not expect justice from it. In his statement, he explained his reasons for this course. "In the first place" he said, "I was for an action which was not only perfectly legal, but based on grounds of doing service, both to the Government and the Satyagrahis who were picketing at Mehemadabad liquor shops, by observing things for myself and giving out the truth to the public. But, no, the police sub-Inspector considered it too outrageous for any outsider like myself to pry into his illegal methods, and he arrested me under the arbitrary powers laid into his hands by the recent Ordinances. In the second place, for over a month that I was out on bail the Collector and the District Magistrate has objected to my criticising, during the period, any action of Government in the Press, also to my going to any area of possible disturbance for making any inquiry; in other words for the purpose of ascertaining truth and bringing it out. For this alleged offence of mine, a notice has been issued against me, asking me to explain why my personal bail-bond should not be cancelled. My answer to this notice is, Sir, that you may, under the circumstances, cancel my bail-bond and send me to the lock-up, as I am unwilling to surrender any of my liberties voluntarily." The full text of the statement is printed elsewhere. Mr. Thakkar before the satyagraha movement, was doing social and temperance work among the Bhils with remarkable results. He is really a pioneer in this line. That a man of his character and record should be sent to jail for merely looking on at picketing, without any hint of molestation whatever, is a significant commentary on the spirit in which the Viceroy's Ordinance is being administered.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1930.

NOVELIST AND PROPAGANDIST.

Some years ago Mr. Edward Thompson published a book with the title "THE OTHER SIDE OF THE MEDAL."* He showed in that book that Anglo-Indian accounts of the Indian Mutiny were mostly distorted and one-sided and that the atrocities imputed to Indians were equalled if not exceeded by the atrocities perpetrated on Indians in that troublous time. That event occurred eighty years ago and has no appreciable influence on the Indian attitude on political questions at the present day. The Government of India passed from the Company to the Crown as the result of the Mutiny, and the principles of the new system were laid down in the Queen's Proclamation. For many years, it was the main plank of the National Congress that these principles had not been fulfilled, till Lord Curzon practically repudiated the Proclamation as having any binding force on the British Government. The events of the Mutiny are not, therefore, very relevant to an understanding of present-day problems. Nevertheless, "The Other Side Of The Medal" showed that Mr. Thompson possessed the power of detachment, not too common among Anglo-Indian writers, and could admit that his own countrymen were as much to blame as Indians for the happenings in those days.

A later book by Mr. Thompson "An Indian Day," too, showed the same capacity. It was almost a sacrilege, it struck us, to use the religion, philosophy, and social life of India as background to a commonplace love-affair between a District Judge in India and a girl from some London suburb. There was not even the dubious interest of an inter-racial match in it as both the parties were English. One felt that there was not much sense of proportion in making "An Indian Day" end in an English girl impulsively accepting—in an Indian temple of all places—the hand of a man whom she had only a few months ago as impulsively rejected. However, the novel was relieved by some shrewd observations on the reactions of the Indian bureaucratic system on its instruments, English and Indian. It clearly brought out the fact that the system is and can be kept going only by the best British men and women in India keeping down their intellect and conscience under the narcotic of the shibboleth that they were doing their job. "Everyone had to get on with his job, knowing its necessity to that complex vessel of India's destiny and that it must remain undone if he fell aside. But intellectually the community was third-rate, and its mind was fed on starch and saw dust." What was the cumulative effect of these "jobs" so assiduously performed on India's destiny? On Indian character? It is Deogbaria "the damndest, vilest, oiliest, basest rascal that even India under British rule ever produced" that gets the K. C. I E. and the Commissionership while the honest Neogyi is transferred to a distant, malarial swamp as a penalty for his uprightness. "Oh don't, don't," cries Findlay to the Indian ex-I. C. S. man turned Sannyasi, stopping his ears. "I know, I know. We've evolved a method of selecting you which picks out all your swabs and sets them over you." Police Superintendent Nixon, thus reflects on his "job" of having to run to earth some revolutionary anarchists: "I have got to smash these chaps, of course; and they are devils out for bloodshed. But, you know, you can't wonder that any kid with any spunk prefers this game to being a tame clerk and saying "Achchha, Sahab" for the rest of his days. It takes some pluck to handle all those things we found today. And think of it, Hamar, imagine yourself a young Indian!" and so on. As for the Liberals and Moderates, no one can read "An Indian Day" without feeling that they are beneath contempt.

We have referred to Mr. Thompson's book on the Indian mutiny and his "An Indian Day," to get the right perspective for what we have to say about his recent efforts at political propaganda in the United States. There is much perturbation in Britain at the sympathy increasingly felt in the States for the Gandhi movement. (We prefer to use that name as it is the personality of Mahatma Gandhi rather than any particular part of his programme which appeals to the American and also to the idealistic minded sections of the British public.) Professor Rushbrook Williams was sent to divert American sympathy to the official British point of view. Sir John Simon himself went there for the same purpose. Sir John is a very clever man, but his personality does not inspire confidence; and to us at least it seemed that his visit to America would greatly neutralise the impression produced by the reading of the carefully camouflaged report of his Commission, which was widely circulated in that country. Professor Edward Thompson—he is now lecturer in Bengali in Oxford—went to America without any idea, it seems, of engaging in anti-Indian propaganda, but the misconceptions he found prevailing there about British rule in India, we are told, obliged him to take the field in the interests purely of truth. Some time back a friend in England sent us a pamphlet entitled "America and India by Edward Thompson" being a reprint of three articles published in the Times

* It was reviewed in the Reformer of 21st November, 1925.

(London) purporting to refute some impressions which the author found prevailing in the United States on Indo-British affairs. The articles struck us as rather thin. Mr. Thompson has set himself in these articles to expose some economic and historical statements which he noticed in the writings on Indian questions in some American journals. One of these is that "India, to put it plainly, is England's bread and butter." The American journal, Fleet's Review, in which this statement was made sought to establish it by alleging that Great Britain imported her wheat, cotton and ore largely from India. As a fact, England imports very much less than other foreign countries of Indian commodities, which is the main difficulty in the way of a plan of Imperial Preference. But it is also the fact that much of the money which accrues to India from her exports to other countries, goes to Britain; and the American paper, after all, only paraphrased Lord Rothermere's statement that 4 shillings in the pound of every Englishman's income comes from India, in other words, that one in five of the inhabitants of great Britain is maintained by India. If this is the fact, why should Englishmen be ashamed to acknowledge it or be annoyed if Americans mention it?

At times, Mr. Thompson is frankly childish as when he cavils at an American writer for describing Vaishnavism as the most orthodox Hindu cult. "I defy," writes the Oxford Lecturer in Bengali, "any Orientalist to tell me what this can mean or in what way a Vaishnava is more orthodox than a Saiyite, a Sakta or a Vedantist." Why invoke an Orientalist, who rarely knows much of present day India, to confute such a simple statement? The American writer clearly intended to mean that the Vaishnavas are the strictest sect of Hindus. This is true in a sense. While the Saiva and the Sakta will worship at Vaishnava temples, many Vaishnavas will not resort to Saiva or Sakta shrines. In any case, the point raised by Mr. Thompson has no bearing on British policy which it is his aim to justify in the eyes of the Americans. But the most amusing part of this pamphlet is where Mr. Thompson tells the Americans that since "the British do not hold meetings about the Negro question, or the American problem of the Philippines or American action past or present in the Caribbean or Central America," Americans should reciprocate by observing a corresponding reticence about British doings in India! This seems to go perilously near political blackmailing! Mr. Thompson attempts to correct the American journal for saying that the salt tax is iniquitous. The journal concerned has denied that it said so. Apart from that, has Mr. Thompson read what Mr. Ramsay Macdonald has written about the tax in his book on India? Then, again, Mr. Thompson tells the American people that Mahatma Gandhi wanted the Viceroy to carry out reforms not in his power. This is not honest. Mahatmajji asked Lord Irwin to "initiate" reforms in respect of his eleven points, which it is well within the power of the Governor-General to do. It would seem that the series was being continued and the London Correspondent of the Hindu has cabled a summary of the concluding article which, no doubt, is intended as the climax of Mr. Thompson's American propaganda. In closing a lengthy correspondence in "The Times," says the message, Mr. Edward Thompson urges the Americans to discourage simplifying the British relations with a complex people of 330 millions and asks them to remember that "what to America is merely exciting news, to us is the most perplexing problem we ever faced." By continuing the present methods of criticism, he continues, they steadily misrepresent their own people and he gives as an example that in India as well as the European countries it is widely believed that American students are far gone in moral degeneracy and women worse than men, which, he says, is far from the truth. He adds that American movies falsify the Indian situation and broadcast a lying picture of their own young men and women. We do not know how the Americans would relish Mr. Thompson's championship of the morality of their youth against the misconceptions alleged to be prevalent in India and Europe. It shows considerable ingenuity on his part to make it appear that British rule in India is the best safeguard of the reputation for morality of American boys and girls, and that anything which imperils the former must necessarily undermine the latter. Indians do not form their opinion of American or, for that matter, of British morality from what they see in cinema pictures. What really matters is what you are and not what you seem to be—in cinematograph shows. By the way Mr. Thompson's few references in "An Indian Day" to Americans are not exactly complimentary.

Mr. Thompson has not been content to write these articles in the Times, which have been broadcasted in pamphlet form in America. He has written a book, "The Reconstruction of India" in which the same motive of "enlightening" American opinion peeps out every now and then. Its object, however, is stated to be to provide "a connected account of how Britain and India have come where they stand today" which, the author thinks, is necessary "if the public is to follow the Round Table Conference, and assess its findings intelligently." But this article has become long and we reserve the book for separate treatment.

GANDHIJI'S PLACE IN HISTORY.*

By Mr. J. C. KUMARAPPA.

GANDHIJI'S MISSION.

The life of a nation like the incoming tide is one of successive waves. Though each wave may appear to recede the sum total of the result is progress. In the history of a nation each wave may last for centuries. Very often the lull between the waves is mistaken for death. For centuries India has been hibernating and during that time foreigners have been exploiting the land. From time to time a wide awake prophet would arise and disturb the slumbering masses for a time only to let the country turn over and plunge into a deeper sleep than ever before. On these occasions if the authorities incarcerated the prophet whose activities were embarrassing to them then nothing happened to the people who just slept on. But what is happening to-day?

About a decade ago Gandhiji—our Moses who was to deliver his people from bondage—woke up and said: "Watchman, what of the night?" when he launched out the Non-Co-operation movement and soon came reverberating through the darkness, the reply "The morning cometh." So he patiently abode his time for a decade in his Ashram on the banks of the Sabarmati, preparing for the time when the land shall bestir at the dawn of the rising Sun of Liberty.

In 1930 his alarm has rung throughout the length and breadth of the land and the masses have jumped out of their beds and have rolled away and put aside their beddings not to go to sleep any more. They are girding up their loins to put their house in order and any unwelcome guest found therein will soon be ejected. Intoxicating liquors and Lancashire goods have been discovered and are being thrown out of the house. Gandhiji has assumed the role of the Captain and is drilling the masses into an iron discipline that many a militaristic state may well envy. His discipline is not a discipline of fear but of love. The word of command is not human but the voice of God rings it out.

Our loyalty is not to a mortal King but to the Everlasting throne of Grace. Our motive power is not self-aggrandisement but the welfare of others. Our soldiers are not mercenaries but idealists who count it a gain to lose their lives. Our interests are circumscribed only by the good of humanity. The British Government has not the vision to see the might of the forces in operation to-day. Following old precedents they have tried placing Gandhiji behind iron bars and stone walls hoping the people will go to sleep again. But that is not to be. The movement at present is immeasurably stronger than when Gandhiji was out and has exceeded all expectations of even an optimist like him.

* Address delivered at a public meeting at Surat on the 19th September.

CONFLICT BETWEEN THE EAST AND THE WEST.

We have to ask ourselves what is the secret of his success and the nature of his mission. The greatness of a nation rests with the people and at times when this is forgotten we need a Seer to show us the proper functions of Society and this awakening usually causes what is called a revolution. Some of these prophets restrict themselves to one or two spheres of National Life, either to spiritual, moral, political or economic. Gandhiji is one of the few who have influenced all of these and radically changed some.

Every nation has its own peculiar genius. In so far as it advances on its own lines it progresses but if it begins to imitate an alien civilisation it is flirting with death, and national deterioration will not be long in overtaking it. During the inevitable contact with all sorts of peoples that the activities of a live nation involves, frequently the people lose sight of their main mission in the world and run after novelties like children after new toys. Providence in its good time sends us national schoolmasters to direct us back to the right path.

For some decades we have been in conflict with western civilisation, a conflict of ideals, a conflict of values and a conflict of standards of measurements. A decade or so ago it looked as though our own indigenous ideals, values and standards were in danger of being swamped by the glitter of the West. In the spiritual world we were losing ground against the advancing materialism of the West. It had almost become a fashion to be irreligious. Spiritual values had well nigh ceased to have any significance in the political world and in the economic life of the people. We were clinging to forms and ceremonies with a corroding superstition. In India, and for the matter of that, in the East, things spiritual were always placed first. Renunciation and not Acquisition was held up to adoration, Learning and not Possession commanded the homage of the people, Service and not Power was held in high respect. We find innumerable instances in history where kings exchanged the sceptre for the beggar's bowl and had greater homage rendered on that account; and where regal honours were conferred on savants whose material possession consisted of the rags on their backs. Deserting these ideals we went a 'whoring after the golden calf' and we had begun to put a premium on hat, coat and pants to the exclusion of every thing else. It was left to Gandhiji to turn us back from these to realise the true value of life in its proper setting. Gandhiji in his loin cloth commands the love and adoration of more than a fifth of the human race and the homage of the rest. No Emperor in all his glory was so honoured in the history of the world and no millionaire commanded such devoted service.

PHYSICAL FORCE EXALTED.

At the present moment it is not so much his spiritual appeal that is before the public as his political and economic programme. We shall devote a little more time to this aspect of his work. Until quite recently politics were regarded as of doubtful honesty and diplomacy was almost synonymous with deceit. Most honest people stepped clear of politics on that account. Religion was assigned a pigeon-hole, outside of it, it was powerless and ineffective. Religion and politics were considered to be in watertight compartments. Nationalism was understood to be a narrow outlook on mankind and to be opposed to internationalism. Usually big business interests controlled the State and the affairs of the masses were neglected. Broadly, Might was Right. Our people had begun to answer force with force and violence was about to be enthroned. Our younger generation was eagerly studying and imitating the selfish nationalism of the West which seeks to devour its neighbours. We were in danger of being drawn into a whirlpool of international rivalries. In the West, Imperialism directs the activities of Nationalism to serve its own purpose. Armies and navies are recruited for 'King and Country' but in reality as an arm of imperialism. Politics has been reduced to a game on the chess-board of high finance and foreign relations to one of exploitation of contacts amongst the powerful ones.

CULTURAL DISCIPLINE OF THE EAST.

This is all against the current of our past history and if we had proceeded on those lines it was bound to have landed us on the rocks sooner or later. In ancient India, our nationalism did not assume the form of imperialism but was brought under the pale of religion and the nation was organised into a unit by this cultural process. Our tie with the rulers was indeed frail. The people managed all their own affairs in a most democratic fashion. Their actions were disciplined not by fear of civil law or any other external force but was the outcome of self-discipline occasioned by religious observances. It was a cultural discipline and not the discipline of the 'Lathi.' In this respect our ancient governments were on a much higher plane than the modern governments of the West which depend on fear of physical injury to enforce their regulations. This type of theocratic government was not peculiar to India; other eastern nations, such as the Jews, had it also. Here the appeal to the citizen is raised from the physical to the moral sphere. The western nations are still in a backward state in this respect. Although materially they appear to have advanced far ahead of us yet in things that matter they are still in a barbarous condition. We need only to compare the difference in attitude of the Americans and our people towards the expunging the evil of alcohol. Although the law is in their favour the Americans find it difficult to enforce prohibition while, in our case, in spite of the law being against us, we have been able to place an extraordinary check on it. The reason for the difference is not difficult to see. The American appeal is to external forces while our appeal is to the higher nature in man. We have banned it as being immoral. Both Hindus and Muslims regard drunkenness as a sin while the American considers it as merely unlawful. Indeed in India the whole social structure was based on religion and very little was left for the State to do. In this way, everyman was his own policeman and the State was only a defence force. It is because of this that we find that our society has gone on irrespective of changes in the central government. It is also because of this that we are said to be without a political sense as understood in the West. The Western Governments are based purely on the physical plane and therefore law breaking is more frequent as it is not regarded as sin. A man breaks the law if he can 'get away with it' as the Yankees say. Perhaps my description of the situation is somewhat out of perspective but my purpose is only to make my point clear and not to sit in judgment over Western Civilisation.

APPEAL TO HIGHER NATURE IN MAN.

On a similar basis we can explain the armaments of Western nations. Their nationalism, being the handmaiden of imperialism, is equipped with all the offensive implements to enforce an outsider's will upon another. Here again we are on a physical plane. Any peace and order which results from such a government is not a real peace, as it is external to the subject. It is an enforced peace. It is in an unstable equilibrium like an elephant sitting on a small stool, at the command of the circus manager, afraid of the sound of his smacking whip. It is fraught with danger to both parties. Any apparent order there might be is cemented with dynamite and will explode at any moment and blow up the parties to smithereens. Peace and order to be lasting has to be elicited, not enforced. That can only be done on a moral plane. In 1914 we had ample proof of what I am talking about. "If you want peace prepare for war" is a dangerous precept on which the Western nations have been working. By that process we merely get the calm which precedes the storm and we cannot avoid thereby the devastating storm itself. If we wish to end war the efforts will have to be lifted to a higher plane than the physical one. War can never end war. For 'all they that live by the sword shall perish with the sword.' Violence has a demoralising effect. It degrades man to the level of beasts. As civilisation has progressed all people have abandoned corporal punishment even in schools. It degrades both the punisher and the victim. We have passed the stage of settling individual disputes by a challenge to mortal combat. The law courts have taken the place of the fist. But the States are still lagging far behind in the adoption of civilised methods. A time will come and that day is not far off when even nations will settle their disputes like 'Gentlemen' by an appeal to reason. It was this inherent longing in man to reach a higher plane that has led idealists on a quest for a 'moral equivalent for warfare.' The world had its cupful of sorrow in the gre-

European war and the better strata of society in all countries has got tired of armaments. In India itself we were chafing at our lot and were getting tired of slavery. At this time Gandhiji appeared on the scene, and what contribution has he to make towards the solution of the riddle before us?

(To be concluded).

PROSPICE.

Fear Death?—to feel the fog in my throat
The mist in my face,
When the snows begin, and the blasts denote
I am nearing the place,
The power of the night, the press of the storm,
The post of the foe ;
Where he stands, the Arch-Fear in a visible form,
Yet the strong man must go ;
For the journey is done, and the summit attained,
And the barriers fall,
Though a battle's to fight ere the guerdon be gained,
The reward of it all.
I was ever a fighter, so—one fight more
The best and the last !
I would hate that death bandaged my eyes, and forbore,
And bade me creep past.
No ! let me taste the whole of it, fare like my peers.
The heroes of old,
Bear the brunt, in a minute pay glad life's:
arrears
Of pain, darkness and cold.
For sudden the worst turns the best to the brave
The black minute's at end,
And the element's rage, the fiend-voices that rave,
Shall dwindle, shall blend,
Shall change, shall become first a peace out of pain,
Then a light, then thy breast,
O thou soul of my soul ! I shall clasp thee again,
And with God be the rest !

ROBERT BROWNING.

The Indian Stage in America:—Sisir Kumar Bhaduri, the foremost actor of Bengal, with his company of artists, says an Associated Press message, left for Karachi on September 8 enroute to New York, where he has been invited to give a series of representations of Hindu drama. The principal piece to be staged in New York is "Sceta," an epic drama based on the story of the "Ramayan," in which Bhaduri and Miss Prabha will play the lead. Dr. Rabindranath Tagore, who is now in Germany, is expected to be present at the opening performance. It would be worthy of note that some of Tagore's comedies and dramas have been staged by Bhaduri in his own theatre in Calcutta with conspicuous success.

CHRISTIANITY AND CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE

By THE REV. JAMES KELLOCK.

The other point that Father Elwin puts forward in connection with St. Paul is that, the Christian Church being an unlicensed society in the Roman Empire and therefore illegal, St. Paul practised civil disobedience by travelling about in the Roman Empire seeking to maintain and expand the Church. "There is nothing whatever to suggest" he says, "that when circumstances arise to demand it, Christians may not oppose the civil power, and, if they are to follow St. Paul's own example, they may do this by quiet civil disobedience." Now it seems to be verging on the casuistic to suggest that the action of St. Paul in propagating Christianity is analogous to the civil disobedience that openly breaks laws for the sake of defying government. To carry on quietly and persistently doing something which you regard as a divinely appointed duty but which Government has forbidden, is not the same thing as breaking an ordinary law for a political purpose. We would rather see the case for civil disobedience argued without resort to such misleading analogies. A case can be made out for it as being the tactics required to impress the powers that be with the reality and the intensity of the demand for a change. A case might be made out for it as a method of rebellion whereby to sweep away an obstacle to the good life. But only confusion results, if support for the modern civil disobedience movement is wrung out of an activity which was essentially different from it.

We have the same criticism to make regarding Father Elwin's deductions from the Book of Revelation. His argument is based upon a false analogy. The Book of Revelation is a Christian apocalyptic writing wherein denunciation and doom are pronounced against an implacable Government that was trying to enforce the worship of the Roman Emperor, that had made Christianity a capital crime, and that was endeavouring to stamp out Christianity by the most ruthless persecution. Moreover many of the ideas in Revelation are drawn from the ferocious Jewish hatred of that Rome which, as Peake says, "had destroyed Jerusalem and inflicted on the Jewish people one of the bloodiest punishments ever meted out to a conquered nation." It is, to say the least, misleading to suggest, as the pamphlet does on pp. 28 to 31, that the attitude of Asiatic Christians suffering under that persecuting tyranny of Rome should be made an analogy for the attitude of Indian Christians towards the present British Government, which is anxiously seeking to find a solution for one of the most difficult problems that has ever had to be faced and which is asking Indians to come to a Round Table Conference to try to help to solve it. Moreover, it ought to be quite clear to anyone who gives the matter serious consideration, that civil disobedience to a Government that was trying to make you acknowledge a human creature to be divine and thereby trying to make you deny your deepest religious faith, has no connection with the civil disobedience that is being discussed in India today.

At p. 32, Father Elwin begins to discuss the nature of Law, and so leads up to a statement of seven circumstances under which he thinks it would be justifiable to offer resistance to Government. They hardly seem to us to be supported by a true reading of his authorities. Indeed these seven reasons seem to us to be the most unsatisfactory thing in the pamphlet. We say this not because we think the matters complained of are illusory, or that they are things to be merely acquiesced in. We say it because the abandonment of constitutional method, and the adoption of direct action, which means force or coercion rather than legal persuasion, cannot be justified by reasons so vague as "economic exploitation," "burdensome laws," "failure to fulfil the purpose of sociable life and fellowship," or by reference to such particular matters as the respective amounts spent on the army and on education. The reasons given are reasons for declaring the State organisation and action to be imperfect and in need of improvement, but no reasons for trying to annul the authority of the constituted Government—specially when the Government is definitely intending to get itself amended. Reasons for civil disobedience should be reasons that show there is no other way of removing the hindrance to the good life than the way of rebellion.

The root of the defect in Father Elwin's treatment of the matter is that he omits all recognition of the General or Common will, and its means of expression. The essence of democratic government is the establishment of a definite method or machinery for finding and expressing the General will, and the loyal acceptance of decisions thereby arrived at, with the understanding that a minority has always the right to try to turn itself into a majority and so get its will realised by constitutional means. What Father Elwin seems to suggest is a chaotic individualism, in which individuals would decide for themselves the right and wrong both of broad complicated issues and of particular enactments, and forthwith embark on civil resistance if they regarded them as wrong. He says moreover that civil resistance is perfectly legitimate if laws and ordinances of a government do not have the approval of the whole people; or if they have to be maintained by force rather than by legal persuasion. If he means this to be understood anything like literally, then before a law could be sure of obedience the consent of a hundred million or so of persons would have to be secured; and a law that forcibly restrained robbers, instead of legally persuading them, would be null and void!

It would have been different if Father Elwin had argued that India at present, as a matter of fact, has not got the power to make its General will effective, owing to such things as reserved subjects, official powers of veto, and certification, etc. A case for civil disobedience might be made out on this ground though it would, in fairness, have to take into account the projected Round Table Conference whose purpose is to reach common agreement regarding the new constitution of the Indian Government. But Father Elwin does not take this line of argument, unless indeed he would consider it to be implied in his references to foreign government in his 1st and 7th points. But in any case the matter should be made clear and the civil disobedience issue should not be blurred by suggesting as grounds for it a number of things that would justify civil disobedience in practically every country in the world.

Civil disobedience may, without disrespect, be called a species of war. It is not like passive resistance, a refusal to comply with some Government requirement that violates the conscience. It is an endeavour to overthrow or paralyse the constituted Government. Civil disobedience is undoubtedly the most Christian way of trying to do this. But nevertheless it is surely a mistake to suggest, as Father Elwin does on page 44, that, simply because the means are such, therefore Christians should be in the civil disobedience movement. That would imply the curious doctrine that the means justify the end.

It is right that Christians should be active, patriotic citizens of India. They should be second to none in their love of their Motherland. It is their duty to try to discover what is best for India. They ought to be thinking hard in order to find out how the highest interests of the people of India can be achieved. This includes the question of means or methods, but it is a bigger question than that.

Good citizenship requires us to bear in mind that the conditions of political freedom have to be created and maintained. Political freedom is something that has to be built up, and not merely something that has to be asserted. There is much need at the present time for clear thinking upon the problem of how to solve the unprecedented political and constitutional problem which Indian conditions now present for solution. India as a whole has never known a political government that was not autocratic. The task of setting up a real Parliamentary type of self-government for India's varied population of 320,000,000 souls is a task that calls for the clearest vision and the wisest skill. It requires a great idealism that is based firmly upon a solid realism.

The past 150 years of Indian history may be said to have given to India the external form of nationhood...the outward unity, the framework. The future historian, writing after the dust of the conflict has died down, will almost certainly declare, as Professor Radhakrishnan has said, that England built the road along which India marched to freedom. But the Indian Nationalist movement has been breathing the spirit of life into the outward form. There is an inevitability about the Nationalist movement, for self-determination and freedom are a people's birthright. The movement had to come, and it is far from being a discredit to the British connection that it has come. Moreover we can be thankful that the guiding genius of the movement has been a person with so much of the spirit of Christ as Mahatma Gandhi.

PICKETING OF LIQUOR SHOPS.

Important observations on liquor shop picketing were made by Mr. Beram N. Sanjana, Sessions Judge, Thana, in the course of an interesting reference against the conviction and sentence of Mrs. Sakinabai Lukmani, daughter of Badrudin Tyabjee, before Mr. Justice Madgaokar and Mr. Justice Barlee on the Appellate Side of the Bombay High Court. The reference was made under Section 438 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Their Lordships after perusing the minutes of reference issued a rule on the District Magistrate, Thana, to show cause why the sentence should not be set aside and pending disposal of the reference ordered Mrs. Lukmani to be released on her own cognisance for a bond of Rs. 50.

It will be remembered that Mrs. Lukmani was put up before Mr. K. T. Chaubal, Resident First Class Magistrate, Kurla, on a charge under Section 4 of the Picketing Ordinance. The Magistrate convicted and sentenced her to suffer four months' rigorous imprisonment. The sentence was later commuted to simple imprisonment by Government.

The sentence passed in the case was an appealable one, but the party had not chosen appeal. The facts of the case, however, having come to the notice of the Sessions Judge, Thana, indirectly, he called for the papers suo motu and examined them.

The Sessions Judge in the course of his reference stated: "The evidence in the case, which consisted of oral testimony of two Constables showed that between 10-30 and 12-30 on the morning of July 4 last, the accused stood at a distance of 25 or 30 paces in front of the shop and dissuaded some people from going to the shop and they accordingly refrained from doing so. The Sub-Inspector of Police who was the only other witness examined in the case merely added that "neither the shop-keeper nor his servant nor any of the customers were willing to come forward as witnesses owing to fear of villagers who, they were afraid, would boycott them."

"The lady, though she refused to make a defence, yet in her statement to the Magistrate stigmatized this evidence as untruthful. The learned Magistrate, however, accepted it as reliable and thence deduced the following three propositions:—(1) That the lady "Loitere" near the shop within the meaning of the word as used in Section 4 of the Ordinance, (2) that she did so with a view to cause the liquor shop-keeper to abstain from keeping open his shop which he had a right to do and (3) that she hindered him in the use of the shop."

The Sessions Judge commenting on these points observed:— "As to the first finding, possibly no exception could be taken. But the second and third appear to me to be unjustifiable and wrong. A drink habit is universally acknowledged to be detrimental to the person who is a victim to it, and an effort to wean him from it is always looked upon as praiseworthy. A person who disinterestedly takes on himself or herself to promote temperance among the masses is invariably respected as a social benefactor. The Law has never set its face against such activity so long as it is peacefully and reasonably pursued. Neither is the object of the Ordinance to discourage work of the kind for the general good of the masses. When people are dissuaded from frequenting a liquor shop, no doubt the business of the shop-keeper is to that extent affected and he suffers in his gains. But because that is one of its results, it should not be presumed, in the absence of any additional circumstances pointing to the contrary, that the dissuading was done with a view to compel the shop-keeper to give up his business. And unless it was done with that as its direct, primary and principal object, dissuading people from frequenting the shop would not be an offence under the Ordinance. For what is made punishable by section 4 of the Ordinance is molestation and this molestation does not occur, as that word is defined by the preceding Section, until the person charged therewith loiters near the shop of another with a view to cause such other person to abstain from doing or to do any act which he has a right to do or to abstain from doing."

Proceeding the Sessions Judge stated: "It is a cardinal principal of Law that so long as the circumstances of a case are fairly and reasonably compatible with an innocent intention, the presumption of a guilty one should not be made. Therefore, when a person of the class, age and social position of the lady in this case takes on herself to do the dissuading, the ordinary presumption would be that she does it purely as a social benefit work with the object of inducing the party dissuaded to give up a bad habit and not with the view of deterring the shop-keeper from pursuing his business as her direct and immediate purpose. Unfortunately, this activity has come to be mixed up with the mischievous programme of Civil Disobedience and is often pursued as part of it. But that is no reason why the majesty of the Law itself should not maintain its detached and dispassionate outlook and discriminate the innocuous from really mischievous and culpable phases of that activity."

The judge in conclusion stated that in his opinion the second and third propositions did not follow from the facts established in the case, and held that the conviction and sentence were illegal. He, therefore, recommended that the conviction and sentence be set aside and the lady acquitted. The Sessions Judge added, "I should have, pending decision by their Lordships, gladly directed release of the lady on bail under the last clause of Section 438 (1). But, having regard to the general attitude adopted on the subject by this class of persons, I have not deemed it consistent with the dignity of the Law to go out of my way to make an offer which stood little chance of being accepted."

MR. THAKKAR'S STATEMENT.

Following is the text of the statement made by Mr. A. V. Thakkar of the Servants of India Society in the case against him the under Picketing Ordinance at Kaira :

At this stage of the proceedings of the case against me, I have requested my learned pleader, Mr. Somabhai not to take any further trouble to defend me in the case. My reasons for this seemingly abrupt action are as follows:—In the first place, I was arrested for an action which was not only perfectly legal, but based on grounds of doing service, both to the Government and the Satyagrahis who were picketing at Mahamadabad liquor shops, by observing things for myself and giving out the truth to the public. But, the Police Sub-Inspector considered it too outrageous for any outsider like myself to pry into his illegal methods, and he arrested me under the arbitrary powers laid into his hands by the recent Ordinances.

In the second place, for over a month that I was out on bail the Collector and the District Magistrate has objected to my criticising, during the period, any action of the Government in the Press, also to my going to any area of possible disturbance for making any inquiry; in other words, for the purpose of ascertaining truth and bringing it out. For this alleged offence of mine, a notice has been issued against me, asking me to explain why my personal bail-bond should not be cancelled.

My answer to this notice is, Sir, that you may, under the circumstances, cancel my bail-bond and send me to the lock up, as I am unwilling to surrender any of my liberties voluntarily. During the progress of the case I have patiently heard a number of mean untruths related against me by so-called responsible police and Excise officers. The concocted narrations of the Excise Sub-Inspector, Mr. Munshi, who was not present at or near the liquor shop on that day of the alleged offence from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. for a single minute, but who affirmed on oath that he was present there for about three hours continuously, was simply astounding. I do not wish to pitch myself against these untruthful persons and convince the Court that they have lied. The prosecution has not brought forward a single independent witness, I mean from outside Government service, not even the drunkard whom I am said to have dissuaded, to prove that I incited others to picket, or that there were 15 picketers sitting by my side under the tree, as freely alleged.

From the very start of this case, I had my own doubt as to my getting pure justice from the Magistrate who was trying me, who is also an Executive Officer. But I succumbed to the persuasion of my friends and well intentioned colleagues and offered to defend myself through the kind help of my friend and pleader, Mr. Somabhai. But I am now fed up, firstly with the number of untruths told by the prosecution and secondly by the policy of the Government, as expressed through the mouth of the prosecuting pleader, to suppress truth and to withhold publicity of the popular version of events in the so-called disturbed area; and as expressed by you, Sir, to the effect that I should not criticise Government (whose servant you are) adversely, in these days of high tension, I have therefore, come to the conclusion that I do not expect to get any justice from this Court. I, therefore, request the favour of your passing any judgement you please on me, based on the prosecution side only and my statement submitted on the 15th August, and I am prepared to suffer the sentence very willingly.

In these days, Sir, why should one expect justice? When almost the whole nation is on a non-violent war with a mighty armed Government, a sympathiser like myself with the National liberty movement, cannot escape injustice and should not grumble if he does not. In times when non-official enquiry committees into the alleged misbehaviour of an ordinary Sub-Inspector of Police are not allowed to work or even to sit for work, and are put into prison for having the presumption to announce such enquiries, when National Flags are openly burnt by a District Magistrate in his very presence, when people are sent to prison for giving quarters to Satyagrahis, as if they were enemies of the most dangerous type of the State and the country and when sons of the soil are treated as "Undesirable foreigners" and deported and imprisoned, it would be foolish on my part to expect justice for myself, even though I may be doing my work from a social point of view, and not as a propagandist.

I expect justice from a much higher quarter, who will judge you Sir, and me, both in His true perspective. May God teach truth to my untruthful prosecutors and may they repent over their misdeeds.

MARRIAGE AND THE ISLAMIC LAW.

Mrs. Shareef Hamid Ali writes in the Sind Observer :—

Sir,

You will remember that a resolution from the Muslim women of Delhi was sent to the Conference (Bombay Session) asking that the "Shariat right of Muslim women of getting a divorce be recognized in British India." The Standing Committee asked me to consult Muslim Moulvies and Kazis and Lawyers on this subject. I issued a circular letter and received two answers only, one from Mr. Sayid Hassan Imam, Bar-at-Law (Patna), and one from Mr. Faiz Tyabji, Bar-at-Law, (Bombay). They both assure me that the Muslim women's right of divorce is recognized in British India.

Mr. Tayabji says: "Generally with reference to your letter, I would suggest that you should bear in mind that under the law as it stands the most plenary powers of divorce can be acquired by the wife provided appropriate terms are embodied in the marriage contract....." and he suggests that our right course is to "inform all parties interested that without any legislation or any trouble the marriage contract can be moulded as the parties desire."

I draw your attention to the following authorities on the law.

The wife may derive the right to effectuate a divorce in several ways:—

- (1) By a stipulation in the marriage contract that she shall have such a right;
- (2) By an option to divorce derived from the husband;
- (3) By being appointed the husband's agent in that behalf;
- (4) By the husband's pronouncing a divorce contingently on something happening, the contingency being such that the wife has some kind of control over it (section 134-page 210 Tyabji's Mahomedan Law).

In section 144 on conditional divorce (Page 221, Tyabji's Mahomedan Law) Sayed Sahib Amir Ali states that:

(1) "Clauses are usual in marriage contracts to the effect that should the husband marry another wife the first marriage will ipso facto be void. Such a clause would be valid in Sunni Law and would have the effect of dissolving the first marriage on the husband taking a second wife. If the first marriage has been consummated the whole of the Maher would then be due."

The Shia Law of Divorce is also to a similar effect:

Section 125 Tyabji's Mahomedan Law says:—

"A husband may lawfully authorize his wife or any other person as his agent to make or to revoke a pronouncement of Talaq on his behalf."

I specially want to bring his point to the notice of the members of the Standing Committee that not only can a Muslim woman divorce her husband for various reasons of cruelty, adultery, etc., but can indirectly put a stop to polygamy by inserting a clause against a second marriage in her marriage contract. There would be no polygamy as the first marriage would ipso facto be void.

I, therefore, earnestly and strongly press that we must help in spreading a knowledge of the Muslim Law, so that at every Muslim marriage the bride and her relatives should insist on proper safeguards being inserted in the marriage contract. Just as "Maher" is provided for, so it be provided that the wife will have the right to pronounce a divorce.

- (a) In case the husband marries another wife.
- (b) Acts cruelly to the wife.
- (c) Commits adultery.

(d) Refuses to fulfil the conjugal duties laid down in Islam, including the duty of maintaining the wife.

If the Standing Committee desires it, it should arrange to have such a marriage contract prepared and printed in English and Urdu, for being freely distributed at our Annual Conference. This would not only spread the knowledge of Islamic Law, but show people how to utilize it.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Dr. Besant:—Dr. Besant will leave London for India with Mr. O. Jinarajadasa on October 3.

Pussyfoot Johnson in Hawaii:—The native kings, writes Mr. Pussyfoot Johnson who visited Hawaii recently, in the Literary Digest, long before the Maine law, enacted and enforced Prohibition in the Hawaiian islands. In this they were backed to the hilt by the missionaries, who could have gotten rich by debauching the natives, but didn't. It was Captain Lapsee, in 1839, commanding the French Warship l'Artemise, that landed troops from his war-ship and, at the point of the bayonet, compelled Kamehameha II to sign a treaty, one section of which read. 'Art. 5th. French merchandise, or those known to be French produce, and particularly wines and caus-de-vies (brandy) cannot be prohibited, and shall not pay an import duty higher than five per cent. ad valorem.' A little later, England exacted a treaty of the same general character. It was against all this sort of thing that the missionaries fought morning, noon, and night for forty years.

Chinese Minister's Reply to Missionary Protest:—In the course of his reply to a protest presented by twelve Protestant sects with headquarters at Shanghai, the Minister of Education says (July 24): "That we should use religious teaching in the training for life, is not far from the truth. But this depends upon whether you utilize in your teaching the ideals of all religions; one cannot limit the teaching exclusively to those of one religion. Furthermore, religion cannot be taught by outward forms and practices. If you conduct courses on religion and have worship limited to one religion only, this is in fact mere outward formality and from the educational point of view is not an essential in the training for life....If we allow any one religion to inculcate exclusively its own principles in non adults of junior middle school grade and below, this will preempt their minds and deprive them later on when they have reached years of maturity of the ability to exercise freedom in choice of their religion. This is really the placing of shackles upon their liberty of thought...With regard to the idea that all the children of the 200,000 Christians must be enrolled in church schools, this seems to us to be on the same plane as attempt to view the world from your own doorstep and such an idea should not continue to be cherished. If you propose to experiment on projects related to science and social conditions, this is something which the Government unquestionably approves and permits. Religion, however, is one type of abstract intangible imagination and is outside the category of educational theories and there is therefore no reason for the Government to permit religion in schools for the purpose of experimentation....Let this be considered final and not subject to further review."

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

Mahatma Gandhi:—Mahatma Gandhi's sixty-first birth-day, according to the modern calendar, fell yesterday and was celebrated in Bombay by a monster procession of women organised by the Desh Sevika Sangh. In many other places it was celebrated a fortnight back, according to the Hindu reckoning. In his prison cell where he is virtually "buried alive"—to use Lord Lloyd's famous phrase—it will please him to know that millions of his countrymen wish him many happy returns of his birthday to serve humanity through India. Amongst these million voices, those of women and children predominate for they have instinctively realised that his movement means to them freedom to grow to the full height of their stature. He stands forth before the world as the embodiment of India's highest aspirations.

A people is but the attempt of many
To rise to the completer life of one;
And those who live as models for the mass
Are singly of more value than they all.

Lord Irwin on the Peace Negotiations:—The Western practice of making speeches at banquets is thoroughly irrational as well as unhygienic. It keeps the speakers at least from enjoying their meals, as they have to be thinking of their speeches all the time. If the practice has to be tolerated, it can only be if speakers strictly adhere to the old-time convention that they should confine their oratorical efforts to jokes of more or less ancient lineage. We know some who attach so much importance to this rule that they have note-books in which they record amusing sayings from all sources which they have come across, and to the perusal of which they devote half an hour or so before going out to dine. This is for conversational material as well as for speeches. Lord Irwin's speech at the Punjab Ministers' farewell banquet at Simla on Monday must, we are afraid, have upset the digestions and given nightmares to many of the guests who assembled to do him honour. It is clear that Lord Irwin deeply feels the failure of the peace negotiations and we fully share this feeling. The responsibility for the failure, however, is not all on one side, as his Excellency tried to make out. The arrest of Pandit Motilal Nehru, immediately after his peace overture and while the Jayakar-Sapru negotiations were well afoot, made many people doubt if the Viceroy was really keen about the success of the negotiations. There are other points also in which the Congress side is not to blame. It is no good discussing them anew. But the general public cannot help thinking that it is not quite the right thing for Lord Irwin to preach at men who cannot speak for themselves. For obvious reasons, the Indian people are bound to trust Mahatma Gandhi as the British people trust Lord Irwin, though they hold his Excellency in high esteem. It is not the most promising line, therefore, to try to discredit the Congress leaders as a means of advancing the official view in popular favour.

Picketting Liquor Shops:—The decision of the Bombay High Court on the reference made, regarding Mrs. Lukmani's case, comes as a relief. Her conviction and sentence were so outrageously unjust that a proposal was put forward that the Prohibition League of India should challenge it by arranging to picket liquor shops in Coorla and taking the matter to the High Court. Mr. Justice Madgaokar's judgment, in which Mr. Justice Barlee concurred, and which we print today, places the question beyond all doubt, and it is now the authoritative interpretation of the Picketting Ordinance for all the courts in this Presidency. We should like to know what becomes of the order of the Thana District Magistrate to which we referred last week. It makes temperance work, which the Viceroy's Ordinance does not touch, an offence. Mr. Justice Madgaokar rightly said that vindictive sentences as in Mrs. Lukmani's case undermine respect for law. The same result is caused by conduct which society regards as meritorious being penalised, by the arbitrary orders of District Magistrates in exercise of the powers vested in them for serious emergencies. A fall in the liquor trade is not such an emergency and Government or the High Court, in the exercise of their supervisory powers, should call upon the Thana District Magistrate to cancel his vexatious order.

What India Wants:—The London Correspondent of the Leader gives a report of an address delivered by Mr. Srinivasa Sastry at the Summer School of the League of Nations in the course of which he is said to have stated briefly that what India wants is complete control over the internal civil administration, leaving the army, princes and foreign relations to be handled by the bureaucracy. We can hardly believe that this is a correct report. Mr. Sastry has been pressing for recognition of the right of secession from the British Commonwealth, and even with full Dominion status, which presupposes complete autonomy, this is yet a matter of controversy. General Hertzog who is the head of the South African Union Government which has control of all Departments, is thought by some to be premature in pressing the secession question. Without the control of the Army India will not be self-governing in any sense, and Dominion status will be a long way off. It is, therefore, difficult to reconcile Mr. Sastry's previous demand which created a sensation in England with the very modest demand which he outlined at the Summer School. With the three Departments under its control the bureaucracy can reduce the whole administration to a farce. And experience has shown that what it can do in that direction, it will do unflinchingly. We do not think that many even of the non-Congress delegates to the Round Table Conference from British India will accept this small instalment of reform. The defects of diarchy are now too well established to make an experiment with it in the Central Government acceptable. Of course, there have to be some transitional provisions but those suggested by Mr. Sastry will obstruct and not facilitate transition. The whole administration should be transferred to Indian Ministers with safeguards for a specific period. In the case of the Army, this may take the form of a provision, either statutory or by convention, that for five years the Army budget up to a limit of, say, 45 crores will be sanctioned by the Legislature, any demand over and above that amount being subject to its discretion. The appropriation of the 45 crores, of course, will be within the purview of the Assembly.

Congress and the Depressed Classes:—

The War Council of the Bombay Provincial Congress Committee committed a gross blunder in trying to get up a demonstration against Dr. B. R. Ambedkar who is one of those invited to the Round Table Conference. The Congress has declined to participate in the Conference. It is entitled to proclaim its abstention to the world, and even perhaps that in its view those who have agreed to participate in the Conference are doing a disservice to the country. Beyond that it cannot go. In fact, it is not consistent with its attitude of non-co-operation to claim to pronounce on the merits of individual delegates. The Government of India's announcement of the names of those invited was preceded by the declaration that the selections were not made on any principle of representation. The Viceroy had just put down on the list the names of those who, in his opinion or in that of his advisers, could or would assist the Conference in some way or other, either positively by their experience and knowledge or negatively by their not joining the opposition. There is no point, therefore, in questioning the representative character of any delegate, especially by Congressmen who regard the whole show as futile. In the case of Dr. Ambedkar, such an attempt was peculiarly inept, as he is far and away the ablest and most broad-minded of the leaders of the depressed classes. We are afraid that the War Council weakly lent itself to further a factious opposition among these classes to a man of Dr. Ambedkar's outstanding ability and breadth of view. We may add that there is much force in the claim that the depressed classes should have more of their leaders to put their case at the Conference. Mr. R. S. Nekaljay, on this side of India, will be a capable colleague to Dr. Ambedkar.

The Sarda Act:—Justice*, the organ of the Madras non-Brahmin party, takes the Government of India severely to task for having issued confidential circulars to Provincial Governments not to enforce strictly the penal provisions of the Sarda Act. If this were all, we would not blame Government, as it is our own view that the penal provisions of such laws should, to begin with, be applied with great discrimination and enforced only in flagrant cases which outrage public opinion. The primary object of the Act is educative and not punitive, and a too hasty application of the punitive provisions, is sure to militate against its educative intention. But we entirely agree with our contemporary when it castigates Miss Rathbone, an English edition of Miss Katherine Mayo, for falsely accusing the Congress party of stirring up orthodox people against Government by representing that the Act is the first fruits of a policy of interfering in religious customs. The fact is, Miss Rathbone is more concerned to throw mud at the Congress than to see child marriage disappear in India. As we said, we think Government are right in issuing instructions to Provincial Governments to apply the Act cautiously so as to stimulate opinion in favour of the reform. But Government have not stopped there. They have been coquetting with the reactionary orthodox elements and supported in the Council of State, the circulation for opinion, of a Bill which practically is one to reduce it to a nullity. Dewan Bahadur Ramaswami Mudaliar rightly protested against the Government attitude as likely to create in the country the impression that they were willing to go back upon the Act. Miss Rathbone does not either know this or prefers to close her eyes to it in order to have a fling at the Congress.

Lord Birkenhead:—After a prolonged illness, Lord Birkenhead, late Secretary of State for India, died on Tuesday. He was a man of brilliant legal and literary ability, but as a politician he gave first place in his thought to his own career rather than to his country. A violent opponent of Irish Home Rule for many years, he became as violent a defender of the Irish Free State scheme in the House of Lords against his old leader, Lord Carson. When the last Baldwin Cabinet was formed, he expected to be nominated Lord Chancellor, the highest paid post in the Cabinet, which he had once held and for which he had exceptional qualifications. But he had to be content with India in which he had no interest. But in his own way he too served the cause of Indian nationalism. He made Indians feel, as they had scarcely done before, their humiliating position in the British Commonwealth, and may be said to have given a strong impetus to the Independence school in this country.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,

BOMBAY, OCTOBER 4, 1930.

FAITH AND TOLERATION.

However one may feel inwardly, an open condemnation of religious toleration is one of the last things one expects to find publicly avowed at the present day. Yet this is what seems to be the purport of the comparative estimate of Hinduism and Catholicism which we reproduce elsewhere from the editorial columns of the Catholic Leader. Referring to a remark in the Reformer that Hinduism never professed to be the only true religion, the Leader writes: "The position of Catholicism is fundamentally different. Catholicism professes to be the only true religion and all religions that disagree with it are partly or wholly false. Her intolerance is the intolerance of truth and knowledge against error and ignorance." This attitude is reminiscent of the ill-authenticated story of the Caliph who ordered a famous Library to be burnt down, on the ground that the books it contained either contradicted or confirmed the teachings of Islam. In the one case, they were mischievous, in the other case, they were superfluous. According to the Leader, religious toleration is the outcome of religious indifference; and in so far as Hinduism boasts of its religious toleration, it is a religion lacking in religious belief and afflicted with indifference to religious truth. Men are often better than their creeds or it would be difficult for Catholics of this type to live together in peace and amity with people professing other religions. The Catholic Leader itself, notwithstanding the vaunted "intolerance" of its religious belief, does not think it a heinous sin to have on its list of exchanges a heathen journal like the Reformer. And, we are sure, the conductors of our zealous contemporary are not all the time thinking of drawing the non-Catholics among whom they live into their religious fold. Surely, one can love one's own mother without thinking of others' mothers as ugly, old hags!

According to the terrible dictum of our contemporary, we should be filled with rage and fury against the Catholic Church because we do not happen to belong to it. But we assure the Leader that we feel nothing of the kind. On the contrary, we have very great admiration for the wonderful organisation of this historic Church, for its selfless and devoted Orders of monks and nuns, for its noble Church services which appeal to all the higher instincts of human nature. We feel similarly towards the Protestant Churches, towards Islam, towards Judaism and towards the ancient Zoroastrian faith so miraculously preserved in our midst. Not only do we feel in this way, but we feel that it is irrational to feel in any other way. We hold religion to be the profoundest thing in life, and, therefore, cannot admit that our attitude to these great religions is due to religious indifference. Hinduism, notwithstanding that it has no official creed like Catholicism, has endured and inspired millions of men and women for centuries. It has been their solace in life, it has been their solace in death. It existed long before Catholicism. And throughout the ages, its attitude to other religions has remained one of respect and goodwill. When the Jews came to India after the destruction of their first Temple in Jerusalem, the Hindu kings received them with honour and made grants to enable them to live in peace and to practice their religion as their fathers before them. The treatment which the Jews received in Catholic Europe was not quite on the same level of humanity. The Leader will, of course, argue that the difference is due to the fact that the Hindu kings were indifferent to religion, whereas the Catholic monarchs were staunch believers in their creed. The Catholic historian, Lord Acton, however, tracing the history of human freedom, gives India pride of place as being the first to adopt the principle of religious freedom which, he says, is the basis and foundation of civil freedom.

Hinduism, it is true, is not a matter of creeds. It is much more than that. What is known as Hinduism is a system of thought proved by the experience of centuries to be essential to peaceful existence amidst the conditions of this land. The American poet, Lowell, was in a profoundly Hindu mood when he wrote the lines :

Slowly the Bible of the race is writ,
And not on paper leaves nor leaves of stone;
Each age, each kindred, adds a verse to it,
Texts of despair or hope, of joy or moan.
While swings the sea, while mists the mountains shroud,
While thunders' surges burst on cliffs of cloud,
Still at the prophets' feet the nations sit.

Hinduism is the product of the human spirit manifesting itself under the Indian sky, on the Indian soil, amidst the seas which encompass, and the mountains that brood over this land. All those who live in India, therefore, are necessarily Hindus. Curiously enough, years ago it was a Mahomedan friend, who has since risen to high position, who suggested to us that all the inhabitants of India should be known as Hindus, as they originally were and are even now in America. Hinduism itself will have no future if it has no place within itself for all Great Teachers who have helped mankind to face life's problems with courage and confidence in its high destiny.

THE RECONSTRUCTION OF INDIA.*

Several years ago Sir M. Visvesvaraya published a book with the title, "Reconstructing India." In it he, with his intimate knowledge of Indian problems stated clearly and without rhetoric in what respects India had to be reconstructed and how it can be done. The title of Mr. Edward Thompson's book suggests a comparison with Sir Visvesvaraya's, but except for the title there is nothing in common between the two. Mr. Thompson's idea of reconstruction does not reach beyond the surface of Indian affairs which is all that most foreigners, even those who have spent many years in this country, see of it. He tells the reader in his Preface why he came to write this book. "There is need for a connected account of how Britain and India have come where they stand to-day," he says, "if the public is to follow the Round Table Conference and assess its findings intelligently." This was precisely what the Simon Commission had in mind to supply in their first volume. We may take it, therefore, that in Mr. Thompson's opinion that volume does not adequately fulfil the purpose for which it was intended; and we agree with him. In his position of greater freedom, Mr. Thompson has put the Commission right on some points on which they were obliged by the exigencies of their position either to be silent or which they had to gloss over. He has specialised on the Indian Mutiny, for instance, and he can say what the Commissioners could not, about it. We have been recently looking into the late Lord Roberts' "Forty-one Years' in India," and we greatly appreciate Mr. Thompson's query, "Why is it all right for the late Lord Roberts to be a Christian General, and wrong (as well as funny) for Feng (the Chinese Christian General) to be the same thing?" The Simon Commission were bound to make out that the policy of British rule in India from first to last has been continuous and unbroken in its care for the uplift and training of Indians for self-government. Mr. Thompson, writing as a historian, can frankly say that the wise statesmanship of Munro and Elphinstone, which had those objects really in view, disappeared with Sir Henry Lawrence, and that the policy thenceforth in the ascendant was one of suppression which later on developed into one of exploitation. Mr. Thompson's chapter on the Indian Mutiny is, as may be expected, outspoken. There is one matter connected with this upheaval to which we may refer in passing. It is about the incident of the greased cartridges. During, and for many years after the Mutiny, Englishmen spoke and wrote of it as a lying invention of malicious agitators. As a matter of fact, however, it was absolutely true. Lord Roberts in his "Forty-one Years," after repeating the theory of agitators, observes:

"The recent researches of Mr. Forrest in the records of the Government of India prove that the lubricating mixture used in preparing the cartridges was actually composed of the objectionable ingredients, cows' fat and lard, and that incredible disregard of the soldier's religious prejudices was displayed in the manufacture of these cartridges. When the sepoys complained that to bite them would destroy their caste, they were solemnly assured by their officers that they had been greased with a perfectly unobjectionable mixture. These officers, understanding, as all who have come in contact with Natives are supposed to understand, their intense abhorrence of touching the flesh or fat of the sacred cow and of the unclean pig, did not believe it possible that the authorities could have been so regardless of the sepoys' feelings as to have allowed it to be used in preparing their ammunition: they, therefore, made this statement in perfect good faith. But nothing was easier than for the men belonging to the regiments quartered near Calcutta to ascertain, from the low-caste Native workmen employed in manufacturing the cartridges at the Fort William arsenal, that the assurances of their officers were not in accordance with facts, and they were thus prepared to credit the fables (sic) which the sedition-mongers so sedulously spread abroad, to the effect that the Government they served and the officers who commanded them had entered into a deliberate conspiracy to undermine their religion."

We refer to this here because this habit of denying offhand the Indian version of events on the a priori belief "that authorities could not have been so regardless of the sepoys' feelings" has persisted to this day. God knows how many innocent persons have been sent to jail on this comfortable assumption?

Mr. Thompson supplies a much needed corrective to the Simon Commissioners' views on an important point. It is their conviction and, indeed, the corner-stone of their scheme that the antagonism between Muslims and Hindus is fundamental. Mr. Thompson steps in here with a pertinent observation. "Sir George Forrest" observes Mr. Thompson, "is almost the only historian who points out that the Mutiny showed that under all their differences the Hindu and Mahomedan populations understand one another's systems, as no Westerner can, that in normal times these systems interact, and that in 1857 the two religions found a bridge and may do so again." The fact that Hindus and Mahomedans understand each other as no Westerner can and that the two systems interact and have been inter-acting for the thousand years that they have lived together, required no Mutiny, to prove to Indians. Mr. Thompson thinks that Mahatma Gandhi's first great mistake was to strike up an alliance with the Khilafatists. Mistakes too have a real value in life since we often profit by them as by nothing else. Apart from that, the close co-operation between Hindus and Musulmans during the height of the Non-Co-operation movement, also showed that it is not so utterly impossible for the two communities to find a bridge between them as the Simon Commission thinks or rather hopes, for the wish in this case is surely father to the thought. The truth is that Hindus and Mahomedans normally live as good neighbours and friends, and quarrels between them are nearly always fomented by extraneous agencies. Meredith Townsend is a great Anglo-Indian authority not particularly well-disposed to Hindus, and if Sir John Simon or any of his colleagues had looked into his "Europe and Asia" they would have been saved from their obsession that the two communities normally live a cat and dog life in India.

In its self-imposed task of representing India as owing everything to British generosity, the Simon Commission has entirely ignored the work of the National Congress and the great Indians who guided its deliberations from time to time. Mr. Thompson supplies this omission in generous measure. His chapter on the "Coming of Nationalism" fills a big gap in the Simon Report. We can quote only a sentence or two here from it. "Again and again," he writes "you can see that, though Congress did not realize the practical and financial difficulties, it did know, and the Administration did not, what the people were thinking and feeling and suffering." Sir Pherozeshah Mehta often pointed out that almost every demand of the National Congress in his time had been ultimately conceded though always too late. Despite the present estrangement, Mr. Thompson hopes, the day will come when the Congress record will be a common possession both of his own country and India. "More than India will then realize how much of selfless patriotism and mental greatness built up this despised work (of Congress) in a corner."

Mr. Thompson, as a historian, is on the whole impartial, just and even generous. It is only when he becomes a propagandist that he loses both balance and perspective. His condemnation of General Dyer's conduct at Jallianwala and of the attitude of non-official Europeans in India to it, is unqualified. He believes, however, that a complete change has come over the British in India since 1920. We do not know, but it is the fact that Mr. Thompson himself drops the detachment of the historian and becomes a partisan propagandist indenting with events since that fateful year.

Mr. Thompson has great respect and admiration for Mahatma Gandhi.

"I think," he writes, "he (Mr. Gandhi) was mistaken when he launched Non-co-operation, though the provocation received was very great; when he supported the Khilafat movement, acting politician-fashion; when he let himself be carried away at the last Lahore Congress, and became the tool and mouthpiece of the men who desire no settlement. One thing further. I wish he had found time during these tempestuous years to visit my own country. It is not true that he has done all he could to bring peace between his people and mine. He has not done this. He would have been amazed at the generosity of his reception, and would have gained a new perception of the 'decency' that is in man. Even if he had gone back only to opposition, that perception would have stayed with him to the end."

We are sure that Mr. Thomson is right about the reception which Mahatmaji would receive in England. And perhaps he knows it too. And perhaps, that is the very reason why he has not visited England recently. He may fear that, being human, the personal factor may obscure the great national issues which are at stake. Again and again in his writings he has expressed his unaffected faith in the British people. We were turning over a few days ago a slight book of his on Indian Home Rule published many years ago and we lighted on the following passage: "We believe that at heart you belong to a religious nation. We are living in a land which is the source of religions. How we came together need not be considered, but we can make mutual good use of our relations." Mahatma Gandhi is very tenacious of ideas and there is no reason to think he does not hold his about the English people now as he did ten years ago.

Mahatma Gandhi, says Mr. Thompson, is not a great thinker but, though a bad reasoner, he is a superb judge of men. We agree that he is not a thinker in the sense of a reasoner, but he sees truth more quickly and clearly than a reasoner does, however good he may be. And what Mahatma Gandhi sees, he does, leaving friends like Mr. Andrews, Mr. Gregg and Mr. Kumarappa to find the philosophy of it. But a superb judge of men, he certainly is not: not even an indifferent one. When the Non-Co-operation movement was at its zenith, a Mahomedan friend bitterly complained to us that Mahatma Gandhi was making too much of the Ali Brothers who, but for him, had no influence in the community. Perhaps, Mahatma Gandhi may say that he does not presume to judge his fellow-men: he is glad to have their comradeship so long as they choose to give it, and when they choose to part, he has no grievance against them. After all, is this not the wisest view to take? Who but God can know another with absolute truth?

GANDHIJI'S PLACE IN HISTORY.

( BY MR. J. C. KUMARAPPA. )

( Concluded from the last issue )

FORMS OF NATIONALISM.

Gandhiji is attempting to proceed on lines which would be in complete alignment with India's traditions. He is infusing religion into the dry bones of politics. He views life as one whole with no watertight compartments. Politics should form part of our religion, it should guide the course of the State and regulate the actions of Society. What is even more he is attempting to lift the State from the moral to the spiritual plane. He is directing our nationalism back again into such channels as will solidify society on a satisfactory basis. Nationalism is after all the cohesive force that binds together society formed within a geographical area by peoples of a common culture. In the west nationalism has been directed towards selfish ends, for aggressive purposes to satisfy their predatory longings. This is what we may call a "Wolf pack Nationalism." Like the wolves they get together to see whom they may devour. It is this kind of nationalism that Tagore and others condemn. But they forget that the same primary instinct of self-preservation has given rise to other manifestations on higher planes. If the Western Nationalism had assumed a malevolent form, that fact in itself does not condemn Nationalism in other forms as well. We find that the same spirit expresses itself amongst the followers of the Prophet of Mecca in the form of a religious unity. If we may apply the term "Nationalism" to that force that binds together all Muslims we find here it has transcended the boundaries of caste, colour, race or status. Indeed it is an international brotherhood restricted only by religion. This also has marred its fair name by aggression for proselytising.

We find another form of Nationalism in India China and Japan. There is no aggression in this type. It is seen in forces that make for national solidarity. In China and Japan it generates a considerable amount of contempt for the foreigner. But in our country we find neither the aggression and violence of Western and Muslim nationalism nor the contempt for foreigners which characterises the Mongolian and Western nationalism. But it has expressed itself in organising Society into a cultural unit. It is due to this force of nationalism that our Society has shown that tremendous tenacity in spite of innumerable invasions and conquests. Unfortunately it has been overdone and to-day we find ourselves facing the problem of disintegrating the petrified caste system.

Nevertheless we have to recognise the most efficient way in which it has fulfilled its purpose.

RECONSTRUCTION OF INDIA ON SPIRITUAL BASIS.

Any leader who wished to reconstruct India has to follow in the lines on which the ancient foundations were laid. If we were to follow blindly the Muslim communal nationalism we are sure to come to grief. India can only be built either on a moral or spiritual truth base. In the recognition of this fundamental truth lies the genius of Gandhiji. He is marshalling the forces of Nationalism to-day in accordance with our historical past without slavishly copying the western models. He is battling with the currents of aggression and violence let loose by our contact with the west. He has placed a strong dam across the flood; there will no doubt be a certain amount of overflow but as we have witnessed in the last few months he has succeeded in directing the forces of Nationalism into constructive channels and on to a higher plane.

At this juncture but for him, India would have rushed headlong into a stormy ocean of violent revolution. As it is, we are engaged in putting our house in order without injuring anyone else. Immoral laws are being attacked and the people are getting a training in spiritual discipline; we are breaking down the communal spirit and the inhuman system of relegating some of our brethren as untouchables.

Gandhiji's unique success in his own life time is due, in no small measure, to the fact that he comes into a field well prepared to receive his message. Buddha and Jesus were his precursors. What they had sown Gandhiji is reaping. The message of Buddha was not widely accepted until the time of Asoka and Christ left but a handful of followers to carry on his message. Even after 2000 years of familiarity with Christ's teaching the West is still groping in the dark and is dubbing Him an impracticable dreamer. But India on her moral plane is ready to receive an invitation to march on to a spiritual level and has responded to the call in the most wonderful way. Our cultural past has been Gandhiji's greatest asset and he has utilised it to the best advantage.

OHARKHA, SYMBOL OF GANDHIJI'S MISSION.

We have cursorily surveyed Gandhiji's activities both in the spiritual and political world. It remains now to examine his influence in the economic life of the people. Perhaps it is in this sphere that we have as yet not realised the full significance of his contribution, probably due to the fact that this department falls definitely on a plane in which the light of Western civilisation is most dazzling. We have seen the wonderful achievements of the exploiters of the West and the enormous wealth hoarded up by individuals but the concomitant miseries attaching to the Capitalistic system is studiously kept in the background. We do not realise the actual human cost at which these fortunes are heaped up. How many persons think of the millions of Rockefeller? The greed of men knows no bounds. They are in effect extracting gold out of human blood. In our own country millions have fallen victims to imperialistic greed. The avarice of British capitalists has reduced our economic organisation into one of occupation of land and even this is fast shifting into production of raw materials for factories to the neglect of food grains.

In this field also Gandhiji is working in perfect harmony with our past evolution. Owing to the peculiar circumstances obtaining in our country we were best adapted to industries not requiring much capital and our needs did not require large scale production. Due to various circumstances, among which not the least was the example of Japan's spectacular entry and success on western lines into the capitalistic system, we in India had also cast envious glances at other peoples' goods. To begin with, our devotees of renunciation and non-violence set an example in simple living and brought back our old time standards to their proper place. Having done so he proceeded to reconstruct our system into one of useful activity but not one of exploitation. We needed cottage industries to occupy the free time of our farmers. By far the best and the most useful as well as the simplest was spinning cotton yarn for one's own clothes. This Gandhiji readily introduced and made the spinning-wheel the symbol of his mission. In this work he was stoutly opposed by most people as reactionary and a dreamer of dreams. Come what may, he stuck to his programme tenaciously facing all ridicule. The position of the spinning-wheel to-day vindicates his apparent fanaticism. He had foreseen with his prophetic vision that this will be the only remedy for India's starvation and he also appreciated the usefulness of this item on his programme. It immediately made him the champion of the poor and the distressed. The masses of the people adore the Mahatma whose one care is their uplift, whose sincerity they cannot doubt as he practices what he preaches.

GANDHI OR CAESAR.

An American, Edward Holten James, writing in a booklet called "Gandhi or Caesar?" compares the advent of Jesus and the Roman Empire with Gandhiji and the British Empire.

"Gandhi, the Indian, is up against the British invader. Jesus, the Jew, was up against the Roman invader. Why should the Roman govern the Jews? That question was in the mind of every Jew, and that question was in the mind of Jesus. Like other Jews, he did not like to be a slave. Gandhi's feelings are exactly of the same kind, but under a different set of circumstances.

"Here then we have two champions of justice. Did they fight? No. In both cases we find them hurling defiance against a political system which permits the exploitation of man by man. If there had not been gold to get out of Judea the Romans would not have been there, and if there was not great wealth to be got out of India in the shape of trade, pomp of Empire and concession of all kinds would not be there. The British are in India, and always have been, not for the good of somebody else, but for the good of their own precious pocket books; like the Romans in Judea.

If the British were not in India to-day there would not have been a Mahatma Gandhi, and if the Romans had not been in Jerusalem there never would have been Jesus, nor a Golgotha, nor Christians thrown to lions in Rome, nor a Christian era. Such is history—not color, nor opinion, but just cold history, open to anybody with brains enough to understand it.

"Gandhi is a misfit in the British Empire. Jesus was a misfit in Roman Empire. What did Jesus do about it? Did he cut himself over to fit the Roman Empire as the rich Pharisees, clothed in purple and linen were doing? Hardly. He broke the Roman Empire, and Gandhi will, in all likelihood, sooner or later, perform the same favour for the British Empire. Why must it be so? Because humanity is above any empire. This fact is the starting of all religions, and when the next great religion is made upon the earth it will start from this same basic fact.

"Gandhi, for the benefit of humanity as a whole, breaks the salt laws and defies the British Empire. Jesus, for the benefit of humanity as a whole, broke the spell of the Roman Empire, by defying its religion, the worship of its emperor, its idols, gods sacrifices, offices and ceremonies, in fact everything that is commonly called paganism. Paganism was the foundation of the Roman Empire, and once that foundation had been pierced, the Empire fell to the ground like a house of cards."

GANDHI, THE SOUL OF INDIA.

Buddha and Christ came into a world ill prepared to receive them. Jesus had only three years of active life when he was crucified. And when we turn to secular history we find most of the "Nation Builders" contented themselves to one or two phases of national life only. They were not the nation builders in the complete sense. Abraham Lincoln freed the slaves, Bismarck consolidated the scattered German States and so on. Most of them had recourse to violence and in some other respects did not command the whole-hearted allegiance of the people. The one great thing that distinguishes Gandhiji from all the national heroes who have gone before, is the reduction into practical politics the idealism of the seer and the philosopher. He has put into practice the teachings of Buddha and Christ on a nation-wide scale which has never been attempted before this. Because of his closely following the national genius of our people, the oft-repeated description of him as the "Soul of India" is peculiarly apt and significant. Although we are too near a colossal figure in history to enable us to truly appraise his greatness, we can venture to say that his will be no mean place.

CHRISTIANITY AND CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE

BY THE REV. JAMES KELLOCK.

(Concluded from the last issue.)

So we have in India today the tension between two opposite forces which are yet necessary to one another.....one, the spirit of freedom and independence; the other, the system of law and order and unity, within which alone true freedom can flourish. Therefore human nature being what it is, and human governments being what they are, Gandhi and the Viceroy are really two complementary elements in the process of India's self-realisation. Britain has built the road along which India marches to freedom, but the freedom would never be attained, if something in the nature of a Gandhi-movement had not arisen.

The situation as it has now developed obviously has a twofold danger.....that the zeal of freedom, degenerating into license, may plunge the country into chaos; that the Government in its zeal for law and order may lose patience and embark on a policy of mere thwarting and crushing. Statesmanship in Britain and in India will be put to the severest test within the next few months. We would like to see a genuine, All Parties Conference in India meeting and agreeing upon the general scheme of government that India desires for itself; and then on the basis of this the Round Table Conference in London meeting to arrange such safe-guards as may seem to be required, and to settle the details of the transition period.

If we look at history, we see that time after time, and in case after case, social and political changes have, at the cost of tremendous expenditure of energy and of immense suffering, been wrested by one section from the unwilling hands of another section. Now the Christian principle seems to us to require a readiness to concede and to make readjustments wherever the logic of events and the future healthy development of affairs clearly call for such readjustment and giving place. The ever-present motive should be the positive desire and intention of helping the persons and peoples, with whom one is brought into relation, to attain the fullest and best possible life. That is the principle of the Christian "love of one's neighbour." We would like to see the whole matter carried up to this level, and settled at this level. Why should it not be? There are thousands of individuals in Britain and in India who would settle it at this level if it were a personal matter, or a private impasse. If it could be so done, then the long, weary, destructive process of conflict would be avoided, and people's energies set free for positive effort to achieve the country's all-round advance.

The present confusion is due to the fact that this higher attitude which "loves one's neighbour as oneself" is not clearly there, "beyond a peradventure"—the voice of the die-hards is too loudly heard. Perhaps this is the real reason behind Gandhi's persistent insistence upon evidence of a change of heart. Then, also, there is an element in Indian opinion which feels that unless the readjustment is brought about by the force of their own exerted strength, the fruits of attainment will have no sweetness. And in addition to these two facts there is the difficulty which arises from the cumbersome of Governmental machinery, and from the crudeness of mass psychology—which make it difficult to get things settled by the finer and more enlightened mind of the peoples. Still there is a strong element in British thought and feeling about Indian affairs that wants the imminent political changes to be based purely upon the idea of India's highest good and fullest life. If that element were to become clearly and unmistakeably dominant on the British side, and if India could trust it and cooperate with it, then the prospect for India, for Britain, and for the world would be much brighter than it is.

In the foregoing discussion, we have carried out, with friendly intention, what Father Elwin would call "the duty of criticism." In conclusion, we would say amen to the fine spirit and attitude that he commends to us in the last five pages of his pamphlet. It is a spirit of good-will. "The Christian must always look at the best..... He must avoid all sarcasm, all imputation of unworthy motive. Above all things the Christian's task is one of reconciliation. 'Blessed are the peace-makers for they shall be called the sons of God.' To be a peace-maker does not mean that a man must remain politically neutral, but that, while believing whole-heartedly in the justice of his own cause, he tries to see and to make known all that is good on the other side, and never shuts any possible doorway to peace."

MY MOTHER.

BY CYRIL MODAK.

There behind the iron bars,
Gazing at the sleepless stars,
Stands my Mother pale and fainting,
Grief upon her mind is painting
Scenes of that dark bitter day,
When her children quitted play,.....

Tiger's prey?

Through a haze of molten tears,
Challenging barbarian spears,
She can see the quick processions,
Grave as judges at their sessions,
Of her valiant heroes move
Yes, to die, to die and prove

Power of Love.

And a Vision dawns before
Those soft eyes with weeping sore,
From you sacrificial pyre
In the hand of Agni, Fire,
Like fair Sita, Freedom stands,
Holding in her royal hands

God's Commands.

Pale, frail, sad, glad Mother mine!
Your descent is half-divine,
Keep your nightlong vigil lasting,
God, your Sire, Himself shall come
Loose your chains, though you be numb,
Hope be dumb

EUROPEAN OR WORLD FEDERATION, WHICH?

The Editor, Indian Social Reformer, Bombay,
Sir,

Fears are frequently expressed that Mr. Briand's and Victor Hugo's plan for a United States of Europe might result in intercontinental rivalries and jealousies; ending with Pershing's prophesied "civilization going down thro' destructive war and darkness to barbarism."

Having lately returned from the Institute of International Relations, held in the new International House on the campus of the University of California, and reading of a similar International House in New York, I may perhaps be pardoned for calling your readers' attention to a plan that would dispel any fears of intercontinental troubles.

Governments exist for various purposes, administration of Justice, maintenance of law and order, issuing currency or coin, furnishing Postal facilities, imposing tariffs, building roads, etc., etc. Of these functions some are already performed perfectly on a universal plan; notably the Post Office, efficiently transmitting not only letters and parcels but carrying cash to every corner of the globe. Also world wide in operation and regulation are the telegraph, telephone, and radio: and, though at present there is no World Mint or Treasury, the notes of the American Express, or Cook & Sons, are negotiable wherever one may travel.

Moreover there is already extant the International Court of Justice, and the League of Nations, which includes Europe, Asia, Africa, and, in part, America; the League only lacking the adhesion of the U. S. A. to be practically omnipotent in world affairs.

So instead of mankind making a fearsome bugbear of Washington's "entangling alliances" it would be more worthy of this 20th century to celebrate worldwide his 200th birthday by carrying out his "first wish, to make that plague of mankind, war, banished from the earth" by World Federation.

Such action would multiply manufacture and commerce, instead of killing off customers in millions by war, and would make universal that disarmament which has for over a century proved so satisfactory on our Northern border. It would at least be a "noble experiment," and might succeed.

Volunteers are needed in every province and city who would distribute the literature in favour of the non-registration of Caste in Census Papers, which can be had from the Secretary, Jat-Pat Torak Mandal, Lahore.

NO CHANGE OF HEART.

Sir,

Ever since Mahatma Gandhi began his civil disobedience movement, he has been insisting upon one indispensable condition for the withdrawal of his movement, namely, that the Indian bureaucracy, in the matter of the political demands of the country, should show a decided change of heart for the better, by taking a more sympathetic view of the same, and by doing all it could possibly do to bring the country within easy reach of its goal.

Every one knows in the country that the movement of Mahatmaji is spreading on apace, and that it has brought to light all the latent powers of the nation for wonderful self-sacrifice and courageous determined fight with the powers that be for liberating the country politically, socially and economically. To effect a peaceful settlement between the Government and Gandhiji—the recognised leader of the people—Mr. Jayakar and Dr. Sapru very recently took upon themselves the most onerous and responsible work of finding a common meeting-ground between the two contending parties; but, alas! the fond hopes of those who had been watching their peace efforts with great anxiety and who had, so to speak, put all their eggs into the basket of their move, have been shattered to pieces, and, consequently, the country has been left to drift, nay, to plunge further into chaotic depths. No change of heart, indeed!

So far men and women, especially the former, in thousands and thousands have entered His Majesty's jail for the sake of India's emancipation. The non-violent struggle that is now going on has, without doubt, made Gandhiji the cynosure of Western nations; not only that—it has focussed the attention of the West on the question of India's political status and has evoked its unstinted praise and admiration for the unique method adopted in solving the political problem.

But such sacrifices on the part of the people and praise and admiration the movement has evoked from unexpected quarters, one is sorry to remark, have not practically touched the Government as seen from the break-down of peace negotiations and the frequent use of lathi in, and the vigorous application of ordinances to, the country. Taking all these facts into account, it may be safely said that the Government here stands all alone unperturbed, unmoved and unshaken in its repressive policy, thereby declaring to the whole world that it has not been affected, to any appreciable extent, by the mighty work of patriotic feeling now running from one end of the country to the other and carrying before it all obstacles to the unification of the same.

To effect a change of heart in the powers that be and make it thoroughly Indian in outlook and policy it seems that the country is ordained, to go through a fiery ordeal of high-handed repression. Let the Gods avert such a fate and save the nation from further political throes and turmoils! Vox Populi vox Dei is a well-known maxim, and, it is greatly hoped that the authorities at Delhi and Whitehall will pay heed to it in all their deliberations with regard to the adjustment of political relations between the two countries, and justly give India the status she urgently needs, the peace she longs for, and the prosperity which is her due.

BOMBAY HIGH COURT ON PICKETING.

Judgment was delivered by Justices Madgaoker and Barlee at the Bombay High Court in the reference made by Mr. B. N. Sanjana, Session Judge of Thana, recommending the quashing of the sentence of 4 months' rigorous imprisonment, and Rs. 100 fine passed by the Resident Magistrate of Kurla on Mrs. Lukmani, who was convicted of picketing a liquor shop in Chembur, a village near Bombay. Mrs. Lukmani who is 65 years old belongs to a respectable Borah family being the daughter of the late Mr. Justice Tyebji of Bombay High Court.

Mr. Justice Madgaoker delivering judgment observed that Mr. Divatia had pointed out that, when the lady was picketing, no customer approached the shop, and she did not even try to dissuade any body. She was standing all alone.

But in any case, her object was merely temperance work, i.e. to persuade people to give up the drink habit. The question before the Court is whether under Section 3 of the Ordinance such an activity peacefully carried on would be an offence. Their Lordships were not concerned with the political or religious aspect of picketing. The Government Pleader had argued that if the picketing, even though peaceful, was likely to result in loss to the business of the shopkeeper, it would be an offence under the Ordinance. On this interpretation, observed his Lordship, even ordinary temperance work (apart from picketing) would amount to molestation or intimidation of the shopkeeper, and consequently punishable.

Proceeding, his Lordship observed that the Ordinance was meant to provide only against the actual intimidation or molestation of the shopkeeper. This was made clear in Section 3 which defines molestation as loitering near the shop of another with a view to cause the shopkeeper to abstain from doing what he has a right to do, that is, with a view to cause the shopkeeper to close his shop. The molestation that was made punishable was the molestation of the shopkeeper who has a legal right to do his business.

His Lordship said that the point to be considered was whether a person who was convinced that drinking was an evil, and persuaded other people to give up drinking, had in his mind the loss of the shopkeeper. In the case of ordinary temperance worker, it was the moral aspect of the work (the welfare of those addicted to drink) that occupied the mind of the worker, and not the loss to the shopkeeper. Though the activity might in the long run result in a loss to the shopkeeper, the object of the worker could not be said to be to cause such loss.

His Lordship gave an analogy on this point. If a shopkeeper devised some means to attract to his shop the customers going to a rival shop, it might result in loss to the rival shopkeeper. But that did not mean that the shopkeeper had the intention of causing loss to his rival. Similarly, observed his Lordship, dissuading people from drink could not be interpreted as having an intention to interfere with the right of a liquor shop owner to do his business.

"It obviously requires a definite assent of the Legislature", said his Lordship, "to hold that the Ordinance was intended to punish anything like temperance or peaceful picketing. If the Legislature or the Governor-General intended to make temperance an offence, that intention must be made clear in the wording of the law or the Ordinance. As it stood, the offence would be if the shopkeeper himself was molested." It was impossible to hold that persuading other people from drink amounted to molestation of the shopkeeper with whom the accused had no communication. His Lordship held that dissuading a customer from drink could not be construed as causing obstruction to the business of the shopkeeper, even though persistent dissuasion might, in the long run, cause loss to his business.

Concluding, his Lordship observed that the accused, an aged lady of 60 of respectable family, felt it her duty to persuade people to give up drink. A sentence of 4 months rigorous imprisonment and Rs. 100 fine for her was inappropriate and might be criticised as vindictive. "It is necessary at all times, but more particularly" his Lordship concluded, "at this time when respect for law is undermined, that it should not be further undermined by such excessive sentences. Such sentences defeat the very object with which they are inflicted, and produce the contrary effect to that which is intended." His Lordship held that the conviction was wrong in law, and ordered the accused to be discharged.

Mr. Justice Barlee who delivered a separate Judgment concurred with the decision of Mr. Justice Madgaoker.

Indian Oriental Conference—The general secretary, Indian Oriental Conference, has issued the following bulletin to the press:—It is now arranged that the Indian Oriental Conference in Patna from 17th to 20th of December next will hold its session in a number of sections each with its own President as distinct from the President of the Conference as a whole. It was already notified that Rai Bahadur Pandit Hiralal, C. I. E. Retired Deputy Commissioner, Central Provinces has been nominated President of the Conference. Owing to the unavoidable absence of Sir Sultan Ahmed, Kt., proceeding to the Round Table Conference, Mr. K. P. Jayswal, Bar-at-law, has been appointed Chairman of the Reception Committee at Patna. He still continues to be the local Secretary of the Conference and all information in regard to attendance at the Conference and taking part in the sessions etc. can be obtained from him or from Mr. G. Harichand Sastri, Secretary to the Reception Committee at Patna. It is hardly necessary to invite hearty co-operation from scholars,

GOVERNMENT AND THE SARDA ACT.

There has been an impression in the minds of the general public that the Government are not as anxious as they ought to be in the enforcement of the Sarda Act. Many events have tended to confirm that impression, and the confidential circulars which are stated to have been sent to Local Governments not to enforce strictly the penal provisions of the Act only show that the Government have persuaded themselves to be influenced by orthodox and reactionary opinion. If therefore, the Sarda Act is not enforced strictly, the fault entirely lies with the Government who have allowed themselves to be frightened by the orthodox bogey. It is surprising, therefore, to see a Member of Parliament seriously laying the blame at the doors of the Congress Party. In a letter to "The Times," Miss Rathbone protests strongly against the non-enforcement of the Sarda Act and complains that the Congress Party which clamoured for the Act and bitterly reproached the Government for slowness in passing it, is now stirring up the orthodox people by representing that it is the first fruits of a policy of interference in religious customs. She continues: "So long as the reformed and emancipated section of Indians are wholly absorbed in a political struggle, and many are willing to use any weapon to stir up the orthodox against the existing authorities, the difficulties and dangers of the enforcement of this and other social reforms will be too great." There are none so blind as those who cannot see, and Miss Rathbone has shown that distance, instead of lending enchantment to the view, may at times blur the vision and give an entirely false idea of things. To blame the Congress Party for the non-enforcement of the Sarda Act is, to say the least, ridiculous. To acquit the Government of the responsibility for non-enforcement is to display an ignorance of the real state of affairs. And this is what Miss Rathbone has done. Miss Rathbone evidently bases her statement that the Congress is stirring up the orthodox people on the misleading reports that the Peshwar incidents were due to the fomenting of disaffection among the tribes by the Congress, which was alleged to have exploited the tribal antipathy to the Sarda Act. The part that the Government have played in passing the Sarda Bill into law was one which was heartily supported by public opinion all over the country. The part that they have played after the passing of the Act is not one of which they can be proud. They have let down the social reformers, and they have let themselves be captured by the orthodox agitators. In the history of Indian social legislation few things have redounded to the credit of the Government except the Sarda Act, and even this they have sought to nullify by their nonchalant attitude. We have referred more than once to the Government's attitude regarding the Act and how their responsibility to enforce it has not been discharged properly.—Justice.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Hinduism and Catholicism:—Writes the Catholic Leader: The Reformer makes this significant admission. "Hinduism never professed to be the only true religion." The position of Catholicism is fundamentally different. Catholicism professes to be the true religion and all religions that disagree with it partly or wholly false. It is in view of the consciousness of the possession of the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth that the Catholic Church makes ceaseless efforts to draw all countries and nations to her fold and lead them to their eternal destiny. Her intolerance is the intolerance of truth and knowledge against error and ignorance. The much-vaunted tolerance of Hinduism is the result of the lack of religious belief and of an attitude of indifference towards truth. The view that all the great religions are true can only mean that truth and falsehood are a matter of indifference in God's sight. Christianity, Hinduism and Mahomedanism are directly antagonistic in their respective creeds, cults and moral codes. By no stretch of argument can it be maintained that all these irreconcilable beliefs and cults are equally pleasing to God. The fact is Hinduism is an easy religion to live in, whereas Catholicism is a rigorous one. Hinduism has no official creed and as Babu Govinda Das says in his book on Hinduism "an enormous mass of widely divergent or even mutually opposed practices and of no less widely divergent teachings of Sanskrit books" are all held to be equally orthodox by their special devotees, even though they are utterly irreconcilable with one another." Even the belief in God is held not to be necessary to a Hindu. Any one or every one is a Hindu, who says he is a Hindu and accepts any of the beliefs and follows any of the practices that are anywhere regarded as Hindu. Such a comprehensive basis is only a travesty of religion—belief or unbelief does not matter. Not so with Catholicism. It is a rule of conduct. Both are necessary for the practical Catholic. Is there any doubt then that the sacrifices involved in the acceptance of Catholicism are many and great, whereas the liberty allowed in Hinduism render it an extremely convenient religion to live in?

Canadian Indian Scholarship:—The Massey Foundation of which Mr. Vincent Massey, ex-Canadian Minister in Washington, is president, has established a permanent scholarship to provide an annual grant to enable a post-graduate student of a university from India to spend a year in Canada on nomination by the Viceroy of India and the recommendation by the Committee of Madras Colleges and the Indian Y.M.O.A. The object of the scholarship is to promote 'mutual knowledge between the two parts of the British Empire'. Probably the first Indian student under the scholarship will come to Canada in the present academic year.

Tribute to Desh Sevikas:—Mr. D. R. Dinshaw in the course of an article in New India headed "The National Congress at Work in Bombay" writes:—"The Desh Sevikas, or women volunteers of the National Congress, attract a lot of attention by their orange-coloured saris (their uniform when on duty), their civility, courage and efficiency as picketers, as processionists, as speakers, as street-sellers and many other things. Among the many public and private compliments paid to them is this from a Parsi businessman who had always been very loyal and very conservative: I have joined the Nationalists after long and serious thought; if it had been only Indian men working in our National movement I would have thought otherwise, but it is because Indian women have joined it that I feel sure of its ultimate success."

NOTES.

The Airship Disaster:—The week began in deepest gloom. The giant British Airship R-101 which left Cardington at about a half past seven on Saturday evening burst into flames and exploded at 2-30 in the morning on Sunday a few miles off Beauvais near Paris. Of 54 persons who were on board, 46 perished, being burnt to death, including the British Air Minister, Lord Thomson, and Air-Vice Marshal Sir Sefton Brancker. Just about an hour before the disaster, a message was sent to London stating that the passengers after an excellent meal and enjoying a number of cigars, were getting ready to go to bed. An added interest is provided for India by the statement which seems to be authentic that Lord Thomson would have probably succeeded Lord Irwin in the Viceroyalty. It was at first stated that the disaster was due to bad weather which obliged the air-ship to fly low. It collided with a small hill in consequence and the crash followed. This explanation which might have passed off in India did not satisfy the British public and strong criticisms have been passed on the conduct of those who were responsible for starting the ship on her fatal voyage. It has transpired that one of the unfortunate officers who perished had a premonition and had expressed himself doubtfully about some eleventh-hour changes in the structure of the machine. His doubts seem to be confirmed by the discovery of bits of the material of the air-ship five miles from the scene of the crash and the conclusion drawn is that the disaster was due to breakage in its structure, and that those on board knew that tragedy was imminent ten minutes before the crash. The London Correspondent of the Pioneer who sent this information added that this is confirmed by the fact that the majority of the bodies were recovered from the gangway with their fingers clenched in attitudes of tenseness, thus contradicting the suggestion that the victims died peacefully in their cabins. One German expert remarked that British air-ships were somewhat overweighted and another expressed surprise that smoking, which is prohibited in German air-ships, was allowed in the British machine. This startling event, it is no exaggeration to say, has cast a gloom over the whole world, and sympathy has been universally expressed with the British people in this calamity involving the death of several brave men in their prime of life.

The Round Table Conference:—Some more Indian names have been added to the list of delegates to the Round Table Conference, and the names of the British delegates, Government and the Opposition representatives, were published this week. The Prime Minister will preside and the Lord Chancellor, the Secretary of State for India, and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, will also be members of the Conference. The Conservative Party will be represented by Earl Peel, Sir Samuel Hoare, the Marquis of Zetland (better known in this country as Lord Ronaldshay) and the Hon. Oliver Stanley. The Liberal delegates are, Lord Reading, Lord Lothian (Mr. Philip Ker of the Round Table group), Sir Robert Hamilton (ex-Chief-Justice of Kenya) and Mr. Isaac Foot. The Opposition representatives are moderate men and do not belong to the die-hard type. But it is to be doubted whether any of them fully understands the state of Indian feeling at the present time. It is a great mistake to think that the Congress abstainers and the Liberal and other co-operators with the Conference, exhaust the whole of Indian opinion. There is a considerable class between the two, which will be the decisive factor in accepting or rejecting any future scheme of reform. A great many people who have no political leanings and, if anything, are constitutionally disinclined to civil disobedience, regard Mahatma's internment as an affront to Indian self-respect and the action of those who have agreed to join the Conference, as an act of disloyalty to the country. There are yet others who hold that the Conference should be held in India to settle India's future constitution and that the Round Table Conference in London cannot decide anything. This large marginal party has hitherto remained inarticulate, but there is reason to think that it may find early means of expressing itself.

The Lahore Conspiracy Case:—On Tuesday the Special Tribunal which was created by a Viceroyal Ordinance to try what is known as the Lahore Conspiracy Case delivered its judgment. This case originated in the murder of Mr. Saunders, an officer of the Lahore Police. The investigations which followed led to the prosecution of twenty-three persons. After the preliminary enquiry before a Magistrate had dragged on for several months without an early prospect of coming to an end, the Viceroy issued an Ordinance terminating it and referring the case to a Special Tribunal of three Judges to be nominated by the Chief Justice of the Punjab Chief Court. In the normal course, the case would have been committed to the Criminal Sessions of the High Court and the accused would have had the benefit of trial by a jury of their own countrymen. The only evidence against the accused was that seven of them who, on the promise of a pardon, turned "approvers." The Special Tribunal convicted thirteen of the remaining accused, and sentenced three of them to death, seven to transportation for life, one to seven years', and one to five years' imprisonment. Three of them were acquitted. One of them, Jatindra-nath Das, died in jail as the result of a prolonged hunger-strike. The sentences have created a great sensation owing to the number and youth of those convicted, the severity of the sentences, the deprivation of the safeguards of the ordinary judicial procedure in such cases, and the fact that the only evidence against these men was that of "approvers", which cannot under the ordinary law of evidence be accepted without independent confirmatory evidence. The repressive measures of Government against the non-violent civil disobedience movement, has undoubtedly helped to swell the number of those who are sceptical of its effectiveness, and this, too, has quickened the sympathy with the convicted persons.

The Sarda Act:—Justice writes scathingly over our comment on its criticism of the Government's instructions to the Provincial governments not to be precipitate in putting in force the penal provision of the Sarda Act. "The Government may well congratulate themselves" it observes, "in having found a champion to defend them in such unexpected quarters. But we do not think social reformers in India would endorse the sentiments of the journal which professes to advocate eradication of social abuses as early as possible. To say that 'the primary object of the Act is educative and not punitive' is, we believe, to put an entirely wrong construction on the aims and purposes which the Act is intended to serve. The Child Marriage Restraint Act is intended to prevent the inhuman custom of uniting in holy wedlock young children who cannot understand the significance, much less the responsibilities of wedded life. The primary object of the Act is to penalise such marriages. It is not intended for the purpose of educative propaganda in favour of the abolition of child marriage." Our contemporary may see fit to change its opinion, if it realises that though child-marriages are most common among Brahmins in Madras, in some other parts of India, notably Gujarat and the adjoining States, it is most rife amongst the backward and primitive Hindu castes who will take time to understand and appreciate the purpose of the Act which, we repeat, is to educate people and not punish people out of a bad custom.

Indian Christian Names:—The Times of India is responsible for converting Dewan Bahadur A. R. Mudaliar to Christianity by describing him in the list of delegates to the Round Table Conference as a representative of the Indian Christian community. The East Indian, a Catholic paper, remarks thereon: "We presume Dewan Bahadur is a Protestant of some denomination though the name "Ramaswamy" makes it appear that he is a servant of Rama rather than of our Lord Jesus Christ." As a matter of fact, the Dewan Bahadur is a Vaishnav Hindu. The caste mark, straight perpendicular red line, is never by any chance absent from his forehead. Perhaps, the Times thought that there should be two Indian Christians on the Deputation to represent the Catholic and the Protestant sects, and for that purpose converted the Dewan Bahadur to Christianity out of hand. Mr. K. T. Paul has since been nominated a delegate, and there cannot be a better choice from the Indian Protestant Christian community. Speaking of Indian Christian names, the East Indian does not seem to be aware that, in South India, most of the earlier Christian converts, particularly among the Catholics, kept their original Hindu names and habits of life. The circumstances under which some of them adopted European names, were described by Bishop Roche whose remarks we quoted in our News columns some time back. "Europeans", he said, "observe our names and figure that we must be in some way of western origin. This is not the case. In the days of Xavier our families at baptism often took the names of their sponsors who were frequently important officials from Portugal. Most of my people are of the Nadar caste. I am of Paravar caste. It is interesting to note that Bishop D'Souza of Mangalore is a Konkani Brahmin, while Bishop-elect Xavier of Kumbhakonam is of the Vallala caste." Note the present tense in each case. There has been a recent tendency among the younger Indian Christian nationalists to discard the foreign names imposed upon them by the Portuguese bureaucracy and to revert to their Indian names. This, we need hardly say, is an incidental effect of the great spirit of swadeshim which is sweeping over the land.

Catholic Marriages:—In the Reformer of the 20th September we commented on a paragraph in the Catholic Leader relating to a case of alleged bigamy disposed of by Mr. Justice Pandalay in the Madras High Court. We also reproduced our contemporary's paragraph in our news columns to enable readers to check our criticism. If the Leader had returned the compliment, its readers would have seen that its comments on our comments do not really meet the point. We did not defend bigamy, as the Leader suggests. What we pointed out was that the hardships of the Catholic wife in the case, were also those of a number of Hindu wives whose husbands had embraced Christianity. The situation is intolerable, but proposals for relief should cover not only the case of Catholics but of Hindus as well. Incidentally, we mentioned that while the Pope can annul Catholic marriages, there is no power which can dissolve a Hindu marriage. The Leader challenges us to cite a single instance of the dissolution of a valid marriage by His Holiness. We had in mind the recent case of an English duke and there is the historic instance of King Henry VIII of England. It may be said that in either case the marriages were invalid from the beginning, although the parties had lived together and had children by the marriage. This is a mere quibble and it makes no difference whether a subsisting marriage is dissolved or declared to be invalid. However, we do not wish to enter into a controversy with the Leader on this question, and accept its statement as to the indissoluble character of Catholic marriages.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, OCTOBER 11, 1930.

MR. THOMPSON AS PROPAGANDIST.

We can deal here with only a few samples of the propaganda part of Mr. Edward Thompson's "Reconstruction of India." We are sure that no one will be more surprised than Sir George Lloyd, who instituted the prosecution of Mahatmaji for sedition in 1921, at Mr. Edward Thompson's defence of that proceeding. He writes: "By sending Gandhi to jail, Government did several things not on any official agenda. It saved his life, rescued him from admirers who thronged railway stations, when he travelled, and insisted on darshan whatever the hour. It gave him a halo, just when he badly needed one, and put him temporarily away just when his mistakes needed a good deal of forgetting." A man whom crowds thronged at railway stations at all hours to get darshan of, could not certainly have stood in need of a halo. This kind of loose, slipshod writing is not exceptional in this book. Mr. Thompson's remarks are in answer to Mr. C. F. Andrews' criticism that Mahatmaji's prosecution "was a diplomatic stroke, but it had no chivalry in it." Mr. Thompson characterises Mr. Andrews' opinion as "filleted sentimentalism" whatever that may mean. Mr. Thompson defends Mahatma Gandhi's prosecution by Lord Lloyd but he is also ready with his defence of Mahatmaji's internment by Lord Irwin. "On May 4th," writes Mr. Thompson, "Mr. Gandhi was arrested, under a century-old ordinance, by which he could be kept under restraint without trial. The legalists in every country assailed this as monstrous, as of course it was. Yet it was no less monstrous to arrest lesser offenders, while the arch-rebel stalked his unimpeded way. It would be equally monstrous to try a man universally revered as a saint, for breaking the salt monopoly, a law medieval in source and character." The obvious alternative that Mahatmaji might have been conciliated, does not occur to Mr. Thompson. It is curious how contemptuous the champions of law and order are of legalists!

Referring to Mahatmaji's eleven points Mr. Thompson observes: "From this point I, for one, find it hard to believe that he (Mahatmaji) is what he was, or that he has not allowed circumstances to make him temporarily a sheer politician, and a politician only. Such an offer of peace cannot be sincere. Nothing of all that he demands is in the Viceroy's power; he is talking as if he thought he were dealing with Akbar or Aurangzeb." In the first place, Mahatma Gandhi did not demand that the Viceroy should carry out the eleven reforms by his sole authority. He only wanted that the Viceroy should "initiate" consideration of the reforms, which he can well do in several ways. And, in passing, if one Viceroy can double the salt tax by a stroke of his pen, why cannot another repeal it in the same way? In the second place, the Viceroy himself in his conversations with Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and Mr. Jayakar indicated the extent to which his Excellency would be prepared to meet Mahatmaji in regard to his conditions. In the third place, the eleven points were given to Mr. S. R. Bomanji in response to a request from him for terms which he (Mr. Bomanji) might place before Mr. Ramsay Macdonald as those on which Mahatmaji would be prepared to recommend the suspension of civil disobedience. Mr. Thompson had not the Bomanjee-Gandhi letters before him when he wrote the book. That, however, does not justify his imputing insincerity to Mahatma Gandhi. As any intelligent reader can perceive, Mr. Thompson in this part of his book is writing of things which he does not know and cannot understand. He tries to supply the place of knowledge and understanding by the simple device of begging the question. Whenever he is at a loss for facts, he quietly avers that Indians had told him whatever he wants in private. The exploitation of supposed private conversations with Indians, is a favourite device of Anglo-Indian apologists. Whenever any of these conversations have been investigated, they have usually been found to be apocryphal. No Indian whose opinion is worth anything will be ashamed to tell his countrymen what he confides to a foreign propagandist.

Lord Irwin is for all practical purposes not much less of an autocrat than Akbar or Aurangzeb. He cannot, it is true, order people to be trampled to death by elephants or have them roasted in boiling oil, or walled up alive? But he can by Ordinance deprive the people of any or all their freedom, convert innocent and even meritorious acts into cognizable offences, can stop the course of judicial proceedings at any stage, and can appoint special tribunals to try persons accused of capital charges without the safeguards provided by the regular judicial procedure. Having regard to the state of world opinion, the Ordinance powers of the Viceroy are no less autocratic than that of the Moghul Emperors. Mr. Thompson's observations on the complaints about the jail conditions of political prisoners, show either that he knows nothing of the facts or is deliberately misleading his readers.

"India's major problems" writes Mr. Thompson, "remain still her own social system, with all its miscellaneous economic and sectional mistakes and wrongs, and her communal quarrels." A century and a half of British rule has only accentuated these problems. Every Indian who has tried to do social work or to improve economic conditions or to reconcile sectional differences, knows that the moment his efforts seem to become effective, they inevitably come into conflict with the political system which is founded upon these very defects and differences. That is the main argument for a radical change of the system, transferring political initiative to Indian hands.

THE INDIAN CHRISTIAN MARRIAGE ACT.

SOME NEEDED AMENDMENTS.

( BY MR. KOPARGAM RAMAMURTI. )

It is to be very much hoped that the recent decision of the Madras High Court in the Bigamy case to which reference is made in the Reformer of 20th September will receive the anxious consideration which it deserves from the leaders of the Christian community, more especially from the Committee of elders appointed by the National Christian Council for formulating necessary amendments in the Indian Christian Marriage Act (XV of 1872).

No good purpose is served by complaining, as the Catholic Leader seems to do, that conversions to Hinduism from the other faiths which had hitherto held the practical monopoly of the missionary field in modern India are not declared unlawful by the impartial administrators of the law. Nor is it fair to make it a grievance against Hindus that they are perhaps growing to be as ready and eager as any other community to attribute the purest religious motives and the highest spiritual wisdom to their own converts. This human foible, if foible it is, arises in all cases from a genuine belief in the irresistible truth and attractiveness of the faith to which one's own community is wedded and in which one naturally glories by force of traditional sentiment and self-respect, supported not unoften by intelligent conviction as well. A perusal of the illuminating judgment of Mr. Justice Venkata Subbarao in the case of Ratansi Morarji (55 M. L. J. 478=A. I. R. 1923 Madras 1279) will give one a truer perspective of the Missionary career of Hinduism than can be had by clinging pathetically to the theory, which is by no means "generally accepted" as the Catholic Leader imagines, that a Hindu is born and not made. Religious freedom is as much the birthright of those who may wish to come into the Hindu fold as of those who may be persuaded to walk out of it.

Justice Holloway and Innes of the Madras High Court gave recognition to this principle more than sixty years ago and acquitted the accused Michael in a similar case of bigamy because his second marriage as a Hindu was perfectly valid although the first wife was living (3 M. H. C. R. Appeal 7). Their judgment was followed by Justice Abdur Rahim in 1914 in acquitting one Anthony of the same offence (I. L. R. 33 M. 371). It is but natural and fair that Mr. Justice Pandalai should follow those two rulings and refuse to interfere with the acquittal of Anthony II in the present case. The fact is that the offence of bigamy seems to have been conceived by the Indian legislature, not as an offence committed against the exclusive marital rights of the first wife, but as an offence committed against the second by placing her in a false position. The essential element of the offence is that the man led the second woman into a marriage ceremony with him without really conferring on her a wifely status valid in law. The second marriage would be an offence under the Indian Penal Code only in a case "in which such marriage is void by reason of its taking place during the life of the wife" previously married (Section 494). Even in England, as pointed out by Cockburn C. J. in R. v. Allen (L. R. I. C. C. R. 367), the object of the statute was "not to prevent polygamy, that is, the co-existence of two real wives, which was impossible by English law, but bigamy, that is, the co-existence of a real and an unreal wife."

In either case, however, the hardship to the deserted wife is obvious enough. But it arises from the desertion itself and not from the lady's failure to persuade a criminal court to throw her erring husband into the jail with hard labour for 7 or 10 years. Her success might serve as a deterrent to other men of wavering faith and save their wives from a similar fate; but, apart from satisfied revenge which many wives may not crave or care for, his punishment would make little difference to her own unhappiness. What she herself needs is freedom to rebuild her own broken life, if possible, on new foundations. Fortunately, this relief at least a Christian wife can have under the Indian Divorce Act. If it is felt as an unnecessary hardship that she should wait till her faithless husband, after abandoning his Christian religion, has actually "gone through a form of marriage with another woman," as Section 10 requires, the Act may be so amended as to make the husband's apostasy alone, and the wife's unwillingness to tolerate it and live with him any longer, a sufficient ground for dissolving their marriage bond. But it is doubtful whether the Christian community will favour such a course inasmuch as it will deprive the sorrowing wife of the chance still open to her of winning back her wayward spouse to her rightful fold. Moreover such an amendment in the Divorce Act would be incongruous with the liberal policy embodied in the Christian Marriage Act which permits a Christian woman to marry even a raw heathen in the first instance.

What then should be done to prevent the recurrence of such unhappy cases? The dissatisfaction and dismay that may be caused in Christian circles by the recent decision of the Madras High Court must awaken them to a right appreciation of the law as it stands at present and drive them to seek out a remedy by legislative enactment. They had too long been lulled into a false sense of security by the unfounded belief that marriage under the Indian Christian Marriage Act automatically fastens the English law of monogamy unshakably on the bridegroom whether he continues to profess the Christian faith or not, and that even if he was a non-Christian from the very beginning his marriage with a Christian woman under the Christian Marriage Act would somehow clip his wings and disable him from exercising afterwards his personal law right to marry another wife in his own religious fold. Even the learned author of the "Law applicable to Christians in India" was not entirely guiltless of fostering such belief, notwithstanding his vague admission in one place that "the provisions contained in the Act do not entirely conserve the purposes intended by them." He threw doubt on the correctness of decisions of Justice Holloway and Justice Abdur Rahim (which have now been followed by Justice Pandalai) and held up as "the better opinion" an obiter dictum or uncalled for observation to the contrary in Emperor v. Lazar (I. L. R., 30 Madras 515) which is unsupported by the earlier or later decision (Pp. 89-90). He naturally insists that every mixed marriage, whether of a Christian man with a non-Christian woman or of a non-Christian man with a Christian woman, should be solemnized before a Marriage Registrar under the Christian Marriage Act. But, if either of the same couples is married by a Purohit or Qazi with Hindu or Moslem ritual, he insists that every person concerned in the affair—priest, bridegroom, relations, friends and all—shall be punished as criminals under section 68 of the Act. And, for this severe discrimination, he presents a reason which is not only inapplicable to all the aspects of the case but is untenable even within its own limits and misleading through its underlying assumptions. "This was intended," he explains, "to prevent a Christian woman from suffering by the Hindu or Muhammadan husband exercising his privilege of taking other wives superseding his Christian wife and depriving her and her children of their rights of inheritance under the Indian Succession Act" (P. 72). As if the solemnisation of the same marriage meticulously under the Christian Marriage Act could legally prevent these dreaded mishaps? Mr. Justice Pandalai's recent decision confirming as it does the long-standing earlier decisions on the point, must dispel at least the delusive assumption involved in the first half of this explanation, though the second half too stands on no better footing and must receive separate consideration.

What then is the remedy? It may be recalled that this possibility of safe and valid double-marriage was pointed out in a former issue of the Reformer (27th April 1929) as one of the grave defects of the Christian Marriage Act. It was also suggested that a provision must be made in the Act corresponding to section 16 of the Special Marriage Act (III of 1872) which applies even to Hindu couples. The section lays down that if a man who has once married under the Act marries again during the life-time of his wife he shall be punishable for bigamy under sections 494 and 495 of the Indian Penal Code, "Whatever may be the religion which he professed at the time of such second marriage." In the absence of such provision with the specific words quoted above, it is clear, as was then urged and as events have proved now beyond doubt, that a Christian wife married under Act XV of 1872 is as unprotected against the bigamous proclivities of her husband as any heathen woman married with heathen rites before a heathen priest.

Another grave defect which calls for urgent consideration from the Indian Christian Marriage Act Committee is the one disclosed by the latter part of the explanation, which relates to Inheritance, quoted in the earlier paragraph. The assumption made here is that marriage before a Registrar under Act XV of 1872 automatically ousts the jurisdiction of the Hindu and Muhammadan laws of Inheritance over the property of a Hindu or Muhammadan male and secures for his Christian wife and daughter the superior benefits of the Indian Succession Act. But does it really do so? The property of a Christian is no doubt governed by the Indian Succession Act. But there is no provision anywhere extending that Act to the property of a Hindu or Muhammadan. These are on the other hand expressly exempted from its operation. The fact that either of them had married under the Christian Marriage Act makes no difference to the personal law governing them. The principle to be remembered is that it is the religion professed by a deceased person at the time of his death that determines the law according to which the property left by him shall be shared by his survivors, but not the religion or religions professed by his widow and children or other relations who may claim to be his heirs. If he was a Hindu, the Hindu law of Intestate Succession must operate, however disadvantageous it may be to the Christian wife and her daughters in comparison with the Indian Succession Act. If he was a Moslem, the Muhammadan law must take its course in determining who are all his heirs and what share each of them should receive from his property. Nothing but a new and specific provision of law can put out of action the ancient personal law attaching to the deceased owner and instal in its stead the Indian Succession Act to govern the succession to his estate. Such a provision was made in 1923 in the Special Marriage Act (III of 1872) by the insertion of section 24 for the benefit of the Hindus, Buddhists, Jains and Sikhs who may intermarry under that Act. The enactment of a similar provision in Act XV of 1872 should not be difficult of realisation.

Last, though not least, there is a third problem which the Indian Christian Marriage Act Committee, now that it is actually at work on its chosen task, must solve once for all one way or the other. It is the vexed question whether or not Section 88 of Act XV of 1872 leaves the Hindu Law ban against Hindu-Christian Marriage unimpaired, so as to render such marriage void ab initio although it may have been solemnized in strict accordance with the earlier sections of the Act. This question has been agitated often in the columns of the Reformer ever since the Basu Bill controversy in 1911. Mr. Paul Appasami has devoted two and half pages of varied argument to his learned handbook (Pp. 73-75) in support of the general Christian belief that such marriages are valid. But he ended it with the ominous though comforting assurance that "if two parties have been married according to the form which they regarded as applicable to themselves and have lived together as man and wife for some time, the courts would hesitate a great deal before holding the marriage invalid." This may be good news to those unsuspecting souls who have already crossed the Rubicon. But to the Christian or Hindu maiden who may hereafter be called upon to stake her future and the legitimacy and inheritance of her unborn children in the venture of a mixed marriage under the shadow of Section 88, it may not feel very exhilarating to be told that, if only she took the plunge quietly without carrying too many doubts in her mind and stuck to the water sufficiently long, it would be in her power some day to set the whole judiciary and law establishment of the Crown in a desperate seesaw for a considerable time before they found their wits to blurt out that her marriage was no marriage. The pros and cons of the question however have been further discussed and finally summed up in the columns of the Reformer of 17th November 1928 and 27th April 1929. It is now for the Indian Christian Marriage Act Committee and the National Christian Council and the Christian community in general to look into the matter with their own eyes and decide for themselves whether they would like to "let sleeping dogs lie" or to "take the bull by both the horns."

HEAVEN-SENT LEADERS.

Then, in the great hour of need
Of your fainting, dispirited race,
Ye, like angels, appear,
Radiant with ardour divine.
Beacons of hope, ye appear !
Languor is not in your heart,
Weakness is not on your word,
Weariness not on your brow.
Ye alight in our van ! at your voice,
Panic, despair, flee away.
Ye move through the ranks, recall
The stragglers, refresh the outworn,
Praise, re-inspire the brave.
Order, courage, return ;
Eyes rekindling, prayers,
Follow your steps as ye go.
Ye fill up the gaps in our files,
Strengthen the wavering line,
Stablish, continue our march—
On to the bound of the waste
On, to the city of God.

MATHEW ARNOLD.

Women in Jail:—Stree Dharma writes:—"Bengal claims the largest number of women prisoners, Delhi runs it close proportionately. Bombay women prisoners have very distinguished records of service. Madras has forty-eight women in Vellore jail. It is almost incredible that quiet Indian women have undertaken such rigours, such indignities within the short space of six months."

OF IMPORTANCE.

( BY A MISSIONARY )

Much is being said and written these days about the attitude of missionaries and Christian Indians to the struggle for freedom by the Indian nation. In what I shall say on this subject, I shall proceed on the thesis that the British administration in India, as well as the imperialistic administration of other large countries over subject races, is fundamentally wrong and constitutes a serious violation of the universally and generally accepted principles of justice, brotherhood and liberty, and in so far as this is true in any particular situation, it is a grave and immediate cause of national and international unrest. It thus postpones the day when the Prince of Peace shall rule the hearts of men.

Believing this, I ask, "What is to be my attitude as a Christian Missionary and a member of the Church of Christ in these critical days?" Down through the ages, with few, but glorious exceptions, the Church has thrown its lot in with the oppressor, the mighty and the ruler. It has largely ignored the great universal truths at stake in any particular issue. Kirby Page's new book, 'Jesus or Christianity' will furnish ample proof of this statement. Are we now once again to sell out the highest ideals we know for lesser values?

May I quote, as provocative of greater and deeper thought along this line, some pertinent statements of principles. In this dark day they seem to me to be bright beacon towers, flashing light on the paths we are to tread.

"National aspirations must be respected. Peoples may be dominated and governed only by their own consent. Self-determination is not a mere phrase. It is an imperative principle of action which statesmen will henceforth ignore at their peril."

WOODROW WILSON.

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are endowed by their creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that, whenever, any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government."

The Declaration of Independence.

"The question for us as religious people is not merely whether or not the government of our country conforms to these just and righteous declarations of principle, but whether, when our rulers have plainly fallen from grace, we too shall consent to their abandonment, and resign our function as upholders of political and international morality. Our preachings of human brotherhood shall surely amount to more than humdrum peace platitudes in time of peace; they shall be echoes of God's thunder against our country's transgression."

in Appreciation.

These in my mind comprise the minimum of a policy that we as Christians must adopt. Can we justify our existence as Christians if we allow these broad principles to be openly and flagrantly violated? I may be an American, Britisher, Indian or citizen of any country, but I hope that I am a Christian first. I hope that my loyalty to the teachings of Jesus will always take precedence over my loyalty to precepts of the State. And I will struggle that my Christianity may not be throttled by my allegiance to the State. As a Christian I believe I must cry out against injustice, exploitation and imperialism wherever they are found, and if this brings me into conflict with the State, I must be prepared to take the consequences.

May I again quote. This time from the findings of the Jerusalem Missionary Council. Here I find principles specified that claim my loyalty. Yet, who dares?

"All Christian forces, and particularly the International Missionary Council, dedicated as they are to prepare for the establishment among all mankind of the Kingdom of God, are bound to work with all their power to remove race prejudice, and adverse conditions due to it, to preserve the rights of peoples, and to establish educational, religious and other facilities designed to enable all alike to enjoy equality of social, political and economic opportunity. Where the case is that the affairs of a subject people are administered by a governing class of another race, the ruling race should regard itself as entrusted with the duties:

1. Of ensuring that economic resources, and still more, the human potentialities, of the country under its administration are developed in the interests of the indigenous population.

2. Of aiding the peoples so to conduct their affairs that at the earliest possible moment they will be able to stand alone and govern themselves.

3. Of aiding peoples to protect themselves against such evils as alcohol and noxious drugs, which come in the train of western civilization."

JERUSALEM MISSIONARY REPORT.

"Inasmuch as Christian missions involve the largest possible identification of the missionary with the people of the country of his adoption, the International Missionary Council places on record its conviction that the protection of missionaries should only be by such methods as will promote goodwill in personal and official relations, and urges upon all missionary societies that they should make no claim on their government for the armed defence of their missionaries and property."

JERUSALEM MISSIONARY REPORT.

Shall we as Missionaries use these findings as standards for judgement? Can we safely make our adjustments to the present troubles according to them?

May I close with a few statements from outstanding persons, which throw light upon their judgment of the all too-true attitude and conduct of the Church of Christ in India.

"In this milieu, Christianity is called upon to make her witness. To many Christianity is the instrument of the western world, disruptive of India's social order and, above all, the ally of her present rulers."

S. K. DATTA.

"I have told my missionary friends, noble as you are, you have isolated yourselves from the people whom you want to serve. You come to India under the shadow, or if you like, under the protection of a temporal power and it creates an impassable bar."

MAHATMA GANDHI.

"The overlapping of Christian Missionary work by the forceful and pervasive environment of the British Administration in India—so that in many missionary stations there is very little outward sign of any distinction between the British civil rule and the mission work—has led to a painful and almost universal confusion about the essential meaning of the Christian religion among orthodox Hindus and Muhammadans. This confusion has been acutely apparent for the last fifty or more years and has been heartily disliked by every earnest missionary who has come out to work in India."

O. F. ANDREWS.

"It proved impossible to identify myself completely with Indian aspirations because I represented foreign powers which threatened economic and other reprisals unless certain policies determined by some supporting foreign society were carried out to the letter on Indian soil. If missions need anything in this new day it is complete spiritual emancipation from a ubiquitous imperialism that is racial, political and economic."

BISHOP F. B. FISHER,

in "The Christian Advocate."

My plea is that we be true to these high principles, and sensitive to these criticisms. Let us err, if need be, on the side of the oppressed and weak. Let us not allow our loyalty to the State to blind us to those principles and powers high above any State—

"We owe allegiance to the State but truer, deeper, more,

To the sympathies that God hath set within our Spirit's core;

Our Country claims our fealty, we grant it so, but then Before Man make us Citizens, great Nature made us men."

RUSKIN.

In similar words Mahatma Gandhi has expressed the same ideal in a letter written at the time he was removing the indigo stain from Champaran.

"I have disregarded the order served upon me not for want of respect for lawful authority, but in obedience to the higher law of our being, the voice of conscience."

MAHATMA GANDHI ON TOLERATION.

FROM 'YERAVDA MANDIR.'

(A translation of Gandhiji's discourse last week on 'Tolerance' is given below).

V. G. D.

I did not like this word, but could not think of a better one. Toleration implies a gratuitous assumption of the inferiority of other faiths to one's own, whereas Ahinsa teaches us to entertain the same respect for the religious faiths of others as we accord to our own, thus admitting the imperfection of the latter. This admission will be readily made by a seeker of Truth who follows the law of love. If we had attained the full vision of Truth, we would no longer be mere seekers but become one with God, for Truth is God. But being only seekers we prosecute our quest and are conscious of our imperfection. And if we are imperfect ourselves, religion as conceived by us must also be imperfect. We have not realised religion in its perfection, even as we have not realised God. Religion of our conception, being thus imperfect, is always subject to a process of evolution and re-interpretation. Process towards Truth, towards God is possible only because of such evolution. And if all faiths outlined by men are imperfect, the question of comparative merit does not arise. All faiths constitute a revelation of Truth, but all are imperfect and liable to error. Reverence for other faiths need not blind us to their faults. We must be keenly alive to the defects of our own faith, and must not leave it on that account but try to overcome those defects. Looking at all religions with an equal eye, we would not only not hesitate but would think it our duty to adopt into our faith every acceptable feature of other faiths.

The question then arises. Why should there be so many different faiths? We know that there is a large variety of them. The soul is one, but the bodies which she animates are many. We cannot reduce the number of bodies; yet we recognise the unity of the soul. Even as a tree has a single trunk but many branches and leaves, there is one Religion, but any number of faiths. All faiths are a gift of God, but partake of human imperfection, as they pass through the medium of humanity. God given religion is beyond all speech. Imperfect men put it into such language as they can command, and their words are interpreted by other men equally imperfect. Whose imperfection must be held to be the right one? Every one is right from his own standpoint, but it is not impossible that every one is wrong. Hence the necessity for tolerance, which does not mean indifference towards one's own faith, but a more intelligent and purer love for it. Tolerance gives us spiritual insight, which is as far from fanaticism as a north pole is from the south. The knowledge of religion breaks down the barriers between faith and faith and gives rise to tolerance. Cultivation of tolerance for other faiths will impart to us a truer understanding of our own.

Tolerance obviously does not disturb the distinction between right or wrong, or good and evil. The reference here throughout has been to the principal faiths of the world, which are all based on identical fundamental principles, and which can all point to simply men and women who held them in the past and hold them now. In the case of good and evil, we have to cultivate charity for the wicked no less than for the good, for the sinner no less than for the saint, all the while that we cherish inveterate hatred against wickedness and sin.

WOMEN'S INDIAN ASSOCIATION.

The following Appeal has been issued by the members of the Committee which is responsible for the Headquarters; and readers are earnestly requested to send Donations in response to its request.

The Women's Indian Association was founded in 1917, but for the first six years its current expenses were very moderate as its small office in Adyar had only a nominal rent. In 1923 the Association established the Women's Home of Service in Mylapore, Madras, and with the expansion of its work in Madras for this purpose and with Baby Welcomes it was necessary to collect over Rs. 8,000 annually which the public of Madras subscribed generously. After the transfer of this Home to the Poona Seva Sadan in 1928 and with the appointment of Mrs. Patwardhan as Secretary of the W. I. A. and Mrs. Swaminadhan as Treasurer the need for acquiring Headquarters premises in the City became imperative. The fine bungalow and grounds of Pantheon Gardens were rented and have proved ideal in most respects. They house the Montessori School, Sri Dharma Office, the General Office of the Association, Committee rooms and living rooms for three teachers. The Headquarters has proved a valuable centre for many of the activities of social service workers of Madras, such as the Children's Aid Society, the All-India Women's Conference, International Fellowship Club, the Youth League, etc. The Headquarters were opened in Nov., 1928, by Lady Goschen.

The Objects of the Association, carried out by co-ordination of the 70 Branches from Headquarters are (1) Compulsory Primary Education for every girl and boy; (2) Abolition of Child-marriage and Child-widowhood; (3) Equal opportunities of service for women as well as men in all the political and civic duties of the country; (4) The union of women into Branches for self-development through classes, lectures, recreation, etc., and (5) The organisation of women for definite service of others.

Only through the continued generous support of the well-wishers of the Women's movement will it be possible to meet the great increase in expenditure which these Headquarters entail. We need Rs. 5,000 this year for its proper care, rent, staffing and development.

We appeal to those who know the good record of the Association to give us generous donations for this purpose and for the general propaganda work.

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF MORAL EDUCATION.

PERSONAL REPORT OF F. J. GOULD
(September, 1930).

Having taught classes, and joined in the discussions, at the Congresses in London, 1908, and The Hague, 1912, I was asked, after the War, to act as Hon. Secretary of the International Executive Council, and I acted from November, 1919, to November, 1927, and assisted the Geneva Congress, 1922, and Rome, 1926. At Rome, where (though the attendance was small) the arrangements made by professors Orestano and Zichichi were admirable and the discussions excellent, I shared the general pleasure which was felt when our noble and lamented friend, M. G. Belot, proposed a Paris Congress, 1930. At Rome, I joined happily in welcoming the collaboration of the International Bureau of Education, Geneva.

Funds declined in 1926-7. We did not (as the Rome Congress asked) effectively pursue the theme of History-teaching, or of the Universal Code; nor did we maintain a vigorous correspondence with educationists. I myself (not the Council) issued 1,000 gratis copies of a thirty-two pages Summary of the Rome Congress papers and discussions. The Italian Committee issued three well-edited Congress volumes (published by Casa Ed. Optima, Rome; 22s.).

I will not say anything about the interval, November, 1927, to November 1929.

An interview with Dr. Earle Babcock (Carnegie Endowment) led to the plan of revival, and of three-fold co-operation by the Paris Committee, the Geneva Bureau, and a British (English-speaking) Committee. At Paris, November, 1929, I undertook to assist Mr. Spiller, and by July, 1930, our British Committee (list of sympathizers in the British Commonwealth, Palestine, U.S.A., China, Japan) numbered 180 names, and we had issued more than 7,000 circulars, etc. The British Committee's chairman has been Professor J. S. Mackenzie, who took an active part in establishing the Congress in 1908. Through M. Polacco (whose co-operation has been most valuable) Paris sent £150 to the British Committee. In March 1930, I resumed the Secretaryship of the Council (now numbering forty-two members), and I have got into fresh touch with most of the members, helped Mr. Spiller to frame the proposal for a revised Congress Constitution, and have gladly served under the chairmanship of the distinguished educationist, Sir Perry Nunn. The London relations with M. Mosé and the Paris Committee, and with Miss Butts and the Geneva Bureau, have been most cordial.

As I shall be seventy-five in December, I think younger hands should carry on the clerical work, and so I retire from the secretaryship in October. The Paris Congress may initiate a new departure. I will simply say, on the strength of a long experience of educational movements and conferences, that (providing a reasonable money support is secured) I think—

1. The Congress deserves to be continued as a unique embodiment of enthusiasm for youth-education on a nobly liberal basis, free to all faiths and schools of thought.

2. The Congress has had a valuable detachment from questions of administration and from any special experimental system, and, while studying numerous practical applications in family, personality, citizenship, and international fields, its method (pursued in 1922, 1926, and 1930) of broad and philosophical consideration of two or three great themes at a Congress merits continuation.

3. The study of History-teaching should be perennial.

4. A more systematic effort should be made, in the intervals between the Congresses, to maintain (in as many languages as possible) correspondence with educationists in all parts of the world. Such a correspondence aids the growth of the Universal Conscience.

Women and the R. T. Conference:—In reply to a letter received from Mrs. Subbaroyan in which she asked the Committee of the Women's Indian Association: "If they could kindly inform me their opinion on any matters regarding Indian women that should be considered by the Round Table Conference while framing the future Constitution for India" the Committee of this Association has sent the following letter to her dated 30th September, 1930. "In reply to your letter of the 26th Instant we have to state that in April 1930 this Association made it clear to its representatives in England that the Association would not be in favour of a representation to the Round Table Conference unless there is a preliminary statement from the Government recognising the claim of India to complete Dominion Status without reservations, the method by which to give effect to this right being the subject to be discussed at the Round Table Conference. At meetings held under the auspices of the Women's Indian Association in Gokhale Hall and Banade Hall, Madras in May 1930, this Association called on H. E. the Viceroy to "make an immediate announcement that the framing of a constitution for India as a Self-Governing Dominion shall be the duty of the Round Table Conference, this being the essential first step towards restoring peace and goodwill in India." In accordance with these resolutions which have already been communicated to our representatives in London and in the present circumstances in which the Round Table Conference is constituted without the inclusion of any of the leaders—men or women—of the majority party of the country and the Government having made no pronouncement such as we asked for, nor any promise 'to frame a constitution' as your letter incorrectly states, the Committee has no desire to send the opinions of this Association through you or through any other Indian woman to the Conference." Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi, Vice-President Lady Sadasiva Aiyar; Mrs. Amma Swaminadhan, Hon. Treasurer; Mr. M. Dadhabhoy; Mrs. M. E. Cousins Hon. Secretary, W. I. A. Committee."

ALL-ASIAN WOMEN'S CONFERENCE

An informal Bulletin has been issued by the All-Asian Women's Conference which gives a resume of the previous publications connected with the Conference, sets forth details for the information of Non-Asian countries and issues an appeal for the enrolment of members for an All-India Reception Committee.

As a sufficient number of favourable replies have been received to the proposal initiated by the women of India that the women of the countries of Asia should come together in conference in India, arrangements are now in full swing for welcoming delegates and preparing programmes.

OBJECTS OF CONFERENCE

The Conference will be held in Lahore from 23rd to 30th January 1931. The objects of the Conference are summarised as follows:—

1. To promote the consciousness of unity amongst the women of Asia as members of a common Oriental culture.

2. To take stock of the qualities of Oriental civilisation so as to preserve them for national and world service (simplicity, philosophy, Art, the cult of the family, Veneration for motherhood, spiritual consciousness).

3. To review and seek remedies for the defects at present apparent in Oriental civilisation (ill-health, illiteracy poverty and under-payment of labour, infantile mortality, marriage customs).

4. To sift what is appropriate for Asia from the Occidental influences (education, dress, freedom of movement, cinemas, machinery).

5. To strengthen one another by the exchange of data and experiences concerning women's conditions in the respective countries of Asia (economic, moral, political and spiritual status).

6. To promote world peace.

CO-OPERATION PROMISED

Replies promising co-operation in the effort to send delegates have been received to date from Palestine, Syria, Ceylon, Nepal, Japan, Burma, Iraq, Siam, Indo-China, Malaya, Hawaii, Persia and Baluchistan.

Many countries have published a translation of the invitation sent out by the Indian Signatories. The names of Madame Noor Hamada (President Women's Arabian Conference), Madame Nasik Abed Madame M. Jemil Beyhum, (noted Arabian Leader), Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, Mrs. Inouye (Japanese educationist and organiser), Mrs. Sun Yat Sen (Chinese Leader) have been put forward as possible Presidents to be voted upon by the delegates in order of preference.

PERSIAN WOMEN'S GOOD WISHES.

The first Non-Indian visitor for the Conference has arrived in the person of Miss Isabel Robertson from Auckland, New Zealand Member of the India and New Zealand League. She is identifying herself with the work of Indian Women's Association till the time of the Conference.

The president of the Patriotic Persian Women's Conference writes that the Persian women read the invitation with great pleasure and regard the Conference would prove a source of great hopefulness in connection with the salvation and the happiness of the women of different nations. She gives details of the position of women in Persia and promises to send a delegate from that country, ending her letter, "We unitedly acclaim with no ordinary gratification "Long Live our Union of the women of Asia."—

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The Pope and the Aga Khan:—Writes the Catholic Leader: The Sultana Aga Khan may be right in her estimate of the qualities and virtues of her husband, the Aga Khan, as recorded in an interview given to a representative of the Hindu Illustrated Weekly (September 7). One is not disposed to quarrel with her, when she speaks of him as "the embodiment of the best in both the East and the West", and as the "forty-fourth lineal descendant of the Prophet Mahomed's nephew," but when she compares the authority of the Aga Khan in the Ismaelite sect to that of the Pope in the Catholic Church and of the actual status of the latter she betrays her ignorance of elementary Catholic teaching, though she pretends to be a Catholic, she says that the Pope is "accepted as the symbolic representative of St. Peter, the founder of the Christian Church." Every Catholic knows that the Pope is the Vicar of Christ on earth and that Christ Himself is the Founder of the Christian Church. Further, Sultana Aga Khan is reported to have said: "I am a Roman Catholic woman and shall remain so. My husband has stated to me many times that he will never attempt to influence me to leave my faith." If she were indeed a good, sincere and practising Catholic, she would not have married, without dispensation, the head of a Muslim sect. Her marriage is not valid in the eyes of the Catholic Church and as long as she remains in that state, she ceases to be a practical Catholic and cannot be admitted to the sacraments.

Mrs. Shah Nawaz Pleads For Goodwill:—A special cable to the 'Pioneer' dated London, September 23, states:—"The vital interests of the various communities in India are identical. We the women of India, have not allowed communal differences to mar the harmony with which we are working for the uplift of our country," declared Begum Shah Nawaz, the first Indian woman delegate to the Round Table Conference to arrive in London. "I have gladly accepted the invitation to the Conference in the hope that, along with my sister Mrs. Subbaroyan, I shall be able to render my humble services to the cause of Indo-British co-operation in promoting India's advance towards her destined goal, which is Dominion Status. This is the opportunity for us all to work for the best understanding through satisfying the legitimate aspirations of the Indian peoples. I am confident of the success of the Conference if the delegates from both countries work in a spirit of co-operation and mutual goodwill."

Economic Condition of Indian Christians:— Mr. V. V. Phillips writes in the Indian Witness.—The backward state of the industrial and economic life of Christians in India is manifest today in the life of the Christian Proletariat. India is essentially an agricultural country. The peasant in India is industrious and has followed cultivation for centuries. His interest in land dates back for centuries. But within the last quarter of a century this characteristic of the Indian peasant is rapidly changing and migration to towns is rapidly increasing. Industrial revolution has already set in and the great work before the leaders is to see how to mitigate the evils consequent on the industrial revolution. The Christian community in India is still in a sorry plight as compared with other communities. The percentage of illiteracy among Christians in India is certainly high and missionaries have devoted themselves most unselfishly in educating the Christian community. But the evil which has resulted and has not been guarded against in educating the village Christians, is that the village Christians lose their interest in land and agriculture. Their contact with the cities and their demand by the missionaries in cities and larger towns leads them to forsake their interest in cultivation. The proletariat class today forms a larger per cent among the Christians than in any other community in India. The Census and other reports say clearly that the most poor community relatively in India is the Christian community, although the most literate one."

Rao Bahadur R. Srinivasan:—A public meeting of the Depressed Classes was held last week in the Pachaiyapp's Hall, to present an address of congratulation to Rao Bahadur R. Srinivasan on the conferment of the title of Rao Bahadur and on his being selected as a delegate to the Round Table Conference. Mr. Vasudeva Pillay read the address of congratulations to Rao Bahadur R. Sreenivasan of which the following are extracts:—Even at the ripe old age of 72, your interest and enthusiasm for the cause of the community continues unabated. You entered public life in 1891, when you organised "the Pariah Mahajana Sabha" against the bitter opposition of your own castemen and thus showed courage of conviction. In these earlier years you were the first to start the Journal "Parayan" in 1898 to ventilate the grievances of our community and to rouse us from the lethargy of ages. The first mass meeting of the community was held in 1893 and another public meeting was held in October 1895 in the Victoria Public Hall where the inarticulate community began to assert itself and put forward boldly a rightful claim to be recognised and heard by the powers that be. The immediate effect of the awakening was that the name "Pariah" was changed into "Panchama" and "Adi Dravida" by the Government.

No caste Campaign:—In writing to the Secretary of the Jat-Pat Torak Mandal, Lahore, Vinayak Damodar Savarkar has made the following remarks. "You may enlist my name on the All India Jat-Pat Torak Census Committee. The pity of it is that I can not do as much work as a member ought to owing to my internment. Nevertheless I am carrying on a very vigorous campaign in this district against the Caste-Curse, which is having a wider effect in Maharashtra too. My message is:— "Down with the Caste that comes of birth alone and up with the Caste that is by merit won; we are Hindus only and know no other caste and mean to sacrifice that Hindutva too on the altar of Humanity, when all other Non-Hindu Sections of mankind are ripe and ready to do so. For indeed man belongs to one caste alone—The Caste of Man." Dr. Sir P. O. Ray, while commending the movement for the non-registration of Caste in the returns of the coming Census, has consented to serve on the All India Jat-Pat Torak Census Committee. Mrs. Dr. Seta Parmanand (Yeotmal), Mr. K. N. Ray (Editor, the "Tribune") and G. Krishna Shastri (Vedic Mission, Poona) have also joined this movement. Membership of the Committee is open to the public. Forms can be had from Jat-Pat Torak Mandal, Lahore. Shri Narayana Swami president All India Aryan League, has written to Secretary, Jat-Pat Torak Mandal, Lahore, as follows:— "Will you kindly enlist my name on the All India Jat-Pat Torak Census Committee? My message is:—The Caste System was unknown in ancient India. It has its recent origin, i. e. between 200 and 1000 A. D. It has divided the great Hindu community in a lot of petty divisions and hampered its progress. It should be abolished as soon as practicable. No enlightened Hindu should get his Caste recorded in the returns of the coming Census.

Hindu Muslim Unity:—Mr. P. R. Hakeem, Assistant Secretary, Taraqqi Islam, Qadian writes: It is announced for general information that this year the "Holy Prophet's Day" will be observed throughout India on the 29th of October, next, when, as during the past years, lectures will be delivered on the life, character and teachings of the holy Prophet Muhammad (may peace and the blessings of Allah be upon him) and the debt of gratitude which the world owes to that greatest benefactor of humanity. It passes without contradiction that the whole of India's present degradation is traceable to the Hindu-Muslim disunity and discord and the latter in its turn is due, among other things, to the lack of respect shown by the Hindus to the religious personalities of Islam, particularly to the holy Prophet Mohammad, may peace be upon him. As this regrettable tendency on the part of a section of the Hindus to attack our holy Prophet is ascribable to ignorance as to the life, high moral character and teachings of the great Arabian Prophet, the system of these annual lectures on a given day throughout the country has been introduced by Hazrat Mirza Bashiruddin Mahmud Ahmad, the holy Head of the Ahmadiyya Community. These lectures are proving very useful and have already become very popular both among the Muslims and thoughtful and fairminded non-Muslims in the country. It is earnestly hoped and expected that all well-wishers of India will take part in these lectures and try their utmost to make the occasion a success.

NOTES.

The Unlawful Associations Ordinance:—
Only a practising lawyer can keep count of the sections of the Indian Penal Code, the Criminal Procedure Code, the special laws and Ordinances having, the force of laws, under which Indian nationalists of Congress party, are arrested, imprisoned or otherwise brought under the penal provisions of the law. On Saturday the Governor-General issued a comprehensive Ordinance making the membership of the Congress or any of the affiliated bodies a cognisable offence, that is, an offence for which any person can be arrested without a warrant. The provisions of this extraordinary Ordinance are thus summarised in the weekly official summary of the Government of India to the Secretary of State: "The Unlawful Associations Ordinance confers powers by which Government can occupy land and buildings used for the purpose of an association that has been declared unlawful and can forfeit moveable property used for the same purpose. It also contains a provision making the membership of an unlawful association a cognisable offence and this is now operative throughout British India. Provisions relating to property have been extended in the first instance to the Bombay Presidency only and the local government has already taken action under it in Gujerat and the suburban districts of Bombay." On Wednesday these were extended to Bombay city also. The Congress Committees and a number of other bodies, numbering nearly 40 in all, were declared to be unlawful. Among these were the Rashtriya Stri Mandal and the Desh Sevika Sangh. These are two important women's associations in the city engaged in public work. The Desh Sevikas have been principally engaged in picketing liquor and foreign cloth shops. Mahatma Gandhi specially assigned this work to women for the reason that non-violence comes more naturally and easily to them than to men. The manner in which they have acquitted themselves has won for them the respect of the public and the merchants themselves whose shops they picketed have, as a rule, treated them with great consideration. These two bodies may be said to be pioneer movements of women's participation in public life. The declaration of them as unlawful bodies is the latest illustration of what we said last week that, the moment a social reform becomes effective, it becomes obnoxious to the political system under which we live. Government are glad to patronise Indian women so long as they are an ornamental appendage to official parties. But when they endeavour by peaceful persuasion to prevent people from indulging in drink and buying foreign goods, they become unlawful bodies and liable to be arrested by any policeman at sight. The resentment created by this action against the women's organizations brings out clearly the fact that the political system is developing into an anti-social organ. Apart from this, the wide and unprecedented scope of the Ordinance, has shocked the moderate mind, while it has rejoiced those who welcome every measure which is calculated to spread discontent. Even before the Bombay public came to know that the Ordinance was applied to Bombay, Congress House had been occupied by the Police, the premises of all the other bodies ransacked and the members arrested. More than 200 persons were arrested on Wednesday and tried and sentenced to terms of imprisonment. There have been more arrests since. Government seem to be under the impression—at least that is what they convey—that the general population is groaning under the tyranny of the Congress and will welcome their action against that body. How unfounded this belief is, was shown by the very merchants who on Tuesday wanted to break the Congress ban, themselves voluntarily refraining from opening their shops when the Ordinance was applied to Bombay city. The Anglo-Indian Press has been egging on Government to take drastic steps on the inspiration of the less educated and responsible members of the European community. No wonder, it is highly pleased with the result. We do not say that the Government should take no action to protect their interests against the civil disobedience campaign, though the only permanent safeguard is to devolve the responsibility for good government on Indians themselves. But the movement, as we view it, consists in large part of a healthy growth of the social conscience, and it is our complaint that the bureaucracy like blind Samson is bringing down the whole social edifice in its rage against those who dare to challenge its often unintelligent authority.

Pandit Jawharlal on the Situation:—
Pandit Jawharlal Nehru made his first public speech after his release from jail last Sunday at a demonstration to welcome him in Allahabad. The greater part of it was devoted to an attack on

Lord Irwin for "presuming" to criticise the Congress. We do not see why it should be a presumption to criticise the Congress which is a secular body and not an infallible Pope. The Pandit indignantly repudiated the suggestion that a private assurance was asked for from the Viceroy. We do not know what occasion Lord Irwin specifically had in mind but Mr. Reginald Reynolds, if we remember, gave out in one of his articles that Mahatma Gandhi had told an English Press representative—Mr. Ashmead Bartlett, we think—that if a public assurance to the effect that the Round Table Conference was to frame a Dominion status scheme could not be given, he would be satisfied with a private assurance from the Viceroy or the Prime Minister to that effect. There was nothing improper in the offer and Lord Irwin, we thought, made needless play with the point in his Punjab banquet speech. Secret assurances in political negotiations are nothing unusual or abnormal, and Pandit Jawharlal Nehru's protestation that the Congress stands for open diplomacy at every stage or in every way, was overdone. There can be no diplomacy without a certain measure of reticence until the negotiations are concluded. Lord Irwin, it is true, overlooked for the moment the great sacrifices that the country has made and is making to attain the substance and reality of self-government. The special feature of the present movement is that women and even children are in the very thick of it, and that they are indeed its backbone. The bureaucracy chooses to think that it is the machinations of unscrupulous politicians that have drawn them into the movement. Lord Irwin has evidently taken his cue from the bureaucracy and, therefore, does not understand the true inwardness of the movement. But when Pandit Jawharlal talks of burning boats and the last ditch, he is going beyond Mahatma Gandhi who has always declared that he would welcome an honourable settlement. Compromise is the essence of politics but it should not be on a question of principle. To the great majority of the Indian people, it is the substance of self-government that matters and not whether it is called by this name or that. We may add that there is no question of giving a trial, full or partial, to the principle of non-violence. As we have repeatedly pointed out, non-violence is indispensable as a guarantee of fair and just treatment to minorities, and without it, in the conditions of this country, swaraj would be the rule of brute force, either by a numerical majority or an aggressive minority.

Prisoners' Food:—That the cobbler should stick to his last is a sound maxim for "Directors of Information" as for ordinary people. We have noticed more than once how the Director in Bombay errs when he goes beyond his function of furnishing information to drawing conclusions therefrom. A more than ordinarily crude attempt of this kind, was issued this week in the shape of a Press Note designed to contradict the complaints as regards the food supplied to prisoners. It runs thus:—

prisoners were released from the various jails in the Presidency, and at the time of release their weighment charts showed that 9,448 or 52.5 per cent. gained weight, 4,520 or 25.1 per cent. remained stationary and only (sic) 4,031 or 22.4 per cent. lost weight. In this connection an interesting case is that of an 'A' class prisoner in the Byculla Jail who was transferred to the 'C' for unsatisfactory behaviour. Within 8 weeks of the transfer he gained 7 lbs. in weight. While he was in 'A' class, the prisoner used to supplement the jail diet with food provided from outside by relatives and friends but following his transfer to 'C' class in which he gets jail food only his weight has increased from 114 lbs. to 121 lbs."

The figures supplied by the Director himself go a long way to justify the complaints. The jail population, be it remembered, consists largely of men in the prime of life. Infants and old men, who are most liable to disease and death, and women exposed to the dangers of maternity, are very few. That nearly 50 per cent. of such prisoners should have either remained stationary or actually lost in weight in jail, is a serious matter and not a piece of good fortune, as the Director seems to think. As regards the interesting case of an "A" class prisoner who gained weight when he was transferred to the "C" class, and which to the Director seems another refutation of the complaints, we have heard of cases when chronic complaints have been cured by some lucky mishap. But we do not advise a paralytic to try a fall from the first floor, as a specific for his disease.

Tolerance and Intolerance:—The Catholic Leader seems to have realised the dangerous consequences to which its assertion of the intolerance of Catholicism might lead. It would have been more straightforward if it had simply admitted its mistake instead of trying to wriggle out of it by such casuistry as the following: "These observations (of the Reformer) betray a confusion between theoretical dogmatic intolerance and practical religious tolerance. In our notes two weeks ago we spoke of the former; in the domain of religion, as in the domain of science, there can be only one truth. Error as such cannot be tolerated, for it would mean that religious truth has no claim to universal recognition. Such an attitude must necessarily lead to indifferentism which declares that all religions are equally good and true or are equally false and bad. If religious truth is incapable of double dealing, it must be as intolerant as also is geometry or the multiplication table. Intolerance in this matter is nothing else than the expression of objective intolerance of truth towards error. In the domain of faith as well as of science, truth must be the standard and guide of all investigation. And the conviction of the possession of truth necessarily forbids one to countenance error. There can be only one single religion and its opposition towards error is simply the antagonism between truth and error carried into strong personal convictions." The Chinese Minister of Education in his reply to the protest of some Christian Missionaries against his ban on Bible teaching in primary schools, tersely pointed out the difference between religious and mathematical truth. The Leader might remember, more over, that even mathematical truth was persecuted in the name of religious truth. Shade of Galileo!

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, OCTOBER 18, 1930.

THE TRAGEDY OF LORD IRWIN.

The forthcoming Round Table Conference has been likened to the play of Hamlet without Hamlet. But the Conference is not the play but only the play within the play. This interlude, it will be recalled, was arranged by Hamlet to "catch the conscience of the king," that is, to confirm his suspicions regarding his uncle's complicity in the murder of his father. The Round Table Conference, too, is viewed somewhat in the same light by, for instance, Mr. Jinnah who publicly declared that he attends it in order to find out whether and how far Britain is earnest about giving Swaraj to India.

The real play is being played out in India. The principal character at present is not Mahatma Gandhi or Sir John Simon but Lord Irwin. The part of Mahatmaji since his internment is rather that of the Ghost than any other in the play. Sir John's is that of Old Polonius. Lord Irwin is the Prince of Denmark.

In Greek tragedies the impelling force was inexorable fate. In Shakespeare's tragedies it is some vital flaw in the character of the central figure. King Lear, Othello, Macbeth, Hamlet are all great characters, but a solitary flaw in each of them makes tragedy of their lives.

Lord Irwin is also a naturally noble soul. His Excellency in his speech at the Punjab Minister's banquet said that even his severest critics have not questioned his sincerity and goodwill. This is literally true. The bitterest condemnation of the policy of Lord Irwin's Government is almost invariably accompanied by tributes to his goodness of heart and to his desire to do his best for the country.

"The Viceroy is misinformed; he is kept in the dark about what is actually being done under his authority: he wants to do the right thing but his surroundings are against him:" this is what one hears on every side. It is surprising how even political opponents find excuses for Lord Irwin.

Lord Irwin began his Viceroyalty under the fairest auspices. He brought a name respected in British Indian history as the grandson of the author of what has been called the magna charta of Indian education. Friends wrote of him from England in the highest terms. He was one of the finest spirits of the time, who had turned to politics as a matter of public duty. There was no exaggeration in all this.

Nevertheless, it is the sad fact that Lord Irwin has been a failure and a grievous one as Viceroy. He has interned Mahatma Gandhi under an old ordinance without a judicial trial. There is no limit set to Mahatmaji's detention. Lord Irwin's pleasure alone is the determining factor. A Viceroy of India who cannot govern the country without internment Mahatma Gandhi should, for that reason alone, be adjudged a tragic failure. John Masefield, the present Poet Laureate of England, puts some lines in the mouth of Pilate in his poem "Good Friday." They are spoken in reply to the expostulation of his wife against Jesus' crucifixion.

But Roman laws forbid

That I should weigh, like God, the worth of souls.
I act for Rome, and Rome is better rid
Of these rare spirits whom no law controls.
He broke a statute, knowing from the first Whither his act would lead, he was not blind.

History has not accepted Pilate's justification of his decree. Lord Irwin's defence of the internment of Mahatma Gandhi is not materially different.

There are besides Mahatma Gandhi, thousands and tens of thousands of men and women in prison for offences involving no moral turpitude under Lord Irwin's ordinances. Boys of tender years have been sentenced to imprisonment. Women with babies in their arms have been put in jail. A case was recently reported of a Satyagrahi woman prisoner giving birth to a child in jail. Thousands of families have been deprived of their breadwinners. Their homes have been left unto them desolate. There is mourning in many homes all over the country and the tears of women and children are never shed in vain.

The Viceroy's latest Ordinance, if it had been issued by the Soviet Government, would have been held up as a terrible example of Bolshevik depravity. It authorises confiscation of private property as a punishment for political agitation. Lord Irwin in a long preamble deploras the necessity which compels him to issue this Ordinance. That his Excellency is quite sincere, goes without saying. No greater misfortune can befall a man than having to do not once or twice but nine times a thing which goes against his grain. Lord Irwin today is the unhappiest man in India.

When Peter boldly walking on the sea was suddenly assailed by doubt, he began immediately to sink, and the rebuke of the Master has a profound meaning for statesmen and even men in private life: "Wherefore didst thou doubt?" The Gita, too, repeatedly admonishes the aspirant to a higher life against doubt in his own higher self. If Lord Irwin's faith in himself can be somehow revived, the situation may still be saved; otherwise, he will leave behind him a gulf between India and England deepened and widened as it was never before.

And all for what? The people of India ask for self-government which every other country in the world enjoys. As an earnest of this, Mahatma Gandhi requested Lord Irwin to pave the way towards certain necessary reforms. We have ourselves suggested that in one at least, on which there is an overwhelming consensus of Indian opinion, namely, prohibition, Government should take immediate steps to inaugurate a new policy. There is no response to any of these just and reasonable requests.

The people of India have suffered much under Lord Irwin and they are prepared to suffer more. Endurance is the quality which has helped India to survive its many political vicissitudes. That, however, is not our purpose today. It is to call attention to the tragedy of a great character, owing to the one flaw in it, of not having sufficient faith in its own high impulses, and being, therefore, always divided between opposite opinions, proving ineffective and becoming the source of sorrow and suffering to untold millions, to whom it might have been and wished earnestly, to be the source of happiness.

RELIGIOUS APOSTACY AND ECONOMIC UPLIFT.

The Catholic Leader writes :

“Many of the Bishops in India or their representatives have expressed warm sympathy with the plea of Mr. R. S. Nekaljay for the introduction of religious orders skilled in agriculture, for the social and economic salvation of the depressed classes, in the presidential address he delivered at Amraoti at the All-India Depressed Classes Conference in April last. His Excellency the Delegate Apostolic has promised to do his best to carry out the suggestion. The Archbishops of Verapoly and Calcutta have already approached the Benedictines to start houses of this ancient order in their respective dioceses. A Benedictine Abbot in America has given a definite promise to the Superior of Patna Mission to establish a Benedictine Monastery in India. There is not a single Benedictine house in the country at present and if they came and organised industrial and agricultural work on a vast scale, as they did in Europe, they would surely exercise a wonderful influence over the people of the country and contribute powerfully to the advance of religion. The Benedictine monks in North-Western Europe transformed barren wastes and virgin forests into fertile fields and verdant meadows and we have no doubt that similar work accomplished in this country would prove of immense value to religion and society.”

Evidently, Mr. Nekaljay has been in communication with the Catholic hierarchy with regard to his plan. When we first read Mr. Nekaljay's suggestion in his address, we felt considerable doubt about its wisdom, which further consideration has not dissipated. He wants the Benedictines to come as agriculturists, but the Catholic Bishops intend them to come primarily as religious propagandists. Mr. Nekaljay does not seem to have foreseen this contingency or if he did, he said nothing about it in his address. In an earlier part of the same address, he emphatically warned the depressed classes against conversion to Mahomedanism. He said:—

I take this opportunity of requesting the members of the Depressed Classes all over India not to allow themselves to be persuaded or to be deceived into joining the Mahomedan religion. Mahomedans are very anxious to get as many of the Depressed Classes as possible into their fold, not for any love of them, but simply with an idea of increasing their number to wrest the political power in India into their own hands. They give our people no education. They do not give lands to our people to make them peasant-proprietors. In all their fights for power in this land they have consistently ignored the rights of the Depressed Classes and have even robbed them of their seats in the various legislatures. When occasion occurs to show sympathy towards the Depressed Classes, as happened at Harkul, a village in Mangaon Taluka of Kolaba District, they join the Hindus against us. I have not the least doubt that the whole force of their oppression will fall upon the Depressed Classes.

We gathered from this impassioned abjuration that Mr. Nekaljay was against religious apostacy as a means of social regeneration. It may be, however, that while he objects to conversion to Islam, he is not against, if he does not actually favour, conversion to Christianity. The passage about the Benedictines in his address to the seventh session of the All-India Depressed Classes Conference held at Amraoti in April last runs thus:—

“I make a suggestion for your serious consideration and for the consideration of the Depressed Classes spread over this vast continent of India. India is an agricultural country. There are extensive undeveloped lands. There are forest lands. There are marshy lands. France, before it was developed into a flourishing agricultural country, consisted of undeveloped lands, forest lands, and marshy regions. Into these places, where no man had dared to go, big Orders of Christians, known as the Carthusians, the Cistercians and the Benedictines, entered and cut down the forests, filled up the marshy places and transformed the whole country into a veritable flower garden. You might not know what these Orders are. I believe the first two Orders are of a sort of people given up to contemplation like our “Sanyasis” but living a community life. They are not allowed to talk even amongst themselves except for one hour during the week. Their primary work, besides prayer, is cultivation of the land. For centuries they have developed the art of agriculture and cultivation to a high pitch of scientific efficiency. They develop their own lands and the surrounding country-side and allow poor people to settle on them as peasant-proprietors.

Consequently, the poor people become a self-contained community independent, socially, economically and politically. Just like them, the Benedictines also are an Agricultural Society. They teach in their schools how land is to be cultivated scientifically and make a piece of land yield more produce than it used to do previously. It is by means of these three Societies of men that France was transformed. When there is unemployment running riot in every country of Europe, and when England with all its vast resources is unable to solve the problem of unemployment, France has no such trouble. Why? Because it was made into an agricultural country by these Christian Bodies, and has remained so mainly an agricultural country. ....My suggestion is, that we should urge our Christian Brethren, that these Societies be introduced into India and, with the help of Government, given undeveloped lands, not in one Province but in every Province where the Depressed Classes are found. They will start agricultural schools and agricultural farms and will work them with the help of the produce of their lands so as to impart free education. Free education all over India is what we need most. It will soon give us sufficient consciousness—political, social, and economic, as to oppose High Class Hindus and Mahomedans when they are out to strangle us into Nirvana.....These Christian Orders with their resources and the vast storage of knowledge of agriculture, scientific or otherwise, will develop our country-side and permit the Depressed Classes to settle on such lands. In the surrounding places the Government could be induced to grant forest and other lands exclusively to the Depressed Classes, and if feasible, with a proviso that the same be not alienated by sale or by mortgage to any of the Higher Classes. We will thus with one stroke solve our unemployment, our want of lands, our want of education, and get back the political power that we are deprived of."

It will be noticed that Mr. Nekaljay is studiously silent about the religious aspect of his suggestion which really amounts to this: that the Government should subsidise the Benedictines to convert the Depressed Classes by improving their economic condition. This is an old idea. Sir Valentine Chirol in his book on "Indian Discontent" wrote: "From the political point of view the conversion of so many millions of the population of India to the faith of their rulers would open up prospects of such moment that I need not expatiate on them." No doubt, Sir Valentine was thinking of conversion by Protestant Missions but he would not have objected to conversion by Benedictines. He had not also reckoned on the emergence of a Christian Nationalist party. Sir Valentine was a shrewd man but he, like most Englishmen, had no faith in the power of ideas, and nearly all his political forecasts have been falsified because of this vital defect.

As for the practical effect of conversion to Christianity as a means of economic uplift, there has been much misconception. As a matter of fact, it is next to nothing. In our news columns last week (p. 95), we quoted from a recent issue of the Indian Witness what Mr. V. V. Phillips said on the "Economic Condition of Indian Christians." We reproduce a few sentences: "The proletariat class to-day forms a larger per cent among the Christians than in any other community in India. The census and other reports show clearly that the most poor community relatively in India is the Christian community, although the most literate one."

We have scarcely any doubt that the European Benedictines will not fare differently from other exotics—the first crop or breed, luxuriant, the second sickly, the third extinct.

It is however, different with ideas. We agree with Mr. Nekaljay that the economic salvation of the Indian masses lies in agriculture. Even England finds that the surest cure for unemployment lies in return to the land. Here, fortunately, the question is simpler. It is largely to keep the people on the land. Mr. Nekaljay will be able to effect this better for his own community by co-operating with other Indian agencies which have the same end in view.

Religious apostasy as a means of economic uplift is a snare and a delusion.

KARMA, THE COSMIC LAW.

Before beginning, and without an end,
As space eternal and as surety sure,
Is fixed a power divine which moves to good,
Only its laws endure.

It maketh and unmaketh, mending all;
What it hath wrought is better than had been;
Slow grows the splendid pattern that it plans
Its wishful hands between.

This is its work upon the things ye see;
The unseen things are more; men's hearts and mind

The thoughts of peoples and their ways and wills,
Those, too, the great Law binds.

Unseen it helpeth ye with faithful hands,
Unheard it speaketh stronger than the storm.
Pity and love are man's because long stress
Moulded blind mass to form.

It will not be contemned of any one;
Who thwarts it loses, and who servear it gains,
The hidden good it pays with peace and bliss
The hidden ill with pains.

It seeth everywhere and marketh all:
Do right—it recompenseth 1 do one wrong—
The equal retribution must be made,
Though Dharma tarry long.

It knows not wrath nor pardon; utter-true
Its measures mete, its faultless balance weighs;
Times are as nought, tomorrow it will judge,
Or after many days.

By this the slayer's knife did stab himself;
The unjust judge hath lost his own defender;
The false tongue doom: its lie; the cringing thief
And spoiler rob, to render.

Such is the Law which moves to righteousness
Which none at last can turn aside or stay;
The heart of it is Love, the end of it
Is peace and consummation sweet. Obey!

EDWIN ARNOLD.

THE LATE MR. M. M. PIKLE.

(CONTRIBUTED.)

It is with great regret that one has to announce the death of Mr. Marta Mangesh Pikle, which took place a few days ago at Karwar. He lived most of his life at his native-place Ankola, a taluka-town to the south of Karwar. At the time of his death he was only about 38 years of age. Born in a family of small means, the deceased had to overcome many difficulties in educating himself at school and college. He paid his way through the University by taking up tuition work in the intervals between terms, etc. and at last graduated B. A. from the Wilson College in Bombay about 1918. Taking to service for about four years in the Oriental Translator's Office in that city, where his health failed, he returned to his native-place, hoping to recoup it. But phthisis had already made an insidious lodgment in his constitution. He bravely struggled on, however. He took private classes at home, and in his spare time contributed many an article and letter to the press, vernacular as well as English. His contributions to the Reformer, which appeared off and on from 1921 to about the end of 1926 in his own name or otherwise, on various topics—social, political and educational—were marked by great feeling and insight as well as beauty of expression. In one of these articles, I remember, Mr. Pikle entered a strong and well-reasoned protest against one of the late Chitta-Ranjan Das's utterances (then recent) in which the debilitating suggestion had occurred that the Non-violence of our Nationalists was practically a virtue of necessity.

He stuck to his post in his own native-place till about four months ago, when his health having completely broken down, he had to be brought to Karwar for care and treatment by his brother-in-law who lives in this latter town. His pen was at the free service of all sorts of persons seeking redress of their grievances, either through the press or through petitions made to the authorities, and also employed the drafting of appeals, notices, etc., in his town's local politics. On the very few occasions on which the present writer came into personal contact with Mr. Pikle, he was struck by the extremely cheerful disposition he maintained in spite of his narrow circumstances at home and the disease which held him in its fell grip. He never married, but leaves behind him his aged parents, five brothers and sisters, a few friends and a large number of admirers. May Mr. Pikle's memory be an inspiration to social workers in his own district and outside! Let all who would be 'true Brahmans' cherish the memory of one who was not merely a 'born-Brahman', but a 'true Brahman,'—who lived a life of service, albeit so brief, despite a suffering body.

MARATHI AND KANNADA.

It may interest lovers of Marathi literature to learn that the deceased came of the same family as the poet Shubhanand or Subhanant, whose real name was Subha Anant Pikale. Shubhanand who was nearly a contemporary of Shridhar (18th century) may be called the southernmost of Marathi poets, at any rate of the pre-British times; for this poet, too, we know, belonged to Ankola, in what is now the North Kanara district. By the way, the fact is highly significant as an instance of the linguistic vicissitudes of localities due to 'political accidents,' that while this town of Ankola, which now belongs to a district whose population is predominantly Kannada (Kanarese) in language, once (in pre-British days) produced a Marathi poet of highly appreciated merit, it now boasts of another, a rising Kannada poet—a young man at college in Mysore, by name Dinkar Desai, who having been nurtured in the Governmental school system in which mostly Kannada is taught as the recognised vernacular of the district, has taken to that tongue as the vehicle of his literary expression, although it does not happen to be his mother tongue. Of this bit of past and contemporary history I venture to make a present to those Kannadigas (Karnatak-wallas) who are so loudly lamenting (though not quite without cause) the process of their beloved Kanada province being 'cut up and swallowed' by their neighbours, the Marathas on one side, and the Andhras on another.

THE BLIND RELIEF ASSOCIATION.

The following is the report of the work of the Blind Relief Association for the year 1929:—

This Association was established in 1919, registered under Act XXI of 1860 and is the oldest institution of its kind in this Presidency.

It has branch centres at Bulsar, Surat, Anand, Chalisgaon and Bijapur and upto the end of 1929 no less than 3,43,778 eye cases were treated free medically and 80,337 surgically, under its auspices, besides 3,10,387 eye patients treated in villages by field workers in house to house visits making up a total of 7,34,502 in all. In addition to this 2,989 spectacles were supplied free to poor eye sufferers and the eyes of 39,515 school children as well as of 83,487 new-born babies were examined and treated where necessary. So much for the good of the curable blind.

To help the incurable blind the Association has, working under its auspices, the N. S. D. Industrial Home for the Blind (at 3rd Kumbharwada, Northbrook Street) the Happy Home for the Blind and recently to those has been added, the newly established Bhavnagar School and Home for the Blind with H. E. the Maharaja of Bhavnagar as its Patron (that State guaranteeing half the annual running expenses of the Institution at Bhavnagar).

During the year Rs. 12,251-6-0 were received as donations, etc., whereas the expense amounted to Rs. 12,773-1-11. Their Excellencies the Viceroy and the Governor of Bombay as well as His Highness the Maharaja Sahib of Bhavnagar were the distinguished Donors of the year. Amongst the Chief and important contributors of the Association are Seth Gordhandas Soonderdas Charities, Sir Ratan Tata Charities, the N. M. Wadia Charities, Khan Bahadur Dhanjiboy Ratanji Bulsara, the Patel Brothers of Surat and others.

The Report of 60 pages is interesting and can be had free from the Secretaries, Kalbadevi Road, Bombay. 2.

WOMEN PRISONERS IN GERMANY.

(By Miss E. C. GEDGE.)

Through the courtesy of the authorities I was given permission to visit Women's Prisons in Germany, and I was taken over two of the largest German prisons in different parts of the country.

The two institutions which I visited were divided sectionally into a 'Zucht Haus' (House of Correction) where long sentences are served and a 'Gefangnis' (Prison) where the ordinary short sentence people are kept, the larger of the two prisons contained 112 women who were serving long sentences and 240 who were in ordinary prison for short sentences. There were also a few political prisoners who were given special privileges and twenty or more young girls were kept in a special wing of the prison and never allowed to mix with the other prisoners. I asked especially about juvenile cases of crime and was told that there is a special prison for young offenders at Whittlich an der Mosel.

My guide in each case was a woman, the first being a wardress of a very superior type and the second a well qualified teacher whose special department was the education of the prisoners as apart from the technical instruction in handicrafts which they receive from specially qualified teachers. We saw roomfuls of women being taught knitting, sewing, fine embroidery, carpet making, paper-bag folding and toy making. Some of the work, notably the carpets and fine embroidery, reached a high standard of excellence. The women seemed thoroughly interested in what they were doing and the teachers' attitude towards the prisoners was both friendly and encouraging. The prisoners spoke very naturally about their work when questioned and many of them looked very intelligent and there were some fine faces amongst them. I found that in the workrooms I almost forgot that I was in a prison.

I was told that considerable care has to be taken in choosing employment for prisoners as trades are very jealous in these days of unemployment of competition from prison industries where labour can be obtained at so little cost. Other work done by the prisoners comprised all the house work and house cleaning, cooking for the whole establishment in well equipped kitchens, baking bread, laundry and gardening in about 25 acres of land where all vegetables and fruit are grown for an establishment of between three and four hundred people. For the most part the prisoners remain attached to the same section of work and are seldom transferred to another department, a system which one felt might be more efficient but lacked somewhat in change and elasticity. This and the fact that outside teachers of a voluntary type were not usually used struck me as the weakest points in this excellent organisation.

Prisoners are allowed a share in the profits of what they produce and can earn, at the highest, up to about Mks 15 a month. This money is held for them by the authorities and once in a few weeks a merchant comes with things for sale which they may buy. There are three grades of prisoners increasing in privileges as a reward for good behaviour. With few exceptions prisoners are housed in single rooms under modern prison conditions and these rooms have a window, chair, table, cupboard, bed with a good mattress and eating and drinking and washing and lavatory utensils. In the second and third grades they are given special privileges, for example a woman in grade I receives a quarter of the value for which her work is sold, whilst in the second and third grade she receives at least a half and sometimes three-quarters of the profit. Very few are promoted to the third grade, but if they should attain to this privilege they are encouraged to make their rooms look pretty with curtains and table cloths, lampshades, pictures etc. Occasional-ly they are even allowed to don ordinary non-prison clothes and are taken for a walk by the head teacher who seemed to have no fear of their trying to run away. Food which was ample and simple is ladled out of enormous vessels into large cans and taken up to the corridors on to which the cells all open and served individually to each prisoner whose utensils are inside her cell.

The two prisons I visited were each built with central passages running up to the height of the roof with a large window at one end. On either side of the centre passage were corridors built of iron work, one corridor for each store and on to these corridors opened the individual cells. In the newest prison four great sections each lit by an enormous window converged on to a central hall and here at the first floor level sat a wardress with a desk before her on which were telephones and light signals. From this one desk day and night a wardress can control all the lights in the four huge wings. Should an alarm be sounded, she knows at once which room is affected and she can see at a glance if a prisoner has rung an alarm bell, for, when this happens a red sign is shown outside the cell.

We were shown a fine hospital wing with a nurse and doctor in charge but were told that these were not overmuch used owing to the very healthy conditions of work and housing. Indeed I felt that many of these women were living in better surroundings than would be theirs normally, especially in days of prevalent unemployment but then they have not their freedom.

Each of the prisons I visited had its chapels, and clergymen of the Catholic and reformed churches were in charge and a deaconess visited in the cells of prisoners and got to know them individually, thus helping the staff. The library in one of the prisons contained 5000 volumes, all of which were carefully graded for the use of the inmates.

Prisoners are allowed to have an increasing number of books as they rise in conduct and are given facilities for writing. There was one bookcase wherein were English, French and Italian books and by chance I pulled out a copy of 'Paradise Lost.'

After visiting all departments of this enormous institution, a tour which took nearly three hours to complete and after seeing the recreational side of life as represented by an excellent gymnasium and a singing class where the wardress joined with the head teacher in an enthusiastic attempt to teach the girls really beautiful singing, I came back to the entrance half feeling that there was substantial ground for hoping that many of the prisoners would find their 'Paradise Regained' and leave the prison as well equipped and decent members of society. At any rate the staffs of the two prisons which I visited were full of initiative and kindness and possessed with that thoroughness which is so characteristic of the German mentality.

I believe that an efficient system of after-care which combine the different agencies such as Church and welfare centres with the state organisation follow the prisoner as she goes forth to face the world again, a free woman, and seeks in every possible way to help her to obtain work and to turn into a useful citizen.

IN THE LIGHT OF THE CROSS.

WHO HATH EARS TO HEAR LET HIM HEAR.

In the national struggle between England on the one hand and India on the other, it is but clear that the interest involved is on the basic principle of patriotism. Britishers are exploiting India evidently to enrich their own countrymen and so to say their own country. When they say that they are not doing so but, on the contrary, they hold that they rule India in the interest of the Indians in general and in the interest of the minorities and the depressed classes in particular, these assertions appear point-blank in the light of "Ye are the light of the world" for they have been taught righteously enough,—“Render therefore unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's.” The English is a Christian nation; at least they (their religion is not simply idealistic but practical,—“Take up thy cross and follow me”) should set an example of a living faith in their Master who, in bearing witness to the truth allowed himself voluntarily to be crucified, leaving the Kingdom of Heaven in the hands of but a few selected and even they were from the common walk of life. The British Government should not count upon itself as the sole distributor of all good; it is God's only. We know “If these should hold their peace, the stones would immediately cry out,” and still more do we know “The things which are impossible with men are possible with God.”

Moreover, The British Government seems to be self-imposed, righteous after the manner of Prophet Elijah, who in reply to 'a still small voice' said, “and I, even I only, am left; and they seek my life, to take it away,” but he was made known then and there of God's secret that he (Elijah) was not the only soul left as he thought but “I have left me seven thousand.” Just imagine the wonderful works of God!

In this incident we have another lesson,—when I was reading the account of the terrible disaster of R101, the moment I glanced at the reply of Lord Thompson, “with a laugh 'No prophecy'”, someone being caused to fly swiftly touched me saying, “There is a prophecy”:

“And a great and strong wind rent the mountains, and brake in piece the rocks before the Lord; but the Lord was not in the wind: and after the wind an earthquake; but the Lord was not in the earthquake: And after the earthquake a fire; but the Lord was not in the fire: and after the fire a still small voice. And it was so, when Elijah heard it that he wrapped his face in his mantle, and went out, and stood in the entering in of the cave. And, behold, there came a voice unto him, and said, What doest thou here, Elijah?”

In the like manner, at the time of the mentioned disaster “A terrific wind was blowing”; but the Lord was not in the terrific wind: and after the terrific wind “the roaring of engines, crash and series of explosions shook houses four miles from the scene of the accident to their foundation”; but the Lord was not in the roar, crash and explosions: and after the roaring and crashing and explosions “a mass of flames roaring like furnace”; but the Lord was not in the mass of flames: and after the mass of flames there comes “a still small voice” saying, “What doest thou here, Britain?”

“All the churches shall know that I am he which searcheth the reins and hearts: and I will give unto every one of you according to your works.”

Christ says: I am the truth. To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth. Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice. Therefore, more appropriately in the words of the scriptures let it be humbly said about the people of India, to the British Government, with regard to its present policy of repression and violence: Refrain from these men, and let them alone: for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to nought: But if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it; lest haply ye be found even to fight against God.

Consequently it is the duty of the British Government that they rule India, not forgetting the word of the Lord, saying, not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit. Now the Lord is that spirit: And where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.

PREM MASIH.

(Jaipur, Rajputana).

The Salt Enquiry Committee:—The Committee appointed by the Government of India composed of Sir Chunilal V. Mehta, K.C.S.I., and Mr. O. H. Pitt, to enquire into the question of increasing the sources of supply of salt in India so that the requirements of the Calcutta Market can be supplied, will be taking oral evidence in Bombay from the 24th of October till the 31st of October, 1930. A short questionnaire has been prepared and persons interested are requested to refer to the Secretary—Mr. K. G. Jacob, K.A., Town Hall, Bombay, if they wish to place their views before the Committee or to obtain a copy of the questionnaire. Reference to the Secretary should be made as soon as possible as the time is limited.

'TOLERANCE' II.

EQUALITY OF RELIGIONS.

This subject is so important, that I will dwell upon it a little longer. My meaning will perhaps become clearer, if I describe here some of my experiences. In Phoenix we had our daily prayers in the same way as in Sabarmati, and Musalmans as well as Christians attended them along with Hindus. The late Sheth Rustomji or his children too frequented the prayer meetings. Rustomji Sheth very much liked the Gujarati bhajan, 'mane vhalun' etc, 'Dear, dear to me is the name of Rama.' If my memory serves me right, Magaulal or Kashi was once leading us in singing this hymn. Rustomji Sheth exclaimed in glee, "Say name of Hormazd instead of name of Rama." His suggestion was readily taken up then, and later on whenever the Sheth was present, and sometimes even when he was not, we put in the name of Hormazd in place of Ramanama. The late Husen, son of the late Daud Sheth often lived at the Phoenix Ashram and enthusiastically joined our prayers. To the accompaniment of an organ he used to sing in a very sweet voice the song 'Ye bahare bagh' etc.—'the garden of this world has only a momentary bloom.' He taught us all this song which we also sang at prayers. Its inclusion in our Bhajanavali is, a tribute to truth-loving Husen's memory, I have never met a young man who practised Truth more devotedly than Husen did. Joseph Royeppen often came to Phoenix. He was a Christian and his favourite hymn was 'Vaishnava jana etc,' 'he is a Vaishnava (servant of the Lord), who succours people in distress.' He loved music and once sang this hymn, saying 'Christian' in place of 'Vaishnava.' The others accepted his reading with alacrity, and I observed that this filled his heart with joy.

When I was turning over the pages of the sacred books of different faiths for my own satisfaction, I became familiar sufficiently for my purpose with Christianity, Islam, Zoroastrianism, Judaism and Hinduism. In reading those texts I can say that I was equiminded towards all these faiths, although perhaps I was not then conscious of it. Refreshing my memory of those days, I do not find I ever had the slightest desire to criticise any of those religions, but read each sacred book in a spirit of reverence and found the same fundamental morality in each. Some things I did not understand then, and do not understand even now but experience has taught me that it is a mistake hastily to imagine that any thing that we can not understand is necessarily wrong. Some things which I did not understand at first have since become as clear as day light. Equimindedness helps us to solve many difficulties, and even when we find fault with anything, we express ourselves with a humility and courtesy which leave no sting behind them.

This and the short essay on the same subject which we reproduced last week were contributed by Mahatma Gandhi to Young India.

One difficulty perhaps remains there still. As I said last time, the distinction between religion and irreligion remains here undisturbed, and we do not propose to cultivate toleration for irreligion. That being so, some one might object, that there would be no room left for equimindedness if every one took his own decision as to what was religion and what was irreligion. There is a possibility of this decision being incorrect. But if we follow the law of love, we will not bear any hatred; for even when we find some one practising what we think is irreligion, we shall continue to love him, and therefore either we will bring him to see the error of his ways, or he will point out our error, or each will tolerate the other's difference of opinion. The other party may not observe the law of love and may be violent to us, but if we cherish real love for him, there is no doubt that our sweetness will overcome his bitterness in the end. All obstacles in our path will vanish if only we observe the golden rule that even for the faults of others we must not inflict suffering upon them but must suffer in our own person.

CHRISTIAN ATTITUDE TO SATYAGRAHA.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I would like to draw attention to a mistaken idea that is gaining ground in India, that is, that the Christian world in general regards the Satyagraha movement as imbued with the Spirit of Christ.

The case is emphatically the contrary. The fact that Mahatma Gandhi chose the anniversary of the "Massacre" of Jalianwalla Bagh as the date on which to set forth upon his campaign, relying upon the feelings called forth by the memory of that event (needless to point out, not of a Christian nature) to inspire his followers, and that, though qualifying it, he sedulously preached a gospel of hate, with the inevitable results—opened the eyes of thinking people to see, that whatever other virtues the movement may possess, they are not Christian.

A certain number of sincere Christian people there are who are misled, either by being ill-informed, or who have fallen unreasonably under the spell of the Mahatma's personality.

Indian Merchants and Round Table Conference.—The committee of the Federation of the Indian Chambers of Commerce has rejected the suggestion of Lala Sraeram, President of the federation for the revision of the May resolution favouring complete boycott of the Round Table Conference by the Federation. The Committee by an over-whelming majority re-affirmed the boycott resolution, and has barred the members of the Federation from attending the conference even in their private capacities.

MR. SUBHAS BOSE ON CASTE-SYSTEM.

The Jat-Pat Torak Mandal has received the following message from Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose :—

I am a firm believer in the abolition of caste, and have already been doing propaganda in my own way in this behalf. The birth of New India presupposes a new society based on the principles of equality and justice. As in the other matters so also in social matters, I am a whole hogger, I have nothing in common with that mentality which condemns untouchability and at the same time disapproves of inter-dinning and inter-caste marriages. If we are one, there cannot be any barriers between man and man.

The principle on which the caste system was based cannot apply to modern India. Today it is no longer possible to reserve for one section of the community the privileges of bearing arms and undertaking the task of fighting. Similarly it is not possible to reserve for another section the privileges of learning. Neither is it possible to confine trade and commerce to a third section of our community. Modern India demands that every individual should have all facilities for acquiring education and wisdom for being initiated into the art of fighting and for earning one's livelihood by independent means. The keystone in our caste system, viz., division of function, cannot therefore apply to present-day conditions, and the sooner we recognise this act the better for ourselves and our country.

Communities like the Arya Samaj and the Brahmo Samaj have been doing valuable work in abolishing caste, but what we today require is the conversion of the orthodox section of the Hindu society to this new faith. In the task of converting the orthodox society, Arya Samaj and Brahmo Samaj may not be able to do much. Members of the orthodox section must themselves come forward to convert their own community.

From the anthropological point of view, I believe that inter-caste and inter-provincial marriages will bring about a fusion of blood, which will impart a new stimulus and a new vitality to our race and to our civilization.

Therefore from every point of view, the abolition of caste is an urgent necessity, and I therefore heartily commend the valuable services rendered by the Jat-Pat Torak Mandal, Lahore, and any other similar association. I hope and pray that their efforts will be crowned with success and they will be able to bring into existence a new race and a new society which will form the basis of a Free India.

THE MIRAJ SANATORIUM.

Sir William Wanless, Kt., M.D., F.A.C.S., the famous Miraj Surgeon who retired in 1928 from service in this country, is returning to India for a short period for the special purpose of launching the Union Tuberculosis Sanatorium located near Miraj. He is arriving on the S. S. City of Harvard due in Bombay on the 11th October. For a number of years before he retired Sir William was deeply oppressed by the thought of the sadly inadequate facilities in Western India for combating the growing scourge of Tuberculosis and he gave much time and effort to securing increased provision for this large class of sufferers. A fine site of 104 acres has been obtained two miles from Miraj, a good water supply secured, and considerable progress has been made on the erection of the buildings necessary for a Sanatorium. Those responsible for carrying on the enterprise after Sir William retired have named the institution "The Sir William Wanless Union Tuberculosis Sanatorium," as a memorial to this great servant of India on the suggestion of His Excellency the former Governor of Bombay, Sir Leslie Wilson, who himself gave a donation of one thousand rupees.

Depressed financial conditions have hindered the development of the scheme and Sir William is returning now to put his shoulder to the wheel of this undertaking. It is earnestly hoped that many who have been helped by him in the past may be ready to strengthen his hands in this great enterprise on behalf of India. How deserving is Sir William of India's co-operation will be realised when it is borne in mind that during his career as a surgeon William Wanless performed not less than 96,000 operations on all classes of people of India.

Early in September the Union Committee responsible for this great enterprise met to receive the Report of The Sir William Wanless Union Tuberculosis Sanatorium Committee. This report also gave, inter alia, the following facts: "With the large site of 104 acres paid for; With an abundant supply of good water; with the excellent start made on the necessary buildings; with a medical Superintendent, a Nursing Superintendent, and an Assistant Physician who have all had special training for their work in Tuberculosis; and now with the assured leadership of Sir William Wanless for a time in the task of completing the buildings and starting the actual work of the Sanatorium; we feel that the institution is in a position to plead for the further co-operation of all classes of people in Western India, co-operation which is so indispensable for the growth of the Sanatorium and for the continued development of the campaign against this great scourge."

The financial report for the scheme up to September 4th, 1930, showed receipts amounting to Rs. 73,320-10-7 and expenditure amounting to Rs. 73,219-5-3, leaving a small balance in hand of Rs. 101-5-4.

Every lover of India needs to take to heart the gravity of India's Tuberculosis problem. A recent Monthly Bulletin of Health for the City of Bombay mentioned six great scourges: Cholera, Plague, Small-pox, Typhoid Fever, Malaria and Influenza. These all combined carried off only one half as many people during the month as Tuberculosis. This is typical; the figures for the last ten years show that Tuberculosis took off more people than all these diseases together.

Certain social and economic changes in India which may be looked upon as marks of progress for the country are, alas! contributing to the spread of this disease. This is markedly true of the great industrial centres of India which are drawing thousands from the rural areas who live for a few months of the year exposed to the heavy infection on the crowded cities and then return to the villages to scatter the newly gathered seeds of disease. The rapid development of motor and bus traffic is carrying thousands of villagers into the crowded cities who formerly lived more securely in their smaller groups, while the educated classes who are sending their youth in such increasing numbers to city schools and colleges are undoubtedly thereby opening the door for the transmission of this disease.

Dr. Fridodt-Moeller, the eminent head of the large Tuberculosis Sanatorium at Madanapalle in South India emphasizes a most important fact when he says. "The treatment for Tuberculosis does not consist in open-air treatment only. It is certainly not sufficient to tell the patient that he must live in the open air and take rest, in order to get rid of the disease. The Treatment consists of a special treatment carried out in the open air, which is quite a different thing." This is our problem, and it means that we need a "Madanapalle" for Western India. The Sanatorium at Madanapalle in South India in the ten years between 1915 to 1924 secured "positive results" in 72.5 per cent. of the patients treated, and 54.3 per cent. of the cases were living and well five years after their discharge. These are very significant figures when we consider the ravages among the untreated. That institution has now nearly 200 beds, full, as well as a waiting list at present of over 100 names. But the limits of its capacity and distance make it impossible for Madanapalle to do very much for Western India. Here in Western India there are Hospitals for the treatment of all sorts of other diseases in Bombay, Poona, Nasik, Ahmednagar, Vengurla, Miraj, Wai, Ahmedabad, Bulsar, etc. while practically nothing is done regarding the problem of this greatest of all scourges.

These are some of the facts that have led the Union Committee to send an urgent appeal to Sir William Wanless to come once more. The American doctors hesitated to give their permission to one who has reached Sir William's age to risk another journey to the orient with all the strain of such a task after his arrival. But Sir William is determined to take the risk. If, therefore, a doctor of such great skill has decided to forgo the rest he had so well earned, we are confident that the generous heart of India will respond to his appeal for help on behalf of India's own suffering people.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Sind Flood and Loot Relief:—Swami Sambuddhanda writes: The Ramakrishna Mission flood and loot relief works in Sind have, from its 5 centres (1) Nasirabad (Larkana) (2) Rustom-Khanpur (Shikarpur) (3) Rohri, (4) Ghotki, (5) Ubauro (Sukkur), distributed 109 mds 25 seers of wheat and rice, 853 pieces of new cloth and shirts, Rs. 25 cash to 1565 recipients of 645 families and 169 mds 20 seers of fodder to 339 cattle of 70 villages last week ending on the 27th September 1930, over and above more than 2,000 mds of food and fodder, 1631 pieces of new cloth in previous weeks. The present works require to be continued for some time more. The helpless looted families badly require some indispensable utensils for their daily use and also some blankets against the coming winter. Any contribution will be most thankfully received by:—

- (1) Sri Ramakrishna Ashram, Khar, Bombay.
- (2) R. K. Mission Relief camp, Sanatan Dharma Sabha, Shikarpur, and
- (3) Seth Manobhai Djongersey Joshi, Bombay Bazar, Karachi.

English Translation of the Koran:—Mr. Marmaduke Pickthall's translation of the Qur'an, begun in 1924, and finally revised last winter in Egypt with the assistance of Prof. M. A. Ghamrawi (M. Sc., London) and His Excellency Fued Salim Bey Al-Hijazi under the direction of the Sheykh al-Maraghi, former Rector of Al-Azhar University, will be published in London and New York this coming autumn by Messrs. Alfred A. Knopf, Ltd., at the price of eighteen shillings. It will be called "The Meaning of the Glorious Koran: an explanatory translation," this title being chosen in order to meet the objections of a section of the 'Ulama of Egypt to the title "The Qur'an," or "A translation of the Qur'an" the contention being, in the first place, that it is not the Qur'an, but a mere rendering, and in the second place that translation implies substitution; there is a fear that the translation might be used in place of the original in public worship. Arabic is the religious language of all Muslims, and the tie of a common language, which the Church of Rome has found so powerful, is needed by a religion which has no hierarchy and no priesthood. The title chosen makes it clear that the aim of the work is explanation only. It is the first translation of the Qur'an by an Englishman who is also a Muslim, and the first translation by a man of letters. For his commentary Mr. Pickthall has relied entirely on old Arabic sources, his general introduction being based on Ibn Hisham's biography of the Prophet, which contains the earliest accounts, with occasional references to the much later, more concise but more critical biography of Ibn Khaldun. Historical references are presented in a brief introduction to each Surah, thus reducing to a minimum the number of footnotes which interrupt the reading of the text.

NOTES.

Religion Without God:—The idea of religion without God which Professor Julian Huxley predicates as the basic religion of the future, is not new to India. Buddhism and Jainism do not postulate God and nevertheless both have been the means of evoking the spirit of reverence and devotion in a remarkable degree. His expectation that "no longer moulded by the idea of God they (religions) would be moulded by other concepts and would manifest a fresh evolution in new forms" may, therefore, be said to have been fulfilled in these two cases. It is a pity that Western thinkers, owing to their neglect of Indian and Eastern thought generally, are obliged to find through speculation what has been established by experience. It should be added, however, that though Buddhism and Jainism started without a God, they have both found it necessary to provide a substitute with nearly all the attributes of One, in response to the yearning of the human heart. It, therefore, seems that there is much force in the contention of Mr. Hooper, whose letter also we publish today, that God will not be denied, and that the time is not far distant when the prophet's words will be fulfilled.

Extension of Women's Franchise:—Professor Hari Charan Mukerji in an article which we publish makes some suggestions regarding the recommendations of the Simon Commission for the extension of women's franchise. The Commissioners were actuated by a desire to promote the growth of political consciousness in women at an early stage of constitutional development, but the means which they hit upon are not of the best. Besides the educational franchise which is to be extended to men and women alike, the Commission suggested that wives and widows of property-owners who are voters, might be made voters also. This, as Professor Mukerji points out, involves an invidious distinction in favour of property. There is no reason why the wife-or widow of an owner of property should have the vote while it is denied to the wife of an employee in an industrial or commercial firm or in the public service. Apart from that, a civil condition franchise is unsuitable to this country. In effect, it will, in the present state of society, merely mean two votes to a married man, or even three or four, if he has more wives than one. Where marriage is all but universal as in this country, this additional incentive to it is unnecessary and may prove harmful. It is conceivable that, in a keenly-contested election, parties may be tempted to swell the number of their supporters by launching a movement of mass marriages. Election marriages like war marriages may become a feature of our political activities. The Commissioners meant well but they were ignorant of Indian social life, and this grotesque proposal is the result of their well-meaning ignorance. We are utterly opposed to Professor Mukerji's idea of separate electorates for women or even for reservation of seats. They have acquitted themselves splendidly in all kinds of work entrusted to them in recent months, and suitable women candidates will have no difficulty in being returned to the legislatures by the general electorates. We are sure that Indian women themselves will reject the Professor's proposal to provide them with reserved seats and separate electorates.

The Separation of Sind:—We have been disinclined to see Sind separated from Bombay after its long connection with the Presidency. But after perusing the statement issued by the Director of Information on the recent floods and dacoities in Sind, we are decidedly of opinion that the separation will be beneficial in the interests both of Sind and the Presidency. It is a curiously detached statement—the verdict of an onlooker on a game in which he has only a sporting interest. There were floods in Sukkur. A dacoity followed. And the Director assures us: "This dacoity was the direct result of the floods!" If that be so, and since floods are said to be usual and necessary for rabi cultivation in Sukkur, should not Government make provision to prevent the floods from eventuating in dacoities? "Congress influence" is the King Charles' head of contemporary official explanations of all untoward happenings. It must be said to the credit of the Director that in this Note his references to it are just sufficient to satisfy the current convention. He blandly states that Congressmen being mostly Hindus, a rumour somehow got abroad that Government would appreciate their being looted by the Mahomedan peasantry and the latter was only too pleased to express their loyalty by looting their Hindu sowcars. "It is beyond question", the Director observes, "that for some time it was genuinely believed that the looting of Hindus was in accordance with the wishes of Government. Seeing that this theory was entirely at one with the inclinations of the average Mahomedan cultivator, it is not surprising that he took full advantage of it until he was made to realise that he was mistaken." In view of this nonchalant attitude of the Bombay Government, we seriously suggest to the Hindus of Sind that they stand to lose little by their sub-province being separated from this Presidency. The protection that they get is very little while, on the other hand, a responsible Moslem majority in Sind will be able, and will feel obliged, in its own interests to protect them more effectively.

The Conference and Prohibition:—We reproduce elsewhere the earnest plea of our missionary contemporary, the Indian Witness, that the question of Prohibition should be taken up at the Round Table Conference. The Indian delegation will, at the outset, press for a declaration that the conference is convened to frame a scheme of Swaraj for India with reservations in one or two subjects. Revenue and Finance are not among these. If this is conceded, the Conference will not have to deal with administrative details, and the reformed Government of India will be free to adopt its own policy in respect of Prohibition. We are sure that one of the first measures of the new Government will be to abolish the liquor traffic root and branch. If the British Government does not agree to the declaration, it is quite on the cards that there will be important withdrawals from the Indian delegation—so important, indeed, that those who remain behind will have little to do except seeing the sights of London during the days for which they are officially guests of the Government.

"Bombay: Today and Tomorrow."—This is the title of a neatly got-up volume of addresses delivered by citizens of Bombay on the invitation of the Rev. Dr. Maushardt at the "Nagpada Neighbourhood House" on topics intimately connected with the health, education and economic and social condition of the people of Bombay. These lectures were originally arranged under the name of "Building a Better city" but, as Dr. Manshardt says in his brief foreword, "the series raised more problems than it settled," and he wisely decided to change the title into "Bombay: Today and Tomorrow", leaving the day after tomorrow and all subsequent days to the care of those who will come after us. In fact, no one can express more than a tentative opinion on Bombay's problems which, like the Indus, are ever shifting their beds. Sir Frederick Sykes is known as a keen student of social questions and he appropriately presided at the first lecture of the series by the Municipal Commissioner on the "Municipality and the Citizen." His Excellency has written a suggestive introduction to this volume in the course of which he regrets that little has been done to study the history of Bombay in the way in which that of London, for instance, has been studied. The explanation, to our mind, seems to be that every one here is so busy making his own history that he has no time to think of Bombay as a whole. The historian must wait till the Improvement Trust, the Development Department and the other agencies have done their best or worst and have departed from the scene. To take a glaring instance which has rather shocked us. The Church Gate railway station was remodelled at great cost only two or three years ago to accommodate the electric train service. It is now being remodelled again to serve as the terminus of the local service. This is the way in which almost everything is being done in Bombay—hap-hazard, hand-to-mouth, no foresight, no imagination, no appreciation of stability. The loss in money is obvious but what is not equally obvious but more damaging is the psychological effect on the average citizen. We do not want to blame anyone though we are bound to say the Government have set the pace which others have followed. One of Sir Frederick's predecessors remarked to the present writer that he did not call it dispatch merely to pass a paper from one table to another. In Bombay, whether in the business or the official world, that is the only kind of dispatch favoured. Calm consideration is condemned as vacillation and "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof" is the motto of nine men out of ten. As regards the future of Bombay, Sir Frederick cherishes great hopes on the general principle that when winter comes, spring cannot be far behind. This is a question, however, which is not so very plain to our mind, having regard to the enormous change in world conditions, to which Bombay has done little to adjust itself, since its days of steady prosperity nearly a generation past.

Professor Dharmanand Kosambi:—The Subodh Patrika, the weekly organ of the Prarthana Samaj, calls attention to the excessive sentence—eighteen months' rigorous imprisonment—passed on Professor Dharmananda Kosambi by the Bandra Magistrate for being the head of the Vile Parle Satyagraha camp which has been declared an Unlawful Association under the Viceroy's latest Ordinance. Professor Kosambi is a practising Buddhist and distinguished Pali scholar whose services have been twice requisitioned by Harvard University in its Department of Oriental studies. He is one of the gentlest of men who had been drawn into the satyagraha movement from motives of pure compassion for the men and women who have suffered in the cause. The Bandra Magistrate either did not know anything of Professor Kosambi, which is not the Professor's fault, or if he knew, he was inexcusably indifferent to the considerations which should have moved every cultured man's respect, even if he had to punish him in his magisterial capacity. The case is one which should attract the attention of the higher authorities.

Pandit Jawharlal Nehru:—We commented briefly last week on some points in a speech which Pandit Jawharlal recently made in Allahabad. It was our intention to deal more fully with it in this week's Reformer. Meanwhile, however, the Pandit has been arrested and is being prosecuted for that speech. The time for further criticism of it is, therefore, past. If the Pandit had merely acquiesced in, without necessarily accepting, the Sapru-Jayakar terms, he would, as the principal Indian delegate, be sitting at the right hand of the Prince of Wales at His Royal Highness's forth-coming banquet to the Indian delegates to the Round Table Conference. He rejected them, and he finds Naini jail once again looming before him. Whatever one may think of his speech, one cannot but respect him for the choice, for it is certain that Pandit Jawharlal well knew the price of his rejection.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, OCTOBER 25, 1930.

ON THE EVE OF THE ROUND TABLE CONFERENCE.

The Round Table Conference will be held in London in about a fortnight. No pains are being spared to make it the grandest function of the season. The King-Emperor will open the Conference in one of the royal palaces. The heir to the Throne, will entertain the delegates to a great banquet. The Prime Minister, assisted by his principal colleagues, and the leaders of the other political parties will collectively represent at the Conference the British point of view. The Indian point of view will be similarly represented by the princes, ladies and gentlemen whom the Viceroy has selected for the purpose. There will be journalists from all parts of the world who will see to it that the Conference does not lack publicity.

Congressmen will be conspicuous by their absence, their leaders having decided that they can better serve the country by courting imprisonment than by attending the Conference. This, it has been said, is a great drawback but it need not be so. The Indian delegates at least can not forget that there is a Congress party which Lord Irwin's ninth Ordinance has scotched perhaps, but certainly not killed. It may, indeed, be that Congressmen by their absence can better influence the proceedings than by their presence. We had ourselves suggested not that Congressmen should attend the Conference but that they should suspend civil disobedience during its sittings on being released from prison. We still think that this should be done. The invocation of His Majesty's assistance to inaugurate the Conference raises expectations which, if fulfilled, may bring about a magical change in the situation. If the King's appearance is intended merely as a formality, a great opportunity will be missed for paving the way to peace and goodwill. It will be unfair to His Majesty to put him forward as an ornamental figurehead.

Those who attend the Conference are not necessarily less patriotic than those who have preferred to remain behind, whether in prison or outside. Some of the Indian delegates are attending the Conference most reluctantly and as a matter of duty. They know well that, if the Conference result satisfactorily, it will be largely due to the man who is interned in Yerravda and his followers who in their thousands are bearing the brunt of repression in the motherland. Mahatma Gandhi and his colleagues, we may be sure, will not reject an honourable settlement merely because they themselves did not attend the Conference. If nothing comes of the Conference, it will still be a gain in as much as several who are attending it as a last chance, will join the Congress and strengthen its ranks. Both Congressmen and non-Congressmen, therefore, can honestly join in wishing success to the Conference.

The situation in this country has been aggravated by Lord Irwin's Ordinances and more particularly by the last one. His Excellency perhaps thought that by killing the Congress he would relieve the Indian delegates of an embarrassing phantom. As a matter of fact, the Ordinance has not killed the Congress party. It has disorganised it, it is true, but this is no advantage to the other parties nor even to the Government. The delegates, already weighted with the sense of undertaking an unpopular duty, have to bear the added odium of having instigated this sweeping Ordinance aimed at their political adversary. As for Government, it is surely easier for it to deal with organised than with diffused discontent. The Ordinance is already proving unworkable. A new Congress House was announced to be opened last week in Bombay. A name board was put up and a flag. The Police raided the place only to find a box of old shoes in the room. A Congress worker is arrested and a ginning mill of which he is manager is attached. The mill, it transpires, is the property of Sir Pheroze Sethna, President of the Liberal Federation, and a delegate to the Round Table Conference! Many houses in Mandvi and Bhuleshwar, it was reported, had boards bearing the words "Congress Committee's Office" on their doors. The Police, interpreting the Ordinance in their own way, arrested a number of Prabhat Feries which go about singing national songs. The Magistrate pointed out that the Feries were not declared to be unlawful bodies and acquitted the accused. Since then the Police have been dispersing by force some of these Feries on the ground presumably that they obstruct the traffic! Feries which consist of women and children have not been interfered with so far.

From the first, we have maintained that the present movement goes to the roots of national life, that its political phase is a symptom and that a policy of repression will only make matters worse. The almost total absence of the usual illuminations and fire-works on Divali day, is the best proof of our contention. The Divali is the great Indian Feast of Lights which has, perhaps, come down from pre-historic ages when the Aryans in their Arctic home celebrated their first glimpse of the sun at the end of the winter solstice which fell in October, the vernal equinox at the same period falling about Christmas day which, too, is the continuation of an ancient tradition. The only occasion when Divali is not celebrated in an Indian home is when there has been a death in the family during the previous twelve months. In 1899-1900 when a great famine and the bubonic plague lay over the land, Bombay carried out her customary illuminations though on a restricted scale. In 1918, the year of the influenza epidemic, when the cemetery at Sonapur could not cope with the dead who had to be cremated, Diwali was still observed in the city. But this time, there was no celebration not only in the great Indian markets, but even in the homes of the people. The women whose voice is decisive in all matters pertaining to household rites, and even the very children whose deafening crackers used to fill the air with acrid smoke for days before and after Diwali, abstained without a word from their cherished lights and sounds and sweets. New clothes which every household buys for Diwali were likewise eschewed. Another most striking event is that the Indian Foreign Piece-Goods merchants whom the local Anglo-Indian newspaper has been applauding for their supposed revolt against "the tyranny of the Congress" decided practically without dissent to keep their principal market closed for another month, in addition to the five months for which it had remained closed. Speaking of the local Anglo-Indian press, its services in the way of promoting an atmosphere of good will during these anxious days have been far from conspicuous.

Emergencies are bound to rise in every country and the Executive Government has to be entrusted with special powers to deal with them. But its success in coping with abnormal situations is strictly proportionate to the extent to which its emergency powers are exercised so as to attract the maximum moral support of the quiet and peace-loving section of the public which is everywhere the largest and in India more so than in any other country. Unfortunately, Lord Irwin in one of his speeches used words which seemed to condone, if not to justify a random use of force which harmed offenders and innocent alike, and the Police in several cases by their indiscriminate onslaughts have antagonised classes who normally are law-abiding. The use made of the Ordinances even more than the Ordinances themselves, have helped to swell the tide of discontent. So far from allaying discontent as Lord Irwin in the goodness of his heart expected his Ordinances to do, they have greatly aggravated it. We cannot at this stage think of any means which can so effectively soothe the sorely wounded spirits of the Indian people as a sympathetic pronouncement from the Sovereign announcing his resolve to admit India to the comity of his self-governing Dominions, proclaiming, as an earnest of his confidence in Indian leaders, an amnesty for non-violent political offences, and expressing his hope and desire that they should take their share in the deliberations for framing the future constitution of the country. The response to such a gracious gesture from His Majesty will be instantaneous.

WOMEN'S FRANCHISE AND MEMBERSHIP OF COUNCILS.

(BY PROFESSOR HARI CHARAN MUKERJI).

One of the intelligent suggestions of the Simon Report is as regards the proposed extension of franchise to the wives and widows of male voters, who are above 25 years of age. This in itself will create an invidious distinction in as much as many women, though equally intelligent and capable of exercising the vote, will be denied the coveted privilege. This anomaly will become all the more glaring in the case of the widows whose husbands were not voters. It does not at all stand to reason that simply because of the fact that a woman married a propertied or an educated man, she should enjoy the franchise; while her less fortunate sister though perhaps more clever and able to exercise the vote more intelligently, should be deprived of the privilege, because the ability to exercise the vote should be the criterion in extending the franchise. The remedy will be found in adult suffrage where all will be placed on the same level and no one will have any grievance. Moreover the suggestion that persons reading up to a certain class and holding a certificate to that effect will be eligible for the vote, is equally unfair because it will place under disability many who have prosecuted their studies at home but in no recognised institutions and therefore cannot produce a certificate. This disadvantage will be specially felt by the women in many provinces who on account of social customs or economic stress are not able to attend schools. The remedy lies in lowering the educational qualification as far as possible and in making education free up to that standard. These are some of the objections which can be urged against the Simon Commission's recommendations. But from another point of view this concession, however halting and inadequate it may be, appears to be quite illusory. First of all, women all over the world are very reluctant to reveal their actual age, the tendency being to minimise it as much as possible; secondly, there exists no adequate machinery at present specially in the rural areas for the registration of births. Women will be most unwilling to appear before a magistrate and make an affidavit as to their age. Nor will any appreciable portion of them be able to produce the matriculation or some similar certificate which will contain an authoritative statement of age. But the greatest difficulty which is likely to make this concession almost nugatory, lies in the fact that it will be nobody's business in particular to see to it that the names of women voters who come under this category are entered in the register. Knowing as we do the apathy and indifference of men in general to these questions and the active hostility of the more orthodox section who look askance at these modern innovations; we cannot expect them to take an active interest in these matters. The only solution seems to lie in the appointment of permanent officers charged with the duty of entering the names of all eligible females particularly if they happen to be widows and in compulsory registration by husbands of the names of their wives if they come within this category. These two suggestions if accepted are likely to result in much practical good.

But mere extension of the franchise by itself is not enough. Provision should be made in the constitution or the statutory rules under it for a certain minimum representation of women in the central and provincial legislatures. It is undeniable that the presence of women is indispensable when questions relating to women themselves or children are being discussed. The existing laws relating to the rights and privileges of women, the relations between the sexes, women's right of inheriting property, of securing divorce or legal separation in case of incompatibility of temper, guardianship of children, women and child labour in the factories and mines, juvenile crimes and punishments, require thorough overhauling, and the presence of women is necessary when these are discussed or put on the legislative anvil. Provision should be made in the constitution empowering the Governor or the Governor-General to nominate a certain number of women conversant with these questions when a bill dealing with any of these matters is introduced as there is similar provision of bringing in experts and co-opting them as members of the councils or the Assembly. But merely co-opting members on special occasions won't do. A vigilant watch ought to be continuously kept so long as the legislatures will be in session so that the case of the women will not go by default. This is only possible by making statutory provision for a certain percentage of women members in the council as has been recommended in the Central Committee's report. The Simon Commissioners dismiss the subject lightly on account of the practical difficulties of any such scheme. They also seem quite reluctant to recommend joint electorates with reservation of seats for women, for that seems to them to be the negation of representative government as in that case some women candidates will be returned by multiple-member constituencies even though they have come off only second best at the elections. But it is curious to contemplate that their democratic conscience did not at all prick them when they recommended separate communal electorates for the Muslims and reservation of seats in joint electorates for the Depressed classes. If they think that women are more advantageously placed than members of these communities and do not require statutory protection they have entirely failed to gain an insight into the present position of women. To refuse to concede to them extra privileges on the ostensible plea that they will have a fair field and no favour, is rather a hard line for them for, by no stretch of imagination can they be said to be on an equal footing with men either socially, economically or politically. The handicaps under which they suffer are as numerous as those of the depressed classes. Resort to nomination to adjust the deficiency as recommended in the Report will leave the door open for favouritism and will lead to the selection of women members who will be on the good books of the powers that be to the exclusion of really deserving candidates whose self-respect will not allow them to curry official favour or whose activities may have brought down on them official displeasure. This will once more be the negation of popular government.

A certain number of seats will have to be reserved in joint electorates as have been claimed by the various women's deputations which waited on the Commission. But in addition to this it will not at all be difficult tentatively for a period of 10 years to form women's constituencies in the big towns and cities. Voting should not be confined to women of any particular community, class or sect but the entire body of women on the register for that special constituency should vote for electing their own representative. At the end of the period when women have gained sufficient experience and have realised the advantage of exercising the vote there will be no necessity of these special constituencies or reservation of seats in joint electorates. Then they should vote with the men in the general constituencies but there will be a sufficient number of capable women candidates who will be able to hold their own in open competition with men. This suggested experiment will have the additional advantage of acting as a corrective to the prevailing malady of communalism which has infected the body politic and will re-establish cordial relationship between the women of the two major communities by throwing them much together and compelling them to depend on each other's votes and working for a common ideal. The success that has been attained by the Presidency League of Women in Bengal where members of the various communities, European and Indian, Hindus, Muslims and Parsis work together for the common good gives us ground for entertaining the hope that the experiment will be worth trying. The men of the different communities have refused to work together for the national cause. It now lies with women to give the right lead.

WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

A beautiful new building is being erected in Delhi for the Headquarters of the Women's Christian Temperance Union in India. This Union, which has branches in every civilised country in the world, was first formed in India in 1817, and was fully organised in 1893. Branches have been established in Assam, Bengal, Bombay, Central Provinces, Gujarat, Madras, Punjab, Rajputana, and the United Provinces, and are doing fine work for the promotion of total abstinence from alcoholic beverages, for child welfare, and for the spread of purity and nobility of character in social life.

The thirty-fourth Annual Convention of the United Provinces Union has recently been held in Agra, and had well-attended gatherings. Mrs. Satyavati Chitamber of Lucknow was in the Chair, and was elected President for the next year. Reports were read of work done in the U. P. and excellent lectures were given on child welfare and temperance instruction. Donations of Rs. 1,100 towards the cost of the new Headquarters building were promised, and a small presentation was made to the All India President, Miss Campbell, of 3, Commissioner Lane, Delhi, who is to return to America next year after forty-six years' service in India.

AN ENGLISH VIEW OF THE INDIAN SITUATION.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.
Sir,

I wish to bring to your notice the review from the "Times" of August 29th of Mr. Edward Thompson's (Poet, Novelist and Lecturer in Bengali at Oxford) book "The Reconstruction of India," as it represents a remarkably unbiassed attitude, very necessary at the present time.

In this occur the words "They (Indian Nationalists) refuse to understand that a great political change cannot be effected by a sudden mandate from without, independent of steady co-operation from within. Difficulties they surmount by closing their eyes to them." That is the trouble! Lovers of India, and her truest friends, who are no whit behind the children of the Motherland themselves in their desire for India's freedom, are looking on, almost in despair! When statesmanship above all things was necessary, diplomacy was thrown to the winds! Those who would have given sage counsel were either not on the spot, or were as "voices crying in the wilderness."

When there should be an understanding of the working of the democratic system of the British people, that is, Parliament, with whom they have to deal—a correct study and knowledge of the late troubles in Ireland, and Britain's conduct, a courageous facing of disagreeable facts, and the setting about to discover means to change those facts, instead of ignoring them, and acting as if they did not exist, what do we find?—an extraordinary ignorance of everything which ought to be known! Which lack of knowledge is accountable for the complete loss of faith in the honour and the good-will of the British people—the British Government. "Blind leaders of the blind." Credulous where they should be unbelieving, incredulous where they should believe. A complete lack of commonsense. Obscuring their vision with delusion of which the chief is that Civil Disobedience is non-violent.

Do not suppose for a moment that there is not the fullest sympathy with India's passionate desire for freedom, for, are not the terms Briton and love of freedom synonymous? Nor is there among the thinkers, any lack of appreciation of the lofty idealism and heroic qualities brought into action by the Movement, but the British public, as represented by the "plain man," is not able to grasp the subtlety of distinction between hatred of a system, and hatred of the individuals representing that system. It only seems quite clear to him that if the seeds of Hate are sown all over the country, a crop of hatred will spring up, and the usual results will follow. Moreover a method of warfare which uses no weapon, and does no violent act, but compels others to use force, and then lays all the blame of violence upon those others, does not appeal to them, or commend itself to the British sense of manliness or fair play. It is not "playing the game."

They say—as it inevitably results in creating anarchy, it matters not by what name it is called—for all practical purposes it is not non-violent.

Also it would be as well for the Nationalists to remember that a people who pride themselves on their love of justice, and are not cruel by nature, and have their self-respect, and can smart under a sense of injustice and misunderstanding, are deeply resentful of their Government being treated as if it were a bloodthirsty, tyrannous despotism!

With how much pain does one write of the other great delusion—that the Spirit of Our Lord Jesus is in the movement! If there were nothing else to prove the contrary, there is the fact that Mahatmaji chose the anniversary of the so-called "Massacre" of Jalianwala Bagh as the day on which to start forth upon his crusade! One asks: could the feelings roused up by the memory of that event, and counted upon to inspire the Satyagrahis to suffer and die, be those of Christian love and kindness towards the "enemy"?

Those good Christian people, and there are a certain number, who imagine the movement is imbued with the spirit of Christianity, are those only who are ill-informed, or those who have allowed themselves to fall unreasoningly under the spell of Mahatmaji's impelling personality.

One of the Indian leaders admitted that Lord Irwin was one of the best friends that India ever had. How nobly, with what depth of feeling! with what infinite patience! does he not plead! Why not trust him!

"STRAINING AT A GNAT."

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.
Sir,

Over a fortnight ago I read an account of a stir which has arisen in France due to a picture of a nude woman, "reclining on a couch" in a Spanish stamp. Some have suggested that a stamp art censor should be appointed, for a million children collect stamps, and these works of art may have a disturbing effect on them.

This prompts me to contemplate, when a mere picture can affect so seriously the mind of youngsters, what would be the effect of those nude-living pictures which they see daily in their life?

Of course a male youth of to-day views woman sexlessly because she is so obvious. A doctor sees his patient, and an artist his model, so every man sees every woman. Nothing is left to the imagination. Her arms are bare and her back has been seen down to below the waist line, her legs when she sits in the chair, are often visible to her thighs, her undulating body (what is left of it... covered) is outlined by jersey dresses.

She has ceased to be a mystery or a surprise. He knows that just as she looks in the dance room, she looks in bed, she has not even any hair to let down. But in the case of youngsters, it is otherwise.

Under the circumstances, would it not be advisable to appoint a dress censor to see that the women are properly dressed?

PROF. HUXLEY ON RELIGION.

Professor Julian S. Huxley delivered the Conway Memorial Lecture at Conway Hall. His subject was "Science, Religion, and Human Nature."

Sir Arthur Keith, who presided, said there was a point which the lecturer had to make which made a special appeal to him. Professor Huxley held that those who wished to make reason the guide of life could no longer afford to be mere breakers of images; if their way of thinking was to make progress in the world, they must set up as well as cast down.

Professor Huxley said that an enlightened humanism such as that of Moncreux Conway was the greatest need of the world to-day. Would that such vital souls and piercing intellects were with them to help in taking the dispute between science and religion a stage further towards adjustment. Half a century ago destruction was the prime necessity, but now the prime need was construction. The nineteenth century had shown, or so many of them believed, that a whole spawn of monstrous ideas about religion had no validity in themselves. Religion in the light of psychological and anthropological science was seen not as a divine revelation but as a function of human nature. What all kinds of religion had in common was a reaction of the human spirit to the facts of human destiny and the forces by which it was influenced and a reaction into which there entered a feeling of sacredness. The theistic edifice would no longer bear the weight of the universe as enlarged by recent science. God, in any but a purely philosophical, and one was almost tempted to say a "Pickwickian," sense, turned out to be a product of the human mind. As an independent or unitary being active in the affairs of the universe, he did not exist. But robbed of the outlet of deity the religious emotions would find other outlets; no longer moulded by the idea of God they would be moulded by other concepts and would manifest a fresh evolution into new forms.

Chief among the concepts which would mould this new evolution would be concepts of science. For knowledge was inevitably the most important raw material of theology. Speaking of the lines which reconstruction might be expected to take, he said the first ingredient of any religion congruous with science must be a reverent agnosticism concerning ultimates. There must be a break with any rigid or fixed authority in religion and a willingness to accept change.

The need would continue for some specifically religious system to organize the driving force of the specifically religious emotion. To think of the forces that moulded man's destiny in their totality in a spirit of reverence was a truly religious activity, more than ever necessary in a democratic society. Prayer in the sense of petitions for benefits might be meaningless, but in the sense of meditation guided by religious feeling it was psychologically reasonable and spiritually efficacious. The sense of grace, conversion, and mystical experience need not have the meanings which were attached to them by current theology; but to deny their existence as psychological facts was unscientific and to deny their value as spiritual experience was irreligious.

NEBULIZING GOD.

The Editor, the Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

A scribe writes in one of the magazines: "The God that used to hear my prayers is disappearing, is being nebulized out of existence by the Holmeses, and Amesess, and Millikans."

If this scribe were lachrymose and afflicted, we might have some sympathy for him. But it is quite evident that he does not lament the passing of his "God," and that he wants nothing at all to do with God. It is also evident that what he used to worship (if he ever did worship) was not God at all, but a mere god, or the shadow of a god. For what kind of god is he that can be "nebulized out of existence" by petty mortals like Holmes, and Ames, and Millikan? Evidently a mere god of straw.

Attacks against God are becoming cheap, monotonous, and wearisome. They lack the novelty they possessed a few years ago. In fact, they never possessed novelty, for centuries before the Christian era the Psalmist exclaimed: "Arise, O God, plead thine own cause, remember how the foolish man reproacheth thee daily. Forget not the voice of thine enemies, the tumult of those that rise up against thee increaseth continually." And again he says: "For, lo, thine enemies make a tumult, and they that hate thee have lifted up the head."

The time is not far distant when the prophet's words will be fulfilled. "The earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." In that purifying flood the rubbish and the stagnant pools of atheism, irreligion, and immorality shall be swept away. Say what one will, there is a power in pure religion that no earthly power can withstand. The world has felt that power before. It will feel it again.

CATHOLIC-PROTESTANT AMENITIES.

The Examiner, a Bombay Catholic journal of standing, writes:—"He (Dean Inge) goes on to make a statement which he certainly knows to be a lie: 'The Roman Church is strict in theory (on the subject of divorce), but decrees of nullity are granted to those who can pay for them.' When such statements are made in the non-Catholic press here, we can excuse the writer's ignorance; but Dean Inge is not an ignorant man; he is perfectly aware that the old calumny has been refuted again and again; and consequently we have no hesitation in describing this statement, both in what it says and in what it implies, as a malicious lie." It is lucky that the "gloomy Dean" is several thousands of miles away from Meadows Street.

THE ROUND TABLE AND PROHIBITION.

Our attention has been called to the fact that among the delegates to the Round Table Conference are certain outstanding advocates of Prohibition. These are found on both sides of the table, if a Round Table can have sides. And we do not mean to suggest that the London "Table" will have sides made up of any one group or groups pitted against other groups. We believe that as the discussions proceed, it will be discovered that the Table is not made up of sides but of points-of-view. And these points-of-view will vary from one question to another but they will not vary along any group or racial lines.

Will the question of Prohibition for India come before the Conference? If not why not? And if it is laid on the Table does any one think it will divide the delegates along racial or religious lines? Among the English delegates is Mr. Isaac Foot, referred to by a correspondent as "that great advocate of Prohibition for Britain and India." Among the Indian delegates are Dewan Bahadur Ramchandra Rao, the first President of the Prohibition League of India and Sir Parshottamdas Thakurdas, the present President of the League. And there are many other delegates who would surely favour making provisions for Prohibition to have every possible chance in the India of the new day.

We do not believe Prohibition in India can be achieved until public opinion becomes more insistent. But the surest way to bring the public mind to the place where it will insist on Prohibition, will be for a group of leaders, such as will make up the Round Table, to declare in clear terms that India demands Prohibition.

We believe that a majority of the delegates favour Prohibition. Probably, as usual, many might be tempted to veer a bit from a straight course on the plea that it would not be good politics at the present moment. To some minds that sort of thing is never good politics at the moment and unfortunately they always live in the present moment. But in addition to being the best thing that ever happened for India, a declaration for Prohibition would be the most effective politics the Round Table could possibly play. It would be meeting one of the most insistent demands of the Congress group and would be placing them in a position where they would be happy to lend whole-hearted support to that feature of the report at least.

We hope that the Prohibition advocates among the delegates will get together in putting up the case in such a way that it cannot fail to be one of the most definite and clear-cut recommendations to come from the Round Table Conference.—Indian Witness.

MAKING BROTHERHOOD REAL IN INDUSTRY.

That it is possible to conduct a successful business enterprise on a set of principles which sound as "idealistic" and "impractical" as the Sermon on the Mount has been demonstrated by the Columbia Conserve Company of Indianapolis.

Almost every progressive feature seems to have been incorporated in the plan of operation: a minimum wage; a "family wage" with 50 per cent. higher wages for heads of families and extra weekly allowances for each child up to the number of three; security of employment; no discharge except by the democratic council of the workers themselves; an all-the-year-round salary basis in place of the wage system; provision for sickness and old age.

The success of the plan has been achieved in the highly competitive and seasonal industry of canning soups.

The Company is managed by the workers themselves through a council, all being free to attend, participate in the discussions and vote. That the leadership of William P. Haggood, General Manager and with his brother's former owner of the concern, has meant much in the counsels of the company is acknowledged. The striking thing is that he has used his business ability and financial power not as a way of gain or continued power for himself, but wholly to educate his fellow workers and to share with them his knowledge of the principles of good management, as well as making it possible for them to acquire the ownership of the business.

Here are some of the points of view and conclusions of this company.

"We are believers in democracy, in the right of each human to participate in the important activities which mold his life, to make the laws which shall govern his conduct, or to delegate such power to others of his own choosing.

"It is our belief that in a democratic society not only is liberty fundamental to the existence of such a society, but that approximate equality of income is essential to the development of that fraternity without which democracy is a creed, and not a manner of living.

"Under the form of government which we have described, our business has increased in volume, in profits, and in standing with our customers.... Individually our incomes have increased, our education has been broadened by the social as well as by the business problems with which we deal, and most of us are happier than we should be in a less democratic society."

The Editor of the Indianapolis Times comments:

"Of course, it is crazy. Any business man can tell you it will fail.

"And then back of it are the twelve years of success, and the growing fervour and larger enthusiasm among those who manage themselves, and are demonstrating something new to industry."

Blessed are those who have an opportunity to work under the principle of industrial democracy which produces personality as well as economic goods and draws out the latent abilities and loyalties of men and women as they share in the good life of industrial brotherhood. Federal Council Bulletin, New York.

INTERNATIONAL CO-OPERATIVE WOMEN'S CONFERENCE.

Perfect summer weather greeted the many delegates and visitors who assembled on August 21 and 22 in Vienna's magnificent Konzerthaus for the Third Triennial Conference of the International Co-operative Women's Guild. Vienna sees many international gatherings, but none which has greater significance for the future than this assembly of working class mothers, gathered on this occasion from 20 countries and representing 23 different nationalities. In addition to the 287 delegates and fraternal delegates from the Co-operative Women's Movement, guests of honour were present not only from the International Co-operative Alliance, to which the International Women's Guild acts as an auxiliary, but also from the League of Nations, the International Labour Office and a number of international Alliances for Women's suffrage, the Women's International League, the War Resisters' International, the Women's Section of the Labour and Socialist International, while many of the national Co-operative Unions and Wholesale Societies were also represented.

The opening ceremony was simple. The President greeted those present in a few words of welcome and declared the Conference open; the Guild's Esperanto Song "La Patrino Internaciano" (The Mothers' International) was charmingly sung by the Vienna Co-operative Women's Choir, after which Mrs. Seidal on behalf of the Austrian Co-operative women welcomed the delegates to Vienna.

The President's inaugural address, which she read in German and English and briefly interpreted for the few French-speaking delegates, emphasised the insecurity, economic and political, which forever overshadows the lives of working women—poverty made worse by the burden of a vast war debt "which has its seat at every table and eats and drinks with the mothers and children"; the chaos of an economic system ruled and controlled by the few and in the interests of the few, where production swings from glut to dearth and the woman who buys is at the mercy of every exploiter. Only in the sphere of domestic economy have the people any control and this is the province of women who, united in the Co-operative Movement must use the slight economic power each possesses to create new economic conceptions and a new Social system. But the greatest task which confronts mothers is the struggle against armaments and war. Mothers, who give life, cannot allow the artificial destruction of life. The dangers of war are many—the claim of new peoples to self-determination, attempts to upset the unequal provisions of the peace treaties, the organisation in different states of armed bands which may lead to civil war. Whatever the cause, mothers stand against all war and demand complete disarmament by water, land and air. There are two things that all peoples desire—freedom and bread, and freedom means bread and bread means freedom. Co-operative women have power to achieve both.

The President of the International Co-operative Alliance, Mr. Vaino Tanner, then conveyed the greetings of the Alliance, supplemented the next day by an informal greeting from the General-Secretary, Mr. H. May. Both alluded to the good augury for the future of Co-operation of the growing interest of women throughout the world. Mr. Tanner expressed the hope that the women of the Movement would adhere steadfastly to the Co-operative principle of neutrality in politics and religion, and Mr. May that the International Guild and the Alliance might continue their happy relationship and go forward on parallel lines.

The formal business of the Conference occupied little time. There was singularly little discussion on the Report except from the Soviet delegation who raised their usual objection to association with the League of Nations and bourgeois organisations. The report was, however, carried by 68 votes to 22. As the old officers had been re-nominated unopposed no election took place, and proposals for the alteration of the rules were withdrawn by the Committee owing to an unforeseen difficulty which had arisen with the Soviet organisation.

The rest of the Conference was devoted to a discussion of the special reports on the 2 subjects "The Rights of Women in Co-operative Societies" and "Mothers of the Future", and to a resolution on "The Dangers and Prevention of War" submitted by the Soviet Women's Organisation with an Amendment put forward by the Committee and the Dutch Guild.

Two opposing points of view as to the best method of securing membership rights for women in the Movement were put forward by the two openers of this discussion, Mrs. Hardstaff of Scotland who advocated that every adult member of a family should be encouraged to become a co-operative shareholder in his or her own right, and Dr. Orsetti of Poland who preferred a system of dual membership by which both husband and wife would have voting rights on a single share. It was evident from the discussion that the feeling of the Conference was for admitting women in their own right, though the economic and legal obstacles in many countries were brought out, notably by Mme. Heymann, who moved the Committee's resolution and explained the difficult legal position in which women in Belgium found themselves when elected to administrative positions in their Societies. The Committee's resolution, while regarding "open membership" as the more democratic and ultimately desirable method also recognised the value of dual membership as a means of securing rights for women under present conditions and urged the need for reform of civil and economic conditions that militated against an equal status, was carried against a Russian amendment advocating the dual membership method and the abolition of any share or purchase qualification for the exercise of membership rights—a somewhat curious situation in view of Russia's own practice.

Whether the Mothers of the Future should find freedom from wage-earning through family allowances of freedom from household cares through communal services, called forth more discussion than any other subject. The question was introduced by Mrs. Necaskova of Czecho-Slovakia who stood for the house-keeping women, and Mrs. Butanova, U. S. S. R., who upheld the case for wage-earning and communal services. It was notable that no speeches made supported the extreme view of the opener that the place of the mother was the home, though several took the view that means ought to be found of enabling her to stay at home if she wished, and the Committee's resolution urging further study of the whole question was eventually carried after 9 nations had voiced their opinion.

The discussion on the Dangers and Prevention of War was chiefly remarkable for the strength of feeling that, as the President had put it in her opening address, war is a crime against the givers of life, the mothers—and this was finely stressed by Mrs. Barton of England who made a stirring appeal for world disarmament in moving the Committee's amendment which was eventually carried in place of the U. S. S. R. Resolution.

The Conference closed with a vote of thanks to all who had made the Conference a success and particularly to the Austrian co-operators for their wonderful hospitality.

THE SATYAGRAHI.

He shall grow up before him as a tender plant and as a root out of a dry ground: he hath no form or comeliness, and when we shall see him, there is no beauty that we should desire him.

He is despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief, and we hid as it were our faces from him, he was despised, and we esteemed him not.

Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows. Yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted.

But he was wounded for our transgression, he was bruised for our iniquities, the chastisement of our peace was upon him and with his stripes we are healed.

All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all.

He was oppressed, and he was afflicted. Yet he opened not his mouth, he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers dumb, so he openeth not his mouth.

He was taken from prison and from judgment, and who shall declare his generation? For he was cut off out of the land of the living, for the transgression of my people was he stricken.

And he made his grave with the wicked, and with the rich in his death, because he had done no violence, neither was deceit in his mouth.—Isaiah.

INDIAN CHRISTIANS AND THE SARDA ACT.

The Indian Witness, a Christian missionary journal writes: "The Christians are without question in favour of the Law, but with them there is also a difficulty so far as the rural community is concerned. Recently there has been criticism directed at those in charge of rural Christian groups because more marriages have not been performed according to Christian rights. Those who know the situation have realized all along that one of the main difficulties has been that among the rural groups the custom of early marriage has been maintained, so that a Christian minister was not able to conduct these weddings according to the Christian Marriage Act. The rural Christian Church has in a great measure continued to be non-Christian in its marriage ceremonies because it insisted on marrying its children before they reached the age prescribed in the Christian Marriage Act.

This being the case the Sarada Act will be a great help in getting the rural Christian community to observe all the requirements of the Christian Marriage Act. A heavy responsibility is placed upon the pastors of rural Churches in the matter of thoroughly acquainting all Christians with the New Law. If we have been somewhat lax in not insisting on rural Christians observing the Christian Marriage Act we have absolutely no grounds at present for permitting Christians to marry, either according to Christian rights or otherwise, when the parties are below the present legal age. The Government in the United Provinces has called attention to the fact that some cases have been noted when Christian ministers have solemnized a marriage when the bridegroom was supposed to be below eighteen years of age, and when the bride was reputed to be under fourteen years of age. Christian ministers should all realize that to perform a wedding of this kind makes them liable to be prosecuted and punished for breaking the law. We have a very effective means at present of helping our rural Christian community get away from the evils of child marriage. There is no call for any compromise and certainly every Christian minister must satisfy himself absolutely that the contracting parties are of full legal age before he performs a marriage ceremony. These difficulties will continue to present themselves until popular opinion becomes enlightened and it is our duty to do our part in creating a uniform and popular support for the new marriage reform laws. Those in charge of congregations should make it a part of their immediate duties to see that all Christian ministers are both informed regarding the nature of the law and encouraged to help popularize it."

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Women in the League of Nations:—Countess Albert Apponyi, President of the National Council of Women of Hungary, was appointed Vice-President of the Assembly and President of the 5th Commission (Humanitarian Questions).

Mr. C. F. Andrews:—Mr. C. F. Andrews has been doing considerable literary work on behalf of India during the past several months. His book 'Mahatma Gandhi's Ideas' has been one of the best sellers in America and has nearly reached the third edition in England. The story of Mahatma Gandhi's life edited by Mr. Andrews came out in England on Sept. 22 and should have been published simultaneously in America. It is expected to have even greater circulation not only in English but also in other continental languages. In Germany both the books on Mahatma Gandhi are to be translated. They will possibly appear in October. They are being translated also in French and Dutch and probably Spanish. All the profits are going to the Pearson Memorial Hospital at Shantiniketan with Mahatma Gandhi's cordial approval. Mr. Andrews' book 'India and the Simon Report' has already reached the second edition and it may soon be translated. Taking into consideration the fact that Mr. Andrews' name is very well known all over the Continent and also in America the immense importance of Mr. Andrews' literary work can easily be realised. Mr. Andrews has now started for America and his address will be c/o Phelps Stokes Fund, 101, Park Avenue, New York City.

No More Devadasis in Cochin.—It is the practise for H. H. the Maharaja of Cochin to commence worship at the Sri Padmanatha Swami temple, the tutelary deity, (on return from his tour outside the State) on an auspicious day. And as Friday, October 3rd was considered auspicious H. H. began his worship on the 3rd. The usual Kanikka to the several deities were given. On Friday His Highness began his morning and evening worship of the Saraswathi Amman, brought specially from Padmanathapuram, the old, historic capital of the State. All the caste Hindu Officers, the Dewan included, were present at the evening function. The Vidwat Sabha and the music performances in connection therewith were conducted. One striking and conspicuous change in the whole function is the absence of the Devadasis who on former occasion used to accompany the Saraswathi Amman, dance, etc., before the deity on all the Navarathri days. The Devadasi system was recently abolished in all the temples of the State and hence they have no functions in the temples.

A Widow Marriage in Rajahmundry.—Under the auspices of the Rajahmundry Hithakarini Samaj, a widow-marriage was performed according to the Hindu rites in Anandasaram on Sunday the 5th instant at 10 in the night. The bride, Srimathi Lilavathi, has been an inmate of the Widows' Home and is now serving as a teacher on Rs. 20 per month in Board girls' school at Madhavaram, having finished the Elementary Lower grade training. The bride-groom Sriyuta C. S. Sangameswaram, is a representative of a Coffee company at Coimbatore and gets a monthly salary of Rs. 60. Both the bride and the bride-groom are brahmins and related to each other. It is noteworthy that the bride's mother has given her consent to the marriage. Arava Adinarayanamurti Garu, D. Narayanan Rao Garu, T. Viramma Garu, K. Dakshinammurti Garu, K. Kotamma Garu, B. Hanumayamma Garu, I. Vinkata Ratnamma Garu and others attended the marriage and blessed the new couple.

Dr. Besant and Sari:—Dr. Besant in the course of her review of the proscribed book "Must England lose India" writes:—I, who write, have had my home in India since 1893, living with Indians and as an Indian, accepting their diet, with its restrictions, wearing the dress of their women—at first only when in India, but later wearing it also in England. With the fashions now ruling in England—pretty enough for young women, tolerable for the middle aged, but repulsive for the old—I find the graceful and dignified sari, which is suitable with slight modifications for all ages, a very much more decent and dignified dress for an old woman like myself, than to walk about with skirts stopping at the knees, and shoulder-straps for sleeves.

World Prohibition Federation:—Simultaneously with the gatherings of the international Supreme Lodge of the Good Templars, the members of the World Prohibition Federation met at a luncheon-conference given in the Parliament House (Riksdag) Stockholm on Friday, July 25th, 1930. The following resolution was unanimously adopted and ordered to be sent to the British Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for India, and the Viceroy of India. "The World Prohibition Federation representing more than forty nations and states, learns through its Indian representatives that there is a general demand from the legislatures of almost every Province in India for the Prohibition of the Traffic in Intoxicating liquors, and that this demand is supported by an enormous majority of the people in every part of the country. So far, this demand has been resisted on account of financial difficulties which it is alleged would result if the liquor traffic were abolished. The Government of India has, therefore, vetoed the passing into law of this most important measure of social reform. It is, therefore, evident that the Government of India unfairly resists the overwhelming Indian opinion which favours abstinence and prohibition, and is failing to meet the wishes of the popularly elected representatives of the legislatures and other bodies. The World Prohibition Federation would urge upon the Government the speedy adoption of a law against the continuance of the traffic in intoxicating liquors which is undoubtedly a stumbling block in the way of peace and progress in India."

Gadag Swadeshi Exhibition:—A meeting of many representative citizens of Gadag was held on the 7th, and it was resolved to hold an All-India Swadeshi Industrial Exhibition at Gadag. The Gadag Betgeri Municipality has extended its patronage, and the Exhibition will be held under the auspices of the Municipality some time between the 10th and the 31st of December next, the exact dates will be announced shortly. The scope of the Exhibition will cover all Indian Swadeshi industries, but intending exhibitors who will depute their own men to look after their exhibits may send articles of arts and crafts. Further particulars will be published in the course of the next few days. It is hoped that the Exhibition will be patronised by all reputed firms and factories and individual craftsmen (cottage industries). Every facility will be given to them and to their representatives in respect of accommodation (by previous arrangement). Bulletins explaining in detail the arrangements for the Exhibition will be published shortly and can be had gratis and post free on application to the Honorary Secretaries of the Exhibition, Gadag M. S. M. Ry.

NOTES.

India's Supreme Need:—Reuter sent on Tuesday a summary of an address delivered by the Archbishop of York at Oxford in connection with the Oxford Mission to India. His Grace observed that the Mission deliberately aimed at counteracting the inevitably destructive influence of Western civilisation on Indian life. He went on to say that the doctrine of Incarnation by its insistence on God's spirit and control of material is supremely what India needed. The Archbishop evidently meant that the Oxford Mission's special function is to introduce the doctrine in India. If so, His Grace must be surprisingly ignorant of India's religious thought. The doctrine of Incarnation is fundamental to it and, in fact Christianity probably borrowed it from this source as neither Judaism nor Zoroastrianism nor Egyptian nor Greek pantheism, with which early Christianity came in the closest contact, knew it. On the other hand, in the Bhagavad Gita, Sri Krishna declares that the Divine takes flesh from time to time whenever irreligion and unrighteousness tend to prevail. It will thus be seen that the great need of India and of all the world, too, was realised and supplied by her own teachers long before the Christian Incarnation manifested itself in Palestine. And it is significant that Gandhiji, whom the Archbishop rightly described as symptomatic of India's religious attitude, is a devout Vaishnava, to whom the name of Sri Rama, the ninth Avatar, is in itself an inspiration. The Christ Incarnation, too, is an inspiration to many Indians, but what we wish to point out here is that the doctrine of Incarnation is an indigenous and not an imported doctrine. And is it really "inevitable" that the influence of Western civilisation on India should be destructive? It need not be so, to our mind. The efforts of Indian reformers have for their main object to make it constructive and fruitful of good to India and to the West as well.

Professor Einstein's Acid Test:—Professor Einstein, the great scientist, was the guest of honour at a London dinner given in his honour on Tuesday. Mr. Bernard Shaw who presided, described him "as a great man, great among men" who had not only raised wonderful problems, but had also begun to solve them. The Professor, as is well-known, is a Jew and he is not ashamed of his race and religion. In acknowledging the compliment paid to him, he referred to the treatment of his co-religionists in Europe. "The situation of the Jewish community throughout the world," said Professor Einstein, "was the barometer of the moral standard in the political world and to-day that barometer stood very low. But even the depression confirmed him in the conviction that the preservation and consolidation of the community was a duty. There had been disappointments in recent years and even recent days but he advised his fellow Jews not to bemoan the hardness of fate, but remember that they would not have survived as a community through the centuries, if they had had a bed of roses." The only country which can stand Professor Einstein's test, is India which two thousand years ago received Jewish fugitives, expelled by Roman tyranny from their native land, with honour and provided them with facilities for following their own customs and religion in this country. And it is this country which is held up to-day as the home of communal intolerance which has to be protected by foreign army from chronic communal conflicts. If the land which proclaimed and practised respect for all religions centuries before foreign rule was established, has developed communal intolerance, the source must primarily be found in the influence of the new factor. The remedy is plain. Left to themselves, the Indian people will perforce revert to their natural instinct and native tradition.

The Palestine Problem:—What happened in India has happened in Palestine. The Arabs, Jews and Christians of the Holy land are of the same race and they had lived together in peace for centuries. The trouble came when the British stepped into the country as the mandatory under the League of Nations. The Balfour Declaration which undertook to make a national home in Palestine for the Jews, the overwhelming majority of whom are settled in Europe and America, was avowedly made in order to propitiate Jewish financiers in America during the crisis of the war. That declaration undertook to carry out two tasks which were essentially incompatible with each other. As might have been expected, the attempt to do this has set the two parties by the ear, the only common ground between them at present being their distrust of the British. Both Arabs and Jews talk of initiating a passive resistance movement on the lines of the Gandhi movement and, who knows, that this may lead them to join hands at first against the British mandatory. But in course of time the practice of co-operation may grow into a habit, and may prove to be the country's salvation. The Labour Government has, in these difficult circumstances, taken the bull by the horns and stopped further Jewish immigration into Palestine, as a necessary preliminary to foster friendly relations between the two communities. The Arabs have thus gained their point, and we do not quite understand why the Rev. J. J. Holmes asked them at a meeting in New York to launch a civil disobedience movement in their country.

The National Flag:—Pandit Jawharlal Nehru's letter to Mr. K. Santanam of Lahore on the Sikhs' demand for the addition of their special colour to the three colours on what is commonly known as the National Flag, has an interest beyond that specific issue. "The National Congress," writes the Pandit, "has not formally adopted the national flag by a resolution. But practice and convention have certainly made the tri-colour flag at present the National Flag of India. The colours of this flag were not meant to represent any communities as such. None the less some people have certainly stated that these colours represent different communities. It will be for all of us together to evolve a flag which is acceptable to each group and to the nation at large." These authoritative statements, coming from the President of the National Congress, are important as clearing up a matter which, we are afraid, has already become involved in much mythology. The three colours of the flag are not only held to represent communities, but also, according to the exigencies of platform oratory, trades and even qualities considered to be essential to every satyagrahi. The presence of the charka on the national flag is a bit of bathos. The national flag, whenever it is evolved, will have to be in keeping with Indian history and tradition as well as India's outlook on the future. E. B. Havell has shown that the crescent of Islam was really an adaptation of the ancient emblem on the crest of one of the Hindu Trinity, Shiva. If this be so, we have an excellent point to start from whenever we have to devise the national flag. Meanwhile, the question is well worth discussion by scholars as well as political leaders. Each Dominion has its special flag, and not many years ago there was an acute controversy over the national flag of the South African Union.

The Census:—The Guardian, the liberal Christian weekly of Calcutta, supports the demand that caste and religion should be kept out of the schedules at the forthcoming Census: "We hold that the religion professed by any particular individual is no concern of the State and is entirely a personal matter," writes our contemporary, "and that to-day the enumeration of communal religious affiliation does not conduce to the welfare of India. The accuracy of many of the deductions made from these religious statistics is open to serious question, as we have repeatedly seen in the past. We urge therefore that those who are responsible for the 1931 Census should take into consideration the possibility of eliminating entirely the statistics of religious grouping in that census." We may add that no question regarding religious beliefs is permissible at the Census in most countries. While on this subject, we must express our disapproval of the proposal to boycott the Census which, suggested by Mr. C. Rajagopalacharya, has been endorsed by some other Congress leaders. The Census is a scientific and not a political undertaking. It is the great reservoir from which not Government only but also students of the Social Sciences all the world over, will for the next ten years derive their data for investigations into phenomena relating to populations. The Census, in fact, is an international amenity. Any hasty decision, in view of these facts, to boycott the Census will be most unfortunate both as regards its results to the country and its effect on educated opinion in other countries.

"Revolt against Religion":—Dr. A. H. Clark has been misled by an article in a weekly paper called "Revolt," which we have not seen, into thinking that India is in revolt against religion. Excerpts from Mr. Clark's essay are published in this week's Dnyanodaya. We can assure Mr. Clark that there is no widespread revolt against religion in this country. There is a strong movement to reform certain social and other practices which have come to be associated with religion, but this is because there is a truer idea of religion. If proof were needed, we would recommend that Mr. Clark should turn over the pages in last week's Bombay Government Gazette which give the names of 542 books printed in this Presidency during the quarter ending 30th June last in English and the Vernaculars. Among the vernacular books, a larger proportion of books is devoted to religion than to any other single subject.

Marriage Law Reform:—We reprint to-day the appreciative comment of the Guardian of Calcutta on Mr. Ramamurty's learned and illuminating article on the Indian Christian Marriage Act which was published in the Reformer of October 11. Our contemporary says that under the law as administered in this country the disposition of a person's property depends on the religion which he professes at the time of his death. We are sure that it is not so. If a Hindu on his death-bed becomes a Christian, or a Christian becomes a Hindu, we do not think it would affect the rights of his heirs under his personal law in the religion which he inherited and followed during life. However that may be, the position at present is full of uncertainties and it is necessary to remove them. But the remedy suggested by our contemporary, namely, a simple civil marriage Act applicable to, and presumably obligatory on all, is much too premature. If, however, such an Act is made available to persons of all religions who like to avail themselves of it, it may be helpful to many who at present are without the means of contracting a legally valid marriage outside their communities without repudiating their religious beliefs.

BOMBAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1930.

THE NEW ORDINANCE AT WORK.

Lord Irwin will be surprised and pained to know that his ninth Ordinance declaring Congress organizations illegal has made many involuntary converts to the civil disobedience movement. Before the Ordinance, Congress workers had a common meeting place and distinctive badges by which they could be recognised. The occupation of the former by the Police, has obliged them to meet wherever they can. In Gujarat, we are told, the local Secretary carries a large umbrella under his arm, which he pitches in some field or other open place and holds meetings and transacts business under its shade. In Ahmedabad, Bombay and elsewhere several private houses have been placarded either with or without the consent of their owners as Congress offices. The discarding of uniforms and badges by Congress volunteers has made it impossible for the Police to distinguish them from members of the public, and the arrest and rough treatment of the latter is spreading discontent far and wide. Lathi charges are, indeed, regarded by Congressmen as the best form of propaganda for them. This is not all. The learned Chief Presidency Magistrate of Bombay has ruled that any person who is engaged in any of the activities of the movement, assists that movement and commits an offence against the Ordinance. This ruling is diametrically opposed to the view expressed by Mr. Justice Pandarai in the Gandhi cap case in Madras and by Justices Madgaokar and Barlee in Mrs. Lukhmani's case in Bombay. In the former, the judge pointed out that Mr. Gandhi's movement had many aspects and it was against the law to infer that to be concerned with one is to be concerned with all. In the latter case, Mr. Justice Madgaokar emphatically laid down that it is dangerous, without reference to surrounding circumstances, to construe an act which may be done in innocence into an offence. We have from the first insisted that the Gandhi movement is in large part a social reform movement and that the political part of it was merely a surface symptom. For example, removal of untouchability, prohibition of drink and drugs, and hand-spinning, are prominent subjects in its programme. If the learned Magistrate's ruling is sound, the depressed classes missions, the Prohibition League, and Charka classes will come under the ban and persons connected with them will be liable to be sent to jail. Mr. Dastur, of course, is not responsible for the Ordinance, and he has done a public service by exposing its dangerously wide and indefinite implications which, as a Magistrate, he is bound to accept and apply, however revolting they may be to his own mind. Apart from it, as a mere matter of policy, it is the reverse of statesmanship to cast the net of criminal law so wide as to entangle a large number of innocent people in its meshes.

The application of the new Ordinance to Bombay coincided with a change in the office of Commissioner of Police in the city. Bombay with its many interests, communities and currents of life is an extremely complex and delicate problem for any one who has to deal with it as a whole. It takes time and sympathy to understand it intimately. But properly understood and intelligently handled, its very complexity becomes an advantage. As in the compensating pendulum, the variety and divergence of the reactions of its different elements to any kind of stress, makes for steadiness and stability in the public mind, which is the surest foundation of law and order. Sir Ernest Kelly and Mr. Healy understood Bombay thoroughly, and enjoyed the respect and confidence of the citizens, even when, in the course of their duties, they had to have recourse to force to preserve order in the city. It is an old and wise saying that it is not well to change horses when crossing a stream, and British administrators, as a rule, very strictly adhere to it, even when a square man happens to get stuck in a round hole. One very evident reason for this rule is that a new man has in many cases a strong temptation to try to show that he knows a thing or two of which his predecessor was ignorant, and his personal ambition may lead to public disaster. The seasoned administrator, of course, knows that there is no weakness more fatal to success than this, that continuity is the life and soul of administration, and that whatever he wishes to reform must be reformed without a violent breach with the past. There is no greater handicap to a man starting on a new work in this city than the belief that he is going to set the Back Bay on fire. Lord Lloyd started with such a belief and it will be long before the Presidency emerges out of the chaos which he thereby created in its finances. The change in the Police Commissionership has, we are sorry, synchronised with an incident which, it is no exaggeration to say, has created profound indignation amongst all sections of the population. In previous regimes, women satyagrahis were invariably dealt with with courtesy and consideration and there was never any complaint regarding their treatment at the hands of the Police. On the occasion of the monthly Flag salutation ceremony last Sunday, however, the Police resorted to a method which is as unusual as it is inexplicable. They arrested about 40 women, kept some 22 of them in the lock-up, and took the rest to a solitary place several miles out of Bombay the left them there. We have expressed on a previous occasion our disapproval of attempts to hoist and national flag on a College against the wishes of the Principal. We equally condemn the action of the Police in interfering with a ceremony organised by a group of citizens in a public maidan. Particularly reprehensible is the wresting by force from the hands of women the small flags which they were carrying, and which they revere as the emblem of Indian nationalism. But the spiriting away of the women to a distant jungle, is nothing less than an outrage. The incident savours more of the methods of brigands than of Police under a civilized government. One of the victims has published a statement saying that she was kicked and spat upon by the Police at that place. Another serious development is a statement by several medical men of standing to the effect that the lathi blows on the present occasion were aimed at the heads of the crowd instead of at less vital parts as on previous occasions and that they resulted in serious injuries. The Police seem to interpret the ninth Ordinance to give them a blank card as to what they may do to Congressmen and others whom they rightly or wrongly suspect of being concerned in any activity which to their mind savours of the Congress. As the Chief Presidency Magistrate interjected in the course of a trial on Thursday, the C. I. D.—the Criminal Investigation Department—regards itself as omniscient and omnipotent.

British Attitude to India:—An American publicist who was passing through Bombay told us the other day: "Your people are making a great mistake in thinking that the British as a people are against your self-government. I have been in England recently and have talked to many of all classes. I can tell you that opinion among them is divided and the tendency is for the more liberal to extend over the less liberal." Of this, we have ourselves had some proofs of late. Old friends are distressed by the apparently sudden chasm which has opened up between England and India, and they are honestly unable to account for it. The letter which we published last week from Mrs. Pitt well illustrates their difficulty. She is really very devoted to India and her people and has made sacrifices to advance education and enlightenment among women in the district where her late husband, a member of the Indian Civil Service, served and died. There are many Indian families in which she has been always welcomed as a true friend. It is naturally difficult for her to understand why there should be all this trouble in India. The address which Mr. T. Sivasankaran, who has recently returned from England and who is one of Mrs. Pitt's devoted friends, delivered at Gooty and which we reprint today, furnishes the explanation to some extent. We are in fact printing it at his request as a reply to Mrs. Pitt's letter. Dewan Bahadur Kesava Pillay whom also Mrs. Pitt knows well, rightly said at the meeting that even the best friends of India in England needed serious effort to adjust their attitude to the new conditions in this country. The question which young India asks and to which only one satisfactory answer can be given, is, why should England rule India any more than India, England. The Round Table Conference has to find an answer to this question. No constitutional arrangements will satisfy unless they give the same free scope to Indian talent as the British and American, French and Japanese systems do to their own indigenous talent.

INDIA'S POLITICAL STATUS.

Political India is to-day ranged under two flags: Independence and Dominion Status. Every one who wants to take part in politics is expected to adopt one or the other of these watchwords. To one who approaches the question from the historical stand-point neither of them appears to be a satisfactory objective. Independence is ruled out as being out of tune with the genius of the country which, as the great Indian thinker, Ranade was never tired of insisting upon, is deeply rooted in the principle of continuity. Pandit Motilal Nehru realised this when in his interview to Mr. George Slocombe he qualified the demand for independence by adding "with such mutual adjustments and terms of transfer as are required by the special needs and conditions of India and by her long association with Great Britain." Two centuries is not a long period in the history of India, but in this comparatively short time contact with British ideas has profoundly influenced Indian thought and outlook. It has fixed once and for all India's place in international life alongside of the English-speaking nations. Independence, in the sense of breaking away from Britain, is, thus "contra-indicated" by India's history.

Neither does "Dominion status" offer the true solution. To begin with, "Dominion status" is already in course of transition to national status. The Dominions claim to be nations ranking equally with the mother country. It seems to be a waste of energy to seek "Dominion status" when what is really wanted is recognition of Indian nationhood. Besides, it is a terminological inexactitude of a violent type to designate India as a Dominion of Britain. In its origin, Dominion self-government was an extension of British citizenship to British colonials. The French in Canada, the Boers in South Africa and the Irish in the Free State, have been, for political reasons, regarded as Britishers in this sense. They are all white men anyhow and this process, in their case, presented comparatively little difficulty, although not many years ago a great British Prime Minister classed the Irish with the Hottentots and the Hindus as congenitally incapable of self-government. The people of India are not white men, and what is more, they do not want to be merged in the ocean of white humanity. The Dominions, too, are not inclined to admit Indians on the same terms as white men, British or foreign. The grant of "Dominion status" to India will not make any difference to them so far as their attitude to Indians is concerned. There is also the anomaly of calling an ancient country with a population of three hundred millions, differing in race, language and religion, a daughter State of Great Britain,

If Independence and Dominion status are not suitable, what is to be our political category? It must be something special and distinctive combining in itself the perfect freedom of Independence with the continuity of British connection implied in Dominion status. The word for this is Swaraj. As the term "Free State" was invented to reconcile Irish ideas of Independence with the continuance of the British connection, Indian Swaraj will be the distinctive title of India's status. The term "Swaraj" has already been officially recognised. The Duke of Connaught used it in announcing the accession of the present Sovereign to the throne to the Indian people at Delhi. It is an indigenous word well understood by the people and, in fact, it is the term and not "Dominion status" which to them signifies self-government. The word connotes something deeper than what in the West is understood by "self-government." The antithesis of "self" in western psychology is "Not-Self." But in India "Self" covers both these categories, the antithesis being between the higher and the lower self. Swaraj would thus mean the government by the higher self of India of her lower self. Herein lies the key not only to political self-government but to religious, social, economic and industrial problems.

Once we discard "Dominion status" with its indefinite and varying meanings and associations, and adopt the distinctive Indian word "Swaraj" as our objective, we have the road clear before us. Instead of poring over text-books on British colonial expansion for guidance, we can concentrate on the actual conditions of the country, and provide in the future constitution the means of giving the higher mind of India the fullest scope and authority to solve her national problems in the light of her national genius and requirements.

India will be a partner and not a member of the Commonwealth of Nations which, in recognition of that fact, should be known as the Indo-British Commonwealth of Nations. In consonance with the age-long Indian tradition that the Sovereign is the protector of all religions, whatever his own personal religion may be, a special clause to that effect will have to be inserted in the Coronation Oath.

This is but the starting point. But to start at the right point is the most important thing in dealing with most human problems.

Pussyfoot's Message to Mr. Rajagopalachari:—
Mr. Rajagopalachari writes: Pussyfoot Johnson sent me this characteristic message when he learnt of my conviction: "I wish I could be in jail with you. I mean just what I say." Mr. Rajagopalachari adds: "I didn't get the message then, but have just seen it in a letter from a common friend."

CASTE-LABELS AND THE COMING CENSUS.

(By SIR P. C. RAY).

During the last half a century I have waged a relentless war against the caste-system and its adjunct, untouchability. It was my privilege to preside over the thirty-first Indian National Social Conference, held in 1917.

In the course of my address after pointing out the spurious basis of the caste I took occasion to observe:—

"So much for the historical basis of the claims of the higher castes. I now appeal to you from a different standpoint. There is such a thing as expediency even in Sociology. Is it fair, is it just, is it in the best interests of our country that a handful of privileged men should continue to monopolise all the advantages accruing to them through the accident of birth and drive the submerged teeming millions to hostile camps and compel them to live in a state of armed neutrality? A house divided against itself cannot stand. The backward classes are flesh of our flesh and bone of our bone and it is the bounden duty of our men of light and leading to extend to them the right hand of fellowship and lift them up from the quagmire of degradation and despondency. We cannot afford any longer to have in our social frame-work a microscopic minority of Spartans lording it over the helots. The loss to the country from the intellectual stagnation of the overwhelming majority of her people is simply incalculable. We are loud in claiming political equality with our British fellow-subjects, but when it comes to yielding an inch of ground to our own countrymen we fight shy of it and cry help! murder!"

The caste system is an anachronism in modern India—it is a negation of the first principles guiding man's conduct towards his brother man. If, as the immortal poet says "Ignorance is the curse of God" I say caste is equally the curse of God. More than anything else, it is at the root of unhappy India's degradation for the last thousand years and more. It strikes at the root of nationalism. Sir Henry Maine, the eminent jurist very aptly spoke of the caste as "The most disastrous and blighting of human institutions."

Now to come to the point, every effort should be put forth to do away with the various designations of castes and sub-castes in the forthcoming Census operation.

The late Lala Lajpat Rai writing in his journal, The People, reproduced the following observations of a Census officer, Mr. Middleton, who was originally superintendent of the 1921 Census operations in the Panjab but who left before the Report was finally adopted: "I have intended pointing out that there is a very wide revolt against the classification of occupational castes; that these castes have been largely manufactured and almost entirely preserved as separate castes by the British Government. Our land records and official documents added iron hands to the old rigidity of caste. Caste in itself was rigid amongst the higher castes but malleable amongst the lower. We pigeon-holed everyone by castes, and if we could not find a low caste for them, labelled them with the name of an hereditary occupation. We deplore the caste-system and its effect on social and economic problems, but we are largely responsible for the system which we deplore. Left to themselves, such castes as Sunar Tarhahan and Lohar would rapidly disappear and no one would suffer.

"The large number of people who have refused to record any caste at this Census is a sign of progress and the breaking of customary bonds; it is no reflection on the administration of the Census. Personally, I am very strongly in favour of all caste statistics being abandoned at the next Census, though in this I probably go further than most Europeans. Government passion for labels and pigeon-holes has led to a crystallisation of the caste-system which, except amongst the aristocratic castes, was really very fluid under indigenous rule." I cannot further improve upon the weighty remarks just quoted. Caste is a cancerous excrescence on the modern Hindu system and every effort should be made to eradicate it.

Relief Work in Sind:—Swami Sambaddhanada President, Ramakrishna Mission, Khar sends us the following account of the work done by the Mission in Sind:—During the Week ending 18th of October, 1930, relief activities of the Mission in Sind in the District of Sukkur (the Centre at Nasirabad in Larkana having already been closed the week before) comprised the distribution of 59 Mds. 9 Srs. 8 Ch. of Food Grains; 382 pieces of cloth; 396 pieces of household utensils; 300 woolen blankets; Rs. 239-15-0 in cash, 136 Mds. 20 Srs. of "Seeds" of wheat and Ohana and 12 Mds. 20 Srs. of fodder for bullocks among 1416½ recipients in 398 families of 67 villages in all. Besides relief previously distributed in kind and cash amounts to 737 Mds. 17 Srs. of food grains; 3392 pieces of cloth; 1482 pieces of brass utensils; Rupees 137-11-6 in cash and 1556 Mds. 8 Srs. of fodder. Under pressure of persistent appeals, we had, inspite of great financial stress, to extend our relief activities during the week under review to a new area in the interior about 20 miles away from Rohri and helped with some cash and clothes 40 families coming from 7 villages. Under similar circumstances we have been forced to take up a new area in Pano-Akil Taluka during the current week also. Our funds are at the last point of depletion, and with scanty public response such as we have so far got, it has become impossible for us to continue our activities any longer. We therefore take this occasion to inform the public that we may close our relief work in Sind by the end of the next week ending the 1st proximo. Contributions to our funds will be thankfully received by (1) The President, Ramakrishna Mission, Belur Muth (Howrah). (2) The President, Sri Ramakrishna Ashram, Khar, Bombay. (3) The Ramkrishna Mission, Relief Camp, Nebhanpur, Shikarpur, (Sind).

SIR PURSHOTTAMDAS THAKORDAS ON THE POLITICAL SITUATION.

The ninth annual general meeting of the East India Cotton Association Ltd., was held in the Board Room, Cotton Exchange, Sewri, Bombay on Friday the 24th October at 1 p.m., Sir Purshottamdas Thakordas presiding.

The meeting commenced exactly at 1 p.m. and Sir Purshottamdas Thakordas took the chair amidst loud cheers.

Sir Purshottamdas in the course of his speech said:—

The events of the last seven months make an inexhaustible theme for anybody to dilate upon, and are likely to play an important part in making the history of India for long, and in moulding the fate of important countries in the civilized world for years to come. The serious unsettlement of economic conditions in China which has affected silver so seriously, and the unparalleled discontent which has shown itself in such unmistakable manner in India during the last seven months show the extent to which the highly organized and advanced countries in the West are dependent on normal conditions in these two sub-continent of the world containing more than one-third of the population of the world.

I will not trace the history of the events which culminated in Mahatma Gandhi's fateful march from Ahmedabad to Dandi last March. The economic distress in the rural areas showed itself in unmistakable forms, and such of the commercial community as were in comparative distress or danger were not slow to follow. The lathi charge, and increasing estrangement between the public and the Government servants, especially the police, did the rest and the position to-day is that active participants on both sides regard themselves at war with each other. The sympathy of the masses and the average man in the street is, as it is bound to be in any country, with the weaker of the two sides. And when this weaker side 'refuses' to be violent, that sympathy is increased tenfold, and the physical strength of the Government becomes to many almost nauseating. This finds universal expression when well-fed and fully armed police officers attack helpless innocent passers-by and especially so when women and children are attacked.

The Government have not on the whole been slow in showing their power and strength. The regime of one of the best meaning Viceroys has been shadowed by 9 Ordinances which put unheard-of powers in the hands of the police. Excesses with such powers are unavoidable and the people begin to wonder what this rule is coming to.

I cannot help feeling that the Government are seeking, by their measures taken till now, to treat the symptoms and not the disease. People do not seek to make salt because it gives them a living. Nor do they go out in processions because it is good for their physique. Their main demand is that the form of Government in India, by which this country can be exploited for the benefit of either the United Kingdom or any of the Dominions, cannot be tolerated. They do not want interference from Whitehall in their internal domestic civil administration. The exchange and currency manipulations since 1919-20 are too fresh in the minds of the people to enable them to tolerate any further effort at this any more. The effort at protection to Lancashire piece-goods last March simultaneously with a little protection to Indian cotton mills appears to have been the last straw to break India's patience with the fiscal policy enforced from Whitehall.

The question is, is this demand and aspiration of India wrong, or one which should be crushed with brute force? I have not met any sane man saying so.

All that is urged is that the Congress should have waited till after the Round Table Conference to take such drastic steps if necessary. I myself was of the same opinion, but the leaders of the Congress thought otherwise. It must be admitted that the Simon Commission Report does not show the Congress to have been absolutely in the wrong. The publication of that report has strengthened the Congress more than many British politicians can realize.

The Indian commercial community do not want a revolution but orderly evolution. At the same time their minimum is clear and unambiguous and admits of no haggling. It is their fear that England is not prepared to concede this to the Indian commercial community that has made them anxious and uneasy. They are convinced that neither the masses can stand, nor the youth of the country will permit, a compromise regarding the minimum which they require in their constitution of Government hereafter.

I must refer to a peculiar instance of the warped mentality of some non-Indians, a handful I hope, who think they have interests in India more sacred than those of the sons of the soil. "Capital" of Calcutta in its issue of last week criticises the European Association of Bombay and the Bombay Chamber of Commerce for the very sensible and statesmanlike correspondence which is now known as the "Hosseinbhoj-Abercrombie correspondence." The European Association of Calcutta have made themselves notorious by their narrow and chicken-hearted outlook. The leading lights of that body, I look upon as Empire-wreckers and, therefore, no notice need be taken of this lot. Now that the Editor of "Capital" joins them, owing, I believe, to the dangerous proximity of his headquarters to Olive Street, we know what value should be attached to that writer's view. That Association asked for the resignation of Sir Frederick Sykes because he would not work with the methods of the Punjab, the United Provinces and Bengal. The Indian commercial opinion is that His Excellency Sir Frederick Sykes, who has the best of intentions and undisputed sympathy with India's just aspirations, gives way too often and unduly gently to pressure from the Services and the extreme European interests. To ask for his resignation on the ground that he is too weak against Indians is a piece of cheek and effrontery which can be practised only by those who find themselves entrenched behind the guns and armaments of the British Army in India.

As to the letters between Mr. Husseinbhoj Laljee and Mr. Abercrombie, I think it can safely be said that the correspondence does credit to both sides. By that correspondence the Bombay Chamber of Commerce under Mr. Abercrombie, and the local European Association have shown that they can appreciate the other side's point of view. Mr. Abercrombie gives away nothing, but is at least fair and practical. These bodies have shown that if India is to be a contented part of the British Empire it will be owing to their mentality and in spite of the pusillanimous efforts of the European Association of Calcutta.

It is the activities of this last named body which encourage the increasing bitterness between England and India and it is a tragedy that the European Association of Calcutta do not realise that they are moving in a vicious circle by their definite opposition to India's just national aspirations. I sincerely hope that this contagion will not spread from Calcutta to Bombay and I look forward to the leaders of European commercial community in India holding on to their clearly definite position from which they are being sought by Calcutta to be frightened away.

The recent unparalleled economic depression in the world has given most unexpected support to the movement of Mahatma Gandhi. The staying power of the masses, sorely undermined by the ratio of 1/6 forced upon India, suffered a rude shock by the unprecedented fall in the silver market.

PILGRIMS' REST AT ANURADHAPURA.

Mr. W. E. Bastian, Organiser of a project for the construction of a Rest and Free Hospital for pilgrims at Anuradhapur, the sacred city of Ceylonese Buddhism, sends us a printed statement of accounts with an appeal for funds to complete the work. The construction of the Rest and Free Hospital was started in October, 1926. Work has since progressed continuously and the final stage of the scheme has been reached. Apart from the completion of the centre block which includes the spacious Assembly Hall; the 16 dwelling rooms have made great headway. What remains to be done are the completion and equipment of the 16 rooms, the erection of the electric installation and water service, lavatories and bath-rooms. A sum of Rs. 88,100 more is needed for these purposes. The amount spent so far is Rs. 62,000. Mr. Bastian's address is Post Box No. 10, Colombo, Ceylon.

THE INDIAN CHRISTIAN MARRIAGE ACT.

Our Bombay contemporary, the Indian Social Reformer, has a long article on 'Some needed amendments of the Indian Christian Marriage Act.' which is worthy of the careful study of the Committee appointed by the National Christian Council on this matter. The article is written by a Hindu from the standpoint of the Hindu community. A recent decision of the Madras High Court has made it clear that a marriage under the Indian Christian Marriage Act does not necessarily prevent a man from marrying another wife, in the event of his secession from Christian community. It is also pointed out that the assumption hitherto made that this Act automatically brings the persons within the scope of the Indian Succession Act is erroneous. The disposition of the property of an individual depends not upon the nature of the marriage but upon the fact of the individual's religion at the time of his or her death. If before death the person becomes a Hindu or a Mahomedan then the Indian Succession Act ceases to operate. Another doubtful question which needs to be settled is as to whether Hindu-Christian marriages are validated by the Act or not. It has been the general belief that they are but this has been questioned by learned lawyers. The section which has been held to invalidate such marriages is Section 88 which says:

'Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to validate any marriages which the personal law applicable to either of the parties forbids him or her to enter into'

This has generally been considered as referring to marriages within prohibited degrees according to the rules of the Church but it is not clear and needs to be clarified.

We are of opinion that the best way out of the difficulty is to have a Civil Marriage Act which applies to all alike, and which like the Special Marriage Act of 1872, enforces monogamy upon all participants and has special provisions for divorce. The State has no concern with the religious aspect of marriage. That is for each religious community to settle. But from the social point of view it has deep concern with the effects of marriage both as regards the family and as regards property, and the matter should be approached from this angle. Such an Act would not take into consideration the religion of either of the participants but only their civil condition and the civil consequences of the marriage. The various churches and religious bodies would have their own rules for their membership.—Guardian, Calcutta.

Child Marriage in America:—A New York message states that according to the annual report of the Superintendent of Schools, 483 boys and girls (mostly girls) dropped from the school rolls last year owing to marriage. The married persons included a girl of 12 years, another of 13 years, 20 boys and girls of 14 years and 83 aged fifteen.

INDIA AND ENGLAND.

AN INDIAN VIEW OF THE ENGLISH SITUATION.

At the invitation of Mr. G. Lakshmana Reddi, President, District Board, the citizens of the Anantapur District met at the Peace Memorial Hall, Gooty on the morning of the 5th October to accord a welcome to Mr. T. Sivasankaram back home from his visit to England. Mr. P. Bayapa Reddi, Bar-at-law, presided.

THE TIME-SPIRIT.

Acknowledging with thanks the greetings offered by the Chairman on behalf of the meeting, Mr. T. Sivasankaram spoke of his impressions of England, particularly with reference to the attitude of the British people to India at the present crisis. He began by saying that when he left India towards the end of May last, he was grieved to find that leaders of his country had completely lost their faith in British character and good-will. On arrival on the British shore, he set himself to investigate and find out how far the average British voter was responsible for this bitterness. Continuing, he observed that it was due to time-spirit that nations, like individuals, were coming into contact with one another in an increasing measure. Scientific inventions like wireless and air-craft, were bringing closer together far-flung-tracts of the civilised world, but the tragedy of it was that the growth of mutual understanding did not seem to keep pace with the growing facilities for communication of human thought and opportunities for intercourse. The Great War and its after-effects seriously disturbed old values in every branch of life, giving rise to many a problem, like trade depression, exchange trouble, unemployment and conflict between Labour and Capital. As a matter of course, India also got seriously affected in the upheaval along with England, connected as she was with her for over a century. As a result of this connection, neither country was consciously responsible for much of the success or failures for good or evil which it had produced before the war. Every country set about to effect re-adjustments in a manner and in this, considerations of self-interest or self-preservation were placed at the forefront, so much so that the process produced a spirit of suspicious exclusiveness in place of international fusion. This attitude of individual nations did not lend itself to an endeavour to explore avenues of mutual understanding. The British nation, in proceeding to make re-adjustments ignored the Indian claim for self-determination which was held out to India by her responsible statesmen as a reward for her co-operation in the war.

HOSTILITY TO INDIAN ASPIRATIONS.

The appointment of the All-White Commission, inspite of warnings and protests, had produced in India a large volume of resentment with seeds of suspicion against the Britisher. The speaker arrived in England the very day on which Vol. I of the Simon Report was published and a fortnight later

Vol. II of the recommendations was out. He had the opportunity to hear Sir John Simon through the wireless speaking on the Report. Expert examination of the later volume has brought out that the Commissioners completely ignored the claims of India for Dominion Status which the Viceroy had sometime before alluded to as the immediate goal for the Indian advancement. Expert examination had also revealed that many a recommendation was so conceived as to make substantial freedom impossible for ever, indicating a collective attitude on the part of Britain hostile to Indian aspirations.

AVERAGE BRITISH VOTER'S ATTITUDE.

He, the speaker, set about examining on the spot first-hand as to how far the average British voter consciously shared this attitude and his opportunities towards this end were quite the exceptionable. He had occasions to come into contact with various types of British character and the impressions he formed were refreshing. The Britisher, the speaker found, to be extremely courteous and kindly while his common honesty and fair-dealing were of a high order. His respect for law and order was the outcome of an intelligent understanding as a means for common good. The corporate living to which he was accustomed, was so inter-related between individuals and groups of men that it scarcely left any room for one to gain an undue advantage over another. His love of work, the thoroughness with which he applied himself to it day in and day out and his looking forward to recreation towards the end of the day—all contributed automatically to his high level of honesty and fair-dealing. He enjoyed his freedom and the measure of it was indicated by his self-restraint in letting his next-door neighbour to have as much of it as he himself enjoyed. Even the custom of the country by which parents in their old age refused to live with the families of their sons, lest their freedom might be interfered with, revealed this British sense of freedom. The trait attributed to a Britisher not disposed to speak to another until he was formally introduced to him, had perhaps its origin in this very attitude. His love of sport, his daring, his preparedness to take risks and his readiness to sacrifice his own self-interest for an idea, were, the speaker found to be extraordinary. If the Britisher only knew that India was very poor and half the population had no more than one meal a day and that his power to resist had diminished as a result of the present system of British rule and unless there was an economic freedom she could make no progress, his love of justice and freedom was such that he would not have to wait long before he threw his weight on India's side and consent to its emancipation notwithstanding all the sacrifices which that consent might involve.

THE ATTITUDE OF THE PRESS.

With India excluded from party politics, there was scarcely any occasion for him to know, much less to understand, the real Indian situation.

Neither was the Press of England helpful in this direction. Even responsible papers like the "Times" were scarcely inclined to present the Indian case against the opposite version which it was not slow to publish. If a Miss Mayo wrote a book against India, some one of them found it worth while to purchase a number of copies and circulate them among the members of the Parliament; but when responsible Indians wrote to disabuse the wrong impressions suggested by such writing, even the "Times" would refuse to publish. When the American Press now and then indulged in giving out the case for India, a hue and cry would be raised in the British Press and influential papers like the "Times" would invite writers to refute such statements by means which they themselves would not approve in others. For every one paper which might take a fair view of the Indian situation, there were a dozen like the "Daily Mail" which would write prejudicially to India with flaring headlines.

IGNORANCE OF INDIAN CONDITIONS

The sport-loving Britisher going home at the end of the day got his knowledge of India by glancing at these head-lines with no chance of verifying whether what was reported was true or not. In this wise, he was absolutely ignorant of Indian conditions and frequently was the question put "why does not India revolt if she wants freedom?" To the British people the 'satyagraha movement' meant no more than the sufferings of the political prisoners taking things lying down, and that was contemptible in their eyes. The speaker concluded by pointing out that the British people controlling Parliament was only in theory but scarcely in practice at least so far as the Indian situation was concerned. That the average Britisher did not know anything of India and did not endeavour to know, was not entirely his fault. His heart was sound, his character strong and his good-will undoubted but he was absolutely not responsible for the wrongs of omission and commission of the British rule in India.

Dewan Bahadur P. Kesava Pillai in proposing a vote of thanks to the Chair said that India was throbbing under a new awakening, violently disturbing orthodox values to the extent that even the best friends of India in England needed serious effort to adjust their attitude to the new conditions. It was up to the British people, he concluded, to exert and know with a wider out-look and deeper insight the present crisis in all its implications.

The Maharaja of Patiala in England:—The London correspondent of the Times of India wrote to that paper last week as follows:— The Indian States Delegation will meet at St. James' Palace for an inter-change of views on Saturday. The Maharaja of Patiala will be unable to preside as he has been medically advised not to travel at least for a fortnight and his place will be taken by the Maharaja of Kashmir who arrived in London to-day.

There are many whose habit it is to assume that an audience may not be conquered except by theatrical bombardment. No sooner do they light upon a piece bearing the unaccustomed stigma of good prose than they begin to call it a "literary play," to foretell its failure on the stage and to damn it with faint and ignorant praises. After the performance last night of Mr. Moore's plays, they may if they will preserve their word "literary," for the play is indeed literature, but their polite patronage they must swallow. The lovely narrative, gently and discreetly told, moving from act to act as a poem of flawless composition moves from stanza to stanza, weaving the threads of character and thought into a fabric as strong as it is beautiful, held and stilled its audience, winning them to its story and drawing them into its meditation.

The difference between orthodox teaching on the Crucifixion and Mr. Moore's view of it was long ago expressed in "The Brook Kerith," and controversy concerning it is inappropriate to the present occasion; nor is it now relevant to ask whether Jesus should be represented on the public stage, for the stage of the Arts Theatre is not public. We are, therefore, free to discuss Mr. Moore's play, not as a doctrinal challenge, but as a work of art, explaining only—so that they who might be offended may not risk offence—that it is a premise of his argument that Jesus did not die upon the cross but fell into a swoon, that He was taken down as dead and buried, that He recovered, dwelt some time with Joseph and afterwards returned to the cenoby of the Essenes, a religious community living in retirement above the brook Kerith, and became their shepherd. The play opens on the day that He leaves the flocks, entrusting them to younger charge, and rejoins the brethren. Already there are dissensions among them; they are weary of the Essene rule and of interpretations of the Scriptures by Mathias, an Alexandrian disciple of Paul, and by Saddoc. Their president, Hazael, an old man near to death, perceives that they are near to breaking with their ancient loyalties and are ripe for new enthusiasms. That day Paul comes, a fugitive from Jericho. He is given shelter and rest; tells in a magnificent speech the story of his conversion, and preaches the resurrection of the Lord Jesus, Who spoke to him on the road to Damascus. The greater number of the Essenes are won to him, but Mathias, wishing to save the community from disruption, confronts him with their former shepherd, Jesus of Nazareth, Who was crucified and is living. Which is the Messiah—this man or he that spoke from heaven? Paul is unshaken in his faith, and Jesus will not dispute with him.

It is in this concluding passage that the difference between Mr. Moore's dramatic method and the methods commonly employed in the contemporary theatre most conspicuously appears. Even when Paul and Jesus are face to face, when the moment towards which the whole play has been tending is reached, he will not break the texture or deny the spirit of his narrative for the sake of that violent clash of wills which was his obvious "dramatic" opportunity. His Jesus has been for 30 years a contemplative philosopher. He believes no longer in the attempts of men to correct what they suppose to be the errors of man; certainly he will take no active part in such an attempt. He will not confute Paul, but, remaining at Kerith, will leave the future to God. The play thus ends in the quietness of its beginning, and through all its incident, its development of character, its movements of splendour, its passages of meditation, preserves the unity of its aesthetic mood—a mood to which Mr. Robert Atkins's production is beautifully attuned. Mr. Ian Fleming discovers an extraordinary calm and depth in Mr. Moore's portrait of Jesus; the fruit of prolonged contemplation appears alike in his strength and in his tenderness. Mr. John Laurie, weakening for a moment only in Paul's longest speech, gives to the part its fire and its overwhelming sincerity. Here and there among the Essenes are minor faults of detail, but Mr. Hignett's Hazael and Mr. Neil Porter's Mathias are performances of genuine distinction. We do not remember having seen a play performed with a more evident love. To actors, as to audience, the serene rhythms of its language and its rejection of every trick by which a lesser artist would have striven to recommend it, must have been a profound and memorable relief from the trivialities of fashion.

The play is published by Messrs. Heinemann in a limited edition at a price of two guineas. The Times, London.

Indian Delegates in London:—A Free Press message dated Oct. 27 states:—The Indian Delegates have hardly got over the affair of their reception last Saturday when an incident occurred this Saturday which has only aggravated the position. Many of the delegates were invited to witness a special air-force display at which the Imperial Conference delegates were present. Indian delegates accepted the invitation and proceeded to Croydon but on arrival at the Aerodrome were relegated to a corner. For two hours they were kept apart exposed to cold winds without any seating arrangements while representatives from the Dominions were accorded official reception at which the Premier himself was present. The Indian delegates strongly resented this discrimination in treatment and before even the display commenced left the Aerodrome in a body as a protest. Free Press of India learns that later in the course of the day Sir Findlater Stewart and Mr. Monteath, Private Secretary to Mr. Bann saw the Indian delegates at the Chesterfield Gardens and tendered apologies on behalf of the Secretary of State.

BOMBAY CHAMBHAR CONFERENCE.*PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

The Bombay Presidency Chambhar Conference was held under the presidency of Mr. Baloo Babaji Palvankar, on Wednesday, the 22nd October in Sir C. J. Hall. Nearly one thousand delegates from different parts of the Presidency attended the Conference.

After prayer, Mr. Vithal Ramji Ahirekar, the Chairman of the Reception Committee welcomed the delegates.

Speaking about the political situation the Chairman said that the report of the Simon Commission had not at all fulfilled their expectations. Government pretended to take special care of the untouchables, but the Simon Report had exposed the Government.

PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS.

The president in the course of his remarks on social reforms said: The Chambhar community is very much backward considering comparatively the other communities. There are many reasons for this but the chief cause of it is, the people of higher communities kept us away from them and hence they were unable to take advantage of their association. But at the same time they must not put the whole blame at the doors of other communities. They must carry out the necessary reforms among themselves. When they think of injustice done by higher caste people, they must not lose sight of good things done by them. They must be always thankful as far as those things are concerned.

They should never forget that self-help is the chief principle whereby they can come nearer to progress. Instead of expecting others to do good things for them they must try to rely upon themselves. Their economic condition was very bad and the chief cause of that was the lack of education among them. Their progress depended upon the spread of education. In former days, people from their community were given opportunities of service in the army. Their people had shown fitness in the department but since the last few years Government had stopped this facility. The members of their community were not being given chances to serve in the Police Department.

Speaking on the spread of education among their community, the President dwelt at length on the importance of education for boys as well as girls. He also spoke about the necessity of free and compulsory education for those communities which were backward.

Referring to commerce and trade, the President said the community will revive its old trade by preparing different materials out of leather. This trade has been captured by the people of other communities. General poverty, ignorance and lack of unity were the chief causes of the downfall of their trade. They must then try to remove those defects by every possible means in their power.

Speaking about the Political rights, the President said that in order to do justice to the untouchables they must be given equal political rights with Mahomedans. Representatives of their community must find places in the Councils, the local-boards and Municipalities. They alone could serve their community as they know their difficulties well.

Referring to the present political movement, the President said he was unable to express any opinion on the Civil Disobedience movement, but advised the members of his community to use Swadeshi materials as far as possible and also to abstain from drink.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The New Madras Ministers :—The New Madras Ministers are :—(1) Dewan Bahadur Bollini Muniswami Nayudu. (2) Mr. Ponnambala Tyaga Rajan. (3) Dewan Bahadur Subbarayalu Kumaraswami Reddiyar. Mr. B. Muniswami Naidu was born on 27th February 1885 in a respectable family in his ancestral village Valenjeri in Chittoor District, where happily his parents live to-day to bless their eldest son on the occasion of his becoming the Chief Minister with the Government of Madras. After a brilliant high school career at Chittoor young Muniswami came to Madras and prosecuted his studies in the Christian College, then presided over by Dr. Miller. He graduated in 1905, winning the University Medal in Economics. Taking his B. L. Degree in 1908, he apprenticed in the Chamber of Mr. P. R. Sundara Aiyar afterwards a Judge of Madras High Court. Enrolled as a High Court Vakil in 1909, Muniswami Naidu set up practice in his native district where he became one of the leaders of the Bar. On his election to the Council, he joined the Justice Party then in power and was popularly believed as the right-hand man of the late Raja of Panagal. His devotion to the party and his practice of his principles and policies are some of his many characteristics recognised by the South Indian Liberal Federation, when it elected him unanimously as the leader of the party in succession to the late Raja of Panagal in the winter of last year in its session at Nellore. In recognition of his public services, the Government conferred on him first the title of "Rao Bahadur" and in 1929, the title of "Dewan Bahadur." He was Secretary of the Chittoor District Congress Committee for some time. Mr. Muniswami Naidu is a practical supporter of Khaddar and Swadeshi and a critic of the Government's repressive policy and a true representative of agrarian interests.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

God and the Round Table Conference:— The Archbishops of Canterbury and York and the heads of the Free churches in Great Britain have issued an appeal for prayer in all churches for the success of the Round Table Conference. As a recognition of the fact that the relations between India and Great Britain can be placed on a just and rational basis only by the blessing of divine Providence, the call to prayer is as true as it is timely. But why should God be tied down to the Round Table Conference as a means of bringing about the operation of His will in the utter of Indian swaraj? Why not pray for the success of the Civil Disobedience Movement which has the same object in view? Or even better, pray for both? God is not bound by the precepts of the Government of India Act ordaining that the several stages in the attainment of self-government should be decided at the discretion of that body. We can think of a dozen direct ways in which God can resolve the Indo-British angle without any conference or act of Parliament, by His merely willing it. That the Christian churches of Great Britain can not conceive of God acting except through the instrumentality of politicians, British and Indian, shows how much the political spirit has pervaded British Christianity. We profoundly believe in prayer, but it is not for men to prescribe how God should achieve His ends. The success or failure of the Round Table Conference cannot defer or even delay the divine purpose regarding the future of India. Let us all pray that God in His infinite mercy may turn the hearts of British and Indians alike away from hatred, violence and thought of selfish domination, to love, gentleness and co-operation in un-selfish service to advance the highest interests not only of themselves but of humanity at large. The Archbishop of Canterbury in an article in the Diocesan Gazette says that on the success or failure of the Conference may depend the future of India's millions. It rather seems to us that it is the British people who are on their knees before God and humanity.

The Police Censured:—We referred in our leading article last week to the Bombay Police arresting some women and dropping them some miles away from the city to find their way to their homes as best as they could. The incident has provoked deep resentment. A requisition signed by over 25,000 citizens including many prominent business and professional leaders has been sent to the Sheriff to convene a public meeting to voice the universal condemnation of the action of the Police. A Bombay women's meeting was convened practically by women of leading families in the city on Monday when strong speeches were made and resolutions passed about this incident. Mr. Husseinbhoj Laljee who occupies the two important positions this year of President of the Indian Merchants' Chamber and the Bombay Municipal Corporation, addressed a letter to His Excellency the Governor calling attention to the wide-spread feeling created by the incident. Sir Frederick Sykes' reply to this letter was read by Mr. Husseinbhoj at the meeting of the Corporation on Thursday. It is not the British practice to denounce in public the conduct of officers whom overzeal or a sudden access of temper has led to indulge in abuse of their official power. It is in keeping with this tradition that His Excellency has said something by way of minimising the action of the Police. This, however, does not conceal the fact that the Commissioner of Police has been publicly censured by the Governor of Bombay for permitting the occurrence. "In deference to the feeling that has been aroused," writes Sir Frederick Sykes, "the Commissioner of Police has assured me that it will not be repeated"—which means that the Commissioner has been warned to see that such a thing does not happen again. The most charitable interpretation that can be put on the Commissioner's action is that he hoped to scare away the women satyagrahis by deporting them to Vikroli. But Bombay women are not to be scared away in this fashion, while the Commissioner has himself been obviously scared by the outburst of indignation against an incident which would have passed without serious notice in the forests of Khandesh or Kanara. Sir Frederick Sykes is misinformed as to Congressmen putting women in the front of their movement. When Mahatma Gandhi started the present movement, he left no place for women in it, but it was on their importunity that he consented to make room for them, assigning to them the duty of combatting the inroads made by liquor and foreign cloth in Indian social economy.

Sarda Act in the Working :—Stree Dharma* writes: "A father recently came to Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi in Madras and asked her to stop the marriage of his 11 year old daughter which was being arranged by his wife who was living separately from him with her brother The Doctor and Mrs. Cousins went straightway to the wife and read the Sarda Act so as to prevent the marriage, which was to take place in three days. Already some of the ceremonies had been begun though none of them had seen the proposed bridegroom, a man of nearly 40, who was to come the next day from Cuddalore. Despite all their arguments the mother and brother and neighbours persisted that the Act was "closed" and that they would go on with the marriage as money had already been spent on it. The next step to bring heavier authorities of the law to warn them of consequences. Then it was found how little aid the Act gives for preventive action. It was only through the personal sympathy of a commanding officer in the department of the law that a police official was authorised to call on the parties and give advice to them. The result has been that the marriage has been postponed till after the girl becomes 14. If only the office-bearers of reform societies will secure details of marriages in course of arrangement and go at once and set things in motion the Act can be made useful and if these warnings are unheeded then the parties can be prosecuted later with all chances of success and such cases must be followed up so that they may become a deterrent to others. It is during that process that the Headquarters of the Women's Indian Association is prepared to advance to such public workers the required Rs. 100 for deposit with the Magistrate if it is demanded. Vigilance and courage and energy are the first things necessary. What has been done in one case can be done generally."

Bangles and Kunkum :—A Bombay Government Press Note issued this week says: "With regard to the concession to female prisoners in jails to wear bangles, recent orders of the Bombay Government allow married Hindu female prisoners to wear glass bangles if they are in "A" or "B" class and bone (including ivory or celluloid) bangles if they are in "C" class. Married women are, on religious grounds, allowed also to wear a small red mark on their foreheads." The "concession" is made applicable to "married Hindu female prisoners." Several unmarried young women have been sent to jail, and, presumably, they will be deprived of their bangles, and the kunkum. This will be as much against Hindu custom and sentiment which makes such deprivation an incident only of widowhood. Then, the distinction between glass and ivory bangles seems to be curious, as ivory bangles are more costly than glass ones which alone the higher class prisoners can use. We would suggest that a general rule allowing glass or bone bangles and the kunkum mark may be made so as to obviate difficulties. We have seen a report that Mangal-sutras which married women cannot part with during the life-time of their husbands, had been broken on one occasion. This would be considered a grave outrage in social life, and we trust it will not be repeated.

Dr. Modi Memorial Volume :—We congratulate the Editorial Board of the Modi Memorial Volume Committee, on the excellence and variety of contributions which they have secured for the volume on Indo-Iranian subjects from distinguished writers. Dr. J. J. Mody is almost the only surviving scholar of a generation which produced many leaders not only in scholarship, but in all walks of national life. Sir Jamshedji Modi—the editors of the volume do not seem to know that Dr. Modi was knighted recently—has devoted his long life to antiquarian research and it must be a great satisfaction to him that so many scholars belonging to different races, religions and communities, have joined in producing this fine tribute to his high character and fruitful labours in the field of Indo-Iranian scholarship. We shall have to refer often to these pages—nearly 800 in all—which are replete with material for the synthetic history of India which is, perhaps, the greatest need of the day in the field of education. The volume is admirably printed and got up by the Fort Printing Press. It is pre-eminently valuable as a book of reference, and readers will, therefore, feel keenly the absence of a good index. We would suggest that one can be still made, and supplied to those to whom the volume has been kindly sent. It is an absolute necessity for a work of this kind.

discussion will not render a man liable. Obstruction as distinct from prevention is made punishable. Prevention is a generic term, obstruction is specific. Every prevention may or may not amount to obstruction. Persons dissuading others to buy foreign cloth (words used in Urdu record mana hiya) do not commit an offence under this Ordinance. While commenting on the award of maximum sentence of six months' to the accused, the learned Sessions Judge, while adopting the argument of the Judges of the Bombay High Court in a similar case, writes thus :—"It is necessary at all times and not the least when the respect for law is being undermined, whatever be the attitude or principles of any policy, the Court should in all respects scrupulously hold its scales even, observe the correct procedure, and they should not by such sentences themselves still further undermine the respect for law. Such sentences defeat their object and usually produce an effect contrary to what perhaps they are intended to do." It is probable that many of the sentences passed by the Bombay Magistrate too may be reversed on these grounds if they were appealed against. But it is the purpose of the civil disobedience movement to get as many persons into jail as possible, and appeals, therefore, are out of the question. As "assisting" the movement is an offence under the ninth Ordinance, Magistrates who further it by construing the Ordinance in a manner, which the Sialkote Judge has shown to be wrong, may be also said to be offending against it.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1930.

THE REIGN OF ORDINANCE.

In our leading article last week on the working of Lord Irwin's ninth Ordinance we pointed out that its terms were so elastic as to become a source of apprehension and possible harassment to the general public. We referred in confirmation to the Bombay Chief Presidency Magistrate's interpretation of it as applying to any act which in any way is or may be held to assist the Civil disobedience movement. We assumed that Mr. Dastur in thus stressing the wide scope of the Ordinance was really exposing its dangers from the judicial point of view. It will be recalled that the late Sir Lawrence Jenkins, when Chief Justice of Bengal, made some strong observations regarding the vague and indefinite nature of the Press Act while rejecting Maulana Mahomed Ali's appeal against the order of confiscation of the printing press where his newspaper, Comrade, was printed. Those observations of the Chief Justice of Bengal became subsequently the strongest argument against the Press Act in the agitation for its repeal. We took it that Mr. Dastur's observations on the Ordinance were of a similar character. His further observations however, on the scope of the Ordinance in another case on Monday, makes us suspect that we might not have been right in doing so. The learned Magistrate convicted some accused under the Ordinance for singing revolutionary songs although they did not belong to any organisation that has been declared to be unlawful, on the ground that the singing assisted the Civil disobedience movement and, therefore, came under the Ordinance. There are several songs of Tagore which may strike a nervous mind as revolutionary, and the national hymn, Vande Mataram itself has been construed ere now in the same sense. Writing on recent efforts to introduce music in the curricula of our schools and colleges, Mrs. M. E. Cousins observes in the current issue of Street Dharma: "The national songs of Bharati, Tagore and other Bengali poets are evoking a new spirit of courage and joint action, of patriotic inspiration, and self-sacrificing zeal such as could never have been dreamt of six years ago. Yet these bhajanas, these connings of song-books, these bhajana practices and processions are the product of only six months' intensive struggle for freedom, and in them the surcharged heart finds relief and the drooping spirit finds uplift, and all the benediction of Saraswati." The learned Chief Presidency Magistrate went on to add that advocating swadeshi would not come under the Ordinance as it was not unlawful and might be indulged in by any citizen. This may be his personal opinion but another Magistrate may hold that swadeshi too comes under the ban, as it is part and parcel of the Congress creed. Further, a platonic affection for swadeshi unless made effective by a strong desire not to use and to discourage by all means in one's power the use of Videshi articles, is not of much use as a means of promoting national industries. If the swadeshi movement to-day is a real force, it may be argued, it is largely due to the movement for the boycott of foreign goods. There has been a swadeshi movement for nearly half a century but it never got beyond the academic stage until the boycott movement put behind it the driving power of a great national emotion. It is many years since we learnt our jurisprudence but, if memory is not at fault, one of the elementary principles taught was that every law should be interpreted with a jealous regard for the rights and liberties of the citizen and that it is far better for the good of the state that some guilty should go unpunished than that even a few innocent should suffer. Perhaps, jurisprudence nowadays is a different science or it does not apply to Viceroy's Ordinances. In the latter case, what is to guide a Magistrate in interpreting the Ordinance? Is it to be executive instructions or his personal predilections?

The view of the Ordinance taken by the Chief Presidency Magistrate of Bombay, is so rigid as to lay it upon him to prevent the keeper of the shop, where the alleged picketing is said to have taken place, from stating that he was not in any way inconvenienced or embarrassed by the picketers. "The Police do not want your evidence: the accused do not want it. You are not a lawyer and you do not know the law." In striking contrast to this view is that of the Sessions Judge of Sialkote in the Punjab who acquitted eighteen persons who had appealed against the sentences passed on them by the local Magistrate under the Ordinance for picketing. The learned Judge in his judgment held (we are quoting from the Tribune,) that picketing is no offence under this Ordinance. "The word picketing is nowhere used in the so-called Picketing Ordinance. Therefore ringing a bell and asking people to enroll themselves as volunteers for picketing foreign cloth shops is no offence. The learned Magistrate, the police and even the people appear to have been under the all too common but wrong notion that picketing is an offence. It seems that the meaning of the Ordinance has not yet been grasped. A volunteer standing aside and merely trying to persuade a customer by folding his hands and arguing, but not obstructing or blocking his way, would not be guilty under the Ordinance. Verbal

CONSTRUCTIVE WORK IN THE SOCIAL SPHERE.

(By NAYAN H. PANDIA).

The awakening of the national consciousness of the people in the several spheres of life, during the last few months, has been so remarkable, that it has made the report of the Statutory Commission, such as it was, an antiquity, an unreal picture of a bygone age, even while it was in the printing. The large number of convictions of respectable persons for "political offences" and the herding them together in jails under most deterrent conditions has done, indirectly and unwittingly, a great social service, which the framers of the Report have not dreamt of, but which it is important for the public to realise and for social workers to seize upon. It has abolished caste and caste distinctions. A member of a caste professing to call itself, hitherto, the highest in the land, has, during this first year of the Gandhiji Era, dined and lived side by side with a member of the class called untouchable. A bond of brotherhood, which will never be obliterated, has been established between the two, born of a common purpose, common suffering and a common nationhood. When in the fulness of time, these political prisoners belonging to the highest and the lowest classes leave jail, they also leave behind them the superiority complex on the part of one and the inferiority complex on the part of the other. Pride of birth on the one hand and a sense of injustice on the other have burnt themselves in the fire of national service. And how are these ex-convicts, the sons and daughters hailing from the superior castes, treated by their fellow castemen? Are they kept at a distance amidst the family, the community or the district to which they belong? On the contrary, they are looked upon with the deepest respect and admiration wherever they go and their example serves as a stimulant and a perpetual reminder of the country's wrongs and the duty of all true Indians in regard thereto.

It must however be admitted that for every member of a caste who courts jail from conscious motives, there are hundreds who simply look on or who applaud from a distance and do lip service to the building of Indian nationhood. The latter include among others, men who have received university education, literary scribes and poetasters, non-politicals and half-way-house men who feel frightened at the stage to which truth, logic and a little thought are dragging them. They dimly and uncomfortably realise the call of nationhood in the social sphere, but lack the initiative, the courage, the honesty of purpose, the intensity of feeling and a proper recognition of the critical stage that the country has reached, to take the lead in that sphere.

Mahatma Gandhiji has laid his finger on several set-backs in our national life. He has said more than once that there is no justification for maintaining so many subcastes among Hindus.

The subcastes ceased to serve any useful purpose. They do no good to anybody. They are an impediment to the growth of unity. They continue simply through public indifference. The prohibition, for instance, of inter-marriage among sub-castes proves a serious disadvantage both to the sub-castes in which marriageable girls form a majority and to those in which marriageable boys form a majority. If inter-marriage among those subcastes were allowed hundreds of happy and vigorous families would spring up, with consequent economic advantage to society. Each sub-caste needs the infusion of fresh blood from every other sub-caste and this can be done without having at all to embark upon a discussion of the general question of caste abolition and without prejudice to the position of social reformers and the orthodox section of the Hindu community on that question.

Whilst the political prisoners are voluntarily and with full knowledge submitting their life and liberty to the country, it is, to put it at the mildest, the plain duty of every thinking Hindu to submit to these sub-castes and the prohibition of inter-dining and inter-marriage among them, no longer. The procedure for bringing about reform needs also to be changed. The time for holding conferences, passing resolutions and appointing committees, &c., has gone. The time has come for individual action. One should openly live up to one's convictions. No longer should one tolerate or continue a life of hypocrisy, believing one thing and acting another. Such dissimulators discredit their birth, their education, and their character in the estimation of the public, which is generally competent to judge professions at their true value. Such persons whose professions are at variance with their practice invite the ridicule or amazement of foreigners, and by others, they are considered suitable instruments for blocking the national progress or are made unconscious agents for carrying on an anti-national propaganda in their several circles of influence. All such persons should take heart of grace and act boldly and live truthfully.

In any case, the duty of the youth, at this juncture is clear. They should in their individual capacity cast off conventions, which have outlived their utility. They should refuse to recognise sub-castes and should inter-dine and inter-marry among them. Their example, besides putting them right with their own consciences, will put spirit in the half-way-house men; the latter will gradually come to realise the benefits of the abolition of subcastes, and in due course, they too will become in their turn, the teachers of their less instructed brethren. It is no use merely speaking from public platforms or merely calling upon the people to do this, that or the other thing. An ounce of conduct on one's own part is worth a pound of adjuration to others. The youth should show by their conduct that they are prepared to live up to their convictions. Here is an opportunity for real constructive work on the part of the large number of political non-combatants who also feel for their country's cause.

them not allow themselves to be dismayed by conjectural difficulties. Let them surmount difficulties as and when they arise, gathering strength with each vanquishment. Let them earn for themselves and their successors, the satisfaction of having lent a hand in the building of Indian Nationhood. Let this be said. Bold and decisive action in the direction shown above on the part of even a few of our youths, at this juncture will, besides giving strength to the national cause, have a tremendous effect on the masses which are prepared for advance, but lack only some one to lead the way.

ELECTRICITY AND VILLAGE INDUSTRIES.

The Editor, Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Your comment under the above heading in your issue of September 20 interested me very much.
Some years ago, as an engineer working with Messrs. Stone and Webster, Engineering Corporation of America, I worked out a complete plan for electrifying a village for the purpose of cottage industries.
Plans for looms, etc., were worked out in conjunction with Messrs. Krompton and Knowles of Worcester, Mass. We spent a considerable sum of money on the project as well. My friends from India, threatened by some of their friends in England, backed out at the last moment, leaving me in an awkward situation.

However, from an engineer's point of view such schemes are absolutely sound, that is, it can be worked out both for spinning and weaving.
(Krompton and Knowles will furnish you with looms with individual motor attached to it). But the problem is more acute economically. Capitalistic system works when high dividends are paid ; village industries will fall down whenever competitive system for higher dividends are introduced.
So, before any one ventures on such a project, a complete plan should be worked out.

The entire system should be a co-operative venture, that is, on no account should money be borrowed from a capitalist, native or foreign. (Our system was worked out on the basis of two per cent fixed interest. The gentlemen who promised support, were willing to advance sufficient capital at that rate until the villagers were in a position to own the plant themselves. We did not see at that time how it could be worked out otherwise. Some capital was needed to start with. This was a compromise and I see no serious objection to it.)

Secondly once you have introduced machine (power driven), immediately you have the problem of distribution. This is a very important item.
Without a proper plan for distribution and disposal of goods, you will face the same disastrous situation in which many industrialists find themselves today.
(Shiploads of vegetables are occasionally thrown over-board so that the price can be kept high.)

Thirdly, machine work is not less monotonous than hand work, if anything the latter has an advantage in more ways than one. To get rid of monotony one must introduce variety, individual initiate and design. Without such provisions home industries will soon be like small factories (sweat shops).

Cottage industry is desirable not because there is less work, or the work is less monotonous but because it gives the worker a chance to use all his potential powers.

I maintain that this can only be possible when it is kept in mind that industry is meant for the physical, intellectual and spiritual growth of the worker himself.

I hope India will take this step. And if I understand it right, Mahatma Gandhi has this in his mind and this is why he objects to machine. It is a matter of emphasis. Let India take this step and make a success of proving that Industry is for man, not vice versa.

"SOCIALIZING INDUSTRY."

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I read with much interest the article by R. B. Eleazer on "Socialising Industry." But no matter how good the desire behind such actions, they in themselves cannot end the enslavement of some human beings to others, because they do not abolish the custom of putting a price on what is not human work. No one person can abolish that practice alone, but all need to get an understanding of the fundamentals of sane adult human economic association, so that by acting together we can cease to practice the result-unit method of fixing prices, and adopt that of fixing all prices on the basis of hour-for-hour exchange of adult human work.

So long as a price is put on what is not human work, workers must work for others longer than the others work in return, for only so can such a price be paid. That means that some persons will have to act the part of folk who absorb the work of others without working in return. Both the workers and the non-workers are, as human beings harmed by that state of affairs. And it is a state of affairs which exists in every nation of the earth today; and it is the root cause of all imperialism. For putting a price on what is not human work causes persons to seek to monopolize natural resources both so as to avoid working for others without being worked for in return and to get others to work for them without their working for those others. And that desire is not governed by any kinds of boundaries people may draw, so folk will seek to monopolize resources in other countries as well as in the country they happen to live in. That is why individuals of one branch of the human race seek to enslave persons of other branches (as well as persons of their own branch).

When the peoples of the earth learn that each sane adult human being will have the best possible chance to live a normal, full, life by all prices being fixed on the basis of the actual duration of the adult human work involved—hour for hour—, then no one will seek to monopolize natural resources anywhere because these resources will then be without price. Then each sane adult will be directly, individually, self-governing, which will automatically result in each group of such persons being also self-governing, whether that group be a firm of producers, a scientific society, a small or large territorial unit for maintaining public highways, or what. That means that the actual inhabitants of each portion of the earth will control their own affairs, and at the same time be on friendly terms with the inhabitants of all other portions of the earth.

JALLIANWALA COMMEMORATION.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In your issue of Oct. 18, Mrs. Pitt writing from Cambridge calls the Jalianwalla Bagh massacre an un-Christian event, and blames Gandhi for its commemoration. Un-Christian certainly the event is, so far as the perpetrators of it are concerned, and not the victims. As for the Christianness or un-Christianness of its commemoration, what has Mrs. Pitt to say of the "Holy" Innocents' Day or Childermas-day (as it is also called), which, as my English Dictionary (Chambers's 20th Century) defines it, is "an anniversary in the Church of England,...held 28th December, to commemorate the slaying of the children by Herod." (By the way, where is the sense in calling these little babies who could not possibly know what they were massacred for, "holy" ones, and commemorating them as martyred saints? We do not call holy nor commemorate the infants born to Sri-Krishna's parents before him and put to death by Kamsa the tyrant with the same object as Herod.) Then, what about Good-Friday, which commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus, surely an un-Christian act for his Jewish accusers, for the traitor Judas and the Roman judge Pilate, and the sulphurous denunciations piously showered upon all Jews for that act of long ago on the part of some of them, in the Liturgy and Prayer-books of the Protestant and R. C. Churches, in spite of Jesus being said to have prayed for their forgiveness, saying "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do"? I need not mention the other festivals in honour of the "martyrs", of which the Saints' Calendar is full. It should be known, however, that not all of these 'Saints' were true martyrs, for some are known to have died the death of aggressors in the forcible imposition of their creed on non-Christians, and one, especially, "Saint" Cyril of Alexandria, styled a Father of the Church, was guilty of the murder of the Greek scientific philosopher Hypatia, a true martyr, if ever there was one.

Barrows Lectures:—On October 22, Bishop Francis J. McConnell, President of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, was to have sailed for India to fulfil his duties as Barrows Lecturer in university centers there. The appointment was made jointly by the University of Chicago, as Trustee of the Barrows Lectures to India, and the Indian Central Executive Council at Simla. Bishop McConnell will remain in India for three months. The theme of his lectures will be the application of Christianity to social problems and movements. The Barrows Lectures to India are the oldest and best known of those established for religious interpretation between the Occident and the Orient. Five lecturers have been sent previously to India under the auspices of this foundation: President J. H. Barrows of Oberlin; Principal A. M. Fairbrain of Oxford; President Charles Outhbert Hall of Union Theological Seminary, and Drs. O. R. Henderson and C. W. Gilkey of the University of Chicago.

THE RELIGIOUS IDEAL OF RAMMOHUN ROY.*

(BY BASU GOLAKHANDRA DAS.)

Raja Rammohun Roy with his marvellously keen insight into the spirit of all things discovered that the unity of Life is better expressed through diversity of forms than through their uniformity, and showed the way how the universality of a religion could be reconciled to diversity of forms taken by it at different times in different places. He wrote two treatises on this point in the form of questions and answers, one in English, called "The Universal Religion: Religious Instructions founded on Sacred Authorities," and the other in Bengali, called "Practice." The latter book is an exact counterpart of the former. Only, what he laid down as a general principle in his English tract for all theistic denominations of the world, he specialised in his Bengali tract for the Hindu theists. The following quotations will bear out my statement:—

"In this worship (theistic worship) it is indispensably necessary to use exertions to subdue the senses, and to read such passages as direct attention to the Supreme Spirit. It is obvious that as we are so constituted that without the help of sound we can conceive no idea; therefore, by means of the texts treating of the Supreme Being, we should contemplate him." (Vide "The Universal Religion p. 9.") Again:

"An endeavour after the control of the senses and the practice of reciting the pranava, and reading the Upanishads and such other parts of the Vedas is a necessary culture for this worship (the worship of Brahman). The necessity of an endeavour after the practice of reciting the pranava and reading the Upanishads and such other parts of the Vedas arises from the fact of our being so constituted that we can conceive no idea without the help of sound so we should contemplate the Supreme Spirit by help of the pranava, vyahriti and gayatri, and smritis tantras, etc., which pertain to Him."

The Raja further elaborated the above special aspect of the Universal Religion in his other Bengali publications, namely, the preface of the Mandukyopanishad, the Abridgement of Vedant, The Characteristics of a Theistic Householder and The worship of Brahman by means of the Gayatri. All these writings are his own independent productions, in which he inculcated the Hindu method of spiritual and ethical culture for the Hindu theists.

In the Trust Deed of the Brahmo Samaj we find that the Raja established it as a meeting place "of all sorts and descriptions of people without distinction, for the worship and adoration of the Eternal, Unsearchable and Immutable Being who is the Author and Preserver of the Universe," and for "the strengthening" of "the bonds of Union" among "men of all religious persuasions and creeds." But the form of worship that the Raja introduced into his Church was purely a Vedantic one, which was evidently meant as a particular method of worship and national culture for the Hindu theists. For men of other religious persuasions and creeds, he certainly entertained the idea of introducing other forms of worship and culture as well,—such as an Islamic form for the Mahamadan Unitarians, and a Christian one for the Unitarian Christians. In fact, he did so as a tentative measure. For, in his Brahmo Samaj the Muhamadan and Eurasian boys would now and then recite hymns respectively in Persian and English in the evening.

Any one desiring to join the Vedantic form of worship held in the Raja's Church, was not required to abandon his own national ideal of worship and culture, and his own national customs, manners, rites, observances, institutions etc. It was for this reason that Rammohun Roy, before the establishment of his church, attended with his sons, other relatives and friends the usual divine service held in the Christian Unitarian Church set up by Mr. William Adam and Mr. Adam in his turn attended the divine service held in the Raja's Church, when it was established. And it was for this reason also that neither the Raja nor Mr. Adam ever felt any necessity for the amalgamation of their respective churches, or for one's being proselytised into the other's national form of religion.

Rammohun Roy wrote a pamphlet called "Exhortation Letter" in which he offered his humble request to those who, following the Unitarian Srutis of the Vedas, believed God as One without a second, and looked after other's welfare first as they sought their own good, saying that they should treat with great affection those of their countrymen who, though not conversant with the Vedas, entertained the same belief and took the same benevolent view of others. The following is his request:—

Many of the Sannyasins who are known as holders of ten designations, the sect founded by Guru Nanaka, and the following of Dada and Kavira and other Santas or Saints belong to this religion. We should treat them as our brothers. We should also hold those Europeans among the foreigners very dear to us, on account of our unity with them as regards the worshipped, who know God absolutely as One, and worship Him only with purity of mind, and believe in the spread of a kindly feeling as the culture of the highest good. We should not entertain any doubt as to how a spiritual friendship with them can grow, when they regard Jesus Christ as divinely sent and their minister. For, the identity of the worshipped and of culture is the cause of friendship among the worshippers." By these Europeans the Raja evidently meant the Unitarian Christians of Europe, and by promulgating the principle that the identity of the worshipped and of culture, inspite of all differences in other respects, was the cause of friendship among the worshippers, he counted the Muhammadan Sufis and Mawahidins also among our spiritual friends.

* In the course of an address delivered on the occasion of the 97th anniversary of the death of Raja Rammohun Roy on the 27th September, 1930, at the Town Hall, Hazaribagh, Babu Golakchandra Das spoke of the Raja's religious ideal. We take this report from the Indian Messenger.

BUDDHISM AND THE DRINK PROBLEM.

(By A. H. PERKINS.)

When the Blessed One gave forth to his Disciples, and to those Laymen who professed to believe in, and to endeavour to live, the life he advocated in his all-wise teaching, the minimum code that Laymen were asked to subscribe to, and to carry out in their daily lives, was, a simple code of Five Precepts.

These Precepts are not commandments in the sense of something imposed upon us by some power outside ourselves, but are undertaken voluntarily, for the Buddhist recognizes that it is only by living these simple five-fold rules that social life is rendered possible.

These five Rules of Right Living are as follows:—

“ I Promise to abstain from the taking of Life.

I Promise to abstain from taking things which do not belong to me.

I Promise to abstain from all unchaste and immoral acts.

I Promise to abstain from speaking that which is untrue and evil.

I Promise to abstain from intoxicating drinks and drugs.”

This voluntary promise is made in public by the devotee in the ceremony of Pansil. It is usually taken in the Pali equivalent of the Five Rules of Life which I have just read out in English.

Now it is of the Fifth Precept that I wish to speak to-day, which is expressed in the Pali as follows, viz.:—

“Surameraya majja pamādatthānaṃ veramani sikkhāpadam samādiyāmi.” The free English rendering of this is: Samādiyāmi—I solemnly undertake; Sikkhāpadam—the disciplinary practice; Veramani—Abstinence; Surā, Meraya, Majja are the names of some of the intoxicating liquors that were in use in the time of the Buddha; Pamādo—carelessness, heedlessness; Thānam—Basis or Cause.

Thus the actual meaning in English of this sentence is:—I solemnly undertake to observe the precept which enjoins abstinence from intoxicating liquors, the cause of heedlessness.

Now, as no doubt you have all observed, the Teaching of the Lord Buddha always had a practical and scientific reason behind it. Nothing that he taught or said was ever required to be accepted on faith, by his followers; in fact the practice of Analytical Reasoning was always insisted on by the Blessed One at all times, and it was due to this very factor that his Teaching was so popular with the educated and cultured class in Ancient India in his time, and has become a synonym for sound, common-sense based on a scientific outlook, with the thoughtful man of to-day. Now the Law of Causation, known to the Buddhist as the Karmic Law, has been proved to be one of the most important Laws of the Universe that has ever been discovered. The Law of action and reaction which operates in the purely physical world, has its counterpart in the Psychic or Moral Worlds, so that the well-known words that as a man sows, so he will reap, is undoubtedly true; therefore the practice of Heedfulness is enjoined at all times by the Teaching of the All-Enlightened One as one of the most important factors in the lives of men. It means, in other words, the great importance of always thinking of the possible result of any act that you may contemplate carrying out.

How will your action affect you? How will it react on your fellowman? For you must remember that the power of thought, from the Buddhist point of view, is one of the greatest potential powers for good or evil in the world.

When we realize this fact, it is not surprising that the Buddha, that all-wise Saviour of Mankind, should have condemned the practice of drinking intoxicating liquors which befuddle the brain, and destroy the mind as well as the body; for it is very evident that alcohol is a very potent drug and tends to produce the very opposite of careful thinking and discrimination, and always tends to heedlessness and foolish action, in which not only the man himself suffers, but he brings misery, poverty, and degradation both to his family and to the community at large.

In the Dhammika Sutta we find the following passage:—

“The householder who holds to the Teaching will not be addicted to strong drink. He will never invite any one to drink; neither will he approve of drinking on the part of another, knowing that it all ends in madness. For, following upon drunkenness, fools fall into wrong-doing, and induce others to drink. Men ought to shun this haunt of all evil, this madness, this foolishness, wherein the foolish only can take delight.”

You know that Buddhism always lays special stress on Right Action, Right Thinking, and Right Livelihood, but alcohol, even in the smallest quantity, takes away that discriminating power, and tends to turn a man into a fool; and a fool is always heedless of the results of his folly.

Thus the Buddha recognized the evil influence and potentialities of intoxicating liquors, and always endeavoured to lead the people to whom he preached, to leave it severely alone. Instances are given in the Buddhist Scriptures which show how necessary is that restraining influence, for human nature in the time of the Blessed One was very similar to what it is to day; men suffered from the same temptations, and the giving way to them produced the same dire results in the world. Wherever this disgusting habit is fostered, men's brains are befuddled, and their physical bodies poisoned. And please remember that alcohol is not at all necessary, and only benefit those vendors who put profit above honour, caring little what dire results accrue from their evil business.

The Blessed One preached one of his discourses for the exclusive benefit of the layman; I refer to the Sigalovada Sutta. And in that discourse he lays very special stress on things which should be avoided if a man wishes to assure himself health, wealth, and prosperity in this life, in the intermediate stages between births, and to ensure a rebirth in a state of well-being.

In this Sutta he again counsels his hearers to abstain from intoxicating drinks, for, said the Blessed One; “It gives rise to quarrelling, it tends to loss of wealth, it tends to produce manifold diseases; it gains for the drinker a bad reputation; it causes him to lose all sense of shame and honour; and it weakens the power of the Mind.” The Mahabodhi

IMPRESSIONS OF OBERAMMERGAU.

There has been so much written about the Passion-Play at Oberammergau that it seems almost superfluous to add anything to the vast amount of literature that already exists upon this subject. And yet, each visitor to Oberammergau reacts individually to the play, so that there can be as many descriptions of the play as there are visitors. It may therefore be of interest to some readers to hear the impressions of one who lives in Germany and who therefore approaches the Passion-Play from the angle of a fellow-citizen of the players. That the language can be understood is of course of great assistance in appreciating the play, for although the visitors from outside of Germany follow the play in their English version of the text, still just this may tend to detract the attention from the spirit of the performance.

As to the impressions of the Play itself. After the usual bustling of finding seats, buying a text, and getting settled, the audience settles down to a calm and composure that is beautiful. During the entire performance, morning and afternoon, the festival hall is filled with persons who are quite as subdued as though they were in church. One senses a certain sanctity in the air, an atmosphere of piety. The Prologue, spoken this year by the former "Christus," Anton Lang, in a voice that is the height of melody, fittingly introduces the various scenes and is supplemented by the chorus. This chorus of men and women, dressed in classic robes as in the Greek plays, weaves a garland of song and rhythm about the various scenes of the drama. Before the main scenes in the Passion, incidents from the Old Testament, having a similar inner significance, are shown in living pictures. These tableaux are in themselves worth coming to see. They seem like paintings and the costumes and the grouping of the figures are masterful in style and in artistic composition.

It seems almost impious to say that Alois Lang played Christ well. He does far more. He lives him. One is not conscious that the characters "act," they walk about the huge stage as though they were quite at home there and speak their lines as though they had just been inspired at that movement to give utterance to such thoughts. One is impressed with the humanness of all the characters. They are much easier understood and seem closer to one than is ever possible by reading the Gospels. How sorry one feels for Judas in his desperation over his act of treason; how touching is Peter, as he stands by the wall and weeps; how dear and loving is John, as he leads Jesus' mother on their way to Calvary! The visit to Bethany and the scene of the Last Supper are marvels of acting in their simplicity and human appeal. The figure of Christ in his relation to his disciples is one so filled with tenderness and yet almost superhuman strength, that one feels inwardly drawn to him and resolves to be his disciple also. The scene in Gethsemane is one that makes clear to the observer what it means to stick to one's principles, and what is necessary to carry to a conclusion a firm resolve. Christ, the perfect idea, is forsaken by all his companions, even Peter and John desert him in his hour of need. One fairly feels the sense of loneliness that overshadows Jesus, and which reaches its culmination in the words spoken from the cross: "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me." John and Mary come and try to help through the deepest agony by their presence, and at last comes the triumph over the grave, which erases from the mind somewhat the sense of tragedy which comes near to overwhelming it completely.

Many remain unmoved by the many scenes and even by the crucifixion. Perhaps they are unemotional people or perhaps they regard the play merely as a theatrical performance. It will always remain such for many. But a great number begin to understand in a dim way what Jesus did and what it must mean to be his disciple and follower.

The people of Oberammergau who take part in the play probably do not bother themselves very considerably as to what impression the play makes on all those foreigners who come to see it. They perform the play as a solemn rite and a sacred duty. I believe they would perform it every ten years even if no one came to see it. The advertising that has been done for Oberammergau has been done by tourist agencies, not by the citizens of Oberammergau. For the tourist agencies Oberammergau means more than a visit to the Passion-Play; it means a round trip steamer passage, hotel accommodations all along the way, side-trips to many interesting towns and cities of Germany, and all the other fixings that go with a trip to Europe.

A little incident that occurred on the morning following the Play is significant of the spirit of the participants. I stood at the railroad station, waiting for my train to pull in, and chatted with a long-haired porter who had carried baggage down to the train. I asked him what part he played. "Yesterday I played in the mob," he replied, "but I have the part of one of the thieves this year. A few weeks ago I was injured in being taken from the cross and had to undergo an operation. As soon as I am strong enough again, I shall play the thief again." "That is too bad," said I, sympathetically. "Oh no," he said, with a bright smile, "I was glad to do that for my Savior." That is how they regard it—they are doing something for their Savior, and feel consecrated to a great cause.

In walking through the little town one is impressed by the expression in the eyes of the peasants. It is not only their long hair that makes them look interesting. They have an expression of inner peace and inner joy in their eyes which one does not find anywhere else. They live with their Savior, year after year, and their performance of the Passion-Drama is only the outer expression of what they live continually. I do not mean to say that they are all angels. Of course, there will be all the little rubs and irritations between them that exist everywhere else in the world where men and women are, but I believe that they have a higher view of life than most persons and that they actually try to be Jesus' disciples. At least, one is refreshed by the lack of rush and hurry in the demeanor of these people. They are kindly and treat all visitors with kindly respect.

The little cottage where I was quartered for the night was charming. My windows looked out on to the mountains and the swallows that had built their nest on the little balcony seemed not at all disturbed by my presence. In the room the Crucifix hung over the bed and beside the bed was a little image of the Virgin Mary with Holy Water. What matters it whether one is Catholic or Protestant, or belongs to any one of the many sects that bear some name or other! Do we not all want to be disciples of that spirit of Good that remained steadfast through all trials and triumphed at the last because Good cannot do otherwise than triumph? That seems to me to be the lesson and the significance of the Passion-Play.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi's Services.—The following has been sent to us for publication:—The valuable and constructive work accomplished by Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi during her term of membership of the Madras Legislative Council and the unique position she occupied as a representative of Indian womanhood should be marked by some permanent souvenir of appreciation from the public of Madras and especially from women and social reformers. Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi was the first woman member to be appointed to a Legislative Council in British India, and the first and only woman to be elected to the high and responsible position of Deputy President of any Legislative Council. As an eminent Social Reformer and a fighter for the cause, needs and rights of women and children in all communities, her work is favourably known to all and her Legislative achievements have been of the highest value to society. Arrangements were made to hold an "At Home" in Dr. Muthulakshmi's honour on Friday 31st October at 5 p.m. in Pantheon Gardens, Pantheon Road, Egmore, at which she was presented with an address and a suitably engraved casket. The occasion was not a political function but an expression of appreciation from people of all communities and shades of opinion of the many services Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi has rendered to the cause of progress during her term of office. Among the organisers of this function were, Rao Bahadur Dr. O. Natesan, M. L. C., Mr. Sami Venkatachalam Chetti, Mrs. G. Visalakshi, Mr. O. Muthuranga Mudaliar, Mr. S. Giri, Mrs. Yakub Hasan, Mrs. A. Swaminadhan, Dr. Voegeli Arva, Mrs. Hannon Angelo, Miss R. Cowdry, Mrs. M. E. Cousins, Dewan Bahadur O. Viswanatha Sastri, Dr. U. Rama Rao.

Missionary View of Changes Among Indian Women:—So far Christian missionaries have pointed their finger to the bondage of women in India, writes the Indian Messenger, the organ of the Brahma Samaj, and made Hinduism responsible for the evil of Zenana, declaring that the hope of emancipation for Indian women lay in their accepting Christianity. Now that emancipation is coming about, a note of alarm is being raised from that very quarter. We learn from The Christian World that Mrs. Underhill (formerly Mrs. Starr, of the O. M. S. Peshawar) speaking at a Church of England Zenana Missionary valedictory gathering said:—

"Great changes have come in regard to the political, the social, and the industrial life of India. But the most revolutionary and radical of all are the changes among the women. Old customs are going, and their sudden going is very dangerous. A woman in India has been just a piece of property, but the advanced women are demanding for all their sex immediate freedom, complete liberty. Reforms are being brought in by Indian women themselves, yet these very reforms must bring new problems and new temptations. Education is not enough: reforms are not enough. It is not a mere figure of speech to say that Christianity is the only hope for these women, lest the last state should be worse than the first." We so far agree with the alarmist Zenana mission worker that the help of religion is necessary in the changed condition of things. But what exclusive claim can Christianity put forward? Have its experiments in its own surroundings in Christendom proved very encouraging?

Kiloskar Wadi:—Almost the only industrial venture in India which attempts to run a factory on 'idealistic' lines, writes the National Christian Review is that at Kiloskarwadi, in the Deccan, which owes its origin and inspiration to a Brahman. About six hundred men and boys are employed in his factory, which manufactures simple agricultural implements. The impressions formed by Miss M. O. Matheson about this unique factory are recorded in her book, Indian Industry. We quote here a few sentences from her: A model village has grown up round the factory. Most of the houses are detached, and each one has its own electric light and water tap, although the water, which is brought from the hills, three miles away, must often be rationed during the hot weather. Gardening is encouraged, and there is a certain control of shop and market prices, a co-operative store not having proved a success. The well-built house with their shady gardens, the tidy streets and the general air of neatness and prosperity form a striking contrast to the ordinary Indian village. Mr. Kiloskar wants to do away with the difference between capital and labour by making everyone a capitalist in greater or less degree. He himself lives in an ordinary village house, and insists, somewhat naively, that everyone who earns thirty-five rupees or more a month shall become a shareholder in the business. No alcoholic liquor is sold in the village, and it is an understood thing that workers shall be non-smokers. There is a compulsory primary school and free medical dispensary. He is assisted by his son and his nephew, who were educated in Boston and London respectively, before becoming associated in the business.

Pandit Malaviya in Naini Jail:—The following is a pen-picture by the Allahabad correspondent of the Hindu, of the venerable Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, now undergoing imprisonment in Naini Jail for being a member of the Working Committee of the Congress,

"I went over to the Juvenile Ward where, in a section of the same Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya is lodged with his son, Pandit Govind Malaviya who is an under-trial prisoner. It was some time since I had last seen Malaviyajī. He had just then finished his morning bath and prayer and was serenely reading a chapter from "Jaimini Bharat." A copy of the "Ramayan" also was near him. He sat outside in the verandah, which has been specially constructed for his use. I am afraid this verandah is not quite satisfactory since it was open on all sides, which was no small discomfort to the aged Panditjī. He said "I am spending my time, as you see" and inquired after Mr. Rangaswamy Iyengar and said it was a delight to see a representative of a paper so far south taking such interest in North Indian affairs. "Our friends are very good to us" he said as he spoke of the jail officials, but in spite of it all, I could not help feeling that the proud sensitiveness and dignity of this fine man had been hurt beyond words. I left him after my respectful greetings to him, sitting pure and fresh and with that charm which is all his own. Near by him lay a bit of sandal-stick and sandstone on which sandal paste lay yet wet. In prison as he is outside, Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya is a true Hindu."

The National Flag Colours:—In connection with the discussion regarding the colour scheme of the national flag, the following letter is published in the current number of the "Modern Review." It was addressed to Mahatma Gandhi in January 1925. "We are grateful to you and other leaders for giving us that great symbol of self-respect, a national flag. Our Swaraj colours are now red, white and green. Various interpretations are given of these colours. One popularly accepted is that red represents Christianity, white Hinduism, and green Islam. It has also been suggested that red stands for Hinduism, and white for religions and cultures of India other than Hindu and Moslem. We beg to approach you with a suggestion about the proper colour to represent Hindu or Indo-Aryan culture and religion. We suggest the ochre colour (Gairika, Geru of Gerua). It is the colour of sannyasa, of tyaga, of ahimsa, the highest ideal of our Indian civilization. It is the colour of most Hindu sects—Brahmanical, Buddhist, Sikh. Shivaji's flag, the Bhagwa Jhanda, was the Gairika Uttariya of Sri Ramadass. Rabindranath in many a magnificent poem has sung of Gairika Uttariya of Bharata, who is the great Tapasa, the great Ascetic. We suggest that in India's national flag, the Gairika of the Brahmachari and the Rishi, of the Bhikshu and of the Yati, of the Sadhu and the Vairagi, and also of the Indian Darwesh and Pir, be given its proper place. Red is a colour we do not usually associate with Hinduism. In Bengal and elsewhere, red is used by certain Hindu sects, the Saktas specially. The red Java flower and red sandal paste are sacred to Kall and red silk garments are worn in Sakta ritual. Red or saffron is the colour of war with Hindus. It does not strike the Hindu note of ahimsa. White, again, is not specially associated with Hinduism. Further, red, white and green are already the national colours of some other countries, Italy and Portugal for instance. Could we not have red, ochre and green for our "Hindustan-ka tiranga jhanda" the tri-colour banner of India? If the colours do not harmonize, we could have ochre white and green, ochre for Hinduism, green for Islam, and white for other faiths and cultures of India. Or we can have a "Chauranga Jhanda" red, white, ochre, and green? We respectfully request you, revered Mahatmajī, and also other leaders of the country to give your opinion on this suggestion of ours, and if you think fit, the matter may be brought before the coming Congress at Belgaum for discussion and final acceptance. Opinion from Hindus and others who have brought about this question is respectfully invited. Yours Most Respectfully, Dwijendra Nath Tagore, Vidhushekhar Bhattacharya, Suniti Kumar Chatterji, Kalidas Nag, Nepal Chandra Roy, Bhim Rao Shastri, J. J. Vakil, Prem Sundar Bose Marichi, N. Aiyaswami.

The New Russian Calendar:—The French Revolution about a century and a half ago, introduced a new calendar, dating the new era from the establishment of the Republic, September 21, 1792. The Russians have now followed suit. The Russian era begins with November 7, 1917. The year is divided into twelve months of thirty days each. Five national holidays fill out the 365 days. The month is divided into six weeks of five days each, Saturday and Sunday being omitted. Every worker has one holiday a week, which is not the same day for all workers. In other words, factories, offices, socialized farms, etc., work on all five days, while a certain number of workers has a day of rest every week. The fiscal year begins with January 1. The new Russian calendar, writes the World Tomorrow, from which we take this paragraph, is not merely a revolutionary gesture. It is a social experiment of supreme importance and it must be kept in mind when reading the news from Russia. Unobtrusive and seemingly unimportant on the surface, it carries within itself possibilities that are likely to be sensational.

Likely Indian Recipient of Nobel Prize:—A Reuter's message dated Stockholm, November 2, says that newspapers mention Sir Chandrasekhara Venkata Raman's name, with two European and two American scientists, as the likely recipient of the Nobel Prize for physics. Son of a schoolmaster, Sir C. V. Raman was first educated at Mrs. A. V. N. College, Visagapatam, and later at Presidency College, Madras. After taking his degree, he was enrolled an Officer of the Indian Finance Department in 1907. Later he left Government Service and joined the Calcutta University as Professor where he had ample scope for research in Physics. He was Honorary Secretary of the Indian Association for the Cultivation of Science in 1919. He went to Toronto (Canada) in 1924 as British Association lecturer. He presided over the Indian Science Congress in 1928. He is a Fellow of the Institute of Physics, Asiatic Society of Bengal and the Royal Society, London. He has published several papers on Experimental Investigations on Vibrations, Theory of Bowed Instruments, Molecular Diffraction of Light, Music-Instruments, X-Ray studies, and other numerous scientific papers in the Indian Journal of Physics which is conducted by him, and in British and American journals. He is 42 years old. Some years ago, Rabindranath Tagore was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature.

NOTES.

Christian Missionaries Intercede:—We welcome the statement, which a large number of British Christian Missionaries in India have issued, of their considered views on the Indian constitutional problem and how it should be met and solved. No one can read it without realising that a very great amount of thought—and may we add, prayer?—has been brought to bear on nearly every phrase and sentence of this historic document. The unique feature of the present Indian movement, is that it has deeply stirred religious-minded men all over the world and made them feel, in the words of the manifesto, that they cannot remain silent in regard to issues which have caused such widespread and deep disturbance in the lives of men. The signatories state without equivocation that to them the national awakening is a very real thing and that no settlement will be satisfactory that does not respect Indian sentiment. India, they say, is now of age and can speak for herself and urge that the determining factor in the future Indian constitution, should be the wishes of the people of India. If these points, fundamental to the problem, are accepted without any mental reservations, the road to an honourable settlement is at once cleared. For our own part, as we have repeatedly said, we value a peaceful settlement even more than the settlement itself. In the dealings of one race with another, of one civilisation with another, of one culture with another, there is no distinction between means and ends. "The prize is in the process". Another pregnant sentiment contained in this great pronouncement concerns the protection of minorities. It is our own strong conviction that the competence of a people to control public affairs, is proportionate to the consideration they habitually extend and practise in everyday life not only to numerical minorities, but to the backward, the weak, the distressed, and to women and children. Many of the self-governing nations fail in this test, while exacting a high standard from countries like India which seek to secure self-government. Minorities are encouraged to put forward extravagant claims which imply distrust of the majority, often on flimsy grounds. The Missionaries say a true word when they say that they feel that Indian leadership must be trusted in this matter, and we are convinced that the trust will be repaid in ample measure.

The Round Table Conference:—The Round Table Conference was opened as announced on Wednesday by His Majesty the King. The scene is described as gorgeous, but the performances, we are sorry to say, were distinctly depressing. Every one knows that the Sovereign's speeches are drafted by the Prime Minister and his colleagues, but since Queen Victoria returned for revision the original draft of the famous Proclamation to Lord Derby, reminding him that it was the declaration of a Sovereign to her people, royal pronouncements have always had a certain warmth and nobility which touched the finer human emotions. The speech of His Majesty at the Conference is marked by no stirring phrase. It is a very pedestrian performance and in one place at least, the draftsman for lack of ideas has resorted to pure padding. It would have been far more considerate to His Majesty, if he had not been brought into the Conference if this is the kind of speech he had to make. We had suggested as the one sure way of ending the present deadlock that His Majesty should make a gracious gesture which might appeal even to those who have only a limited faith in the Conference. An amnesty for non-violent political prisoners, the termination of the rule by Ordinances and a simple affirmation of the Viceroy's declaration about Dominion status, would have worked like magic to change the situation from one of gloom to one of hope. The Prime Minister, too, was by no means in his best form, although his speech reads better than the King's. Mr. Ramsay Macdonald's sentiments reveal physical fatigue and mental boredom. There is only one passage in it which reminds us that he is no stranger to India and her problems like most British statesmen and that somewhere in the back of his mind is stored much accurate information relating to India, her history and her people. It was where he said: "I am mindful of India's different communities, languages and interests, but I am reminded still more of the quickening and unifying influences which have grown irresistibly from her contact with Great Britain and of the aspirations for united India which were in the minds of her philosophers and her rulers before the first English traders set foot on her shores." It is only when we view the British connection as leading to the fulfilment of the hope and promise of India's age-long history—and it is the right way of viewing it—that British and Indians, can look forward with confidence to the happy solution of what otherwise is a complex and confused mass of conflicting issues. In any case, we must not lose hope, because we cannot simply afford to despair. Even if this Conference fails to achieve anything tangible, it will still have cleared the ground for the next which will start where it leaves off. There is only one observation which we feel we should make regarding the Indian speeches without waiting to see the full texts of them. It is that without exception the Indian speakers seem to have totally forgotten that 30,000 of their people are in jail for non-violent offences, that among them are some who are their equals, if not their betters, in respect of patriotism, culture and character, that one of them, Mahatma Gandhi, has raised India in the eyes of the world as no one had done for centuries and that, really speaking, their own importance has been greatly enhanced by the sacrifice and sufferings of their countrymen who have refused to participate in the Commission.

The Government of India's Despatch:—

We received on Thursday night a copy of the Government of India's despatch to the Secretary of State on constitutional reform. The preliminary description of Indian conditions, struck us as being fair, just and true to actual fact. But when we passed on to the practical conclusions of Government, it seemed that we had strayed into a different atmosphere altogether. The recommendations of Government are tentative but even so they are marked by extreme suspicion and distrust of the motives and capacity of Indians to manage their own affairs. The most important question of responsibility in the Central Government is dealt with in a manner which can only be described as illusory. That is to say, while it is attempted to create the illusion of conceding responsibility actually very little is conceded. In the Army and Foreign Affairs, there is ground for reservations. But the Government of India do not propose to part with their power in Finance and Commerce either. British interest in the latter bulk more largely in their eye than the interests of Indian nationalists. If this is all that we can expect from the Government of India, we must be prepared for still less from the British Government. The guns of the Round Table Conference have been effectively spiked by the despatch of Lord Irwin's Government. This is our first impression, and it may prove to be a hasty one, on a more leisurely perusal of the despatch. If it does, we need hardly assure our readers that we shall not hesitate to revise our views.

An Unhappy Refusal:—The Sheriff of Bombay after a delay of about a week has declined, with apologies, to call, in compliance with a very largely signed requisition, a public meeting to censure the Police for their wild west exploit of leaving some women processionists stranded several miles away from the scene of their arrest. The explanation of the Director of Information, that the place where they were deposited was not a jungle but a provincial road and that the day being Sunday the road was not likely to be unfrequented, showed him to be a humorist but did not appease the public resentment. The Sheriff's reason for refusing to call the meeting is that he being a Government officer, his calling it may be taken to imply that Government approved of the proposed censure of the Police. There seems to be no substance in this. As we pointed out last week, the Governor's letter to the President of the Municipal Corporation was a public and pointed censure of the Police Commissioner, wrapped up, no doubt, in official circumlocution. In fact, after that plain warning, we were inclined to think that there was no need for any further demonstration. But the Sheriff's reason puts a different complexion on the question. It seems that though the Governor has warned the Commissioner to see that no such incident occurs again, the Government would like the public to be under the impression that they approve of the spiriting away of the women processionists. If so, we can only reflect on the contrast between the prompt action of the British Government when an English girl complained of being unduly questioned when under arrest some years ago, and the placid indifference of an Anglo-Indian Government to a much more serious offence on the part of the Police. It is impossible under such a system for women, or men for that matter, to grow up in a healthy atmosphere and that is what we have come to feel regarding the possibilities of social reform under the present political system. The uplift of Indian women is not to be accomplished by purdah parties at Government House or by sipping tea at Willingdon Sports' Club in conditions of palpable condescension, but by Indian women taking an equal share with men in the strenuous struggle for national emancipation. There can be no real social intercourse or sincere goodwill between Indians and Englishmen until the latter learn to treat Indian women with the respect which they expect, and rightly, Indian gentlemen to show to Englishwomen.

The Press and the Police:—Every one who has experience of the conduct of daily papers, knows that friendly cooperation between the Press and the Police is useful and necessary to both. On the other hand, a lack of friendly feeling between them may hamper the smooth operation of both. In Bombay, the normal relations between these two public security services have been on the whole, all that can be desired, and it was a gross mistake on the part of Government to have thrust upon the Commissioner of Police—we are sure he did not take it upon himself—the duty of warning the Press against publishing a certain class of news. It is the business of the Editor to decide what news he shall publish and what reject, and the Indian law is not too tender to him whenever he commits even an honest mistake. Nothing is more calculated to antagonise the Press than to constitute the head of the Police a sort of censor over its conduct, and the warning letter addressed by Mr. G. S. Wilson to the newspapers naturally produced keen resentment. The Associated Press has since been informed that that warning meant nothing in particular. We print the warning letter, the journalists' protest, and the Associated Press disclaimer in another column.

BOMBAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1930.

MR. ANDREWS' BOOK.*

Mr. C. F. Andrews has written a book of less than two hundred pages to which he has given the title: "India and the Simon Report." But as he explains in his preface, his book does not deal with the technical political details of the Simon Report. Its purpose, he says, "is rather to consider the causes of the resentment in India today against Great Britain which have led up to the present deadlock." Really, however, the book does much more than this. To our mind, its most distinctive contribution is that it gives a true and vivid inside picture of the national movement by an outsider. There are very few foreigners who get an inside view of Indian society. Mr. Andrews is one of them. Yet, notwithstanding his intimate knowledge of Indian life, he would not presume to judge for Indians. "I am an Englishman," he writes, "and it cannot be repeated too often that the very meaning of self-government is that these things (dealt with in the Simon Report) shall be settled by Indians themselves and not by Englishmen at all. The mistake from first to last has been the refusal to allow to Indians the initiative in these matters so that they might follow out to the end their own national ideal. They will undoubtedly make many mistakes. But the mistakes will be their own, and the blame for them will be their own. They will not be able any longer to lay them upon others and thus weaken themselves." (p. 75). Some one has said that common sense is the most uncommon thing in human nature. It would seem that there is much truth in that observation seeing how few are the Englishmen in India who seem to realise that it is not commonsense for a handful of foreigners to claim to decide the political destiny of some three hundred millions with whom they have neither race, religion or country in common. Herein lies the fundamental difference between Mr. Andrews and Mr. Edward Thompson, whose letter we publish today, complaining of his being misunderstood by the Indian Press.

Mr. Andrews is right in saying that the non-inclusion of Indians in the Simon Commission caused resentment. But it is too much to say that that resentment is the principal cause of the present deadlock. At any rate, those who resented their exclusion most bitterly were the Liberals who thought their services in working the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms, in the face of the non-co-operation movement, entitled them to participate in the statutory enquiry into what was largely the result of their labours. These men, or most of them, have now accepted the Round Table Conference as sufficient atonement and have gone to attend it. Still, the deadlock continues and is becoming daily more intense. Government have tried to cut the Gordian knot by declaring the National Congress and its subsidiary institutions unlawful and sending their adherents to jail under the elastic provisions of the Ninth Ordinance. The procedure is extremely simple. The Governor-in-Council declares that such and such an Institution is an unlawful association, and before the ink on the paper is dry, the police occupy its premises, confiscate its moveable property, and arrest as many of those associated with it as they chose to. According to a recent estimate given by the Secretary of State for India in the House of Commons there were about 24,000 persons in August serving terms of imprisonment for offences of a non-violent political character. This was before the Ninth Ordinance was promulgated. The number today is perhaps not far below 30,000. At the modest estimate of three friends or relatives to each prisoner, about a lakh of people have been thus involved in the civil disobedience movement. The number is being added to every day not so much by the propaganda of Congress partisans as by the methods followed by Government which seems to be based on the principle of antagonising the maximum number of persons in the minimum time. Outside the circle of its salaried officials and employees Government, it is not too much to say, have few friends among the Indian public who are prepared to defend their method. Even among the officials, there is considerable uneasiness owing to the conflict between their duty to Government and their duty to their own people. We were told by a friend of a Magistrate in the districts whose young son was shouting "inquilab zindabad" outside the Court house where his Worship was sentencing satyagrahi prisoners! Mr. D. N. D. Khandalawalla, Presidency Magistrate, was reported by the Free Press Journal of Tuesday to have observed in the course of a trial: "One woman is marked for the battle in every family (italics ours) and when she goes in the morning, they think she may come or may not."

It has been our endeavour from the first to make Government realise that they have to deal not with an artificially engineered agitation but a social and religious upheaval which has necessarily affected the political situation. There is one great difficulty in the way of Government recognising this fact. It is that when once they recognize it, they must admit that it is beyond their competence to cope with it and that it can and must be dealt with only by a national Government. It is the great service rendered by Mr. Andrews' book that it clearly and calmly brings home to the mind of its readers the organic character of the present movement. We shall refer in more detail to this aspect of it in another article.

THE ROUND TABLE CONFERENCE.

The Round Table Conference was opened by His Majesty the King-Emperor in London on Wednesday. Descriptions of the function are to be found in the daily papers.

His Majesty said :

"It affords me much satisfaction to welcome to the capital of my Empire representatives of the Princes, Chiefs and people of India and to inaugurate their Conference with my Ministers and representatives of other parties composing Parliament in whose precincts we are assembled.

"More than once the Sovereign has summoned historic assemblies on the soil of India; but never before have British and Indian statesmen and Rulers of Indian States met, as you now meet, in one place and round one table to discuss the future system of government for India and seek an agreement for the guidance of my Parliament as to the foundations upon which it must stand.

"Nearly ten years ago, in a message to my Indian Legislature, I dwelt upon the significance of its establishment in the constitutional progress of India. Ten years is but a brief span in the life of any nation, but this decade has witnessed not only in India, but throughout all nations forming the British Commonwealth, a quickening and growth in ideas and aspirations of nationhood which defy the customary measurement of time.

"It should, therefore, be no matter for surprise to men of this generation that, as was then contemplated, it should have become necessary to estimate and review the results of what was begun ten years ago and to make a further provision for the future.

"Such a review was lately carried out by the Statutory Commission appointed by me for that purpose and you have before you the outcome of their labours together with other contributions which have been or can be made to the solution of the great problem confronting you.

"This community of interests leads me to count it as a happy augury that there should be present to-day representatives of my Government in all sister States of the Commonwealth. I shall follow the course of your proceedings with the closest and most sympathetic interest—not, indeed, without anxiety, but with a greater confidence.

"No words of mine are needed to bring home to you the momentous character of the task to which you have set your hands. Each one of you will, with me, be profoundly conscious how much depends for the whole of the British Commonwealth on the issue of your consultations.

"The material condition which surrounds the lives of my subjects in India affects me nearly and will be ever present in your thoughts during the forthcoming deliberations. I have also in mind the just claims of the majorities and minorities, men and women, town dwellers and tillers of the soil, landlords and tenants, strong and weak, rich and poor, of all races, castes and creeds of which the body politic is composed. For these things I care deeply.

"I cannot doubt that the true foundation of self-government is a fusion of such divergent claims in mutual obligations and in their recognition and fulfilment. It is my hope that the future Government of India, based on this foundation, will give expression to her honourable aspirations.

"May your discussion point the way to the sure achievement of this end and may your names go down in history as those of men who served India well and whose endeavours advanced the happiness and prosperity of all my beloved people. I pray that Providence may grant you, in a bounteous measure, wisdom, patience and good-will."

After the King left, the Prime Minister was elected to preside. On taking the chair, Mr. Ramsay Macdonald made the following speech:—

PREMIER'S SPEECH.

"My first duty as Chairman is to ask your consent—I know that it is forthcoming in a full measure—to convey our humble duty to His Majesty and an expression of the loyal gratitude with which we have welcomed his gracious presence here and of our thankfulness for the inspiration his words have given us. I know also that you would have me include our loyal and grateful appreciation of the kindly solicitude of Her Majesty the Queen which my Indian friends have been privileged to experience. Nor are we unmindful that it is to His Majesty's gracious permission that we owe the honour of holding our meeting in this Chamber to-day and hereafter in the Royal Palace of St. James's. We are deeply sensible of these signal marks of Their Majesties' sympathy and favour.

"I am very conscious of the responsibility you have put upon me, but the responsibility lies heavily on us all; for, we are now at the very birth of a new history. The declarations made by British Sovereigns and statesmen from time to time that Great Britain's work in India was to prepare for self-government have been plain. If some say that they have been applied with woeful tardiness, I reply that no permanent evolution has seemed to anyone going through it to be anything but tardy.

I am never disturbed by people who say that I have not fulfilled my pledges, provided I am fulfilling them.

"We have met to try to register by agreement the recognition of the fact that India has reached a distinctive point in her constitutional evolution.

Whatever that agreement may be there will be some who will say that it is not good enough or that it goes too far. Let them say so. We must boldly come out and appeal to intelligent and informed public opinion.

Men who cooperate are pioneers of progress. Civil disorder is the way of reaction. It destroys that social meptality wherefrom all constitutional development derives its source and whereupon all stable internal administration is based."

'LET US FACE AND SURMOUNT OUR PROBLEM.'

Proceeding, Mr. MacDonald said:—"The task ahead of us is beset with difficulties for a solution of which the past affords no ready-made guide. There are stubborn diversities of view still to be brought together and conflicting interests that have hitherto proved irreconcilable. Could any issues be more momentous, could any be more enticing to men who love to make rough places smooth ?

"We must bring to our task all the resources of mutual trust, practical sagacity and statesmanship, which we can command. This is not the time for reciting—to say nothing of pre-judging—our problems. We shall meet them as we proceed. Let us face them as men determined to surmount them.

"Why not? What problems of growth and development in liberty and political institutions have our peoples not faced? And united we remain, despite our diversities, because of our skill in harmonising differences by reasonable mutual accommodation.

"His Majesty's presence at the opening of our deliberations has enabled us to understand both the strength and the flexibility of the bond binding our whole Commonwealth of Nations together in loyalty and devotion to the Crown. The attendance of representatives of the Dominion Governments is an earnest of goodwill with which sister-states of the Commonwealth of Nations will follow our labours.

"The association of Indian Princes for the first time in a joint conclave with representatives of the people of British India is symbolical of the gradual moulding together of India into one whole. What better example could we have than the goodly array of distinguished Prime Ministers, who have been with us consulting about Dominion affairs?

"When I turn to representatives of British India I am mindful of India's different communities, languages and interests, but I am reminded still more of the quickening and unifying influences, which have grown irresistibly from her contact with Great Britain, and of the aspirations for a united India, which were in the minds of her philosophers and her rulers before the first English traders set foot on her shores.

"Nor is it without significance that we who, though not of India, also seek India's honour, are drawn from all three Parties in this Parliament, on the inter-play of whose rivalries, no less than ideals, is built up our British system of Government.

"But apart from these things, surely the simple fact that we have come here to sit at one table with the set and sole purpose of India's advancement within the companionship of the Commonwealth is in itself an undeniable sign of the progress towards that end and also an inspiring challenge to reach an agreement.

"We must now begin our labours. Many things have been said in the past, whether in anger or blindness or for mischief, which we had better forget at this table.

"Whatever be the story that is to be written of this Conference, be assured that it will be written. Let us strive to make it worthy of the best political genius of our peoples and add by it to the respect paid by the world to both our nations."

MR. THOMPSON EXPLAINS.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I know that in the present unhappy estrangement an Englishman who does not accept without reservations the extreme National Congress position cannot hope for justice from Indian opinion. I am not bothering about the misrepresentations of myself that are appearing in the Indian press. But I have respect for the Indian Social Reformer, and believe it likes to be honest and fair. So let me say that it simply is not true that I engaged in anti-Indian propaganda in America. I was teaching English literature, when the Foreign Policy Association were told about me, and drew me into the controversy, in which I was kept thereafter by Indians no less than Americans. I do not suppose any British speaker ever had friendlier relations with Indian opponents; I was careful of Indian self-respect throughout, and it was on the complaint of Indians that Mr. Gandhi cabled repudiating the man against whom I debated, on the ground that he misrepresented the Indian cause. So I had high support, unless the notification that was sent round the American press, that Mr. Gandhi desired America to "beware of" my opponent, was an invention. And in my five articles in the Times, I wrote not one sentence that could hurt Indian susceptibilities, even inflamed as they now are.

I am afraid I do not accept Lord Rothermere as an authority on India, and if he said that four shillings in the pound of every Englishman's income came from India he was talking nonsense. But I do not care what you say in matters of detail. What is important is that those Indians who still wish for a peaceful settlement should realise that there are many Englishmen like myself, who are not offended by anything, however bitter, that Indians say, but feel strongly that American intervention is both ignorant and self-righteous, and that American reformers would be braver and better employed if they attended to American affairs. You, and many other Indians, were annoyed when Miss Mayo "butted in," but are pleased when Upton Close and Dr. Sunderland do it. For myself I claim consistency. I was Miss Mayo's first and severest English critic, and Lala Lajpat Rai quotes me at a length in his "Unhappy India." I see no right on America's part to interfere, and the interference, as I have shown, is valueless, except to our own extremists, whom it strengthens. I want both Miss Mayo and Dr. Sunderland to leave alone a matter they do not understand. For the rest, if England could 'walk out of India' I should be glad. Since I cannot see how she can, I want a settlement on terms that will satisfy Indian self-respect. And no one can produce anything from my speeches or writings that justifies the charge of anti-Indian propaganda.

REVOLT AGAINST RELIGION.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,
Sir,

Dnyanodaya, a Christian Weekly of Poona, of several years' standing, in its issue for October 30, 1930, has given far too much importance to a weekly entitled, "Revolt." To say that the latter speaks on behalf of India as a whole, is very much like a blind man saying that an elephant looks like a trunk of a tree after feeling one of its legs. Dnyanodaya quotes extracts from "Revolt" and comments under the heading "The New Factor of Indian Atheism."

This means that we are confronted with a new factor in India, the factor of plain stark atheism in a blatant denial of God. We call it a new factor because India has hitherto been rightly represented as given up to the worship of her three hundred million gods, (probably the word 'gods' when in plural begins with a small letter) but within recent years there has developed an opposite tendency which can only be described as a revolt against religion. "We propose" writes the Dnyanodaya, "by means of a few illustrations from the pages of the weekly paper called Revolt to show something of the process that has led to this strange development. The quotations will show the kind of religion against which the educated mind of India is revolting, for the revolt in question is limited almost entirely to India's educated people." (underlining is mine).

I think I will be committing a sin by attempting to reproduce the quotations here. But I am sincerely sorry that a Christian paper "representing six Missionary Societies" should waste much time in taking into consideration the views of a few Atheists, who, I hope, have now changed their views. They will do better to study the present situation in India with an open mind and then understand the true colour and greatness of India's religious thought and the presence of God in the heart of Indians and in India. If, as they affirm, "the educated mind of India is revolting against religion and God," I am afraid they have not sufficiently come into contact with the educated men and women of India. They are not being fair to the educated people of India; but we, as Indians, should not find fault with them for they know not what they say. If a few educated minds turn away from God and Religion, there must be something very much lacking in Western culture. May I suppose that the lacking element is Religion? I wish Christian Missions in India looked into the brighter aspect of the great Religions of India. Hinduism with its numerous Gods has very much more to contribute to Western Nations in exchange for their theory of Christianity and Machine Guns and Bombs and other instruments of destruction.

INDIA'S SUPREME NEED.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,
Sir

Referring to the Note under the above heading in the I. S. R. of November 1, 1930 I wish to point out that Hinduism still expects the one sinless Incarnation. To Christians it is inconceivable how any incarnation but a sinless one could claim to be an incarnation of God. The good news that Christ's messengers strive to give to India is that the sinless Incarnation has come and that whosoever believeth in Him has life everlasting.

To say that India's supreme need is to know God's Incarnation is therefore not to ignore India's doctrine of many incarnations. The time will come when "the son of Man" will reveal himself to all seekers of truth as the only perfect man and the only incarnation of God on earth.

Chhindwara, }
5th November 1930 } V. RINMAN.

[Hinduism regards "sin" as the result of "ignorance" and the knowledge of God as its true remedy. An Incarnation, being God Himself in the flesh, cannot be ignorant of Himself and, therefore, sin has no meaning for Him. This may be too abstruse for Christian Missionaries but it was quite clear to Jesus Christ. "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free." Ed. I. S. R.]

WOMEN'S FRANCHISE.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.
Sir,

In most of the schemes I have seen put forth to extend the franchise to our women, notably the Simon scheme, those women are to be given the vote whose husbands, whether alive or dead, are or would be eligible to be voters in their own right. This way of extending the franchise is of course open to the objection that it bases one's eligibility as a voter on the eligibility of one's spouse. But another aspect of it which has escaped general notice is that its adoption would logically require, from the stand-point of equality of the sexes, that the vote should be extended to the husbands and widowers of females eligible to the franchise in their own right. It is curious how in such cases we forget to raise the male to the level of his female partner. But equality demands it.

If the wife of a reigning King is styled Queen, why should not the husband of a reigning Queen be styled King? Is it because they fear that a 'King' connotes much more than a mere courtesy title like 'Queen' does, that they withhold the title of King from the consort of a Queen regnant? If so, it is surely a slur on the sex—I mean, the female sex—in these days of sex-equality.

Similar is the case with the franchise. If a he-man's right to the vote is powerful enough to let him impart it to a she-man, but not vice versa, then surely the she-man is on a lower plane. Equality cannot tolerate such an arrangement.

A CHRISTIAN MISSIONARIES' MANIFESTO.

British missionaries, working in India have issued a statement on the present political situation in the course of which they express the hope that the Round Table Conference will lead to a just and lasting settlement of the Indian problem. The statement says:

"We, men and women of British nationality, who are working in India in connection with various missionary societies feel that it is our duty as Christian people to make a statement regarding the present political situation, which we hope will be of some help to our brethren in the West.

"We are not politicians, and we realise that party politics as such lie outside our sphere; but we feel that the present movement is more than political. It touches the springs of personal and national life, and as Christian men and women we feel that we cannot remain silent in regard to issues which have caused such widespread and deep disturbance in the lives of men.

"We have to face a situation that is marked by misunderstanding, distrust and bitterness. We recognise that many explanations may be advanced to account for this, but we would record our conviction that the main cause is to be found in the growing sense of ignominy in the minds of Indian people that the destiny of the nation lies in the hands of another people.

"To us the national awakening is a very real thing, and it is our belief that no settlement will be satisfactory that does not respect Indian sentiment and make for the recovery of national self-respect.

"India is now of age and can speak for herself. We therefore, urge that the principle should be fully and frankly recognised that the determining factor in laying down the lines of India's future constitution should be the wishes of the people of India.

"This principle is held by politicians of all schools, and it is one that accords with our deepest Christian convictions. Its acceptance by the suzerain power would go far to ensure the success of the Round Table Conference.

"We are fully aware of the complexity of the problems connected with the future Government of India, and in particular we are sensible that the acceptance of the principle we have urged may give rise to grave anxiety in the minds of many regarding the position of the minority communities in India. But we feel that in this matter Indian leadership must be trusted.

"During the past months, when emotion has so largely taken the place of constructive thinking we have been doing what we could to strengthen the hands of all who were striving for peace, and we will continue to do so. For we feel that for an adequate and final solution of the political problems, which are in themselves sufficiently difficult, there must be a wide diffusion of a more Christian spirit of good-will, and a restoration of mutual respect and trust.

"We, as a Christian people, must be ready to show the forbearance, faith and Christian love which are prepared to take risks for the establishment of this spirit of friendship and goodwill.

"We look forward with deep and prayerful interest to the Round Table Conference and we regard it as a good omen that it will be opened by the King-Emperor. We have every confidence that the Indian representatives will give clear and convincing expression to the prevailing mind of the country, and we are equally confident that they will receive a fair and friendly hearing. It is our earnest hope that the Conference will lead to a just and lasting settlement, and that the Indian and British peoples may go forward in an honourable partnership which will be for the highest good of both."

The signatories to the missionaries' manifesto number over 200, including the Rev. John Mackenzie, Principal, Wilson College, Bombay; the Rev. J. Z. Hodge, Secretary, National Christian Council; the Rev. G. H. C. Angus, Principal, Serampore College; Bishop Pakenham Walsh, Principal, Bishop's College, Calcutta; Dr. A. G. Emmet, Nandyal; also all members of the Cambridge Mission to Delhi and numerous members of the Church of England and the Church of Scotland Missionary Societies, also of Baptist, Wesleyan Congregational and other missionary societies.

A Widow-Marriage in Rajahmundry:—Under the auspices of the Hithakarini Samaj, a widow-marriage was celebrated in the Ananda Gardens, Rajahmundry at 5-30 p.m. on Wednesday the 29th October 1930, according to Hindu rites. The bride is Srimathi Chittamma, an inmate of the V. H. Widows' Home, Rajahmundry. The bride-groom is Sriyuta Maguluri Brahmayya Garu of Pechala-Tadiparru in Guntur district. Both of them belong to Viswa-Brahmin community. The bride-groom is getting on well in his caste-profession. Some Kamma gentlemen and Viswa-brahmins encouraged him to take this step and many of them attended the marriage also. Arava Adinarayanamurti garu, P. Kameswara Rao B. A., B. L., Ch. Satyanarayana garu B. A., B. L., B. Kameswara Rao garu, B. A. L. T., D. Narayana Rao garu, B. Nagayya Chowdary garu, D. Somalinga Chatiyula garu were the prominent among those present on the occasion. Thanks are specially due to them, as they could manage to attend the function, inspite of very bad weather. K. Hanumanta Rao Secretary, Hithakarini Samaj, Rajahmundry, 30th, October 30.

POLICE CENSORSHIP OF THE PRESS.

The Commissioner of Police, Bombay, has sent the following communique to the Editors of Bombay daily newspapers:

"I notice that though several Congress organisations have been declared unlawful, the press in Bombay are publishing their statements, resolutions and other news of their activities and programme.

As publication of matter of this kind is tantamount to assisting the operations of these unlawful associations, which is an offence under Section 17 (1) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act XIV of 1908, I hereby warn you to abstain from publishing such reports."

JOURNALIST'S PROTEST.

A meeting of journalists in Bombay was held on Sunday, November 9, in the office of the "Bombay Chronicle." Messrs. K. Natarajan, K. P. Khadilkar, S. Sadanand, S. A. Brelvi, N. H. Belgaumwala, S. P. Kapadia and U. Subramaniam were present. Mr. Natarajan presided. The letter of the Commissioner of Police to newspapers was discussed and the following resolution was passed:

"This meeting of journalists in Bombay enters its emphatic protest against the amazing warning addressed by the Commissioner of Police to newspapers in Bombay against publishing "statements, resolutions, and other news of the activities and programme" of bodies declared unlawful by the Government. Journalism is as much an honourable and responsible profession as law and medicine and the Commissioner's warning is on the same footing as a warning to lawyers and doctors would be, not to defend or treat persons connected with bodies declared "unlawful" in as much as that would also be tantamount to helping their activities. It may be recalled that his Excellency the Viceroy explicitly stated that the Press Ordinance did not apply to publication of news relating to matters covered by it. The Commissioner's warning, therefore, goes much beyond the Viceroy's Ordinance and is a serious encroachment on the liberty of the Press which in the public interest is bound in duty to put the public in possession of all facts necessary to form a correct judgment on the trend of events in the country. The warning of the Commissioner is hasty, ill-considered and uncalled for and an affront to journalism, and this meeting trusts that it will be promptly withdrawn and that in all matters connected with the Press, the longstanding practice of Government themselves dealing with the Press will, on no account, be departed from."

The Chairman was authorised to send a copy of the resolution to his Excellency the Governor and the Home Member, Bombay Government.

AN OFFICIAL EXPLANATION.

The daily papers had the following announcement on Tuesday:—

"The Associated Press of India understands, after discussion with the authorities concerned, that the purpose of the warning to the press recently issued by the Commissioner of Police was not to prevent the publication of news regarding events that had occurred or of news of obviously general interest with regard to the activities of the Congress or other bodies, but the warning was directed against undue advertisement of the propagandist activities of and programmes of bodies declared unlawful in as much as such advertisement is calculated to lead to breaches of the law, conflict with the authorities and the promotion of unconstitutional agitation."

WHEN MAGISTRATES DIFFER?

[ We print below the proceedings in four successive days before four Presidency Magistrates in the cases of persons charged with the offences of belonging to an unlawful association and assisting its operations. The last case, before Mr. Khairaz is still pending, and we therefore, hold over our comments for the present. Ed. I. S. R. ]

(Times of India, Nov. 6).

Manoramabai Shinde and Ratanbai Dhanji, two women were placed before Mr. D. N. D. Khandalawala, Presidency Magistrate, Third Court, Bombay, on Wednesday, under Section 17 (1) and (2) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act. They were arrested near the Esplanade Maidan on Tuesday evening where a meeting to congratulate Mr. H. D. Rajah on his conviction by the Chief Presidency Magistrate had been advertised to be held. His Worship found them guilty under Section 17 (1) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, namely on the charge of being members of an unlawful association, and sentenced them to pay a fine of Rs. 250, or in default, to undergo rigorous imprisonment for six weeks.

Mr. Spencer, Police Prosecutor, said that a meeting had been advertised to be held on the Esplanade Maidan on Tuesday evening, to congratulate Mr. H. D. Rajah who was convicted by the Chief Presidency Magistrate on a charge of sedition. Supdt. Home found a crowd on Waudby Road, and among them the two ladies were shouting the usual slogans. He told them to desist and clear away. They refused to do so and they were arrested. On the person of Manoramabai was a "kirpan" which she took out and showed to a police officer. Two badges of the "Ladies' Satyagrahi Dal" were recovered from their persons.

Superintendent Home was then examined for the prosecution.

Manoramabai stated that as they could not get away they stood on Waudby Road. Meanwhile a crowd collected. She joined the crowd in shouting some slogans. The police dispersed the crowd and arrested them. Continuing, she said they were members of the Akali Dal Volunteer corps, and according to its rules she had to keep a "kirpan." However they were non-violent satyagrahis. Ratanbai stated that she joined the Dal only recently, that she had not been given the "kirpan" by the Dal. Manoramabai further stated that the "Ladies' Satyagrahi Dal" had not been declared unlawful. Nor had the Akali Satyagrahi Dal been declared unlawful. To the police the kesaria sari was a red rag to a bull. Their association had not been declared unlawful.

Two witnesses were examined for the defence.

His worship, in delivering judgment, remarked that the accused were persuaded to move away from Waudby Road, but they did not do so. Mr. Home was therefore obliged to arrest them. They were dressed in the kesaria sari (saffron coloured sari), which was worn by women working in a particular association. The accused said they did not belong to any unlawful association. The Hindustani Seva Dal had been declared an unlawful association by the Government. Members of that body also put on the kesaria sari. This, His Worship held, was nothing but a change in the name with a view to circumventing the Government order.

(Free Press Journal November 7).

"In order to improve the economic condition of India, we have been peacefully persuading our countrymen and countrywomen not to buy foreign cloth. If that is a crime according to the Government, we gladly plead guilty" said Mrs. Shantaben, wife of Dr. Bhaskar Patel and Mrs. Navalben Harilal Daphtary, when placed before Mr. H. P. H. Destur Chief Presidency Magistrate this afternoon just before lunch time under section 17 (1) and (2) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act. The two ladies were arrested in front of Haji Haroon's shop at Sitaram Building.

Deputy Inspector Macarthy said that he went to the shop on receiving telephone message and arrested the ladies while they were sitting in front of the shop. He did not see them preventing anybody from entering the shop.

Questioned by His Lordship, Mrs. Patel began to read a statement which was written in Gujarati. The Magistrate asked her to hand him the statement, which was as follows :

"In order to improve the economic condition of India we have been peacefully persuading our countrymen and countrywomen not to buy foreign cloth. If that is a crime according to the Government we gladly plead guilty. And we hope that our arrests will open the eyes of our brothers, the foreign cloth dealers and that the sight of the arrests of their daughters and sisters in front of their shops will induce them not to deal in foreign cloth any more. We hope our countrymen including yourself, will cease feeding the hand of repression and do all in your power to increase the prosperity of the country."

His worship on reading the statement said: They were not picketing at all.

Mr. Macarthy: They were sitting outside the shop.

His worship: They say they were there to explain and dissuade people from purchasing foreign cloth. That is not picketing according to the ruling of the High Court.

Mr. Thanawala: In view of the ruling I have nothing to say.

His worship: Are you a member of the Desh Sevika Sangh or the Hindusthani Seva Dal.

The ladies replied that as they were arrested the prosecution ought to know that.

The Magistrate: The shopkeeper has complained that you were not peacefully picketing.

The ladies said that they had made their statement and that they had nothing to add to it.

His worship adjourned the case till after lunch time, as Mr. Macarthy said he would lead evidence.

The ladies were again placed before the Court at 3-30 p.m. when Mr. Macarthy said that he had no evidence to lead.

His worship acquitted both the ladies.

(Free Press Journal Nov. 8.)

Miss Kamakoti Natarajan, daughter of Mr. K. Natarajan, Mrs. Indramani Bhatt and Miss Suraj Ohunilal, who were arrested in the noon for picketing two foreign cloth shops that remained open at New Oharni Road, were placed before Mr. Indaravadan Mehta in the afternoon, at the Girgaon Police Court.

Sergeant Tylor, giving evidence said that the police received information that picketing had begun. Constables were sent to watch. At the appearance of the police most of the shops closed down and there were only two shops open; viz Messrs. Dayalbhai's and Eruohshaw's. He saw customers being intercepted and talked to but he could not hear what it was.

The ladies did not want to cross examine the Sergeant.

Questioned by the Court they all refused to take part in the proceedings.

Deputy Inspector Sait in his evidence deposed that he raided the offices of the Desh Sevika at O. P. Tank on the 15th October. He seized some correspondence and files. There was a list of Sevikas wherein appeared the names of the accused against numbers 14, 28, and 82 respectively. The list contained 437 names.

When questioned again whether they wished to say anything all the three refused to take any part in the proceedings but Miss Natarajan added "I am a daughter of Mother India and in that sense I want to serve India.

At this juncture Mr. Kama Bhide, advocate, wanted to give evidence but the accused did not want his evidence nor did the Court allow him.

The accused refused to sign the statement papers, Miss Suraj Ohunilal refused to give even her age but her father who was present in the court enlightened the court and said it was 17.

In his summing up the Magistrate said that as far as picketing was concerned prosecution had not proved molestation but it was proved that they were members of an unlawful assembly. So under Sec. 17 (1) he convicted Miss Natarajan and Mrs. Indramani Bhatt to two months simple imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 50 or another months' imprisonment in default. Miss Suraj Ohunilal was given the option of a fine of Rs. 100 or in default one month's simple.

Bombay (Weekly) Chronicle, Nov. 9.

To The Editor "The Chronicle."

Sir.—I am instructed by the Presidency Magistrate, 4th Court to address you as follows:—

His Worship's attention has been drawn to a misleading heading and untrue report of a case against Miss K. Natarajan and two others appearing on page 7 of your issue of 9th instant.

The heading "For Picketing" is misleading as the three ladies were not convicted for picketing. The report that they were convicted for assisting in the operation of an unlawful association is false as they were convicted under Section 17 (1) of Act XIV of 1908 for being members of the "Desh Sevika Sangh" a body declared unlawful by Bombay Government Notification of 14th October 1930. His Worship distinctly held that he held them not guilty for picketing.

It seems that either your reporter was not present or being present did not hear the judgement being delivered.

His worship will, therefore, thank you to correct the report in your paper at the earliest opportunity.—Yours etc.

PINTO.

JUDICIAL CLERK.

Girgaon Police Court, Bombay.

( Indian Daily Mail. Nov. 11 )

Ramanlal Jal Singhbhai and five others, who were arrested by Sgt. Beddow of the Pydhonie police station yesterday, were placed before Mr. G. B. Khairas, Presidency Magistrate charged with picketing.

Mr. Barodia, conducting the prosecution, said that the six accused were seen picketing foreign cloth shops, which was one of the activities of the Congress Committee which had been declared unlawful.

Sergt. Beddow, in his evidence, said that he saw the accused standing in front of some shops, exhorting people not to buy foreign cloth.

His Worship asked him if they caused any molestation to customers to which witness replied in the negative.

His Worship held that peaceful picketing was no offence.

Mr. Barodia said that by picketing they were assisting the operations of an unlawful association (the Bombay Congress Committee.)

But his Worship maintained that as long as the "pickets" caused no molestation they committed no offence.

Mr. Barodia, wanted time to consider the matter further and the case was therefore postponed for to-morrow.

SOCIAL SWARAJ IN KASHMIR.

( BY A MULKI. )

The statesmen of the world have admitted that social re-construction of a people must precede any political reforms. A society whose social background is unsafe may smack of a larva stage and is doomed in the whirlpool of political storm. It is a thing which mere newspaper articles and platform lectures can not make secure forget as they generally do the practical aspect of a problem. And how difficult it is to build a social edifice that can stand even earthquakes and tempests in a people wide apart in creed and traditions can be better imagined than expressed. Imagine a Rajput tracing his heredity to sun and moon; a Brahmin proud of his superior caste as a hereditary world teacher turning over the pages of Manu for reference in vain; a Mussulman quoting a chapter from Quran, the only book revealed by God from his pulpit and so on, signs determined only to prolong our social degeneracy.

Maharaja Harisingh, alive to this, took up the matter into his own hands for mere love of his subjects. He who can claim to have travelled abroad and to have come in contact with the progressive races of the world could not for even a single moment tolerate to sit indifferently, and he has accomplished with the help of legislation what would have taken selfish and noisy social workers years to achieve. Is it too much if he is ranked among the social reformers and patriots of the world which, if we were to ask his consent, he would unhesitatingly refuse? He would refuse because, sincere as he is, he will never want fame as we people understand it.

The first thing he did was to pass the Early Marriage Prevention Act which prevents marriage of boys under eighteen and of girls under fourteen, a thing in which the Indian Legislative Assembly succeeded after years of hard debates and mutual bickering. How sad was the mentality of the people in this respect will be seen from the following account. The Rajput would betroth his child on the very day of its birth and before the child had crossed its fourth or fifth mile stone it would be counted among the married. The Kashmiri Pandit would think it a great sin on account of which he had to face the wrath of the gods if his girl remained unmarried after eight or nine years of age. The Mussulman demanded nothing but freedom in this respect no matter whether the Quran was adhered to or not. Such was the condition of the people more than ninety per cent. of whom exulted in conservatism not knowing whither they were going.

The whole of the State does not claim a population of more than thirty two lacs. Kashmir hardly contains eighteen lacs. Srinagar, one of the largest cities of the Indian Empire, can boast of one and a half lac of people only. While it consumed thousands of mounds of tobacco of its own production it also imported cigarettes worth thousands of rupees inspite of a huge import duty. The condition was such that boys of very tender age were taking to this habit and there was hardly a boy who did not smoke. Sometimes a poor boy who could not afford a pipe was seen smoking an imitation cigarette made of mere paper. Just imagine what a severe effect this habit was having upon the whole race. What guardians and school teachers had practically failed to check, His Highness with one stroke of his pen prohibited by passing the Juvenile Smoking Act. Its effect on the State Exchequer is apparent but His Highness is a prince who cares not for revenue in the interests of his subjects.

The Rajputs of Jammu, proud of their honour, had fallen into a very bad custom. They would kill their girls as soon as they were born to save their honour from any future outrage. Mere passing of a law could not have the desired effect. His Highness, therefore, promised them a plot of land for every girl and this is saving many a girl from being prematurely put to death. They also would not take to husbandry. His Highness himself one day handled the plough before the whole Biradri at Jammu which act of His Highness atonce changed their mentality. That was like a true leader who can only then command a following when he first himself sets the example.

Achhoots are a people who either because of their birth or their profession are still looked down upon by other castes inspite of gigantic efforts put in this direction by many a worthy son of Mother India. At Jammu also their presence would not be tolerated at public schools, public wells and so on by Rajputs and Brahmins both. High Highness threw public schools and public wells open to them and granted them special scholarships. Today they enjoy the same civic rights as other castes,

The State of Jammu and Kashmir was as much known for its poverty as for its beauty. An outsider coming to the State would first ask for a girl. And girls were available very cheap on account of the poverty of the people. The parents, necessitated by economic stress, would seldom hesitate to sell their girls to unknown people. Sometimes when a girl was not forthcoming of her own will or with consent of her parents she would be stolen away and carried to far off places for prostitution. Most of such girls were found in Calcutta, Bombay, Karachi and other places. His Highness, on being acquainted with this, took very severe preventive measures against this heinous practice. The magistracy and the public were specially instructed to check Barda Faroshi (traffic in women) and the practice has now stopped to a great extent. The Muslims and the Dogras were the principal victims of this trade.

The last but not the least in importance was the act of His Highness' Government to prepare a sanitation film at a cost of about rupees ten thousand to educate the masses, especially the female section, who are almost cent per cent illiterate in sanitation and hygiene and to prevent Tuberculosis which is daily growing in Kashmir.

We desire to make it known here with all the emphasis we can command that this scheme of social reconstruction would not still have shown the desired result in the distant future had not His Highness timely hit upon the idea of female education on a wider scale. Every year heavy sums are being earmarked for female schools; today we find numerous schools—high, middle and primary—spread in the State under well-paid inspectresses and teachers and who knows that this net-work may not grow thicker in the immediate future. A women's welfare association has also been started under the patronage of His Highness which provides parks, sports etc. for the girls. This Association also helps the Women's Welfare Trust, a solely private enterprise, in its work of female uplift.

This is the record of a ruler who has been on the throne only for the last few years. Does it not without any frown or favour throw the record of any other modern ruler into shade? We venture to make the statement because no other ruler known to us can boast of such service to the people. There is always a big gulf between actual service and lip service and we dare say that the service which His Highness has rendered to his people during the last few years has been actual, inspired by good motives and prompted by honest feelings.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Far-Fetched:—An illustration of the loss inflicted on the tax-payer by the ill-advised operations of the supporters of Civil Disobedience, says a Bombay Government Press Note, is afforded by the facts relating to the damage done to the Gurlhosur Causeway. This Causeway which is 875 ft. long and 23 ft. wide is situated on the Dharwar-Bagewadi road and was constructed at a cost of about Rs. 43,000 to facilitate the crossing of the Malaprabha river. It is on the main road leading to Yellama Hill which is a sacred place and carries the heavy traffic to the Yellama fairs held almost every month. It also permits through traffic from Murgod, Rail-Hongal, Bagewadi, Kittur and Belgaum on the West to Saundatti, Dharwar etc., on the East and South. Since April last the Civil Disobedience movement has taken the form of cutting down Shendi trees in forests adjoining the tributaries and on the banks of the Malaprabha. Monsoon floods brought down the trunks of these trees which choked up all the openings of the Causeway, the flood water thereby being diverted over to the right bank of the Causeway and scouring heavily downstream. Nearly 150 ft. length of downstream wall has been breached and the whole of the sloping apron washed out. Traffic has been temporarily stopped. Work worth about Rs. 4,000 has been washed out. Temporary repairs to the Causeway will cost Rs. 500, while the cost of reconstructing the damaged portion will be nearly Rs. 10,000.

Tales from Sanskrit Dramatists:—These tales (published by Messrs G. A. Natesan & Co., Madras. Rs. Two) which range over the vast field of Sanskrit Drama from Bhasa down to Visakhadatta include such well-known plays as Vision of Vasavadatta, Avimaraka, Sakuntala, Malavikagnimitra, Vikramorvasiya, Mricchakatika, Malati Madhava, Nagananda, Ratnavali, and Mudrarakhasa. They are written on the lines of Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare, and are intended to bring the treasures of the classics within reach of the lay reader. To the scholar, the English garb in which they are presented will renew old acquaintances redolent with the rich similes of the original and to the ordinary reader unacquainted with Sanskrit they are a welcome diversion. The tales are prefixed with short sketches of the respective authors coupled with critical notes on the Plays concerned. And they are told in easy and elegant English which must be particularly attractive to students in our schools and colleges. They are so written as to present the original in a fresh and vigorous style. Among those who have contributed to the volume are Prof. M. Hiriyanna, M.A., Dr. S. K. De, M.A., Ph. D., Dr. Kunhan Raja, M.A., Ph. D., Dr. P. S. Subramania Sastri, Vidvan G. I. Somayaji, M.A., Mr. T. L. Krishnaswami Ayyar, B.A., M.L., and Kamala Sathianadhan, M.A., while Sir O. V. Kumaraswami Sastri, Rd. judge, Madras High Court, has prefixed the Tales with an introduction.

New Bombay Ministers:—In exercise of the powers conferred by section 52, sub-section (1) of the Government of India Act, His Excellency the Governor of the Presidency of Bombay has appointed 1. Maulvi Rafiuddin Ahmad, Bar-at-Law, 2. Sardar Sir Rustom Jehangir Vakil, Kt., 3. Rao Bahadur Siddappa Totappa Kamblil, B.A. LL.B., to be his Ministers to administer transferred subjects. The Honourable Ministers took upon themselves the execution of their office on the 10th instant.

NOTES.

Thursday's Mass Meetings:—The Govern- ment of Bombay, we trust, will realise the signi- ficance of the "record attendance"—the Bombay Chronicle puts it at 75,000—at the public meeting held on Thursday on the Esplanade Maidan. Its object was to protest against "the un- chivalrous, brutal and inhuman treatment" of Indian women by the Bombay Police at the flag salutation ceremony on the 26th October. The meeting was presided over by Dr. Deshmukh and among the speakers were persons belonging to all communities. Intense resentment was the keynote of all the speeches. The principal resolution which was moved by Sir Purshottamdas Thakurdas and seconded by Mr. Meyer Nissim, ran as follows :

"That this public meeting of the citizens of Bombay emphatically protests against the unchival- rous, brutal and inhuman treatment accorded to the Indian women who had assembled on the Azad Maidan for the flag salutation ceremony on Sunday, October 26 and strongly condemns, in particular, the action of the police in taking a number of women outside the city limits and leaving them there, un- cared for and unattended. That this meeting considers this act of the police as an insult to India's womanhood and is in defiance of all canons of decent and civilised behaviour."

Sir Purshottamdas in a powerful speech charged the Police with having taken the women away to a distant place "in the hope or expectation that some one would pick them up and, perhaps, harass them in a manner which would prevent them from participating in such activities again." Whether this is the right diagnosis or not—it is strange that no explanation of the purpose of the act has been forthcoming—the Police are undoubtedly open to the blame of having grossly abused their power and of oppression of these women. The resolution was passed unanimously. If Government do not intend to flout public opinion, they must find another Commissioner of Police both in the public interests and in fairness to the present incumbent, Mr. G. S. Wilson. The head of the Bombay Police, whose conduct has been publicly censured by such a representative body of citizens, cannot but be handicapped in the discharge of his responsible duties by this formal withdrawal of public confidence. In selecting a successor, Govern- ment may well consider the desirability of choosing for the office an Indian of good social position, education and high character, who is in touch with Indian society and need not rely, wholly at any rate, on the C. I. D. for his knowledge of tendencies and happenings. Some friends, we know, disapprove of this step, and one of them roundly says that an Indian will be worse than an European and that what has to be changed is the system. We agree that the system is bad and must be changed. But we have faith in the stability of the Indian character when it is given free scope and has not to guide itself by the judgment of non-Indian superiors. Let a good Indian be chosen, and let him be given a fair field, and let us judge from results. In any case, no Indian will be guilty of the particular kind of conduct against which the meeting entered its emphatic protest.

When Magistrates Differ:—We reprinted last week from the columns of the local dailies reports of four cases disposed of in four successive days by four of the Presidency Magistrates of Bombay. In the first case, which came before Mr. D. N. D. Khandalawala on the 5th instant, two women wearing saffron- coloured saris were arrested by the Police for shouting slogans in a crowd and refusing to move when ordered to do so. The charges on which they were put up before the Magistrate were that they were members of an unlawful association and that they assisted its activities— Section 17 (1) and (2) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act. The women said that the Asso- ciation to which they belonged, namely, the Akali Dal Volunteer Camp had not been notified as an unlawful association. The learned Magistrate held that though the Akali Dal Volunteers had not been declared to be unlawful, they were neverthe- less guilty. They were, he said, dressed in the Kesaria sari (saffron coloured sari), which was worn by women working in a particular asso- ciation. The accused said they did not belong to any unlawful association. The Hindustani Seva Dal had been declared an unlawful association by the Government. Members of that body also put on the Kesaria sari. This his worship held, was nothing but a change in the name with a view to circumventing the Government order. The second case was tried the following day by the chief Presidency Magistrate, Mr. H. P. H. Dastur. In this case, also, the accused were charged with the same offences under the same section of the same Code. The women were sitting outside a foreign cloth shop whose owner called up the Police. His worship held that this was not picketing under the High Court ruling, that they were not assisting the activities of any unlawful body, and that, as the Police had no evidence to lead, they were not members of an unlawful association. He acquitted the accused. In the third case, under the same section, which was similar to this one, Mr. Indravadan Mehta held that the accused were not guilty of molestation under the Viceroy's Ordinance, and that they were not guilty of assisting the activities of an unlawful association, but found them guilty of the offence of being members of one. In the fourth case, Mr. Khairaz, held that picketing was not an offence, that boycott of foreign cloth was not unlawful and that a person cannot be convicted of being a member of an unlawful association after being arrested for picketing.

Some Questions :—Not only do the different Magistrates differ in their interpretation of the law, but the same Magistrate sometimes seems to interpret the law one way and sometimes in another way. The newspaper reports might have omitted some essential point, and as our comments are based upon them, they are open to correction if it should be found that they have done so in any case. Without going into the details, we may say that all the Magistrates do not seem to remember in every case that they are not prosecutors but that they are discharging judicial functions and, in addition, have also in this country to supply the place of juries which, in England, assist judges in assessing the evidence before the Courts. Would a jury find an accused guilty of an offence when the person alleged to be offended against appears in the Court and says that he is not aggrieved by such conduct? Is a Magistrate justified in disallowing members of the public who have personal knowledge of facts alleged by prosecution witnesses and who in open Court request permission to state facts which contradict or put a different complexion on them? The refusal of Congressmen to participate in the proceedings, it is true, creates a difficulty, but has not the Court a duty to see that no one is unjustly punished even though he refuses to defend himself? Then, again, in political cases, is it any good Magistrates indulging in admonitions to accused persons? If a picketter gets two annas and free board and lodging for his daily drudgery, does that stand on a different plane from the case of others who get paid for their services perhaps on a higher scale?

Pandit Motilal and Ahimsa :—Ahimsa is not merely a negative quality. Non-violence is a very inadequate equivalent to it. The correct English term for Ahimsa is "charity" as St. Paul defines it in his letter to the Corinthians. The rank and file of Congressmen put too narrow an interpretation on the term. We heard not long ago of a volunteer who, on receiving some provocation, took off his Gandhi cap, and engaged in a hand-to-hand fight with the person who had given offence. His idea seems to be that when he was not wearing the cap, his duty to be non-violent ceased. With great respect, we cannot help thinking that Pandit Motilal Nehru's denunciation of the unknown person who paid Miss Nehru's fine as "the deadliest enemy" of himself and the country, and exhortation to the country to treat him as such, falls under a like category. When Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya was fined by a Bombay Magistrate three months ago for not obeying a Police order, we said that it was utter folly for any one who has work to do outside, to waste his time in jail if he could help it. The Pandit's fine was paid and he was released. Perhaps, if he had remained in jail, he might not have been arrested in Delhi for attending the Congress Working Committee. But that is not the point. Why should Panditjee who, next to Mahatma Gandhi, should be the leading exponent of Ahimsa in its true sense, denounce an unknown individual as "the deadliest enemy" of the country and call upon the public to treat him as such, for acting on a good impulse?

Wanton Provocation :—The Evening News of India published in its issue of the 5th November a photograph showing a Police sergeant trailing in the mud the national flag, which had been hoisted at Chowpati that morning. We do not know if the Sergeant was acting under any law or ordinance in doing so, but it shows deplorable lack of taste and good feeling for any man to hurt the feelings of his fellowmen in this wanton way. The flag is held in reverence by thousands of men and women all over the country, and if it had to be removed, it can certainly be removed without unnecessary offence. Officers of the rank of sergeants are not expected to possess a high standard of taste, but it is the duty of higher officials to inculcate in their subordinates the importance of discharging their function without needlessly wounding the feelings of any section of the public. "With what measure ye mete, the same shall be meted out to you again."

A Symbolical Incident :—The incident of the elephants at the Lord Mayor's show in London on the 9th instant has a symbolical significance. The Indian elephant is an intense nationalist and it has, when transported to foreign countries, refused to take orders from any one except an Indian and in any language except the vernacular to which it is accustomed. It is slow and steady in its gait and the late Lord Ripon when he was Viceroy of India once held up its cautious method of feeling with one foot that the ground under it was safe before putting down another, as a model for statesmen. It has, it would seem, also accepted the principle of non-violence as, after seizing the lion mascot which was dropped by one of the sight-seers, it and its three companions quietly rejoined the procession and resumed their stately progress amid the plaudits of children. India, too, does not intend to fall out of the Commonwealth. She too, after seizing the mascot of Swaraj, will join the procession of the Commonwealth and proceed in her stately way amid the plaudits of the other Dominions who are "small deer" in comparison.

Provincial Governments' Despatches :—The Government of India released this week the despatches of Provincial Governments on the Simon Commission's recommendations. Provincial Governments, it is generally thought, take a narrower view of Indian constitutional reform than the Central Government. But this is by no means the case on this occasion. Several of the Provincial Governments have recommended more liberal measures than the Government of India.

BOMBAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1930.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA SCHEME.

The Government of India sum up their general observations at the beginning of their Despatch in a sentence which is evidently intended as the key to the whole of their proposals. "The solution of our difficulties," they observe, "is not to be found by attenuating the channels through which Indian political opinion finds expression, but rather by harnessing that opinion to constructive work, so that what is at present a danger to the stability of Government may be converted into its main support."

It is impossible to put the whole problem more tersely. In that sentence, Government supply the test on which their proposals were presumably framed and by which, therefore, they may fairly be judged. Does their scheme widen and deepen the channels through which Indian political opinion can find expression or does it further attenuate the existing inadequate channels?

Indian political opinion is embodied in the national demand which Government correctly describe. "The national demand," they observe, "is for self-government and dominion status. The demand for self-government, stated in practical terms, is that India should be allowed to manage her own affairs both in the provinces, and, subject to any temporary safeguards that may be requisite at the centre. The claim to dominion status, so far as that can be separated from ideas of self-government has perhaps a sentimental, but not on that account any less potent aspect. The demand is not only that India should be enabled actually within necessary limits to settle her own affairs but that she should be publicly recognized before the eyes of the world as competent to settle them. Both these ideas are included by Indian opinion in that dominion status which the announcement by His Excellency the Viceroy on the 31st October 1929, described as the natural issue of India's constitutional progress." This, again, is a frank and faithful statement of the national demand and its acceptance by the British Government through the Viceroy.

How far are the Government proposals calculated to help India first as regards the management of her affairs, (1) in the provinces and (2) at the centre, and, secondly, as regards public recognition in the eyes of the world as competent to settle them?

Generally speaking the scheme of the Simon Commission relating to provinces met with little criticism from Indian opinion, and that little was to the effect that it pushed the principle of provincial autonomy much too far having regard to certain tendencies of Indian history and the necessities of national evolution.

The Government of India propose to modify the Commission's scheme in two ways. Their proposals, if adopted, would make provincial governments less autonomous but more autocratic than in that scheme. Provincial autonomy is most needed in respect of finance, and the Government of India's criticisms of Sir Walter Layton's proposals show that they are not inclined to relax their control in that respect. As a solatium, the Government of India throw out the suggestion, which the Simon Commission did not think of, that Governors of provinces should be invested with Ordinance-making power like that possessed and exercised so freely of late by the Governor-General. The Criminal Procedure Code and the Police Act confer powers on the local authorities which sometimes exceed that of the Governor-General. The Police Commissioner of Bombay recently issued a warning to journalists which went much beyond the Viceroy's lately lapsed Press Ordinance. It cannot be said that the Government of India's proposals in regard to Provinces enlarge the channels through which Indian opinion can find expression.

Does their scheme for the Central Government and Legislature fulfil this end? The Simon Commission suggested that the necessity of retaining British troops in the Indian Army was the principal obstacle to the immediate grant of self-government to India. The Government of India point out that this is not the case, and that there are other difficulties as well, relating to finance and commerce, which preclude it. The only improvement that they propose is that the Governor-General, who is to appoint the members of his Executive Council under the Simon Commission scheme, may select some from the elected members of the Legislature. But the salaries of these like those of the official members, are to be non-votable, and their position under the proposals, will otherwise be so beset before and behind by limitations, that the only activity in which they can engage is to do propaganda on behalf of their official colleagues in the Legislature and outside. As no weight whatever will be attached by the public to these salaried preachers of subservience to the powers that be, the Government proposal will not increase the avenues by which Indian opinion can influence the policies of Government.

In the course of their general observations, the Government of India truly remark: "One consequence of the growth of nationalist feeling has been to make Indian opinion exceedingly sensitive to any ill-informed judgments, which might appear to indicate a lack of trust, and to all that might be held to mark the status of India as inferior to that of other units in the Empire." This consideration so clearly stated is conspicuous by its absence from the proposals of the Government of India for the constitution and functions of the Central Government. The proposal to select some Ministers from among elected members of the Legislative Assembly, is surrounded with so many safeguards that it looks as if the main purpose of this reform is not so much to give Indian opinion a wider channel for expressing itself in the policy of Government as to secure non-officials of influence who will act as propagandists of government policy. Experience during the last ten years in the Provinces has shown that, with rare exceptions, the Minister in a diarchic system inevitably tends to become the henchman of the bureaucracy. The same thing will happen in the Central Government as the number and importance of the reserved subjects are much more overwhelmingly superior to the subjects that are to be transferred to Ministers. According to the Government's own estimate 80 per cent. of the net revenues of the Central Government will be "a first charge," and "the authority responsible for seeing that these payments are made has an intimate concern in the whole financial administration of the country." This means that the reserved side of the Central Government will be all in all and that the non-officials admitted to the Executive Council will have perforce to be nonentities.

Government seriously think that the elimination of the Secretary of State's control will, of itself, be accepted by the people of India as conferring, vis-a-vis the Dominions and foreign countries, a distinct individuality on the Government of India. The result, on the contrary, will be to make that Government in theory, as it is already largely in fact, irresponsible to anybody. No questions can be asked in Parliament about Indian administration, as the Government of India will be a distinct entity. No control can be exercised by the Indian Legislature over it, as 80 per cent. of its expenditure will be non-votable. The resulting condition will be to establish a military autocracy under the Governor-General who, and not the Government, is to control the Army! The Government of India must have a very poor idea of the Indian people, since they believe, honestly no doubt, that this will be accepted as a satisfactory response to the national demand. The Simon Commission erred from want of light. The Government has sinned against the light which, as shown in their general observations, illuminates their mental view of the problem.

We publish to-day a scheme which has met with the approval of most of the few friends to whom it was sent for opinion. It contemplates the immediate inauguration of self-government and the institution of measures to effectuate the complete transition to Dominion status within a maximum period of ten years. It is a simple and straightforward scheme devoid of the most conspicuous defects of the Simon and the Government of India schemes.

THE SWADESHI MOVEMENT.

Next after food, clothing is a primary necessity of human beings. In fact, it is even more important as Indian women in particular will rather starve than go naked. No country should depend upon another country to clothe its people. Yet, India, the ancient home of the cotton industry, has to import millions of yards worth crores of rupees to clothe her men, women and children from outside. During the Great War, when imports stopped, there was a cloth famine which led to dire results in parts of the country.

The necessity of establishing and fostering swadeshi industries was realised by eminent Indians like Dadabhai Naoroji, Jamshedji Tata and Mahadev Govind Ranade many years ago. But not until the present national movement made it an outstanding feature of its programme, did the spirit of swadeshi penetrate to the large masses of the population. To-day, it may be truly said that swadeshi is a basic creed of the religion of Indian patriotism.

In all self-governing countries, it is the recognised duty of the State to promote home industries, protecting them to the utmost extent needed against outside competition. "The most powerful instrument which a Government desirous of pursuing an active programme of industrial development can employ," observe the Government of India in their Despatch on Constitutional Reforms, "is the customs tariff." India is as yet without this powerful means of industrial development. For want of it, she is obliged to rely on propaganda to persuade merchants on the one hand, to refrain from selling videshi cloth and the people, on the other, not to buy and use foreign cloth. Thanks to the great national awakening and especially to the self-sacrificing zeal with which the women of India have thrown themselves into the movement, the former propaganda has succeeded in bringing about a great and steady decrease in the imports of piece-goods. Scores of women nurtured in the loving care of parents, brothers and husbands, have renounced without regret the protection of their homes and cheerfully accepted the restraints of jail life, administered by officials who are strangers to them and often strangers to the social and deep-rooted sentiments of Indian society. The necessity for their sacrifice arises out of their fear that merchants cannot be relied upon to forego a chance of making a profit, however much they may be convinced that what is gain to them is loss to the country.

The Bombay Swadeshi League has been considering how this distressing state of things can be avoided, and if it can in any way help to mitigate, if not to put an end to it together. This, can be done in two ways open to the League within its constitution as a non-political body. The first is to disabuse the merchants of the illusion that their trade has suffered principally owing to the political movement for the boycott of foreign cloth. Sir Purshottamdas Thakurdas, Mr. Hurseinbhoy Lalji and Mr. Walchand Hirachand have shown recently that the political movement is only slightly responsible for the trade depression and that, if it was closed down today, the situation so far as the merchants are concerned will not be any better. But every merchant is not an economist, and it is difficult for them to realise that with the purchasing power of the agriculturist, that is, the great mass of the population, at its present low level, they cannot expect to make large sales of cloth, swadeshi or foreign, in the country.

The Bombay Swadeshi League is convinced that if the cloth dealers were perfectly free to dispose of their goods, their difficulties will not be materially decreased. But there is the danger that, owing to the dumping methods followed by foreign manufacturers, the little demand for cloth that there is, may be deflected from swadeshi to videshi cloth. This is a danger which must be guarded against. The zealous efforts of Indian women have averted this danger so far, but these cannot and should not be indefinitely prolonged. There is a simple way in which each one of us can co-operate to consolidate the results attained so far and permanently direct Indian demand to Indian cloth. The rich people in the country are a minute fraction of the population and, besides, however rich a man may be, there is a strict limit to the quantity of food or clothes he can use up. The masses have little to spend even on food, and can spare still less for clothing. Ex-King Amanullah of Afghanistan when he was in Bombay was struck most of all by the scanty clothing of the people as compared with his subjects. The largest part of the demand for cloth comes from the middle classes who are, in India as elsewhere, the backbone of society. These are literate and keenly sensitive to promptings of patriotism. They can understand the vital importance of fostering home industries. They have realised the humiliation of service in businesses which cut across their national sentiments. It is in their power to give the cause their most powerful support, by pledging themselves to purchase every yard of cloth they need from swadeshi production only, regarding the diversion of a single rupee to foreign cloth as a sin against the nation. It is to them, then, that this appeal is primarily made, and we are confident that it will meet with a ready and prompt response.

THE FUTURE INDIAN CONSTITUTION.

[We print below the outlines of a scheme drafted by Sir M. Virveswaraya, late Dewan of Mysore, which has been generally approved by most of the friends to whom it has been submitted in India. Copies have been sent so as to reach the members of the Round Table Conference in time for the opening. A fuller exposition of the scheme has been prepared, and we have a few copies of it which we shall be glad to send to any one who applies for it.]

Any new Constitution that may be devised for the country as a whole should fulfil the following essential conditions :—

(1) The Constitution should be built up on the Dominion model from the very start and provision should be made in the Dominion of India Act for affairs to be so shaped that complete Dominion Status is automatically attained within a period not exceeding ten years.

(2) The new Government, Central or Provincial, should be a responsible Government from the very start, i. e., the Executive of the administration in each case should be responsible to its Legislature.

(3) The powers and functions of Government should be divided into two spheres, viz., the Central Government and the Governments of the component Provinces and States, like that in Canada or Australia.

(4) The Central Government should be strong. It should not be weakened on any account either by separating from it the control over Defence Forces or by severing its present association with the Indian States. The integrity of the country as a Single National Unit should be maintained.

The Central Government at the present time has control over the Army, the Air Forces, and what there is of the Navy and it also exercises paramountcy over Indian States. The new Dominion Government should continue to exercise this control to enable it to function as an organic whole. Any deprivation of existing powers will weaken it. It is recognised that in the transition stage, various limitations and safeguards, will be necessary, but all such limitations should automatically disappear within a period not exceeding ten years.

Legislative power should be invested in a Parliament consisting of the King-Emperor represented by the Governor-General, a Senate and a House of Representatives.

The Lower House of the Central Legislature may be called the House of Representatives and the Upper House, the Senate. The strength of the former may be 320 members, or about one member per million of inhabitants of the country, and of the latter about 100 members. All members of both Houses should be elected and none should be nominated.

Seats to the extent of about 23 per cent. may be reserved in both Chambers for representatives from Indian States. This percentage represents the proportion of the population of the States to that of India as a whole.

There should be statutory provision for maintaining schedules of all India subjects, i. e., subjects common to both Provinces and States. There will also be a separate list of subjects which relate exclusively to the Provinces. The Indian States representatives in both Houses of Central Legislature, will participate in dealing with such subjects as are scheduled as all-India subjects.

Under responsible government the Governor-General will be required to form his Executive Council or Cabinet from the members of the Indian Legislature possessing the confidence of that Legislature and dependent for their office on the support of a majority of members of the Lower House. The Lower House will possess the power over taxation and appropriations.

Literacy and property will be qualifications for voting.

The members of each House should be paid a regular salary for their services at the rate of, say, Rs. 5,000 or Rs. 6,000 per annum plus a free pass on railways. The British House of Commons and the Dominion Legislatures pay their Members regular salaries and in a country of great distances like India, such payment is absolutely necessary to secure the services of competent members for the new Legislatures.

The Governor-General will be the representative of the King-Emperor and he will exercise the executive power vested in His Majesty, of giving his consent to legislative enactments and administrative decisions of the Central Legislature, acting by and with the advice of the Executive Council or Cabinet.

The future Indian Cabinet should consist of an adequate number of ministers, in order that the many and complex problems of administration and development which are likely to arise in the near future, when a responsible government comes into existence, may receive sufficient and continuous attention.

Perhaps 15 Ministers should be the minimum. In the Dominion of Canada, there are 23 Ministers although that Dominion has a population of less than 10 millions.

The salaries of Indian Ministers should be between Rs. 3,000 and Rs. 4,000 per mensem, besides the regular allowance given to them as Members of the Legislature. In the very rich countries of the United States of America and Canada, the salaries of corresponding officers do not exceed these amounts.

The principal Federal or all-India subjects will be Currency, Finance, Defence, Tariffs, Opium, Salt, Railways, Posts and Telegraphs, Emigration, and Immigration, Inter-State and Inter-Provincial Relations, Trade and Commerce, all-India Social Legislation and other allied subjects.

A Supreme Court should be established to hear and decide all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution, and the laws of the future Dominion of India and the treaties and contracts made under its authority. The same Court will hear and decide appeals from the High Courts of the Provinces in all other justiciable cases. It may also hear and decide appeals from the highest Courts of Indian States. As far as possible there should be one system of Law and Justice for the whole country.

The powers of the Federal Government and the Provincial Governments should be clearly defined, and whatever powers are not conceded to the Provincial Governments should, for the present, be retained by the Federal Government.

PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS.

The administration of each of the nine British Provinces, including Burma, if it remains within the Indian Federation, will be entrusted to a Governor or Lieut. Governor appointed by the Governor-General in Council, a Unicameral Legislature and a Cabinet composed of 6 to 12 Ministers, their number depending upon the area and population of the Provinces.

The future Provincial Legislatures should be organised as at present on a single Chamber plan, the name of the Chamber being altered from Legislative Council to Legislative Assembly. The omission of the former term is recommended because in practice it is associated with a system which recognises the principle of nomination of members. There should be no nominations to any of the Legislatures of the 9 major Provinces referred to above. The number of members in the Legislatures of the principal Provinces should be increased to 200 or 250, for the present, as recommended by the Simon Commission, and every Provincial Legislature should, after 6 to 8 years, be at liberty to recast its representative system, if it chooses to do so.

The Governor will invite a leading member of the Legislative Assembly, from the party which has the largest number of supporters in the Legislature, to form a Ministry. When the Ministry is formed, joint responsibility of all its members should be insisted on. No official element should find a place in the Ministry as recommended by the Simon Commission.

The list of subjects classed as Provincial under the Government of India Act of 1919 is fairly comprehensive. All local public works, except railways, lines of ships, telegraphs, etc., extending beyond the Province or connecting other Provinces, and all works and undertakings which the Federal Government can administer with advantage in the interests of the country as a whole, should be vested in that Government. In other respects the local administrations should have full freedom for internal development, especially in industries, public works, irrigation schemes and other similar objects. The Government of India may provide for technical advice but should not ordinarily interfere with local initiative.

DOMINION OF INDIA ACT.

The Dominion of India Act should make suitable provision to satisfy the Indian public in respect of the following fundamental issues:—

- (1) Federal Government at the Centre, with a Cabinet responsible to the Central Legislature,
- (2) Full responsible Government in the Provinces, and
- (3) Responsibility for Defence; Safeguarding British interests and minority interests.

The Government of India with all its resources, liabilities, duties and responsibilities, as exist at present, should be transferred to the charge of the new Cabinet which, as already explained, should consist of about 15 Ministers, three at least of whom should hold the portfolios pertaining to India States' affairs.

A Dominion Preparations Commission should be appointed for the purpose of studying Dominion models and preparing the country and administration in accordance with those models as far as may be considered necessary. The Commission should remain in office for 3 to 5 years after the new Government is actually in the country.

Although the reservations and safeguards set forth will be necessary for a period of ten years, that is, till full Dominion Status is attained, yet, from the beginning:—

- (1) The new Government of India should have full control over its financial and economic policies.
- (2) The finances of the Central Government should be clearly and entirely separated from the control of the India Office after making due provision for liabilities to be met, and payments to be made, in England.
- (3) The Government of India should be free to build up its new economic and nation-building policies and activities, with the aid of officers and agencies of its own selection.

Elephants at the Lord Mayor's show:—A Reuter's message of the 10th instant says:—The new Lord Mayor, Sir William Phene Neal is a London county councillor. At his request all the council schools within one and a half miles radius of the Lord Mayor's show were closed today. The result was that an enormous crowd unusually composed of children witnessed a most colourful pageant of the empire ever staged in London, including four Indian elephants with gorgeous trappings and attendants. One of these was responsible for an unfortunate accident. Scared by the shouting of students outside King's College embankment, one of whom was holding a lion mascot and others discharging fireworks, the elephant charged the students who bolted and dropped the mascot which the elephant seized. The other elephants followed. The students were scattered and a number of women and children were trampled on by the crowd which pressed back on the narrow pavement and were slightly injured in the rush. The elephants turned back of their own accord at the entrance to the college into which the students had disappeared and returned to the procession and resumed their stately progress amid the plaudits of children. The rest on the route were unaware of the incident.

THE DANGERS OF OBEDIENCE AND OTHER ESSAYS.*

The citizens and the authorities often come into conflict on vital issues in which the authorities are not always nor necessarily in the right. Should the State repress the subjects or the citizens rise in revolt, should the individual silently bear injustice or risk defiance?

Prof. H. J. Laski, one of the most brilliant and daring political thinkers in England, has endeavoured to reply to this interrogation in a recent book.* We have been so long accustomed in this country to repeat antiquated cliches and obsolete dogmas of orthodox political philosophy of the West that it is refreshing to turn to a more realistic treatment of political problems. For one thing, Prof. Laski has, in a series of scholarly and creative treatises from "Studies in the Problems of Sovereignty" to a "Grammar of Politics" and more recently "Liberty in the Modern State", denied the super-sovereignty of the State which he has regarded as only one institution among a series of institutions in a federal society. He has, in the second place, insisted that the State, like other institutions, must win the loyalty and affection of its subjects by the due performance of its functions. He has, moreover emphasised that the element of command in law is never final but that law is simply an expression of social experience and an instrument of satisfying human desires. Finally, Prof. Laski has argued that the State has and must have moral ends and its actions must be judged by ethical canons applicable to individual conduct. It is only necessary to add that this is almost precisely the political philosophy of Satyagraha. But because it is attempted to be practised instead of being merely preached in neatly-bound volumes—and that too, impudently enough, by a subject-people of the British Empire—its moral significance is never adequately realised; while our broad-minded and statesmanlike politicians who grow ecstatic over political inventions and ideas of the West like the League of Nations or Fascism do not even take the trouble of realising its full implications. If anyone doubts that Satyagraha has the sanction of what is most vital and creative in modern political thought, let him read this latest work of Prof. Laski.

After dwelling on the exaggerated value assigned to obedience which in certain matters has become the condition of material well-being, Prof. Laski goes on to point out the dangers of irrational and apathetic obedience. "We preach incessantly that we are not responsible for the acts of Governments which live by our consent," he observes. A massacre in Amritsar, he adds for instance, moves us little or at best to a mere verbal protest. But such obedience not merely implies inertia; it constitutes a positive dereliction of duty. "An acceptance of injustice to others is the price we pay and are prepared to pay for our own safety," he states. "Silence is acquiescence and a failure to protest against injustice only makes us the less vigilant against invasion of our freedom." Indeed, this is the central thesis of Prof. Laski's essay. He insists repeatedly that by our refusal to protest and act against injustice, we not only weaken the forces striving for justice but reinforce the authority of those whose conduct appears unjust to us. Such acquiescence induces lethargy in citizens and further tyranny on the part of authorities. Inertia leads to tyranny and tyranny thrives in turn on lethargy. Disobedience under such circumstances is not only a right, it is tantamount to a duty. With accents which remind one of Mahatma Gandhi, Prof. Laski observes, "No man ever remains free who acquiesces in what he knows to be wrong." It would no doubt shock those who condemn Gandhiji's movement as an anti-social one to learn that, in Prof. Laski's view, "those are always most truly citizens who insist upon bringing back our rulers to a realisation of the conditions upon which their power is held." Gandhiji has often stated that the State is based not on force but on cooperation and that this cooperation is voluntary and ought to be refused when the State denies the moral purposes for whose realisation it really exists. Prof. Laski in a similar strain contends that "the only ground for obedience to the State is where its purpose is morally superior to that of its opponents." If the State can show that in each particular action, its aim is the good of the community, then and then only is it entitled to obedience in respect of that action. The State, that is to say, cannot claim obedience to ordinances merely because it taxes people in order to provide them an education inefficient in quality and inadequate in volume. It cannot justify lathi-charges simply on the ground that the lathi is the emblem of the majesty of the law.

The moral ends of a State tend, indeed, to set a limit to the absolutism of the governments. "One thing that authority fears to encounter is the insistent conscience of its opponents," observes Prof. Laski. "No State can act in the face of considerable opposition from its citizens, if the latter are deeply and conscientiously moved by the issue in dispute." A despotism exists because, in the ultimate analysis, the people have not the strength to will that it should go; it rests, that is to say, not on the physical might of the rulers but on the psychological attitude of the ruled.

It will no doubt be objected that such a reliance on conscience, a limitation to political obedience and an insistence on the right to rebel is a doctrine of anarchy. Prof. Laski catches this reactionary hull by the horn. His answer to this objection is, in effect, that peace and order will not be challenged by the mass of people unless they have become keenly conscious of a wrong. Popular violence, as Burke showed long ago, is always the outcome of a deep popular sense of wrong. Prof. Laski's diagnosis is similar: only it is more positive and militant in the cause of liberty. "Social peace may well be purchased at too high a price," he remarks "there are kinds of order which are closely akin to death." But this is not all. "Organised disobedience is always the price of injustice. Men do not revolt until wrong has driven them to revolt," he observes. He refuses to agree that we owe the State an unreasoning obedience and insists that when we meet wrong it is our business to challenge it "lest authority be victorious over justice." For, as he says, "the price of freedom is an ultimate courage to resist." And if this should be the motto of all citizens who value freedom, the motto inscribed over our Secretariats should be his observation that "No State is ever securely founded save in the consciences of its citizens."

If only because of the first essay—not to mention the other thoughtful essays on "Teacher and Student," the "Academic Mind," and "Machiavelli and the Present Times"—it deserves to be on the shelf of every serious student of Politics.

The Depressed Classes Mission Society of India:—The 24th Anniversary of the D. O. M. S. of India was recently celebrated by its Poona Branch at the Ahalyashram Hall of the Society at Poona City. Rao Saheb Papanna Jaiya Thade, Hon. Magistrate of Belgaum presided. Mr. D. V. Gaikwad, Life Worker of the Poona Branch conducted a special Divine Service suitable to the occasion. Mr. K. G. Patade Life Member and secretary of the Society reviewed in brief the history of the work done by the several Provincial Branches of the Society founded by Mr. V. R. Shinde since 1906 which he pointed out was a real national service to India, as it very considerably helped India in trying to remove the root cause of her downfall. Mr. Patade concluded by remarking that "Trying to secure Swaraj for India before the complete removal of the sin of untouchability, was a sheer hypocrisy." Mr. A. K. Ghogre Vice-President of the D. O. M. S. Poona, Messrs. G. B. Shinde, K. R. Madhale, R. S. Jadhav, and B. D. Khande also made suitable speeches on the occasion. Rao Saheb Papanna in his speech thanked the workers of the Poona D. O. M. for the honour done to him in asking him to preside over this important meeting. He was glad to observe that the few workers of the Society amidst many difficulties were doing their utmost to continue the good work very ably inaugurated by Mr. Shinde, the veteran champion of the Depressed Classes. He however, expressed his wonder how Mr. Shinde could support the Congress propaganda under Mr. Gandhi, while the latter had not done its utmost in removing the national sin of untouchability. In conclusion he expressed his satisfaction at the successful efforts made by the Poona D. O. M. Committee under the very able leadership of Lt. Col. H. O. Steen, its President in settling the long standing dispute, by mutual good will, with the society's Head Office at Bombay and congratulated the Poona Committee on its being able, during the current year, to construct the much needed compound wall round its buildings with the generous donation of Rs. 3000 from H. H. the Maharaja Holkar of Indore,

MARRIAGE LAW REFORM

(By MR. KOPARGAM RAMAMURTI)

The Reformer of 1st November in its Editorial Note on this subject, for which I am deeply indebted, has taken exception to a statement by the Guardian of Calcutta and raised an interesting doubt as to the law of succession properly applicable to a person's property. The Guardian stated that the law depended on the religion which the person professed at the time of his death. The Reformer however is sure that it is not so and says: "If a Hindu on his deathbed becomes a Christian, or a Christian becomes a Hindu, we do not think it would affect the rights of his heirs under his personal law in the religion which he inherited and followed during life." As the statement demurred to seems to be part of a resume of what I wrote in my article of 11th October on the Indian Christian Marriage Act, I feel I must try to clear the doubt if I may, without being thought pedantic or dogmatic.

"The principle to be remembered is," I said, "that it is the religion professed by a deceased person at the time of his death that determines the law according to which the property left by him shall be shared by his survivors, but not the religion or religions professed by his widow and children or other relations who may claim to be his heirs." I am still unable to see where this proposition is unsound. When the Reformer speaks of the indefeasible "rights of the heirs" of a man who is not actually dead but is still alive though on deathbed, what is probably in mind is the right of the sons and other male members of a joint Hindu family to take their respective shares in the joint property notwithstanding the defection of any one by conversion to another faith. But their right is not a right of heirship. It is a right of joint ownership of the peculiar kind known as coparcenership in Hindu law. The convert in his pre-Christian days may have been the head and manager of a large Hindu joint family and as such held in his hands the whole estate which descended to himself, his brothers and brothers' sons and other male relations jointly from his ancestors. He may also hold properties subsequently acquired with the help of their joint funds or joint labours. But none of these are his entirely. And if sons are born to him they would also acquire an interest in the family properties and diminish his interest correspondingly, because they become co-sharers with him from the date of their birth, though they may not seek actual possession of any part during his life. This interest of the family members, and their right to have their shares separated and delivered to them whenever they want, can never be defeated by any one, not even by the manager and head of the family whether he remains a Hindu or becomes a convert to Christianity.

The immediate legal effect of conversion is entirely personal to the convert himself. He loses the managership of his Hindu family if he was its head and ceases even to be a member of it from the moment of his baptism whether he is on deathbed or in sound health at the time. The fraction to which he is entitled in the family properties which till then was liable to fluctuation through births and deaths of male members in the family, becomes at once fixed and definite and gets also earmarked for him, so that it cannot lapse to the other members even if he died the next moment after baptism. This fraction, together with any self-acquisitions which he may have held separately for his own benefit without allowing them to get mixed up with the joint family properties, forms his separate estate. It is this estate which he is free to dispose of by gift or will even to strangers, and it is in respect of this that the question of heirship arises when the owner dies without making any such disposition. When we speak of any one as the heir of a living person we only imply that he would be the heir if the said person happened to die this instant or if the same set of circumstances as existed at present remained intact till that person died in the fulness of time. Who the actual heirs are must be determined by the law which is applicable to the deceased owner, and what that law is must again be determined by the religion which he professed at the time of his death. It is now well established throughout India that the moment a man becomes a Christian, not indeed by mere verbal allegiance but by formal baptism, the Indian Succession Act begins to govern his estate. It may be that his Hindu son himself, who as coparcener had already taken a share from him, will also succeed to this estate as his heir. But the son's vested right to a share during the father's life and his contingent heirship right to succeed to the father's undisposed separate estate on the latter's death are two distinct rights of different quality and relating to different kinds of property.

The case of heirship to a Christian after his conversion to Hinduism is more simple. There is no joint family system among Christians, and whatever property is held by a Christian is absolutely his own whether it had been originally acquired by his ancestors or by himself. His sons acquire no right to a share of it by their birth. They are either self-helpers or dependents of their father, not co-owners or coparceners with him as in a Hindu family. So when he renounces Christianity and comes into Hinduism he is free to bring his property with him whole and entire, to spend, give or will away as he likes. When he dies, be it but the next moment after his conversion to Hinduism, it only stands to reason to expect that the Hindu law of inheritance will immediately take hold of his estate (A.I.B. 1928 Madras 1279) and hand it over entirely to his sons, leaving to the wife and unmarried daughters nothing but the glorious right of dependence for bare livelihood, while to the married or widowed daughters not even that is left. I should be most happy to learn however that it is not so.

INDIANS IN AFRICA.

Mr. S. A. Waiz, Secretary of the Imperial Indian Citizenship Association recently visited Simla and had an interview with the Hon. Sir Fazli Hussain, the member of the Government of India in charge of the portfolio on questions affecting Indians overseas. In particular he called Sir Fazli Hussain's attention to the situation in South Africa and East Africa. The Hon. Member gave Mr. Waiz a statement in the course of which he said: "Early in February, 1930, the Union Government, as a result of a number of recent judicial pronouncements, set up a Select Committee of the House of Assembly to enquire into these questions and to propose such legislation as it might deem fit. The Government of India have always been conscious of the importance of Indian interests involved, and it was for this reason that they deputed Mr. J. D. Tyson, who was at that time Secretary to their first Agent—the Right Hon. V. S. Sastri—in South Africa, to make suitable representations to the Committee in regard to the safeguarding of legitimate interests of the Indian population and to give the Indian community such assistance as it might need for placing its views before the Committee. As you know, the Committee's report, together with its conclusions, which were embodied in a Bill, were placed on the Table of the Legislative Assembly of the Union on the 13th May and the Bill was read for the first time on the 14th of that month. As soon as the Select Committee's report and draft Bill reached the Government of India, they represented to the Union Government that they should be allowed adequate time to examine carefully the far-reaching provisions of this measure. Our representations met with a favourable response and it was decided to postpone further consideration of the Bill until the following session of the Union Parliament which in all probability will commence in January next. The spirit in which our request was met was but another indication of the friendly relations that had been established by the Cape Town Conference. Our Agent in South Africa has been and is hard at work, discussing the Bill with Indians and others, formulating views and reporting us the situation as it develops from time to time. We sought last July the advice of the Standing Emigration Committee of both Houses of the Indian Legislature on the provisions of the Bill. The advice given by them has been found most valuable and every endeavour is being made to prepare the Indian case as thoroughly as possible.

"Newspaper reports also show that the delegates of India at the Imperial Conference have availed themselves of the opportunity to discuss the situation informally with General Hertzog in London. We hope friendly negotiations will bring about a satisfactory settlement honourable and equitable to the Indians in the Transvaal.

"As regards East Africa, it is generally admitted that the conclusions of His Majesty's Government, which are set forth in the white paper issued in June last, represent a considerable advance on the former position. The Indian community has always attached great importance to the principle of a common electoral roll, and the Government of India have always lent their full support to this view. We still adhere to the opinions expressed in this regard on former occasions and, therefore, naturally welcome the declaration that the establishment of a common roll is the object to be aimed at and attained, with an equal franchise of a civilisation or education character open to all races. The proposal to leave the constitution of the Kenya Legislative Council substantially unaltered is also satisfactory. As regards the scheme of Closer Union, I am aware that apprehensions are entertained in certain quarters that if the three territories of Kenya, Uganda and Tanganyika are brought together for purposes of administration, the spirit of Kenya white settlers, which is one of political domination, might prevail on account of their number and influence and that in particular the interests of Indians in Tanganyika, which is administered under a Mandate, might be affected prejudicially. We shall arrange to apprise the Joint Select Committee of Parliament, when it is constituted, of the views of the Indian community on all these matters. We are told that it will be for the committee itself to decide what procedure it should adopt in regard to the fulfilment of the task to be entrusted to it. When that procedure has been decided, we shall take steps to see that our views are placed before the Committee in the most suitable manner.

Referring to certain speeches made recently in South Africa and also in London, Sir Fazli Hussain said: "I can very well understand that the reports (as they appeared in the press) of the speeches having caused great dismay to Indians. I myself felt astonished and, to be frank, horrified at some of the sentiments as reported in the Press, and only hope that the full speeches will show that the effect produced in the minds of the readers was due to certain passages having been divorced from their context. I am reluctant to believe that in view of the great world movements of thought on these subjects, any of the great Dominions would be prepared to sanction what would seem from the telegraphed reports to be so serious a departure from the principles of British justice and fairplay that have been more than once enunciated by His Majesty's Government. I trust that the two questions of native policy in East Africa, and of Indians in South Africa will be kept entirely apart and distinct and that each issue will be considered separately only in the light of circumstances germane to it.

In conclusion, Sir Fazli said: "Though our task of safeguarding the interests of Indians overseas is one of very great difficulty and delicacy, it is one on which as a rule not only Indian opinion is united, but on which Indian public opinion is reflected in the views the Government of India formulate. Your Association may rest assured of our continued vigilance and of our determination to do all we can to promote the interests of Indians overseas. We know the righteousness of our cause and feel confident that when this is brought to the notice of the statesmen on whom rests the responsibility for these matters, they will recognise its justice."

THE MARTANDAM METHOD.

I am asked to tell you briefly about cooperation as we use it in our Rural Demonstration Centre at Martandam and in its Extension work in the villages of South Travancore. I wish to do this under five heads:—Socialization, Cooperative Credit, Cooperative Production, Cooperative Marketing and Cooperation between Government and Non-Official Agencies.

SOCIALIZATION.

By socialization I mean the bringing of all persons in the area to work together and move together freely and happily, members of all castes and religions, the poor and the more well-to-do, the illiterate and the educated. The slow degree of socialization in India is a condition which most tenaciously has helped to hold this country in poverty. Failure in economy means failure in socialization. Socialization is the first step in co-operation and co-operation the first in socialization.

The intercaste cooperative draws into its membership, out of their similar needs, former ultra individualists. Such men find themselves associating in a very personal business venture, not only with other men, but with men of other castes and creeds. The member finds himself benefitted by this kind of association. He experiences joint liability, but still for his benefit. There is clear evidence in our villages that such a member becomes willing and even keen to join in other inter-communal ventures for his personal and the general good.

We are absolutely opposed in our Rural Work to communal societies or projects of any kind. We will not be connected with a society of any particular religion or caste if it means that other castes and creeds are excluded. Often a group of persons come to us and say: "There is a Co-operative Society in our village. We are not allowed to join." If they be Christians they may say "We want to start a Christian Co-operative." When asked if they like being excluded, they say, "No." Then they readily see that it is not quite the thing to go and do likewise. No, they may start a co-operative society, but it must be wide open in membership to all persons of worthy character. The very strong stand which the Registrar of Co-operative Societies has taken in this same direction is most creditable and has added a great deal to the usefulness of the co-operative movement in Travancore.

MARTANDAM AREA RURAL DEVELOPMENT ASSOCIATION.

We have the Martandam Area Rural Development Association to which all those in the villages of that area, who are trying to improve their own methods and are working for the uplift of agriculture and rural life may belong. In the statement of the objects of this Association the very first is, "To bring the people of all castes and religions to join hands in this work of improving the economic, social, moral and spiritual welfare of the people living in the villages of the Martandam Extension Area."

*A speech delivered by Dr. D. Spencer Hatch on Rural Reconstruction at the International Co-operator's Day at the Jubilee Town Hall, Trivandrum. Dr. Spencer Hatch is the Director of the Rural Reconstruction Department of the Travancore Y. M. C. A.

CO-OPERATIVE CREDIT.

The establishment of co-operative credit here as elsewhere has been the first and easiest step in co-operation for economic improvement. One secretary of our Association gave nearly full time for years to pioneering co-operative credit work in villages of South Travancore. We stuck closely to the principle of giving credit only for known productive purposes. These societies needed the personal attention, training and help of one with a true brotherly spirit. The record of their achievements, showing the purposes for which loans were taken and the benefits derived, is an inspiring one.

One of the unexpected benefits perhaps has been the settling of disputes by arbitration through the Co-operative Society Panchayat. People quite readily turn to this honored committee to save them from the expense, the annoyance and the disgrace of protracted lawsuits.

CO-OPERATIVE PRODUCTION.

Since loans were given for productive purposes, Co-operative credit was the foundation for co-operative production and they are very closely allied. We taught hand-weaving to the poorest boys, but what use was teaching a very poor boy how to weave and simply graduating him from this school? An improved loom called for Rs. 60, and there is a tremendous gap between a poverty stricken boy and Rs. 60. He was helpless and his weaving knowledge useless. But through the co-operative credit society this boy who had established his character during the school could take a loan, buy a loom and immediately began earning and paying back the loan from cloth sold.

We taught poultry keeping. Through the co-operative society many villagers took loans to get the necessary eggs, better breeds of fowls and beginning equipment. We advocate, breed and introduce better cattle. I suppose there may not be an individual in the whole area of village who can afford to own a seed bull like the one we have at our Centre and which in a year's time has some 100 calves in the villages around. But we have a scheme whereby, through co-operative bull associations, we could have several such bulls in the area and all might have the use of them in improving the cattle—one of the greatest needs in India. Wells are needed in many villages. In one village I recently visited there is no well with water in it even during the monsoon. After digging down eighty feet no water was found. A very deep well is required and no one family is able to dig such a well alone. It must be done co-operatively.

NOTES.

The Round Table Conference:—The first plenary session of the Round Table Conference opened on Monday the 17th with a speech from Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru. It was at once tactful and forcible and put the Indian case fairly and clearly. It is now almost the sole credit claimed by the bureaucratic system of Government that it has kept the peace between the several communities of India. Sir Tej Bahadur deftly pricked this bubble when he asked if this claim was borne out by the experience of the last twenty-five years. An impression had been created that Lord Reading would be a strong opponent of Indian political aspirations at the Conference. Sir Tej Bahadur had been for a period the Law Member of the Government of India in Lord Reading's Viceroyalty. He was no doubt drawing upon some common experience during that period when he confidently appealed to Lord Reading to say whether responsible Governments in the Provinces with irresponsibility at the centre, would not lead in a week to a complete break-down of the political system. Then, again, Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru has been the legal adviser of several Princes and knows them intimately. He could, therefore, appeal to them, as he did, to be patriots first and Princes afterwards and to throw their weight into the scale in the demand for equal status for their country in the Indo-British Commonwealth. The speech, it is reported, made an excellent impression on the Conference and it has been well received in this country. There were several noteworthy speeches amongst those which followed. Sir Mahomed Shaffi, the Moslem leader, and His Highness the Jam Sahib, both laid stress on the fact that the present discontent is not confined to the educated minority but was wide-spread among the masses. Begum Shah Nawaz achieved a great personal success by a dainty little speech in which she supported the national demand for Swaraj.

The Prime Minister's Speech:—Writing of Mr. Ramsay Macdonald's opening speech at the Conference we remarked on the almost total absence of anything in it to show that he was no stranger to India and her problems like most British statesmen and that somewhere in the back of his head is stored much accurate information relating to India, her history and her people. Of the speech with which he concluded the first plenary session this cannot be said. He gave full scope on this occasion to his knowledge of and deep interest in the art, philosophy and religion of India as well as her history and political aspirations. The speech has been criticised as platitudinous by some of our contemporaries. Well, it contained many things which were rather of a friendly than of a business character. But surely the establishment of a friendly atmosphere is of the first importance in such Conferences. The speech did much more than this. Mr. Ramsay Macdonald completely succeeded in showing that the Indian delegates were there to urge freely and on perfectly equal terms their demands and that no considerations of red-tape are to be allowed to obscure or over-ride the paramount importance of arriving at a just and honourable settlement on the Indian problem. The Prime Minister, whatever his personal views, has to take as large a mass of British opinion as possible with him, if he is to achieve his objective. His speech was admirably calculated to serve this purpose, particularly in its stress re-iterated from different points on view on the absence of antagonism between British and Indian habits of thought and their modes of approach to the important problems of life. No other British statesman could have made that speech without laying himself open to the charge of affectation. It must be admitted, however, that the effect it has produced on the Indian mind, is not altogether what it would have been a generation back. The public here are now rather impatient of sweet words which, merely because they are sweet, it is disposed to suspect. It is anxious to know what the Prime Minister has actually to offer to satisfy national aspirations and is inclined to be aggressive in manifesting its resolve not to be put off with pleasant reminiscences and flattering references to the excellence of Indian art and philosophy.

Result of English Education:—Mr. J. C. Kumarappa of the Gujarath Vidyapith is one of the keenest students of Indian problems at the present day and his long and varied experience of Western life is of great service in enabling him to see some things, which the home-staying Indian is apt either to exaggerate or to underrate, in their right perspective. The home-staying Indian, however, enjoys a compensating advantage in that he is not exposed to the violent revulsions of feeling which overtake many Indians against Western ways of life and thought as a result of their sojourn in Western lands. The latter has also another advantage, namely, that living and growing with his Indian environment there is no hiatus in his appreciation of the changes in the moral and social life of the country. There is very much in the address, which Mr. Kumarappa delivered at the Punjab Students' Conference early this month and which we are glad to be able to publish, to evoke our warm approval. We entirely agree with him that the future course of Indian progress must be consciously laid out in the direction indicated by her past history and culture and that most of the mistakes of the British administration, since it departed from the wise guidance of the constructive statemanship of Munro, Elphinstone and Malcolm, are due to the increasing neglect of Indian experience extending over many centuries. The tendency has been whenever any problem demanded solution to import British "experts" who generally muddled matters and after wasting time and crores of money returned to their native land beyond the reach of reproach from those whose plight they had worsened. Many of our drainage and irrigation works, the Back Bay reclamation and other ambitious projects, are standing monuments of the folly and futility of this method. Sir Bampfylde Fuller in his interesting book of reminiscences unhesitatingly declares that the activities of the British Indian Agricultural Department, to which he was for many years attached, have been very little to the benefit of India. We are also glad that Mr. Kumarappa points out that, in the social institutions of India which have been condemned wholesale, there may be germs of valuable suggestion for the building up of modern India. Where, however, we are obliged to differ from him is his sweeping condemnation of English education. To begin with, he is in error in thinking that Lord Macaulay was primarily responsible for its introduction. Raja Ram Mohan Roy, rightly known as the father of modern India, had anticipated Macaulay by founding an English school, and was at least as much responsible as Macaulay for the introduction of English education. In our judgment, he was right. The Indian mind at that time had reached a stagnation from which it had to be lifted out, and only a system which challenged it at every point could do that. We do not agree that the main effect of English education has been to denationalise us. On the contrary, it has been almost the sole influence which has roused us to a sense of our duty to ourselves, and brought about the religious and social awakening the results of which we behold on all sides today.

The Martandam Scheme:—We print today the concluding part of Dr. Spencer Hatch's interesting account of the scheme of Practical Co-operation of the Travancore Young Men's Christian Association at Martandam. Generally speaking, missionary methods of rural reconstruction are but of small interest, owing to the fact that they require as a fundamental condition that the villagers should either be actual or prospective converts from their ancestral faiths. This experiment at Martandam, however, is not of that type. In the opening sentences of his paper, Dr. Hatch has made it clear that he and his co-workers are absolutely opposed in their rural work to communal societies or projects of any kind. "We will not," he says, "be connected with a society of any particular religion or caste if it means that other castes and creeds are excluded." Unfortunately in India along caste and communal lines lie the lines of least resistance, and enthusiasts who are eager to show results in the shortest time succumb to the temptation thus offered. The Government of India has been the greatest sinner in this respect and to-day its worst difficulties have arisen from the Frankenstein it unthinkingly raised twenty years ago. Although it is a hard task to overcome the communal spirit, yet it is only by striving to overcome it that we can create the force needed to lift the country out of its medievalism. Dr. Hatch emphasises the important point often overlooked that efforts to improve and increase production unaccompanied by efforts to increase distribution are doomed to end not only in failure of a particular effort but also to discourage future efforts for a long time. This is also what Mr. M. N. Chatterji said in his letter from Leipzig, on the electrification of village industries, which we published in the Reformer of the 8th November.

Welcome To Father Winslow:—There was an interesting gathering at Neighbourhood House, New Nagpada, on Saturday evening to welcome on his return from England the Rev. Father Winslow, founder and head of the Christa Seva Sangh of Poona. All communities and schools of opinion were represented in the gathering and amongst the speakers. Father Winslow has brought with him a fresh recruit to the Sangh in the person of Father Barber. In a brief speech conveying his thanks for the cordial greetings offered to him, Father Winslow described the British attitude towards India as he found it in the course of his lecturing tours in Great Britain. First, there were the diehards inspired by and consisting mainly of retired Governors and servicemen, who were bitterly opposed to Indian political advancement. Then, there was the large mass of the population whose mind was a blank as regards India. The workers, said Father Winslow, were inclined to be sympathetic whenever Indian aspirations were properly explained to them. Lastly, there was a small but growing class of intellectual and spiritually-minded people who took the view that Indian claims to self-government should meet with adequate response. Apart from the Indian problem and, in a way, embracing it, is the insistent claim amongst British religious leaders that the Church has a great responsibility to apply its tests to the entire field of life, and to exert itself actively to ensure their being satisfied. It is pleasing to understand that the members of the Sangh have the support of high Anglican Church dignitaries in their attitude to Indian nationalism.

Sir Visvesvaraya Scheme:—The copies of the pamphlet containing the full scheme of constitutional government are nearly exhausted. It is possible that a second edition may be issued with some alterations in the light of the proceedings of the Round Table Conference. Those who would like to have a copy may apply enclosing a half anna stamp to the office of this paper.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1930.

"FROM DEPENDENCY TO DOMINION."

We published in the last issue the outlines of a scheme drawn up by Sir M. Visvesvaraya having for its object the conversion of the present irresponsible system of Indian government into a fully responsible one. A fuller exposition of the scheme is given in the form of a pamphlet of which this article is largely a summary. The transition from a Dependency to a Dominion, according to the scheme, would be commenced immediately, and should be completed within a period of ten years. The first step is for Parliament to pass a Dominion Act. Immediately after that, the Central Legislature and the Provincial Legislatures should be convoked according to its provisions. When these bodies assemble, the Governor-General and the Governors will call upon the leaders of the largest group to form Cabinets. The scheme proposes to have 15 Ministers, all of them chosen from amongst members of the Legislature. The new Cabinets thus formed will take over from the present Government the system of administration as it is. The transformation of the present system to one suited to responsible government in all particulars, will be the first important duty of the new Government. For this purpose, it is suggested that a Dominion Preparations Commission should be appointed for studying Dominion models and preparing the country and administration in accordance with them as far as may be considered necessary. This Commission will place itself in communication with other Dominions, despatch agents or deputations to them to collect material as required and frame the measures needed to build up the new form of Government and Legislature and to be put into operation as they are approved by them and the Governor-General as the King-Emperor's representative. The Dominion Preparations Commission, it is expected may take from three to five years after the new Government is actually installed to complete its work.

The fundamental feature of the scheme is that the integrity of the country as a single national unit should be maintained. This is possible only if the new Dominion Government continues to exercise all its present functions, including control over the Army, the Air Forces and what there is of the Navy, and also paramountcy over Indian States. The new Dominion Government should continue to exercise this control to enable it to function as an organic whole. Any deprivation of existing powers must weaken it. When the scheme was drafted it was not certain whether the States would agree to come into it immediately. This doubt, however, has been removed by developments since the meeting of the Round Table Conference. One main difficulty in the way of Dominion Government has, therefore, ceased to exist. Apprehensions are felt in some quarters regarding what is regarded as the sudden change in the attitude of the Princes. We should dismiss all such apprehensions from our mind, in view of the fact that in all such matters it is not the actual motives of the individuals concerned but great social forces originating in natural and historical conditions which work themselves out with irresistible effect. Moreover, if the States are not with the new Dominion Government, they will necessarily be against it. They are with us and we must take them with us. Nor are they long likely to be a drag on British India. Even today, some of the most advanced Indian politicians hail from Indian States. It may be noted that Sir Visvesvaraya's scheme provides that the representatives of the States in the Federal Assembly should, in all cases, be elected by constituencies approximating, as far as may be, having regard to local conditions, to corresponding constituencies in British India. We must look to the people of the States to see that this condition is faithfully observed and that their representatives are men who can hold their own with the ablest men in British India. By taking the States into the scheme at the very start their people are provided with a powerful lever of constitutional reform in their own administrations.

The Scheme requires that the Army like other subjects should be immediately transferred to a responsible Minister. An understanding to the effect that a fixed grant for Defence purposes will be provided for a period of, say, five years, will give all the needed safeguard for Army administration. In the meanwhile, strenuous efforts should be made by establishing a military college and in all other possible ways to re-officer the Indian troops entirely with Indian trained officers as rapidly as possible. The main argument of the Simon Commission against the transfer of the Army to a responsible Minister, is that British officers will not serve under Indians. A very effective reply is given to this argument by the Central Provinces Government in their dispatch on the Simon Commission's Report to the Government of India. They observe :

"So far as this Government can judge, local Indian sentiment is not in favour of an army divorced from the central government of India as proposed by the Commission, nor would Indians generally be willing to barter their duty to defend themselves for an Imperial subsidy. What Indians want is that the Indian army should remain, as it now is, on an equality with the British army, in the toils and achievements of which it has shared in many countries and for many years, but that a resolute attempt should be made to make it Indian in fact as in name. Fifteen years ago, when the Islington Commission swept away all racial distinctions in the services, and started the process of real Indianisation, the Indian Civil Service was Indian only in name, and many were the forebodings as to what would happen if Indians were admitted to it in numbers sufficient to make it Indian in reality after a period of years. The attempt was made and there has been no catastrophe. What India asks now is that similar steps be taken to Indianise the officer ranks of the Indian army, and that as a pledge of intentions an Indian Sandhurst be set up, and Indian military schools be multiplied to feed it. For the rest the hope is that, if possible, the risk will be taken of reducing somewhat the present crushing military expenditure so as to set free funds for "nation building" purposes. It is not for this Government to pronounce on the feasibility of translating these aspirations into practice, but it ventures to record its sympathy with them."

No Indian could have put the argument, so well as the Government of the Central Provinces in the above paragraph.

Next after the Indian States and the Army, some may claim even before them, comes the question of safeguarding minority interests. Among such interests British financial interests have a special place. The scheme provides that reasonable guarantees should be given that all legitimate rights in this direction will be respected in the same way as in the other Dominions of the Commonwealth. As regards minorities, and with special reference to the Muslim minority, the Scheme expects that the leaders on both sides will come to an agreement at the first opportunity, if the British Government announces that it is ready to grant Dominion Status. In this connection, we are in a position to state that the tirades against Mr. M. R. Jayakar by Mr. F. W. Wilson in the Indian Daily Mail are wholly without foundation. The position of the Hindu leaders is that in a self-governing India a little more or a little less for majorities and minorities is of no consequence but so long as India is not self-governing, the minority communities are under a constant temptation to use their weightage to bargain with the Government for special concessions. We have no doubt whatever that the moment the road to Dominion Status is clear, the Hindu leaders will astonish not only the Muslims but all minorities including the least, by their spontaneous liberality.

THE CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT.

The Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act was passed in 1908 by the Imperial Legislative Council in order to deal with anarchical crimes. It had two parts—Part I for creating special tribunals to try such cases, and Part II to declare certain associations unlawful. Part I was repealed in 1922 and a Bill to repeal Part II, which was introduced by Sir H. S. Gour, was carried in the Assembly by a large majority in September 1925 but was thrown out by the Council of State. By the Act of 1908, the Governor-General in Council was empowered to declare associations unlawful and any one participating in the activities of such associations after the declaration were punishable with 6 months imprisonment. By the Devolution Act of 1922, this power, among others, was transferred to Local Governments. Dr. Gour put the case for repeal mainly on the ground that the purpose for which this Act was intended was equally well, if not better, served by the Criminal Conspiracies Act of 1913. The Bill for repeal was strongly opposed by Government, and as said above, it was thrown out in the Council of State. The grounds on which it was declared to be necessary to keep it on the statute-book, entirely related to the likelihood of the recrudescence of anarchic crime at any time. "I quite admit," said Sir Malcolm Hailey, then Home Member, "that, on the last occasion when this Act was used, the net was swept wide and large number of men came into it who were not themselves criminals. That I admit. But I also wish to point out that, when reference is made to the wide use of this Act, it must be remembered very large numbers of men offered themselves for arrest, or when they were arrested, refused to plead in our Courts. We were not, responsible for that." (Legislative Assembly, March 25, 1924.) The reference is to the non-co-operation volunteers. Sir Alexander Muddiman who succeeded Sir Malcolm Hailey also made the existence or possibility of anarchical outrages, his main reason for opposing its repeal. "You say," he said "Why not use the conspiracy law? Is not that sufficient? Sir, the answer is 'Because our witnesses are intimidated, our witnesses are shot? Am I to stand by and see the Commissioner of Police hunted for his life? Am I to be told that when we have to cope with the bomb and the revolver, we should hand over any of the special powers we have?' This argument did not convince the Assembly which by a large majority passed Dr. Gour's Bill. But it convinced the Council of State which when the Bill went up to it, threw it out.

It has been necessary to go into this past history of the Act to show that it was originally and primarily intended against anarchic violence. Sir Malcolm Hailey admitted that it was not intended to apply to non-violent agitation and that it was a mistake to have applied it to the non-co-operation volunteers in 1921. The mistake has been repeated. The non-violent organizations of the Congress and even such bodies as the Rashtriya Stree Sabha and Desh Sevika Sangh have been declared unlawful associations under the Act. No man in his senses can imagine that these women's organisations are likely to hunt down the Police Commissioner with bomb and revolver. Their main activities have recently been picketing liquor and foreign cloth shops, and surely the Government by law established in British India does not appear to the best advantage as the champion of the liquor and foreign cloth trade against the Sevikas who by peaceful persuasion endeavoured to wean their people from these wasteful trades. The moral of it is, that it will never do to entrust the Executive, which is absolutely out of touch and sympathy with the people, with emergency powers, without placing a strict limit on their exercise. In this case, a power which was obtained on the plea of the bomb and the revolver, is being employed against women whose sole weapons are normally their plaintive voices and pathetic gestures—at the worst their flashing lips and fulgurant eyes.

THE INDIAN CHRISTIAN MARRIAGE ACT.

THE ABUSE OF SECTION 68.

(BY MR. KOPARGAM RAMAMURTI).

The decision just to hand of the Additional Sessions Judge of Elore acquitting the six accused, Hindu and Christian, male and female, who stood charged before him under section 68 of the Indian Christian Marriage Act, will no doubt be received with thankfulness and relief by all right-minded people of every religion. (vide the "Hindu" of 5th November, Page 13.)

The offence for which the Manager of the United Lutheran Christian Mission at Bhimavaram deemed it his Christian duty and privilege to run these numerous innocents to earth, was that a marriage was performed with Hindu rites on the 20th of March last between the 6th accused who was a Christian girl and the 5th accused who was a Hindu, at which the 1st accused officiated as a Hindu priest, and the remaining accused, who were no other than the parents of the bridegroom and bride, actually assisted at the function with their physical presence and consenting mind. Under the peculiar exigencies arising out of the misuse of a law enacted for a different purpose, it was the priest who had to be arraigned in this case as the principal offender, and the marrying couple themselves and their parents were made out to be his "abettors"!

If the learned Sessions Judge found it easier to give substantial justice by letting out the accused by the back door, accepting their plea that such of them as were alleged to be Christians had ceased to be so before the marriage, than by taking hold of the prosecution story itself as it stood and laying the axe boldly at the absurd pretension that section 68 was intended by the legislators of the Indian Christian Marriage Act to govern Hindu marriages and rituals as well, the fault is not at all his. There is a higher tribunal above him in Madras which must fully take the blame. It must also repent for whatever suffering has been unjustly inflicted in the past and might with equal injustice be inflicted in future in this Presidency under the assumption tacitly made, that a Christian Act professedly intended for regulating Christian marriages and framed practically without the concurrence or knowledge of the teeming non-Christian populations of this country, may nevertheless be utilised to override all non-Christian rights, traditions and liberties.

To the superior-minded, over-zealous and empire-building evangelist of a certain type, and to his complaisant recruiting agent or "Manager" in India, it is excusable if section 68 of the Indian Christian Marriage Act appears as legitimate and handy for his purposes as the death-dealing electric-wire fence might seem to an extensive slave-owner naturally anxious to prevent his chattel escaping or being lifted from his lawful custody. But the unfortunate mischance by which the High Court of Judicature at Madras unwarily "slipped" into the habit of supporting the extra-theistic operations of such people, mistaking the object and scope of that section in a number of cases culminating in the Full Bench decision of Chief Justice Wallis in 40 Madras, which Justices Napier and Sadasivaier had endeavoured in vain to avert, constitutes a judicial tragedy of the first magnitude which every justice-loving person in India must take deeply to heart and strive to remedy.

The Indian Christian Marriage Act of 1872, now in force, is a consolidating and amending Act, replacing certain earlier Acts, English and Indian, which were all enabling statutes relating to Christian marriages in India. Its object is not to prevent Christians or other people marrying as they wish, but to enable such of them as wish to be married as Christians under its provisions to protect themselves and their posterity by a lawful and binding marriage. It is obvious that no marriage can be solemnised under the Christian Marriage Act where both parties to it are non-Christian in their religious faith. To be eligible to be married under the Act, at least one person out of the marrying pair must be a Christian. But from this proposition to postulate the converse, and assert that no marriage shall be performed except under the Indian Christian Marriage Act when at least one of the parties to be married is a Christian, is to take a long jump backwards. And it would be a more preposterous jump still to declare that if any non-Christian priest performs such a marriage with his own non-Christian ritual, he shall be either transported or given rigorous imprisonment for 10 years, and that the marrying couple also, together with their parents, friends and relations, shall be similarly punished as the abettors of the priest! That is, however, exactly what is being religiously done by designing persons in India, with the strength of High Court rulings at their back, under cover of section 68 of that Act, to the utter confusion and unspeakable suffering and terror of humble, poor and ignorant village folk, whose only fault is that they seek to pursue their own individual likings in their social and family relations and refuse to be dictated to by the masterful "civilising" agent of a higher power who has piously assumed lordship over their souls and bodies for the extirpation of false religions and heathen customs.

For ensuring the validity of a marriage under the Indian Christian Marriage Act, two other conditions must be fulfilled besides one or both of the parties being Christian. Firstly, the person solemnizing it must be one duly authorized under the Act. Secondly, the ritual or procedure followed must be strictly in accordance with the provisions of the Act. If either condition fails, the marriage would be null and void. Penalties are therefore provided to punish those who, whether as bride or bridegroom or solemnizer of a marriage professedly performed under the Act, do anything wilfully and falsely or unauthorizedly so as to render the marriage void. Section 68 is one of such penal provisions. It is directed against the solemnizer of a Christian marriage. If he professes to conduct it with the formalities prescribed by the Act and actually does so without being duly authorized under the Act, and has not even taken the precaution of securing for the occasion the presence of the Christian Marriage Registrar of the district, the marriage is void and he becomes punishable. A Hindu or a Muhammadan priest performing a marriage with Hindu or Moslem rites obviously cannot be guilty of an offence under this section, because he does not pretend to solemnize a Christian marriage or to do anything in pursuance of the Christian law. No Christian Marriage Registrar, surely, can be called upon or is bound to attend and witness a non-Christian wedding even if one of the parties happens to be a Christian. While, in fact, no Hindu priest of any caste will ever perform a Hindu-Christian marriage except in the belief that the preliminary part of the marriage ritual with its Hindu worship and purificatory Mantras turns the latter also into a Hindu, it must be remembered that according to Quranic law and usage, a Moslem priest is perfectly entitled to solemnize a Moslem marriage between a Moslem and a Christian without the latter renouncing or forfeiting the Christian religion. Yet it is these unpretending and unpretentious non-Christian priests who are being cruelly persecuted as the principal offenders against section 68 for being faithful to their own religions and customs and for exercising their own lawful rights.

It is amazing, and indeed shocking, to think that this travesty of law and justice has held the field in the Madras Presidency ever since 1891, if not earlier. It was even canonised by a Full Bench decision in 1917. It had actually begun to set the fashion in other Presidencies too, when Justice Walsh, to his everlasting honour and glory, deliberately unmasked it and gave it a reeling blow in Maha Ram's case in 40 Allahabad. He quickly laid bare with unerring finger the "apparent error" into which the learned Chief Justice had slipped in the so-called "Full Bench" case of 40 Madras. He refused to believe "that the Legislature could have intended to sweep into the net of the criminal law, through an indirect piece of legislation by reference, not only every professing Christian who chooses not to be married as a Christian, but every non-Christian whom such persons might marry and every non-Christian who took part in the solemnization or celebration." He declared that "the question is one of public importance," and deliberately recorded his opinion that "prosecutions like the present should be discouraged."

"Since the above pronouncement, it has become risky, at least in the United Provinces, to undertake prosecutions against Hindu priests and Musulman Cazis": So bemoans Mr. Paul Appasami in his learned hand-book on Christian law, as if the ruining of Hindu priests and Musulman Cazis is the be-all and end-all of Christian existence in India. And he promptly supplies two excellent reasons why it should be believed that the legislature did favour and intend such prosecutions although he admits that "such actions have always been unpopular in this country and have tended to inflame feeling against the persons who promote the prosecution." (P. 72).

RE-BUILDING INDIA.*

(By J. C. KUMARAPPA).

When we consider the problems of re-building India we have to bear in mind that rural India is India itself. The urban section of India is merely an accompaniment of rural India. The life in our country does not centre round a Court or a Royalty which is chiefly the case in Western countries. Hence it does not take its civilisation from city life. This is a fundamental difference that most people lose sight of when they talk about 'Rural Reconstruction' or 'Village Uplift' with a patronising air. We have to approach our subject with deep reverence and humility as we are dealing with the life centres of our Motherland. One of the reasons why Western civilisation has made little headway in our country, in spite of the exploits of one of the mightiest and craftiest of western peoples for a couple of centuries in our midst, is that their culture is primarily urban while ours has been basically rural. The two kinds cannot assimilate. If the two cultures had been of the same kind they would have lost each other in a common product. Kipling, though quite unconsciously, uttered a great truth when he sang 'East is East and West is West, and never the twain shall meet.' The great hold that Gandhiji has over the masses today is because he is a rural genius, while on the other hand we may say that the nominees to the Round Table Conference represent what may be termed urban mentality and they have more in common with the West and the people of our country know them not.

If we are to rebuild intelligently, it is incumbent on us to study the nature of the ground on which we are going to build. We are re-building, not merely building; this implies that there are excavations to be made to trace the old foundations and plans. Unless this is done thoroughly the work of the builders will be in vain. You cannot superimpose a noble edifice on the ruins of a mean hut, nor put up a skyscraper on the foundations of a rambling mansion.

This delving into the past is one of the most essential functions of education. This prepares the future builders of the nation and moulds their minds in the way best suited to pass on their heritage to the coming generation. If this is not carried out skilfully the indigenous culture of that country will degenerate. It is in this rudimentary function that our present system of education has totally failed and the nation suffers the humiliation of seeing its colleges full, while it is engaged in a life and death struggle. The present generation of students have been rendered aliens in their own native land. In England, during the World War, most of the seats of learning were emptied of its nationals and only the disabled and foreigners were to be seen pursuing their studies undisturbed. The students responded to the call of their motherland and were prepared to lay down their very lives for their country because the culture imparted to them made them effective citizens. Indeed much of the bankruptcy of statesmanship in England and the lamentable spectacles of spent forces like Macdonald struggling at the helm is largely due to the loss of valuable lives on the fields of Flanders. But in India, Macaulay and others who laid down the educational policy of our Universities did not aim at turning out Indians glowing with a sense of duty towards their country but hoped to manufacture clerks who, though with brown skins, will have a British outlook. Our colleges bear witness to the success of their scheme. I do not blame our young friends who are but victims of a system which imparts knowledge but inoculates no indigenous culture.

We are not able to understand our own country. We learn all our subjects from an alien viewpoint with the help of an alien language. We learn economics from text books which merely dish up Royal Commission Reports published by an alien Government as a propaganda to justify its exploitation. Our professors lack touch with rural India. What understanding of Indian problems can a citizen have who is brought up on histories, etc., written on the basis of the Simon Commission Report? That is exactly the situation to-day. Until we unlearn what we have been taught and get into grips with the actual problems of the land with an insight into past tendencies expressed by the old institutions of our country it is futile to hope for a regeneration. The present educational system has been largely instrumental in bringing about the cultural degeneration we are languishing under at the present time. All this has to be altered when we come to rebuild our country. A system of education has to ground the future citizen into the principles that underlie the indigenous culture. We have been taught to turn up our noses at all things Indian. The much maligned caste system and the joint family system have a great deal to teach us in Economics and Sociology. While we may be prepared to throw away the deposit we should strive to understand the chemical action that brought about the precipitation. The principles on which a nation acts and reacts are the results of thousands of years of adaptation and so cannot be summarily dismissed and new ways formed in the course of a few years. If we attempted such a transformation we shall be building on sand.

It is obviously not possible in the course of an address such as this to lay down the principles on which the future of our land can be built. It is a matter for several years of close study. We can but indicate rapidly some cardinal points in which direction explorations have to be carried out. In studying human institutions we should never lose sight of that great teacher, mother Nature. Anything that we may devise, if it is contrary to her ways, she will ruthlessly annihilate sooner or later. Everything in nature seems to follow a cyclic movement. Water from the sea rises as vapour and falls on land in refreshing showers and returns back to the sea again. All creatures consume inorganic substances and by the process of nutrition build their organic bodies out of them. But by death, disintegration and dissimilation such organic matter is returned to the inorganic world again. A nation that forgets or ignores this fundamental process in forming its institutions will disintegrate. Our economic situation in India today is largely due to the absence of this natural order. For instance, taxes taken from the peasant are not returned to him in services but spent outside the village. This has caused a great deal of the present maladjustment in our country. More of this presently. We shall survey briefly the landmarks of our economic, political and social organisations.

Let us for a moment consider the way our ancestors attempted to grapple with exploitation, which is perhaps the greatest evil of western economic organisation with its attendant demons of Capitalism and Unemployment. In many of their solutions we do not find, at this distance of time, the reasons for them clearly enunciated, but there is no mistaking the purposes for which certain barriers were erected. We can also verify our conclusions by observing what happens when these very barriers are let down. The Joint Family system was a decided check on personal greed. It prevented individual accumulation of wealth and made the distribution more even. In this the chief motive for exploitation has been curbed. The able member of the family had the support of the weak. Again the caste system was a very effective check. Here also a person was prevented from giving unbridled rein to his cupidity. However attractive a source of income might be, if the occupation was outside his caste he could not engage in it. The moment this check is taken away, as in the case of new professions, the field gets immediately a rush of practitioners and occupation gets overcrowded resulting in unemployment and misery to the unfortunate ones.

Fragmentation of holdings, which is considered an unmitigated evil by westerners, has played its part in stopping exploitation. Even to this day in villages where crops are irrigated no one is allowed to have all his holdings near the source of water-tank or canal. Each holder has a piece of land, however small, which is of great value owing to its proximity to water supply and other pieces which are different. However big a price one may be offered for a piece of land near water one cannot dispose of it without the consent of the village. This prevents all the good lands going into any one family to the exclusion of everyone else. This is in striking contrast to western practice where by horizontal and vertical combinations all or most allied businesses and sources of raw materials can be brought together under one management and thus obtain control of the market for exploitation, by creating virtual monopolies in certain commodities.

AMERICAN FILMS.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I understand that some voices in India have been raised against the character of American Films shown in Indian cinema theatres.

I myself rarely go to the cinema, therefore I do not know a great deal about it. I understand that pictures of cowboys, Red Indians, and the "wild west" (as the wild west used to be) are shown, and also pictures of fashionable life and of criminal life. I believe, however, that the denouements of the pictures usually inculcate some good moral—virtue is rewarded, and vice is punished, in the good old way. Certainly no objection can be made to that. Of course, any picture that does not inculcate a good moral should be placed under the ban.

If objection to American films is based upon the circumstance that they do not do justice to the customs, manners, and ways of a foreign people, this is a matter that should be taken up with the American producers of films. Surely the American film makers do not err intentionally in this respect, but through ignorance of the ways of foreign peoples; for they would not willingly offend their customers, and thus injure their own business. Of course, a little good-natured banter at the expense of foreigners does no harm, but only adds to the "gaiety of nations." The people of every nation like to poke well-meant fun at the peoples of other nations. This adds to their amour propre, and gives them a pardonable feeling of superiority.

There is at least one American film that no one can reasonably object to. I refer to "King of kings", a picture of the life of Christ. The high spot in this picture shows Christ mocked and spat upon; and immediately after there flashes upon the screen the age-long symbol of majesty and power—the King with His Crown of Thorns. Out of the depths of the abyss He grasped the Sceptre of Power. There is something inexpressibly moving and awe-inspiring in this scene. Truly He was King of kings. Other kings draw power from power. This king drew power from weakness. He spun a cobweb upon the Cross; and lo, that cobweb has become a net of steel that enmeshes heaven and earth.

The Noble Prizeman:—We offer our hearty felicitations to Dr. Sir C. V. Raman, F. R. S., on the honour conferred on him by the authorities responsible for the award of the Noble Prize. Dr. Raman is a remarkable man in every way. He entered the Indian Finance Department, says the Servant of India, at a very early age and even during the few years of his active life in the Department found time for research. The late Sir Asutosh Mukherjee, the great Vice-Chancellor of the Calcutta University, chose young Mr. Raman for the Palit Professorship and was successful in inducing him to resign a service which had every promise of making Dr. Raman's life as happy as money could make it. But Dr. Raman heard the call of service and research. During all these years he has built up steadily a school of research in Physics at Calcutta. He has been the mainstay of the Indian Science Congress which is today a power in the land. Dr. Raman has also travelled widely in different parts of the world. He is an international figure. The Nobel Prize is not only a great honour to the great scientist, but is a recognition of India's scientific capacity. We may add that a few days ago he was awarded the Hughes Medal by the Royal Society.

PRACTICAL CO-OPERATION.*

(Concluded from the last issue.)

Our villages are getting very keen on sanitation for better health. They are constructing bore-hole latrines both for private use and for schools, some of which have hundreds of pupils and not the size of a latrine. Probably no one family would own an earth borer like the one we loan and which cost about Rs. 80. But co-operatively it is easy for a village to own one. Probably no one family of those we have taught bee-keeping in the village as yet would feel they could own a honey extractor which not only means clean, salable honey, but means double production. Co-operatively beekeepers in a village can easily own one of these.

CO-OPERATIVE MARKETING.

After eight years of co-operative credit and five years of direct effort in co-operative production, we found certain of our friends, who had tried both these, somewhat discouraged, and in respect to some projects, thought whether this was worth while continuing. I may as well confess that we waited too long before adding co-operative marketing which was needed to bring all the rest to fruition. This delay and in many instances the failure to do co-operative marketing at all is the most common and greatest sin of co-operation in India—the sin of omission. Read the reports of co-operative departments over India. We find so many regrets that this part has not been done to any extent; and our own Dewan (of Travancore) reports in his address on this very platform to the Sri Mulam Popular Assembly that "the one fundamental weakness in the movement" is the comparative fewness of societies for purposes other than credit.

Take the production of eggs, as an illustration. For five years we had persuaded the people and helped them to have better breeds of poultry. We had taught them how to breed, how to feed and how to care for these fine birds. Coming back from furlough a year and a half ago I found them with the better bigger eggs, but they were discouraged about the whole poultry venture. No egg merchant in the market would give them any more for their double sized eggs. These merchants said that an egg was an egg. I had come back from the countries of the West, including America and Denmark, where I had studied all I could of the most successful methods on co-operative marketing. We adapted these methods to make them, Travancorean.

Any Monday or Thursday forenoon, if you will come to our Demonstration Centre at Martandam, you will see men, women, boys and girls all bringing eggs to the Centre. Many of them walk long distances from various villages. Some of the eggs come from miles distant. These eggs are carefully tested for freshness, are weighed, graded, stamped with the number of the producer, wrapped attractively, packed and shipped guaranteed to private customers. This is the egg producers' own co-operative society. The Martandam Y. M. C. A. Poultry Co-operative Society, Ltd., No. 1739, is registered with the Government Co-operative Department. We are very anxious that all we do shall be the people's own, for the people, of the people and by the people. We try to make it simple enough so they can understand it. They are urged to stay on marketing days and help with the whole process.

There is no denying the fact that they need a great deal of attention, education and supervision for a long time. It is hard for a poor man to resist the temptation for digging up all the old eggs he can find when the price is more than he has ever seen an egg sold for before. It takes a long time for them to fully realize that the whole success and business depends on quality of product. They could ruin their business in a week by letting any bad product through.

As a result of this cooperative marketing, these poor village producers of eggs are getting more than twice the price of eggs in the local market. Later from profits of the society, they receive an additional bonus for each egg they have supplied. Being very poor persons they have to be paid for the eggs as soon as they are tested and accepted. This means that they must have a surplus in the society to carry the business until bills are paid monthly by customers.

Well, cooperative marketing of eggs in our area has completely changed the attitude of the people. There is no lukewarmness about poultry keeping now. They are more eager to try other projects recommended. Even while these villagers have been the victims of the terrible poultry Cholera which has repeatedly taken off flocks of these beautiful improved hens, they have seen the profits of poultry keeping, and when they lose their fowls they get more eggs to raise more fowls and start again. I fully believe that had this disease struck these villages in advance of cooperative marketing they would have been so discouraged that the results of cooperative production would have been lost and they would have dropped poultry keeping as not being a worth while cottage industry.

We have an even more simple mail order system whereby we are marketing Cashew nuts supplied by some of the poorest of Travancore's people, the majority of them, women. We have an arrangement for the marketing of honey. We are selling refined jaggery. Our plan is to take one by one every indigenous product, first improve its quality, then teach the people to market it cooperatively. We follow the system well proved in countries most advanced in cooperation of having a separate society for each product. At first the rules must be most simple or these poor people will not cooperate or join. Gradually the organization of each may be developed until it is a fully fledged cooperative society which may be registered with the Government department.

COOPERATION BETWEEN GOVERNMENT AND NON-OFFICIAL AGENCIES.

The Royal Commission on Agriculture saw clearly the need of cooperation between Government departments and non-official agencies and have emphasized this repeatedly in their report. To me one of the finest features of cooperation is this. Government has the money and means to carry on certain experiments, to have cattle farms, poultry farms and other experimental stations. It has the money to assist non-official agencies in work which these agencies can do even better than Government. Because of the closer association which men like my Indian colleagues have daily with the village people, they can help Government to spread some of the results of Government's good work and experiments in a way which officials can hardly do. It is a matter of gratification and encouragement to us that our Travancore Government realizes and openly says this, and gives grants to various ventures and projects in our rural development programme after we have proved to Government that these are highly useful ventures. I think that no institution should ask Government for grants until it has proved the worthwhileness of each project.

So co-operation is not a small one or two cylinder affair. Let us see it to full fruition in all attempts to bring more of happiness and better life to all our people.

CONSTRUCTIVE WORK IN SOCIAL SPHERE. The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

One point in my article on Constructive Work in the Social Sphere published in the Reformer of November 8, seems to have caught the fancy of some persons in Ahmedabad one of whom called and saw me the other day in reference to the matter. The result of my conversation was, that it is proposed to start a Mutual Information Bureau in Ahmedabad. It is proposed that a small Committee should be formed from among persons of recognised social standing and education from all sections of the Hindu Society. The Committee will maintain a Register, in which, for a small annual fee of say, Rs. 5, will be inserted the name, address and occupation, etc, of every person who intimates his or her desire to be put in communication with any other person, either belonging to the same main caste or generally, with a view, either to matrimony or the growth of social intercourse. The information recorded in the Register will be made available to all members whose names are entered on the Register.

I am assured that there is many a parent and grown up young man who is on the look out for a suitable match but is seriously handicapped owing to ignorance as to where he or she should look for the same. An Exchange Centre of the character sketched above under the control of men and women of light and leading, would, under such circumstances, prove highly useful. I trust those interested in the subject will go forward with the idea and put it in practical working order without loss of time. The city of Ahmedabad is, for several reasons, a good place to make a start, although there is no reason why the matter should not be taken up in cities like Poona and Bombay also.

MR. K. T. PAUL.

H. A. Popley writes in the Indian Witness:—

Mr. Paul comes from the rural middle classes of South India and for the past two generations the family has been settled in Salem, a large town in South India famous for its silk-weaving community. His paternal grandfather was a Hindu, a Reddy by caste and an indigo merchant of Cuddapah in the Andhra districts. He became the dubash of a large European firm at Chittoor and later joined the Roman Catholic Church. David Paul, the youngest son of this family, was the father of Mr. K. T. Paul.

K. T. Paul was born in 1876 and was the only child of the marriage. At the age of ten he joined the school department of the Madras Christian College. Dr. William Miller, the Principal of the College, was one of the greatest influences in K. T. Paul's life. Later he returned to Salem and passed his Intermediate Examination with distinction from Salem College. Among his classmates was Mr. C. Rajagopalachari, a man of noble character and charming personality, who later took the lead in the non-co-operation movement in South India. He returned to the Christian College, Madras, for his graduate course and among his friends and classmates was V. S. Azariah, now Bishop of Dornakal, Sir A. P. Patro, late Minister of Education in the Madras Government and a member of the Round Table Conference, and Sir Venkata Reddi Naidu, Agent of the Government of India in South Africa. At that time politics, social reform and Tamil literature were the prominent interests in his life.

After graduation he became a clerk in the Madras Secretariat and joined the Law College. On completion of his law course he returned to Salem and took up farming for a year, only leaving this for a teacher's post on the urgent request of his friend Mr. P. J. Devasagayam, Headmaster of the London Mission High School, Coimbatore. In 1903 Dr. Miller offered him the position of a tutor in the Madras Christian College which he accepted and for the next four years he was associated with Dr. Miller and took up definite religious work among the students in Madras.

In 1905 at a Conference of Indian Christians in Serampore, which met to organise the National Missionary Society of India, he met Dr. Sherwood Eddy for the first time. Mr. Paul was one of the founders of the National Missionary Society and became its first Honorary Treasurer and later Organising Secretary. He still retained his position in the Christian College and during his holidays travelled all over India organising branches of the Society and developing its work. In 1907 he left the College and accepted the position of full-time Secretary of the National Missionary Society, which meant frequent journeys all over India in third class carriages. During this time he gained his intimate knowledge of the Indian Christian community from Peshawar to Cape Comorin and from Bombay to Bengal, and at the same time served on the Municipal Council and District Board, thus gaining his apprenticeship in local government.

In 1912 he was chosen to accompany Dr. John R. Mott throughout his all-India tour for the purpose of organising the Christian Representative Councils in every province and so he entered into closer touch with the missionary leaders throughout India. His wise counsel and Christian statesmanship secured him an honourable place in the All-India Christian organisations. It was in this year too that Mr. E. C. Carter, then National Secretary of the Y. M. C. A., offered him the position of Assistant National Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. with special responsibility for the creation and development of Rural work in connection with the Y. M. C. A. In 1913 he resigned his position in the N. M. S. and entered the Y. M. C. A. as a full-time Secretary.

A year later the Great War broke out and Mr. Carter left India to undertake work in France and so Mr. K. T. Paul became the first Indian National General Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. During the war years he showed his capacity for leadership and his ability to work in harmonious relationships with men of all nations, and under his leadership the Y. M. C. A. in India became one of the most influential national organisations working among young people.

In the midst of all these activities he never lost his love and zeal for the church and was one of the organisers of the South India United Church and later was elected to the Presidentship of the General Assembly of that Church.

As the war drew to its close the public life of the country attracted him more and more and he was one of the first Indian Christians to express himself clearly against communal representation. He made his first journey to the West in 1919 and during his visit to England he gave evidence before the Joint Committee, emphasising his objections to communal representation for the Indian Christian community. Since then he has made many trips to the West in the interests of the work of the International Missionary Council. He was associated with the Lausanne Conference on Faith and Order and with the Stockholm Conference on the Life and Work of the Christian Church and is now almost as well known in England, Europe and America as he is in India.

During the past ten years his interest in the public life of India and in its social and political problems has been growing. At the request of the British Student Movement he wrote a book on the relationship of India and Britain entitled 'The British Connection with India' which has had a very wide sale both in India and the West. His great experience of rural co-operation led the Government of Madras to appoint him as a member of the Committee on Co-operation in 1927.

This year, in view of the political situation, he felt impelled to sever his connection with the Y. M. C. A. and to throw himself entirely into public and political life. He has made himself familiar with the problems of India from the sphere of local self-government to that of national politics and is also a keen student of international affairs. He may be called a Christian Nationalist with an international outlook. In his work for the Indian Church he has always aimed at helping it to become the Indian expression of the Church of Christ and has been one of the strongest pioneers of indigenous modes of worship and service. His friendships with Christians of all denominations and with men of all groups have given him a respect for the opinions of others, a wide knowledge of men and a broad and tolerant outlook. His intimate contact with detailed problems of administration in many spheres has kept his feet on solid ground while his eye has been on the stars. As a social worker he knows at first-hand the pressing daily problems of Indian life in the towns and villages and as an international traveller he knows how some of these have been solved in other countries.

He goes to the Round Table Conference pledged to uphold the claims of India for Dominion Status and intimately conversant with the problems that will need to be solved. He has shown his deep practical interest in the backward classes and he knows intimately their difficulties and needs. In Mr. Paul the Indian Christian community has a worthy representative who may be trusted to uphold the principles of Christ and the highest ideals of Indian nationhood.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The National Liberal Federation of India.—Mr. G. A. Natesan, Secretary, National Liberal Federation, requests us to announce: that in accordance with the decision of the Council of the National Liberal Federation of India, in view of the pendency of the Round Table Conference, it has been resolved not to hold the annual session as usual in December, but at the end of March or April next at a time and place to be announced later.

Lokmanya Tilak Statue:—The Governor of Bombay has approved the following inscription which is proposed by the Tilak Memorial Committee to be engraved on the pedestal of the statue of the late B. G. Tilak:—

Lokmanya Bal Gangadhar Tilak :
 "Swaraj is my Brithright and I shall have it."

Born :

Died :

As the Municipal Corporation, Bombay have no objection to a site measuring about 18 feet by 16 feet on the spot where the late Mr. Tilak was cremated being reserved and permitted to be used for the purpose of erecting a pedestal for the proposed statue, and as that body has agreed to undertake the upkeep of the statue provided that Government paper of the market value of Rs. 1,200 endorsed in the name of the Municipal Commissioner for the City of Bombay is sent to him by the Committee, Government have granted to the Committee an area measuring 18 feet by 16 feet for the erection of the statue on the Chaupati sands.

Postponement of the All India Swadeshi Exhibition:—Mr. A. H. Kulkarni, Joint Honorary Secretary writes: The All India Swadeshi Exhibition which was to be held in November—December 1930 has been postponed to February—March 1931 due to the tense and disturbed political conditions in Bombay, as also to complete the erection work more satisfactorily. The Committee has taken this step after mature consideration in the best interest of the Exhibitors themselves. Although there is enough time, manufacturers and merchants of 'Genuine Swadeshi Articles' requiring stalls should immediately write to the undersigned stating the area required and giving details of their manufactures together with a remittance of Rs. 50 for each stall as deposit for which an official receipt will be sent signed by either of the Treasurers Raja Narayanlal Bausilal or Seth Surji Vallabhdas. The construction work will be taken in hand from the 15th of January 1931. Those requiring special stalls and also small cottage industries will be given special concession. All the necessary facilities and help for demonstration purposes will be given. The Exhibition office is now shifted to the Great Western Hotel Buildings, Old Customs House Road, Fort, Bombay, where all communications should please be addressed in future.

Opponents of Reform Outcasted.—A Hyderabad (Deccan) Correspondant writes: An interesting sidelight on the state of affairs in the village and places nearby is afforded by the sequel to another widow re-marriage which had been arranged to be celebrated but which did not come off. It appears that the would-have-been bride of this marriage, acting under the instigation of some orthodox members of the community, refused, at the eleventh hour, to be married, much to the chagrin of the bridegroom and his party. For this act of disobedience and disappointment, the bride, the members of her family and those who abetted her in the step she took have been outcasted! This is a unique sequel to a unique situation—the social reformers outcasting the orthodox members of a community!

Bishop Fisher on Gandhi:—Speaking at the University of Chicago says The Christian Century Chicago, Oct. 10 on Mahatma Gandhi, Bishop Frederick B. Fisher, who recently retired from his India bishopric to assume a pastorate in Ann Arbor, Mich., discussed the personal characteristics, the life and the national importance of the Indian leader who now commands world attention. "Gandhi is not fanatical," Bishop Fisher said, "he knows exactly what he is striving for and how to accomplish his ends." Gandhi is without the faults of the conventional religious leader, he stated. In his lecture Bishop Fisher referred to Great Britain, declaring that "that nation could never have attained such a high standard of living without exploiting colonies." He said a lesson yet to be learned by the western world is to cede to the east the natural resources actually belonging to it.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru:—A message published in India on Wednesday stated that "Reuter learns that on the question of minorities, as also on questions relating to communal settlement and the claims of the depressed classes, which Sir T. B. Sapru is strongly supporting, there has been a sharp difference of opinion between him and his colleagues. Sir Tej Bahadur has withdrawn from the Indian Liberal Group and authorised "Reuter" to state that henceforth he will strike a line of his own and not attach himself to any party either in London or in India, but work independently for the good of his country. It is anticipated that as the result of the Round Table Conference, a new party will arise in India which will devote itself entirely to constructive work." Mr. F. W. Wilson who is in close touch with Sir Tej in a special cable to the Hindu on the same day said: "I am authorised by Sir T. B. Sapru to announce that henceforth he will work for what he considers to be the best interests of the country as an independent politician unconnected with any group or party. I understand that Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru will probably find himself in agreement with 95 per cent. of the Indian politicians on all questions, but he doesn't wish to have any party commitments. Already he has been speaking at the committee in a purely individual capacity." On Friday, the papers published the following statement issued by another member of the Liberal delegation, Sir C. P. Ramaswami Aiyar: "My attention has been drawn to the report with reference to the alleged difference of opinion between Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and the Liberal Party. As far as I can gather, differences, such as they are, relate to the Hindu-Mahomedan question regarding which the Party is not unanimous but in respect of which agreement is possible, if a policy of give and take is pursued. Regarding the Depressed Classes, there is no difference of opinion. As a matter of fact, in the first Sub-Committee, which is the most important Committee, now sitting, Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, Sir Phiroze Sethna, Mr. Jayakar and I have been working in perfect concord. I may add that in both the open conference and the Committee and also in consultations agreement among Indian delegates is much more marked than difference in outlook." It is quite clear that Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, for reasons of his own, has found it necessary to proclaim his severance from the Liberals. What new party consisting of ninety-five per cent. of Indian politicians, he is going to form, unless he means to join the Congress, we have no idea. We can make a shrewd guess of how exactly the trouble has arisen, but it is wiser to await developments.

The High Courts and the Reforms:—One of the recommendations of the Simon Commission is that all High Courts and Chief Courts should become central subjects, as the High Court of Bengal already is. The Government of India in their despatch on constitutional reforms accept this so far as the appointment of judges is concerned but, in view no doubt of the strong opposition of some Provincial Governments, leave the larger part of the subject for future consideration. Among Provincial Governments, the Government of Bengal has no objection to the High Court remaining under the Government of India provided all other High Courts are placed in the same position. The Central Provinces Government accept the Simon Commission's recommendation in principle and ask for a High Court. The High Court Judges of Bombay, Madras and the United Provinces, too, approve of it but the Provincial Governments are opposed to it. The Government of Madras say they are not convinced either by the arguments of the Commission or the opinion of the Judges of the Madras High Court that the change is necessary at present. The Bombay Government, while opposing the transfer, have enclosed the letter of the High Court, which is instructive reading. The Judges without committing themselves at this stage to a positive conclusion, take up one by one the objections of the Provincial Government and answer them in a fair and convincing manner. Their Lordships, however, clinch the point, when they observe: "The village people base their simple faith on the fact that the High Court stands between them and any attempted salum on the part of the local policeman or executive official. But once the High Court is rendered inefficient, their tyranny or corruption or even incompetence may prove a source of widespread discontent which it would be difficult to stay, and if it was unstayed would probably result in some serious disease." In a recent case, the High Court upset one of several decisions of the lower courts on the ground that though it conformed to the letter of the law it ignored an elementary principle of justice. One of the local Government's objections to the High Court becoming a central subject, was that it will prevent frequent contact between Judges and Members of the Executive Government. The Judges point out that the latter are in Bombay for hardly four months in the year and that the proposed transfer will not make much difference. But it is also a question whether excessive contact between the Executive and the Judiciary, is in itself desirable. One has heard of Chief Justices in the old days who never set foot in Government House as an outward mark of the perfect independence of the High Court of all Executive influence. It is essential not only that Judges should be independent but also that they should not appear too frequently in contexts which may seem to the public not quite compatible with the maintenance of their absolute independence from the intrusion of official, social or personal influences.

Rights of Prisoners:—It is an ill wind that blows nobody any good. The imprisonment of numerous educated persons engaged in political activities in recent years, has given an impetus to prison reform which it badly lacked. Speaking in the House of Commons as Home Secretary in 1910, Mr. Winston Churchill declared that "the mood and temper of the public with regard to the treatment of crime and criminals is one of the most unfailing tests of the civilization of any country. A calm, dispassionate recognition of the rights of the accused, and even of the convicted, criminal against the State—a constant heart-searching by all charged with the duty of punishment.....unfailing faith that there is a treasure, if you can only find it, in the heart of every man—these are the symbols, which, in the treatment of crime and criminal, mark and measure the stored-up strength of a nation, and are sign and proof of the living virtue in it." The doctrine that even convicted criminals have their rights, is one which finds no recognition from many of those who administer the Indian Jail system. Even Magistrates, including Presidency Magistrates, sometimes indulge in the meaningless gibe that people who break the law should not ask for considerate treatment. They seem to forget that the classification of prisoners is intended for those who break laws, and not for those who keep them, and that it is their duty, laid on them by their official position, to apply it in order to secure the "individualization of punishment" which has done so much to humanize prisons and correspondingly to minimise crime in modern countries.

The Old Fallacy:—Writing of this principle, a Great British authority, Sir Evelyn Ruggles-Brise observes: "It is quite consistent with a firm administration of penal justice, but it destroys for ever the old classical idea of the 'abstract type of criminal.' In other words, justice demands that the old formula 'imprisonment with or without hard labour' indiscriminately applied, shall no longer be held to satisfy her claims. The re-action against this so-called 'dosimetre penale,' i. e. the abstract conception of crime and the mechanical application of punishment 'according to code' is a growth of force." Something has been done to remove the hardships of the Indian system by instituting two superior classes but the grievances of the majority outside them, remains unredressed. These are overcrowding, want of privacy, bad and unsuitable food, abuse, rough treatment, and exhaustion of excessive work. Sometimes worse allegations have been made. The system of convict wards is largely responsible for many of the wrongs and abuses complained of. The object with which the system of classification was introduced, is all too often lost sight of, and it is being applied in a way which defies understanding. It is impossible to understand on what grounds Mr. Brelvi, one of the foremost journalists in the country and the editor of the leading Indian daily newspaper in Bombay, has been assigned even tentatively to the second class.

A Wrong Policy:—It is now perfectly plain that public opinion does not approve of the Congress policy of requiring persons sentenced to pay fines to serve the alternative or additional term in jail, notwithstanding Pandit Motilal Nehru's fulmination against those who pay such fines without the knowledge and consent of the prisoners. This week three men, all of them staunch Congressmen, have been thrust out of the Thana jail on the expiry of their terms of imprisonment, owing to some body or other having paid their fines which they had resolved not to pay. These are Mr. B. G. Kher, Swami Anand and Mr. Vandrekhar. The public, quite sensibly in our opinion, take the view that it is absurd for workers to waste their time in jail when there are wide fields of national service lying fallow for want of them. It is now perfectly certain that, in many cases of the kind, fines will be paid by somebody or other, irrespective of the consent of the prisoners concerned. It is therefore, that the Congress revised its policy which is more honoured in the breach than in observance. It is also, we think, the proper thing for the prisoners themselves or their relatives openly to pay their fines, instead of waiting for some anonymous friend or stranger to forestall them. As the authorities do not insist, as in the case of visitors, that the fines should be paid only by near relatives, the contingency of any casual sympathiser coveting the satisfaction of doing good by stealth, should not be ignored.

Inconsistent:—The Jat Pat Torak Man has been making representations to Government against the inclusion of castes in the Census schedule. But it has instigated a resolution passed by the Arya Pratinidhi Sabha practically prohibiting Arya Samajists from returning themselves as Hindus which they are in the eyes of the law and according to usage at the present day. Swami Shraddhanand, Lala Lajpat Rai and other prominent Arya leaders were the founders of the Hindu Mahasabha and regarded themselves and were regarded by the Hindu community as Hindus.

Gadag Swadeshi Exhibition:—The date of the opening of this Exhibition has been postponed from December 21st to January 25th, 1911, at the request of several would-be Exhibitors. The date in the advertisement published elsewhere is, accordingly, changed:

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, DECEMBER 6, 1930.

AN ATTACK ON THE PRESS.

The Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act, as we showed in last week's Reformer, was passed in 1908 to combat conspiracies in which the bomb and the revolver played the leading part. Dr. Gour's Bill to repeal the Act in the Legislative Assembly in 1924 was opposed by Government entirely on the ground that the danger of such conspiracies might recur at any time. The clause relating to assisting unlawful Associations was throughout the debate interpreted and understood to mean, assisting with financial and other material contributions. Replying to the criticism that the Act had been applied to non-violent Congress volunteers, Sir Malcolm Hailey, then Home Member, said that it was all the fault of the volunteers who offered themselves for arrest and would not defend themselves in the courts. "We are not responsible for that," he protested.

In the light of this history, the application of the Act to Congress organizations pledged to non-violence, constitutes a breach of faith on the part of Government with the Legislature and the public. It may, however, be said that the no-tax campaign started by certain Congress committees directly threatens the foundations of Government and that the organizations which promote it cannot claim to be engaged in lawful activities. Even this is a stretching of the Act beyond its avowed purpose. What, however, is the justification for extending the ban to such organizations as the Rashtriya Stree Mandal, the Desh Sevikas and the Prabhat Pheries which are not associated with the no-tax campaign? The first two were engaged mainly in picketting liquor and foreign cloth shops, and the last were bands of amateur minstrels who perambulated their respective areas reciting national ballads in more or less musical voices. The extension of the Act to such activities has been sought to be justified on the ground that as the Congress Committee's programme included the extinction of the liquor and foreign cloth trade, therefore, all bodies having these purposes in view are "assisting" an unlawful association, and their members are punishable under the Act. Peaceful picketting of these shops is not illegal in itself, according to the law and the ruling of the High Court. The above reasoning leads to the position that even persons engaged in a lawful propaganda become liable to be penalised for assisting an association declared to be unlawful, if their propaganda or any part of it happens to form any part of its propaganda, even though not the part on account of which it was declared to be unlawful. An extreme example may expose the fallacy clearly. Suppose, a body of men band themselves together to rob their neighbours and it was a part of their policy to distribute a part of their loot amongst the poor—the Robin Hood method which an individual is said to have followed recently in Sind. According to this interpretation of the law, which is accepted without question in some of the Police Courts—though definitely rejected by the High Court in Mrs. Lukhmani's case—all charitable relief societies and their members will be liable, as a result, to be penalised under the Criminal Law Amendment Act because, forsooth, charitable relief is also a part of the programme of the robber gang. If we may say so without disrespect, this line of reasoning bears a striking resemblance to the famous syllogism of Fluellen :

"Fluellen:—What call you the town's name where Alexander the Pig was born?

Gower:—Alexander the Great.

Fluellen:—Why, I pray you, is not pig great? The pig, or the great, or the mighty, or the huge, or the magnanimous, are all one reckonings, save the phrase is a little variation.

Gower:—I think Alexander the Great was born in Macedon.

Fluellen:—I tell you, Captain, if you look in the map of the 'orld, I warrant you shall find, in the comparisons between Macedon and Monmouth, that the situations, look you, is both alike. There is a river in Macedon, and there is a river in Monmouth. And there is salmon in both."

To the Commissioner of Police of Bombay, belongs the credit of a further fearful extension of this India rubber enactment. He issued early this month a warning to newspapers, in which he laid down that publication of the statements, resolutions and other news of the activities and programmes of the Congress organizations which had been declared unlawful, was tantamount to assisting the operations of these unlawful associations, and was an offence under the Criminal Law Amendment Act; and he warned them to abstain from publishing such reports. The sweeping character of this dictum made even semi-official journalists gasp and there was also a protest by a meeting of Indian journalists. The Associated Press of India was thereupon given to understand, and presumably authorised to publish, after discussion with the authorities concerned, that the purpose of the Commissioner's warning was not to prevent the publication of news regarding events that had occurred or of news of obviously general interest with regard to the activities of the Congress or other bodies, but the warning was directed against undue advertisement of the propagandist activities and programmes of bodies declared unlawful in as much as such advertisement is calculated to lead to breaches of the law, conflict with the authorities and the promotion of unconstitutional agitation." This was generally understood as explaining away the Commissioner's unprecedented incursion into the sphere of the judiciary. It now seems that that communication to the Associated Press meant nothing whatsoever. In the strict terms of the Commissioner's warning, the Editor and publisher of the Bombay Chronicle were arrested and prosecuted this week for publishing the programme of a function announced by the Bombay Congress Executive Committee. The editor for reasons which, to our mind, have no sort of relevancy to the charge against him and which are likely to prejudice the position of other journalists and even of his own locum tenens, declined to take part in the proceedings. The burden of the defence was, therefore thrown upon the publisher who has only a technical responsibility in law for what appears in a newspaper, and it was ably argued by counsel on his behalf that the news was published in good faith in the ordinary course as of interest to the public. This, as the Magistrate remarked, would have come more appropriately from the Editor, though in sentencing the publisher he made no distinction between the two. The learned Magistrate's main contention was that the journalist as such had no more right than any ordinary citizen. This is quite true as regards comment and all the authorities cited by his Worship in his judgment relate to comment. But the question here was the publication of news, not comment or expression of views. The Viceroy made it clear that the Press Ordinance did not cover the publication of news and even the commissioner of Police, according to the Associated Press, did not intend his warning to do so. The learned Magistrate declined to recognise the right of the Viceroy to interpret his own Ordinance—and he was no doubt technically right—but surely the fact of the Viceroy making a distinction between news and comment has a bearing on the question at issue in this case. It was said that the publication of the announcement regarding the Congress function attracted people to the scene. It also, certainly kept many others from the scene, and there was absolutely nothing to show that if the Chronicle had not published it, there would have been fewer persons present at the function. No one is in the least likely to attend a function merely because a newspaper announces it. Nor is any one who is interested in the function likely to stay away from it merely because it is not announced in one particular newspaper. The advantages of publicity far outweigh its disadvantages in every case from the public point of view. The prosecution and conviction of the Editor and publisher under the Criminal Law Amendment Act is a grave invasion of the freedom of the press which is the freedom of speech and thought. The sentences of five months imprisonment each on the Editor and Publisher can only be described as ridiculously out of proportion to the offence, and vindictive. It is, indeed one of those sentences which, as Mr. Justice Madgaonkar remarked in the case of Mrs. Lukmani not long ago, is calculated to bring the administration of Justice into disrepute.

"IN THE MIDST OF LIFE."

As I was taking my walk along Perry Road on Sunday morning, I heard myself called by name from the house of the Deputy Collector and Magistrate, in Bandra, Mr. G. K. Kudav. Since the present campaign of arrests began we had not seen each other except casually in the train, though before that we often met on our morning walks and had long talks together. I was wondering why he should call me now—I thought was Mr. Kudav calling or some one for him—when I saw Mr. Korgamkar, the President of the Prarthan Samaj, coming towards me from the house. I stopped, and he and a friend came up and broke the sad news that Mr. Kudav died at midnight on Saturday of heart failure. I went home, changed my clothes, and returned to the house where a contingent of Samajists had gathered. The funeral was to be according to the simple Samaj rites. After an hour or so, the body was placed on the Municipal ambulance cart, wrapped up in a shawl the face also showing. It was drawn by Samajist and other friends and a large number of the local officials, followed it. As it emerged from the gate, a Police party saluted it and took its place at the head of the mournful procession. As it neared the junction of Turner Road with Godbunder Road, an old Parsi asked Mr. Bhagwandas Mathavdas, who was walking by my side, who had died and was to be that it was Mr. Kudav. "The Magistrate?" he queried, and learning that it was he, he said something about the sighs of the people and the sanctity of conscience. Almost at the same moment, a lorry full of khaddar clad men and boys with a sprinkling of khaki uniforms among them, evidently the morning's haul at Vile Parle—passed the cortege from the opposite direction. The Police guard in front evidently excited the Congressmen on the lorry. They raised a tremendous shout, "Inquilab Zindabad", shaking their hands sea-saw fashion at the silent body of the dead magistrate. The procession passed on to the cemetery, the lorry rushed past to the lock up. There was a grim irony in the momentary encounter between the two which might have been avoided with a little forethought.

Mr. Kudav was very loyal to the Government but he was also not without a heart for the people. One morning on my usual work I came upon a weedy little man holding up three tall men on Perry Road on the way to their work. The man requested me to take down the names of the three men as he could not write himself. I took down one name and then it occurred to me to ask him why he wanted the names. He said that they had fouled the fore-shed and he had been ordered to take all such offenders to the municipal office. I asked him for his authority which he said was an oral order; for a uniform which, he said, had gone to the dhobi for any badge of office, and he lifted up his coat and showed a belt. There was not a sign of a public latrine or privy; for a mile along and it was pure zulam to molest people without providing an easily accessible convenience which they can resort to to answer their natural calls. My remonstrance with the petty official and particularly the use of the word "zoolam" attracted a small crowd, some persons in which began to relate their own experiences of official molestation. I was feeling embarrassed at thus involuntarily finding myself pushed into the position of a popular leader, when to my great relief I saw Mr. Kudav coming towards us. I told him the story, and asked him what he would do if he found himself impelled by a like necessity as the three arrested men. I was pleased to see him turn furiously on the little Gurkha and order him to let the men go and not to interfere with the public in that way. Then he poured out his heart on the vagaries of these rude, illiterate men which undid all the good effects of honest administration. He was himself, he said, most anxious to do everything to satisfy the people but he was at every turn thwarted by the stupidity of these subordinates. There were one or two other incidents which impressed me as showing his genuine desire to do his official duty in a spirit of sympathy with the people.

The best proof of the fact that this was understood and appreciated, was forthcoming at the funeral. Amongst those most actively assisting in the arrangements, outside the circle of relatives, were some Gandhi caps, and one or two of the men who wore them were actually undertrial men out on bail awaiting trial. In these days of social boycott of officials, this is a remarkable testimony to the broadmindedness of Bandra citizens. The remark of the old Parsi, however, reflected a considerable amount of the popular feeling. The Indian masses still cling to the idea, now obsolete in the West, that the Higher Powers punish or reward bad or good conduct in this life. But though the moral law never fails, it does not operate in the same way as a Viceregal Ordinance. Mr. Kudav's official duties made him rather prominent in the repression campaign in the Suburban District. As a matter of fact, however, in all the cases which he tried he gave the lightest sentences of any Suburban Magistrate, and he once spoke to me strongly of some unconscionably heavy sentences by a colleague which had shocked the public. Sudden death is not a God-ordained penalty for oppressing the people, or some others, I dare say, would have come by it long before Mr. Kudav. At the same time I cannot help thinking that the mental conflict between his official duty and his nationalist sentiments, may have affected his heart. It behoves Government to consider if it is well to follow policies which an intolerable strain on the finest and most conscientious Indians in their service.

MISSIONARIES IN INDIA.

(By Prof. Hari Charan Mukerjee, Midnapore College.)

The manifesto of the Protestant missionaries in India signed by such eminent persons as Messrs John Mackenzie, J. Z. Hodge, Angus, Dr. Hogg, Miss McDougall and Bishop Pakenham Walsh and others does credit to the gentlemen and ladies concerned and is a convincing proof of the fact that the latter throwing off their silence and apathy are actively interesting themselves in the great struggle that is now going on in the country. Only a few months ago the "Unity" of Chicago bewailed this apathy but tried to explain it away on the plea that the missionaries following the example set by their great Exemplar have always "given unto Caesar the things that be Caesar's," have always meekly submitted to the powers that be having never been engaged in any hostile propaganda against them. This aloofness, according to the "Unity", is imperatively necessary for their very existence and the opportunity of being allowed to carry on their work unhampered enjoying as these missionaries do the hospitality of the British in India. It is further of opinion that the saintly character of Mahatma Gandhi, the leader of the present movement, has given the lie direct to their pet theory that saintliness can not exist outside the pale of Christianity and hence by wounding their amour propre have ranged them against the passive resistance movement. Nevertheless the paper bewails the fact and says that even if active sympathy with the movement is out of the question under the present conditions of their work, they ought to have at least lent their moral support to this great experiment which is now being tried and which, if successful, will usher in a new era in world politics substituting love for hate, soul force for brute force and sweet reasonableness and sympathetic understanding of the viewpoint of others in place of armed intervention in international disputes.

But this diagnosis of the "Unity" seems not to be a correct one. The malady lies deeper and has not been probed to its source. The missionaries undoubtedly know full well, intelligent men as they are, that under a Swaraj government the undue facilities which they now enjoy in carrying on their activities will no longer be extended to them. They will have a fair field and no favour. The Swaraj constitution will surely place no obstacles whatsoever in the pursuit of their legitimate activities but it can not be expected to make matters smoother for them to the detriment of other religious bodies. Liberty of conscience and worship as well as the liberty of converting people by gentle persuasion and arguments and by all other approved means, will be guaranteed. But the missionaries can not surely expect any extraneous aid as, for example, preferential treatment in the matter of liberal educational grants to their denominational institutions in proselytizing which they now enjoy. It is sad to reflect but there is no gainsaying it that in India the missionaries seem to have entered into a sort of tacit understanding with the powers that be for mutual help and advantage. Accordingly they have always tried to supply a moral justification for the continued British occupation of the country by representing the Indians as very low in the scale of civilization, steeped in ignorance and superstition, who always stand in urgent need of the beneficent care of a civilized Christian power. It is a fact that inspite of their long and intimate acquaintance with the people they have seldom attempted to study sympathetically the religion, philosophy and social institutions and customs of the people. Appreciation of these have come not from them but from European philosophers and scholars like Schopenhauer, Max Muller, Viscount Haldane and Romain Rolland or Westerners who have identified themselves with India like Sister Nivedita or Dr. Besant or even from servants of the crown like Sir William Jones, Sir Edwin Arnold, F. W. Rhys Davids and Sir John Woodroff. Eager as these missionaries have been in propagating their faith they have eagerly snatched at every opportunity which have been offered to them by the foreign government. The latter also believe that the more the number of converts, the more securely will it establish itself, for the Indian Christians up till lately used to look upon the foreign government as their best patron and friend. Fortunately for us this attitude has undergone a complete change. The Christians have long been tired of ploughing a lonely furrow and are making common cause with the rest of their countrymen. They have outgrown their narrow communal outlook and have adopted a broad, liberal and national outlook. This is undoubtedly highly to their credit but in times past they imagined that there was more affinity between them and the Europeans than between them and their own countrymen. They were fast getting denationalised and were imitating our masters in every particular. The latter too used to look upon this process with evident glee and satisfaction for it was believed (perhaps quite erroneously) that in case of an armed revolution in the country they would have been able to count upon the allegiance and loyal support of these Christians whose success in life as individuals and as a community was bound up with the perpetuation of the established order.

But with the increase in their numbers and the spread of education which together have brought in their train acute unemployment and hence disillusionment, but above all due to the growth of a sense of national solidarity, the Indian Christians have revised their policy and have determined to sink or swim with the rest of their countrymen. But though disillusionment has come to them it has not yet come to the Missionaries who have not been able to keep themselves abreast of the times. They have not yet shaken off their obsession that co-operation with the powers that be, at least acquiescence in everything that is being done by them, will result in many advantages which they require for the propagation of their faith. It is needless to mention that this attitude on their part smacks rather of opportunism than that lofty idealism and fearless support of the cause of truth and justice and above all contempt for worldly advantages which we have learnt to associate with Christ and his disciples. But it can be confidently affirmed that if they revise their policy and can make up their minds to expect henceforth no extraneous aid in proselytizing, depending entirely upon the merit of the gospel they preach and the noble and selfless lives of those who will expound it to us, their efforts will be attended with far greater success than heretofore. Christianity which can count its adherents by many millions in this country has come to stay and the missionaries, whatever be their nationality, can be assured of a hearty reception everywhere in this country whenever they come with the zeal and earnestness of the early apostles in preaching their faith as well as in fighting illiteracy, ignorance and disease, the idea which fired the imagination of their predecessor and which even now not a few amongst them have steadily set before themselves. But the sooner they dissociate themselves entirely from the power that be which have got in such a bad odour now the better it is for them. It is a matter for genuine satisfaction and it augurs well for the future that the process has already begun and the missionaries having at last broken their discreet silence have collectively raised their voice on behalf of the Indians and are pleading that the right of choosing for themselves their own form of government should be conceded to them. We ought to be grateful for this frank recognition of our rightful claim however tardy it might have been in coming.

THE INDIAN CHRISTIAN MARRIAGE ACT.

(BY MR. KOPARGAM RAMAMURTI.)

[ Concluded from the last issue. ]

The utter untenability of both the alleged reasons set up by the learned author and jurist (Mr. Paul Appaswami) was exposed and explained in the Reformer of 11th October and needs no further notice. But the latest Ellore case is a cogent and opportune reminder to the incredulous and the unwary that in the unceasing pursuit of the old medieval game of hunting down the heretic and the apostate, there are children enough of the true faith sojourning in India who will not hesitate to take, reason or no reason, any such trifling risks as may be involved in the occasional failure of a criminal prosecution on minor issues after a sufficiently prolonged agony to the victims. The unforgettable and unmistakable major fact is that the Full Bench of 40 Madras still dominates the legal horizon. Its subordinate criminal courts still crouch under its daily sweep. And occasionally they are driven by their sense of justice to acquit the accused, they do so not by following the trenchant lead of Justice Walsh but by taking the cue from his learned and profound brother Justice Knox, who was the first to discover a masterly and comfortable way out of the tangle without approaching the crux of the problem.

To Justice Knox too it did seem at the end "extremely doubtful" whether Section 68 of Act XV. 1872 was intended to penalise "marriages other than those intended to be or purporting to be marriages under the Indian Christian Marriage Act." But he did not "consider it necessary" to go into the question, although it called for nothing more than a mere application of law and commonsense to the very facts alleged by the prosecution without disputing their accuracy and so might justifiably be regarded as a necessary preliminary issue. He coolly walked past this main question as though he did not see it standing at the front gate challenging his attention, and plunged straight away into the evidence as to the truth of the prosecution case. Of course, he rescued the whole wedding group from the jaws of section 68 just as effectively as Justice Walsh. But he did so, not by spoiling for ever its unnatural appetite for non-Christian priests and their bridal parties, but by pleading that the particular case was not fit food for its consumption. In short, he held that the bridegroom, whose supposed Christian antecedents gave a handle to his persecutors, could not be strictly reckoned as having "professed" the Christian religion "at the time he was married." And the reason for holding so—in spite of the fact that he was born to a professed Christian, was duly baptised when an infant, was admitted to a school to which none but Christian lads were admissible, passed for a Christian among those who knew him and never denied that he was a Christian either before or after the marriage—was mainly and in the last resort the unquestionable fact that he participated in idolatrous worship and ceremonial at his marriage by the Hindu priest. "That act was undoubtedly a profession, an act entirely inconsistent with, I might add, repugnant to, the view that the person performing it was a person professing the Christian religion." (L. L. B. 40 Allahabad 393.)

To this classic line of defence which is always available in every such case of mixed Hindu marriage, being inherent in the prosecution charge itself, the learned Sessions Judge of Ellore has sought to add another line, on some analogy with the declaration in Act III of 1872, which is not quite clear from the report. But he has done a distinct public service by emphasising that "there is no formality prescribed by law as a condition precedent to a Christian abandoning the faith," that "all that is required is that the person should cease to profess the faith," and that "the point is what the person professes at the time of the marriage and not what he was professing at a former time;" although, one should suppose, he went beyond the needs of the case when he thought it necessary to find that the alleged Christian bride's father also ceased to be a Christian before he could be acquitted.

But where does all this learned argument lead us to? The root of the evil is in every case left untouched, free to raise trouble for innocent in-offensive people again and again. How will all this backdoor reasoning help to save, for instance, an honest self-respecting Moslem priest who takes his stand firmly and boldly by his Quran and asserts not only that one of the pair whom he married with non-idolatrous Moslem rites was indubitably a Christian at the time, first to last, but that he had every right to solemnize such a mixed marriage under the Islamic law? Not until some one in superior authority either in Madras or London or Delhi declares unequivocally by means of a ruling or a statute that section 68 can under no circumstances apply to non-Christian marriage rituals and that the alleged Christian faith of the marrying parties, even if true, cannot give it jurisdiction to harass the non-Christian priest or anybody else when the marriage is professedly and manifestly not a Christian marriage, will the missionary vendetta begin to abate, on these lines, just as the flogging of marriage processions could not be prevented in the O'Dwyerian days of 1919 until the martial law was rescinded in the Punjab. The Full Bench of 40 Madras with its strangely indiscriminate and oppressive marital law is the combined Dyer and O'Dwyer of this province whose baleful sway should be endured no longer. Can any learned argument or precarious chance of acquittal in the Sessions Court be an adequate safeguard against, or reasonable compensation for, the outrageous humiliation, agony of mind, physical distress, worldly ruin and blasted life of all the numerous helpless persons, female and male, whom the law, as propounded by the highest tribunal of justice in Madras, has made it so easy to drag mercilessly to the prison door?

Justice Napier, in his Order of Reference to the Full Bench in 40 Madras, had pleaded in vain that the words "every marriage" in the section of the Indian Christian Marriage Act should be read as meaning "every marriage purporting to be a Christian marriage." One can only hope and trust that the present High Court of Madras will hasten to do at least belated justice to his wise, generous and equitable plea through a fuller Bench, and make life and honour safe for non-Christians as well as Christians who may not care to avail themselves of the services of a Christian priest or a Christian Marriage Registrar. If perchance it is found impossible for it to take action suo motu in this case because there was an acquittal in the lower court, may we not appeal to the philanthropic manager of the U. L. C. Mission of Bhimavaram to carry his crusade a little farther and take the trouble to move the High Court against the acquittal, just to give that great tribunal an early chance to set itself right with its conscience and its prestige? If the High Court, however, can neither move nor be moved, the awakened conscience, love of fairplay and good neighbourliness of the National Christian Church of India must assert themselves and make it stand unabashedly and chivalrously by its fellow-countrymen of all creeds and put its foot down on every priestly activity which may savour of religious enslavement, tyranny and persecution in this ancient home of religious brotherhood and tolerance. In any case, it is the obvious duty of awakened India as a whole to insist that the Central Legislature shall step in with an Amending Act embodying in Act XV of 1872 the considered view of Justice Napier, which has also been weightily endorsed by Justice Walsh, in the interests of humanity and commonsense.

RE-BUILDING INDIA.

The idea of monopolies is repulsive to us while it has been for centuries the aim of all Western business. The East India Company itself was a monopoly. Monopoly and exploitation go hand in hand. Unfortunately this Western device is creeping into Bombay under the pretext of better organisation and production. India is not meant for large units but for decentralised control. Centralisation has been against our nature, and any attempt in that direction either in economic or political spheres will lead to failure. Even for rendering service such centralized organisations as the Co-operative Societies have been unsuccessful in most places. One of the striking features of the present Satyagraha movement is that it is decentralised in control. Gandhiji urged everyman to be his own leader. This is absolutely contrary to all notions of warfare in the West. Yet the movement has shown a solidarity any Western militaristic state might well envy. The reason is that in this as in most other activities Gandhiji is closely following the natural genius of the people. This decentralisation does not end in chaos as we have deeper cultural forces that run throughout the national structure and unify action in the form of common ideals and institutions. Centralization takes away the human element in life and reduces men to a mere automaton as illustrated in the western factories.

When we turn to the distribution of wealth we again find Joint Family system acting as a check both against great accumulations of wealth and against dire poverty. The acquisitive ability in the family is pooled and the direliets of society are provided for. Instead of the individual as a unit as we find in the West, here we have a group of several persons with their families pooling their resources. The caste system provides for the poor and needy and at the same time restricts the economic activity of an individual. The amount of wealth our society recognises as necessary for each man is indicated by the regulations, which still obtain in most villages, for the payment of artisans. Each artisan is paid so much in grain by each family that needs or may need his services. This is a kind of a retainer and it ensures his maintenance and anything over and above this he needs he has to earn by extra labour. Take, for instance, the village carpenter. He is given a definite amount of grain per plough and in return he has to do all repairs that may be necessary. This is irrespective of the requirements of each farmer. Some would need more repairs and some nothing at all, but all pay equally to maintain this functionary for the village and any other work he may do, such as supplying woodwork for a house, etc., he gets paid for separately. This places a limit on the amount of wealth he can accumulate.

The functional distribution ordained by the caste system gets rid of the nightmare of western businesses—the death-dealing competition. It ensures to everyone, who is willing to do his quota of work, enough to keep him and his family in comfort.

Thus our economic organisation was calculated to check exploitation, accumulation of wealth and provide employment for all and ban dire poverty. These curbs on individual greed have always been looked upon by Western writers as evils to be eradicated before India can progress. They have completely failed to appreciate the fact that in any society freedom to the individual does not mean unlimited licence to do all he wants to do without any restraint. There is no doubt that Caste System and the Joint Family system have curbed individual activities and eliminated the possibilities of a Rockefeller. But is that an evil? All civilised men have to be subject to restraint of society and be prevented from encroaching on the rights of their fellowmen. We do not deny that in time these two systems have operated in a way not contemplated by the originators but nevertheless we cannot afford to lose sight of the useful function they have fulfilled. One of the reasons the Britishers found it possible to exploit us to the extent they have done is because these had bound us hand and foot while they were free to carry out their machinations unhampered by any considerations. Some of us have broken loose from these shackles and are playing freely the British game of exploitation. When we come to rebuild India we have to bear in mind that in ordering the economic life of the people, India is not for exploitation, unlimited accumulation of wealth and unrestrained competition.

The centre of economic life has always been the village. Towns were merely accompaniments of village life helping in the exchange of goods. But the British system of Government and administration is urban centred and the villages are looked upon as raw material suppliers. This is diametrically opposed to India of History. The Britishers have placed the cart before the horse, and therefore, there can be no progress until we get back to our nature order. We cannot accept in toto our old organisations of caste etc. but we have to face the task of evolving something in their stead to fulfill those necessary functions while we wipe out the evils that have grown around them.

In an agricultural country like ours the chief department of government should be the Agricultural Department, which ought to disseminate information to the farmer, carry on researches and undertake to supply seeds etc. Instead of this we have an Agricultural department that has not even been heard of in many villages. It has proved to be purely an excuse for spending more money on salaries and foreign goods. It is a parasite on society. Where they do have agricultural colleges they are totally out of touch with practical farming. Prof. Kilpatrek, an authority on education with International fame, says that Indian Agricultural colleges only teach students to teach others. They do not turn out practical farmers. How can they? Their organisation is altogether foreign. Most of the Principals are Britishers who have never known what it is to walk behind a plough drawn by a pair of bullocks. Is it fair to expect them to understand Indian conditions? We need actual farmers as heads of such institutions. The Government model farms have unlimited resources behind them and are not run on purely commercial basis. How many can continue if they are placed on a self-supporting plan? It is foolishness talking about 'improved implements,' and 'insufficient manuring' without understanding the farmers' difficulties. Deep ploughing means greater amount of manure and this in turn needs larger quantity of water. In a land like ours where the monsoon is a gamble it is the height of stupidity to ask the farmer to sink more capital in the form of manure on the off-chance of a good monsoon. A man who faces starvation can take very little risks. We should like to see some of our Agricultural college Principals made to live on the produce of land allotted to them and with their own labour. Unless this is demonstrated to be practical, it is adding insult to injury trying to preach to the peasant after squeezing out of him every rupee in way of taxes.

All the talk we hear about not using improved implements, wasting cowdung as fuel, spending too much on marriage ceremonies etc. are mostly smoke screens raised by the government to shield the unwarranted heavy taxation of the poor farmers in an attempt to explain away their poverty and shift the responsibility to them. It is not possible here to go into a detailed refutation of these absurd theories which are the products of the I. C. S. mind later redished out by our arm-chair professors in text books. Taking merely the question of manures, an analysis of all the important rural surveys conducted in various parts of India reveals that the bulk of the farmyard manure—somewhere over 80 per cent—is used as manure by the agriculturists all over India. The dung of animals fed on green fodder has large manural value while that of animals living on dry fodder has very little. Hence for over 9 months the dung is collected and used but during the dry and hot seasons they make dung cakes. Besides, in some cases the farmers are unable to utilise the whole of the manure collected for the lack of water. Apart from this the forest laws have tended to decrease the fuel supply available to the people and they had no alternative but to resort to cow dung cakes for fuel. Furthermore, Mr. Milne in his evidence given before an inquiry committee in Bombay last December stated that cow dung cakes form the most economical fuel compared with the heat giving properties of coal and charcoal. This was his conclusion after carrying out scientific experiments. If there is a lack of manure it is not due to waste of farmyard manure but to the export of bones and oil seeds. These facts are conveniently forgotten as these raw materials are needed for British factories even at the cost of impoverishing India's soil. I have said enough at least to indicate that there is another side to the picture.

In any rebuilding of India the Agricultural Department will have to be one of the major departments of government; not run by high paid Britishers but by Indian farmers who know what it is to face a failure of the monsoon and possible starvation. It has to be a service department and not a prestige maintaining bloodsucker.

(To be concluded).

PLEA FOR AN "ALL-INDIA PROHIBITIONISTS ASSOCIATION."

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The movement against Drink, Opium and other intoxicant poisonous drugs like Bhang, Ganja, Charas, cocaine etc. is purely a social and humanitarian one, and even missionaries are doing something in removing the evils. But they are unable to join the present nation-wide movement against Drink owing to its political associations with the Congress. There are also many social workers among Indians who belong to the moderate or nationalist or other schools of political persuasion who would whole-heartedly join in this social work but are unable to do so as they cannot subscribe to the Congress creed. All of them believe in peaceful picketting of liquor, Toddy and Opium shops, auction-sales for the licence to sell such harmful things, and take all other measures of house to house and mass propaganda which are at present taken under the auspices of the Congress. In fact, they would carry on the work on the same lines as at present without the name of the Congress. In order to enable all such workers to join and strengthen the movement, I would suggest the creation of a separate All-India body, quite independent of the Congress to carry on the work called "the All-India Prohibitionists Association." There is a precedent for this in the creation of "The All-India Spinners Association" which is independent of the Congress. Sardar Vallabhbhai and other Congress leaders may follow the precedent set by Mahatma Gandhi, and as time is ripe for creating such an independent body to take charge of the work and intensify it by better picketting and better propaganda and other additional measures that may be necessary. Of course, those who do not believe in peaceful picketting can have no place in this body, but as the Viceroy admits the legitimacy of peaceful picketting in his objects and reasons of the Anti-picketting Ordinance, I do not think there are any Indians who can have any reasonable objections to peaceful picketting.

The Congress will lose nothing by entrusting this work to such an independent body and the nation will gain by the additional help of all other parties, who sympathise with this aspect of the present Congress programme but are unable to join it as they cannot subscribe to the Congress creed. Even some of the Missionaries will join us in this work and help us in stamping out this evil. Any Government trying to suppress such a Body will forfeit all claims to being considered a civilised one and will be ranked with the worst tyrannies that the world has ever heard of, whether Eastern or Western. The Government cannot afford to alienate world opinion, without serious damage to its prestige, and will lose the support of all the moderate elements in the country, whom it is so anxious to conciliate at the so-called Round Table Conference.

I request you, Sir, to take up the question in right earnest and establish the new organisation in collaboration with Mr. Amritlal V. Thakkar and other social workers and the Congress leaders led by Sardar Vallabhbhai.

27th November 1930.

[There is already the Prohibition League of India of which Sir Purabottamdas Thakurdas is President and Mr. C. Rajagopalacharya, now in jail, General Secretary. The League's activities so far have been chiefly confined to representations to the authorities but we do not see why it should not turn its attention to more concrete forms of propaganda as suggested by our correspondent. Mrs. Lukhmani has started a Prohibition League at Chembur on lines similar to those which he mentions. There is, of course, the possibility that under the interpretation of the law current in the Bombay Police Courts, the activities of such a body may be held to be assisting an unlawful association. This, however, is a risk which no Indian, engaged in any form of social service, can be sure of avoiding nowadays who is not a Magistrate or Police official or a member of the Government or a liquor-shop keeper or dealer in foreign cloth.—Ed. *I. #### GOVERNMENT OF INDIA AND REPUDIATION.

The Leader publishes the following letter said to have been issued by Major Robson, the Administrator of the Bharatpore State to the British Indian investors in the 5½ per cent. Bharatpore State Loan, 1927-47 :—

DEAR SIR,—In view of the virtual bankruptcy of of the Bharatpore State, the Government of India have had under consideration for some time past the whole question of the aid which they are able to afford in settling the liabilities of the Darbad, as the State is utterly unable to liquidate the debts from its own resources. In respect of the 5½ per cent. debenture loan raised in 1927 and repayable in 1947, of which you are one of the holders, they have now been pleased to order that the debenture holders are to be offered fresh debentures on the same lines as the old ones. As to rate of interest (which will be at 5½ per cent.), and maturity but for half the amount of the present debentures. The arrears of interest due to the end of the current year will not be paid; further interest, which will accrue on the new debentures with effect from 1st January 1931, to be paid yearly in January beginning with January 1932. The Government of India have further laid down that the holders are to be informed clearly that if they do not accept this offer within a reasonable period, which is hereby fixed as up to the 30th November, 1930, the liability of the State will be definitely written off and no farther claim in this respect will be entertained.

I am accordingly to give you notice that if you do not intimate acceptance of this offer and return for necessary action, as explained above, the debentures held by you so as to reach the Financial Secretary Bharatpore, by 30th November, 1930, the debt due to you will be written off and no further claims will be entertained. The Government of India have arrived at this decision after earnest consideration of all the facts connected with the case, and the offer made is final.

Yours faithfully,

Administrator, Bharatpore State,

The Leader comments as follows on this ultimatum to the creditors of Bharatpore State; "When a suggestion was made by Mahatma Gandhi that the Swaraj or Dominion Government, when established in India, should have the right to repudiate its liabilities for the loans taken by the Government of India, Lord Irwin emphatically refused on behalf of the Government of India to assent to any such repudiation in whole or in part on any ground whatsoever. Yet when it comes to dealing with an Indian state, of which the Government of India has assumed direct management, the Government has not hesitated to propose a repudiation of a material portion of the loan, regardless of the loss which it would cause to the British Indian investors, who naturally look up to the Government of India for support. Is it right and equitable for the Government of India to insistently press and expect any Dominion Government, likely to succeed to it, to honour its obligations in full, and yet deal differently with an Indian state, when it assumes its direct administration, and ask the British Indian investors to forego half the amount of the loan and the interest for the preceding three years without making any serious attempt to develop its resources and economise its administration? We would like to draw the attention of his Excellency Lord Irwin to this matter, as a very important question of principle is involved. We regard it as nothing but scandalous to threaten in this autocratic and arbitrary manner the British Indian investors with the writing off of their share of the loan if they do not agree to accept the terms offered. We feel pretty sure that if the Maharaja had been alive he would not have acted in this manner towards his creditors. And if he had done so the Political department of the Government would itself have taken strong objection to such a course being adopted."

USE BRAINS! NOT BULLETS!

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.
Sir,

The last thirty years has witnessed an entire revolution in Science, Physics, and Mechanics; but sad to say, matters political and religious remain in the 16th century Slough of Despond. The last reported achievement of the former is the Strato-plane, scheduled to travel 500 miles an hour, at an elevation, if needed, of 40,000 feet. Add to this achievement new high explosives of unprecedented destructive power and poison gases of threefold deadly potency and yet there remain "Preparedness" politicians perpetually prating of "Security."

This "Security" is to be achieved by adding armament to armament,—frontier forts and floating fortresses, marching men and murderous machine gun tanks, travelling forty miles an hour.

Short of any actual outbreak of war the sham invasion of London, staged some months ago, should convince the densest of statesmen of the utter impossibility of guaranteeing "Security" anywhere. In that invasion 75 planes invaded London from the North. London forewarned, was defended by an equal number of planes, plus anti-aircraft guns and balloons. In spite of all these preparations the invaders dropped 200 bombs (duds of course) over selected targets, and retired without losing a single plane. Evidently "Preparedness" furnishes no "Security."

What may?

A well known titled diplomat has lately published that the last world war was caused by the "mismanagement and stupidity" of all the parties involved. Lloyd George says: "Wars are precipitated by motives, which the statesmen responsible for them dare not openly avow." Should their "mismanagement and stupidity," again threaten to involve the nations in another war, let it be decreed that these gentlemen, armed with Machine guns, shall themselves be first in the field, and turn those guns on each other before any of the best young blood of the world is sacrificed. They will, before coming, by their mismanagement and stupidity, to extremities find it convenient to submit their case to decision by the International Court of Justice or League of Nations, and settle their differences by "Brains, not Bullets" and thereafter to build "Friendships, not Battleships."

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Reform Marriage in Hyderabad State:—A Social Reformer sends us the following three notes:—Considering the opposition to Pandit Keshav Rao's Bill to enact for the Hyderabad State a law on the lines of the Widow Remarriage Act in force in British India, one would be disposed to regard the dominions of H. E. H. the Nizam as backward in matters of social reform. Yet there are a few facts proving quite the reverse. It gives me great pleasure to send you the following report of reform activities in a village in the dominions not far from the Metropolis.

A Village Centre of Social Reform:—The village in question, Kondapuram is the headquarters of the Jahgeer lands of a Hindu family of which Dewan Bahadur Seth Lakshminarayan and Raja Shreekishen are the chief members. It (the village) is situated about a mile and a half from Ghatkesar, a way-side station on the broad gauge section of the Nizam's State Railway, between Secunderabad and Bezwada. It may well be described as a centre of Social reform. The Raja Sahob, though a Sanatanis of Sanataness has taken up in hand the elevation of the Depressed Classes of the village by providing them with well-built houses, in the first instance; and it was a pleasure to see these unfortunate members of the Hindu community living in neat and decent buildings. Mr. Kommidi Narasimha Reddy, the Patel and Vatandar of the locality, has, on his part, made a substantial contribution to the progress of the people in his charge. He has started, and is maintaining a school (the Andhra Urdu Vidyabhivardhini Dharmapatha Shala) at Ghatkesar where children of both sexes and of both the Hindu and Moslem communities receive instruction in the three R's. The most remarkable feature of the school is the provision made for educating the children of the Depressed Classes also. And beyond all, and above all, this sturdy champion of social reform has fully prepared his community of Goney Reddies to accept the widow remarriage reform.

Celebration of Widow Remarriage:—In the night of Saturday, the 15th November, a widow remarriage was celebrated in the village. The parties to it belong to the Goney Reddy community among whom the system of pre-puberty marriage prevails and the re-marriage of widows is prohibited. The bride, Shreemati (and now) Sowbhagyavati Mallamma, aged about 18, is a daughter of Immidy Narsa Reddy. She had been married when she was a child of 5 and became a widow when her age was 7. The bridegroom Mr. Todeti Venkatrama Reddy, is a young man of 25 and a farmer by profession. He belongs to the village, Bahramulguda, in the jahgeer of Nawab Sir Ameen Jung Bahadur. The ceremony took place in the presence of about 150 persons, nearly half of whom were women. Practically all members of the caste were present. Mr. Baji Krishna Rao, B.A., B.L., the well-known social reformer of Secunderabad, who himself married a widow several years ago, went to the village, specially for the occasion, with his wife and children and a party of social reformers including Mr. P. Anjayya Gupta and officiated as Purohita. Mr. S. Pratapa Reddy, B.A., B.L., a leader of the community and Mr. P. V. Narasimha Reddy, of the Hyderabad P. W. D. who both could not arrive in time at the village to be present at the ceremony but came afterwards, blessed the newly married couple and offered them their most hearty felicitations on the happy event.

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum NOW without any help whatever from you. The woman who has been "All the Wife and Mother" is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

NOTES.

The Society of Friends and India:—The Archbishops of Canterbury and York issued on the eve of the Round Table Conference an appeal for prayer in all the churches for its success. Commenting on this appeal, we pointed out that God could not be tied down to the Round Table Conference for doing His will about India, and that He could, if He chose, achieve His purpose through the Civil Disobedience movement as through the Round Table Conference. The Society of Friends showed a truer appreciation of the spiritual aspect of the problem when they closed their Emergency Conference on India held on the 22nd November "in worship and with prayer for the Viceroy and M. K. Gandhi, whose great influence was being felt at the Round Table Conference." The organ of the Society, the Friend, gives a report of the proceedings of the conference in its issue of the 29th November. The principal speaker at the conference was Mr. Horace G. Alexander who was recently in this country. Mr. Alexander stated fairly the official as well as the non-official side of the present situation. "In long and intimate talks with the Viceroy," he said, "he had come to understand his position. The Viceroy had a real love for India and was not content to be an official. He had made many true friendships. He tried to see things as an ordinary human being and to come into touch with ordinary people. His humility of mind made a deep impression. India responded to the serious way in which he took his religion and tried to live ever nearer to the example of Christ." With equal fairness, Mr. Alexander described Mahatma Gandhi's position: "Against his advice the Indian National Congress decided at the end of 1928 to give Britain one year's grace; and if at the end of that time Dominion status was not established, to start a campaign for complete independence. Gandhi knew that the large younger element would go through with it, having completely lost faith in the Government. The revolution that had been preparing so long could not be kept off any longer. Should he withdraw from such a plan or should he say, 'I believe so much in the motive and purpose that, rather than see the young people carried over into communism and violence, I must go through with it with you and ask you to accept my methods of campaigning'? That might not be a complete representation of his view; but he did put himself at the head of the movement and try to keep it non-violent." Mr. Alexander bore testimony to the spread of the movement to the villages and the work of women. He explained that its extraordinary spread was largely due to the methods to which the authorities had been reduced to suppress it. Police repression had been used, he said, in many parts "just to show people a lesson" quite apart from any immediate need to deal with unruly crowds. In accordance with the Friends' practice, the address was followed by an impressive silence. Several Friends spoke but the Clerk who seems to be a sort of rapporteur at these meetings, ruled gently but firmly that the Conference had not reached the stage at which it could then and there put down a message on paper.

The English in India and in England:—We gladly publish Mrs. Pitt's letter. She, as we had occasion to mention recently, is one of the most earnest and sincere English friends of India, and has proved her friendship not merely by words but by real, self-sacrificing efforts in the service of Indian women and children in her chosen field at Penukonda. We may assure her that the knowledge that there are English people like her to whom the Indian people are not merely consumers of cotton goods and India is not merely a land to earn furloughs and pensions, is the only counterpoise to much which is calculated to estrange Indians from the English as a people. Her letter on this occasion is an attempt to impale the Indian reader on the horns of a seeming dilemma. Mr. T. Sivasankaram, in a speech which he delivered on his return from England, spoke appreciatively of the English character. Mrs. Pitt fastens upon this testimonial and demands to know how it is that this high English character is alleged to undergo a complete sea-change in this country. There are Indians who had been longer in England than Mr. Sivasankaram, and who will not hesitate to question the correctness of his estimate. For them, therefore, the dilemma does not exist. For our own part, we think that Mr. Sivasankaram is substantially right but that the English character in India does undergo deterioration. Character, it has been said, is nine-tenths environment. We do not altogether accept this dictum, as character is most often formed and manifests itself in resistance to rather than in sympathy with environment. It requires no character to float with the stream. In England, the Englishman's self-assertive tendencies encounter the similar tendencies of other Englishmen, and he learns from early age to keep them under strict control. In India, the easy acquiescence of the Indian deprives the Englishman of this necessary corrective, and his character deteriorates. The Indian's weakness from this point of view, we have long come to the conclusion, is in its effect on English character not different from wickedness. We freely make this admission, and will only add that the present upheaval is an attempt, in part, to get rid of this weakness, and is, therefore, in the best interests not only of Indians but also of Englishmen. A free India alone is a safe place for English character.

The Calcutta Murder:—The Inspector-General of Prisons of Bengal, Lieutenant Colonel Norman Skinner Simpson was shot dead at noon in his office on Monday. Three men entered Colonel Simpson's office-room and fired several shots at him, killing him instantly. They ran out of the room, shooting wildly at all whom they came across, one of those who narrowly escaped being shot being the Finance Member of the Government of Bengal. Mr. J. W. Nelson, the Judicial Secretary, received a bullet on his leg. All the three men attempted to kill themselves. But only one of them, who took a strong poison, succeeded, while the other two are lying in the Hospital in a precarious condition. The murder has been condemned universally by Indian opinion. It was a wanton, cold-blooded crime, committed by desperate men who had made up their minds to kill themselves after killing some high European official. The Inspector-General of Prisons is a purely administrative officer and it is unlikely that the men who shot him had any particular grievance against him or against any of the other Europeans who came under their fire. Judging from the published accounts, it looks as if these men had conceived a blind hatred of European officials and did not mind whom they killed so long as it was one of them. It is said that one of the murderers confessed before he died that he was the man who shot the Inspector-General of Police of Bengal, Mr. F. J. Lowman, three months ago. If this is the fact, it would show that the terrorist movement is finding no fresh recruits and the attempted suicide of the three men might have been intended as its formal winding-up. However that may be, the murder is a serious set-back to Indian nationalism of which, as we have repeatedly said, absolute non-violence is the indispensable requisite at least at the present stage of its evolution.

Not A Concession:—The Director of Information, Bombay writes: "As a further concession to female prisoners in jails, the Government of Bombay are issuing instructions to the effect that all married Hindu female prisoners whose husbands are alive, may, on religious ground, be allowed to wear "mangal sutras." There are two Indian members of Government and three Ministers. Two of these are Hindus. There are besides other Hindu officers in the Secretariat. The English members, although they have served many years in this country, are not, of course, expected to know anything of Indian social customs. If any of the Hindu members had been consulted, they would have told the authorities that the "mangal sutra" is the exact equivalent of the wedding ring worn by European married women. We do not know if married women prisoners in England are deprived of their wedding rings. The Government have done well in doing away with the absurd rule depriving married women of their "mangal sutras." It is, however, not a concession in any sense but the removal of a senseless cruelty. We may add that no one but a married woman will wear a "mangal sutra" even if the jail requires her to do so. While on this subject we think it only fair to mention that more than one recent visitor—prominent figures in the women's movement—to the women's section of Yerravda Prison, has told us that the inmates of all classes, whom they had opportunities of seeing and speaking freely to, are well treated and that the incident complained of was due to an innocent misunderstanding. This should be re-assuring to relatives who have been made anxious by careless and incorrect reports.

Pin Pricks:—What do Government gain by a policy of pin pricks, the latest instance of which is the definition of "near relatives" issued to Jail Superintendents for their guidance in permitting visitors to prisoners? A downright prohibition of any visitors would be intelligible if illegal. But to frame a list of relatives, more meticulous than if it was meant as a schedule to a Succession Act, is merely irritating. If cannot be enforced effectively because the jail authorities have no time or means for verifying whether a visitor comes really within any of the categories specified by the rule. The authority responsible for the rule has similarly no means of knowing whether it is equally enforced in jail ails. No one is surely going to waste his time hanging about jail unless he has some interest in a prisoner. The insistence on blood-relationship as the sole qualification for visiting prisoners, is an instance of official atavism. Surely, one may have friends who are as dear as kith and kin. We are sure if the authorities concerned give some thought to the matter they will see good reason to withdraw this vexatious rule.

An Inopportune Inauguration:—Messages are published giving the names of delegates from the Dominions who are to attend the inauguration of New Delhi said to be fixed for next February. No announcement regarding this function has, as far as we know, been made in this country which is primarily concerned in it. May we suggest that the political and economic situation at present is not the most suitable for any such festive celebration? It is sheer affectation to pretend that nothing is wrong with India and that "business as usual" should go on. The country is in no mood to welcome guests with thousands of her best men and women in jail. It strikes us as being almost callous, if not indecent, to choose a time as this for inaugurating anything in this country which does not give immediate promise of meeting the national aspirations. New Delhi must wait till a new constitution acceptable to the people is ready for inauguration.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, DECEMBER 13, 1930.

DANGERS BEFORE THE ROUND TABLE CONFERENCE.

It will be unfortunate if the Round Table Conference end in a fiasco. But it will be even more unfortunate if it is stamped into a "settlement" which is not an advance but a retrogression from the present political system in the essentials of self-government.

The principle of single citizenship irrespective of creed or caste, which was guaranteed by Acts of Parliament and the Queen's Proclamation to the people of India, gave place to the principle of communal citizenship as the basis of the British Indian State twenty-two years ago. As a result, not only Mahomedans and Hindus, but Sikhs, Christians, Parsis and Jews, are now under the sway of the communal principle. The British in India, too, think of themselves as a community. The depressed classes and non-Brahmins and also latterly some Brahmins, think themselves as distinct communities. The tendency is not likely to stop here. The Sunni-Shiah cleavage in Islam, held in solution pending the larger Hindu-Moslem issue, will assuredly assert itself when the latter is settled. The Protestant Catholic antagonism is already showing its head in the political sphere.

The separatist tendency has been manifesting itself in the territorial sphere also. The initiative here was taken not by Government but by the National Congress after it came under Mahatma Gandhi's influence. The Congress re-distributed the provinces on a linguistic basis, that is to say, areas where a single vernacular is spoken were constituted into separate provinces with their own Congress organizations. It is worthy of note that while Congress has carried decentralization so far the Moslem League has steadily stuck to its policy of extreme centralization.

The great cumulative effect of British rule in the last century was to act as a check on these communal and provincial separatisms. This was done not deliberately with the object of unifying the country, but as a necessity indispensable to the establishment of a stable administration. This made possible the growth of the sentiment of nationalism in which the idea of British rule as a foreign rule had but a very small part. The Indian leaders accepted British rule as the foster-mother of Indian nationalism and their ideas of political reform and civic freedom were modelled on the British pattern. Gokhale was the last and greatest Indian statesman of this period. English education was regarded by this school as the greatest gift of Britain to India next to the "reign of law" which, as Ranade said, it had substituted for the personal rule of Hindu and Mahomedan rulers. Complete self-government on the Dominion model within the British Commonwealth was the goal of its aspiration.

This was in line with the policy of this school in social reform, of remaining within and working for reforms in the community rather than attempting the short cut of migration to other folds. Experience has shown that the first method of reform is best calculated to achieve the end sought for without untoward reactions while the other method has often ended as a flash in the pan. The method of this school of socio-political reformers may thus be called the organic method. This journal has for forty years been the exponent of that method. Nothing which has happened during the last ten years has shaken its belief that this is the only right method and it is convinced that when the present wave of reaction subsides, the Government and the people of India will return to the organic method of reform.

Its essentials are in particular two, namely, a common Indian citizenship transcending creed and caste and the reign of law. If these two go, the constitutional road is closed for ever. And it is because there seems to be some danger of their going, that we say that there is a greater danger in the Round Table Conference being stamped into ways which are no improvement on but are rather a set-back from the progress already achieved, than its ending without result.

On the communal question with special reference to Hindu-Muslim differences, none of the suggested solutions on either side excel Gokhale's scheme which reconciles the reasonable claims of minorities with the paramount claims of nationalism. We reproduce his views on another page. He recognised that our Mahomedan countrymen are apprehensive of the effect of exclusively joint electorates. He, therefore, favoured communal electorates but only for making up the deficiencies of joint electorates. This was also substantially the plan of the Government of Lord Minto. Gokhale as well as Lord Minto desired, to quote the words of the latter's biographer, to prevent the followers of Islam from becoming a rigid enclave, divorced from the rest of Indian life. Another important feature of Gokhale's scheme is that it is applicable not only to the Moslem but to other important minorities also, if desired. We suggest that the Round Table Conference should take up Gokhale's scheme as the basis for an equitable compromise between the extreme Hindu and extreme Mussalman views.

As regards Indian States, the latest development seems to be that the States refuse to come into a scheme of federation unless British India is first cut up into separate, unrelated units like themselves. If the States insist on this dissection as the price for their adhesion, British India can very well do without them. We want India to become more and not less unified as the result of federation. Federation is only a means to the end—the end being unification. In fact, the only reason for taking the States in at this stage is that they will necessarily have to substitute constitutional methods in their own Government as the result of their being brought into organic relation with British India. As Dewan Bahadur A. B. Latthe, late Dewan of Kolhapur, observes in his illuminating book, Problems of Indian States: "The smooth working of the Federal organisation will largely depend upon the progressive character of the governments which the Princes will give to their states. The States' representatives or the Princes themselves, if they choose to go to the Federal Assembly, will not be able to make their full weight felt by the Federation unless they are backed, in one form or another, by their own people." It is a maxim of political morality that no people can be transferred from a more highly evolved to a less evolved system. We do not want the bureaucracy of British India replaced by the autocracy of the States.

This is not an academic objection. The Indian States, even the [most advanced among them, seem to have a certain stunting effect on social evolution. Mr. Srinivasa Sastry presiding not long ago at the prize distribution of a Women's College in Mysore, made a shrewd observation. Although, he said in substance, higher education for women began in Mysore many years before it did in British India, yet the women of Mysore were behind their sisters in the neighbouring Presidencies as an influence in public life. This may form the subject of a thesis on the bearing of forms of government on the social evolution of communities. To set up the States in any position of dominance in the future Federation, would inevitably be to plunge India back into the social stagnation from which she has raised herself through the vivifying influence of modern ideas.

CO-OPERATION IN NON-CO-OPERATION.

We are all working together to one end, some with knowledge and design, and others without knowing what they do.

Men co-operate after different fashions: and even those co-operate abundantly, who find fault with what happens and those who try to oppose it and to hinder it; for the universe has need even of such men as these. It remains then for thee to understand among what kind of workmen thou placest thyself, for He who rules all things will certainly make a right use of thee, and He will receive thee among some part of the co-operators and of those whose labours conduce to one end.

—Marcus Aurelius.

A PLEA FOR GOODWILL.

Dear Editor,

Your issue of November 1st contains a paragraph headed "British Attitude to India" and also under heading "India and England," Mr. T. Sivasankaram's address at Gooty on his return from his stay in Cambridge, as our guest. As this dear old friend and I sat over the breakfast table preparatory to his departure, I said to him "If you publish anything which I do not think correct, I shall have to take notice of it." "Very good," he assented.

Now I am glad that the opportunity comes to clear up some understanding. Mr. Sivasankaram would also concur with the remark of the American publicist you mention who said: "Your people are making a great mistake in thinking that the British as a people are against your self-government." &c. You remark further on: "Old friends are distressed by the apparently sudden chasm which has opened up between England and India, and they are honestly unable to account for it." Further, "It is naturally difficult for her (Mrs. Pitt) to understand why there should be all this trouble in India."

But, dear Editor and old friend, I do not know what this means at all!

Who, better than myself, should understand why this "chasm has opened up," or why there should be "all this trouble in India?" When I have watched the storm gathering and gathering force for the last 40 years,—from the time when I revolted from the artificial station life of "Plain Tales from the Hills" fame, feeling even then that in the complete severance of the British from the people of the land, there was something all wrong. When at last I got the opportunity I longed for, I had the advantage of being able to live inside the small Indian town, among the people, and having no other reason for being there, as they knew, than that I was most happy to be among them. All those who have been able to come in contact with the people of India in such a way will bear me out when I say that it means two things—love of them, and complete sympathy with their aspirations.

I must here ask forgiveness for having dragged myself in, as without this, I cannot drive home my point—and that is—that on these grounds, I make claim for value for my plea—for justice—Justice for Britain and the British Government. For with all its many defects and failings it now requires Justice. Without Justice there cannot be goodwill, and without goodwill, there can be nought but disaster.

In the History of the World there have been few events more momentous than the day by day deliberations of the august Assembly in St. James's Palace. So intense is the spiritual atmosphere that one can almost visualise the forces of Good and Evil warring together for the mastery. God is in the cause of India's freedom, but His will cannot be done by those who stir up "envy, hatred, malice and all uncharitableness." Without faith in the goodwill of the British Government the force of evil will gain the ascendancy.

Now it seems to me that your difficulty in believing in the goodwill of the British Government is that you do not connect the British people with their government.

Mr. Sivasankaram says of the "average Britisher," that "his heart was sound, his character strong, and his good-will undoubted, but he was absolutely not responsible for the wrongs of omission and commission of the British Rule in India!" That is a statement highly controversial, and would not be made by one thoroughly conversant with democratic systems. But without being concerned with this aspect, too large for this space, let us narrow it down to the question: "Who are the members of the Government of India?"

They are—these very "average Britishers,..... sound of heart, strong of character, and good will undoubted," that our friend admires so much.

But you will at once say, they may be so at home, but after coming to India, joining that corporate body, soulless and mechanical, they become ground into robots, or mere puppets pulled by strings held in the hands of his Satanic Majesty himself!

Allowing for the fact that the English official in India is placed in conditions trying to his character, and where the worst side of him is more often easily observed than the best, and that a great and strong body like a government, does have to guard against the tendency of machine-like working, one wonders if it is really believed that the Government is so bad that it is only amenable to methods suitable to the dark ages.

And if this is really believed, surely it is a poor compliment to "Mother India," that sojourn under her golden skies, and contact with her people, should have the effect of turning the sound-hearted, strong charactered, and good-willed average Britishers into a conglomeration forming one brutal and monstrous whole!

Another matter, which, as it is published, I cannot allow to pass. Amongst Mr. Sivasankaram's remarks on the attitude of the Press he says: "When the American Press now and then indulged in giving out the case for India, a hue and cry would be raised in the British Press, influential papers like the Times would invite writers to refute such statements by means which they themselves would not approve in others" &c.

It being impossible to credit Mr. Sivasankaram with anything but good faith, it is evident that we have failed in our efforts to divest him of some wrong impressions which he had acquired when over here, so that without malicious intent he is able to make a statement which, with its insinuation of unfair dealing against a Press organ that prides itself above all on its lofty tone, fair and large mindedness, is as erroneous and misleading as any could be.

All this mistake has arisen out of the inability to understand the difference between a simple plea for "fair-play," as made by Dr. Edward Thompson to America, and Government propaganda.

Though admiring this love of fair play and "playing the game," so characteristic of the British, one has to note with great distress that many of the most ardent Indian patriots appear, at least for the present, to be lacking in that quality implied in the phrase "Give the Devil his due."

Moreover the remarks about the Press effects of glaring headlines and so on, upon the "man in the street," show how unwise it is to generalise unless after exhaustive study of the subject, or taking account of opinions of thinking Britons themselves, who know how Press head lines &c. do really affect the reading public.

What miasma is it, clouding the eyes, and, diminishing the intelligence of so many of our Indian friends, that they are unable to understand that British Governments, Press and such bodies, cannot be separated from the elements which they respect and admire in individual British character.

And now for a last word—

I beg you not to "turn" me "down," as a Government Propagandist!

RE-BUILDING INDIA.*

(By J. C. KUMARAPPA).

[ Concluded from the last issue. ]

One of the main reasons for the poverty of the villages, which is hardly ever noticed, is the fact of a lack of variety of occupations and handicrafts to utilise the idle moments of the farmers. British exploitation has consciously killed our cottage industries and has driven a larger proportion of the people to agriculture which works on: what the economists call 'The principle of decreasing returns'; consequently the output per head has gone down considerably. We need to introduce subsidiary industries. Swiss watches, Bavarian pencils and Austrian glassware are products of government aided industries. A truly national government can do a great deal to alleviate poverty. Gandhiji's spinning wheel is only a precursor of many solutions of this evil. The British Government has not even by mistake exhibited any concern or solicitude for the masses. If India is to advance their productivity has to be increased.

Now if we turn to the political side of rural Indian life, again, as in the case of our economic life, we meet with decentralisation. Each village was a republic in itself. It had its council of elders who decided all important matters. The central government was merely a protection department, and for their services they were paid a revenue—a share of the produce of land. Beyond affording protection little was done for the people by the central government.

All the village institutions were self-supporting. Disputes were settled locally. There were no expensive courts of Justice to go to. Schools were endowed with free lands. The products from these were sufficient to meet the school expenses. Other public works like building of tanks, sinking of wells etc., was undertaken by mutual co-operation and effort, or the philanthropists took care of them. Even to this day some of the splendid irrigation works owe their origin to private enterprise and munificence. These were not done with a low commercial motive of seeing their names on the list of Rao Sahibs on the new honours list, but were the result of a sense of duty to their fellow beings. Conscience money formed no part of their finances as we find in most public gifts of Western industrialists. Even philanthropic motives are exploited today. Each village functioned efficiently and managed its affairs to its satisfaction. People felt their responsibility and rose equal to the occasion.

We have had no feudal lords and serfs or slaves. It is true we have the depressed classes amongst us, but that is social tyranny rather than a political one. Our people have always been a free people. Invaders came and invaders went but the masses have gone on for ever. It is only the British who have enslaved us by their subtle diplomacy. We have had cruel and despotic monarchs but at the most the reign lasted but a generation if they had not met their fate at the hands of their rivals much before their time. Their successors often proved generous rulers. The periods of tyranny alternated with those of benevolent reigns. We have never had 200 years of continuous and systematised despotism till the British period which will figure in Indian History as the 'Dark Age.' The idea of exploitation has always been foreign to us. Our Nationalism has ever been a self-protective Nationalism and not an aggressive self-seeking Nationalism as we find in the West. Hence it is that we fell ready unsuspecting victims to this wildest of nations and have gone through this period of political and economic cannibalism. We are often told that we are under an obligation to British writers like Burke and Mill for our ideas of freedom and independence. This is a travesty of truth. The fact is, these stalwarts of liberty opened our eyes to the British variety of cannibalism. We were a trusting people with no prejudice against foreigners. While the British exploiters spoke in high terms of idealism we took them at their word and we now know with what dire results.

This divergence between their profession and practice, between the word and the deed, is a characteristic of the British. Take, for instance, the enactment of about a hundred years ago which said :-

"No native of the said territories, nor any natural born subject of His Majesty resident therein, shall by reason only of his religion, place of birth, descent, colour or any of them, be disabled from holding any office, place or employment under the Company."

How far are we from attaining that end today! We shall be just as far from attaining the goal of Self-Government indicated in 1919 after another 100 years, if we continued taking their words at face value. Can anything be couched in nobler words than the preambles of the Ordinances of Lord Irwin which usher in the most despotic mandates ever issued by a tyrant? Even patriots like Gandhiji and Malviyaji were cheated by high sounding words until only the other day when they began to demand an earnest for the fulfilment of the promises of Britishers. Our unsuspecting confidence has been shattered by closer knowledge of the British politician. It is this insight into their psychology that Mill, Burke and the rest of them provided. Freedom and Independence are no new conceptions to India. Even during Vedic times, when the contemporary Britishers, such as they were, were savages dwelling in caves, the king is described as a servant of the people. What greater conception of democracy can modern Political Science hold out than this. Why are the unsophisticated peasants of Gujarat who have never heard of Burke and Mill fleeing into Baroda territory today? It is the natural urge within them that makes them seek freedom leaving behind their hearth and home and choosing physical misery. It will be hard to find a parallel for the terrorism that reigns supreme in those parts today. The State there is not functioning as a servant but as a tiger pouncing on its prey. We are prepared to grant that there may be some truth in the credit claimed for Burke and Mill, in that, the rarity of the commodity under British rule has made our love for freedom grow fonder. These writers have explained to us the Nationalism of wolves and we are ever grateful to them for it. We cannot accept Britishers' words—spoken or written—any more. We ask for deeds and deeds alone.

As regards taxation in former times, the state came in for a share of the produce. The revenue could be paid in kind and if the crops failed it automatically vanished. Under the British Government which pretends to do everything for the good of the people they have become emasculated. The school lands have been taxed and that has stopped education in villages. To obtain justice one has to lose one's inheritance and spend time and money away from the village in a taluka town. Irrigation is a mockery in most cases. It has become a mode of classification rather than an item of Public Works. Land under irrigation can be increased by the simple process of assessing fields to Himayat rates; there is no need for supplying water at all. Irrigation is only another method of screwing money out of the farmers. In some cases the so-called irrigation tanks do not hold water even in time of floods. The Punjab may be a little better situated in this respect than other parts of the country. In return for all this taxation there is precious little done to the villages. Over 88 percent of the taxes are not spent in the village for its benefit but goes to pay the high salaries of foreign officials. Hence there is in the finances no cyclic movement to benefit all. It is all onesided. Money flows out of the villages but little returns to them. Can we wonder at the miserable condition in which we find them? Whether the crops are good or bad the revenue is payable in hard cash without any regard to the farmers' condition or market prices. Any government we may evolve will have to arrange to receive taxes in kind, if such a payment is convenient to the farmer. A marketing organisation formed by the government to dispose of taxes so received will greatly help in regulating prices.

Salaries of Government servants have to be ruthlessly cut down and brought into some kind of relationship with the income of the people from whom these are ultimately drawn. We have to transform the present parasitic government into an aid to the welfare of the people. These Government servants will have to live amongst the people and be subject to the control of the village council. The present iniquitous land revenue system will have to be abolished and the farmers given an option of either paying a fixed proportion of the produce or electing to be assessed to income tax in the normal way.

We have already considered the part that an Agricultural Department should play in our Rural economy, and it is not necessary here to add much more to that.

As regards medicine, sanitation and veterinary help next to nothing has been done in the villages. They are left to their own devices. All these aids are available in most towns in varying degrees but the villages are sadly neglected.

Hardly anything is done in the villages to promote education. All the large schools and colleges such as they are are located in towns. In this respect we have to confess that even national institutions, such as the various Vidyapiths started under Gandhiji's inspiration, have erred on this point. We have blindly followed government practice and have established such institutions either in towns or very near them. The proper place for them is in villages. Village boys ought not to be taken away from their surroundings for education. There are hardly any graduates who are sons of farmers who have gone back to farming as profession. This is a heavy loss to the farming community, and it reflects a serious flaw in the educational system. The right kind of education should make a person a better citizen wherever he may happen to be placed.

Coming to the social aspect of the question, we notice that for several centuries there has been a great retrogression in the status enjoyed by women. No nation that tyrannises over its women can ever progress. Perhaps a large measure of our backward state is due to the overlordship men had exercised over women. This has created an inferiority complex in our women who even now vehemently protest against equality of treatment. Thanks to the Satyagraha movement these barriers are breaking down rapidly and the women are marching forward with great strides. If this pace is kept up, I am afraid soon the tables will be turned and we men will have to start another Satyagraha movement to regain our independence from women after the Britishers have been dealt with. However, this is all to the good, and men need not fear reprisals from the fair sex when they come into their own. Women have always been generous rulers, unlike men and there is no reason why they should be different in future.

Taking the social structure itself, we find one of the most unique institutions in our land. The caste system has provided for centuries a binding factor in the national life. It has been instrumental in regulating group life, and in directing individual actions. In the west, we find family pride sometimes, keeps persons in the straight path but more often it is the fear of the civil law. But in India, caste regulations have been invoked time and again to ail society in carrying out its will. Even today a good deal of the effectiveness of the foreign goods boycott is due to this weapon. The Mahajan lays down the law which defies the ordinances of the most arbitrary Viceroy we have ever had. Social boycott is not a new weapon devised by Gandhiji. It is taken out of our ancient armoury. With these social weapons the villages found it easy to keep the recalcitrant individual on the right path without recourse to expensive law suits and demoralising imprisonment. Social pressure is a far more civilised way of regulating communal life than punishment in jail.

Again caste system has dealt a severe blow to the prestige attached to material wealth and taking each caste separately it forms a thoroughly democratic unit. The evils we notice in the present day observance of caste are mainly due to ideas of status creeping into this conception giving rise to feelings of superiority in the higher castes and the development of an inferiority complex in the others. This is a later excrescence and was not originally meant. Both the caste system and the joint family systems have helped towards subduing the influence of 'ego' and in creating a sense of social responsibility.

In India we gave the highest place to learning and culture as represented by the Brahmins. I do not mean the Brahmins of today who by their own conceit have been reduced to a community of cooks or 'Maharajas.' They were intended to lighten the community morally and spiritually but instead of this they kept themselves aloof physically and have thus met their degradation. We placed a premium on renunciation; the Brahmins have converted this into a privilege of receiving presents and offerings. I am mentioning these only to show how we have wandered away from the starting point and we must not judge the institutions by the present day malpractices we observe all around us. We have undoubtedly great evils attendant on caste and other ancient institutions which we would do well to demolish unrelentingly. Looking at the various strong points that have been discussed here and earlier, one sees perhaps why a great democrat and an opponent of social inequality like Gandhiji does not throw in his weight to completely annihilate the caste system.

I have not been pleading for a reversion to old methods but I do want you to think on these lines "prove all things, hold fast that which is good," and our patient explorations will be rewarded by the discovery of the principles underlying our indigenous Social, Political and Economic structures and when we come to rebuild our country we shall have in our possession well seasoned and tried materials with which to raise an edifice that shall be the pride of the world and which can be confidently dedicated to the service of suffering humanity.

LIGHT FOR RURAL INDIA.

(By MR. N. LAKSHMANAN).

In recent years the literature on the problems of rural India has increased to a considerable extent, both in quality and quantity. This is probably more true of the Punjab than any other province. In his latest book Rusticus Loquitor* Mr. Malcolm Lyall Darling discusses the old light and the new in the Punjab village. Broadly speaking, his impressions of the eastern and western Punjab are found to be applicable to other parts of India as well.

It is a well-known fact that Mahatma Gandhi, Mahakavi Rabindranath Tagore and their great friend Deenabandu Andrews have rendered incomparable service to the cause of rural India by rousing the conscience of the educated men and women all over India; and by giving them the vision of service and sacrifice. But, with honourable exceptions, the high officials in India are prepared to ignore the work and worth of these three humanitarian workers of international reputation. The book under review makes it clear that Mr. Darling has endeavoured to rise above the usual official pride and prejudice.

The following message from Post Tagore's famous novel Gora is printed on the title-page: "Come inside India, accept all her good and her evil; if there be deformity, then try and cure it from within, but see it with your own eyes, understand it, think over it, turn your face towards it, become one with it." This is, by the way, the sum and substance of Tagore's Introduction appended to the new edition of The Web of Indian Life by Sister Nivedita who was "the true mother of the people." Mr. Darling's quotation from Gora is significant and is, I imagine, a silent protest against the Miss Mayo cult of mischievous misrepresentation.

On page 371, Mr. Darling refers to Miss Mayo's talk about the sanctity of the cow and carefully defines Gandhiji's own doctrine of Ahimsa by saying that Gandhiji is the protagonist of the new light. Mr. Darling is fairminded enough to confess that the Hindu's reverence for the cow "is merely an extension of the European view that human life is sacred to a conviction, justified by a belief in Pantheism and the transmigration of the soul, that all life is sacred. It is to forget, too, that many peasants feel towards their cattle as the typical Englishman feels towards his horse" p. 373. This, of course, is a sane view. Till recently Indians were prepared to listen to debilitating suggestions, as if Indians were born with a double dose of original sin. This is no longer possible. At least two prominent leaders of the Western India Depressed Classes have chosen to minimise the importance of Mahatma Gandhi's unique endeavour to get rid of the curse of untouchability. On page 343, Mr. Darling quotes an instance to show how far north untouchability spreads. "But", he continues, "in the heart of India powerful voices, notably Mr. Gandhi's are being raised against it."

The enlightened Indian States of Mysore and Baroda have recognised the fact that handspinning, as a supplementary occupation, is quite useful in dry and precarious tracts. Mr. Darling's attitude is peculiarly fairminded, and I make no apology for quoting him in full: "Mr. Gandhi's faith in the spinning-wheel is known to all and is regarded by most as an impracticable anachronism. When the peasants we met on our tour heard that he would have them spin as well as women, all said at once it was not their custom, and that was enough to put the idea out of court. One villager admitted that the idea was good, but said 'the march of the times' was against it. Many of those whose sympathies with Mr. Gandhi are keenest would endorse this. Yet, if it is a good idea, should it be condemned, whatever men may think of the times, until every effort has been made to see whether it can be established? This is too large a question to be answered here, but two points must be noted. The first is this. We all know that the Indian peasant is poor, often desperately poor, but Mr. Gandhi has seen more clearly than any one else that if he is to escape from his poverty, he must husband every penny of his substance and every moment of his time. Secondly, with a faith and devotion that every lover of the peasant must deeply admire he has set himself to try to provide for every home in India that needs it, an industry which will add both to its resources and to its employment. Some say that the addition to resources will be negligible, and in truth it will be small enough—Mr. Gandhi himself puts it at only two annas a day—but those who have any knowledge of Indian standards and of Indian poverty will regard any addition as welcome. Two annas a day is nearly fifty rupees a year, and every peasant knows how quickly this amount when borrowed can turn into hundreds." I have thus quoted Mr. Darling's opinion at such great length because it is so much like the opinion expressed by devoted friends of India like Andrews, Harold Mann and Richard Gregg.

In Mr. F. L. Brayne's much-advertised Rural Reconstruction Experiment in the Gurgaon District, the Charaka was conspicuous by its absence. It will be remembered that non-official investigations published in Young India (and reproduced in the I. S. Reformer) gave one the impression that the Gurgaon Experiment was a dismal failure and a costly farce. Even Mr. Darling's restrained remarks go to confirm this view. His book came to be written, as he says in the preface, because in the course of his official duties as Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Punjab, he undertook an extensive tour on horseback with the primary object of finding out what headway co-operation was making in the countryside. In accordance with the method followed on this tour, the villager himself has been asked his opinion. The whole discussion is quite interesting, and, for want of space, I quote only the concluding remarks: "While in Gurgaon the Experiment has suffered partial collapse, outside its influence extends far and wide. So far as this province is concerned, a prominent Akali said to an Indian friend of mine that had Mr. Brayne been sent to the central Punjab instead of to Gurgaon, there would have been no Akali movement. This may or may not be true, but it is the case that of late years many have felt that considering the magnitude of the rural problem, Government was not doing enough to improve rural conditions. In Gurgaon itself I have heard it said that whatever mistakes were made, they have been forgotten by the people in their gratitude for the way Mr. and Mrs. Brayne spent themselves in their service. And others too may be grateful for an example which should quicken us all in the service of the peasant."

The book is replete with valuable lessons for rural workers in India.

A MODERN CREED FOR THE MODERN WORLD.

BY

KURNOOL DISTRICT).

In the course of history men have sought to gain knowledge by a diversity of ways. Many have sought to gain knowledge by an appeal to all kinds of Gods, Goddesses and Spirits. Others have sought to gain it by sitting alone and thinking deeply and logically on all the matters of human experience. Still others have sought to gain knowledge by striving to temporarily abolish within themselves all conscious thought or sensation and so gain knowledge through a medium other than man's normal mind and senses. Finally, within the last few hundred years, men have sought to gain knowledge by observing what actually happens in the material world, evolving mentally an explanation of these happenings, and then testing this explanation by seeing

(a) if it will explain other facts beside those noted and

(b) whether it leads to the discovery of facts previously unknown.

If the explanation satisfies these two conditions it is accepted as a useful working explanation—a theory—but it is still subject to revision if later discoveries necessitate this. Usually later discoveries do not directly contradict a theory arrived at by the method outlined but simply expand and simplify it. As to the relative value of these different methods of gaining knowledge, we cannot say that one method is better than another, but for the Western people during the next thirty years the last method is the only practicable one.

Our material civilization is based wholly on knowledge gained by this method. Our problems are many and urgent and must quickly be solved, else our civilization will perish. Should we delay and try to learn a new method of gaining knowledge wherewith to solve these problems we are lost, for before our new knowledge is ready our civilization will crumble before our eyes. Accordingly the only form of knowledge which is of value to Western people today is the knowledge gained by Scientific Research. In solving our problems this is the only form of knowledge which can be of use to us. Our problem is chiefly one of evolving a new set of rules of conduct, suitable to our modern world. Hence we must apply ourselves to the task of evolving new rules of conduct for men, based solely on knowledge gained by scientific research.

A vast fund of knowledge gained by scientific Research is now available. This is not to say, however, that it is easily available. Research has been carried on spasmodically, with no definite direction, and while some fields of enquiry have been studied intensively others have not been touched at all. So, even to the trained scientist, science does not present a complete picture of the whole of human experience (the universe), nor even a picture which is evenly developed. It presents him with a picture some parts of which are completely blank, while even those parts which it gives him are bright with details in some places but misty and indistinct in others. But we must also note that, even in this torn and patchy form, the picture is not available to the great body of mankind, for the works of scientists are written in a language incomprehensible to any but a Scientist, and each Scientist knows little of those parts of the picture which are remote from the particular little portion on which he himself works. Accordingly before we can base any rules of conduct on the knowledge gained by scientific research this knowledge must be co-ordinated into a complete picture, the parts of which are all in their proper places; and this picture must be painted in words which will be intelligible to any educated man.

Taken the torn and unevenly developed picture which we have to-day and translating its broad outlines into every day language, we may say that the picture is in two great parts, the boundaries of which are gradually merging one into the other. The one part of the Universe of non-living things or matter, and the other part, the Universe of living, scientist things, or mind. The first great division of the picture shows us the great Universe of stars, of which our Galaxy, or milky way, is but one;

while within our own Star Cluster are many solar systems, of one of which our sun is the central star, and round our sun circle many planets, one of the smallest of which is our earth. Thus we conceive of the true position of our earth in the universe of stars. Within the structure of our earth we can see various physical mixtures and compounds of which it is composed, the molecules which make up the molecules, the electrons which are the components of the atoms, and finally the bright rays of which electrons, atoms, molecules, compounds, earths, suns, star clusters and Galaxies are but specialised and complex forms. Thus we see the position of our world midway in the scale of things between the infinitely great distances of interestellar space and the infinitely small dimensions of the electron.

The second great division of the picture shows us the great ladder of living things, and our knowledge of this is confined to those parts of it which have existed in this earth. What forms it may have taken on other earths we cannot say, but on our own, we can trace the course of development from the simplest living things we can distinguish—single cells—to the most complex living thing we know of—man himself. The simplest forms of life we know can react only to very simple stimuli, one at a time, and their range of reaction is very limited. Tracing our way from these single cells up through microscopic forms of life, jellyfish, real fish, plants, reptiles and giant plants, insects, mammals and finally man. We see a steady increase in the range of stimuli which will produce a reaction, the number of reactions possible at one time, the range of reaction to any one situation and lastly an increase in the number of intelligent reaction. It seems as if the ultimate aim of evolution is to produce a completely intelligent being, one whose every action will be based on reasoned conclusions based on scientific facts.

We must now add that modern research is rapidly leading us to believe that the material and mental worlds are one—that with every smallest particle of matter is associated some degree of sentiency—and that with the buildings of these particles of matter into units of greater and greater complexity, higher and higher degrees of sentiency are reached, till in the higher animals intelligence begins to appear and in man himself conscious intelligence.

(To be concluded)

Government of India and the Sarda Act:—The following resolution was passed at the Fourth Annual Conference of the Hyderabad (Dn.) Women's Association for Educational Advancement held under the presidentship of Begam Saheba Nawab Mukram-ud-Doula:—"That this Conference deploras the attitude of the Government of India in re-opening the question of Child Marriage Bill and strongly urges upon the Government the necessity of keeping the marriage age at 14, as it affects the health and welfare of women, and in the long run that of the nation. It also regards action on the same lines in our own State." The motion was proposed by Mrs. Amir Hasan, seconded by Mrs. M. K. Pillai, supported by Mrs. Rustomjee and carried.

GOKHALE ON THE MINORITY PROBLEM.*

Mr. Gokhale proceeded to express his view of the controversy that had agitated the country during the last six months. Much of the excitement, he said, had been due to a misapprehension of the character and scope of the new reforms. Mr. Gokhale stated his own position in the matter quite frankly. He had all along been in favour of special separate electorates for important minorities but he wanted such electorates to provide not the whole of the representation to which the communities were entitled but only so much of it as was necessary to redress the deficiencies and inequalities of general elections; and he wanted the same treatment to be extended to other important minorities than Mahomedans where necessary. Mr. Gokhale held strongly that in the best interests of their public life and for the future of their land they must first have elections on a territorial basis in which all communities without distinction of race or creed should participate and then special separate supplementary elections be held to secure the fair and adequate representation of such important minorities as had received less than their full share in the general elections. He had urged that view publicly from his place in the Vicery's Legislative Council last March, and he had been called hard names by both sides for it. He however adhered to his view that in the present circumstances of the country, that was the only course which reasonably safeguarded the interests of all communities and prevented injustice to any one of them in practice. As far as they could see, the Government of India's original proposals had been very much on those lines. And if the Secretary of State had not unfortunately disturbed them in first instance, very probably they would not have heard much of the demands that had since been made. No doubt, under these proposals special treatment was proposed to be accorded only to Mahomedans, but there was nothing to prevent the same treatment being extended to others later on if necessary. The Secretary of State, however, proposed, from the highest motives as they could all see, a scheme of his own and having afterwards found it necessary to abandon it and fall back again on the Government of India's proposals, did so in language which opened the door to large demands by the Moslem League. Straightway the League threw the Government of India's proposals overboard and began to urge the grant of larger concessions. Mr. Gokhale made no complaint of this. Indeed so far as the League urged this substitution of election in place of nomination for all special seats, his sympathies were with the League. But when some of the leading spokesmen of the Moslem community demanded a larger representation than they were justly entitled to on grounds such as special importance and higher loyalty traditional or otherwise, an occasion undoubtedly arose when it became the duty of the other communities in the country to protest strongly against such claims. His own feeling in the matter was the same as that of their great leader Sir Pherozeshah Mehta than whom the country had no wiser or more patriotic guide.

Mr. Gokhale associated himself fully with the telegram recently despatched, and as he knew, most reluctantly despatched, by Sir Pherozeshah Mehta to the Government of India. He had assented to that telegram personally, having specially attended the meeting of the Presidency Association for the purpose. When any one said his community was important and should receive fair and adequate representation, the claim was entitled to the sympathetic consideration of all. But when any one urged that his community was specially important and should therefore receive representation in excess of its fair share, the undoubted and irresistible implication was that the other communities were comparatively inferior and should receive less than their fair share. That was a position to which naturally the other communities could not assent. British rule was based on equal treatment for all communities, and the speaker trusted that the Government would never be so weak as to lean for support on any one community in particular. It was urged that the Mahomedans had ruled in India for five centuries. It must not however be forgotten that the Hindus had ruled for countless centuries before them and even afterwards, before the British came on the scene, the Mahomedan power had been broken and displaced over nearly the whole country by a revival of Hindu rule. Then it was said that there were large Mahomedan populations in other countries some of them self-governing countries and that invested the Mahomedans of India with special importance. Mr. Gokhale could not see how that mattered in determining the extent of the representation which the Government of India should grant to its own subjects, unless it was on the assumption that in the administration of this country, those whose heart was not with India were to have preference over those whose was. Moreover the same ground could with equal reason be urged by Indian Christians and by Buddhists. Lastly, as regards the higher traditional loyalty of Mahomedans to British rule, the claim was not historically tenable. And even during the last two or three years Mahomedan names had not been altogether absent from the lists of those speakers and writers against whom the Government had thought it necessary to proceed, though it must be admitted that the number of such names had been extremely small.

INDIA IN 1960.

BHOWANIPORE Y. M. C. A.

The Bhowanipore Branch of the Y. M. C. A. in Calcutta held its Annual Members' Dinner on November 29th, carrying on the tradition of its former habitation in Ripon Street, where the annual dinner was the social event of the year. The guests, numbering over a hundred (Hindus, Mohammedans, Christians, Buddhists, Bengalis and Madrasis), were waited upon by the members themselves, and after dinner the toasts were proposed by distinguished speakers in a succession of witty speeches. In replying to a flattering toast to "our lady guests," Mrs. A. N. Chaudhuri suggested that the many compliments that had been lavished on the ladies down through the ages had done less to forward the women's cause than what women had achieved for themselves in the course of the past few years.

This point was taken up by the guest of the evening, Professor S. Radhakrishnan, the well-known philosopher and Gifford Lecturer, who suggested that thirty years from now, the women of India would have achieved an equality of status which to-day was only an aspiration. "If I could have been given the opportunity" said the professor, "of choosing whether I should be born a man or a woman, I should certainly have chosen, when my time came, to be born a man. If you can imagine that choice being extended to me again in 1960, I think I should very likely choose to be born a woman!" Assuming the prophet's robes, the Professor went on to forecast that the year 1960 would see in India a large sharing of spiritual values, the various religions no longer claiming any exclusive possession of the whole of truth. He anticipated also that by 1960 India would have made further progress towards democracy, and that humbler members of society, the tenant, the menial, the employee, would have won a new dignity, in the recognition of their personal worth and their irreplaceable part in the special organism.

Towards the achievement of these ends, Professor Radhakrishnan, himself an old member of the Association, declared that the Y. M. C. A. was making its distinctive contribution. He proceeded to an analysis of the Christian message, which was of special interest as coming from the author of The Hindu View of Life. "What", he asked "does Christianity ultimately mean, if it is not the power of love and suffering to remake society?" This, he declared, was the method of the Christian Revolution. "I will overturn, overturn, overturn." These, he said, were the words uttered by God in the vision of the Prophet: Ezekiel, and Christianity ultimately stood for that view of God as the supreme Revolutionary.

NOTES.

Indian Reconstruction:—We published in the last two issues Mr. Kumarappa's stimulating paper headed "Rebuilding India." We have already indicated our difference with him on the effect of English education on Indians. There is a shadow side to every good, and English education, especially in its early stages, did operate as a disintegrating rather than as a reintegrating factor. Perhaps, it could not have done otherwise, as destruction has often to precede construction. But it had within itself the corrective to this tendency, and English-educated Indians soon pulled themselves together when they learnt the central lesson of English history and literature: "This above all: to thine ownself be true, and it must follow as the night the day, thou canst not then be false to any man." As regards British rule, it has doubtless made many mistakes, the greatest of all being its all but culpable neglect of India's economic well-being in the fallacious hope of benefitting British industries. John Bright, Henry Fawcett and other far-seeing Englishmen foresaw the result of this "exploitation" policy and warned England that a prosperous India would be her best customer while an impoverished India would lead to her own decadence. But England had in the third quarter of the last century come under new and largely alien influences—Darwinism, Hegelism and Bismarckism. It is a great mistake to think that British rule in India has followed from the first a consistent policy whether of amelioration or exploitation. We have never been able, therefore, to join those who hold that British rule has, from the first, been actuated by a deliberate intention to ruin India or to exalt India.

Nor are we able to accept without large qualifications the idealisation of pre-British India, though Mr. Kumarappa has rightly described the ideals of the ancient lawgivers. If the picture was as rosy as has been painted, the Indian Social Reformer would not have come into existence. The Indian social system had become a rigid, mechanical system before the British came to the country, and, in fact, that is why she accepted British rule as a possible remedy. Women's position had become intolerable. If for nothing else, the British connection should be given credit for the emancipation of women—in many respects, the greatest and most beneficial achievement of the British period. A due recognition of our gains under British rule is not only quite compatible with a clear recognition of its defects but is also essential to a right understanding of the present situation and the best way of setting about to improve it. Mrs. Pitt asked us in her letter which we published last week, to give the devil his due. We do not believe in the devil at all—our "pantheism", which our missionary friends condemn, leaves no place for Satan in the universe. Therefore, it has never been difficult for us to give British rule its due and, moreover, it is quite unnecessary to go into motives in dealing with history. The British period is now an integral part of Indian history and we have to apply to it the canons of historical and not those of ethical judgment. Mr. Kumarappa's paper, however, voices views which are widely held by the younger generations of Indian workers—earnest, sincere men and women who are prepared to give up much at the call of the motherland—and on that account, it deserves close and careful, but not by any means uncritical, study.

The Criminal Law Amendment Act and the Press:—The Upper India Journalists' Association, Delhi, addressed a letter to the Government of India on the 11th instant calling attention to the warning to Bombay newspapers sent by the Commissioner of Police, Bombay, against publishing statements, resolutions and other news of Congress organisations which had been declared unlawful. The order, the Secretary of the Association observed, affected the collection and publication of news to a material extent, and was a serious encroachment on the liberty of the Press which, in the public interests, was bound to put the public in possession of all the facts necessary to form a correct judgment. He added that during the War communiques issued by the German Government were published in the British Press. He enclosed the opinion of counsel who had been consulted, stating that the Commissioner had entirely misread Section 17 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act and that he had been ill-advised with regard to the interpretation of the Section. The Government of India in reply stated that they understood that the legal issues involved were before the High Court of Judicature at Bombay. The High Court gave its decision on Tuesday confirming the judgment of the Magistrate on the ground that the words of the Section were wide enough to cover the publication complained of in the Bombay Chronicle. The eminent Counsel who appeared for the publisher of the newspaper—the Editor did not appeal—laid stress on the publication of the Commissioner's ban of the same meeting in the same issue as absolving the paper of the offence with which it was charged. The Chief Justice pointed out thereupon that the Police Commissioner did not mention the time and place of the meeting which were indicated in the announcement, which the Chronicle did, and that this must have assisted the promoters of the meeting. With due respect to Counsel and Judge, we think that the publication of the ban of the Commissioner was not relevant to a consideration of the case on its merits.

The point at issue was whether the publication was intended to assist the operations of an unlawful body. There was no evidence to show that it did assist in this case. It is as probable that it did the contrary by dissuading people from attending the banned meeting. If Messrs. Brelvi and Kapadia had published a leaflet or notice announcing the meeting, their intention to assist its promoters would stand in no need of proof. But they only published this along with other news in the course of the daily routine. The law as laid down by the Judge, must, of course, be accepted, but we fear they have failed to appreciate and allow for the peculiar position of the journalist. The main issue in the case, to our mind, is whether a person pursuing his customary and lawful occupation as the editor and publisher of a newspaper can be convicted of assisting the operations of an unlawful assembly because an item of news among much other news in a single issue may lead some reader or readers to assist any of its operations. There is an Associated Press message in Thursday's newspaper to the effect that certain Mussulman tenants in a district of Bengal have resolved not to pay rent to their Hindu landlords and that they have been warned by the District Magistrate of the consequences of carrying out their resolve. It is quite conceivable that the news may induce tenants in other districts to follow the example. Is a newspaper liable to be convicted for assisting the unlawful intention of the cultivators? However, for the time being the law of the matter has been laid down. It now remains for the Government of India to say whether they are satisfied that this application of the law is consistent with their assurances in debates on the Act in the Legislature to which we have called attention in previous issues. These debates are of no account in a Court of Law. But they are binding on Government in as much as pledges, implied if not expressed, were given on their behalf to the Legislature in order to persuade it to pass the Law. The reply of the Government of India to the Upper India Journalists' Association seems to allow that the legal is not the only aspect of the question to be considered.

Mr. Winston Churchill on the Indian Problem:—Mr. Winston Churchill, Chancellor of the Exchequer in the last Conservative Government of which Lord Irwin was also a member before he was sent out as Viceroy, made a striking speech at the Empire Union in London Club which has recently started by some retired Governors and others to oppose the grant of self-government to this country. Mr. Churchill attacked Mahatma Gandhi immediately on his starting the civil disobedience movement. If this had been done, he thought, there would have been no necessity for the immense series of penal measures which had been taken. These measures, he claimed, have nearly solved the problem. "24,000 Indian politicians or their dupes were in prison everywhere. Disorder had been repressed and the Gandhi movement had been largely mastered, even by the most long-suffering of administrations." In another passage he contradicted himself as regards the mastering of the movement. He said that the Indian representatives at the Round Table Conference were in no way real representatives and that they had no power to pledge the Indian Congress Party to the sincere acceptance of any agreement. "Gandhism and all that it stood for (including non-violence?) must be sooner or later be grappled with and finally crushed. It was useless to try to satisfy a tiger by feeding him on cat's meat." The meeting, at which Viscount Sumner, Lord Inchcape, Lord Islington, Sir Michael O'Dwyer, Sir Reginald Craddock were present, and Lord Lloyd unavoidably absent, adopted a resolution pledging to support the Indian Empire Society in its effort to awaken public opinion in Britain to the sense of "the grave danger threatening the Empire in India." The danger, in their view, is not so much the Gandhi movement, as the Round Table Conference! Mr. Churchill's speech was made on the 11th. It was at once strongly condemned by the Liberal papers and the Times compared Mr. Churchill to the assassins of the Indian revolutionary school. The Prime Minister, Sir Herbert Samuel and others have spoken in severe censure of Mr. Churchill's pronouncement.

The Hindu Delegates' Attitude to the Communal Question:—Anglo-Indian correspondents of Anglo-Indian as well as Indian newspapers are perversely misrepresenting the attitude of the Hindu delegates to the communal question at the Round Table Conference. Referring to one such misrepresentation some time back, we said that the Hindu delegates would make liberal concessions as soon as it was declared that India should have real Dominion status. Mr. Jayakar, according to a Reuter's message dated the 18th, said precisely the same thing at a meeting of Members of Parliament at which he spoke. "The Government," he said "have already been given an assurance by the Hindu leaders that they will settle the communal problem to the satisfaction of minorities as soon as they have a clear assurance from Government regarding their intention to confer full Dominion status on India. I am aware that in certain quarters attempts are being made to postpone cleverly the settlement of the constitutional question on this ground but it would be an unwise step." It is unfortunate that the Hindu delegation has no independent agency of publicity to keep India correctly informed of

BOMBAY, DECEMBER 20, 1930.

BABU GANU.

The picketting of foreign cloth shops in Bombay city had been showing signs of fatigue. The number of picketers arrested every day had been falling off, and on a few days there were none arrested. The flame was visibly flickering. But a dramatic occurrence at the end of last week, suddenly fanned it into a blaze.

The drama was a tragedy. Picketters in Bombay and elsewhere have been stopping vehicles laden with foreign piece-goods by lying down in front of them. Only in one instance at Lahore was it reported that the driver ignored this primitive form of protest, of which the policeman's uplifted arm and probably also the semaphore, are symbolic derivatives. The injury caused was not evidently serious, as nothing further was heard of the incident. And in Bombay too no untoward results might have followed but, we really believe, for the unfortunate and unjudicial suggestion of one of the Presidency Magistrates a few days ago that the picketers should prove their sincerity by throwing themselves before a moving motor lorry. When we read the report of this Magisterial levity we felt that some serious accident was bound to happen as its direct consequence. The dynamic quality of suggestion is now a commonplace of psychology and it is revolutionising our ideas of education, medicine and even religion. An invitation such as that publicly thrown out by the Magistrate to the highly susceptible minds of young men at this time of surging national emotion, is as a lighted torch thrown into a gun-powder heap. We are sure that the Magistrate must now be deeply regretting his impulsive remark. But, as Marcus Aurelius would say, we are all working together to one end, some with knowledge and design and others without knowing what they do.

Babu Ganu was until 11 A.M. on Friday the 12th an unknown unit of the million and odd inhabitants of this city. At that hour, he jumped before a moving motor waggon laden with foreign piece-goods and on to the front ranks of Indian nationalism. He sustained injuries of which he died in a few hours, and was carried to the burning ghat amidst popular demonstrations which out-rippled those which attended the funeral of Jatin Sen who died of hunger-strike in a Lahore jail. There were two incidents at this demonstration which will strike every Hindu as profoundly significant of the momentous transformation of Hindu ideas under the impact of nationalism. Hindu women insisted on shoulder-ing the bier along with the men and a Hindu woman—a Brahmin, too, of the highly exclusive Nagar clan—set alight the funeral pyre of this Kamati lad. Hindu women do not join funeral processions even of their nearest relatives. No woman has the right of setting fire to the pyre even of her own husband, father or brother. Where no direct male descendant is available, the widow or daughter or sister, as the case may be, hands a blade of the kusa grass to some male relative or to the priest as his authority for conducting the obsequies. A Brahmin lady performing the last and most sacred duty to a stranger is a radical departure from the iron rule of tradition and custom. And Babu Ganu was not even of the same caste. Let orthodox Hindus ponder over this event. Hinduism has broken away for good from their bonds and has become the vehicle of Indian nationalism. Mrs. Hazrat applying the torch to Babu Ganu's pyre, is awakened India applying it to the narrow, soulless body not only of orthodox Hinduism, but of all other orthodoxies, religious, social, and political, as well.

In the presence of this mighty upheaval in the foundations of an age-long system, the question of the individual responsibility for Babu Ganu's death pales into insignificance. Babu Ganu himself, we are sure, never thought of what his act meant. The monk Telemachus, the historical parallel which suggests itself, when he stepped into the Roman arena to part the gladiators about to engage in the murderous tamasha, was moved not so much by a personal impulse as by the outraged conscience of the race which for the moment possessed him and bade him act or be damned. The Roman mob stoned him to death for daring to intervene in the favourite pastime of its degenerate days. But gladiatorial exhibitions were never again held in Rome.

Grave-Yard Inscriptions:—The India Historical Records Commission had recommended that selected inscriptions from the grave-yards of European Settlements in the Bombay Presidency prior to the year 1800 should be printed. Lists of such inscriptions were accordingly compiled by the officers of the Public Works Department and sent to Mr. H. G. Rawlinson, I. E. S., for editing. This work, says a Government Press Note, has, however, had to be abandoned for want of funds and owing to the financial situation it is not expected that funds will be available for this purpose for several years. Government have accordingly decided to postpone this work indefinitely. All the material so far collected will, however, be deposited in the Record Office of the Secretariat, Bombay, where it will be available for research students. This, we think, is pre-eminently the concern of the British community in this Presidency and we hope that it will come forward to provide the funds necessary for the work now abandoned by Government.

THE INDIAN RIDDLE.

Lord Irwin from the first has consistently refused to see a single redeeming feature in the Civil Disobedience movement. A sincere man generally gives credit to others for sincerity. His Excellency has appeared to be a rare exception as regards satyagrahis. The great advocate takes his adversary's case at its strongest unlike the schoolboy orator whose chief aim is a dialectical victory for the time being. Lord Irwin's persistent refusal to see anything worthy of consideration in the civil disobedience movement has been the main cause of his adopting methods which, intended to suppress the movement, have actually served as its most effective propaganda. Then, again, even those who do not profess satyagraha have need to be careful about facts. In his speech at the European Associated Chambers of Commerce in Calcutta on Monday, Lord Irwin is reported to have said referring to the boycott movement: "The direct methods employed in Bombay have, as you know, resulted in closing of several mills and the unemployment of a large number of hands." In the course of a lengthy statement in the Bombay Chronicle on the same day, Mr. Jamsedji Ardeshir Wadia said: "But for this intensive swadeshism, the mill industry in general, and the Bombay mill industry in particular, would have been completely ruined. But for intense Swadeshism, Bombay would not have survived." Mr. Jamsedji is a Bombay millowner, one of those whose mills were said by his Excellency to have had to be closed, and his opinion on the question should carry some weight even though it happens to be directly contrary to the statement of the Viceroy. We do not profess to know the mind of statesmen or administrators. But to the man in the street it does not seem to be the right thing for one to make depreciatory and controversial allegations against others whom one has thrown into prison and arbitrarily incommoded in several other ways.

The Viceroy is the great enigma of contemporary Indian politics. Men who have seen him and known him at close quarters have the most implicit faith in his goodwill and determination to see India on the high road to achieve her great destiny. Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, Mr. Jayakar, the Maharaja of Bikaner, Sir Mirza Ismail, and Sir Akbar Hydari—men of wide diversity of training and temperament—all agree in regarding him as the greatest British champion of Indian Swaraj. We attach much importance to Mr. Horace Alexander's heart-felt testimony to Lord Irwin's personality, which we quoted last week. Mr. Alexander is the last man to exaggerate, even though the object of his estimate is the Viceroy of India. This is shown by the fact that his high opinion of Lord Irwin did not prevent him at the Friends' meeting from charging his Excellency, and through him the British people, with responsibility for the Police and Magisterial excesses in this country. How are we to reconcile such a tribute to the Viceroy's personality with the hard facts of his policy which stare us in the face? When Mr. Alexander returned from Simla, he had halted at Delhi in the hope of meeting Dr. Ansari. But he found to his astonishment that Dr. Ansari had been arrested. When asked how he reconciled this policy with the personality of the Viceroy, he simply said "Frankly, I cannot." But there must be a way of reconciling the two. And there is.

We received recently a life of George Fox, the founder of the Society of Friends, by Dr. Rufus Jones. In it, referring to the relations between Fox (who anticipated by three centuries the non-violent civil disobedience movement of Mahatma Gandhi with whom he had many traits in common) and Oliver Cromwell who was Protector, the author writes: "Fox and Cromwell ought to have understood and appreciated one another, and up to a certain point they did understand and appreciate each other, but the exigencies and demands of Cromwell's difficult role and position made him suspicious of all contagious popular movements, and he more or less mistrusted the Quaker doctrine of the inner Light because it seemed to him to be too closely allied with the wild claims of contemporary Ranters." Lord Irwin's resemblance to Cromwell are not evident on the surface and possibly the Protector—an iconoclast in Church and State—is the last great Englishman to whom his Excellency would like himself to be compared. But many people have expressed surprise that two such religious-minded men like Mahatma Gandhi and Lord Irwin could not have got on harmoniously together. Scoffers have answered by saying that there is no room in India—vast as it is—for two Mahatmas. For our own part, we are inclined to think that Lord Irwin substantially agrees with Mahatma Gandhi's aims, but differs from him in holding that the bureaucracy cannot be converted by frontal attacks but must be hoist with its own petard. Both believe in suffering as the means of salvation, only while the one undergoes it, the other inflicts it, for the good of the country. As a Conservative statesman, too, Lord Irwin perhaps dislikes popular movements—Conservatism, Mr. Gladstone said, is distrust of the people qualified by fear. And as we said in the beginning, His Excellency has never been able to discriminate between non-violent satyagraha and bomb and revolver revolution.

its position from time to time. We may, however, say that there is no basis for some of the hysterical messages that are being sent out to this country, and that the Mussulman no less than the Hindu delegates are fully conscious of the grave responsibility they will incur if they fail to agree upon a fair, just and equitable settlement on this comparatively minor question. Whatever settlement is reached must be on principles such as can be extended, if necessary, to other minorities should they so desire.

THE CHARACTER OF JESUS CHRIST.

(BY THE REV. VERRIER ELWIN, CHRISTA SEVA SANGHA.)

It is not easy to speak of one who has made life beautiful for me beyond my dreams; and I realise that all the art and wisdom of the centuries has not succeeded in catching half His secret; yet who can help talking sometimes of His Love?

In trying to portray the character of Jesus, it may be of interest to take a few of the classical descriptions of sanctity that India has given us, and to see how far they can be used to describe the Mirror of the Saints. We may begin by quoting an account of the Beauty of Holiness from one of the short poems of Tulasi Das, the Vairagya-Sandipani (The Kindling of Dispassion).

"Simple are his syllables, simple his language. But, though simple, know thou, that they are full of meaning. Tulasi, simple is the Holy, and thus mayst thou recognise him.

"Unimpassioned is he, but giving happiness to all. Just and self-restrained, ever singing the praises of the Lord. Ever enlightening the souls of the ignorant, and ever for this purpose wandering from place to place.

"Ever devoted to helping others, ever devoted to the supreme goal, in love working out his life.

"When he speaketh, it is with discretion, and full of his own sweet nature; nor even placeth he his foot on the way which leadeth to pain or angry words.

"Gentle are the words of the holy man, falling like nectar upon the ear. Not by deed, not by thought, not by word, doth he give pain to any one.

"Very gentle is he, and pure even in his desires. In his soul there is no defilement. On his Master alone is his heart ever stayed.

"Equal counteth he gold and glass. Equal counteth he friend and foe. Such an one is counted in the world as a Holy Man."

This beautiful picture, which in some respects presents a striking parallel to J. H. Newman's portrait of a true Gentleman, might almost be a description of Jesus. The keynote of His life was a supreme simplicity; His mind and heart were unified about a single Goal. This unification of character reveals itself in the speech of Jesus, and specially in His parables "Simple are His syllables, simple His language." His sayings are "full of His own sweet nature." Every word of Jesus was full of Jesus. Like best poetry, His sayings are inevitable; you cannot imagine them otherwise. They fit into the whole scheme of things. They are inevitable. Like all profoundly simple souls, Jesus was very gentle; although like many gentle souls, He could be moved to a noble indignation against social evils. By His gentleness He transformed men, ennobled them, gave them dignity and strength. All came like to His generosity. He counted equal gold and glass, for He saw glass as gold. He saw in every foe one who might some day be His friend.

If the keynote of Tulasi Das's ideal is simplicity that of Tukaram is Love. "Their tongue," he says of the saints whose praises he so often sings, "is moistened with the nectar of love; every impulse of their mind dwells immovable at the feet of God." "It is the glory of the saints that they came to bless the world; they wear out their bodies in serving others. Forbearing love is their stock-in-trade; there is no self-love within them." Tukaram lays a strong emphasis on the spirit of service. "Compassion is the saints' capital: they expend their speech in doing good to others." "They are the vigilant servants of mankind. Because they are free from all self-seeking, their hearts are quiet." "Their mind is purified, and reposes." "There is no anxious care in the village of the saints; shouts of victory ever resound there." This quietness of heart issues in a gentleness of speech and manner. "They whose hearts are pure are gentle in demeanour." "Where pity, pardon, peace abide, there God abides." The saint is thus the gentle, patient, self-less servant of mankind, whose heart is full of love, though he will probably bestow his blessings rather by what he is than by what he does. For "such are the saints who meet us on our path that the fetters of the world are broken at the sight of them; they are ever filled with the joy of true mind and true being; and we shall honour them as hallowed sources of liberation."

There is no need to stress the place of love in the personality of Jesus. Forbearing love was indeed His stock-in-trade; and compassion was His capital. Jesus, says Mozoomdar, "was the incarnation of the sweetness of self-forgetful compassion." His love was that unbounded generosity of the spirit which is naturally attracted to the unattractive. Jesus sought out those who were despised by the respectable, or boycotted by the intolerant, or excommunicated by the orthodox. In the story of the Good Samaritan He presses home the duty of active neighbourliness. In the story of the Prodigal Son, He shows how it is the very nature of Love to treat men better than they deserve. In the story of the Lost Sheep He illustrates the great truth that in the return of the soul to God, it is God Himself who takes the initiative, for love can do no other. Jesus Himself loved men with a tender and discerning sympathy that no ingratitude could alienate, and on the Cross He prayed for His murderers and forgave them.

The heart of Jesus, like Tukaram's ideal saint, was full of peace and He rebuked anxiety as a slur on the goodness of God. "Peace I give unto you, my peace I give unto you." "Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid." As Jesus walked among men, their worldly fetters were broken, and they were filled with joy. "I am come that they might have life and might have it more abundantly." He was in truth a hallowed source of liberation. "I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life." "The Truth shall make you free."

There is another tradition of Indian sanctity which we may call the Ascetic tradition, an ideal also deeply embedded in historic Christianity. The ideal of the ascetic is freedom, freedom from every bond that would hold him to the earth. Such an ascetic is described in the Mahabharata. "He neither grieves nor exults." He is free from the distractions of the conditional life. He has risen above sympathy. "When all creatures are afflicted, he can never be afflicted by anyone." "He is devoid of all desire, and so is never shaken by pain and sorrow and fear, the terrible effects that flow from affection and attachment." He is completely self-sufficient. "Having adequately concentrated his soul, he lives steadily on himself." And "nowhere in the world can be seen anyone that is happier than he." The ascetic has closed the gates of the five senses, and he enjoys the exultation of true inner freedom.

No seeker after God can afford to ignore the ascetic challenge of religion. The body must be tamed and controlled, the senses must be subjugated, there must be a thorough-going hygiene of the mind, the seeker must submit to a life-long discipline. Jesus Himself was an ascetic who fasted forty days in the terrible wilderness of Judaea; He was a celibate; He possessed no property; He was ready to sacrifice sleep, food and comfort for the great purposes of His life. But Jesus never allowed His asceticism to dry up the springs of sympathy. He never became dehumanized, aloof from human interests, indifferent to human sorrow. He was at once free and bound, detached and attached. For example, He loved His mother with a pure devotion, yet when in the middle of His work she came to dissuade Him from the course He was adopting, He asked, "Who is my mother?" and with a gesture that seemed to include the whole world, exclaimed, "Behold my mother and my brethren. For whosoever shall do the will of my father which is in heaven, he is my brother, and sister, and mother." Above all, Jesus possessed that asceticism of the mind which is essential to all who would follow truth courageously. He told his followers to be indifferent to the good opinions of men. "Blessed are ye when men shall reproach you, and persecute you, and say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake." They were to have no fear of those who could only hurt the body. He himself was utterly free of the fear of convention, of ecclesiastical disapproval, of unpopularity and of death itself. His only bondage was an alert and active sympathy with the whole human race. The heart of Jesus was bound up with the heart of man. Mozoomdar asks, "Free from desire, the mother of sorrow; free from carnal affection, the cause of all misery; free from self-interest and self-glorification, why did Jesus weep?" His weeping was "no weakness," he replies, "it was the overflow of strong love." He wept for others, He would allow no one to weep for Him. Jesus wept: He wanted the whole suffering humanity to be His in sweet, everlasting sympathy.....and His holy tears carried the warm current of vitality into the heart of the living and the dead."

The last account of saintliness that we will consider is contained in a hymn dear to the heart of Mahatma Gandhi. It was sung to him during his great fast; it was sung again not long ago when in the secrecy of night he was carried off to jail. "He is the true Vaishnava who knows and feels another's woes as his own. Ever ready to serve, he never boasts. He bows to every one and despises no one, keeping his thought, word and deed pure. Blessed is the mother of such an one. He reverences every woman as his mother. He keeps an equal mind and does not stain his lips with falsehood; nor does he touch another's wealth. No bonds of attachment can hold him. Ever in tune with Ramanama, his body possesses in itself all places of pilgrimage. Free from greed and deceit, passion and anger, this is the true Vaishnava."

With the alteration of one or two words this noble hymn might be placed on the title page of a Life of Christ. Its keynote is the ideal of service. True service springs out of sympathy, it is never boastful, it is always reverent. In such a way did Jesus give loving service to all humanity. There was nothing artificial about his service. It was not done on a theory, or because he thought it would look well, or because it was the fashion. He served men because He could not help it. His deeds, like words, were inevitable. They were the natural fruit of love. Jesus never despised any one, for He put Himself below all men as their servant. Jesus had no servant, and so he never got into the habit of ordering people about and dominating them. He remained always what he once illustrated in vivid symbol—the master kneeling at the feet of his disciples, serving them in the sweet abandonment of love.

Simplicity, Love, Freedom and Service—these are four notes of a personality which ultimately defies analysis. I well realise how far this is from describing even a part of that full-orbed wonder that was Jesus. He can only really be known in the inner depth of the heart, for we only know what we are, and if we would grow in knowledge, we must grow in love. "He comes," says Schweitzer, "He comes to us as One Unknown, without a name, as of old, by the lake-side, He came to those men who knew Him not. He speaks to us the same word: "Follow thou me!" and sets us to the tasks which he has to fulfil for our time. He commands. And to those who obey him, whether they be wise or simple, he will reveal himself in the toils, the conflicts, the sufferings which they shall pass through in his fellowship, and, as an ineffable mystery, they shall learn in their own experience who He is."

Though truths in manhood darkly join,
Deep-seated in our mystic frame;
We yield all blessing to the name
Of Him that made them current coin.

TENNYSON.

COMMISSIONER BOOTH-TUCKER.

(By BRIGADIER H. PINK SMITH.)

"Booth-Tucker, Sadhu and Saint", by F. A. Mackenzie is an account of one whose work as a missionary in India was unique in its methods and marvellous in its results.

The story of how Frederick St. George de Lantour Tucker resigned his post in the I. C. S. and became an Officer in the Salvation Army has often been told. In this book Mr. Mackenzie, in lively fashion, tells of the long line of family connections with the administrative class in India and of how the one who was to become the best-known of them all was born in Bengal, educated in England, returned to India to follow in the steps of his predecessors in the family line, and then heard the call of God to take up the task of a brave endeavour to bring deliverance to the many millions of India who seemed to have been overlooked by the authorities and to have been despised by their more favoured countrymen.

Through well-nigh three hundred pages the author never lets the interest of his story flag. From birth to death—through the trying times of the Indian Mutiny, through College days in England, through four and a half years as a member of the governing body in the Punjab; and then the wonderful, daring, persecuted yet victorious entry of the Salvation Army into the stream of India's life, with the spread of its work throughout the land, and then, further, through years in England and America and, at length, back again to India for such social, industrial and agricultural work as has been the wonder and admiration of all who have had knowledge of it—this man, who gave up all for the ALL, goes to his rest honoured by the King, whom he ever loyally served, and blessed by tens of thousands of people on both sides of the globe for whom he freely spent his powers.

Anyone who knew Booth-Tucker would say, that the great driving force in his life was the religion of Jesus Christ. "He was more like Jesus Christ than any man I ever knew," was the testimony of one who was intimately acquainted with him. This religion of Booth-Tucker's had two main features: it was deeply mystical and it was eminently practical. He had not any use for a religion which did not get things done, which did not make a man better in himself and set him to work to make other people, and other people's circumstances, better.

To readers of "The Indian Social Reformer" some of the ideas of Booth-Tucker (or 'Fakir Singh' as he was familiarly known in India) in regard to the Depressed Classes and the relation of Government to them will be of interest. Speaking of these people he says: "I certainly think the 60,000,000 of these depressed classes ought to have some sort of representation. Some of the cleverest people

I have ever met in India came from these classes—magnificent people with brains. It does not follow that because a man cannot read or write he has not brains."

In a memorandum drawn up by this lover of India in 1919 he advocates the forming of an Indian Village Welfare Association. In this paper he presses for the satisfactory provision of drinking water for villagers; for quick-growing fuel timber, (so that manure could be used to enrich the land, instead of being used as fuel); for the supply of fertilizers as a means of helping to increase fodder, and for some system of preserving fodder, either dried as hay or in silo.

For village industries he urges an improvement in regard to methods and implements connected with hand-loom weaving and the taking up of sericulture and silk-weaving. There should be adequate medical aid provided, and education which would fit those who got it for doing of better work as farmers and as village artisans. He also favours the provision of periodical literature, in the vernacular, of a bright and informative character, after the style of Mr. Arthur Mee's "Children's Newspaper."

In regard to India's relationship to Britain and the Imperial Government he is of the opinion that the Secretary of State for India should be chosen because of his knowledge of India and its needs, and in view of all the guesses which have been made recently as to who will be Lord Irwin's successor, it is not without interest to note that long before the present situation arose this far-seeing man suggested that a Prince of the Royal House should be Viceroy, with an adviser or Deputy Viceroy chosen from amongst those who had first-hand and deeply sympathetic knowledge of India.

Before the Joint Parliamentary Committee on the Government of India Reform Bill, on October 9, 1919, Booth Tucker gave evidence in the course of which he said: "Let the British official make the people feel that he loves them. I believe you can do anything with Indians if you can make them feel—not by the lips, but by your actions—that you love them. I have gone in and out among all classes of Indians, and I am glad to have an opportunity of saying that a more beautiful set of people I have not met in the world, with whom I would rather associate in any sense, or put myself under them as well as over them."

Progress in Prison:—"The key to the Progress of India is with the women. I have the greatest reverence for all they are doing", Lady Simon is reported to have declared, speaking at a luncheon at Wadham College, Oxford, where she and Sir John Simon entertained a large party of delegates to the Round Table Conference and their ladies. The key is with the women, but the women themselves are under lock and key in Indian prisons. Lady Simon's reverence, therefore, cannot reach beyond the prison doors as she cannot claim to be a "near relative" of these women under the rules.

MODERN CREED FOR THE MODERN WORLD.

(Concluded from the last issue.)

Thus we see in the whole universe a constant evolution going on from simple units with little sentience to complex units with higher intelligence. From the electrons of the cold nebula to the simple atoms of its hotter form. From these to the more complex and various atoms of the sun. From the sun-atmos to the compounds of a hardening earth and from these to the simplest forms of animate slimes. From these we pass through fish, reptiles, insects and mammals to intelligent men, and we cannot doubt that the stages yet to come will develop, first a unitary national intelligence in men, next, unitary racial intelligence, and finally the whole universe will be one self-conscious unit of intelligence. The picture science gives us based on verifiable knowledge, is of a constant revolution, from the first, beginnings of times, and throughout the whole universe, of simple forms of sentient matter into more and more complex structures of form and intelligence. With this process we must align ourselves, and our rules of conduct must be such as will harmonize with it.

My dictionary defines the word God as meaning a superhuman or supernatural being regarded as controlling natural forces and human destinies and worshipped or propitiated by man; a deity, a divinity; a personification of any of the processes of nature; a person formally recognised as divine and entitled to worship; an image, animal, etc., worshipping as an embodiment or symbol of supernatural power, an idol.

Of any creature or person answering to these descriptions science knows nothing. We have no knowledge of the existence of beings outside the universe, and we can say definitely that the arbitrary interference with the processes of the universe by any outside influence never occurs. Hence if any beings exist outside the universe they can have no effect on our own lives. Of the existence within the universe of beings higher than men we have also no knowledge, but we have also no proof that they do not exist. Of the fact that men "worship and propitiate" many deities we are also aware, but science knows nothing of their existence and can say definitely that the results of such worship and propitiation are not discernable, for the processes of this universe go on in their normal directions no matter how desperately we pray and sacrifice. Science sees a great evolution everywhere going on (in their normal direction) according to a definite and well ordered plan. What influence ordered that plan science cannot tell, nor whether it is inside or outside our universe. Whatever that influence is, it gave us our intelligence, that we might use it in development of its plans. It wants neither worship nor propitiation but intelligent co-operation. It intends that we should constantly realise its ends and willingly help to achieve them. To do this we must use the gift it has given us—our conscious intelligence—we must research, research, research into every thing which exists. We must think universally. And we must base our every action on conscious thought.

If we would ask how this programme of intelligent co-operation may be carried out in our daily lives, 3 great tasks confront us:

(1) We must co-ordinate all scientific knowledge into one great picture showing all that we know of our place and purpose in the universe where our knowledge is incomplete we must present as clear a picture as we can, and frankly admit that we may later be forced to modify it. Then we must carry this knowledge to every man, woman, and child in the world. We must convince every one of the supreme dignity and necessity of research. We must organise research on so huge a scale that every one will spend part of his time in research, even though, as always some will be the original thinkers and experimenters while others will be capable only of routine checking and testing. And we must have a careful direction of this research so that no subject is given undue attention while another is left untouched; we must extend research to all those occult phenomena which it now ignores and throw the search-light of our intelligence into every dark corner of the universe.

(2) We must co-ordinate all our national activities into one harmonious whole, the purpose of which is to advance our research. We must adjust our births and deaths so that we get the types of people we want, in the numbers we require.

We must so adjust our production and distribution machine that the material needs of the people may be met with the least possible expenditure of time and energy, thus leaving more time and energy for research, and we must so adjust our information service that our people shall attain a fair and impartial attitude towards life and world affairs and be capable of judging any issue logically on a basis not of prejudice but of fact.

(3) So soon as an adequate co-ordination of activities within the nation is achieved, co-ordination of the separate national entities into a higher unit—the race—must be striven for. We must direct all our means of influencing human behaviour—book newspapers, films, radio—to the production, first of a conscious national intelligence and next of a conscious race intelligence amongst human beings. Then indeed will man stand on the earth for a footstool and stretch out his hands among the stars.

Here is sufficient work for all of us, for the rest of our life on earth: Let us forget our petty personal aims and devote ourselves to these great tasks for, if we succeed we shall have made man truly immortal. All other civilizations have risen, flourished and perished. So will this present civilization unless we combat its ills by the use of conscious intelligence. We are very near the brink today, and only if the men of this generation work as men have never worked before, and work intelligently shall we escape the fate that overtook ancient civilizations.

The Spirit which guides the Universe is striving to make us masters of our destiny and co-partners in its work. Let us dedicate to that end our energies and if needed be our lives.

TREATMENT OF POLITICAL PRISONERS

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The absurdity of the classification of prisoners never showed itself so palpably as during the present week. A magistrate in Bombay had the temerity to ask the counsel to produce evidence of status in the case of Messrs. Brelvi and Kapadia, as though their being heads of the editorial and managerial departments of the Chronicle did not carry its own status. The classification in their case was as vindictive as the sentence.

In Ahmedabad Mr. Mahadeo Desai has been the victim of the same policy. He was an 'A' class prisoner in Sabarmati jail only a little while ago, being confirmed in that class by Government. But the trying magistrate Mr. Kadri has now placed him in 'B' class. In Mr. Brelvi's case the magistrate professed ignorance of the status of the accused. Here there was no question of such a pretence, in as much as the prosecutor described Mr. Mahadeo Desai as "an LL.B., Mahatma Gandhi's Private Secretary, General Secretary, Working Committee of the Congress, Provincial Secretary of the Gujarat Prantik Samiti for several years, one who has led the movement and who has considerable influence; a live wire etc., etc."

In the jail itself there have been two flagrant cases of transfer from 'A' to 'B' class. Mr. Vin, a leading lawyer of Broach and President of the Bar Association who was in 'A' class had been lowered to 'B' and Mr. Vadilal, who is the son of an Ahmedabad magnate and a Supertax payer has also been so lowered.

Some means of effective protest must be found against the mischievous way in which the curious rules about classification of prisoners are administered. One feels that there has been very little agitation in this matter.

Ahmedabad, }
8th December 1930. }

Yours, etc.,
JIVANJI D. DESAI.

[Since this letter was in type, Mr. Desai has been moved up to the A class. The case of Mr. Brelvi is really inexplicable. It is freely said that Government is especially set against Mussulmans associating with the civil disobedience movement. It is quite obvious that the real purpose of classification is often lost sight of, and that it is being utilised for some other unintended purpose. This is a matter which should be looked into by those responsible for the good government as distinguished from merely efficient administration. Government may appoint a committee of officials and non-officials to suggest a method of classification which will remove the present glaring anomalies. The proper line of reform is to separate political from common offenders, to prescribe a common standard and to allow prisoners to get any thing extra within limits at their own cost.

OUR NEW PLACES OF PILGRIMAGE.

(The Social Service Quarterly.)

Writing eight years ago on the Annual Administration Report of the Bombay Jail Department, we ventured to express the hope that the incarceration of a large number of political workers and leaders because of the non-co-operation movement would have the result of attracting attention to a part of the administrative machinery of the country which was apt to be neglected. One of the workers we referred to, Mr. J. P. Bhausaali, contributed to a subsequent issue a most valuable article on "Jail Reform" based on his personal experiences in the Yeravda and Ahmedabad Central Prisons. Mahatma Gandhi after his release in 1924 wrote a series of articles in Young India drawing attention to the evil features of the Indian prison system and suggesting some very modest measures for its improvement. When we wrote in 1922, Government had not issued orders on the Report of the Indian Jails Committee, presided over by Sir Alexander Cardew, and it did not then seem unreasonable to hope that as a result of the recommendations made by that Committee, and under the searchlight of public criticism directed towards a neglected part of the administrative machinery of the state, we would see some of the most vicious features of the working of the jails removed without delay. Unfortunately, the exposure of the evils was not followed up by a vigorous public propaganda on the platform and through the press for the reformation of penal system, and hence we are, at least in the Bombay Presidency, where we were in the year of grace 1923. So unresponsive are Government to public opinion, so impervious to the trend of modern thought on penology that their methods of dealing with crime continue to be the same as they were ten years ago, while there is scarcely any civilized country in the world where these have not undergone a veritable revolution since the War. If we compare the Jail Report of 1922 with the recently published Report for the year 1929, we find scarcely any changes in the arrangement of the material or the presentation of facts, much less in the mental attitude and trend of thought of those in charge.

The volume of evidence about the horrors of jail life forth-coming from those imprisoned for political offences during the non-co-operation movement has had no effect on Government, except that yielding to the pressure of organized opinion in the Legislative Assembly, Government have agreed to divide prisoners, into three classes, mainly according to their status in life. What Government have done is not what public opinion demanded. Instead of creating a special class of prisoners, as was recommended by the Carlew Committee, to which might be assigned persons of good character whose offences did not indicate grave depravity of mind, Government have been pleased to introduce the vicious principle of class distinction even among political prisoners themselves. There is already racial distinction observed in jails, foreigners being treated better than sons of the soil, and now those who are well off in life are to be treated better than those not so well circumstanced, though the offences might have been the same. And thus we witness the disgraceful spectacle of a revered and distinguished Servant of India like Mr. Amritlal V. Thakkar being awarded hard labour in the B division for the performance of a public duty—like guiding a temperance campaign which in the eyes of social servants is no offence whatsoever—while foreigners convicted of the most heinous of crimes continue to enjoy special facilities in the same jails and under the same law. Since the commencement of the present civil disobedience movement, thousands of Satyagrahis have been sent to jail but it is only a few who have been allotted to the A or B divisions and have thus been enabled to observe some decency of life and enjoy some amenities during their stay in jail. All the rest, that is the vast majority, who too have committed the same offences involving no moral turpitude are classed as C, that is they rank with ordinary criminals and do not enjoy any special treatment because of the fact that their offence is a technical breach of the law committed deliberately as passive resisters. They never avoid arrest nor do they ever attempt to escape and yet they are often handcuffed or fettered mainly with a view to humiliate them; they observe all the jail regulations and yet they would be subject to harassment and indignities on the part of petty officials in jail and even to punishment for supposed offences against discipline; though educated and often more cultured than all the jail officials put together they are kept intellectually starved and often deprived of suitable opportunities for reading and writing; though accustomed to a wholly different dietary they have all to take to the style of food suitable for persons bred up differently; and, lastly, while capable of doing skilled work they are put to unskilled labour of the worst description.

In view, however, of the large accretion to the population in jails that the incarceration of political prisoners results in, it might be futile to expect the authorities to adopt any differential treatment unless suitable structural alterations are effected in the jails or the political prisoners are segregated and housed in separate detention camps. Failing this, the immediate demand of the public should be for a wholesome change in the treatment of all prisoners in jails and a rapid improvement in their conditions of life and work. What these changes should be is indicated by the following comments on the main features of the last Jail Administration Report for the Bombay Presidency.

Released political prisoners have given expression to their dissatisfaction with the quality of the food supplied in jails, especially to C class prisoners. These complaints are the same as were given expression to eight or ten years ago, and to all except those accustomed to a very coarse diet the food is so unpalatable that there is a considerable amount of voluntary starvation and consequent loss of weight. The average cost of the food supplied is Rs. 46-3-0 per prisoner annually that is about two annas per head per day. The cost of vegetables and condiments purchased has gone down progressively from Rs. 25,580 to Rs. 15,025 in the last five years. It is explained that the decrease of expenditure on vegetables and condiments purchased for the prisoners is due to increased dependence on the products of the jail gardens. The value of such produce has indeed gone up from Rs. 65,963 to Rs. 84,803 in the corresponding period but it is not mentioned what portion of this produce is actually made available to the prisoners themselves. Another set of figures shows that 22.4 per cent. of the jail population lost weight during the year, while the percentage of those who gained in weight fell during the year from 56.8 to 52.5. Here it may be observed that the bulk of the jail population in normal times under our present economic system is drawn from those without adequate means of livelihood. Hence the increase in the weight of such prisoners does not indicate a satisfactory standard in respect of dietary. It merely shows, what should have been obvious, that famished people or those on the verge of starvation put on weight in jail as they get regular nourishment. What effect the wretched food supplied to ordinary prisoners has on their health is clearly evident from the history and records of political offenders released even after a short term of incarceration as C class prisoners.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Alcohol and the Indian Crisis.—A special cable to the Hindu, dated London, December 6, says:—The Conference of Metropolitan Temperance Workers Union at Friendshouse Euston, on alcohol and the crisis in India, after addresses by Mr. Frederick Grubb and other speakers, British and Indian, resolved unanimously:—“This Conference welcomes the uprising of the Indian people against drink traffic and whilst condemning any obstruction or disorder, protests against the arrest and imprisonment of persons peacefully persuading others not to enter liquor shops. The Conference trusts under the new constitution now being considered by the Round Table Conference, full powers will be given to the people of India to prohibit or restrict traffic in accordance with their own principles and ideals.”

Depressed Classes and the Round Table Conference.—At a meeting of the leaders of the various sections of the depressed classes in the city of Bombay held at the Depressed India Association's Free-Reading room, on Friday the 28th November at 7-30 p.m. with Mr. R. S. Nekaljay, J. P. ex M. L. C. in the chair it was resolved to send the following cablegram to the President, Round Table Conference: “Depressed Classes unitedly demand separate electorate with seats in Central and Provincial Legislatures proportionate to their numerical strength with weightage if Muslims are given any. Dissatisfied with Simon Commission's recommendations regarding certification, Nomination, Joint Electorate and Non-Depressed class men representing Depressed Classes. Urge statutory safeguards for admission of Depressed Classes in Army, Police, Civil services in British India and Indian States. Please Circulate delegates." R. S. Nekaljay.

Late Colonel Simpson:—Dr. B. C. Ghosh, in seconding the resolution, passed by the Calcutta Corporation condemning the murder of Colonel Simpson, the Inspector-General of Prisons, expressed on behalf of the medical profession, his regret at the untimely death of Lieut-Col. Simpson. For the last few months, he said, he had been in touch with him in the study of Mental Hygiene. One day, Col. Simpson asked him about ahimsa. A discussion ensued in which it was learnt that repression and terrorism went together. Where there was terrorism there was repression and vice versa. It was, therefore, a source of grief to him that a man who was wanting to understand the Indian mind from that point of view, who was trying to reform the jails, and who was doing his best to start reformatory schools for the reclamation of juvenile offenders, had been murdered just when he had the power to initiate such reforms and associate himself with the best traditions of the medical profession.

The C. S. S. Review:—The Christa Seva Sangha Poona hope to issue in March 1931 the first number of a monthly journal, which will give constructive and positive expression to its ideals. It is hoped that "The C. S. S. Review" will contain some of the following features:—Leading Article always on Jesus Christ—His Character, His life, His teaching, His meaning for the modern world. Bhakti Marga (The way of Devotion). Studies of the Saints and Mystics. Articles on prayer and Contemplation; on the Religious Life, especially on St. Francis. Poems and Prayers. Jnana Marga (The way of Knowledge.) Articles on constructive Christian philosophy from the Indian stand-point and in Indian terms; on the great religions and philosophies of the world on non-controversial lines; on the Culture, Art, Music, History and Literature of India; Translations of Indian classics. Karma Marga (The way of Service). Articles dealing with the Social and Economic welfare of India, the idealistic basis of the National Renaissance, etc. Reviews of Books will be a special feature. While "The C. S. S. Review" will be primarily a philosophical and religious journal, it will not be out of touch with current events, but keeping before it the ideal of Reconciliation, it will attack any kind of racial discrimination, and any traces of the colour bar in all parts of the world. It will stand fearlessly for the application of the principles of Christ to every aspect of public life. The Subscription will be Rs. 5 per annum, and may be sent per V. P. P. at the first number.

Agriculturists in Distress.—The following Resolution was passed by the Indian Central Cotton Committee, Bombay, at its meeting held on the 16th December 1930: "The Indian Central Cotton Committee regrets that whilst the Government of India are unable to accept its suggestions for the assistance of the cotton growers on the lines indicated in the Committee's correspondence with Government, Government have not been pleased to put forward any alternative scheme to afford help to them at this juncture. The unprecedented fall in the price of cotton and all other agricultural produce, has brought the great mass of cultivators, who always have the greatest difficulty in making two ends meet, to a miserable condition. In the opinion of the Committee it is necessary for Government to take some effective action to assist the cotton growers of India to surmount the difficulties with which they are faced. The Committee, in particular, wishes to urge upon Government the necessity for an immediate and substantial reduction in railway freights on cotton in order that the benefit of such reduction may reach the grower."

Essentials of Indian Constitution:—The follow-up message signed by Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Mr. G. K. Devadhar and Mr. K. Natarajan was sent on the 16th to Mr. M. R. Jayakar for circulation among his colleagues of the Round Table Conference:—"In view of conflicting reports we think it desirable to advise you and other friends that the scheme to be acceptable must recognise British India as a single unit and not a collection of sovereign Provinces, that Home, Finance and Commerce should be included in portfolios of responsible ministers in Central Government, and that fundamental rights habeas corpus, freedom of the press, speech and association should be secured in the statute. The communal problem may best be settled on the basis of Gokhale's scheme of communal electorates supplementing the deficiencies at general elections. See the speech in Natesan's compilation. Circulate this Maharaja of Bikaner, Mr. Sastri, Mr. Jinnah, Sir O. Setalvad, Sir P. Sethna and other friends.—Devadhar, Natarajan, Lalubhai Samaldas.

India's Desire for Dominion Status:—A Reuter's message dated the 18th says:—"Speaking at a well-attended meeting of the members of the House of Commons held at the Commons last night, over which Mr. Wardlaw Milne presided, Mr. Jayakar explained why the Round Table Conference was boycotted by the Congress, although they had themselves asked for it in 1924 and 1925. He said that in India a good many things asked for were ultimately rejected, because they had come too late. Continuing he said:—"The Congress does not believe in the Round Table Conference and does not expect anything from it. It is now for the British people to create confidence as soon as possible by making a declaration of policy and having the necessary resolutions passed immediately, giving India full responsible government. It is useless to expect us to wait until all the details are settled. We have no time in London to consider at leisure all the fine points of detail. That may be done at a more convenient opportunity after the country has been assured that the Round Table Conference will give it the kind of constitution on which it has set its heart. The settlement of the communal question need not delay the satisfaction of India on the constitutional issue. Government have already been given an assurance by Hindu leaders that they will settle the communal problem to the satisfaction of the Minorities as soon as they have a clear assurance from Government regarding their intention to confer full Dominion Status on India. It will be a mistake of the gravest character to hold up the constitutional issue on the pretext that the communal settlement has not yet been reached. I am aware that in certain quarters attempts are being made to postpone cleverly the settlement of the constitutional question on this ground but it would be an unwise step." Mr. Jayakar then explained in detail India's desires and said that although there were differences on other points between the more important political schools of thought in India, they were all agreed in demanding Dominion Status. One school even regarded it as the minimum.

NOTES.

The next Viceroy:—When Lord Willingdon left Bombay at the end of his governorship of Madras, it was said that he told some friends that he would come again to this country. That wish, hope or resolve is in a fair way of being fulfilled. In the ordinary course, he will arrive here in time to relieve Lord Irwin whose term expires in the beginning of April. The selection of Lord Willingdon has been warmly commended in the British Press, with two significant exceptions, however, of the Times and the Manchester Guardian. We are inclined to share the misgivings of these two important organs though not for quite the same reasons. The rule about not sending out to this country one who was Governor of a Province is a sound one, and Lord Willingdon has been Governor not of one but of two Presidencies. The effusive opinions expressed by some Indians now in London, are in all cases not quite disinterested. Lord Willingdon's view of social strategy as a panacea for all problems, too, is out of tune with the present temper of the country. His memory is kept alive in Bombay by a Sports Club and in Madras by a Racing Season. We have heard serious-minded people in Madras expressing grave concern regarding the results of the introduction of the racing habit with its concomitants while the social intercourse promoted by the Willingdon Club does not touch the deeper layers of life whence alone it can issue as a perennial fountain of effective goodwill. The new generation of politically-minded Indians are disposed to regard these institutions as diversions, and rather frivolous diversions, from the serious tasks of nationalism. Unlike Chinese nationalism, Indian nationalism has its stronghold in religion as is shown by the fact that the movement in English history which most attracted Indian reformers was the Puritan movement. These are considerations which cannot be put aside in appraising Lord Willingdon's nomination. The main direction in which the social gifts of Lord and Lady Willingdon may be most useful is in bringing the British community in this country to a reasonable frame of mind in respect of the right of natives of India to control their own destinies—"to go to hell," as some one put it, "in their own way." The man who oils the wheels fulfils as necessary a function as one who drives the engine and if India is provided with a suitable constitution, Lord Willingdon may be depended on to see that the axles do not catch fire for want of sufficient greasing.

Lord Irwin's Paradox:—We print elsewhere the portion of the speech which Lord Irwin delivered at the Calcutta European Association on Monday. It was an answer to those who find fault with his Government for not having adopted more drastic measures to suppress the civil disobedience movement. The Viceroy complained that these critics did not specifically state what more he could have done. He could have made a desert and called it peace, he said, but would that have benefitted the interests which shouted "martial law and no damned nonsense?" As a matter of fact, Lord Irwin has gone farther in the direction they want than any of his predecessors. If he has not, like the ancient Romans, made a solitude and called it peace, he has tried hard to make a silence and to call it peace. He recognises the strong and deep current of nationalism beneath the present troubles, but he has by his Ordinances done his best to prevent it from finding an outlet through normal channels; and this, in our opinion, is the main cause of the recent outbreaks of anarchic violence in Bengal and the Punjab. It has been most unfortunately a fixed idea with His Excellency that the non-violent movement is only a cloak for violence. That this has not been the case, and that, on the contrary, anarchic violence waned and disappeared when the non-violent movement was at its height and reared its head again when the latter waned, has been acknowledged in the semi-official annual review, India, more than once. If Lord Irwin had not so completely misconceived the real nature of the Gandhi movement, and had he framed his policy with discrimination, so as to prevent the evil without injury to the good side of it, a large measure of public sympathy which was forcibly diverted to the movement, would be now available to keep it under control. However, there is no use arguing the point at present. Few persons who read Lord Irwin's speech on Monday would have been prepared for the promulgation of three Ordinances on Tuesday, conferring exceptional powers on the Executive Government. One of these revives the Press Ordinance which lapsed a short time back and the others are directed against unauthorised news sheets and incitement to withhold taxes. A Free Press and a bureaucratic system are utterly incompatible with each other, and the latter has always made a scapegoat of the former whenever it found itself in difficulties often as the result of its own blunders. The Indian press is not syndicated like the British press, and controlled by financial magnates. It functions in close touch with the people's lives, and it reflects truly their grievances and hardships. A wise Government, especially when its heads are not natives of the country, can make valuable use of it as its eyes and ears. The Press Ordinance is most unlikely to promote contentment and goodwill. Responsible journalists who bring a conscience to their task will feel most the humiliation of having to work under the menace of a law which can be put into force at the will or whim of a Secretariat official.

Mr. Churchill's Speech:—The Press and platform fulminations in England against Mr. Churchill's speech are rather overdone. Mr. Churchill's past record is not that of a reactionary. He did admirably as Home Secretary and we quoted the other day his wise and humane observations on the treatment of prisoners. He did a good deal to carry out his views in Jail administration. Then, we should not forget the speech which he made in Parliament denouncing General Dyer's action at Jallianwalla Bagh. It was the principal speech on behalf of Government and it was scathing in its exposure and condemnation of the methods of terrorism adopted on the occasion. In his book on East Africa, he has generously recognised the share of Indians in building up that part of the Empire and strongly deprecated the introduction of racial considerations in settling the constitution of that colony. The late Mr. Montagu in his Diary fixed on Mr. Churchill as one who would make an ideal Viceroy of India. To the objection, that he has not shown interest in Indian aspirations, he replies that Mr. Churchill has "a departmental mind," that is to say, when he has the responsibility of administration he throws his whole soul into the task unhampered by any preconceptions. He was speaking at the Empire Union Club or Society from a brief which reflected the actual policy that is being followed by many of the Home Departments of Indian Governments, and the chorus of repudiation which his speech has evoked from all sides including his own, may be expected to have a chastening effect on these Departments. For aught we know, he has no great respect for the ex-governors and other gentlemen whom he addressed at the Society. He was called upon to play a part and he did it with characteristic thoroughness. Should he be the next Secretary of State for India or Viceroy, he would not think of framing his policy so as to suit the ideas of the retired Indian officials whom Lord Morley once described in pungent terms in a letter to Lord Minto.

A Field-Marshal's Outburst:—The opinion of Field Marshal Sir Claud Jacob on the Indianisation of the Army in this country is of little importance. But as Reuter has thought it worth while to cable it, it is perhaps desirable to comment on it. The gallant Field Marshal is reported to have said in a speech at Oxford that the demand that the British should be replaced by Indians, is nonsense. "They cannot find men at least at present. Ninety per cent. of the population is illiterate and if Britain allows Indianisation of the Army, it will bring down the whole structure with a crash." He added that 65,000 British troops in India was inadequate.

This is the first time that the illiteracy of the masses is mentioned as a reason against the Indianisation of the Army. It is from these illiterate masses that the Government of India has already raised its Indian troops including the large number of men who were sent to the different countries during the War. It is on the other hand conceivable that if the population was proportionately more literate, it would not have lent itself so easily to be made use of as mercenaries in an Army which offers careers to very few. And who is responsible for keeping 9 per cent. of the population illiterate during a hundred and fifty years of British rule. Does the Field Marshal expect France or Germany or America to look after the education of the Indian masses while Britain looks after the collection of revenue and the market for her goods? To be quite frank, an educated Englishman, which the Field Marshal is, should be ashamed to advance the illiteracy of the people as an argument. This illiteracy must last as long as the present system lasts, for the system cannot function without having at its core a large half-starved and illiterate population. That is one main reason why nothing but radical reform of the whole system can set the country on the road to real progress.

Treatment of Women Prisoners:—The National Council of the Women of India has appointed a committee to enquire into the condition of women prisoners in the jails throughout the country. Its members are Mrs. F. A. Taleyarkhan, Mrs. Faiz Tyebjee, Miss Wingate and Dr. Mrs. Sukhtankar. The Secretary of the Council will be ex officio Secretary of the committee. The Committee invites statements from women who have been recently released from the several prisons. On receipt of these a questionnaire will be drawn up and sent out to as many women as possible. The Committee intends to ask permission of the several Governments to visit the prisons to see for itself first-hand the condition of women prisoners.

Hindu Women's Rights:—We have received a copy of the comprehensive report of the Committee appointed by the Government of His Highness the Maharaja of Mysore to consider the question of improving the position assigned to women under the Hindu Law as at present administered in the Mysore Courts. An exhaustive examination of the question in all its aspects, crystallised in a draft Bill appended to the Report. The Report, though it primarily concerns Mysore, is a valuable contribution of interest to the whole of India, and Dewan Bahadur Chandrasekhara Iyer and his colleagues have laid the whole Hindu community under a great obligation. The Report will be noticed at length in subsequent issues of the Reformer.

The Punjab Outrage:—The attempt on the Governor of the Punjab, when leaving the University Hall at the close of the annual Convocation over which he presided as Chancellor, is an outrage as contemptible as it was cowardly. Luckily, his Excellency escaped with two injuries which are not of a serious character. The choice of the time and place, makes the crime more than ordinarily outrageous. Perpetrators of acts such as this, must realise that the country looks with abhorrence on all such crimes.

BOMBAY, DECEMBER 27, 1930.

' HINDUISM INVADES AMERICA. ' * *

One of the reasons given by Miss Katherine Mayo for writing "Mother India" was that she wanted to protect her country from being infected by Hindu ideas. For this purpose, she pitched upon child marriage as the central idea of Hinduism which she depicted as a putrid mass of sexual corruption. But she did not know, or overlooked the fact, that educated Americans were not to be so easily deceived, as they had a deeper appreciation of what was sound and what was unsound in Hinduism. We have often referred in these columns to Professor Buck's "Religious Faiths of India" as the best and most reliable book by a non-Indian author on that subject, especially on Hinduism as a working faith. A book received recently, "Hinduism invades America" by Mr. Wendell Thomas, is a scholarly study of the influence of Hindu thought in the United States. It is, "the author observes, "simply a study of the amazing adventure of an Eastern faith in a Western land. Accordingly, it is not a collection of curious or sensational anecdotes about a few of the many Hindu Swamis and Yogis visiting these shores, but an account of the serious impact of a Hindu philosophy and culture on American life, especially in the form of organized religion." Many European, and particularly English, scholars show a decided reluctance to acknowledge the influence of Indian thought on western religion and philosophy. They even strive hard to find dissimilarities where similarities are obvious between Hindu and Christian ideas. A recent example is Professor Rudolf Otto who concludes his small book on "Christianity and the Indian Religion of Grace" with the sententious but not very profound remark that "India knows of a saviour, but not of an atoner." To the ordinary man, it may not seem very important if he has a saviour whether or not the latter is also an atoner." The sick man is satisfied if his doctor cures him of his disease. He does not require that the physician should himself contract the disease. The attempt of the Dnyanodaya, the local Christian Missionary organ, to show that the Hindu idea of avatar is not the same as the Christian idea is another example of this tendency. The Subodh Patrika, the organ of the Bombay Prarthana Samaj of which a disbelief in incarnations is a cardinal creed, has effectively answered the Dnyanodaya in its last issue. But attempts to answer such arguments serve no useful purpose, as the European reluctance to acknowledge any point of contact with Indian thought, is the outcome of an intellectual conceit springing from the sense of political domination.

Noted American thinkers have generally been free from this vitiating prejudice. Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, one of the great leaders of contemporary American thought, says in his introduction to "Hinduism invades America": "The book makes clear, what it has long been evident would sometime be inevitable, that there can no longer be a sharp distinction between the so-called "home" and "foreign" fields in religion. Christianity is at work in India and Hinduism is at work in the United States. There is no possibility of Indian religion escaping the influence of Jesus Christ, and there is no possibility of American religion escaping the influence of the great Indian faiths." This frank avowal will be unpalatable to many European missionaries who are interested more in the import than on the export side of religious commerce between Europe and India. Even the Christa Seva Sangha, a tremendous advance upon the conventional missionary attitude, speaks only of presenting Christianity in an Indian garb. But the architecture of the Hindu temple, for instance, has grown organically out of the basic ideas of that religion and cannot be mechanically fitted on to other religions. The leaders of the Sangha, however, are men of faith as well as spiritual courage, and it is sometimes possible to feel one's way from the skin inwards to the soul as from the soul outwards to the skin. Political dependence is a serious hindrance to human fellowship. American thinkers and men of letters had no political obsession to overcome in appreciating Indian thought on its own merits. When European scholarship first opened the door to Indian culture, American thinkers were the first to make practical application of Indian ideas to current thought. Emerson, Whittier, Walt Whitman, Henry James, were all familiar with Indian philosophical ideas. Mr. Wendell Thomas does not seem to be aware that Longfellow was also attracted to Indian literature. Many years ago we found appended to an edition of his prose writings an English translation of the highly poetical sums in Arithmetic which the ancient Hindu mathematician, Bhaskaracharya, set to his daughter Lilavati, whom he trained to a high proficiency in his own favourite science.

Mr. Wendell Thomas regards the Hindu movements in America described in his book as an expression of Young India. "The religious development of modern India," he observes "can best be understood as the reaction of her communities to the impact of Western Christianity." But all communities have not reacted to the same extent or in the same degree. The Muslims as a rule, he writes, turned a deaf ear to the Christian message but the Hindus, though they too did not become converts in large numbers, did not refuse to listen to it. The Hindu social and religious reform movements are the outcome directly and indirectly of the impact of Christian on Hindu ideas, and even the political movement through them has been subject to the same influence. In the sphere of religion, this impact led to Hindu religious missionaries preaching the Vedanta in America. Mr. Thomas devotes a chapter to explain the Vedanta and it is characteristic of his synthetic mind that he has no difficulty in discerning that Sankara and Ramana, and the other sects including Sikhism and Buddhism, all start from and rest largely upon the same foundations which, he calls, the essence of Hindu faith. Ramakrishna Paramahansa was the embodiment of all these currents and he had furthermore acquired by experience a deep insight into Islam and Christianity. "Ramkrishna," writes Mr. Thomas "is now the inspiration of a world-wide cult that preaches love and service as well as renunciation and meditation." That this is by no means an exaggerated estimate, is shown by the brilliant study of the Paramahansa by M. Romain Roland, which is another proof of the influence of Hindu ideas on some of the foremost Western minds. Swami Vivekananda carried his Master's message to America. Mr. Thomas gives a vivid description of Vivekananda's appearance at the Parliament of Religions and his instant and overwhelming triumph:

"He has no notes or prepared address, and his Mother has given him no command. So the son sits dumb. Again and again he puts off his time to speak until at last, at five o'clock in the afternoon, the chairman rises and openly names Vivekananda as the next speaker. Mother or no Mother, he must speak now! In the magnificent hall, he faces a yawning audience, worn out by masses of manuscripts. Confused hesitation. Then a beginning: "Sisters and Brothers of America ....." At once the house shakes with deafening applause as in a political convention. The splendid oriental has spoken in such sweet friendship!"

Then follow chapters describing the establishment of the Ramakrishna mission and other centres of Hindu religious propaganda in America. In a concluding paragraph, the author explains why America has welcomed this movement. "The modern age" he writes, "has little use for the traditional dualism between the natural and the supernatural, and is making towards pluralism on the one hand and monism on the other, towards the path of less religion and the path of more religion. Hinduism comes to America to point out the path of more religion." But Hinduism in America is not content to remain an exotic creed. "To a large extent," says our author, "Hinduism in America is American Hinduism." It may be, who knows, that we shall ere long have American missionaries of Hinduism coming over to help the Hindus of India to awaken from their long sleep and play their proper part in the great world-movements of our time?

"WHO ARE MY BRETHREN?"*

(By J. C. KUMARAPPA).

You will remember the context of my subject. When Jesus was talking to a multitude of people his mother and brethren stood without desiring to speak with him. Jesus asked "Who is my mother? and who are my brethren?" We shall spend a few moments in considering Jesus' answer to this question, as at the present moment there appears to be very vague ideas as to who can claim kinship with Jesus in a spiritual sense. Although we constantly hear of high sounding phrases of brotherhood of men and fatherhood of God, we rarely stop to think out the implications of this relationship. To form any kind of relationship there needs to be a common factor binding the various units together. This factor may be economic, political, social, cultural or spiritual. Often we find more than one such force combining to produce a community of interest. As the binding factor widens the group affected enlarges and when it reaches a spiritual stage it becomes universal. Where there is a lack of common interest it leads to intolerance, friction and warfare.

It does not take much observation to note the binding factor in the economic world. There is hardly an organisation as efficient as the one that binds the capitalists the world over. It is an international brotherhood for the exploitation of the weak. It makes little difference whether the units are composed of Jews or Britishers, or Germans, or Americans or Indians. They are all out for the same thing, and they will combine to achieve their ends without any scruples. On the other hand, we have a fast growing international comradeship amongst labour. Realising that unity is strength they are forming themselves into a powerful brotherhood irrespective of caste or creed.

Even politically, nations are seeking after international understanding. The League of Nations is an indication, if nothing else, of this spirit abroad. Often economic currents disturb the tranquillity of political life and control it to a great extent.

Although due largely to the results of the economic activity of men, social life is broken up by wide gaps of wealth and poverty, yet on all hands we discern a definite attempt made to unify life. We are witnessing one of the greatest, if not the greatest, experiment on these lines in Russia to-day. In other lands we do not see such a volcanic disturbance; nevertheless forces are at work everywhere to equalise inequalities and bridge the gulf between the various strata of society.

It is a sad reflection that it is in religious life that we find intolerance rampant. Even within the pale of the same religion sharp lines of demarcation are drawn giving rise to denominations and sects between which feelings run high at times. All credit is due to the founders of the Brahma Samaj and the Prarthana Samaj for choosing as their pivot "Tolerance." We ought not to confound religious apathy and callousness born of ignorance and morbidity with 'tolerance.' Tolerance is not incompatible with a zealous loyalty to one's own convictions. On the other hand, it is an attribute of the spirituality and charity of the individual. You will remember when John told Jesus that they, the disciples, forbade one who was casting out devils because he followed not Jesus, He replied "Forbid him not: for he that is not against us is for us." Bigotry is not faithfulness, nor increasing the numbers of converts in the fold, a service to God. This kind of missionary work called forth from Christ a severe rebuke. "Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, for ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is made, ye make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselves."

It will not do to be dogmatic in our religious life. The spiritual capacity of each individual differs even more than the physical and mental outlook does. The sunlight is white, but is composed of seven elementary colours. One looking through a green glass cannot condemn another using a red glass. No man has seen God in all His infinitude. How can anyone then presume to judge another's point of view? Even though we may get all the rays to form white light still the intensity may differ. A bat or an owl that can see well enough in the subdued light of the stars is dazzled by daylight. We are not all ready to receive the fullest revelation. Christ recognised our inability to comprehend everything and so we are told: "With many such parables spake He the word unto them as they were able to hear it." Again He says to His disciples later: "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now. Howbeit when he, the Spirit of Truth, is come he will guide you into all truth." Although one may hold Christ to be the complete revelation of God one may not presume to know all that He stands for. A cup that is dipped in the sea may be full of sea-water but it is not all the sea. If I am a follower of Christ that does not preclude me from a reverential observance and study of other religions. God is above all man-made distinctions of beliefs. There is but one God and we are all children of the same Father. We may group ourselves according to temperament but that is a matter of convenience and should not separate us. Jesus told the woman of Samaria: "Ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father. But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth; for the Father seeketh such to worship him. God is a spirit: and they that worship Him must worship him in spirit and in truth."

Although Christ had no use for ceremonial worship, did not allow His own disciples to fast ceremoniously and held God will have mercy and not sacrifice, yet often times he recognised the need for ritual in dealing with men who were not advanced enough to receive his doctrine. He told the leper who was cleansed: "Go thy way, show thyself to the priest and offer the gift that Moses commanded for a testimony unto them." Jesus adapted his methods to the needs of those around Him. "A bruised reed shall he not break, and a smoking flax shall he not quench." He was guided by principles and not by the rule of thumb.

The early followers of Jesus closely adhered to His teaching and formed themselves into small communities, called Churches, like what we know here as Ashrams, with a common purse and led a simple life of poverty. This early church was looked upon as the "Bride of Christ." The members were called "Christians" in derision, and were subject to considerable persecution until the time of Constantine when the Church coveted the luxuries of State. Since that time the Church had neglected Christ, its lawful Master, and had become the mistress of the State; supporting it in all its exploits of violence and greed. It is because of this we found her in 1914-1918 actively supporting and goading on the carnage in Europe. Because of this we find her in India with her mouth shut in the midst of the most inhuman treatment of a non-violent people. Because of this the Bishop of Bombay has not yet found it convenient to even visit the Congress Hospital while the Commissioner of Police had the human heart to visit the wounded. Can such sympathy be expected of a Bishop of the Church when she lives as a dependant of the State? This dignitary draws his princely salary from the Indian people, including the peasants of Borsad and Bardoli, but he has closed his ears to all accounts of cruelties in these talukas. But we must say this for the Bishop of Bombay that, as far as we know, he has not blessed the sergeants nor consecrated the lathis before an onslaught. This will certainly be counted for righteousness. During the war, ministers of the Church, the Bishop of London downwards, went round the battlefields preaching to the 'boys' that if they died as soldiers they would go to heaven straightway. Where did they get this doctrine? You would search the New Testament in vain for any such teaching. It suited the state to find all sorts of encouragement to slaughter human beings and the mistress of the State very obligingly found the necessary dope. The Y. M. C. A. and other so-called Christian organisations assisted the armies under the pretext of social service but their zeal for such service vanished into thin air the moment non-violent people were being oppressed by their liege lords. Now they fold their hands and offer pious incantations on days of prayer called from their holiday resorts and content themselves with issuing beautifully worded manifestos. They even have the audacity to suggest Satyagrahis' ways are not altogether 'Christian' as they do not deliver up the salt when asked for. They evidently found the gory trenches more to their taste. Well may Christ say to those "Why beholdest thou the mote in thy brother's eye but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye? Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote of thy brother's eye."

Is it not blasphemy to call these organisations 'Christian'? I have nothing against individual missionaries, some of whom I count it a privilege to number amongst my friends. What I am concerned with is the divorce of Christ from the Church. It is no use calling the Church 'Christian,' and honouring the Master with the lip while their heart is far from the Will of God. "Not everyone that saith unto me, Lord, Lord shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." Does it not make one shudder to think the Father in heaven saying: "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels, for I was hungered and ye gave me no meat; I was thirsty and ye gave me no drink, naked, ye clothed me not, wounded by lathis and ye came not to bind my wounds, sick and in prison ye visited me not:" and to their reply "Lord when saw we thee hungered, or athirst, or naked, or with a broken head, or sick or in prison and did not minister unto thee?" He shall answer them saying "Verily, I say unto you, in as much as ye did it not to one of the least of these in Bombay, Bardoli and Borsad, ye did it not to me." Can these be the brethren of Jesus?

Our religion will amount to nothing and our prayers will ascend no higher than the ceiling of our room unless we see with our spiritual eye God in the needs of those around us. Tagore in his own inimitable way lays emphasis on this aspect of the question as against mere formal worship when he says:—

Leave this chanting and singing and telling of beads,
Open thine eyes and see thy God is not before thee,
He is there where the tiller is tilling the hard ground, and where the path-maker is breaking stones.
He is with them in sun and in shower,
And His garment is covered with dust.
Put off thy holy mantle,
And even like Him come down on the dusty soil.

(To be concluded).

A Notable Widow Marriage:—A correspondent writes:—Under the auspices of the Hindu Widow Reform League, Lucknow, the marriage of Shrimati Chameli Devi (Radha Rani), who belongs to a Dhaighar Tandon Khatri family and who was teacher in a Municipal Girls' School, took place with Mr. Shambhu Nath Segal, who is Chief Executive Officer of the Municipal Board, Indore, and whose grand-father is Diwan Bahadur Bisheswar Nath, O. I. E., on Sunday the 30th November, 1930, at Kunjviyas, Risaldarbagh, Lucknow.

THE ECONOMIC CONDITION OF INDIA.

(By Sir M. VISVESVARAYA.)

If we come to consider the economic condition of the people in India, the prospect is not cheering. The production is as low as it could be, because, among other reasons, the population is illiterate, employment is uncertain, and as proper statistics are not maintained, the public are unable to visualise the precise extent of unemployment and under-employment in the country. We have an ill-fed and short-lived population which badly needs a rise in its present low standard of living.

The low economic condition of the country is a fact freely admitted on every hand and it will be apparent from a comparative table of the national income and wealth estimates of five countries which I have compiled from recent publications:—

Country.	Yearly Wealth national estimate income per capita. (1921)
	Ra.	Rs.
	United States of America	2,080
Great Britain	1,136	5,536
Canada	1,608	5,314
Japan	184	1,225
India	103	244

The figures given for national income are based on a table published in the 'American Economic Review' and reproduced in the 'Indian Journal of Economics' for October 1930. They refer to one or the other of the years between 1924 and 1928. The estimates of national wealth are those given in an American book bearing the title 'These Eventful Years' published after the War by the Encyclopaedia Britannica Co., Ltd., of New York and London. I do not think the figures given for India are quite correct, but they are sufficiently dependable to show how low is the position which India occupies in all such comparisons.

It is said that something like 12 million people in Europe and America are unemployed at the present time. If correct statistics are taken, I am not sure that the total of unemployed persons in India, that is, in this country of ours alone, will not exceed that number.

In 1898 I noticed that Bombay was exporting cotton piecegoods and yarn to Japan. To-day we see Japan exporting these commodities to Bombay. Under a dependency Government, the power of co-ordination and team-work is always feeble and it is not easy to build up industry and trade. Neither Bombay nor the people of India as a whole can be altogether blamed for this sad state of affairs.

ECONOMIC ADVANCE: A CONSTRUCTIVE PROGRAMME.

Many of the economic policies and measures now followed in India are those deemed appropriate for * Being extracts from the speech of Sir M. Visvesvaraya, at the annual College Day Celebration of the Sydenham College of Commerce, Bombay.

a dependency, but in order to build up a sound economic structure, we must of necessity follow the lines of action already established in the self-governing British Dominions and in Great Britain itself. I will sum up the policies and measures suited to our conditions in this regard under ten heads as follows :—

1. Extension of mass education to the utmost limit along with adequate technical, commercial and professional education.
2. Rapid development of industries and transport facilities.
3. Increase of production to the limit, particularly in agriculture.
4. Fiscal protection on the Dominion model.
5. Expansion of trade along Dominion lines.
6. Collection and maintenance of statistics as in Canada.
7. A comprehensive survey of country's resources.
8. Stabilisation of currency.
9. A sound banking system.
10. Economic organization and equipment on international lines.

These heads are self-explanatory and I will not take up your time by going into details. I venture to think, however, that the policies and measures implied under those heads will meet with the approval of nine out of every ten economists in this country and of every important expert outside it.

Reforms in several directions are attempted even at present but it is all work done piecemeal, work which an Imperial Government considers appropriate for a dependency. Real progress cannot be made if solutions are attempted in compartments. For example, the results of the banking enquiry now going on will not be quite satisfactory so long as currency and exchange are kept out of its purview. It is in consequence of such sectional treatment that our official commissions and committees have failed to achieve tangible results, and that India has failed to keep pace with the progress in the Dominions of the British Commonwealth.

A QUESTION OF POLITICAL RE-ADJUSTMENT.

To prosecute successfully a constructive programme on the scale I have indicated, important changes will be necessary in the economic framework of this country. A new outlook is needed and a new adjustment is called for of the basic conditions upon which our economic life has hitherto rested. And here we come up against politics, but, any reference to political questions at a convivial gathering like this is out of place. I will only say this: Economic issues cannot be dissociated from political issues. They were not so dissociated in the deliberations of the recent Imperial Conference held in London. A satisfactory solution of all these questions is dependent upon the system of government which may be established in India as a result of the Round Table Conference which is now sitting in London,

For increasing production, the country wants men to plan, to finance and to execute, and to do this cheaply and efficiently, commercial and technical education are indispensable. With every extension of professional education, the cause of industrial development is advanced. Industries are the life blood of the community and, if the coming constitutional reforms lead to real economic autonomy, the very first thing that this old country should do is to make a vigorous use of its opportunities to build up its industry and, through it, a strong economic structure calculated to raise the income of the people.

Once the political situation is straightened, there will be no occasion to feel despondent about the future. It is true the country is saturated with population and production has not kept pace with its growth. But our student population may prove our greatest asset if we take timely measures to give our students the right kind of education and organise measures to put them to the right kind of work. We have nearly 100,000 of them in our universities, a number not exceeded by any country except the United States of America. Numbers must tell in the end and that is our great hope.

THE DYING GLADIATOR.

I see before me the Gladiator lie,
He leans upon his hand—his manly brow
Consents to death, but conquers agony,
And his droop'd head sinks gradually low—
And through his side the last drops ebbing slow

From the red gash, fall heavy, one by one,
Like the first of a thunder shower; and now
The arena swims around him : he is gone
Ere ceased the inhuman shout which hail'd the wretch who won.

He heard it, but he heeded not : his eyes
Were with his heart, and that was far away ;
He reck'd not of the life he lost nor prize,
But where his rude hut by the Danube lay,
There where his young barbarians all at play,
There was their Dacian mother—he, their sire,
Butcher'd to make a Roman holiday—
All this rush'd with his blood—shall he expire
And unavenged?—Arise, ye Goths, and glut yone ire.

Byron.

OPINION AND CONDUCT.

Whatever man thou meetest with immediately say to thyself: What opinions has this man about good and bad. For if with respect to pleasure and pain and the causes of each, and with respect to fame and ignominy, death and life, he has such and such opinions, it will seem nothing wonderful or strange to me, if he does such and such things; and I shall bear in mind that he is compelled to do so.—
Marcus Aurelius.

OUR NEW PLACES OF PILGRIMAGE.

(The Social Service Quarterly.)(Concluded from the last issue.)

The net cost of maintaining a prisoner in jail is Rs. 119-1-0 after deducting the cash earnings of prisoners sentenced to labour. The net profit per prisoner sentenced to labour is Rs. 20-14-1, and this is all appropriated by the Government. If only the prisoners employed in manufactures are taken into consideration the net profit is Rs. 47-11-7. In view of these figures it is not surprising to find the Inspector-General of Prisons opposed wholly to the idea of prisoners being sentenced to simple imprisonment, calling such punishment by the name of legalized idleness. No doubt, the Jails Department do not wish to lose this valuable source of revenue, but one would like to know if there is nothing prevalent in other countries corresponding to simple imprisonment. Labour and work are necessary, but one feels something revolting in the idea of convict gangs often being set to crude and monotonous tasks without considering whether the particular work assigned to them is suitable or not. Nor does the idea of exacting work under rigorous discipline of the type prevalent in jails with the constant fear of lashes and beatings to bear down on a prisoner the moment he shows some slackness appeal to our instincts of humanity. At any rate, it is not through labour exacted in such sweated conditions that any taste or liking for work will be born and any craft or occupation taught that can be resorted to for livelihood after release from jail.

Another very common grievance is the uncleanness of life in jails, the lack of suitable sanitary conveniences, latrines, bathing and washing places and the like. Though Government deem it necessary to devote special sections to this matter in their annual Factory Reports, curiously enough the Jail Report makes no mention of these minimum requirements of the decencies of life, presumably because in the eyes of those entrusted with the administration of our jails, these are matters of no moment to a people whose standard of life is so miserably low as ours unfortunately is. Despite this low standard of life candid observers have always noted that the standard of personal cleanliness in India is pretty high, higher even than in countries where the bulk of the population is comparatively better off in life. Although the sick rate and the death rate both rose during the year, the general health of the prisoners is reported to have been good. The increase in the deaths was due to pneumonia and tuberculosis, the latter a disease likely to spread quickly under conditions of overcrowding. The Inspector-General observes that in 1929 there was no overcrowding except in some jails in Sind, though with the incarceration of political prisoners conditions are bound to have grown worse during the current year. A hastily improvised jail was set up at Visapur and conditions of life there can easily be imagined especially during periods of intense heat or cold or with rain pouring down the roofs of the barracks as happened more than once during the recent monsoon. Even ordinarily, malaria and dysentery are common ailments and the damage they cause to the health of prisoners must indeed be immense. And yet Government pat themselves on the back for looking after the health of the prisoners entrusted to their care during the period of incarceration while their standards of medical relief in jails show no improvement if we are to judge by last year's Report as compared with one of eight or ten years back.

Sir Frederick Sykes wishes to keep children out of prison and so does the Inspector-General of Prisons who deems it the duty of every citizen to prevent as far as possible the introduction of a child to the atmosphere of a prison. Yet it took Government nearly ten years to introduce a Borstal Act and it was only the force of public opinion in Bombay city that led to the acceptance of the Children's Act by Government and the legislature. It is needless for the Inspector-General to shed tears over the difficulty of attempting reformation by the infliction of short sentences. No reformation is ever possible so long as the present methods of jail administration obtain and the more a person convicted of an ordinary crime stays in jail the more coarsened and brutalized he will become and the less fitted he will be for a decent life in society. Let the children be kept out by all means whether for ordinary or political offences, because as seen today the jails are merely an instrument for breaking the spirit of those who offend against the laws of the land. It may be that those who break laws for the sake of conscience may—and often do—succeed in keeping alive the fire in their souls, but the fact that the jails are there to break their spirit need not be disguised. The State wreaks its vengeance on those who disobey it, making no distinction between the motives of those who offend for sordid reasons and those who do it on principle.

What the real aim of Indian prisons is evident from the importance attached in their rules and regulations to the enforcement of discipline. Discipline in Indian jails is exalted to the rank of a deity to whom all have to pay homage. The superintendents function as the High Priests wielding almost supreme power, and as against 16,246 offences—an increase of 2,000 over the previous year's figure—dealt with by the superintendents of jails only 91 were taken to court. The bulk of the offences related to work and the usual punishment awarded was the imposing of fetters or confinement in cells, though the report makes no mention of the latter. Most of the punishments inflicted are noted for their savagery and brutality. For instance, it is true that fetters mark a man, and thereby call attention to him but that they prevent escape is a delusion, according to the testimony of experienced prison officials themselves. Out of 6,120 persons punished with fetters 2,394 had to suffer because of orders issued by superintendent. The number of floggings ordered by the superintendents was 55 as against 18 in 1927. The tribute exacted by the deity is evident from the fact that 14 of the offences for which whipping had to be administered related to "conduct seriously affecting the discipline of the jail."

There are at the end of the Report the usual patronizing or platitudinous remarks about the work of released prisoners' aid societies and general lack of public interest in the welfare of prisoners. Mention is also made of 337 visits paid to jails by non-official visitors, an average of less than thirty visits per jail per year. But in the present conditions it is impossible for non-officials actively to interest themselves in the welfare of prisoners. When non-official visitors investigate grievances and bring to light defects they are hounded out as recently happened in the Punjab to a prominent member of the Punjab Legislative Council. Submission of complaints to the higher authorities in the jails themselves is often looked upon as a sign of "rebellion," and any such attempt by a body of prisoners is suppressed as a "mutiny." There is no real desire on the part of Government to redress grievances and to see complaints ventilated. They are still imbued with the old tradition: a tooth for a tooth, an eye for an eye, a nail for a nail. For all practical purposes, the prisoner's feelings and sentiments are like the prisoner's personal belongings to be left at the prison gates; and of the feelings and sentiments of the officials in charge the less said the better. The iron school of discipline which now holds sway requires constant evidence of driving by the cold hard methods of whip and fetters and cells. The other school of thought sets greater store by the higher influences of leading, reward, hope, instruction and example. But it is difficult to follow as it requires faith, devotion, implicit conviction of its righteousness, and hence a majority of prison officials and those supervising their work prefer the former method. So long as they do this and so long as their idol is discipline so long will the prison system fail of its purpose. That purpose should be not retribution and deterrence but reformation and regeneration of lost souls. It is only when that deity is dethroned and humanity installed in its stead that we may expect prison houses to awaken the man in the ordinary criminal and to train up such offenders against the laws of the State to be better equipped for the struggles of life than they were when their liberty was restricted by the State.

New York Scholarship for Indians:—The Indian Christian Messenger has the following:—"Dr. H. H. Horne, Professor of Education, New York University, informs us that there is always a possibility of getting a scholarship at New York University for a graduate student. Applications must be sent three months in advance so that arrangements may be completed in good time for the candidate to proceed with his studies in September. Applications for Scholarships are considered on the 1st of April. Students applying from India must do so in the last week of February, at the latest."

VICEROY EXPLAINS HIS POLICY.

The following are extracts from the speech of His Excellency the Viceroy, delivered at the Calcutta European Association annual dinner on Monday the 21st instant :

"From one quarter the general criticism that we hear is, of course, that there would have been no trouble, or that any trouble would have immediately disappeared if only the country had what is called "strong government." I notice that those on whose lips this phrase generally lies are often more unanimous in their denunciation of Government than in describing in exact terms the matters in which executive action falls short of their ideal, and I find some difficulty in ascertaining clearly what it really is that they have in mind.

"During every week of these last months, my Government have worked in the closest co-operation with His Majesty's Government on one side, and with the Local Governments on the other, reviewing the situation from week to week, exploring new means of countering new developments, and on no single occasion has there been difference of opinion between any of the parties concerned on any point of substance affecting the special powers for which the Local Governments, after due deliberation and with a full sense of their responsibility, deemed it necessary to ask.

"We have examined in detail various proposals put forward by unofficial persons and in the press and in many instances have incorporated them in the powers we thought it right to assume. Others, on examination revealed insuperable objections and were evidently impracticable, and, therefore, without, as I have just said, claiming any infallibility for the Government, I think I am entitled to ask men and women of sober judgment:

"Why those who compose the Local Governments and the Government of India, and who together represent a good deal of varied Indian experience, must be supposed to have forfeited, because they hold official positions, whatever may have been their natural endowment of common sense, and why they applying their minds day in and day out to the problem of how best to combat the threat of civil disobedience, are more certainly all wrong than critics who have not the same facilities for information and who, therefore, have not the same opportunity of forming their conclusions?"

"The truth, I fancy, is that such critics are firm believers in what I may call the practicability of short cuts. In 'Alice in Wonderland' as you will remember, the Queen had only one way of settling all difficulties, great or small. 'Off with his head,' she would say without even looking round, and that policy translated into terms of real life will always offer powerful attractions when men are impressed with the disturbance that is being caused by particular agitations, and believe that a speedy and effective remedy lies ready to hand in the shape of vigorous executive action. Now, I think the Government can do and ought to do many things to protect those who want to obey the law and to punish those who break it. And I am constantly told from other quarters that we have done far too much.

"But I definitely do not share the view that any Government action, however drastic, will or can be as powerful a solvent of these troubles as will be the gradual force of public opinion, which must sooner or later awake to the fact of how mistaken is the course that the country is invited to pursue.

"The conditions, for example, of prosperous and friendly commercial intercourse will always depend far more upon public opinion than upon Government action, and however emphatically we may condemn the civil disobedience movement—and nobody can feel more strongly than I do the harm that it has done and is doing to the cause of India—whatever powers we may find it necessary to take to combat it so long as it persists, we should, I am satisfied, make a profound mistake if we underestimated the genuine and powerful feeling of nationalism that is to-day animating much of Indian thought and for this no simple, complete or permanent cure ever has been or ever will be found in strong action by Government.

"Before this movement started I formed the definite view, which everything that has happened since has only reinforced, that it would, no doubt, be possible to apply a far more ruthless policy of repression than anyone has yet suggested, and after a space of time, be it short or long, to create a desert and call it peace. Such a policy would have involved a rigid censorship of the press compared to which the operation of the Press Ordinance would have been negligible, the strict prohibition of all hostile expressions of opinion in all forms, the supersession of the ordinary law of trial and punishment over a wide field, and other action of a similar kind. But any such policy, apart from all other considerations, must be judged not only by its immediate effects—let these be as favourable as the sternest advocate of the plan might desire—but by its ultimate results, and these again must be placed in relation to the wider purposes that you have in view. We all know what these are.

"And here I do not believe that any man can doubt that so far from facilitating the accomplishment of the principal purpose of Great Britain, which is to lead India to self-government and to retain her as an equal and contented member of the Imperial Family of Nations, such action, even if otherwise feasible, would, on the contrary, aggravate your task quite indefinitely and probably destroy any hope of bringing it to a successful issue.

"The British people, more than any other, ought to know that, in so far as the matter is one affecting the forces that we call nationalism, it cannot permanently be dealt with on such lines. The Government has a clear duty to maintain the law and to resist attempts to substitute another authority for its own, and I am glad to have this opportunity of paying a tribute to the manner in which Their Excellencies Sir Stanley Jackson and Sir Hugh Stephenson, who recently acted for him, and all their officers have during these troublous times, upheld the administration of this Presidency. But if the Government is wise, it will remember that to the extent to which these things are only the symptoms of underlying causes, they call for different treatment.

"At the other extreme is the line of criticism which denounces Government as repressive, the enemy of all true progress and national feeling. In answer to this charge, the policy of Government has so often been made plain that I must ask forgiveness for restating it once again.

"The fact that civil disobedience claims to rest upon harmless gospel of negation has not prevented its rapid development in practice into a positive challenge to the constituted Government and a menace to the good order of the whole body politic. Those who summoned from the deep this spirit of law breaking in support of a so-called non-violent movement, cannot escape responsibility when their gospel has led ill-balanced minds to have resort to methods of violent terrorism of which you have had experience in Calcutta and Bengal during the last few weeks, in such crimes as the murders of Mr. Lowman, Inspector Tarini Charan Mukerji and lastly, Colonel Simpson.

"It is always within the power of reckless miscreants to take the lives of their fellowmen, and to inflict untold pain and sorrow upon those who held those lives dearer than their own. But action of this kind will not deter men who know their duty from its performance any more than it will deflect on one side or the other the judgment of those with whom rests the responsibility for considering and framing the political structure of the future. I know full well how deep and how bitter is the resentment which such happenings excite in the hearts of all loyal citizens, and there is not one of us here who can, for a moment, forget the strain that they impose most of all upon the people.

"I should like to express here publicly my sense of the great debt that Government owes as to the police generally, so particularly to Mr. Graig and Sir Charles Tegart himself, only lately the object of one of these criminal attempts, for the example of steadiness, wisdom and gallantry they have set to the forces that they have the honour to serve under them, and of which they have the honour to be chiefs.

"If repression means the determination to resist this menace, Government readily pleaded guilty to the charge, for no Government worthy of the name could do otherwise. But if by repression our critics mean that Government desire by any action they have been forced to take to strangle national aspirations or to obstruct India's constitutional advance, then I say that no such charge can be levelled against those who were responsible for commenting upon Sir John Simon's Report as we did in the Reforms Despatch of the Government of India published a few weeks ago."

GANDHI, INDIA AND PROHIBITION.

We take the following from the Clipping issued by the Board of Temperance, Prohibition and Public Morals of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Washington, D. C. :

Mahatma Gandhi, the Indian Nationalist leader, in his platform for India advocates total prohibition of the liquor traffic. This platform of Gandhi's containing eleven major points, states the issues of the Indian Nationalist Movement. Prohibition is one the three main issues having been made points of contest thus far, the other two being the salt law and foreign cloth.

The only way the Nationalists see to secure prohibition under the present Government is to picket the saloons in order to prevent the sale of liquor. Their repeated attempts to do this meet, of course, with displeasure upon the part of the Government since the government has financial interests in the liquor business. Day after day pickets are arrested only to have new pickets come up to take their places. Although the jails are crowded to overflowing, the struggle continues.

All along the route of his famous non-violent march from the Ashram to the village of Dandhi he addressed the villagers, urging them to wear khaddar, to refrain from drinking and to join the satyagraha movement. His words were eagerly seized upon and relayed to others, even to the remotest villages.

Clifford Manshardt, Director of the Nagpada Neighbourhood House, Byculla, Bombay, writes in Religious Education, for October :—

"It is a strange anomaly that India, which is probably one of the most temperate countries in the world, is forced to endure the evil of the saloon because of the Government's financial stake in the liquor traffic. The people of England demanded that the Government of India take an annual loss of ten crores of rupees by prohibiting the export of opium to China—thus 'protecting the Chinese'—but one fails to hear a similar demand for the abolition of the drink traffic to 'protect the Indians.' We are therefore faced with the spectacle of a Christian Government arresting Indian (non-Christian) Nationals for picketing liquor shops in response to the dictates of their own consciences."

The question of Government in India is not wholly one-sided in its merits. Government, if it is going to rule, has a certain duty to insist upon obedience to law. The justice of this cannot be contended. But the question of how to exercise most intelligently Government is the paramount problem. It is the matter of wisdom for the powers that be to recognize the will of the people in the fullest possible measure.

The desire of Nationalistic India to banish from the lives of its people the cancer of the trade in alcohol is a challenging development in the world of human progress.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Anti-Caste Campaign :—At the instance of the Jat Pat Torak Mandal, Lahore, the following Resolutions were unanimously adopted at the Executive Committee of the Pratinidhi Sabha, U. P. :—"Whereas we Arya Samajists profess our "Religion" as "Vedic Dharam" and Race "Aryan" resolved that the Executive Committee of the Arya Pratinidhi Sabha, U. P. urges the Government to issue instructions to Census enumerators to record every Arya Samajist in the column of "Religion" as "Vedic Dharam" and that of the "Race, tribe or caste" as "Arya" and directs the Arya Samajists to have themselves recorded in accordance therewith. It was also decided that if the above enumerators object to these entries, the above columns be left blank. It was further resolved that the propaganda work in this connection be entrusted to the authorities of the Jat Pat Torak Mandal."

The Indian Women Delegates' Memorandum :—Mrs. Subbaroyan and Begum Shah Nawaz, the two lady delegates to the Round Table Conference, have submitted to the Franchise Sub-Committee a memorandum on the political status of women under the new Constitution, urging the adoption of a franchise qualification giving women due weight in elections and also advocating a temporary arrangement securing for women seats in Legislatures. The memorandum expresses the opinion that it is vital that the Conference should decide women's future position in the Constitution. It expresses apprehension regarding the attitude of the Government of India, and says that unless women's political status is dealt with now, when the claims of others to special consideration are being settled, it will be far harder to secure for it adequate examination later. The memorandum states that the present property qualification results in great discrepancy between the numbers of men and women voters, and urges that women must be given due weight. Dealing with the question of seats for women, the memorandum accepts as the ultimate aim that women should compete on the same terms as men, but refers to the difficulty women experience in other countries. It does not expect that the position in India will differ and, therefore, urges the temporary reservation of a small proportion of seats in view of the vital importance of women's voice being heard during the first important years of India's new life. The necessity of arriving at no decisions regarding the franchise and seats unless women's views are consulted is stressed and the memorandum asks for the embodiment in the Constitution of the principle that sex should not disqualify from serving the country. The memorandum, however, does not examine in detail the methods for securing the desired ends, but willingness is expressed to put forward proposals under both heads.

NOTES.

The New Year:—The New Year opened in Bombay in distressing conditions. There was a clash between the Police and the public at the flag Salutation ceremony last Sunday, leading to many casualties among the latter. We are utterly unable to understand why the Commissioner of Police should ban this innocent ceremony. The usual formula that it may lead to breaches of the peace is, as everybody knows, only a formula. On Wednesday again there were further casualties owing to Police trying to prevent the celebration of the passing of the Independence resolution by the National Congress in different parts of the city. Here, again, we cannot help thinking that the true interests of law and order would have been better served if the people who wished to keep a midnight vigil had been left alone. We are afraid, however, that the authorities are in no mood to accept suggestions from Indian sources. In the circumstances, the prospect for the New Year is by no means bright.

Revolt Against Kemalism:—There seems to have broken out in Turkey a revolt against Kemal Pasha's reforms similar to the one in Afghanistan against Amanullah Khan's regime. The successful leader of a political revolution is not always necessarily well fitted to carry through great social reforms in a country. The methods of political revolution, hitherto followed, are wholly unsuited to the task of effecting reforms in the social life of a people. Management of men plays a large part in political movements, whereas in social reform it has no place at all. It is utterly inconceivable, for instance, that a Round Table Conference in London can bring about the least change in the customs of the smallest sect in this country. Kemal Pasha's reforms, moreover, were such as appealed not to the deepest instincts of men but to their superficial nature. He was too much in a hurry to have his people westernised to see that westernisation itself was an active means of instilling a sense of inferiority which cannot but paralyse a people's endeavours to assert their equality with other nations. It is probable that Kemal Pasha will be able to put down the present outbreak by his military measures, but unless he takes a lesson from it and modifies his methods so as to allow of free play to the Turkish character, there is little chance of his country settling down in the ways of peaceful progress in the near future.

Ideals and Practice:—We publish to-day the concluding part of the trenchant criticism of the Christian churches which Mr. J. C. Kumarappa embodied in his anniversary address to the Ahmedabad Prarthana Samaj. The first remark upon it which occurs to us is that the address would have been more appropriate if made to an audience of professing Christians. The Prarthana Samaj itself is by no means a perfect interpretation of the ideals of its Founders and it would have benefitted more if it had been invited to look to the beam in its eyes rather than to the mote in its Christian neighbours. We hope, however, that the utter candour with which Mr. Kumarappa exposed the shortcomings of his own Church will not be lost on the members of the Prarthana Samaj, who are apt to be somewhat excessively sensitive to anything which savours of self-criticism. Indeed all that Mr. Kumarappa says of the Christian Church can be matched if not surpassed from the state of other organised religions. Hinduism, of which we can speak with some knowledge, has certainly fallen low from its high ideal of universalism. Of Islam, Muslims would perhaps be able to say the same. No religionist, in fact, can point his finger at another on this score. If anything, Christianity with all its defects can claim to have inspired many humanitarian missions. There is nothing in the record of other religions to equal, to take one instance, the splendid work of Christian men and women for Lepers. We received not long ago the annual report of the Mission to Lepers and we can only hope that the time is not far distant when Hinduism, Islam, Buddhism and all other religions will vie with one another in humanitarian service of this kind rather than in fighting for communal electorates and weighted representation. The community which serves humanity best will always be the one which exercises the most potent influence over its destinies.

Caste and the Census:—There is much force in Mr. S. D. Nadkarni's criticism of the reply sent by the Government of India to the representation of the Jat Pat Torak Mandal against the recording of caste in the census report. There is evidently some confusion in the reply. It seems to imply that unless a Hindu has broken caste rules in his marital or communal relations, he is obliged to fill the caste column in the Census paper. In the first place, this seems to be a misconception of the legal position. Surely, if a man does not wish to state his caste, he need not do so, whether or no he has married outside his caste or sat at meals with persons not of his caste. The restrictions on inter-caste or inter-communal dining have become obsolete and if this is a test very few educated Hindus can be said to observe caste. In marital matters alone caste is at present a ruling consideration. But as Government do not make the breach of caste rules in marital relations the sole test, there should be no practical difficulty for any one who does not wish to return his caste to refrain from doing so even in the terms of this letter. Mr. Nadkarni very properly takes exception to the personal knowledge of the enumerator being of any account in the filling-in of the Census paper. Even if a person strictly observes his caste rules, it is possible he may not like to proclaim the fact in the census. The objection to having a column for caste in the census paper, is that it fosters the Indian passion for being known to belong to an exclusive group. But this consideration can be appreciated only by a Government which is directly interested in eliminating all influences which make for division and disunity in the population.

Lord Willingdon:—Indian opinion, on the whole, is sceptical about the wisdom of Lord Willingdon's appointment to the Viceroyalty. It may even be said that it disapproves of the selection. Meanwhile, he is cutting short his stay in Canada for the purpose of taking over charge from Lord Irwin at an early date. Evidently, his lordship likes the pomp of Delhi better than the informality of Ottawa. With the prospects of the Princes coming into a Federation, the chances of methods of diplomacy getting the better of recognised constitutional methods, are likely to increase. Many Indian States' administrators honestly believe that backstairs are a more effective and convenient way of getting things done than the front stairs, and they are experts at the game, whom the British Indian politicians will have to reckon with in Federal India. The position of the Governor-General will become correspondingly difficult. Lord Willingdon will have to exert considerably more than mere social tact in order to maintain the high tradition which great Viceroys, Lord Irwin not the least of them, have established.

Another Indian Bishop:—The Church of England in India was the first to appoint an Indian to its episcopate in the person of Bishop Azariah of Dornikal. The Roman Catholic Church followed the example after a considerable interval, but made up for the delay by nominating three Indian Bishops within the last few years. The American Methodist Episcopal church at the Central Conference for India held on Wednesday at Cawnpore elected the Rev. J. R. Chitamber, Principal of the Lucknow Christian College, as one of its bishops. Bishop Chitamber will reside at Jubbulpore. We hope that Bishop Chitamber will have all the powers and privileges of an American Bishop and that there will be no "reserved" subjects in the administration of his diocese.

Treatment of Prisoners:—The Managing Committee of the Bombay Social Service League at a meeting held on the 20th December appointed a Committee with power to co-opt, to investigate complaints made by released prisoners regarding their treatment in Jail as also about the working of the new Jail rules in the Bombay Presidency, and to make suggestions for their reform. The following members have been named for the Committee: Dewan Bahadur K. M. Jhaveri, Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Messrs. Natarajan, Kher, Syed Munawar, and P. G. Naik with Mr. A. W. Phanse as Secretary. Apropos of this question, the rule recently promulgated defining "near relations" of prisoners who alone may be allowed to visit them, seems to be practically unknown outside Bombay. Even in Bombay it seems to affect only those who cannot or will not adopt the little devices which bring them within the permissible degrees.

Women and Bureaucracy:—When we said the other day that the movement of women's emancipation was the greatest achievement of the British period, we were challenged to show what the bureaucracy did for women. The bureaucracy did nothing and we did not suggest that the emancipation movement was initiated or encouraged by the bureaucracy. Bureaucracy is against freedom, whether of men or women. When as the result of influences beyond its control, they break the purdah to take part in the national movement, it promptly shuts them up in its prison cells. The bureaucracy is really more intolerant of women's freedom than the most bigoted Hindu Shastri or Mussalman Moulvi. The current issue of the Bombay Government Gazette contains a good illustration. An Indian Minister evidently under bureaucratic influence calmly proposes for women for the same work lower scales of salary than for men. We refer to the scheme of Provincial Educational Service in which while a man can rise to a maximum of Rs. 1500, a woman's maximum is only Rs. 1000. That is to say, the sex and not the competence of the teacher is to determine the scale of remuneration.

The Kettle and the Pot:—We deal in a leading article with the presidential address which Bhai Parmanand delivered at the Sind Hindu Conference last Saturday. A day or two later, Sir Mahomed Iqbal, presiding at a Muslim Conference, held at Allahabad far surpassed Bhai Parmanand in demanding the establishment of an independent Muslim state by the amalgamation of Sind, the Punjab and the Frontier districts. We are glad to see that responsible Muslim leaders are repudiating the fantastic ideas of the Poet-politician.

A Strange Omission:—We have received a compilation consisting of papers offered to the Library Service Section of the first All-Asia Educational Conference. Among Indian Libraries dealt with in the papers, we miss several important names, the most prominent of them being the Royal Asiatic Society's Libraries. Even the Imperial Library, which is wholly under official control has a paper relating to its arrangement. The Library movement is going strong in Baroda and Mysore and occupies a prominent place in the compilation.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, JANUARY 3, 1931.

THE FIRST ALL ASIA EDUCATION CONFERENCE.

The political or rather civil troubles which the country is experiencing should not be allowed to obscure the momentous significance of the two All-Asia Conferences that are meeting in India. The first of these, is an Educational Conference which held its inaugural session in Benares on the 26th December. The second is the All-Asian Women's Conference which meets at Lahore. As compared with Europe, Asia is now a continent only in a geographical sense. A number of causes has gone to make Europe a cultural entity with a distinctive civilization. Christianity and the Greek and Roman classics are the foundations of European culture. The Roman Empire and the Papacy which stepped into their place, furnished a common mould in which European civilization has been cast. The Protestant Reformation destroyed the religious basis of European culture but the pursuit of the physical sciences became the dominating principle and provided a fresh basis for it. The history of Asia presents a marked contrast in these respects to that of Europe. It seems probable that at the highest period of its expansion, Buddhism did for Asia much that Christianity did for Europe. But the influence of Buddhism had largely disappeared when Islam gave Western Asia a considerable measure of religious and cultural unity. In India, Islam had to compromise with Hinduism. There was a period in Indian history when it seemed as if a fusion of the Islamic and Hindu religions and cultures, would become the basis of a new Asiatic culture. But this process was interrupted by the advent of the European and Christian factor. We need not regret the interruption, because a culture which left out the great contributions of Christian Europe, cannot be a complete whole. In India to-day we have all the three great world-cultures in close contact with one another. They are seemingly in hostile contact but really they are only fighting against being left out of the grand synthesis that is in process on Indian soil. The pan-Asian movement is, therefore, utterly unlike the pan-European movement foreshadowed by Mr. Briand's plan of economic federation. The European federation will exclude Asia except as the common object of exploitation. Pan-Asianism, on the other hand, includes European and American contributories. No Asiatic can have a place at the European Round Table. At the Asian Round Table there is room for all who are willing to serve the cause of humanity. This is in consonance with the Asiatic outlook which is essentially universal and comprehending. The great religions of the world had their birth in the Indian and Arabian peninsulas. Buddha and Christ, writes Professor Höffding, divide the spiritual allegiance of mankind. The Sakyamuni is the finest flower of the Indian as the Galilean incarnation was that of the Arabian view of the Universal.

The genius of Asia is synthetic. It seeks to unite in peace and amity all the valuable elements in human thought. Pan-Asianism can have no aggressive after-thought. It is in keeping with this principle that the first conference of a pan-Asian character should meet at Benares, India's Eternal city, where Gautama Buddha first set rolling the wheel of his Universal Dharma, that it should be dedicated to the subject of education and that it should be attended not only by representatives who are Asiatics by birth but also by representatives who are Asiatics by service and sacrifice in the cause of humanity. From Asia have arisen the foremost world teachers, and their precepts and practice furnish the highest models of the science and art of education. There is one principle common to all Asiatic educational systems and that is the personal feeling of reverence on the one side and of more than parental solicitude on the other which should actuate the relation between pupil and teacher. Where this feeling does not exist, where the teacher's profession has been degraded into a Service like the excise and the Police the vital link is sundered between teacher and taught, and education is reduced to a deadening routine. We trust that the All-Asia Educational Conference will concentrate on this and other constructive principles rather than on schemes and plans which each country should make for itself in relation to its needs and resources. The great difference between Western and Asiatic conceptions of life is that while the former emphasises rights the latter emphasises duties. When everyone is after his own rights, with scant regard to those of others, anarchy must result, and where everyone has only duties to discharge and not even the right to call his soul his own, a general stunting of human personality must result. The West has overdone the gospel of rights while Asia has made the same mistake in regard to the duties of man. A just correlation of rights and duties, and the apportionment of rights in exact proportion to duties, is the great problem of every political constitution and education is the most important means of bringing about the necessary re-adjustment, first, in the mind of youth and, through it, in the social, economic and political organisation. If the All-Asian Educational Conference helps in bringing educational thought to bear upon this problem, it will render a most valuable service to the upward march of the human race. The next Conference has been invited and will probably be held in China.

THE POT AND THE KETTLE.

The presidential address which Bhai Parmanand delivered at the fourth Sind Hindu Conference held at Sukkur last Saturday, reminds one forcibly of the saying about the pot calling the kettle black. While blaming Mahomedans for trying to set themselves up as a separate nationality, Bhai Parmanand calls upon the Hindus to do likewise. "It is the Mahomedans," he says at one place "who have all along been keeping before themselves the idea of forming a separate and an independent nationality in this country." In another place, he frankly avows himself as an advocate of a Hindu national movement. He criticises the National Congress leaders, old and new, for having fostered anti-national tendencies among Mussulmans. "The policy followed so far," he observes, "has ended in failure. There is the other alternative left for us yet to try. It has a different basis to start upon. It is that Mahomedans have not sought unity with us because we were not united among ourselves, therefore we should first try the unification of the Hindus on a purely national basis and then it would be worth while for Mahomedans to seek friendship with us." He adds: "If you think of obtaining Swaraj even without the help of the Mahomedans, the unification of the Hindus becomes the more incumbent on you." Bhai Parmanand admitted that the idea of Hindu nationality has not yet made much progress and that the voice of its advocates was very weak. He was howled down, he said, when he attempted to propound his views at the Conference called at Lucknow to consider the Nehru Committee's report. But he is profoundly convinced of their soundness and believes that what has happened during recent months has proved that his estimate of the situation is quite correct. Bhai Parmanand thinks that it is the Hindus living in Sind, Punjab and the Frontier in close neighbourhood with other peoples, who can realise and feel the effects of the weakness of the Hindu community. "Unfortunately for us" he remarks, "our political leaders and journalists come from Madras, Bengal or Bombay, where Hindu consciousness has not yet been awakened in the Hindu community."

It is not that Hindu political leaders and journalists do not understand and sympathise with the grievances of their co-religionists in Sind, the Punjab and the Frontier province. They do most keenly. But they are not convinced that a separatist Hindu movement is the true remedy. They are convinced, on the other hand, that the real and permanent remedy can be found only in a nationalism which, rising above differences of caste and creed, has for its aim the providing of equal opportunities for all who are born or have made their homes in India to develop their God-given talents in complete freedom. This was the ideal of the founders of the National Congress and this is also the ideal of Mahatma Gandhi, Pandit Motilal Nehru, Dr. Ansari and other Hindus and Mahomedans who are able to take a long view of India's future. The caste and communal appeal comes home more readily to the masses whose outlook is bounded by their immediate environment. It is to the great credit of Hindu leaders in Sind and the Punjab that they have not allowed their temporary difficulties to detract from their faith in the larger nationalism. Would it be believed that Bhai Parmanand actually suggests that the demand for swaraj may be postponed until such time as the Hindu sangathan movement has achieved its end? Continuing his reflections about Hindu political leaders and journalists being mostly men from the other provinces, Bhai Parmanand observes: "This has given rise to two schools of thought among us. The one, that is very predominant, thinks that our country is chained in the bonds of slavery, so our first duty is to free ourselves from them, and till we are free we should forget all differences of Hindus and Moslems and try to work for the common end. The other school, whose voice is not yet much listened to, feels that though to struggle for freedom is a sacred duty, there is another duty more sacred than that and that is to save the life of the nation to which we belong. Liberty is good, but it is a means to an end. The end of course is that the nation should live and progress. While struggling against our opponents to gain our liberty, political wisdom requires that the struggle should not be conducted in such a way as should prove dangerous to our very existence."

There is, it is true, a school whose cardinal creed is that once India breaks away from the British Commonwealth, all other desirable and necessary reforms will automatically follow. And in order to achieve this supreme end, it is prepared to sacrifice every other consideration of prudence and equity. If Bhai Parmanand had confined his criticism to this school, we should have had no difficulty in sympathising with him. But he attacks not only the neo-Congressites but also the older school which so long as it was in the ascendant strove to utilise the British connection to establish Indian nationalism on a broad, non-communal basis. The ground was cut from under these leaders by the adoption by the Government of Lord Minto of religious beliefs as the basis of the franchise, but not until the most influential of them were dead, did the Congress agree to compromise on this all-important issue. There is, as we said, an independence at any price school, and it is made to bulk more largely in the public eye than it should as much by the exaggerations of Anglo-Indian reactionaries as by its own propaganda. The solid bulk of opinion, however, still favours the old method, though in view of the repressive measures of the Indian and Provincial Governments, it does not get a chance of asserting itself. The Nehru Report reflected the opinion of the country. Bhai Parmanand's criticism of that Report is, anything, more severe than his criticism of the Moslem proposals. He says that the Nehru committee agreed to yield to some of the important Moslem demands and in order to purchase the approval of joint electorates sacrificed the Hindus of Sindh, the Punjab and the Frontier Provinces. We may observe in passing that we, like Bhai Parmanand, are not so enamoured of joint electorates as to consider any sacrifice of principle worth making in order to get Muslims to agree to them. If the Mahomedans feel that they can get the right men into the Legislatures only through separate electorates, constraining them to vote in joint electorates, will only irritate them to voting more communally. Much valuable time is being wasted in the endeavour to force the pace in regard to this reform which is bound to come in the natural course in five or at most ten years. But the Nehru Committee sternly refused to sacrifice any principle in order to get Mahomedans to agree to joint electorates. It stuck to the population basis of representation though it well knew that if it had agreed to the eightages demanded, it could have secured the support of many of the Muslim leaders. When it accepted Muslim demands, it did so not as a concession but on sound principles. Speaking at a Round Conference, Bhai Parmanand naturally makes most of the Nehru Committee's recommendation regarding the Muslim demand for the separation of Sindh from the Bombay Presidency. He misconstrives that recommendation and then proceeds to condemn it. The Nehru Committee did not ignore the reasons for which the proposal was originally put forward. At the same time, it would not reject it merely because it came clothed in a communal garb. If it is wrong to separate Sindh because the Mahomedans want it, it is equally wrong to retain it in the Bombay Presidency because the Hindus wish it. The question must be considered on its merits apart from the communal standpoint on either side, and we must say that, so considered, we are quite sure that the only conclusion possible is that the interests of Sindh are best served by its remaining a part of Bombay. Bhai Parmanand himself wishes the strongest argument for a new alignment when he described "the majority of the Muslim population in Sindh" as being "illiterate, fanatic and given to kidnapping, robbery and other crimes." If this is the result of the long administration of Sindh as a part of the Bombay Presidency, surely it has not been to the benefit of the province and it is high time to consider whether separation may not prove more beneficial to the inhabitants. The only ground on which the present position can be justified is that it has so benefitted the people of Sindh that a change is uncalled for and may be injurious to them. But this is precisely the contrary of Bhai Parmanand's argument.

CASTE AND THE CENSUS.

(By S. D. NADKARNI.)

In their recent reply to a memorial submitted as far back as the middle of August last by the Jat-Pat Torak Mandal (Anti-Caste Association) of Lahore against the recording of caste in the Census papers in the case of those Hindus who do not believe in it, the Government of India say: "In the case of all persons who have actively ceased to conform to the caste system and who have accordingly broken it in their marital or commensal (inter-dining) relations, but who do not belong to reforming or schismatic communities such as the Arya Samaj or the Sikhs or Jains, a return of 'nil' will be both accurate and adequate and will be accepted by enumerators, particularly where they have personal knowledge of the accuracy of the householder's reply. It is not possible to go further than this or to make a general dispensation from the necessity of returning caste in the case of people who observe it in practice, whatever their theoretic or sympathetic inclinations....."

The reply is objectionable on several grounds. If a Hindu states that he does not believe in Caste or anything to that effect, the statement should be taken as sufficient for the enumerator to enter 'nil' or 'no caste' in the caste column,—without any inquisitorial enquiry as to whether he has actually 'broken caste' or been 'out-casted' or the like. When a man returns his religion as Mahomedan or Jew, the enumerator is not expected to verify that the man is circumcised and abstains from pork and so forth, nor, if one returns one's sect as Anabaptist, is the enumerator expected to make sure whether the individual has been baptised as an adult, or to get him to produce proper evidence of his alleged religious affiliation and the due observance by him of his church's rites. The same holds or should hold for Caste.

If Caste for Census purposes be a matter of birth only, then it must be inquired and duly recorded in the case of all—'Schismatics' as well as Brahmanists, converts to non-Hindu faiths and the out-casted, as well as those who are not out-casted but have 'ceased to conform to caste.' That would be the only intelligible and consistent course. If Caste for Census purposes is not a matter of birth only, then whether one 'conforms to caste' or has 'ceased to conform to caste' is surely not a matter for Census enumerators to decide. As in the case of a man who states that he has 'no religion' the enumerator has to accept the statement without satisfying himself that the individual has divested himself of all 'religious' beliefs and connections, even so there should be no inquisition with regard to Caste when a Hindu returns 'no caste' to a question about his caste.

'CONFORMITY TO CASTE'—WHAT'S THE TEST?

Now, what precisely is meant by 'conforming to caste'? Caste rules are not concerned solely with inter-dining and inter-marriage. A casteman may manage to observe all the punctilios of orthodoxy in the course of a trip to and from some place situated beyond the confines of this 'Holy Land', yet he is liable to be outcasted for committing 'foreign-travel.' He may eat forbidden food and drink liquor publicly in company of his own caste-fellows, and thus be committing no 'inter-dining'; yet he is liable to loss of caste. His marriage with a widow of his own caste, though it is not an inter-marriage, might yet entail loss of caste. Even if we confine ourselves to inter-dining and inter-marriage, 'conformity to caste' implies so many and such varied niceties, that perhaps the only objective criterion to decide whether one who is born a Brahmanist Hindu may be said to conform or to have ceased to conform to caste—such a severely practical test alone as the Government could expect its enumerators to apply in their Census operations—would be to ascertain whether that Hindu has been formally 'outcasted.' For, if a person is not known to have been 'out-casted,' it may be argued, the presumption is that he has not 'broken caste.' Even if he has affiliated himself to a 'schismatic' sect like the Arya-Samaj or the Prarthana-Samaj, he does not necessarily 'break caste' thereby, nor is his mere affiliation to such a sect commonly treated by his caste hierarchy as a ground for 'outcasting' him, unless he is known to have actually 'broken caste'—by foreign travel, widow-marriage, or the like. I know the case of a learned man in Western India, now a political prisoner, who had long publicly professed the Buddhist creed, without the caste hierarchy taking any notice of his heterodoxy. The hierarchy was roused to action, I hear, only when he presumed to travel abroad or to give his daughter in marriage outside the eligible caste-group. Till then, presumably, the gentleman was for caste purposes a Brahman, though he had ceased to be a Brahmanist or Hindu proper; he was a Brahman, but not a Hindu!

Even that objective criterion with which to decide whether a Hindu could validly be returned as of 'no caste'—viz. whether he has been formally 'outcasted' or not—will not do; for a Hindu under an interdict at the time of the Census may be thinking of making his humble submission to caste by means of a prayashchitta, as a great protestant against Caste in Western India in the nineties of the last century was reduced to doing in the name of 'the line of least resistance' and what not. As a man may belong to one religious denomination on the day the Census is taken, and may belong to another the day after, it is just possible that a Hindu who could be returned as of 'no caste' by the above criterion on the day of the Census, may with a sip of 'the vile compost' of panchagavya drink himself into caste the very next day. Would it be an offence against the Census Act? But then even 'outcasted' persons are known to return themselves as belonging to the castes in which they were born, but from which they have been formally outcasted, not only at the Census, but in their sworn depositions in Courts etc., and such statements are made by the parties with perfect impunity and accepted by the Government without demur. Only when a Hindu states that he recognises 'no caste,' fancy that same Government insisting on the strictest objective proof of that statement! The cloven hoof—the political motive in strengthening and rigidifying Caste is all too apparent.

'BREACH OF CASTE'—HOW JUDGED?

When a Hindu is a bona-fide non-believer in Caste, his actual 'breaking' of it depends on the occasions or opportunities he has for putting his belief into practice; and as the Bombay Chronicle justly observes, "those who do not believe in Caste are perfectly justified in refusing to label themselves, whether or not they have had occasion actively to break caste restrictions." (12-12-30.) Whether and how far one has broken caste depends again upon the nature of the caste rules which the generality of the members of one's particular caste or sub-caste, the biradari or immediate circle of one's castemen, regard themselves as bound to observe; and these rules vary almost indefinitely according to times, according to localities and other circumstances. As to putting one's non-belief in Caste into practice, one may have done so, not necessarily by participating in an inter-caste dinner oneself, but even by not scrupling to dine with a casteman who has inter-dined and been outcasted, or by keeping up and persuading one's caste-fellows to keep up social relations with a casteman who has been outcasted for that or any other breach of caste. Is the Census enumerator then to constitute himself into a Pīṭhādhipati or Caste Swami or Sarpanch of a caste panchayat to decide the point whether a professing non-believer in Caste has 'actively ceased to conform to Caste,' and how, when and where he has done so?

The Government did not consult the Acharyas and Swamis or orthodox Hinduism as to whether the Nāpits or members of the Barber-castes (usually called Nayis, Nhavis etc.) could be properly designated as Brahmans, before issuing their recent fiat to their Census officers to enumerate all of them under Brahmans! Perhaps they thought that having taken upon themselves the Swamis' function in regulating Caste matters in the Napits' case, they could go a step further and delegate similar powers to their numerous underlings (the enumerators) to decide whether a Hindu observed or had ceased to observe Casts.

Not that I object to the Napits being returned as Brahmans; in fact I would rejoice if all Brahmanist Hindus came to be returned as Brahmans, without distinction. If the name of Hindu is not good enough, and as the name of Brahman is either a coveted distinction or a pet aversion—that is, an object of love either positive or negative (witness the negative nomenclature of Non-Brahmin), there is much to be said in favour of all Brahmanists being called Brahmans.

(To be concluded).

“COWARDLY AND CONTEMPTIBLE.”

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,
Sir,

I am very much grieved to read your remark regarding the recent Punjab outrage. That it was “a rash act of a wretched boy who could not even shoot straight” appears to me the almost appropriate and adequate comment. How you consider it as a “cowardly” and “contemptible” outrage I fail to understand. Do you mean that it was more cowardly and contemptible than the Ordinances and Lathi charges? Or, do you consider Lathi charges as very brave and commendable deeds?

How the choice of time and place, again, makes the outrage more than ordinarily outrageous, is another puzzle to me. Is the Azad Maidan and fine winter morning a very proper time and place for Lathi charges? Is the height of Simla and the eve of Christmas a very appropriate time and place for the issue of strangling Ordinances?:

That it was “a mad act of a misguided youth” I readily admit. That it is against the Congress creed is true. That it may more hamper than help the purpose it aims to accomplish is possible. But will it therefore be “O. O.”? Suppose, for the sake of argument—which God forbid—Satyagraha fails. What next? Of course, even terrorism may fail. But then, is it not something, far better, infinitely more honourable, to boldly face and answer arrogance, than silently and sheepishly surrender to Ordinances, Lathi Charges, bayonet thrusts, rifle shots, bombing from planes, torture in jails?

Please mistake me not. I do not defend violence merely as violence. I only object to your calling terrorising the tyrant as cowardly and contemptible. Is not “operation” a form of violence? Is not the killing of germs by phenile a form of violence? Are they on that account to be entirely eschewed? And what is Satyagraha? It is only a protest, a form of argument or reasoning. And as such, it may avail against reasonable beings. But how will it avail against midnight robbers or tigers in the jungle?

I too share your abhorrence of the crime. But I look and I believe the country, why, the whole world, will look with me—with more abhorrence on the cause of the crime than on the crime itself.

Lastly, who is responsible for the outbreak of the “cowardly and contemptible” outrages? The Congress? which has adopted nonviolence as its creed, and is daily getting hundreds of heads broken, and sending hundreds of people to jail without so much as a protest? Or the Mahatma? who is an Incarnation of Non-violence, and is now shut up in a cage? Or the Tyrant, or Despot?—call it what you will—Irresponsible Government, Ordinance, Certification, Exploitation?

Bombay, }
1st January 1931. }

Yours faithfully,
MAN.

[The adjectives were appropriate. Universities are sanctuaries of learning and the Chancellor was present at the Convocation of the Punjab University trusting in the honour and goodwill of the scholars. The attempt on him on the occasion, therefore, called for special censure which was intended by the epithets to which our correspondent takes exception. The conduct of the Police in dealing with Congressmen has nothing to do with the question. We have not failed to express our opinion of it from time to time.—Ed. I. S. R.]

Review of Economic Position in India:—News has been received that Sir Arthur Salter, Director of the Economic and Financial Section of the League of Nations Secretariat, who is visiting India this winter, leaves Marseilles on December 26, and reaches Bombay on January 9. He is expected to arrive in Delhi by about January 10. In addition to advising the Government of India as regards the kind of machinery to be set up to help the Government on economic questions Sir Arthur will also discuss with the Government the development of India's collaboration in the work of technical organizations of the League. In this connexion, Dr. Pillai, Director of the Indian Branch of the International Labour office, in a statement to the Press, explaining the origin and purpose of Sir Arthur's visit, says a suggestion was thrown out by Mr. Shanmukham Chetty, M. L. A., during the Budget debates early this year regarding the formation of an Indian Economic Advisory Council. Sir George Schuster, in reply said that he realized the necessity for a scientific study of economic conditions of the country and that the Government often felt handicapped by lack of machinery by which it can get in touch with unofficial opinion and settle in consultation with the public the main lines of economic policy. Pursuing this suggestion the Government of India addressed the Secretary General of the League of Nations to the effect that they would like to consult Sir Arthur Salter regarding their plans for the creation of an organization for the study of economic questions “including both continuous interpretation of current developments and the consideration of plans designed to achieve particular purposes.” In this connexion they had given attention to organisations which had recently been established in other countries, and particularly to the work done by the League of Nations. In view of Sir Arthur's record of achievement as a Director of the League the Government had requested the League to arrange for his visit to India this winter in order that they might obtain his advice regarding the kind of machinery to be set up in this country for the study of economic factors and the formulation of policies.

(By J. C. KUMARAPPA).

(Concluded from the last issue.)

By its traditions the Church has made the teachings of Jesus of no effect. It emphasises forms and ceremonies to the detriment of the spirit. To be a “Christian” one has to be baptised and partake of certain sacraments. Different denominations attach varying importance to different forms, and as long as you conform to these you are a “Christian” and you are expected to express your faith in the divinity of Christ and honour him with your lips. These are all contrary to the teachings of Christ. Jesus never founded a Church nor did he form a religion making converts to follow him. He wanted them to do the will of the Father and be brethren. His whole emphasis was on deeds and motives and not in a creed. “Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven.” These deeds were not to be merely outward shows for the sake of public praise like the actions of the Pharisees but should be the outcome of a close living with God. Only then will the very thoughts be pure. He says “Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time: ‘Thou shalt not commit adultery,’ but I say unto you that whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart.” The Pharisees merely contented themselves with the observance of the letter of the law and therefore he says “that except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and the pharisees ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven.” Are we not justified in saying now that unless our righteousness exceeds the righteousness of the “Christian Church” we shall in no case enter into the Kingdom of heaven? The church is in much the same position to-day as the scribes and pharisees of old. They are satisfied with mere interpretation of doctrines and create tradition wherever it suits them to do so and have not the moral courage to rise higher. They are flirting with power and honour as their prototypes did. When the people were gathering round Jesus the pharisees said: “If we let him alone all men will believe on him and the Romans shall come and take away both our place and nation.” Do not the Christian missionaries fear in the same way, that if they let Christian principles have full play they will get into trouble with the powers that be and lose their jobs? Is this Christ-like? Are we not told “Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul, but rather fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell?” We should be able to recognise the brethren of Christ by their deeds and not by their profession,—“Wherefore by their fruits ye shall know them.” Christ laid hardly any emphasis on formal loyalty to him. He wants us to follow him not personally but by carrying out the principles pointed out by him. He never sought after personal attachment to him. You will remember when a woman in a crowd cried out “Blessed is the womb that bare thee and the paps which thou hast sucked.” Jesus replied “Yea rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it.” This does not mean that a good life should be led for its own sake. One who does so usually takes pride in it like the Pharisees who prayed “God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are: extortioners, unjust, adulterers, I fast twice a week, and I give tithes of all I possess.” A life led in humility and service will only reveal ones own shortcomings like in the case of the publican who prayed smitting upon his breast saying “God, be merciful to me a sinner.”

CHRIST AND THE CHURCH.

The fact of our being a member of a church which calls itself ‘Christian’ does not of itself make us brethren of Christ. The Jews prided themselves on being the children of Abraham but Jesus remarked “If ye were Abraham’s children ye would do the works of Abraham.....Ye are of your father the devil and the lusts of your father ye will do.” We shall know the brethren of Christ by their Christ-like actions. “If ye love me keep my commandments” is all that he requires of his disciples. Again he says to his disciples: “I have chosen and ordained you, that ye should go and bring forth fruit.” Therefore Christ himself lays that the criterion by which a follower of Christ shall be known should be the actions and motives of a person. He urges us, “Be ye perfect even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.” His sheep hear his voice, he knows them and they follow him. Even as regards his own identity he appeals to the Jews to judge who he is by his works. “I told you, ye believe me not. The works that I do in my Father’s name they bear witness of me.” “If I do not the works of my Father believe me not. But if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works: that ye may know that the Father is in me and I in him.”

Forgetting Christ’s standards the Church clings to a few ceremonials like the observance of the Last Supper and has made sacraments of them. They follow the letter but the spirit is lost. How many of those who partake of this ceremonial eating together will actually eat and mix socially outside the Church building. The White does not mix with the Black and Brown and the rich with the poor. Jesus enjoined us to be brethren but the Church has divided itself into the Clergy and laity. Fathers and Bishops exercise lordship over them like the gentiles. Christ came to minister but these are there to be ministered unto. The followers of him who had not where to lay his head live in Palaces receiving princely salaries. How far have we strayed from Christ’s way of life! When Jesus sent out his disciples he instructed them to “Provide neither gold, nor silver, nor brass in your purses, nor scrip for your journey, neither two coats, neither shoes nor yet staves for, the workmen is worthy of his meat." Which Christian organisation today will send out its workers on this basis? These Christians enter into a contract on the same basis as any commercial concern assuring them of a regular salary to live in comfort, an outfit allowance, Hill allowance, medical allowance, transport allowance and what not? It need to be contended that Christ's method was not practicable in this age. Yes, why should it be so? Because the Church has renounced Christ and has become the mistress of the State and wants all the paraphernalia to keep up her position. Gandhiji's way of life has demonstrated this contention to be false. Then they took shelter under the fact that foreigners cannot do so in India. Fortunately we have a few experimenters who are giving the lie to that also. Jesus spent himself in service to those who were neglected. Even to the young man who had great possessions who asked him what he should do to have eternal life the final answer of Jesus was "Go and sell that thou hast and give it to the poor." We have to serve the masses. If we do good to them which do good to us what thank have we? We have to do good hoping for nothing again. The missions have spent enormous amount of time and labour in higher education while the masses are illiterate. Higher education we needed but we need the three Rs more. If Christ had been directing the policy he would no doubt have concentrated on primary education leaving higher education to the secular authorities. Who shall say this emphasis placed on higher education was not carrying out the policy of the Government to supply cheap clerks? I do not suggest that this was done consciously by the missions, but their anxiety to fall in line with the programme of the Government may have led them astray and made them lose sight of the needs of the masses. I do not in the least wish to belittle the services rendered by missions. They have done yeoman service in the past and are doing excellent work now but what I am pleading for is that the righteousness of the Christian Church should exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees and should be in line with the teachings of Christ and adopt his way of life.

FROM DEEDS TO FAITH.

It is due to this shifting of the emphasis from deeds to faith that Christianity has become an exclusive religion. Christ meant to have a catholic body. The much quoted verse "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life." has lent a great deal of support to the belief theory. Belief in Christ has almost become an obsession and a superstition with the Church. What is meant by "whosoever believeth on him?" Does it merely mean a pious expression of opinion? Belief here is synonymous with faith, and connotes an intimate acquaintance of the personality in whom we have faith. The nearest demonstration of what faith means we find today in Borsad and Bardoli. These peasants have faith in Gandhiji. That does not mean that they adore his pictures and sit comfortably in their houses and talk in high terms of appreciation of Gandhiji's achievements. Because of their faith they have left all that they considered dear to them and are following the principles of him whom they adore. They are prepared to lay down their very lives at his bidding. This is faith. Whosoever in like manner will identify himself with the ideals of Christ and is prepared to drink of the cup he drank of shall have eternal life. How many of our present church going Christians will qualify under this interpretation? Everyone who believes in Christ to this extent is a brother of Christ. In this sense we are sure Christ will acclaim Gandhiji as his brother as he doeth the will of the Father in heaven and is striving to clothe the naked and feed the poor with his gospel of the Charaka. Many Westerners have often expressed a wish Gandhiji was a Christian. Let us thank God he is not in the accepted sense of the term; otherwise he might have been made a "twofold child of hell." Holding to this interpretation of a brother of Christ we hesitate even to think what Christ will say to the Bishop of Bombay and the rest of the so-called Christians when they say to him: "Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name and in thy name done many wonderful works?" Will he say to them "I never knew you; depart from me, ye that work iniquity?"

DIVINITY OF CHRIST.

Another great test that the Church seeks to apply is a belief that Christ was God himself. As far as we can see, Jesus never laid down this as a qualification to be counted a brother of his. I am not a Unitarian but I cannot see that Christ will disown anyone because he may have no clear ideas on this one point. According to my interpretation Christ as I see him will own up even an atheist or an agnostic if they are sincere in their views and follow their conscience and live up to their ideals and in so doing do the will of the Father in Heaven. It is true he often spoke as though he were God himself. But we have others who have done so. Krishna speaks in that way in the Gita. That did not mean that each was claimed to be God exclusively. There is room to construe their claim to be merely a media for the word of God, and to that extent being divine. Jesus himself claimed nothing more than this when he was definitely challenged on this point by the Jews. I would refer you to the tenth chapter of St. John's Gospel verses 33 to 36. When the Jews sought to stone Jesus for blasphemy saying to him: "Because thou being a man, makest thyself God." Jesus replies: "Is it not written in your law, 'I said ye are Gods.?' If he called them gods unto whom the word of God came and the scripture cannot be broken, say ye of him whom the Father sanctified and sent into the world 'Thou blasphemest' because I said I am the Son of God?" "If I do not the works of the Father believe me not." Even the Roman Emperors called themselves 'Son of God.' At all events, this belief is not as fundamental as the Church would have it. Christ's own test of his followers is "Who-soever shall do the will of the Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother and sister and mother." The "who-soever" is not restricted by any form or ceremony. "There is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision or uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free, but Christ is all and in all." Jesus said many shall come from the east and the west and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven but the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness.

BACK TO CHRIST.

The Church has formulated for itself an exclusive dogma and has narrowed down the field of action indicated by Christ. She has further joined hands with imperialism by entering into a liaison with the State. By so doing she lowered the status of religion which should be the controlling factor in all human activities. Because of this today we find economic motives playing the important role in all spheres with the help of politics. Religion is relegated to a position of no consequence, leaving room for hypocrisy to deceive the people into subjection.

When we get back to the position when the relationship with Christ will be determined by "doing the will of the Father in heaven" and this becomes the helmman in all departments of life, then shall Christ's way of life assume an universal aspect and the dissensions with the other religions will cease and we shall witness a unification of the motives and ideals of all nations and there shall be one flock and one shepherd, love dwelling in the hearts of all will make the world but one family and then shall there be "Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace, goodwill toward men." May God hasten that day.

An Indian Aviator:—Mr. A. M. Murad, a nineteen years old Mahomedan youth of Bengal arrived in Karachi on 31st December and intends to fly to Capetown to win the Aga Khan's prize of £ 500 for the first solo flight in a light plane from Karachi to Capetown and has been busy for two days in over-hauling his machine. Mr. Murad fears that the worst part of his journey would be from Karachi to Cairo as the rains would have set in and he would have probably to encounter snow en route. Mr. Murad is the son of the late M. Rashid, formerly Deputy Collector, Monghyr. He received his training in aviation at Dum Dum, (Calcutta). He obtained the British Air Ministry's "A" pilot license only in March 1930. He also holds a certificate of the Aero Club of India and Burma. His attempts to win the prize was delayed by about two months as permission to fly over Persia and the African route had to be obtained from the India Office in London. Mr. Murad intends to proceed to South Africa via Jask, Bunder Abbas, Basra, Baghdad, Rutba Wells, Gaza, and Cairo. From Cairo he proposes to follow the new Imperial Airways route, touching Assuan Wadi Halfa, Khartoum, Pretoria, Palapye and Capetown.

THE CHRISTIAN CHURCHES IN ENGLAND AND THE ROUND TABLE CONFERENCE.

During the last weeks of 1930, almost every section of the Christian Church in England has issued a call to its members to join in prayer on behalf of India and the Round Table Conference. In many cases these Calls to Prayer show a real understanding of the Indian situation, and offer a welcome sign that there is a large body of Christian people in England which views the aspirations and sorrows of India with sincere sympathy.

On the 29th of October, an Appeal to Prayer was issued by four leaders of the Churches in England: The Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Moderator of the Federal Council of Evangelical Free Churches, and the President of the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches. This appeal is cautious in tone, and contents itself with urging the reality of the power of prayer, and the importance of the spirit in which the delegates will approach and conduct their discussions. "In this region of spirit, God ever manifests the power of His own Divine and Holy Spirit, and it is in answer to prayer that this answer is promised." They invite the people of England to pray that "throughout the deliberations (of the Conference), East and West each bringing and interpreting to the other its fullest knowledge and its highest ideals, may take counsel together for the permanent welfare of all the peoples of India."

While the above Appeal is addressed to practically the whole of the Protestant Christians in England, a similar appeal has been issued by the leaders of the Roman Catholic Church to its members. The Tablet, (the leading Roman Catholic newspaper in England) on November 15th, 1930, referring to this Appeal, remarks: "We may be tempted to pray for a happy and successful Round Table Conference mainly so as to be rid of the worry. But India is more than a worry.....What we have to pray for is not merely the swift and equable settlement of disputes which vex our peace and derange British trade, but for a solution which will bring the truest happiness to the greatest number... The people of India are one-sixth of the whole human race, for which our Divine Redeemer died. Prayers for so vast a multitude must be on the big scale of "adveniat regnum tuum" ("Thy kingdom come").

The Baptist Missionary Society also passed a resolution on November 19th, sending "a message of Christian affection to all Indian Christians," and endorses the calls to prayer received from the International Missionary Council and the World's Evangelical Alliance. The last-named appeal (of the W. E. A.) shows a good many traces of the old 'imperialistic' outlook; but no one will hesitate to endorse their prayer "that the people of India and Britain may through the events of these difficult days be drawn together in mutual understanding and trust."

Much more striking is the Call to Prayer issued by the London Missionary Society, which displays remarkable courage and insight in its attitude towards the Indian situation. It begins by recognising frankly the universality and seriousness of the Indian National Movement, which, "though its intensity varies in different parts of India, undoubtedly extends widely over the country and penetrates deeply the several levels of Society, laying hold not only on the political groups and the students, but of the teachers and agriculturists." From this it passes on to what it describes as "a tragedy, and at the same time the hope of the situation", i. e., the large measure of common ground shared by the best men on either side: "We must remember too, for our encouragement, that the providence of God has set in authority in India the Viceroy, Lord Irwin, a man of the deepest Christian conviction, and that among those by whom he is faced are men, who, like Mr. Gandhi, have proved that their lives are dedicated to moral and religious issues."

It contends that there are certain duties incumbent at this time upon all British Christians. "We can press steadily for recognition, on the part of the public generally, of the rightness of the fundamental moral claim that underlies the Indian movement; the desire that Britain should treat India with the respect that is used to an equal."

That such words should be used by the British representatives of a great British Missionary Society, is certainly a matter for thankfulness and encouragement.

The Society of Friends have always stood in the van of progressive Christian thinking; and it is not surprising to find that they also have issued a manifesto which is in many respects notable and encouraging. More perhaps than any others, this manifesto shows a real understanding of the psychological factors behind the present conflict between India and Britain. "We British" (they say) "live free from the domination of an alien race, but have felt ourselves to be justified in our ruling of India. What then is our attitude to the new spirit of India that keenly desires and wills to be free? Have we a warm responsive sympathy to give, though the keen desire strikes at the rule of our own people over India? Or are we simply dismayed and antagonistic? Have we the imagination kindled to see this uprising of an ancient people as a spiritual happening, due in measure to the kindling ideas we have ourselves planted? And do we clearly believe that God's will, not ours, must determine the destiny of India?" And again "Reconciliation, in the Christian sense, is not a compromise and surrender of ideals, but a search for the will of God. It is the finding of a new way, a way of mutual respect, and affection and understanding." No finer expression could be desired of the true Christian spirit in its attitude to the complex problem of India; and we believe that such words will find an echo in the hearts of all men of good-will.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Hyderabad Hindu Widows Remarriage Bill:—The Hyderabad Correspondent of the Hindu writes:—The Select Committee on the Hindu Widows Remarriage Bill, comprising Nawab Justice Hashim Yar Jung Bahadur, Nawab Bahadur Jung Bahadur, Mr. Justice Rai Bishweshvarnath, Raja Bahadur Venkatarama Reddi, Commissioner of City Police, Mr. Pingli Venkatarama Reddi and Pandit Keshav Rao, ex-Judge of the Hyderabad High Court and the mover of the Bill, assembled on the 14th instant, (December) morning at 9 o'clock in the Council Hall. A large crowd of Hindus was present. The mover of the Bill dealt briefly with the need for the Bill. Mr. Ramachandra Rao, Vakil, Secretary of the local Sanathana Dharma Samstha, expressed the opposition point of view on grounds of offence to the orthodox section of the Hindu public. Mr. Ramachander S. Naik, M. A. (Oxon.), Bar-at-Law, supported the mover in an eloquent speech for which he was cheered so vociferously that the members of the Select Committee warned the public to maintain silence. Messrs. Madapathi Hanumantha Rao, Vakil, Pandit Rai Digamber Dass Choudhari and Narayan Rao, were among those who expressed themselves in favour of the Bill. The opposition was led by Mr. Vaman Naik ("Deshabhakta") and Mr. Pandurang V. Joshi, M.A., LL.B., Vakil, Pandit Madhwa Ohari, as an expert in the Dharma Shastras, who has been sent for specially for this purpose by the local orthodox Hindus, from Northern India, also opposed the Bill. The opinions of the witnesses were recorded and the Committee rose at 12. The Secretary of the Legislative Council announces that the Select Committee on Pandit Keshav Rao's Hindu Widow's Remarriage Bill has been adjourned for a month and that at its next meeting further opinions from the public will be taken.

Lord Oliver on Congress Intransigence:—Pressing his inability to comply with the request of the Editor of the Indian Review to contribute an article on the Round Table Conference, Lord Olivier, Secretary of State for India in the first Labour Government, writes: "It has seemed to me impossible to say anything that during the last few months, would have been either opportune or advantageous: in view of the inconceivable and intransigent attitude of the Congress Party, which is the only obstacle to a hopeful view of the Indian constitutional problem. I attended the opening of the Round Table Conference last Wednesday: which was impressive, and should have been an occasion for hopeful confidence: but which seemed regrettably incomplete and imperfectly balanced. I feel sure, however, that the Conference will arrive at a reasonable, and what should be an acceptable, Report and the progress will be made towards ensuring a solid contribution towards the unification of a policy satisfactory to all aspirants to Indian Self-Government. I think, and I have long thought, this tactical leadership of the Congress Party deplorable. The loss of O. R. Das was from that point of view an immense misfortune. May the New Year be a happier epoch for Indian Nationalism!"

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

Maulana Mahommed Ali:—The news of the death of Maulana Mahommed Ali was published in the newspapers on Monday morning and was received with genuine feelings of sorrow by all classes of the Indian population. The Maulana, with his elder brother Shaukat Ali, was a household word in the palmy days of the Non-co-operation movement. Next after Mahatma Gandhi's, the names of the Ali Brothers were shouted at you by street urchins with the appendage "jai." Mahatma Gandhi broke up negotiations with Lord Reading, against the wish of the late Mr. C. R. Das and others, because he would not yield on the question of the release of "the Fatwa prisoners." For some reason which remains still obscure to us, there was a sudden cooling off in the ardour of collaboration between Mahatmaji and the Ali Brothers. The former took the parting at any rate outwardly without a pang, but the volcanic temper of the Ali brothers brooked no relation intermediate between complete absorption and open breach. Owing to the abolition of the Khalifate by Kemal Pasha, the bottom was knocked out of the Kbilafat movement which the Ali brothers had organized and worked independently of the Muslim League, which resumed its old position as the accredited political organ of Indian Mussalmans. Quite recently, the attitude of Government towards the brothers underwent a marked change, and Maulana Mahommed Ali was nominated as one of the Indian representatives at the Round Table Conference. He made a powerful speech at the opening session of the Conference, with much of the old fire. It showed that, whatever may be the attitude of Government, Mahommed Ali, notwithstanding his broken health, was not inclined to compromise a jot on the question of his country's independence. He was a fiery patriot every inch of him and the misunderstanding of his actual position as an Indian and a Mussulman was largely due to the downright terms in which he expressed his convictions without regard for the susceptibilities of others equally sensitive as himself about their dual position as patriots and communalists. Maulana Mahommed Ali was absolutely incapable of fear. As a journalist and as a public man he spoke out his mind freely in the spirit of the motto of his well-known newspaper, the Comrade: "They only live who dare." It was a characteristically devoted act on his part to go to London to attend the Conference, conscious that he may not return alive, to his native land which he loved with all the intensity of his ardent nature. His body, it was announced, would be brought down to India for interment. The latest news, however, is that the family has accepted the offer of the custodians of the famous shrine of Omar in Jerusalem, as it was the dying wish of the Maulana to be buried there. The Grand Mufti in his message said that this would be considered an honour for the Moslem community. A new link will be thus forged between the two Asiatic peninsulas, famous as the cradles of the world's great religions, by this great Indian being laid to rest in the great Moslem shrine of Jerusalem.

Dr. Muthulakshmi as Legislator:—Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi has written an account of her work in the Madras Legislative Council of which she was elected Vice-President. It is a record of which she can well be proud. In the short period of three years she was able to do much for the cause of women and children which she has at heart. The education of poor girls, questions of social hygiene, the dedication of women, Temperance and other social questions, engaged her attention and in her quiet, modest way she did much to enlist the sympathy and support of her colleagues in these subjects. The Act for the abolition of the Devadasi system is a standing monument of her work in the Legislature. Dr. Muthulakshmi pays a high tribute to the help rendered to her by the men who were members of the Council. She contrasts the attitude of Englishmen to the women's franchise movement in their country with that of Indians here, and adds: "Not only the Indian men themselves initiated the many reforms for the women's uplift in this country but also at every new step we took in public life, they continued to give their full support, sympathy and co-operation. Indian women are really fortunate in that respect. When India secures self-Government, there is not the least doubt that Indian women would very soon get rid of all their disabilities such as the custom of early-marriage, purdah, unequal marriage laws, unjust inheritance laws etc., customs introduced into the Hindu Society during the turbulent period of the Indian history for the safety and protection of its women but still allowed to exist through the ignorance and illiteracy of the masses and the neutrality of the Government towards social evils."

Bishop J. R. Chitambar:—We have received too late for publication this week an account of the proceedings of the fifth session of the Central Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Southern Asia held in Cawnpore on the 27th December. The outstanding feature of the Conference was the election of the first Indian Bishop in the church. The following particulars relating to the election and to Bishop Chitambar are taken from the account sent to us. "It was there we elected our first Indian Bishop—J. R. Chitambar, Principal of the Lucknow Christian College and Superintendent of the Lucknow District. His mother-tongue is Marathi though he has long been out of the Marathi language area. In 1928, 21 ballots were taken in an effort to nominate an Indian man to the General Conference for election without success. This time there was such unanimity of thinking and splendiddness of spirit that the Rev. Dr. Chitambar was elected on the second ballot. He is widely known throughout Methodism. He was first a delegate to our General Conference in America the same year Bishop McConnell who was also present at our Central Conference was elected to the Episcopacy, some 18 years ago. Bishop Chitambar was elected on the basis of life tenure and is given charge of the Central Provinces, Lucknow and North India Conferences and also our India Home and Foreign Mission Field with his residence in Jubbulpore, C. P. He was consecrated to the office of a Bishop on Sunday, January the 4th, in the Hindustani Church which now stands on the same spot where he spent some years of his boyhood."

The Dnyanodaya on the Reformer:—We are sorry that our contemporary, the Dnyanodaya, has found it necessary to apologise for us to the few friends who have recently spoken to it of "the unfortunate undertone of much of its (the Reformer's) recent editorial comment." "Our own answer has been," it continues, "and is still, that if thousands of our own fellow-countrymen had been put in jail by a foreign government we ourselves should feel much as the Reformer does nowadays." Should the fact of not being an Indian make so much difference to a Christian Missionary in India, we wonder. But we were not thinking of the people in prison when we traced the tendency to institute comparisons, invariably unfavourable to the Indian side, between European and Indian ideas and institutions to "intellectual conceit springing from the sense of political domination." We gave examples for the view which we expressed and we can give some more from current events. That the Dnyanodaya's view is not shared by all Missionaries, is shown by the following which we take from a letter received this week, from one of them: "The Reformer is better and better. I admire your sound judgment and balance during these days of prejudice and excitement."

The Story of Telemachus:—A correspondent wants to know where we got the story of Telemachus referred to in the leading article on Babu Ganu in the Reformer of the 20th December. It is in Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." "Amidst the general joy of the victory of Pollentia", the historian writes, "a Christian poet exhorted the Emperor to extirpate; by his authority, the horrid custom which had so long resisted the voice of humanity and religion. The pathetic representations of Prudentius were less effectual than the generous boldness of Telemachus, an Asiatic monk, whose death was more useful to mankind than his life. The Romans were provoked by the interruption of their pleasures, and the rash monk, who had descended into the arena, to separate the gladiators, was overwhelmed under a shower of stones. But the madness of the people soon subsided; they respected the memory of Telemachus, who had deserved the honours of martyrdom; and they submitted, without a murmur, to the laws of Honorius, which abolished for ever the human sacrifices of the amphitheatre." Gibbon himself was not quite convinced of the authenticity of this incident. In a footnote, he says: "I wish to believe the story of St. Telemachus. Yet no church has been dedicated, no altar has been erected, to the only monk who died a martyr in the cause of humanity."

Hindu Women's Property Rights:—In the Reformer of the 27th December we briefly referred to the valuable report of the Committee appointed by the Government of His Highness the Maharaja of Mysore to consider the question of improving the position assigned to women under the Hindu Law. We received on Thursday the Report of the Committee appointed by His Highness the Maharaja Gaekwad on Hindu Women's Property Rights. The Mysore Committee's Report covers somewhat wider ground but there is much which is common to it and the Baroda Committee and the two Reports taken together are an illuminating exposition of the subject of the position of women in two of our most important States.

of time, find adequate expression through such conferences as the one inaugurated at Benares and the one to be inaugurated at Lahore. In our leading article last week on the Education Conference, we pointed out that membership of Asiatic Conference was not limited to born Asiatics but also to others who have devoted their lives to the service of Asiatic countries. That article was written before we saw the prospectus of the Women's Conference. We see from this that non-Asians are to be admitted only as visitors and will not have the right of speaking or voting at the Conference. We have called the attention of Mrs. Margaret Cousins, who is the prime mover in calling the Conference, to our observations and expressed the hope that the term Asiatic will be interpreted in the most liberal sense possible. Some of the most devoted workers in India are Western women who have completely identified themselves with this country. It is not necessary to mention names. To exclude them from full membership of the Conference will jar upon the feelings of the Indian public with whom race counts for far less than the mind and heart.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, JANUARY 10, 1931.

ALL-ASIAN WOMEN'S CONFERENCE.

We print today the prospectus of the first All-Asia Women's Conference which will commence its sittings on the 19th January. The invitation to join the Reception Committee and to co-operate in making it a success will, we hope, meet with prompt and abundant response. Some further particulars are given in the second bulletin issued by the Committee. The following gathered from it may be found useful by intending members and visitors. Ten delegates are allowed to each Asiatic country. They may be either direct representatives of women's organisations or nominees of Governments, or private individuals. The Reception Committee undertakes to secure hospitality for the delegates at the port nearest to Lahore (Calcutta, Bombay and Karachi). They will be met at Bombay by Mrs. Faiz Tyebji and at Karachi by Mrs. Homi Mehta. The Committee will pay their return fare (second class) between that port and Lahore, provide board and quarters for them in Lahore during the week of the Conference and will do everything possible to give them an enjoyable visit to India. Women of non-Asiatic birth will be welcome as visitors to the Conference but will not have the right of speaking, or voting at the Conference session. Board and lodging for them will be provided at Lahore for between Rs. 3/- and 6/- per day or possibly free of charge. Each delegate, and member of the Reception Committee, non-Asian visitor has to pay a fee of Rs. 10/-, and those paying Rs. 200/- will be classed as Patrons. Delegates are requested to wear national dress throughout the Conference and to bring on loan some representative products of the country as the art expression of their national culture. These will form a small Asian Exhibition entirely chosen by women as typical of oriental beauty without reference to production for Western markets. For the Presidency, some names are suggested, and it is stated that Mrs. Sarojini Naidu has so far received the largest number of votes. As it is, however, quite uncertain whether she will be released from prison before the date of the Conference, the election of President will take place at the first meeting of the Reception Committee preliminary to the Conference session. Delegates from the following countries have definitely promised to attend: Palestine, Syria, Ceylon, Burma, Baluchistan, Nepal, Persia, Japan, Java and India. Non-Asian visitors have already arrived from New Zealand and the United States.

A provisional programme has been drawn up. The addresses of the Chairwoman of the Reception Committee who, it is expected, will be a princess of one of the Indian States, and of the President, will be delivered on the opening day. On the next day and on the four days following there will be morning and afternoon sessions. Both the sessions on Tuesday the 20th will be devoted to the discussion of questions bearing on Family Relationships including marriage, motherhood, polygamy and traffic in women. On Wednesday the subjects for discussion are Health, Education and Religion. The morning session on Thursday will be given up to questions relating to Labour Conditions comprising Arts and Crafts, Agriculture and Industrialism. The afternoon session is assigned to "Women and Government" when the question of franchise, nationality of married women, Women's rational status and Laws directly affecting women will be discussed. The provisional programme for Friday the 23rd is stated as "sub-committees to formulate resolutions, especially as regards accidental influences." The afternoon will be devoted to social functions and visits to institutions. On Saturday resolutions will be passed and closing addresses will be delivered. The future work of the Conference will also be considered and settled in the afternoon session of that day. On Sunday there will be a special historical expedition to another city, probably, Delhi. The Committee invites delegates to send three subjects in order of preference in which they will be willing to speak or read papers. Secretaries of women's associations are also requested to send written statements giving their experience and ideals on the objects of the Conference. These will be read or printed in the proceedings as circumstances permit.

We have from the first warmly supported the idea of a conference of the women of Asiatic countries. In an ideal state of society there will be no place for special women's conferences. But we are far from that state, and even in the West where women have enjoyed greater freedom for centuries, women's movements are still found necessary. In Asia the subordination and seclusion of women have been more marked, and there is, therefore, greater justification for an All-Asian women's conference. There have been some criticism of the All-Asia Educational Conference held recently at Benares on the ground that there were very few delegates from foreign countries participating in it. Such criticism is entirely misplaced. An ancient saying warns us against despising the day of small beginnings and nearly all the greatest movements in history were initiated by a small number of men inspired by a great idea. The idea of an All-Asia synthesis of culture and civilization is undoubtedly a great one, and we are confident that it will, in course

INDIANS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

( BY MR. S. A. WAIZ, SECRETARY, IMPERIAL INDIAN CITIZENSHIP ASSOCIATION. )

The history of Indians in South Africa is a sad and tragic reading. Thousands of ignorant Tamil labourers were made to sign a contract to work in Natal and were removed from the peaceful hamlets in South India as early as 1860. On the expiry of their agreement, majority of them desired to return home, but were induced to sign on for another term. This semi-slavery system continued until 1911, when the indenture labour for Natal finally ceased. With these indentured labourers went out many free emigrants as petty tradesmen. In fact, the entire Indian population of the Transvaal today are the descendants of free Indians who had emigrated to South Africa prior to the Smuts-Gandhi Agreement of 1914. The pioneer Indian labour turned the howling wilds of Natal into a smiling garden. Speaking in the old Natal Legislative Assembly in 1908, Sir Leige Hulett said: "The condition of the Colony before the importation of Indian labour was one of gloom.....
.....at the importation of Indian labour the country began to thrive. Dublin was absolutely built upon Indian population." Indians in South Africa are law-abiding, hard-working, honest and thrifty community. Despite the fact that they suffer many disabilities and have been deprived of municipal and political franchise, they manage to thrive and are a source of stable revenue to the Exchequer of the Union. They are a voiceless people but the proverbial oriental patience has sustained them. They have never been given a breathing space to recover from the devastating consequences of the outrageous indenture system and yet they can hold their own in a hostile and ungrateful country like South Africa. There is always some anti-Indian legislation for consideration before the South African Parliament.

At the present moment, there is the Transvaal Land Tenure Bill, which if enacted will spell the ruination of thousands of Indian merchants in the Transvaal. The bill is based upon the principle of segregation which, as it was understood in 1926, when the Class Area Bill was dropped, was considered to be provocative. If the proposed Bill, which has already passed the Select Committee stage, is fortunately abandoned, it will only be in accordance with the traditional policy of the legislature of the Union of South Africa to introduce another private Bill in its place. These are some of the methods adopted by the statesmen of South Africa to solve the Indian problem. The Government of India, however, was able to convince the South African statesmen that repressive and oppressive measures were not the only means if that is a way at all of settling permanently the Indian problem: and one of the methods suggested was a Round Table Conference. The representatives of the Government of India and of the Union of South Africa met at a Conference towards the end of 1926; and in February, 1927, evolved, what was afterwards known as the "Cape Town Agreement." The fundamental principle as agreed to by the Union of South Africa at the Conference is that "it is the duty of every civilised Government to devise ways and means to take all possible steps for the uplifting of every section of their permanent population to the full extent of their capacity and opportunities and accept the view that in the provisions of educational and other facilities the considerable number of Indians who remain part of the permanent population should not be allowed to lag behind other sections of the people." Indians, on their part, agreed to maintain a Western standard of living and accepted a scheme of assisted repatriation. The Indian community helped the civilised Government of South Africa in their laudable intention of uplifting a section of permanent population by generously contributing £ 20,000 towards founding a college for the education of their children. They have always and are still making huge sacrifices for the good name of their Motherland and the civilisation they represent. Under the assisted repatriation of the Cape Town Agreement, over 18,000 Indians have reluctantly said good bye to the country of their birth, and have returned to India. It was a tragic scheme because for thousands of repatriated Indians India is a foreign land. Many do not know any Indian vernacular and everyone of them is out of touch with the social systems of their communities in India. Still for the sake of those who are left behind in South Africa, these people renounced their rights of domicile in South Africa. It is stated above that these people or their forefathers were removed from their ancestral homes in India and taken over to South Africa and just when they began to look upon the latter country as their home land, they were again induced to break up their homes! These repatriation schemes under different names have been in existence since 1911 and are responsible for the repatriation of over 53,000 Indians. To induce a South African born Indian by offering him £ 50 or £ 100 to leave his home and return to India or any other country is a camouflaged expatriation.

However that may be, the time for the revision of the Cape Town Agreement is drawing nigh and perhaps the representatives of South Africa and India will sit round a table again in order to review the situation. Dr. D. F. Malan, the Minister of Interior, will undoubtedly be the chief spokesman of South Africa. It does not require a prophetic vision to state that he will declare that the Cape Town Agreement has been an utter failure, for according to this redoubtable Doctor of Divinity, so long as there is one Indian left in South Africa, the Indian problem remains. This gentleman, by temperament, is incapable of learning or unlearning anything. He cannot understand how a pig can be roasted without burning down the house. Dr. Malan, to be fair, is frank and open and never for a moment hesitates in telling what he has in his inmost thoughts. It is surprising therefore, that at a recent speech at Vryheid, he stated his conviction in an ambiguous language. The Government of India has an arduous and delicate task before them. The time for diplomacy and sweet reasonableness is long past. No useful purpose will be served by refusing to face the facts. There are not many Indians left in South Africa. The latest figures are not available, but there could not be more than 1,25,000 Indians in the Union of South Africa. Out of this number, more than 60 per cent are South African born and the rest have no intention of returning to India either under voluntary or assisted scheme of repatriation. The duty of the Government of India is, therefore, clear. They ought to declare unequivocally and boldly that the number of Indians in South Africa has already reached the irreducible minimum and that they would not be a party to any scheme involving further reduction of Indians in South Africa. Unless and until the Government of India take up that stand and abandon the ruinous and futile schemes of repatriation the Indian problem in South Africa will never be solved and our people here will continue suffering untold hardship and disabilities. South Africa will at last realise that India means business. Will the Hon'ble Sir Fazli Inusein consider the situation from this point of view and make it the basis of his future negotiations with South Africa? If he does, Indians, all over the world, will wholeheartedly support him.

"Drafting Acts of Parliament is apparently not an easy task," remarked Lord Justice Bramwell in Coverdale v. Charlton (L. R. 4 Q. B. D., 115.)

If that be so in England, where there is no need and no obligation to depend on third rate experts imported from abroad, it is no wonder that codification in India, as Justice Dalal observed in 90 Indian Cases, is to a certain extent a "Gamble."

However that may be, of one piece of Indian legislation in particular there seems to be no difference of opinion. All the Honourable Judges of a Full Bench of the Madras High Court agreed with both the learned counsel who appeared in the case that the Indian Christian Marriage Act (XV of 1872) was "very badly and clumsily drawn." (1891 I. L. R. 14 Madras 342.)

But of all the eighty-eight sections comprised in that badly drawn Act, section 68 easily takes the palm by its mischievous obscurity and murderous inhumanity. These two inestimable qualities have, with the adventitious aid of a blundering course of judicial interpretation, acquired for this section the audacious sweep and deadly power of the Inquisition and made it a menace and a terror to non-Christian people, especially the uneducated depressed Classes and Mussalmans in the rural parts of this country. It is now the Vdgh-Nakk or Tiger's Claw by which the Christian missionary is enabled to hold his unruly subjects firmly in his love-compelling paternal grip, or to tear out their vitals, and those of their sympathisers too, if they dared to break loose from his sanctified fold and fraternised again with their unregenerate kinsfolk in the old heathen way. The Reverend gentleman, unnamed, of Rajamundry (17 M. 391), the Reverend L. B. Scudder of the American Reformed Church in North Arcot (20 M. 12), the Reverend J. Dequidt of the same district (40 M. 1030), the Reverend A. W. Moore of Farukhabad (40 All. 393), the Reverend Manager of the United Lutheran Church at Bhimavaram (41 I. S. B. 201), who all found fame and immortality at one time or other in the annals of Indian criminal law, are by no means the only workers in God's vineyard to have been smitten with a burning faith in Section 68 of the Indian Christian Marriage Act as a spiritual weapon providentially designed for the regeneration and uplift of the fallen people of this land.

That fateful section which, wielded zealously by pious hands, has proved the bane of religion and a veritable enemy to humanity and intercommunal goodwill in India, prescribes a sentence of imprisonment or transportation which may extend to ten years for "whoever not being authorized by section 5 of this Act to solemnize marriages, solemnizes or professes to solemnize in the absence of a Marriage Registrar of the district in which the ceremony takes place, a marriage between persons one or both of whom is or are a Christian or Christians."

It is sincerely claimed not only by reverend Christian gentlemen who are Ministers of Religion but also by other good Christian people like the learned author of the "Law applicable to Christians in India", that a Hindu priest who performs with Hindu rites a Hindu marriage between a Hindu and a Christian, or a Moslem priest who conducts with Moslem ritual a Moslem marriage between a Moslem and a Christian, must be punished under this section as a matter of course, and that in fact it was so intended by the Legislature.

It is true that Act XV of 1872 being, as its name implies, an Act dealing with Christian Marriage in India, nobody can solemnize a Christian Marriage in this country who is not authorized by section 5 of that Act. It is also true that section 5 does not contemplate the recognition of any non-Christian priests as persons competent to solemnize Christian marriages as provided by that Act. Only Christian persons who have received ordination, or Clergymen of the Church of Scotland, or Christian Ministers of Religion licensed under the Act, or Christian persons licensed under the Act to grant certificates of marriage between Native Christians, are competent for that purpose. It is further true that according to section 5 a civil marriage between a Christian and a non-Christian as provided in Part V of the Act can be lawfully performed only by or in the presence of a Marriage Registrar appointed under the Act, and only a person professing the Christian religion can be appointed to that office. But, as pointed out by Justice Walsh in the case of Bhangi Maha Ram (1928 I. L. B. 40 All. 393), all that section 5 says is that marriages may be solemnised in India by the persons specified thereunder. This does not mean that no other marriages may be solemnised in India. That would be an impossible contention. It must therefore mean "marriages under this Act," or, in other words, "Christian marriages." It is a mistake to say, as has been said in 40 Madras 1030, that Section 68 provides a penalty for solemnizing or professing to solemnize a marriage "contrary to the provisions of the Act." What it really does is to impose a penalty upon any person "who does under section 5 what he is not authorized to do, namely, solemnizes a Christian Marriage."

If nevertheless the Legislature is to be credited with the intention of stretching out its arm beyond the Christian fold and strike at outsiders who may sympathise or co-operate with the malcontents within and to have framed Section 68 with that deliberate purpose, is it not strange that it has omitted to provide a section for punishing the malcontents themselves who are the primary culprits? "We therefore start with this," says Justice Walsh, that there is no express prohibition preventing a professing Christian from doing violence to his faith and marrying a non-Christian by a non-Christian ceremony. His marriage may not be valid by English law as a Christian Marriage in India, but it is not forbidden to him."

But when our good Christian Missionary friends pitch upon Section 68 of the I. C. M. A. as affording a suitable handle for bringing the offending non-Christian priest to book, it is by no means their intention to overlook the offence given to them by their own Church-Member. On the other hand it is their earnest wish and diligent endeavour to round up in addition every person, married or single, male or female, Christian or non-Christian, who had anything to do with the obnoxious function either as a party to the marriage or as a relation, friend, guest or spectator, in order to infuse a wholesome respect for the Christian religion and teach a lasting lesson in good neighbourliness all round. In seeming to fasten their attention first on the priest they only condescend for a moment to yield to the technical and tactical requirements imposed by the section the help of which they are obliged to seek for want of a more suitable one. But they make up for this weakness, almost immediately by using Section 114 of the Indian Penal Code as a convenient adjunct and lever to haul up the entire bunch of possible offenders at one pull and throw them into the lap of Section 68 alongside of the luckless priest dubbing them his "abettors", as though the marriage which he was persuaded to perform was primarily of his seeking. This tremendous missionary coup and legal legerdemain fairly staggered Mr. Justice Walsh. "It would be a startling result of this Act," he exclaimed, "if a person being free to choose and not prohibited from marrying otherwise than by a Christian Marriage, should find himself liable to transportation for abetting the person who marries him." "This is a startling result," he again repeated, "and it satisfies me that there must be a fallacy in the reasoning which reaches it."

But our good and kind Christian friends, when their conscience is assailed thus with argument, may very well rise up in their righteousness and triumphantly claim that their policy and action stand justified before God and man inasmuch as the highest tribunal of justice in this province, the Honourable the High Court of Judicature at Madras which is an exemplar also to other Indian High Courts, has accorded them consistent support during the past sixty years, ever since 1871 in fact, and has even pronounced "Well done, Faithful servant," at a Full Bench specially convened in 1916, and that is still the Law of the Medes and Persians, at least in Southern India! Therein lies the tragedy of Section 68 for all who have eyes to see and the heart to feel impartially about Christians and Non-Christians alike.

Keshub—the Prophet of a New Order:—Mr. Jaimeni Kanta Koar writes in Navaavidhan: "I will enumerate a few of the more important means and Sadhans which have led to the fostering of a spirit at once national and international. (1) Keshub had a book compiled, called Shloka Samgraha, which is an Anthology of world-Scriptures, readings, from which are given during worship. (2) He made up an emblem, which is in use among us, composed of the Cross, the Crescent, the lotus, the Trident, and the Omkara representing the reconciliation of religions and communions. (3) He took the orthodox Bhratridwitya (Bhai Duja) Festival and made it a Sacrament of Universal Brotherhood and Sisterhood. (4) He was the first to celebrate the birth and death anniversaries of all prophets, without distinction of color or creed. (5) He inaugurated the New Arati—the Flag Illumination Ceremony in which the scriptures of World-Religions are placed on a pedestal and over it is unfurled a flag to announce their unity and atonement! (6) Keshub always kept a Globe in front of his Vedi in the Family Sanctuary to remind him of all peoples and countries. (7) Over and above all he instituted sadhans for children, seeking to visualize to them world-unity in the following way. Here are the words taken from his last book—The New Sanhita. "The mother shall lead them on to the place of sadhan, and begin the ceremony thus; "The mother shall first draw the figure 1 and the child shall place flowers over it and say: One God, One Faith, one Family, One Scripture, One Salvation. On the second figure representing the flag of the new Dispensation the child shall similarly scatter flowers and say: Victory to the New Dispensation. The third figure shall represent the map of Asia, Europe, Africa and America and the child in honouring it shall say: On earth peace and good-will, and among the four continents unity. After the ceremony is over the drawings shall be washed and effaced and the same practice shall be repeated daily for a week."

CASTE AND THE CENSUS.

(BY S. D. NADKARNI.)

(Concluded from the last issue.)

With regard to the return of caste in the case of communities other than Brahmanist Hindus, the Government's attitude has been far from being consistent or impartial. In those communities, viz. Christians, Mahomedans, Sikhs etc., it may be that Caste is actually observed and perhaps as rigidly observed as among the Brahmanists. Of course, we recognise the material difference, that Caste claims no 'religious' sanction among most of those communities; so that if a 'Brahman Christian' marries a 'Shudra Christian,' no Padre or Bishop issues an outcasting fiat against the caste-revoking parties concerned; and similar is the case with the Mahomedans etc. Yet in the instructions issued to the enumerators it is provided that caste should not be inquired in the case of Christians, but may or should be in the case of Mahomedans etc. This tenderness to Caste among Christians is too shamefully invidious even for a Government that ranks on fostering 'born loyal' classes as a support to itself in its extremity.

In the same reply Government also observed that they do not consider that the mere fact of not stating caste in the Census return will have any effect' in the direction of abolishing 'any anti-social features that may appear to the (Jat-Patlorak) Mandal to be involved in the caste system.' This pontifical dictum is belied by the remarks which Mr. Middleton, one of their own officers, had on one occasion to make, which were brought to light by Lala Lajpat Rai in his journal, "The People," a short time before his death, and which were recently re-quoted in part by Dr. Sir P. O. Ray in an article published in the papers about the beginning of November last. Mr. Middleton, we are told, was originally Superintendent of the 1921 Census operations in the Punjab, but left before the report was finally adopted. He showed how the Census, in the way it has laid emphasis on Caste labels, has tended to solidify and rigidify Caste, particularly in the Punjab.

Mr. Middleton wrote: "My intention was to confine these chapters almost entirely to statistics. I was going to point out that the learned treatises on Caste included in past Census Reports (which are in reality quite extraneous and unnecessary as part of the Census) has led to a tradition that the Census Officer is an arbiter on caste questions. I decline to take up that position. I would have given no decision in caste disputes, but would have mentioned the aspiration of such people as the Ahluwalias with all the sympathy. I had intended pointing out that there is a wide revolt against the classification of occupational castes; that these castes have been largely manufactured and almost entirely preserved as separate castes by the British Government. Our land records and official documents have added iron bands to the old rigidity of caste. Caste in itself was right amongst the higher castes, but malleable amongst the lower. We pigeon-holed everyone by castes and, if we could not find a true caste for them, labelled them with the name of an hereditary occupation. We deplore the caste system and its effect on social and economic problems, but we are largely responsible for the system which we deplore. Left to themselves such castes as Sunnar, Tarkhan and Lohar would rapidly disappear and no one would suffer. The large number of people who have refused to record any castes at this Census is a sign of progress and the breaking of customary bonds; it is no reflection on the administration of the Census. Personally I am very strongly in favour of all caste statistics being abandoned at the next census, though in this I probably go further than most Europeans. Government's passion for labels and pigeon-holes has led to a crystallisation of the caste system, which except amongst the aristocratic castes was really very fluid under indigenous rule.

"There is no justice in labelling a Government official whose ancestors have worked in similar capacities, as a Sunnar, a Tarkhan or any other term denoting a menial occupation with which his family has no connexion whatever. Nor is there any good to be obtained from constant reiteration of the doubtful fact that Ahluwalias are of the distilling and wine-selling castes.

"If the Government would ignore caste it would gradually be replaced by something very different amongst the lower castes. It is the inflexibility of the lower castes more than of the higher that paralyses the Indian's efforts at economic salvation, and that inflexibility is not inherent in the caste system itself." (The People, Lahore, 16-8-1928, p. 102.—Italics not mine.)

Readers of the Reformer will be greatly edified and fortified, I am sure, if it will have its own authoritative say on this question, as it is a question at once of law, of conscience and of public policy.

A Vacation Course for Teachers:—A correspondent writes from Karwar: During the Christmas holidays a vacation course for training of Secondary Teachers was organised at Karwar by Mr. K. G. Warty, the Head Master of the Gokak High School and the representative of the Head Masters of the Karnatak group in the Senate of the Bombay University. A series of talks on the Principles and Psychology of Education by Mr. Warty and on the lives and doctrines of Educational Reformers by Prof. S. V. Phadnis, the Head Master of the Ram Mahan English School of Bombay were given for the benefit of teachers particularly those preparing for S. T. O. Examination. Not less than 25 persons from Karwar and outside availed of the course. Mr. M. S. Muzumdar, the Head Master of the Local Government High School took keen interest in the movement and encouraged the organisers by his presence throughout and emphasised in his concluding remarks the importance of such movement which is quite new in this Presidency. In fact the course at Karwar is the third of its kind in the presidency and the first in Karnatak.

ALL-ASIAN WOMEN'S CONFERENCE.

The First All-Asian Women's Conference will be held at Lahore from 19th to the 25th January.

The Organisers invite all men and women to join who are in sympathy with the aims of the Conference, and who are willing to co-operate in according All-Indian hospitality to delegates and visitors from outside India for this unique experiment at Asian synthesis.

It is expected that a Princess of one of the Indian States will be the Chairwoman of the Reception Committee. Donors of Rs. 200 or more will be classed as Patrons. The Membership fee for the Reception Committee is Rs. 10. Special arrangements will be made at the Conference for Reception Committee Members.

Duties of the Reception Committee are :

1. To welcome Delegates at the Ports and give them hospitality there.
2. To arrange meetings locally which the delegates may address.
3. To collect their travelling expenses to and from that port to Lahore (Railway concession has been requested).
4. To arrange the General Programme for the visit of Delegates in co-operation with the Lahore Local Reception Committee.
5. To collect funds for the Conference at Lahore.
6. To elect from the members of the Reception Committee, ten representatives to the Conference, and Officers for the Reception Committee.

Provisional Secretary to the All-India Reception Committee, Mrs. M. E. Cousins, Pantheon Gardens, Egmore, Madras, to whom the Fees of Reception Committee Members should be sent, and from whom further information can be obtained.

ALL-INDIA RECEPTION COMMITTEE.

H. H. the Junior Maharani of Travancore, Rani Rajwade, and Sardar Sir Shitole have become Patrons of the Conference. Amongst those who have joined the Reception Committee are Mrs. Fiaz Tyabji, Mrs. Premchand, Dr. Sukhtankhar, Dr. Nowrange, Judge Mudgaokar, Col. Irani, Dr. Penfell. Miss Mary Campbell, Miss Mayadas, Miss Sushila Ram of Delhi; Mr. Hamid Ali, General Rajwade, Mr. and Mrs. P. K. Sen, Dr. Thungama, Professor Seshadri, Sir Moropant Joshi, Mr. Khattry, Professor Mohan Singh, and further information has especially been requested by residents in the Indian States of Indore, Bikanir, Kapurthala, Kohlapur, Travancore and Kotah.

OBJECTS OF CONFERENCE.

1. To promote the consciousness of unity amongst the women of Asia as members of a common Oriental culture.
2. To take stock of the qualities of Oriental civilisation so as to preserve them for national and world service (simplicity, philosophy, Art, the cult of the family, veneration for motherhood, spiritual consciousness).

3. To review and seek remedies for the defects at present apparent in Oriental civilisation (ill-health, illiteracy, poverty and underpayment of labour, infantile mortality, marriage customs).

4. To sift what is appropriate for Asia from the Occidental influences (education, dress, freedom of movement, cinemas, machinery).

5. To strengthen one another by the exchange of data and experiences concerning women's conditions in the respective countries of Asia economic, moral, political, and spiritual status).

6. To promote world peace.

Signatories to the Proposal for holding the Conference are Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, Dr. Muthalakshmi Ammal, Dr. Poonen Lukhose, Lady Abdul Quadir, Mrs. Rustoomji Faridoonji, Mrs. Saraladevi Choudrani, Lady Hydari, Rajkumari Amrit Kuar, Mrs. Hamid Ali, Mrs. Rameswari Nehro, Mrs. Protima Devi Tagore, Miss Khedia Begam Ferozuddin, Mrs. Padmabai Sanjiva Rao, Rani Lakshmbai G. Rajwade.

President of Conference: Each Delegate is being requested to send in her vote for one of the following women as President of the Conference, or to suggest some other nominees.

Madame Nour Hamada (President, Women's Arabian Conference).

Madame Nasik Abed (Madame M. Jemil Beyhum, noted Arabian Leader).

Madame Sarojini Naidu (Indian Leader, Poetess and Orator).

Mrs. Inouye (Japanese educationist and organiser).

Mrs. Sun Yat Sen (Chinese Leader).

Replies promising co-operation have to date been received from Palestine, Syria, Ceylon, Nepal, Japan, Burma, Iraq, Siam, Indo-China, Malaya, Hawaii, Persia, Baluchistan.

All further information to be had from the Hon. Organizing Secretary, Rani Lakshmbai G. Rajwade, Gwalior, Central India.

WAYS OF HELPING.

The problem of fusing Asia is difficult in the extreme, but some one must make a beginning—why not its women, its mothers? Give your help by influence, ideas, money, encouragement.

Please help the Conference by joining as a Patron or as a Member of the Reception Committee and by sending your name, address and fee.

Please bring the Conference to the notice of the public in every possible way, especially to those interested in internationalism, World Peace, the problems and assets of Asia, an international health service, an international child welfare service, reforms concerned with sex and narcotics.

Ask people to join the Reception Committee.

Send names and addresses of nationals of non-Indian countries resident in India. Invite them to join the Conference as Delegates or Members of the Reception Committee.

Send suggestions for carrying the Conference to success.

SOME FACTS ABOUT LIFE INSURANCE.

The Labour Age of New York, writing on Compulsory Unemployment State Insurance, rejects the alternative of Private Insurance Companies undertaking the function. It gives some figures relating to the inner working of Life Insurance Companies in America which show that a very large proportion of the premia paid go in high salaries and commissions. The bulk of the profits accrue from lapsed prematurely surrendered policies which the Labour Age estimates at two-thirds of the total number :

One more alternative to compulsory state unemployment insurance is offered the public and that is that private insurance companies can handle the situation better than state insurance plans. It was to be expected that private insurance companies would enter the lists against state unemployment insurance. They were opposed to workmen's compensation until forced to accept it by enlightened public opinion. They are today opposing old age pensions in those states where such legislation has not yet been adopted. They are vehemently opposed to unemployment insurance for the same reason—as a threat to profits which they see an opportunity of adding to their already overstuffed coffers.

The big question here is, not how much profit the private insurance companies can make for themselves but what it will cost the workers to get the insurance offered by them. In the first place, insurance companies have as yet no legal authority to expand their business to cover unemployment insurance. Only one State in the whole country gives them a legal right to embark upon such a venture, that State being Michigan. In the other 47 States they would first have to have enabling legislation passed before sending out their agents to garner in the additional dollars from the workers.

Secondly, the cost of selling such insurance would be so prohibitive that very few workers would be benefited by any such policies. We can get a good picture of what would happen if private insurance companies were turned loose selling unemployment insurance by noting how the holders of life insurance policies are now being fleeced.

Of the total new business done by insurance companies in 1928, for which $ 269,713,118.41 was collected in premiums, $ 114,848,777 or 42.5% was absorbed by commissions alone. In other words, for every dollar the insured pays in, nearly 50 cents goes to the agent getting the insurance. But that is only the beginning of the story. Out of the rest of the money must come all other insurance costs, not the least of which are the monstrously high salaries of the insurance companies' executives. During 1928, 19 persons in the Metropolitan Insurance Company drew a total of $ 919,000 in salaries; twelve executives in the New York Life Insurance Company received more than $ 600,000 for the same year. Equally fortunate were thirteen persons in the Prudential who were paid a total of $ 5,38,000. Ten persons in the Equitable Life Assurance Society found $ 387,961 in their annual pay envelopes. The Travelers paid to seven of its chosen officials $ 279,500 while six executives in the Mutual Life received $ 260,000. Adding up these six-cylinder salaries we find that with the addition of a few others not here mentioned, eighty high officials of the ten larger insurance companies received salaries in 1928 to make the noble total of $ 3,492,627. No wonder these executives with princely salaries would like to add unemployment insurance to the proceeds of their widespread and lucrative racket. They so badly need to raise their annual income a few notches.

POLICY HOLDER HOLDS BAG.

On the other hand, what do the poor policy holders get out of this business which is so exceptionally kind to the management on top? Here the story is not so swell, that is from the point of view of the fellow who is holding the bag. During the prosperous year of 1928, 22,454,695 ordinary policies were outstanding. Only 563,088 of these, amounting to $ 1,161,975,735, were terminated by death, maturity, expiry or disability. Of the remainder, 401,219 policies to the amount of $ 133,613,159 were surrendered for one reason or another. 764,733 policies amounting to $ 2,055,127 were permitted to lapse. So that in ordinary insurance two-thirds of the policies are either surrendered or lapsed in which the policy holder loses everything he ever paid in as premiums or gets only a part of what he was promised.

If this is the unpleasant and astonishing record of ordinary life insurance, the story of unemployment insurance managed by private insurance companies, would be infinitely more dismal. In a pinch the worker would let his unemployment insurance lapse long before he would cancel his life insurance.

Should the insurance companies sell unemployment insurance to industries instead of to individual workers, the result would in no wise be different and might possibly be worse. The same overhead costs would prevail; the same high premiums and the same enormous profits, instead of going to the benefit of the insured, would go into the pockets of the insurance companies, much of it to find its way into the pay envelopes of the highest executives. Industrial life insurance, taken out in group form by employers, has not been any too successful. Group unemployment insurance would be even less so. According to the New York Commission on Old Age Security. . . "Group insurance, which is an attempt by industry to take care of its workers, fills a very real need. But, like industrial pensions, only the most prosperous and best-managed corporations are likely to undertake it, and even they have restrictions which often bar the workers in irregular employments where income is lowest and protection most necessary. . . ."

The greater evil under group unemployment insurance would be that like insurance by plant scheme, the moment a worker found himself out of a job, removed from the payroll of the firm for which he was employed, he would immediately be minus any employment protection.

RECONVERSION AND MARRIAGE.

A Correspondent writes :

An interesting wedding took place at Khar on Friday, the 2nd instant. The bridegroom was Mr. Raghava Rao Sreshta, M. A., LL. B. (Cantab) of the Department of English, Lucknow University, who had the unique distinction of being the first Indian to be awarded the Chancellor's Gold Medal at Cambridge for the best composition in English verse, two of the previous recipients of the Medal having been Macaulay and Tennyson. The bride was Miss Tara Kaikini, daughter of Mr. B. V. Kaikini, a Saraswat Brahmin. Mr. Sreshta originally came of a highly respectable Roman Catholic family of Mangalore but, having been greatly fascinated by Hindu philosophy and culture with which he felt he had complete spiritual affinity, was readmitted by Shankaracharya of Sharada Pith in 1926 to the Saraswat Brahmin fold to which his ancestors had belonged before they were converted to Christianity by the Portuguese.

The marriage ceremony was performed strictly according to Vedic rites by Mr. Sundarrao Vaidya of the Hindu Mission Society. The event must be considered as a landmark in the history of Hindu society inasmuch as it has shown that it is no longer exclusive as it was once.

NEWS AND VIEWS.

Politician and World Teacher:—Prof. A. R. Wadia, president Indian Philosophical Congress, recently held at Dacca, dwelt upon the philosophy of Mr. Gandhi whom he characterised as a politician as well as a world teacher. He pointed out certain "inconsistencies between Gandhi the man and Gandhi the teacher" and said: Gandhiji's moral fervour and austerity evoke our dearest homage, but true morality must flourish not in the artificial atmosphere of studied simplicity, but in the busiest haunts of men. Genuine simplicity belongs to the heart, not to our mere physical environment. He has forgotten the long aeons that the spirit of man has taken to rise above its animal origin and create bit by bit that mighty fabric which we call civilisation. Philosophy and ethics did not take their birth in the caves of the cavemen or in the huts of savages. They awoke when man had conquered nature sufficiently to give him leisure to look around him and think. Hegel's great remark that the owl of Minerva takes its flight only when the shades of night are gathering, has a marked bearing on the philosophy of civilisation. It was not a mere accident but the truth of history that Indian philosophy was nurtured in the palaces of Kings Janaka and Ajatasatru and other Kshatriyas, though later it may have attained its full form in the Ashramas of ascetics. If the industrialism of the West is really wicked and soulless, it will not do for India to turn her back upon it but she must spiritualise it and this will be the test of her spirituality. This is what many in the West look eastwards for. Spirituality is not nihilism, it has to spiritualise the most recalcitrant material."

H. E. the Viceroy in Calcutta:—H. E. the Viceroy, on the 27th December, paid incognito visits to various poorer quarters of the City, with a view to gain first-hand knowledge of the conditions prevailing there. Mr. Swan, Chairman of the Calcutta Improvement Trust and Sir Charles Tegart, Commissioner of Police, accompanied His Excellency, who visited the Mahomedan quarters of Iqbalpur, Anglo-Indian quarters near the Bow Bazar Police Station, Ultedinghi Basti and Entally. His Excellency several times left the car to walk through the narrow lanes and to see something of the actual housing conditions of the people, who drew His Excellency's attentions to the various defects in their houses and spoke strongly upon the unhealthy nature of the surroundings.

Bombay Depressed Classes Meeting:—A correspondent writes: A public meeting of the members of the depressed Classes was held on Sunday the 21st December at 9 p. m. at Bharichi Chawls behind David Sassoon Mills under the presidentship of Mr. R. S. Nkaljay, J. P., ex. M. L. C. and Municipal Corporator, Bombay. Amongst the speakers were Messrs. M. N. Kandalkar, K. B. Javle, Head Masters Municipal School, N. L. Gangawne, O. B. Kairmode, B. A., T. M. Nevrikar and others. The following resolutions were passed unanimously:—(1) That this meeting thanks Messrs. Dagdeo Darekar, Sakaram Satwaji Sarvagod Yelvikar, Shirpatrao Londker for their donation of Rupees one hundred each towards the building fund of the proposed hostel for depressed classes children (Mahars) at Satara. (2) This meeting congratulates Rao Bahadur M. O. Raja, M. L. A., on his nomination to the Legislative Assembly. (3) This meeting of the members of the depressed classes have learnt with great satisfaction the announcement that Lord Willingdon is to succeed Lord Irwin, one of the greatest Viceroy India has ever seen, and trust that Lord Willingdon during his regime will make the cause of the Depressed Classes of India as his own and take measures necessary to help them to take a larger share in the political life of the country. (4) This meeting of the members of the Depressed Classes have learnt with deep regret the sad deaths of late Messrs. Bayaji Babaji Khairmode and Martand Sambhaji Chowra.

Father of Persian Nationalism:—Aga Moidul Islam Jalaluddin-ul-Hossaini, the editor of the "Hablu Matin" and the father of Persian nationalism passed away at his residence in Calcutta on the 15th December last after a brief illness of heart complaint. There is hardly any person acquainted with Eastern politics who has not heard of the "Hablu Matin" and its learned editor, says the Bihar Herald. His Eminence was born in 1285 A.H. He came of a distinguished family of Mujrahids of Persia. He received his early education in Kashan and then proceeded to Ispahan for higher studies. From Ispahan he went to Mesopotamia to receive his final instruction under Hajee Mohammed Hussain Shirasi, the chief of the learned men of the Shiah sect who became famous later on in connection with the question of the Tobacco Monopoly in Persia. After completing his studies he turned his attention to politics and to the amelioration of the condition of Muslims. He lived for sometime at Bander Abbas interchanging views with the great Jamaluddin Afghani and there they laid the foundation of Pan-Islamism. He arrived in India in 1868 A. D. and travelled throughout India Burma, Java and Singapore eventually settling in Calcutta. In 1311 A. H.

His Eminence established his famous journal the "Hablu Matin." From that very day a political revolution commenced in Persia, Turkey, Muslim Russia and other Islamic countries. Being a foreigner he never took any direct part in Indian politics but he always advocated fearlessly the cause of his country. He was strongly opposed to the Kajar tyranny. He inspired the movement for constitutional freedom which is the cause of modern Persian Progress. He had many-sided activities. One of his great missions was to bring about the federation of Islamic brotherhood. A representative of the best modern culture, his death has removed a strong bond of union between Persia and India. The Muslim world is certainly poorer today. He leaves behind five daughters and one son. Two of his sons-in-law are District and Sessions judges, one being Mr. Mir Amiruddin, District and Sessions Judge Anantapur (Madras Presidency) and the other Mr. T. I. N. Nurannabi Chaudhuri I. C. S. District and Sessions Judge Barisal (Bengal). His third son-in-law is Mr. K. Nasiruddin I. S. E. Executive Engineer, Bezvada (Madras Presidency). He was a great advocate of women's advancement and higher education. His three daughters are Hons. graduates and M. As. His fourth daughter is a student in the B. A. class and she, the only son, and the youngest daughter are minors.

The Kanchi Prohibition Association:—In his report of the work of the Kanchi Prohibition Association for the year 1930 the Secretary of the Association gives the following important facts: The strength of membership which was 143 last year has fallen to 53 owing the annual membership fee having been raised from annas 4 to Re. one, but this fall is considered as not of much importance, because the propaganda against drink has only just begun, and as people come to know more and more of the benefits of prohibition, the Association will gain in strength and will be able to reduce the membership fee. All classes and communities of people have shown interest in the work of the Association and there were in its Executive Committee Brahmans, Non-Brahmans, Mahomedans and Christians. The work is carried on in various ways. Journals, books, leaflets supplying information on the subject of Prohibition have been largely circulated. Public meetings have often been held in different places exhorting the masses to abstain from drink. Official co-operation has also been sought and the Association has received a grant of Rs. 450 from the Central Propaganda Board. The Association sent a memorial to the Excise Commissioner urging the abolition of certain toddy shops in a particular area as an experiment towards a "dry area", but though the Commissioner was in favour of trying the experiment, it could not be carried out owing to the adverse vote of a majority of the Local Excise Licensing Board. However, as a result of the propaganda carried on by the Association bidding at the last toddy sales in the town have appreciably decreased.

Cawnpore Women's Association:—The Cawnpore Women's Association held its third annual session on the 20th December, 1930, the Dowager Rani Saheba of Mandi presiding. Besides the office-bearers and members of the Association, a number of prominent visitors including the Rani Saheba of Mandi's sister, were present. In her presidential address the Rani Saheba of Mandi congratulated the ladies of Cawnpore on the successful and progressive manner in which the Association is being run. She, however, emphasized the necessity for more practical work. Concluding, she expressed gratification at the nomination of Mrs. J. P. Srivastava to the Legislative Council. Resolutions recommending that the marriage age for boys and girls should be raised to 21 and 16 years respectively, urging the Cawnpore Municipality to make Primary Education free and compulsory for girls as well, urging the Government to prohibit by law a Hindu or a Mohammedan to remarry during the lifetime of his wife, recommending that every girl in school should be taught one such craft by which she may be able to earn her livelihood when necessary, and that with a view to secure the economic independence of women they should be given equal share in ancestral property and every office under the Government should be thrown open to them.

Friends' International Centre at Vienna:—The Society of Friends have opened an International Centre at Vienna for visitors. It has a small Hostel for the accommodation of Friends and other guests interested in the work of the Society, or in other religious, international, or social activities or in the study of Austrian conditions. Meetings for worship are held on Sundays at 10-30 a. m., and the Vienna Adult School (in English) on Saturdays at 6 p. m. Lectures upon International or Quaker subjects, or Young People's Clubs, are held on every week-day evening with the exception of the Summer holiday months.

The Bank of India Limited.—The Profit of the Bank of India Limited for the year ended 31st December 1930 including the sum of Rs. 4,30,957-12-6 brought forward amounts to Rs. 20,29,021-14-5. Provision for Income Tax and Super Tax for the current year will absorb Rs. 1,25,000-0-0. The payment of an ad-interim dividend at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum made on 30th June 1930 absorbed Rs. 5,00,000-0-0. The balance now available for distribution is Rs. 14,04,021-14-5. The Directors propose to pay a final dividend for the half year ended 31st December 1930 at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum free of Income Tax Rs. 5,00,000-0-0. To place to Bank's Property A/C Rs. 1,00,000-0-0. To place to the Bank's Reserve Fund Rs. 2,00,000-0-0. To place to Reserve for Contingencies Rs. 1,00,000-0-0, and To carry forward the balance subject to the payment of Bonus to the Staff Rs. 5,04,021-14-5.

Miss K. Natarajan.—Mrs. K. Natarajan, who was sentenced to two months' imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 50 by the Fourth Presidency Magistrate on November 7, for being a member of the Desh Sevika Sangh which has been declared to be an unlawful body, was released from Arthur Road Prison on Tuesday, the fine having been paid.

Mr. Vithalbai Patel.—Mr. Vithalbai Patel, ex-President of the Legislative Assembly, was released from Coimbatore Jail on Wednesday. The Government of India have issued the following communique:—Subsequent to the issue of the Press communique of December 25, the Government of India received a report regarding the health of Mr. V. J. Patel which was less favourable than those which were before them when the communique was issued. In the circumstances, and, in order to enable Mr. Patel to obtain such medical advice and treatment as he may desire, the Government of India, in consultation with the Madras Government and the Chief Commissioner of Delhi, have remitted the unexpired portion of the sentence he is undergoing.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

"A Few Imprisonments and A Few Lathi Blows":—Mr. Srinivasa Sastry is a careful speaker and it is surprising if Reuter is correct that he should speak of "a few imprisonments and a few lathi blows" as the trifling cost at which India is about to achieve what Ireland did by "those methods with which they were unhappily too familiar." It is an understatement amounting to misstatement to speak of thirty-thousand as "a few" imprisonments and Mr. Sastry's "few" lathi blows is an inexcusable euphemism for the numerous acts of the Police which have called forth lurid accounts from British and foreign journalists, not to mention publicists nearer home. When Mr. Sastry's grossly inexact statements were being applauded at Edinburgh, the Manchester Guardian was calling attention to Mr. Brailsford's denunciation of the Police methods in Gujarat in an article in the American weekly, the New Republic. "Practically nothing of this kind," the Guardian remarked "has been published in this country." We cannot blame the British Press when a prominent Indian like Mr. Sastry goes out of his way to minimise the terrible sufferings of the Indian people. It is sickening to have to comment on such insensibility on the part of Indians who are regarded as spokesmen of their people in England. The patient endurance of lathi blows is a greater strain on the nerves than death or even wounds by a sudden bullet, as those who have seen some lathi charges in Bombay know. If the Irish were shot down, they were not slow in retaliating, but the Indian non-violent satyagrahi denies himself the satisfaction, such as it is, of dealing blow for blow. It is a pity that Mr. Sastry does not appreciate the splendour of the achievement of his own people. We cannot see what purpose was intended to be served by this ridiculous travesty of facts.

The Round Table Conference:—Mr. Sastri implied that India was going to get what Ireland has. Is this true? The proceedings of the Round Table Conference do not hold out any such promise. Mr. Jinnah declared the other day in a Committee of the Conference that he is under no illusion that India was about to obtain Dominion status at the Conference. The dramatic entry of the Princes into the scheme of Federation, aroused misgivings in India which have not been dispelled by the conditions which they have put forward as the price of their co-operation. It is curious that the British Government should rely upon the Princes rather than upon His Majesty's British Indian subjects for the stability of the administration and the security of vested interests. In addition to the "safeguard" provided by the Princes, there are several others relating to Finance, Defence, Minorities and every conceivable and inconceivable contingency. In fact, the future constitution of India may be described as one of safeguards interspersed here and there with a few glimpses of liberty. The Round Table Conference is laboriously trying to balance a constitutional cone on its apex, namely, the Governor-General who is evidently expected to be a sort of superman. In practice, the Governor-General will mean either Secretary of State, if he is a masterful man, or the Private Secretary who will, of course, be a member of the Indian Civil Service and the guardian of its interests. The Hindu-Moslem problem, in these circumstances, is not likely to be solved in a way which will be equitable to both communities. It is almost certain that the Round Table Conference's proceedings will have to be revised if not completely recast in India before they can lead to definite conclusions on which a constitutional scheme can be securely founded. It is, therefore, premature for Mr. Sastry or any one else even to suggest that India is about to get self-government on the same lines as Ireland.

The Sholapur Executions:—The situation in Bombay on Friday is tense with excitement. The newspapers give only vague and indirect hints as to what may be expected, as publication of the programme of the local Congress organization has been decided to be assisting the Congress and, therefore, an offence. The Commissioner of Police has ceased to publish his usual ban on the ground, presumably, that it is superfluous. The Director of Information, however, issued a press note on Thursday in nearly the same terms. The occasion for the complete hartal is the execution of four persons in connection with the Sholapur outbreak. The evidence against three of these men did not satisfy the experienced Indian Judge of the High Court who sat with the Chief Justice to try the appeal of the condemned men. He wished therefore, to give them the benefit of the doubt and to acquit them. As there was a difference of opinion, the case was referred to a third Judge who concurred with the Chief Justice. An appeal was lodged in the Privy Council, which, however, failed. The Governor of Bombay was approached by public bodies to exercise his prerogative to commute, if not to cancel, the sentence, but he did not see his way to do so. The Viceroy was then flooded with resolutions and appeals from all over the country. All the four men were hanged on Monday morning in Yerravda Prison. We have seldom known such a large consensus of opinion as that which regards that the four men did not deserve the fate which has overtaken them. The demonstration on Friday seems to have been organised to give expression to this feeling. It appears to us that no principle would have been sacrificed if the Viceroy or the Governor had, in deference to a huge volume of public sentiment commuted the sentence into one for imprisonment. Although in strict logic, it has nothing to do with the political situation, such action on the part of the authorities would have been effective as a gesture and gone some way to create the atmosphere which everybody wishes to see created.

Treatment of Prisoners:—We print today the series of questions issued by the Committee appointed by the Social Service League. It is addressed primarily to released prisoners, but all who have reliable information relating to the treatment of prisoners in jails in the Bombay Presidency including Sind, can materially assist the Committee in its work. In particular, retired Jail officers can be of great service, as they know best the weaknesses of the system they had to administer. Lieutenant Colonel F. A. Barker, Inspector-General of Prisons in the Punjab, published last year through the Christian Literature Society an informing book entitled "Imprisonment" in which the evolution and working of the Indian system is explained and suggestions for improvement made. Colonel Barker, however, does not go into details. The rules for the administration of jails may be excellent, but how far are they carried out in practice? British officers at the head of departments seldom know what is actually being done in their departments. Retired Indian subordinates are the best persons to give information on this aspect of the subject. The Jhaveri Committee's questions are not confined to the treatment of political prisoners and, indeed, the Committee attaches comparatively less importance to this part of the subject than to the treatment of ordinary convicts. The Government of India have persistently refused to recognise any distinction between political and criminal offences. Persons sentenced for participating in the non-violent civil disobedience movement, have been placed in the same category as persons whose offences involved grave moral turpitude. Permanent improvement in the treatment even of political prisoners can, therefore, be brought about only through improvement of the lot of ordinary convicts. Our main source of information, however, has to be released political prisoners who have had opportunities of observing the general economy of jail life. The Committee has already received a considerable amount of valuable information from this source. While on this subject, we may say that some suggestions, which have been made in the columns of the Times of India, for improving the lot of political prisoners, touch only the fringe of the subject. What is wanted is a general humanising of the system.

British Champions of Indian Women:—We have received a copy of the Memorandum signed by sixteen British men and women and addressed to the Round Table Conference on "certain questions affecting the status and welfare of Indian women in the future constitution of India." There are only three names among the signatories which we are able to recognise as those of social workers in India. The connection of the rest with this country was official, casual or none at all. We are not sure that some of the signatories are in favour of the kind and measure of constitutional reform which would be acceptable to the people of this country, including women. They do not give a hint in their memorandum, if they know of it, of the part played by Indian women in the national movement, of the hundreds of them who are or have been in prison or otherwise subjected to hardships of one kind or another. They express no appreciation of that tremendous fact which really makes their intervention in the matter appear somewhat superfluous. Dr. Muthulakshmi's warm testimony to the way in which Indian men have assisted and supported her in her labours on behalf of women and children in the Madras Legislative Council, and her expression of complete confidence in their co-operation under a system of self-government, show that Indian women do not want extraneous help to get their rights recognised by their own countrymen. We are quite sure that the signatories were inspired by an excellent motive though, we cannot help thinking that their intervention is, somewhat misconceived. The suggestion of the memorandum that the women of India should be treated as a minority community requiring safeguards against the "majority community," is on the face of it ridiculous. We do not think that there will be much difficulty in the present state of Indian opinion for competent women to get elected to the Legislatures without any reservation. Of course, in the nature of things, we cannot expect a very considerable number to choose a political career. Even in England, where women are in the majority, they do not do so.

All-India Women's Educational Conference:—The Fifth Annual Session of the All-India Women's Educational Conference opened at Lahore on the 12th instant. Lady Abdul Quadir, Chairman of the Reception Committee though speaking from behind the purdah condemned the purdah system as an evil which should be got rid of. She urged upon the government the necessity of subsidising more women's educational institutions. Dr. Muthulakshmi, president of the conference stressing this point of lack of funds for women's education, in her address urged that all legislative bodies, district boards and Municipalities should demand funds for the furtherance of women's education. Detailing the programme of work for this year she said that the abolition of purdah, the enforcement of the Sarda Act and the improvement of the existing secondary schools for girls should be given the first place.

BOMBAY, JANUARY 17, 1931.

"BAPU GANDHI"*

We have had and are having books on and about Mahatma Gandhi by European and American writers. Mr. Justice Piddington is the first Australian to give his impressions of the Mahatma and his Movement. Mr. Piddington has no preconceived theory to maintain nor has Australia a direct interest in the political status of India. He writes as a disinterested observer with a general belief in the right of every people to govern itself. The central figure of his book is "Bapu Gandhi" but the portrait is painted with its proper background—first, Ahmedabad and next, the Ashram at Sabarmati. It is inevitable that a reference should be made to Miss Katherine Mayo's book but Mr. Piddington had the benefit of the opinion about it of one who was said to have helped Miss Mayo in writing the book. Miss Cornelia Sorabji, however, denied the rumour completely. Her own view of "Mother India" she neatly summed up in an epigram: "The facts are all right, but the focus is all wrong." Mr. Piddington did not see much of the cruelty to animals which Miss Mayo denounced in the streets of Ahmedabad, but he was struck by the cruelty to man evidenced by cripples begging for alms. On the other hand, two habits of Indians impressed the Australian Judge. These are the morning teeth-cleaning and the daily bath. "I do not know," he writes, "What Arhat or Swami or Yogi or Sanu (Sadhu?) or other inspired teacher launched this ritual which 350 millions of people follow, but it must have greatly contributed to the health of the race in such a climate as that of India, just as the hygienic regulations of Moses have given the Jews their tenacious physique, and as those of Mahomed have done the same service for Arabs and Moors and Turks." This sentence is typical of the writer's attitude of appreciative observation of the manners of people other than his own. Mr. Piddington waxes eloquent in praise of the Indian women's Sari. He writes:

"The sari, or single garment worn by women, is more often uniform in colour and is put on in graceful swathes, sometimes being shaped on the head into a hood, sometimes into a shallow turban, and sometimes leaving the smooth hair untouched. It can be arranged in all kinds of layers or pleads, sometimes leaving the back bare between waist and shoulders, sometimes the breasts covered and then nothing till the waist-line. But the beauty of the sari and the impeccable modesty with which it is worn make it one of the noblest of national costumes, and it is not surprising that when that high priestess of human grace, Madame Pavlova was in Calcutta she gave Indian women an earnest warning never to abandon their national dress for European fashion."

Of the wearers of the Sari, Mr. Piddington writes with equally frank admiration. He refers to the Indian women's "figure and grace of walking caryatides" and adds: "Indeed, the fancy often strikes one that, just as the caryatides of the classic buildings of Greece support the edifice of religion or of palatial pleasure, so the Indian woman as she walks is the support of the Indian home and the Indian family."

He visits Gandhi's Ashram, and the first thing that strikes him there is that "all is truly hygienic, not merely superficially and ritually correct." Enquiring what the proper way was of addressing Mahatma Gandhi he was told that he might call him Mahatma, Gandhiji or simple "Mr." but that they called him "Bapu" in the Ashram. "Bapu," he was told was something more than Father, something of love but also of pride and trust. The Mahatma would not have "dear Father" or "Father dear" as being too weak and feminine.

Many foreign writers have described Mahatmaji as of poor physique. Mr. Piddington's impression of him was quite the reverse. He writes:

"At Sabarmati this year (1930) he struck me as having the very essence of serviceable health. Though he is spare and was in light condition, his eye was bright, his fine, large and well-shaped head was poised in easy strength, and his arms, the only part of his body uncovered in the winter, had the fine silky skin of the finished athlete, underneath which was a sinewy strength and ductility of muscle equal, one would think, to a good deal of enduring work. If I had been inclined to regard him as an enemy to the Empire instead of, in the last analysis (that of spiritual kinship in governmental ideals), one of its friends, I should have felt as the Highlander sergeant did at St. Helena when he saw Napoleon land from the Bellerophon. 'They tellt me he was a sick man, but the man has twenty battles yet in his belly—damn him!'"

If you want to take the true measure of a man, some one has said, follow him across his threshold. Here is a pen picture of him at meals, which is one of the most felicitous of several in Mr. Piddington's sketch:

"Gandhi ate well, but did not speak during the meal, being absorbed in a newspaper which brought a stern and thoughtful look on his face. The men opposite me did not strike me as having anything very spiritual or happy in their appearance, but amongst the women there was far more life and mirth. They chattered, laughed, and ate, making in their bright saris and with their smoothly braided hair a pretty picture. I discovered presently that a good deal of the laughter was due to a dainty little blossom of about fifteen, who evidently had a touch of genius about her, for her companions craned their necks to catch the crisp little comments or stories or jests, whatever they were, which this born entertainer was pouring on with all the kinds of gesticulations and play of the delicate hands. Presently she caught me looking at her, and, answering with a charming half-smile, she brought her hands together in the respectful salaam used when thanking, and added a naive little bow like a young actress applauded during a speech.

Mr. Piddington seems to have felt that this enthusiastic verdict was not becoming in a Judge of the Supreme Court of Australia, and so he justifies it by reflecting that "one bright soul at least was being rescued from the hideous custom of child marriage." But really, however, child marriage has nothing to do with it. The fact is that the woman-soul has found itself in the cause national freedom which includes freedom from child marriage as well as freedom from thralldom to a political system which has been stunting the growth of the manhood and womanhood of India.

Mr. Piddington speaks feelingly of the appalling poverty of India. He is inclined to lay the blame for it not on the British Government but the customs of the Indian people. He writes:

"To bring about the deplorable state of human life in India the British Raj has done nothing. On the contrary, it has done and is doing much to abolish it. For one thing, famine has been banished by irrigation works and railway construction. But when the masses are miserable, the government, whatever it is, of the country is blamed. Thus the British Raj is held up to detestation for causes which are to be found in century-old customs of caste with its dominants and its subjects, of land-tenure with its subjection of the tillers of the soil, of early marriage, recklessness of procreation, of superstition which resists hygiene and modern medicine, of tribute paid to princes and above all to the Brahmin priesthood, and of obstinacy which clings to ancient tools."

In other words, if only the people of India were the people of Germany or Japan, or Australia the British Raj would have done wonders with them! As they happen to be none of these but only Indian natives, it cannot, notwithstanding its great talents and intentions, do much to raise the condition of the people from its incredible plight. "The cheapness of human life", observes Mr. Piddington, "and, therefore, of labour astonishes the Australian." The Australian maintains the high value of labour by rigorously restricting immigration and imports of goods. The Indian can do neither. That, however, is by the way. Mr. Piddington acknowledges, however, that Mahatma Gandhi is not insensible to the social drawbacks of Indians. "Gandhi", he writes, "though perhaps more saint than statesman, is no mere dreamer. The Mill-hands' Union in Ahmedabad is the only union with much industrial influence in India, and it is all Gandhi's creation. So, too, his Swadeshi campaign, if it cannot win through as an economic movement, refreshes national energy as well as reviving national feeling. Again, Gandhi has been a successful mediator in industrial troubles."

He says that Gandhi's work probes to the reality and heart of things with political self-government as with political violence, and he concludes with an earnest plea for Indian swaraj within rather than without the British Commonwealth. He writes:

"With Gandhi I avoided every political question, except that I told him the Australians as a self-governing people had much sympathy with Indians in their aim at Dominion status as soon as they were able to work with it. I added that from the broad point of view of humanity and its needs there was an immense value in the grouping under one government of the greatest possible number of consenting people, if only for this reason. While people are separated into wholly disconnected national entities, any topic of disagreement tends to be fought out to the bitter end—involving, finally, physical war—as a matter of patriotic pride. Such differences between countries separated as independent nations without any common allegiance may often be magnified and aided to until the breaking-point is reached, whereas, simultaneously with complete local freedom of action, the common nationhood of members of the British Commonwealth of Nations secures the adjustment of such differences by peaceful political action. I concluded that total separation of India might easily be a step to international dissension, and without international peace there can be no social or other advancement for any race or country."

Mahatma Gandhi eagerly assented that international peace was indispensable for every one. Mr. Piddington quotes Browning's profound observation: "A nation is but the attempt of many to rise to the completer life of one," and truly observes: "There is no man in India whom Indians could better take as their oriflamme. Aspiring to no mastery but only to service, and ignoring caste and social and religious severances, his thought is a slow but sure solvent of disunion and will ultimately effect the cohesion of All India in freedom, action and progress, as the British Raj has secured it in obedience to law and civil peace." We commend to our readers this little book of but 54 pages, as one of the most understanding and suggestive, by a broad-minded observer.

REVIVAL OF SWADESHI.

(BY VAIKUNT L. MEHTA.)

The question has been raised why there is so much insistence laid on the propagation of Swadeshi in India's struggle for self-realisation and why India's men and women should be called upon to refrain from purchasing articles, particularly cloth, even if they are cheaper than indigenous products.

The reply to this is simple. India was once industrially a great country and she wants to be industrially great again. Foreign domination, more than any other factor, has been responsible for having crushed India's world-famous industries; and then the import of cheap foreign goods, coming through the open door, gradually drove out of the field goods manufactured in India. To reconstruct the country's industries has become a most difficult problem in the face of world competition, especially when the government of the country, being alien, feel no serious concern about the matter, and having allowed exploitation by their own nation, are not averse to letting the country's economic needs be a free field for exploitation by all the industrially advanced nations of the world. If we had a national government, representative of and responsible to the people, it would certainly have taken steps to stop this exploitation; it would have protected the country's existing industries, and it would have actively encouraged new ones being set up. The present government is, however, not a national government and hence what the State fails to do the people must take in hand and achieve.

The State elsewhere encourages industries by protective duties, bounties, subsidies and other concessions. It is not in the power of the people of India to-day to extend to industries any of these forms of assistance by compelling the government of the country to take action. But there is one thing the people can do. The goods are there for being sold, they are manufactured in the country or imported from abroad for that purpose; and the purchasers of these goods are the people themselves. In our country, as in any other country, those whose interest in economic life is that of consumers only, form, by far, a larger section of the population than producers or those engaged in the distribution of goods. The consumers to-day are in our country unorganised. We now wish them to be organised and thus seek to achieve what the government of the country have failed to do. They must protect the country's industries by exclusively confining their patronage to its products either by refraining from buying foreign goods or by giving a decided preference to indigenous articles over imported ones. If they do this, they will surely succeed by bringing to bear on trade and industry the force of organised opinion among the consuming classes and they will thus help to supply, to some extent, the place of State action in the economic life of our country.

Why is it that cloth is being selected, above all things, for being boycotted and why is trade in foreign cloth deemed harmful to the economic interests of the country? The reasons are not far to seek. After food and shelter, clothing is the most urgent need of mankind all over the world. The demand for cloth is universal and from the earliest times the demand has, so far as possible, been met from local sources. India is fortunately most favourably situated in regard to the production of cloth, especially the kind of cloth usually required in the tropics. India is one of the largest growers of cotton in the world and labour is available in plenty. Not only is labour available, but the labour is of a skilled type, trained by tradition in the manufacture of cloth out of cotton. Cloth textiles were, till a century ago, one of the most flourishing industries in the country and India's cloth fabrics were noted for their fineness, durability and other qualities throughout the world. In spite of the damage caused to this once flourishing industry by the deliberate attempt at its suppression on the part of the British a century ago, and despite the handicap of having now to face world competition, the cotton textile industry, in all its forms, continues to be the leading industry in India to-day. It may, however, succumb in the intensified competitive struggle of modern economic life, unless it continues to enjoy the unstinted support and patronage of the consumer of India. And, moreover, despite the favourable conditions for the development of the industry, under the operation of economic forces its ramifications cannot be extended unless the unorganised body of consumers organize at least to refrain from buying foreign cloth, however cheap and attractive and abstain from the use of such varieties of cloth as are not produced in India.

All over India, there is a very insistent urge for the improvement of the economic condition of the masses of the population. The bulk of these are dependent upon agriculture for their livelihood more helplessly than their forefathers ever were, because in days gone by there were other pursuits upon which men and women could fall back and industries absorbed the surplus population of the land. Most of these industries have gone, ruined by the neglect of an alien government,—which was ever indifferent to the permanent economic welfare of the country—while processes of production have been mechanized and, as a result, the pressure of population of the land has increased. For the last thirty years, if not more, our national leaders have been repeatedly and pointedly drawing the attention of the government of the country to the urgent need for the industrial regeneration of the country, with a view to the absorption in industries of the labour which cannot find remunerative employment in the land. Thanks to the enterprise of the pioneer industrialists of this great city, we have in our midst the beginnings of the revival of our ancient cotton textile industry. The cotton textile industry is, according to all canons of economic theory, the most suited for development in this country. It is an industry which serves primary and essential human need, and if still its revival fails to come off there can be only poor prospects for other organised industries to thrive. And if our efforts at developing these and other suitable industries do not succeed because of the lack of public support and patronage, then the country's national industry, namely, agriculture must itself suffer. That industry can hardly flourish if on it is thrown the burden of supporting a growing population and if no suitable remunerative occupations are available in rural areas to engage surplus labour on the land. It was no false sentiment, no wave of emotion that led Mahatma Gandhi to adopt hand-spinning and hand-weaving as the universal cottage industry for this country, it was his acceptance and shrewd appreciation of hard economic facts, the same which should induce all lovers of India.

To use khadi preferably as being the purest indigenous product and as providing in the process of manufacture local employment in rural areas.

Failing khadi, to buy and to use pure Indian cloth made of Indian yarn and woven in Indian mills or on hand looms.

And, lastly, to refrain from the purchase of non-Indian cloth and to abstain from the use of foreign cloth until such time as India comes into her own and has power to reorganise her industries and to reconstruct her economic life in accordance with her own peculiar needs and conditions.

THE TRAGEDY OF SECTION 68.

ACT XV OF 1872.

( BY MR. KOPARGAM RAMAMURTI. )

It was in 1871, as mentioned in the "Reformer" of last week, that the Honourable the High Court of Judicature at Madras, impelled by an irresistible sense of rightly interpreting the scope of the Indian Christian Marriage Act, first condescended to dig a grave for the non-Christian priest who offended the protagonists of Christian monopoly in India by exercising his own religious rights and performing a non-Christian marriage for a Christian with non-Christian ceremonial. It was evidently not enough that Christian Ministers and Marriage Registrars should be licensed to encroach with impunity upon domains expressly prohibited by Hindu law or comprised within the peculiar jurisdiction of Islamic law from time immemorial. The new-fangled law borrowed from the west and framed afresh in this country in 1865 professedly for the regulation of Christian marriages, and therefore without consulting non-Christian interests or susceptibilities, must needs be interpreted to have been empowered also to deal out practical death to non-Christian priests operating according to their lights within the ambit of their own religious law.

The grave thus dug for the luckless priest alone in 1871 was subsequently enlarged with the help of the "Abetment" section of the Indian Penal Code by successive decisions of the same High Court so as to accommodate the married couple also and all their sympathising friends and relations. In 1916, a Full Bench of the same Honourable Court assembled and sat at special request to review the handiwork of all the previous Division Benches, but found no difficulty in pronouncing it to be quite good. The judgment as reported does not disclose that the court strove to answer or bore in mind the reasoning earnestly put forth in the Order of Reference in favour of the contrary view. Of the three learned judges who composed this Bench, two have left absolutely no public record of the workings of their mind, not even to the extent of barely indicating that they concurred with the pronouncement of the Honourable the then Chief Justice who alone delivered his opinion on behalf of the whole Bench. But a Full Bench decision so-called in the authorized Reports of Madras is none the less a Full Bench decision binding on all the Sessions Courts and Magistrates throughout the Madras Presidency, whatever may be thought or said about its authority or logic by Honourable High Court Judges in other Provinces.

It is a sad reflection on the patriotic foresight, citizenly solicitude, humanitarian zeal and vigilant public spirit of the highly intellectual high-caste people, Brahman, Non-Brahman and Muhammedan, contending for office and power in this Presidency, that this unfortunate course of judge-made law and "indirect piece of Legislation by Reference" should have been allowed to hold sway without a single protest for a period of sixty years, even down to the end of the year of grace 1930 as evidenced by the recent Ellore case, to confound and ruin from time to time whole families of the Depressed Classes who by their wretched poverty, ignorance and neglected social condition are most exposed to religious exploitation, enslavement and persecution. It is unfortunate also that at this juncture in our history the infant Church of the native Christ in India is not yet fully in charge of its own affairs, and its internal and external policies are practically beyond its control and direction. And endeavours therefore that may be necessary to make in order to safeguard the communities victimised by section 68, will have to be shouldered exclusively by the leaders of those communities themselves, unencouraged by any generous gesture of voluntary self-restraint or fraternal sympathy from their Christian brethren.

But before any plan of action can be chalked out in the matter to retrieve the law from its present intolerable position, it is perhaps necessary to make clear one or two points which seem to puzzle even well-meaning friends by their obscurity. When we talk of a Hindu marriage being performed between a Hindu and a Christian, and a Moslem marriage between a Moslem and a Christian, one is apt to conclude that the two kinds of marriages stand on an analogous footing and carry the same implications of fact and law. It is but right to know and remember that they do not.

Under the Moslem law it is quite legitimate for a Moslem to wed a Christian without the latter renouncing Christianity or being thought to lose the Christian status on that account. So when a Moslem weds a Christian with due Moslem formalities it can be rightly presumed that the latter is still a Christian and that no attempt was at all made at conversion before the marriage nor was it intended or believed that the marriage ceremonial itself would effect such conversion. To solemnize such a mixed marriage is the immemorial Islamic right of a Moslem priest or Qazi. To hold that by such solemnization the Qazi makes himself liable to be punished as a criminal under section 68 of the Indian Christian Marriage Act is therefore tantamount to asserting or assuming that the British legislators in India who were solely responsible for passing the Act in 1865 and again in 1872 had silently revoked without notice the solemn assurance of religious neutrality previously given by the British Government to the non-Christian peoples of this land, an assumption which no High Court would be justified in making without positive proof, when attempting to interpret the meaning of a Government statute. Yet this is exactly what has been done in the High Court decisions. Mr. Justice Sadasiva Aiyar drew pointed attention to this anomalous position in his Referring Order in 40 Madras. But the Full Bench has solemnly ignored the argument, and it is unquestionably true, as Mr. Paul Appasami claims in his book on Christian Law, that the Qazi is liable to be convicted under Section 68 as authoritatively interpreted in this Presidency. No such case has apparently gone up yet before the High Court, judging from available reports. The records of Criminal Sessions in the mofussil must be searched therefore to see how many Qazis and their so-called "abettors" have fallen victims to this self-stultifying British Law.

A Hindu marriage, however, between a Hindu and a Christian stands entirely on a different footing. In fact, there can be no marriage at all between a Hindu and a Christian as such. And there is no Hindu priest or layman so ignorant, so unconventional or so impious as to seek to bring about such marriage with Hindu ritual. In not a single case that has been decided by the High Court of Madras under section 68 has this important and vital fact been given its proper weight or even a passing thought in judging what it was that really happened.

It would be unthinkable and presumptuous, if not criminal, for any one however learned, wise or high in the kingdom to doubt the wisdom or correctness or propriety of a learned High Court judgment. But it may be hoped that it is permissible to the least of us to state fearlessly and humbly where the shoe pinches, to put ourselves, as it were, into the skin of the Toad under the harrow and croak out its anguished feelings without being guilty of blasphemy or irreverence. From this point of view therefore one must most respectfully take leave to declare frankly that the Honourable the High Court of Judicature at Madras has not done justice either to itself or to the non-Christian people entrusted to its care, in its administration of section 68 of the Indian Christian Marriage Act during the past sixty years.

To catch hold of a poor unfriended Pariah man for the kindly fault of welcoming back into his Hindu fold through the sacred portals of marriage, without heeding the threats and warnings of the local Padre, a Christian kinsman long lost to the parent community by Missionary machinations; to allege and start with the presumption that he did intend and carry out deliberately a mixed marriage with Hindu ritual disregarding every customary, legal and religious interdict and all ingrained personal prejudices to the contrary; to drag him through the terrors of a tremendous criminal prosecution through two courts, the committing court and the sessions, far away from his native village and normal fields of livelihood, with the prospects of transportation or long term imprisonment looming before him; to throw on him in effect, though not in legal theory, the burden of proving the absence of guilt and rescuing himself from the powerful clutches of a foreign law which his forefathers were assured to have been concocted only for other people and other purposes; to take advantage practically of his inability to analyse and explain with scientific precision the psychological processes of his mind in regard to religious "conversion" or advance subtle arguments about criminal "knowledge"; to quash successively the acquittals made by conscientious English Sessions Judges who invariably repudiated from the very first case, the jurisdiction of a Christian law over non-Christian Marriages, reject each new reasoning of theirs as unsound but taking no trouble to find sound reasons for their just conclusion; and in the end to convict the wretched man and ruin him for life, branding him as a criminal and making him a prisoner:—such has been the course of British justice in the Madras Presidency, from the sufferer's point of view, and it should not have been persisted in so long by any court of Equity, even though a learned Brahman Crown Prosecutor may have urged it or an eminent Brahman Judge thought it reasonable, nay, not even if the precious principle at stake be nothing less than the vindication of the irresistible majesty of the Christian law. (6 M. H. C. R. App. XX; 17 M. 391; 20 M. 12.).

If it is pretended by the prosecutors that it is only the performance of mixed marriages invalid under Hindu law that is sought to be prevented by this cruel procedure in order to guard against the worse evils of illegitimacy, such a plea but ill becomes a criminal law which does not take trouble to penalise even avowed concubinage or professional immorality. And it comes with especial bad grace from a Christian law and an administration of justice which fails to bring to book, even departmentally, the Christian Marriage Registrars appointed under Act XV of 1872 who infringe daily the well-known Hindu law ban against mixed marriages in spite of the clear warning embodied in section 88 of the same Act and in culpable disregard of the duty clearly laid on such Registrars by that Act to satisfy themselves beforehand that there is no legal impediment of any sort whatsoever to any of the Marriages which they solemnize. (Vide 1909 Probate 67; 33 M. L. J. 113.)

The fact is that these prosecutions are nothing more nor less than modern manifestations of the medieval instinct for religious persecution and reprisal still lurking within the pious breast of Christian imperialism in enslaved India. Being, however, obliged to hide its notorious features amid the glare of twentieth century civilization, it is thankful to seize upon and assume self-righteously the mask of decent legal form accidentally provided for it by the unconscious agency of our High Court in Madras. The Honourable High Court, on its part, having, unfortunately for the people under its administration, slipped without argument into a grave but unsuspected error of judgment in 1871, has solemnly and stolidly and with eyes riveted faithfully backwards on the same unhappy course through thick and thin, without caring to look round and see the effects of its disastrous march upon the living human organisms growing along its path, and paying no heed to the note of alarm earnestly sounded by Mr. Justice Napier through his Referring Order in 1916 that "the question raised is of serious importance in view of the large number of Christians among the lower castes."

TREATMENT OF PRISONERS IN BOMBAY JAILS.

The following is a list of questions issued by the committee appointed by the Social Service League, Bombay, to investigate into the complaints of released prisoners and to suggest reforms in the jail rules:

(1) Name, age, sex, place of residence, education, occupation before conviction.

(2) Offence for which you were convicted, date of conviction, and date of release.

(3) Which jail or jails were you confined in during the period of your sentence; rigorous or simple.

(4) How were you classified—A, B, or C., by the Government?

Were jail rules explained to you?

(5) Were you in a cell or a barrack? If in a cell, alone or with other prisoners; their number, ventilation, arrangements for the privy, bathing and washing clothes; pots and furniture given to you.

(6) Did you take the ordinary jail diet or any special diet or your own diet?—If the former, its quality and quantity. Have you any complaints regarding the sufficiency or the nature of food given to you?

(7) Have you any complaints as regards the clothes supplied to you? Were they sufficient? Give details.

(8) What were you given for bedding and what was its condition?

(9) Nature of the task you were given—your classification for work—good, hard or medium or otherwise.

(10) Have you any complaints to make about the interviews and correspondence you were permitted to have? Give details.

(11) Did you fall ill? What was the nature of your complaint? Were you admitted to hospital? If so, for how long? What was the diet and treatment given to you?

(12) Did you receive any jail punishments? If so, under what circumstances? Give details.

(13) Were you allowed any facilities for exercise or recreation?

(14) Were you allowed to receive books and writing materials? Have you any complaints to make about these?

(15) Were you allowed any newspapers and periodicals? If so which? Were you allowed any books? If so, have you to suggest anything in this respect?

(16) What was your experience of the treatment by convict warders, jail officers and jail visitors?

(17) What facilities, if any, were given to you for religious observations?

(18) General remarks.

(19) What reforms will you suggest?

MEMBERS OF COMMITTEE.

The following are the members of the Committee:

Dewan Bahadur K. M. Jhaveri, M.A., LL.B., Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt., Mr. K. Natarajan, Mr. B. G. Kher, Solicitor; Mr. Syed Munawar, B. A., M. L. C., J. P.; Mr. P. G. Naik and Mr. G. N. Sahasrabudhe, Secretary.

The first Indian Bishop:—The Catholic Leader writes: "The Indian Social Reformer is mistaken in the statement that the "Church of England in India was the first to appoint an Indian to its episcopate." It was the Catholic Church that took the initiative in the appointment of Indian Bishops. Already in the year 1896, the Holy See nominated three Indian Bishops in Malabar. The Church of England followed the example of Rome much later. It was only about 20 years ago that an Indian Anglican Bishop was appointed. It has always been the policy of the Catholic Church to give every nation Bishops of their own and this policy is being followed in India also as far as conditions permit." On the same point, the Examiner writes:—"The first 3 Indian Bishops—and they were real bishops—were appointed by Pope Leo XIII in 1896; the Anglican Bishop of Dornikal was not appointed until 1912. The Anglicans have just chosen a second Indian to be Assistant Bishop of Lahore, while in the Catholic Hierarchy at present there are ten Indians exercising episcopal functions."

GREATER INDIA.

BY B. V. RAMACHANDRA RAO, M.A.

The cessation of the publication of the Mysore University Magazine, which is notified, is a distinct loss to Indian periodical literature. The following interesting article on Greater India appears in the current number :

The earliest chapter of the accredited history of Greater India may begin with her contact with Egypt, the starting point of European historians. The valley of the Nile was well-known to the ancient Hindu colonists and traders. The Puranas show the earliest knowledge of the sources of the Nile, centuries before Captain Bruce re-discovered the same; the Puranas are said to have even served as a guide for the same Captain. The river was known to the Hindus as Nila, Kali, and Krishna. According to them "the celebrated and holy river takes rise from the Lake Amara, in the holy land of Somagiri." To-day the natives call the Lake Victoria Nyanza by the name of "Amara" or divine, and the adjacent mountain as the "Mount Moon" or Somagiri. Lassen, the great Orientalist, wrote that the mummies of Egypt were wrapped in Indian muslin dyed in Indian indigo. It is the spiritual leaven of Aryanism that is worthy of remembrance. About 1377 B. C. Amenhatop III of Egypt married the sister of Dasaratha, an Aryan king of Asia Minor. His son and successor Amenhatop IV introduced into Egypt the worship of the glorious Sun God, Ra, (Skt.—Ravi) in preference to "the monstrous animal worship" of old. Some scholars opine that the gods, Ises and Osiris are evidently variations of the Indian Iswara. Their infant deity, Horus, who seems but an echo of Ilari, is also seated in lotus. But other authorities doubt this view. Indian figures are found carved in the ruins of Memphis, indicating the existence of Hindu colonists, in the opinion of Sir C. Elliot. The author of the Periplus and the geographer Ptolemy confirm the existence of Indian colonies contemporaneously. Mysore will be glad to learn that a Kannada sentence has been found in a Greek drama of the second century A. D. It runs thus: "Btre koncha madhu patrakhe kakt." Egyptian tradition also believed that they owed their culture to "the wise men of the East." Who were they, unless it were Indians?

As already noted, Asia Minor was a "half-way house," for the Aryan culture. As early as 1746 B. C. the Aryan chiefs of Asia Minor swore allegiance to the Vedic Gods Surya, Indra, Varuna, etc. Three centuries later, the daughter of an Aryan king took with her to Egypt the Sun worship. The Harappa discoveries confirm beyond all doubt intimate contact between the Indus and Tigris valleys.

Greece, that proud mother of European culture, was not unconnected with Eastern civilisation. In the markets of Iona were exchanged spiritual as well as commercial products of the then known world. Pythagoras of 500 B. C., and his followers Appollinus and Plotinus (second century A. D.) looked up to India as the home of wisdom. The culture of Greece was founded upon an early Aegean civilisation which is said to have been "steeped in Eastern culture." The "Mysteries" of Greece could not but be the distant waves of Indian philosophy and religion.

NOTE—The writer is greatly indebted to the writings of Sir C. Elliot, Prof. G. N. Bannerjee, Prof. J. Sarkar, Dr. S. K. Aiyengar and others.

Later, the Sermon on the Mount and the asceticism and monasticism of the early Christian monks could not be explained without reference to the wandering priests of Buddhism.

Modern Afghanistan was once a "home province" and a radiating centre of Indo-Aryan ideas. She was ruled by Kshatriya kings till the eleventh century of the Christian era. Buddhism and Saivism were found to be flourishing therein by Yuau Chwang (C. 640 A. D.). At Bamian in the western border of Afghanistan is to be seen even to-day a standing figure of the Sakyamuni 170 ft. high, carved out of solid rock. The hill near Kabul was the peaceful abode of Siva. (Kapardhi-Siva). The name Iran of Persia is only another form of Aryana. The Hindukush means "Hindu-killer," signifying the fatal experience of the Indian caravans.

The plains of Central Asia were at one time the truer northern province of the Greater Aryavarta. It could be easily identified with the Uttara Kuru of Indian geographers. Here was truly the beehive of humanity. From here did flow waves after waves of invaders, flooding the three continents of the old world. For us its importance lies in its being another "half-way house" for the culture-trader of India on his way to China and Tibet. These burning sands of Turkistan have preserved for us our earliest Sanskrit manuscripts of second century A. D. and faithful reproductions of the arts of Ajanta and Karla. Rawak Stupa in the eastern border has kept in good preservation the statues of Hindu-Buddhist Gods, while the halls of Dandin Uiliq transport the visitor to the scenes of Ajanta caves. Of the galaxy of scholars who preserved and propagated the Aryan ideals, it is our duty to remember at least the names of Kasyapa, the apostle of Buddhism (C. 60 A. D.) Kumarajiva (C. 383 A. D.), a living encyclopædia of learning and Budhagupta the itinerant scholar (C. 500 A. D.).

China came under the spell of India as early as the third century B. C. when she saw Brahminism and Buddhism in the Tarim Basin (C. 200 B. C.). She has been indebted to India for books and scholars. It is computed that no less than 1,467 Indian books are found translated into Chinese. To interpret those Indian classics, China was constantly receiving Indian scholars such as Kasyapa, Katanga, Kumarajiva and Budhagupta. Bodhidharma the twenty-eighth Patriarch of Buddhism transferred his spiritual capital from India to China in 528 A. D. Vajrabodhi and Amogha went to revive the religion of the Buddha again about 720 A. D. A Sanskrit dictionary has been compiled for the use of scholars and many more Sanskrit manuscripts are found in the cells of many a monastery, awaiting to be deciphered by the renascent India.

Korea became Buddhist in 380 A. D. and Japan followed suit in about 500 A. D. Sanskrit texts in Bengali characters abound in the monasteries of Japan. These verses are used, without understanding, as charms to avert evil and also dedicated to Gods. Thus all Far East looks upon India as their Holy Land. May she be worthy of it!

Most interesting for us is the pantheon of Gods in Tibet. Here the Buddha wields in his hands the thunder-bolt of Indra. The blue-necked Mahakāla (Siva—Nilakantha) is found standing on Ganesh, while Brahma is here riding on a white horse, like the expected Kalki avatar of Vishnu (Hayagriva—Horse-necked) and Tara (Sri) remind us of the great influence of Hinduism on Tibetan religion.

Burma was the "suvarnabhumi" of the Hindus. According to tradition, Abhiraja, a prince of Benares, is said to have founded the first kingdom between 600-800 B. C. Of course, Asoka's missionaries brought over Buddhism to this country. But ancient Burma seems to have been influenced most by colonists from the Kadamba country (Mysore), since the Pali script and architecture bear close resemblance to those found in Kadamba kingdom. Numerous Sanskrit inscriptions and Vishnuite temples were discovered in Pegu. Lower Burma or Pegu was known as Kidāram in Tamil, and formed a part of the oversea empire of the great Chola emperor. A tower of victory still commemorates the maritime power of the Tamilian emperor.

But it is the civil law or Dharma-thats of Burma that shows the completeness of Indian conquest. The codes of Manu and Narada have been adopted wholesale, excepting their religious aspect. One of their law-givers has been known as Manuraja. Burma is a LAND of Pagodas, betraying Nepalese origin for their ancient prototypes. The Shewe Dagon (C. 1050-1200 A. D.) is said to be taller than even St. Paul's Cathedral, the pride of London. "A veritable pyramid of gold" is Shewe Dagon. At Pegu is to be seen a standing figure of Buddha, 90 ft. high, another in a recumbent posture, 180 ft. long.

Siam derives its name from syam—"black." But the natives call themselves "Thai" or "freemen." The history of Siam is summed up in her three successive capitals,—Sukhothai, Aynthia and Bangkok. Sukhothai, a variant of Sāketa (Rama's capital) was evidently first founded by a prince of Kosala. Rāmarāja is the earliest known prince of this ancient city. He seems to have been a Buddhist. He prides in having invented an alphabet for his people. Another prince, Suryavamsi Rama (1361?) invited monks from Ceylon and erected images of Mahesvara, Vishnu and Buddha.

(To be concluded).

MUSLIM SUPPORT TO JOINT ELECTORATES.

BENGAL MOSLEM WOMEN'S ASSOCIATION.

A report in "The Amrit Bazaar Patrika" states: The following letter of Mrs. Sofia Khatun and 80 other Moslem ladies of the Bengal Women's Association to the President of the Town Hall meeting held on 3rd instant will be read with interest. Translated from Bengali into English the letter runs thus:—"At a moment when the fight for freedom has reached its most intense stage in the country, the communal wrangles at the Round Table Conference have assumed such an ugly proportion that we from the seclusion of the home feel it our bounden duty to raise our voice of protest against it and draw the attention of the male members of the community to the necessity for giving up all communal demands and join hands with the Hindu brethren in presenting a united front to the Britishers. Let us spare ourselves the humiliation of seeking favoured treatment and thus sacrifice the greater interest of the nation to narrow communal interests. To make Mahomedans really powerful we must act in co-operation with our Hindu brethren."

The letter was read at the meeting on the 3rd instant amidst applause from the audience.

The ladies sent also a resolution to the meeting to be adopted by it:

"Whereas the separate electorate is inimical to the progress of the country and such unfair advantage would only retard the progress of the community, the Bengal Moslem Women's Association record their strongest protest against the system of separate electorates."

PLEA FOR JOINT ELECTORATES.

The Vice-President of the Punjab Provincial Muslim League has been sounding and collecting Muslim opinion on the question of joint electorates as a result of which the following cablegram was sent to Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru:—

"Influential Muslim opinion of Punjab favours joint electorates with full representation on a population basis, equality to the Frontier province, Sindh, and Baluchistan, and linguistic, cultural and religious protection guaranteed to all groups."

The signatories include Mr. Abdul Aziz, President, Lahore Municipal Committee, Khan Bahadur Habibullah, ex-Deputy President, Legislative Council, Malik Barkat Ali, Muslim League, Maulvi Sardardin, Muslim Missionary and Secretary Anjumani-i-Shait Islam, Malik Lalkhan, Pirtajuddin, Mr. Mahomed Amin and others.

PROGRESSIVE MUSLIMS' VIEW.

The following cable gram was sent to London to Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and several other delegates to the Round Table Conference:—

"The retention of separate electorates most undesirable and means negation of dominion constitution. Large number Muslims consider it prejudicial to their community. National honour demands fight against perpetuation of the evil. India shall never accept any constitution not based on joint electorates."

The signatories include, among others, the Maharajah of Mahmabad, Sir Ali Imam, Mr. Hassan Imam, Raja Nawab Ali, Molana Kutubuddin, Abdul Wali and Mohammad Nasim, Chowdhury Khaliq-uz-Zaman, Khwaja Majid, Mr. Mahmuddallah Jung, Mr. Majibur-Rahman, Mr. Tufail Ahmad, Mr. Mohammad Hafiz, Mr. Ehsanulla, Mr. Rahman Kidwai, Mirza Abid Hussain and Syed Hyder Mehdi.

METHODISTS AND NATIONAL MOVEMENT.

We give below as it was finally passed by the Central Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church the Resolution on the question of self Government, "Whereas, events and tendencies are working from many directions toward the attainment of Dominion Status for India; and Whereas, the British Government has called the Round Table Conference which is working for the accomplishment of that end as soon as possible; and whereas, our people are in confusion as to what the Christian attitude should be toward national life in general, and toward the present political problems and movements in particular, and hence need some statement defining our attitudes in these matters, therefore be it resolved, that, we accept the idea of Dominion Status for India with deep satisfaction, and that we pledge ourselves to help in every legitimate way possible toward the making of Dominion Status a success. That we realize that communalism is one of the greatest obstacles in the making of Dominion Status a success, and that we hereby declare ourselves to be opposed to communalism. We feel that neither race nor religion should be used for separatist social and political ends. We hereby state that we have no intention of creating a separate political entity called the Christian community. We believe in the Christian Church as a moral and spiritual organization and as a means of the corporate development of the moral and of the spiritual life, but we do not desire to build up around the Christian Church a separate social and political entity called the Christian Community. If this kind of community has been built up part of the responsibility has been ours. But we now feel that this period of segregation is over, we have no intention of continuing this separatist mentality in our people. We desire passionately a united India. But part of the responsibility for this communalism is not ours. If those who desired to give their allegiance to Christ had been allowed to stay in their homes and be frank, open baptised Christians then this communalism would not have been built up. We are even now ready to say that if those who desire to follow Christ should be allowed to stay in their homes without social or political penalty then we are willing to see the Christian community as a political entity fade out leaving the Christian Church as a moral and spiritual organization contributing its power to the uplift and regeneration of this land. We have no desire to use the Christian Church for the gaining of political power. Part of the remedy for this communalism which has been built up around the Christian Church lies in our hands, but more so does it lie in the hands of those who have, in general, laid social penalties on those who have changed their spiritual allegiance. That we appreciate and approve the stand that Mr. K. T. Paul, a Christian Indian member of the Round Table Conference, has taken against communal representation and assure him of our gratitude. That we recognise that those of us who are American missionaries, whatever our convictions may be, can take no part in political movements as such; that we also recognise that the Church as a Church cannot give itself over to, or ally itself with, any Government, or political party or group. As we see it the function of the Christian Church in this matter is to keep its conscience unbound by entangling alliances so that it may provide ideals and the dynamic for the correction and regeneration of the social and national life. But while those of us who are American missionaries can take no part in political movements and while the Church as such cannot go into politics, the individual Christian in India, Anglo-India, or Britain, who may be a member of our Church, should be free to partake in, or to refrain from partaking in, national movements and in the political life of the country as his Christian conscience may impel him to do. The Church must be comprehensive enough in its understandings and sympathies to hold within itself those of differing political views and outlook. That we set aside a portion of the time of the Central Conference for intercession that a just and honourable settlement may be arrived at in the Round Table Conference now going on in London."

NEWS AND VIEWS.

Is England Fit for Self-Government?—"8 a. m. Baton charge by police; iron spikes and stones used by crowd. 23 injured. Religious riots raged in Liverpool from 8 a. m. yesterday until midnight. 23 people, including three policemen, were injured and taken to hospital." Here is a report from The Daily Herald: Liverpool's religious war reached a climax in rioting which continued all day yesterday until an hour ago, and a number of people will appear in Court to-morrow. Shortly before 2 a. m. yesterday morning word was passed round that the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Liverpool, Dr. Downey, was to attend the early service in a new presbytery in York-terrace. Scores of men, women and children formed a chalking squad, and now every street around bears such words as "Down with Popery!" "No surrender to Rome!" and "Down with the Downey birds!" Men and women left their beds, and before three o'clock the crowd had grown to thousands. An S. O. S. was flashed to all police-stations. Before the police assembled iron-spiked railings were torn up as weapons. Windows were smashed, and there were scuffles. Then the police drew their batons and charged. Last night hundreds of children marched along York-terrace led by a girl carrying a five-foot effigy of the Archbishop. Police rushed up from all directions, and a sergeant snatched the effigy. Later stones were thrown, and injuries were caused to twenty people, two constables, and a police-sergeant. They were all taken to hospital. The scenes continued until midnight, and the streets were thronged with Black Marias, hospital ambulances, and scores of specially drafted police. This is not a scene in India, reprovingly reported by an Anglo-Indian paper, but one under the "Mother of Parliaments" in one of England's most important sea-ports. The fight was waged between two sects, belonging to the Christian faith and not between two religions. If religious differences and quarrels justify England in withholding Self-Government from India, ought she to rule another Nation when in her own little island such religious riots occur as the one above described? "Black Maria" is the slang name for a police-van.—New India.

NOTES.

Amnesty to Political Prisoners: An Essential Condition:—At the Liberal Party's dinner in London on the 21st inst, Mr. Srinivasa Sastri, recalling the speech at the Imperial Conference of 1923, in which Mr. Lloyd George laid down that the Empire was not a white Empire, said that he had occasion several times to quote the statement in South Africa to a people who believed that the Empire was white and meant to maintain the white civilisation against the rest of the world. They had just concluded a miracle in political achievement, but that was only a part of the story. In India they had been conducting a pacific struggle under the guidance of one who believed in non-violence. They had borne great sacrifices. To-day there were over 30,000 men and women in jail in India. (Voices: 60,000). Persons nurtured as gently as they themselves, who had been to school and college, read the same classics and imbibed the same ideals, received at the hands of the police (he did not blame the police who maintained peace and order against great odds) severe blows on their bodies. These were not things to be forgotten. They were adding to their troubles in a way which could not be imagined. The situation in India to which the work accomplished during the past nine weeks would be an instant remedy under ordinary conditions, was such that he feared even a miracle achieved would not go down. Mr. Sastri eloquently affirmed that if the work of the Conference was to be appraised at its true worth and bring peace and contentment, it could only be if they called into consultation those whom the fortunes of politics had deprived of their liberty. He knew that amnesty given to so many people might make difficulties of its own and might possibly leave the situation worse than it was to-day. He did not under-rate the difficulties, but they must be faced. He did not believe that British statemanship was unequal to them. There were many present who had contributed greatly to the success of the Conference. He believed they would regret it all their lives if they risked undoing what had been achieved. The only remedy which offered some chance of relieving India and enabling them to complete their mighty work was to set free those whose free counsel and free co-operation were the essential conditions to the success of the work begun with such promise. He appealed to those present with influence to bring about what was so vital to the completion of their work. Lord Sankey, speaking at a dinner given by the Maharaja of Alwar, declared that the Conference had achieved real success. It had only suffered one misfortune—there was a large body of educated and patriotic Indian opinion which they had not had the advantage of hearing. He deeply regretted that there were so many men now lying in Indian jails who would have been better employed at the Conference, and he trusted that they would see them at future meetings of their Committees and at the final session of the Conference.

Unsympathetic Bureaucracy:—While Lord Irwin unreservedly acknowledged the "spiritual force" and sincerity of Mr. Gandhi, he hoped that Mr. Gandhi would not be unwilling to acknowledge that "the men of my own race who are today responsible for the Government of India are sincere in their attempt to serve her." If the Mahatma had believed in the sincerity of those responsible for the government of India, he would not have started his civil disobedience movement at all, writes the Servant of India. "It was because he had lost all faith in them that he resorted to his unique campaign. If Lord Irwin laid emphasis on "today responsible for the government of India," and meant himself and the Labour Cabinet, there is a large section in India which freely admits their sincerity. But it is the painful experience of many that such sincerity has a way of suffering a sea-change as it filters from the centre to the circumference, where it actually comes in contact with the people. Between the authorities ultimately responsible for the government of India and the people is interposed the bureaucracy which is more truly represented by Sir Henry Craik of the Punjab who is reported to have said that "conciliation was moonshine; it would merely encourage crimes," by the Government of Sir Ernest Hotson who refused the widely-supported plea for the commutation of the death sentences on the Sholapur convicts, and under whose aegis have occurred the lathi charges in Bombay and the terrorism in Gujerat, and by Mr. Stewart of Gandhi cap fame in Madras, whom the King delighted to honour in the New Year Honours list. It was cynically remarked that every officer who was responsible for a lathi charge got a C. I.

E. I The sincerity of Lord Irwin and the Labour Cabinet does not percolate to the bureaucracy, who are really responsible for the government of India to-day. And unless he is able to secure greater control over his agents and get them to conform more approximately to the policies that he lays down; Lord Irwin pleads in vain for trust in the sincerity of those of 'his race who are today responsible for the government of India.'

A Plea for Internationalism:—Dr. Rabindranath Tagore held "court" at Hyde Park Hotel when the "All Peoples' Association" gave a reception in honour of the poet on the 8th instant. He spoke seated on a chair—a venerable figure with a soft melodious voice—and was surrounded by an extraordinarily interesting throng representing the East and West and at least a dozen nationalities, including Indian Princes, Dr. Bevan, Dr. Edward Thompson, Sir Norman Angell, Mr. Bernard Shaw, and Mr. Max Beerbohm. Dr. Tagore described the growth of internationalism in his own life and mind and alluded to the influence upon his family in his youth of the great personality of Ram Mohan Roy. As an example how the inspiration of English poets went to the heart of that generation in India, Dr. Tagore recounted how a young man roused him when asleep at midnight. The young man said he had just read a wonderful line in Keats and that he must repeat it, "which he did." Dr. Tagore admitted that he himself had gone through a stage of aggressive nationalism, but had lost it now and had therefore often incurred his own countrymen's displeasure. He was, however, of opinion that abstract nationalism was often smothered in a man's higher spirit. To counteract the evil of nationalism, there should be other channels of communication, where East and West could meet in a pure spirit of sympathy and co-operation. "I often wished," continued Dr. Tagore "some great minds from England could come to India, not merely as members of a ruling class, but to spread their human love among our people."

The Seva Samiti, Allahabad:—This is one of the largest and best-known institutions of social service in India. The annual report for 1929-30 gives a complete and interesting record of the activities of the Samiti which was founded sixteen years ago. The Venerable Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya is the President, and the permanent General Secretary is Pandit Hriday Nath Kunzru, Vice-President of the Servants of India Society. The Samiti has several departments. Its Education department conducts a high school, a Vanita Vishram or Women's residential school, a circulating library and several night schools. Through its organisation department, the Samiti rendered excellent help at the Allahabad Kumbha Mela of last year, and the principal fairs and festivals. The Samiti has a Boy Scout Association. In the department of social reform, the most important activity of the Samiti during the year under report, was the redemption of the Naik community in Almora, Nainital and Garawal. The Naiks train their girls to prostitution. Although a Naik Girls Protection Act was passed by the United Provinces Legislature, the law has not been brought into force in the area comprised in the three centres named above. The Samiti is able to report progress which can be accelerated by the judicious application of the Act. The Medical and Ayurvedic Departments of the Samiti are doing excellent work. The Report concludes with numerous appreciative acknowledgments from Government officers of the valuable co-operation of volunteers of the Samiti on occasions at the fairs and festivals.

The R. T. C. and the Congress:—The following cablegram was received on the 21st instant by Pandit Motilal Nehru from Mr. Sastri, Mr. Jayakar and Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru after the Working Committee had unanimously adopted a resolution on the situation: "Starting to-morrow. Meanwhile we earnestly beg of you to postpone your decision till we meet." The Working Committee considered the cablegram and sent the following cable: "Your cable received after the Working Committee adopted unanimously a resolution. In deference to your wishes we will not release it for publication till we meet. Meanwhile the Congress programme will continue."

The Late Maulana Mahomed Ali:—The following resolution regarding the death of Moulana Mahomed Ali was adopted at the meeting: "That the Working Committee places on record the deep sense of loss sustained by the country by the death of Maulana Mahomed Ali, whose great courage, lofty patriotism, spirit of self-sacrifice and dynamic personality have been of great value to the Congress and the nation."

party is of paramount importance as has been amply recognised by Indian leaders at the Conference having appealed to Pandit Motilal Nehru to postpone coming to a decision as to the attitude of the Congress party on the Prime Minister's statement until after they have had an opportunity of meeting and discussing it with him. The Working Committee of the Congress, which met at Allahabad on Tuesday has accordingly decided to await their arrival. If meanwhile Government release the Congressmen now in prison relying on their sense of chivalry not to take advantage of their freedom to push forward the civil disobedience programme, there is every prospect of Congressmen deciding to participate in the forthcoming discussions. If on the other hand Government insist on imposing conditions and in other ways showing that they distrust the Congress leaders, the chances are that the latter will refuse co-operation and the whole thing will end in a fiasco. We are sorry to see that while the Prime Minister and the Viceroy are appealing for peace, arrests and prosecutions of Congress members are going on with unabated vigour. The Prime Minister said that neither the bureaucracy in Britain or India should be left to settle the future constitution. Neither should it be allowed to thwart the framing of it by political leaders of the two countries.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, JANUARY 24, 1931.

THE ROUND TABLE CONFERENCE.

The Round Table Conference has been suspended, to quote the words of the Prime Minister, so that Indian opinion might be consulted upon the work done and expedients considered for overcoming the difficulties which have been raised. The two main difficulties in the way of self-government which have been most discussed are the Indian States and the Hindu-Muslim problem. The declaration on behalf of leading States at the Conference that they are ready to enter into federal relations with self-governing British India goes far to clear the ground of the first difficulty. The Conference has agreed that the Central Government should be a Federation of all India embracing both the Indian States and British India in a bi-cameral legislature. It has further agreed that connection of the States with the Federation will remain subject to the basic principle that with regard to all matters not ceded by them to the Federation their relations will be with the Crown acting through the agency of the Viceroy. The British Government, for their part, are prepared to recognise the principle of the responsibility of the Executive to the Legislature in all subjects except Defence and External Affairs which during the transition stage will be vested in the Governor-General. Responsibility in respect of Finance is also to be transferred but with certain reservations which demand careful scrutiny. Lord Reading explained that these reservations are in the interests of India and are not intended to strengthen the control of Britain, and the Prime Minister further emphasised that they are designed not in British financial interests but in order to establish the moral credit of India in the eyes of the world. These assurances are of course sincere, but the point which Indian opinion will have particularly to consider is how far these reservations are absolutely necessary and, even more, how far they will impede the rapid emergence of the country out of the transition stage.

The action of the Princes in agreeing to enter the federal scheme is prompted as much by motives of patriotism as of self-preservation. It is thus both wise and prudent and we do not altogether share the apprehensions felt by some leaders regarding this seemingly unexpected development. Care will have to be taken of course that representatives of States in the Federal Legislature are not mere nominees of the Princes, in which case they will carry little weight, but persons chosen by constituencies analogous, as far as circumstances permit, to corresponding electorates in British India. Since States' representatives are to vote only on federal subjects, they will not be eligible to be ministers unless they sit, as some may, for a British-Indian constituency. The demarcation of Federal subjects from Provincial and British ones should not be too rigid. Customs barriers are of course inadmissible in federated India. The federal scheme is to be valued most as opening wide the door to collaboration in the national cause of the people no less than the Princes of States with British Indians. The political cleavage which at present divides them will cease to operate under a federal system which is an important step towards unity of the country. It must be recognised that the coming in of the States necessarily means some slowing down of the pace of political advance in British India, but this must be accepted as inevitable in the larger interests of the country as a whole and in order to prevent a breach which may be irreparable.

It is all to the good that the Hindu-Muslim question has been left for settlement by mutual consent in India. Within the last few days influential Muslim opinion has expressed itself strongly in favour of joint electorates. It is evident that a considerable body of the younger generation view the communal problem from an entirely different angle than their elders who were most conspicuous at the Round Table Conference. The Hindu representatives too were handicapped by the absence of an authoritative leader like Pundit Madan Mohan Malaviya. Mahatma Gandhi has more than once declared in favour of meeting Muslims generously and there is good reason to hope that a working compromise on the question of electorates can be reached when the Congress leaders take their place in the consultations now impending. This they can do only if they are free. The imposition of conditions preliminary to their release may not be accepted and if accepted, will embroil Congress leaders with their following, large numbers of whom have been humiliated and exasperated by the treatment meted out to them by the Police and in jails. Executive Governments have done their best to make conciliation impossible while the Round Table Conference was deliberating measures for that very purpose.

The Prime Minister mentioned some things in regard to which it may be possible to take action without awaiting the formation of the constitution, instancing the establishment of an Indian Sandhurst and undertook to accelerate progress respecting them. Definite conclusions regarding the separation of Burma and Sind and the constitution of a Governor's Province of the Frontier having been reached, steps will be taken to prepare the ground for their accomplishment. In all these matters the co-operation of the Congress

REPATRIATES FROM SOUTH AFRICA.

(By MR. S. A. WALZ, SECRETARY, IMPERIAL INDIAN CITIZENSHIP ASSOCIATION.)

The Government of India appointed a Committee of Enquiry to report on the working of special organization in Madras for the reception of repatriates from South Africa under the scheme of assisted emigration of the Cape Town Agreement. The Committee consisting of the Hon'ble Mr. G. A. Natesan and Mr. J. Gray, Labour Commissioner, Madras, submitted their report in May last which was published by the Government of India last week.

Under the Cape Town Agreement, the Government of India undertook to see that on arrival in India repatriates from South Africa are protected against squandering their cash and helped as far as possible in settling in some sort of occupation for which they are suited. A Special Officer was appointed in August 1927, with his headquarters in Madras, to fulfil that obligation. The Committee find that satisfactory facilities are afforded on board the ship regarding accommodation, lavatories, bathrooms, food and medical aid. They interviewed a number of these men and none of them complained in this matter. They also find that satisfactory arrangements have been made for their reception on arrival in Madras. The Special Officer is constantly in touch with the repatriates; he tours about the country and encourages them to apply for employments. It would appear that out of 5,326 emigrants who arrived in India between August 1927 and March 1930, 2329 were men, 1216 were women and 1781 were children. 431 men were decrepits. For the decrepits, the report says, a special home has been established. Arrangements are also made for the protection of their cash by safe deposits in the banks. During the half year ending 31st December 1928, the Special Officer received Rs. 3,32,861 in cash from repatriates and assisted them to deposit Rs. 1,86,139 in the Bank. During the same period, he paid out Rs. 3,41,755 in cash and authorised withdrawal by those who had deposited money with the Bank of a sum of Rs. 1,47,484. Of the repatriates, 45 per cent. belong to the class of petty farmers; 23 per cent. domestic servants. The Special Officer is always able to find employment for domestic servants and land is available for those who wish to settle down as agricultural labourers. But the other 32 per cent. are skilled workers. It is very difficult to find work for them, because the wages are low in India as compared with those in South Africa and even if employment is obtained for such men, they refuse to accept it because they consider it to be below their dignity. In the case of several applicants, the report says, the Special Officer has been able to do little or nothing.

It has often been alleged in India and South Africa that the Government of India have failed to carry out their obligations of safeguarding the interests of repatriates in India. The report, however, fully refutes this allegation. If the lot of the repatriates in India is not a happy one, it is due to circumstances over which neither the Government of India nor their agencies have any control. It must be admitted, therefore, that the Government of India have fulfilled their obligation. In Bombay, the Commissioner of Police is made responsible for arrangements connected with the repatriates from South Africa. In Bengal, the duty is entrusted to the Protector of Emigrants. In the United Provinces, the Registrar of Co-operative Societies is responsible for their welfare. In Bihar and Orissa, the Director of Industries is selected for the purpose. Thus we see that the repatriates have some one to look to for help in every province. The Special Officer was appointed in Madras, because it is the port of entry and home for the majority of repatriates. The Committee have no suggestions to make except that the heads of the larger department and organisation should form into a body to assist the Special Officer in securing suitable employment for the repatriates. The report does not reveal to the public what happens to those repatriates who fail to get work; and there are several such cases. The only recommendation that the Committee have deemed fit to make is hardly fair on the increasing number of unemployed in the Madras Presidency. Their recommendation, if carried out, will make the problem of unemployment more serious in Madras. Undoubtedly it is the clear duty of the Government of India to help them in every possible way, but it was never intended that they should do it at the expense of the unemployed in India. And why should decrepits be sent back from South Africa? These poor people spent their youths in developing South Africa and now when they are aged and unable to work, are repatriated to India, where they have no friends and relations. But the hardest lot is of the South African born Indians, for to most of them, India is a foreign land. Many of them do not know Indian vernaculars. No wonder that some of them returned to South Africa. The time for revising the Cape Town Agreement is near and pressure should be brought to bear upon the Government of the Union of South Africa to abandon the repatriation scheme because India will never accept them again in any form or at any stage.

In considering the report, it is well to remember that Mr. Venn, Commissioner of Asiatic Affairs in South Africa, was deputed two years ago to study on the spot and report how far the Government of India were discharging their obligations in terms of the Cape Town Agreement. His report has not yet been published. It is strongly rumoured that Mr. Venn has recommended that the repatriation scheme has failed, because India is not in a position to assimilate repatriates from abroad. However that may be, the fact remains that if his report is made available to the public, it will help to understand the Indian problem from the South African point of view. The report of Pandit Bhavani Dayal Sannyasi, on his investigation into the position of repatriates in India, is also eagerly awaited.

THE LAW OF INHERITANCE.

A valued correspondent writes :—

In one of the issues of the Reformer you doubted whether a man's change of religion had any effect on the law of inheritance to his property, specially if that change took place shortly before his death. The Privy Council has recently given a decision laying down the rule that it has this effect. The ruling is, Mitar San Singh v. Maqbal Hasan Khan, a case coming from Audh and now reported in 38 Bom. L. R. I. The remarks of their Lordships are: "When once a person has changed his religion and changed his personal law, that law will govern the rights of succession of his children. It may, of course, work harshly to some extent upon expectant heirs, especially if the expectant heirs are the children of the ancestor who does in fact change his religion; but, after all, it inflicts no more hardship in their case than in any other case where the ancestor has changed the law of succession, as, for instance, by acquiring a different domicile, and their Lordships do not find it necessary to consider any question of hardships that may arise. They will certainly, in their Lordships' view, be outweighed by the immense difficulties that would follow if the wider view were to prevail."

I may here state that in this judgment the Privy Council have approved a ruling given by the Madras High Court in 1917, and over-ruled the view taken by Sir John Edge when he was the Chief Justice of Allahabad, in the case Bhagwant Singh v. Kalla, I. L. R. 11 All. 100. The view taken now by the Privy Council has also been taken by the Rangoon High Court, where in a ruling reported in I. L. R. 6 Rang. 243, it has further been laid down that in the case of a Hindu who became a Mussalman and died a Mussalman, his Hindu widow and other Hindu relations would be excluded from succeeding to his property in competition with his Mussalman relations.

In the case reported in I. L. R. 43 All. 525, the Privy Council has laid down that converts from Hinduism can not elect to be governed by Hindu law of succession.

Benares University and Govt. Grant:—The report that Government of India have stipulated that Pandit Malaviya should resign the Vics-Chancellorship of Hindu University as a condition for paying their promised grant to the University is authoritatively contradicted. It is however a fact that six lakhs non-recurring grant and half of the recurring grant of rupees three lakhs which was payable in May and the second half of the recurring grant which was due in November have not yet been received by the University. Mr. A. H. Mackenzie, Director of Public Instruction, U. P., visited the University on the 19th instant and was shown round the several colleges of the University. Afterwards, he saw Pandit Malaviya at his lodge and had a long talk with him lasting over an hour.

THE WILL FOR PEACE.

( BY BRIGADIER H. P. SMITH. )

"Toward a Better World" (Salvationist Publishing and Supplies, three shillings and six pence) is the title of a book of Evangeline Booth, daughter of the Founder of the Salvation Army, and Commander in Chief of the Army's forces in the United States of America. The various chapters of the book deal with a variety of topics, all treated with that zest and fervour which have marked the Army in its redemptive work for mankind. So choice is the language used in the volume that over wide stretches it reads almost as a prose-poem. Moreover, it glows with enthusiasm and bubbles over with joy.

In one striking chapter, "The Christ of the Andes," the Commander writes on the subject of International Peace. In graphic style she tells the story of how the Republics of Argentina and Chile had for long been at enmity with each other, distrusted each other, and felt that the only way to secure themselves in peace was to be armed against each other. It seemed as though bloodshed was imminent. Then, in 1900, on a sunny Easter morning, a saintly man of Argentina preached the message of brotherly love between men and between nations. Again and again, far and wide, with the zeal of a prophet he preached the same message, until his countrymen were roused to action.

Across the border a Chilean preacher took up the same evangel and, in his turn, toured the land, beseeching peace and mutual recognition of rights. The two Governments were moved to action, plans for the mobilization of forces were replaced by thoughts of peace, and by schemes to make peace permanently effective, and the outcome of it all was an unconditional treaty of arbitration.

The very instruments of death, the guns of the frontier forces, were melted and cast into a great bronze figure of Christ, the cost of which was defrayed by a Buenos Aires lady, and on March 13, 1904, the statue was dedicated in the presence of vast crowds from both sides of the frontier. The Argentine soldiers, by invitation, camped on the Chile side, and the Chileans on the Argentine side, thus, shewing that those who had been looked upon as being enemies were now to be considered as friends—they trusted each other.

The unveiling took place in profound silence and then the two peoples knelt together and prayed for the peace of the world. On the pedestal of the statue are the words: "Sooner shall these mountains crumble to dust than Argentines and Chileans break the Peace."

Since that time the two Republics have lived at peace with each other; soldiers are kept for police purposes only; warships have been sold or turned into merchant vessels; the Chilean Grand Arsenal has been made into a Technical School; the money saved from preparations for war has been used for public works, railways and houses for the people. Fear and exasperation are banished; trust and goodwill prevail.

What a grand day it will be for India when such a spirit rules throughout the land. Let us work for communal, national and international peace. Let us have the will for peace and peace shall be ours, and along with peace prosperity and progress.

LORD IRWIN'S APPEAL TO THE CONGRESS.

Speaking at the Legislative Assembly on Saturday, the 17th instant, His Excellency the Viceroy said:—

“ Pending that (the Premier's) announcement, I content myself with pointing to certain things which already stand out in sharp relief. The first undoubtedly is the recognition by the Indian States of the essential unity of All-India and their readiness to take their full share in designing the instruments of Government through which that conception of unity may gain concrete expression and effect. I do not underrate the difficulties that still have to be surmounted before these aspirations can be realised in their entirety, but those need not blind us to the far-reaching and deep significance of the step taken by the States' representatives in London. I scarcely think I exaggerate when I say that the historian a hundred years hence commenting on these times will find in it the turning point of the constitutional history of India.

MISUNDERSTANDINGS REMOVED.

“ The Conference has had two further results that seem to me of incalculable value. At the time of its convention the atmosphere was clouded with misunderstandings on both sides. Opinion in Great Britain was ill-informed of the realities of thought in India. Opinion in India, even in circles where so-called moderate views prevailed, was suspicious and sceptical of the purpose of Great Britain. If ignorance and suspicion still linger they represent the rare-guard and no longer the main body of opinion in the two countries. Great Britain has realised, as she has heard it at first hand from all sections of the Indian delegation, something of the new forces that are animating the political thought of India, while India, feeling no longer that she is misunderstood, is better prepared to recognise that British statesmen have approached the problem, not indeed ignoring real difficulties, but with a single will to find the means by which they may be speedily and securely resolved.

NEW HOPE.

“ Thus it might appear that all who have longed to see the Conference bear fruit for the true healing of the nations may take new hope. The London discussions have revealed a genuine desire on all sides to find practical means by which speedy and substantial recognition may be given to the natural claims of Indian political thought.

“ There is no one who will not deplore the fact that the work of the Conference should have been so gravely impeded by that problem, which continues to occupy so prominent and unfortunate a place in the domestic life of India. Any constitution that is to work smoothly must obviously command the confidence of all communities and in this matter India can help herself more than anybody else can help her. I would most earnestly trust that leaders of all communities would once more come together resolved no longer to allow the constitutional progress of India to be impeded by this cause or India herself to lie under this reproach of internal discord and mistrust.

“ Apart from this, it is evident that to many of those participating in the Conference the influence of personal contact with men of differing views along with the inspiration of the new and wider vision of a united India that the Conference has unfolded has had the effect of presenting an old problem in new guise and of leading them to revise some of their earlier views upon it. That way lies the best possibility for both countries of a return to the conditions of peace and harmony that we all desire.

TRIBUTE TO MR. GANDHI.

“ Many times during the last twelve months thoughtful men and women must have pondered deeply over what has been one of their most poignant and perplexing features. However mistaken any man may think him to be and however deplorable may appear the results of the policy associated with his name, no one can fail to recognise the spiritual force which impels Mr. Gandhi to count no sacrifice too great in the cause, as he believes, of the India that he loves and, I fancy, that though he on his side too thinks those who differ from him to be the victims of a false philosophy, Mr. Gandhi would not be unwilling to say that men of my race, who are to-day responsible for the Government of India, were sincere in their attempt to serve her.

“ It has been one of the tragedies of this time that where ultimate purposes have perhaps differed little, if at all, the methods employed by some should have been, as I conceive, far more calculated to impede than to assist the accomplishment of that largely common end; and deeply as I crave to see the dawn of a happier day in India, I am bound, so long as a movement designed to undermine and sap the foundations of Government holds the front place in the programme of the great Congress organisation, to resist it to the uttermost of my strength.

THE BETTER WAY.

“ Is it not now possible, I would ask, for those responsible for this policy to try another course that, in the light, on the one hand, of sinister events in India and, on the other, of the encouragement offered to India by the progress of the Conference in England, would seem to be a more excellent way.

“ A great deal remains to be done, for it has long been generally recognised that, if and when the broad lines of constitutional revision could be drawn, much subsequent detailed thought would be required for its adjustment to the particular circumstances of India. Quite evidently it would be for the good of India that all the best elements, both here and in Great Britain should join hands in the work of elaborating and bringing to fruition the undertaking so well begun in London and thus place the seal of friendship once again upon the relations of two peoples whom unhappy circumstances have latterly estranged.

“ On the wide basis of friendship and mutual respect alone can we confidently build the structure of a strong and self-reliant India, one within herself and one with the other partners in the British Commonwealth. I feel confident that I can count on every member of this House to lend at all times such assistance as may be in his power to the furtherance of a work so fraught with consequence to the welfare of India, of Great Britain and of that Empire in which I very earnestly pray India may for all time be proud to take her place.”

THE ROUND TABLE CONFERENCE.

THE PREMISE'S DECLARATION.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald addressed the final Plenary Session of the Round Table Conference on the 19th January and sketched the main lines of the proposed constitution. After reviewing the work of the Conference, the recommendations of the different committees and the various considerations which had to be borne in mind Mr. MacDonald made the following declaration regarding the future government of India:—

RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT FOR INDIA.

“At this point I will read to you the declaration which I am authorised to make by my colleagues of the Government. The view of His Majesty's Government is that the responsibility for the Government of India should be placed upon the Legislatures, Central and Provincial, with such provisions as may be necessary to guarantee during a period of transition, the observance of certain obligations, and to meet other special circumstances, and also with such guarantees as are required by the Minorities to protect their political liberties and rights.

“In such statutory safeguards as may be made for meeting the needs of the transitional period, it will be a primary concern of His Majesty's Government to see that the reserved powers are so framed and exercised as not to prejudice the advance of India through the new constitution to full responsibility for her own Government.

“His Majesty's Government whilst making this declaration is aware, that some of the conditions which are essential to the working of such a constitution as is contemplated, have not been finally settled, but it believes that as a result of the work done here, they have been brought to a point which encourages the hope that further negotiations after this declaration will be successful.

ALL-INDIA FEDERATION.

“His Majesty's Government has taken note of the fact that the deliberations of the Conference have proceeded on the basis accepted by all the parties that the Central Government should be a Federation of All India, embracing both the Indian States and British India in a bicameral legislature. The precise form and structure of the new Federal Government must be determined after further discussion with the Princes and the representatives of British India.

“The range of subjects to be committed to it will also require further discussion because the Federal Government will have authority only in such matters concerning the States as will be ceded by their rulers in an agreement made by them on entering into the Federation. The connection of the States with the Federation will remain subject to the basic principle that with regard to all matters not ceded by them to the Federation their relations will be with the Crown acting through the agency of the Viceroy.

THE EXECUTIVE.

“With a legislature constituted on a federal basis His Majesty's Government will be prepared to recognise the principle of responsibility of the Executive to the Legislature. Under existing conditions the subjects of Defence and External Affairs will be reserved to the Governor-General and arrangements will be made to place in his hands the powers necessary for the administration of those subjects. Moreover as the Governor-General must as a last resort be able in an emergency to maintain the tranquillity of the State and must similarly be responsible for the observance of the constitutional rights of the minorities, he must be granted the necessary power for those purposes.

CONDITIONAL FINANCIAL CONTROL.

“As regards Finance, the transfer of financial responsibility must necessarily be subject to such conditions as will ensure the fulfilment of the obligations incurred under the authority of the Secretary of State, and the maintenance unimpaired of the financial stability and credit of India. The Report of the Federal Structure Committee indicates some ways of dealing with this subject, including a reserve bank, the service of loans and exchange policy, which, in the view of His Majesty's Government, will have to be provided for, somehow in the new constitution. It is of vital interest to all parties in India to accept these provisions to maintain financial confidence. Subject to these provisions the Indian Government will have full financial responsibility for methods of raising revenue and for control of expenditure on non-reserved services. This will mean that under the existing conditions the Central Legislature and the Executive will have some features of dualism which will have to be fitted into the constitutional structure. The provision of reserved powers is necessary in the circumstances, and some such reservation has, indeed, been incidental to the development of most free constitutions, but every care must be taken to prevent conditions arising which will necessitate their use. It is, for instance, undesirable that Ministers should trust to the special powers of the Governor-General as a means of avoiding responsibilities which are properly their own, thus defeating the development of responsible government by bringing into use powers meant to lie in reserve and in the background. Let there be no mistake about that.

GOVERNOR'S RESERVED POWERS.

“The Governors' Provinces will be constituted on the basis of full responsibility. Their Ministries will be taken from the Legislature and will be jointly responsible to it. The range of Provincial subjects will be so defined as to give them greatest possible measure of self-government.

“The authority of the Federal Government will be limited to the provisions required to secure its administration of Federal Subjects and to discharge its responsibility for the Subjects defined in the Constitution as of all-India concern. There will be reserved to the Governor only that minimum of special powers which is required in order to secure, in exceptional circumstances, the preservation of tranquillity and to guarantee the maintenance of the rights provided by statute for the Public Services and the Minorities.

PROTECTION OF MINORITIES.

Finally, His Majesty's Government considers that the institution in the Provinces of responsible government requires both that the Legislatures should be enlarged and that they should be based on a more liberal franchise. In framing the Constitution His Majesty's Government considers that it will be its duty to insert provisions guaranteeing to the various minorities, in addition to political representation, that the differences of religion, race, sect, or caste shall not in themselves constitute civic disabilities. In the opinion of His Majesty's Government it is the duty of the communities to come to an agreement amongst themselves on the points raised by the Minorities Sub-Committee, but not settled there. During the continuing negotiations such agreement ought to be reached and the Government will continue to render what good offices it can to help to secure that end, as it is anxious not only that no delay should take place in putting the new constitution into operation, but that it should start with the good will and confidence of all the communities concerned.

APPEAL TO LEADERS OF THE CONGRESS.

"The various Sub-Committees, which have been studying the more important principles of a constitution which would meet Indian conditions, have surveyed a considerable part of the structure in detail, and the still unsettled points have been advanced a good way to agreement. His Majesty's Government, however, in view of the character of the Conference and of the limited time at its disposal in London, has deemed it advisable to suspend its work at this point, so that Indian opinion may be consulted upon the work done, and expedients considered for overcoming the difficulties which have been raised. His Majesty's Government will consider without delay a plan by which our co-operation may be continued so that the results of our completed work may be seen in a new Indian constitution. If in the meantime there is a response to the Viceroy's appeal to those engaged at present in civil disobedience and there is a wish to co-operate on the general lines of this declaration steps will be taken to enlist their services.

DELEGATES THANKED.

"I must convey to you all on behalf of the Government its hearty appreciation of the services you have rendered, not only to India, but to this country, by coming here and engaging in these personal negotiations. Personal contact is the best way of removing these unfortunate differences and misunderstandings which too many people on both sides have been engendering between us in recent years. A mutual understanding of intention and difficulty, gained under such conditions as have prevailed here, is by far the best way for discovering ways and means of settling differences and satisfying claims. His Majesty's Government will strive to secure such amount of agreement as will enable the new constitution to be passed through the British Parliament and to be put into operation with the active good will of the people of both countries.

A FAREWELL WISH.

"And now, my friends, we go our various ways. Our ten weeks of valuable co-operation and pleasant companionship and friendship are ended.

"Finally, I hope and I trust and I pray that by our labours together India will possess the only thing which she now lacks to give her status of dominion amongst the British Commonwealth of Nations, what she now lacks for that—the responsibilities and the cares, the burdens and the difficulties, but the pride and the honour of Responsible Government."

BOMBAY VIEW OF THE PREMIER'S DECLARATION.

Sir Purshottmdas Thakurdas, Mr. Husseinbhoj A. Lalji, Sir Chunilal V. Mehta, Messrs. Lalji Naranji, Ambalal Sarabhai, Kasturbhai Lalbhai, F. E. Dinshaw, Behram N. Karanjia, L. B. Tairsea and N. M. Muzumdar have issued the following statement:—

"We have read the Prime Minister's statement and find that it is refreshingly different from the recommendations of the Simon Commission and the views of the Government of India as contained in their despatch on the Simon Commission Report. We note that the details of the various important items are to be discussed and settled hereafter and it would, therefore, be premature to express any definite opinion. We feel that the Prime Minister's statement ought to have been accompanied by a whole-hearted gesture of goodwill to the leaders of the Congress and we very much wish that he had responded to Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru's appeal for the grant of amnesty to political prisoners. We urge that the Prime Minister should declare an amnesty to all political prisoners in India who are not guilty of crimes involving moral turpitude and thus give a real practical opportunity to all those leaders and others to confer regarding this statement made on behalf of His Majesty's Government.

SUSPENSION OF ORDINANCES.

"We consider such a step and the suspension of all Ordinances by Government to be absolutely essential in order to ensure a full and unbiassed examination from the point of view of the people of India. At the moment several organisations connected with the Indian National Congress have been declared illegal. Obviously it is impossible for persons connected with them to meet together and confer on the Prime Minister's statement. We hope that when Government have complied with our suggestion the leaders of the Indian National Congress, including Mr. Gandhi, Mr. Jawahar Lal Nehru and others will give their most careful consideration to every part of the declaration made on behalf of His Majesty's Government with a view to get such parts in it removed as they and the country feel are not in the country's interests and to have such amendments and additions made thereto as may be necessary. Until this is done we feel that it would be wrong to reject this statement."

GREATER INDIA.

By B. V. RAMCHANDRA RAO, M.A.

(Concluded from the last issue.)

This synthetic aspect of Hindu life in the Greater India is most remarkable and worthy of adoption by the mother country. Indeed, the rules in India showed impartial respect for all sects. But no attempt was made to cement closer, "the mutually repulsive" religious communities. An inscription of C. 1510 A.D. found in Siam clearly asserts the identity of the Buddha and Siva.

The festivals and ceremonials of Siam point out unmistakably to the land of their origin. The official New Year is known as Songkran, Sankranti of India. There is also the ploughing festival reminding of the days of King Janaka. In this ceremony the king or his minister will officiate as the leader or "Yajaman" of the day. The rivers are also worshipped, as in India, by floating lamps on them. The rites of shaving (Chowla), raming (Namaharan) and piercing the ear (Karnavedana) are truly our own. But both the boys and girls of Siam have Chowla for them!

Siam is the only Hindu kingdom of Asia enjoying sovereign independence, because it has been found expedient by Britain and France to have a buffer between them. The court of Siam is truly symbolical of the Greater India. The priests of the royal household are Brahmins, using Pali language. They fix auspicious hours, cast horoscopes and crown the king. They worship still in the temples attached to the palace. Their colonies are still to be seen in the Malaya Peninsula. Thus the Brahmins are most influential at the court, though the subjects of the king are Buddhists. There is no sectarian conflict where a royal decree has established the identity of the Buddha, Siva and Vishnu. The present<sup>1</sup> ruler of Siam is Rama IV and Garuda<sup>2</sup> Vishnu adorns the royal banner. Ganesha, Nāgayan on Garuda and Lingams are still venerated here along with the Sakya Buddha.

Camboja has been called the southern corner of Jambudvip by Itsing. A race of Kaundinya Gotra Brahmins seem to have established themselves in power, about the fourth century A.D. and changed the customs of the country so as to conform to those of India. The Sanskrit inscriptions and the style of architecture and sculpture bear close resemblance to those of Bijapur District. Figures of Mukha-lingas, Harihara, Vāmana and Narasimha are common to both the countries. As in Siam, the people believe in the oneness of the multifarious gods of Buddhism and Brahminism and both Buddhist and Brahminical temples are found flourishing, side by side, even to-day. The royal court of Camboja, like that of Siam, supports numerous Brahmin priests, known as Bakus. The Brahmins here, wear top-knots and sacred thread. They guard the sword of Indra, in the royal household. At the coronation ceremony of 1906, the king erected four Brahminical shrines, and holy water was poured over the king's head by the Brahmin priests.

Besides Buddhist temples, Hindu Gods are also to be found living in amity and peace. Siva, Krishna, Harihara, Sankara-Nārāyana, Lakshmi, Bharati, Maruta, have been worshipped here from ancient times. But the most interesting place of Champa is the famous Angorvat or Vishnu-paramaloka. It is said to be the largest and best preserved ruin in the world. Its thousand yards of bas-reliefs depict scenes from Puranas, of Gods, Hell, and Heaven. These ruins of Angor have made the name of Cambodia famous throughout the cultured world.

Java is the easternmost limit of the Greater India. It is mentioned in Rāmāyan as Yavadvip. It is said to be known to the Tamils as included in their island empire of Kidāram. Ptolemy, the geographer, (150 A. D.) mentions it is a part of India. Fabien noted that the island was filled with "heretical Brahmins and the law of Buddha was not regarded." A Sanskrit inscription of King Purna Varman, 400 A. D., eulogises Vishnu as the highest deity. Buddhism was introduced into the island only after 650 A. D.

The island of Java seems to have been colonised by the people of Kalinga, under the lead of a Pallava prince. Hence it came to be known to the Chinese as "Kling." The method of Hindu colonisation was most remarkable for its humanity. The native population was not exterminated, nor dispossessed of their patrimony, as in modern times. The Hindus won their way into the heart of the people by their native superiority and conciliatory policy. Yet the super-imposition of the Aryan culture was complete. Arya, Raja, Prabos, Dipati, are proved titles of the people owing Indian origin. The land tenure of Java is still on a communal basis as in ancient India. Java fell under the sword of Islam in the fourteenth century and Hinduism disappeared from the island, as the dominant religion, only to take shelter in the island of Bali.

The architectural remains of Java are remarkable for their size, number and beauty. The temples of Borobadour and Parambanam are only two among several places of note. The monuments of Borobadour are said to surpass even the pyramids of Egypt for their massiveness. Its three miles of alto and bas-reliefs and thousands of statues simply dazzle the traveller by their magnificence; as for the perfection of the sculptures, "it has no equal." The Stupa, the main structure of Borobadour, is pyramidal in shape, rising tier over tier, in nine galleries, each face abounding with carvings of scenes from the life of the Buddha. It is one of the wonders of the world. Parambanam contains a group of Hindu temples, dedicated to Brahma, Vishnu, Siva and Nandi. The largest of them is the shrine of Maheswara with Ganesh and Durga. Of course, scenes from Rāmāyan are carved on the balustrades of the temple. Here is also to be found the shrine of Agastya, the harbinger of Aryan culture to the south. The inscription in the temple is Tamil, indicating the influence of the Tamils far beyond their original homes, in the opinion of Dr. Vogel.

Of the numerous islands of the Eastern Archipelago, Bali is most remarkable and important for us. For, it still cherishes with pride the fire of Hinduism which it took from India, through all the vicissitudes of her political life. Often, did the neighbouring Moors try to root out of the island, the race of infidels, but all in vain. The people are more robust than the Javanese, and hence the survival of Hinduism in this little island.

The caste system is still living in Bali. The people fall into five classes, Brahmins, Satriyas, Visiyyas, Sudras, and Parias. The rules of society are rigidly enforced. The dead are burnt. Sati is still observed in high families. Oxen are never slaughtered. The people use the Saka era, beginning from 78 A.D.

Temples of gods are indeed numerous. They receive daily worship and offerings. Ganesh, Indra, Vishnu, Krishna, Surya, Garuda, Siva, the Pandavas, are sculptured and revered in the shrines of Bali. Garuda-Vishnu is a common figure of the land. But Durga and Siva are the chief gods.

The people possess, like the Indians, their Vedas, Mahabhārata, Rāmāyana, Brahmapurāna and Niti-sār. But these are written in the local dialect known as Kavi language.

Now "the abstract and brief chronicle" of the Greater India must close. She seems still to need the rejuvenating touch of the aged yet young, Mother India. But it could be given only by a united reascent India of to-morrow.

Widow-remarriages in Bombay:—The Jt. Hon. Secretary, Bombay Presidency Social Reform Association sends for publication the following list of widow remarriages, recently performed in Bombay by the joint efforts of the Bombay Presidency Social Reform Association, Vidhya Vivah Sahayak Sabha and the Arya Samaj. Marriages between: Gangabai and Shivadarshan, both Vaishas aged 20 and 30; Ramabai and Bahadarsingh Pratapsingh, both Aryas aged 22 and 30; Ibbhabai and Maganlal Vallabhbhai, the one Brahmin and the other Arya aged 23 and 29; Tarabai Joshi and Yeshwantrao Joshi, both Brahmins aged 29 and 39; Indirabai and Govind Rajaram Dani, both Brahmins aged 25 and 30; Jadubai and Ootmanlal Thakordas, the one Gujarati Bania and the other Vaisha aged 25 and 35; grand daughter (Brahmin) of Mr. V. A. Paleikar, Pleader, Dhulia and a Brahmin from Poona; Sitabai Satwashila and Narendra Nath Parshuram, both Brahmins aged 30 and 36.

MILITANT PACIFISM.

"The World Tomorrow," of January, 1931 publishes the following passage from an address delivered by Professor Albert Einstein in New York:

"When pacifists come together they usually have the feeling that they are the sheep and the wolves are outside. The trouble is that pacifists generally contact only their own groups—that is to say, those who are already convinced. They make no effort to go afield and convert others. Serious-minded pacifists should try actually to do something instead of contenting themselves with idle dreams or merely talking about their pacifism. Our next step is to act—to do something. We must realize that when war comes, everyone considers it his duty to commit a crime—the crime of killing. People must be made to understand the immorality of war. They must do everything in their power to disentangle themselves from this antiquated, barbarous institution and to free themselves from the shackles of slavery.

For this I have two suggestions. One of them has already been tried and found practical. It is the refusal to engage in war service of any kind, under any circumstances. Even at the risk of great personal sacrifice and hardship all who wish to do something concrete toward world pacification must refuse war service. Pacifists who mean what they say should adopt this position in time of peace even in countries where there is compulsory military service. In other countries, where there is no such service, pacifists should declare openly that they will never bear arms or take part in any military service whatsoever. I advise the recruiting of people for this idea all over the world. And for the timid ones who say, "What is the use of our trying, we are so few in number," my answer is: "If you can get only two per cent of the population of the world to assert in time of peace that they will not fight, you will have the solution for international troubles." Even so small a proportion as two per cent will accomplish the desired result, for they could not be put in jail. There are not enough jails in the world to accommodate them!

The second suggestion I offer appears less illegal. International legislation should be attuned to the idea that those who declare themselves against war should, in time of peace, be allowed to take up some kind of difficult or even dangerous work either for their country or for the international benefit of mankind. In this way they can prove that their opposition to war is not promoted by selfish or cowardly motives.

I feel confident that whoever adopts this program will eventually succeed in establishing international legislation either by legal or other methods. I advise all war resisters to organize and to internationalize; I also advise them to collect money so that they may reinforce war resisters in other countries who have no means with which to carry on their work. Let all those who wish to promote pacifism, who have the courage to suffer, devote their energy to the initiation of these activities and stand firm so that the whole world may see and respect them for what they are doing."

THE MIRAGE OF A BRITISH LANCER.

Mr. Henry James Norman writes in the journal, Illumination, published by the School of Life Foundation, New York:—

Any one who believes that miracles are scarce in this day had better read at once this outstanding book by a British army officer upon his life and adventures in India. He will realize that miracles happen even to an English public school boy.

Major Yeats-Brown was an ordinary well-bred English subaltern when he arrived in India at nineteen, hard-polished with no nonsense about him, as his companions and superiors would have testified. "A bad drill, a wake voice," said Mulvaney, "thim's the sign of a bad man." Yeats-Brown bore none of these stigmata. He loved horses, bull-dogs, polo-ponies, polo, pig-sticking and other things that his messmates doubtless considered equally manly.

Then a curious thing befell this irreproachable cavalry officer. Owing to the circumstance that a man near his house was bitten by a snake, the entire life of Yeats-Brown underwent a strange and peculiar change. He was told by a servant of a Saddhu who could bring the dead to life.

"I can animate the body for a few minutes tonight, Sahib," said the Saddhu, "but it is too old and weak and full of poison to live." The man subsequently called forth the cobra that had bitten the dead man by playing soundlessly upon a flute. A new immediacy of preoccupation began from that moment for the British soldier. He must find out more concerning this Indian wisdom. In Benares they told him were many gurus. He must go to Benares. Diligent inquiry finally led him to Bhagawan Sri. He asked the guru to teach him something of Yoga and breath control.

"Pranayama" replied the guru, "would be more dangerous for you than polo, Sahib, for it cannot be performed without purification and prayer.....You eat meat and indulge in an unnatural amount of exercise. The way will be long for you."

After nine years of life full of conflict and pain and adventure the Englishman was once again upon his way to the guru. The little he had tasted of the wisdom drew him irresistably. Was it for him, he wondered, was it to be his mission to bring the Eastern wisdom to his own countrymen? He found his old guru together with two friendly disciples at Katgodam.

"I see signs," observed the guru, "that you have progressed in the Path. But the journey is a far one." Yeats-Brown did not feel encouraged. Nevertheless he pressed on, begging that he be accepted.

"You have seen much and learned much during these years, Sahib" said the guru, "but you have not learned to love. And love, you know, is the first as well as the last virtue of the Path."

"Can it be taught?"

"You must first learn indifference, Sahib, for love can only come into stillness."

Entreaty was of no avail. In the end Yeats-Brown returned in disappointment. Yet the last words of the Englishman concerning the Hindu teacher, are:

"And as all colours mingle and merge in sunlight, so in him the blending of all these beliefs showed forth love."

A moving book and a stirring—one of the most brilliant touching India that has appeared in recent years.

NEWS AND VIEWS.

NOTES.

Release of Mahatma Gandhi:—On Monday the 25th January, Lord Irwin ordered the release of Mahatma Gandhi and other members of the Working Committee and cancelled the notification under the Criminal Law Amendment Act declaring the committee an unlawful association. The following is the text of the Viceroy's statement made thereon: 'In order to provide an opportunity for considering the statement made by the Premier on January 19, the Government in consultation with the local Governments have thought it right that the members of the Working Committee of the All-India Congress should have full liberty of discussing between themselves and with those who have acted as members of the committee since January 1, 1930. In accordance with this decision and with this object and in order that there may be no legal bar to any meeting they may wish to hold, the notifications declaring the committee to be an unlawful association under the Criminal Law Amendment Act will be withdrawn by all local Governments and action will be taken for the release of Mr. Gandhi and others who are members of the Working Committee or who have acted as such since January 1, 1930. My Government will impose no conditions on those released because we feel that the best hope of restoration of peaceful conditions lies in discussions being conducted by those concerned under terms of unconditional liberty. Our action has been taken in pursuance of a sincere desire to assist the creation of such peaceable conditions as would enable the Government to implement the undertaking given by the Premier that if civil quiet is proclaimed and assured the Government would not be backward in response. I am content to trust those who will be affected by our decision to act in the same spirit as inspires it and I am confident that they will recognise the importance of assuring for these grave issues a calm and dispassionate examination.'

General Amnesty Essential:—Mahatma Gandhi and many other Congress leaders including all members of the Working Committee at some time since the Committee was declared unlawful, who were released this week proceeded immediately to Allahabad where Pandit Motilal Nehru is seriously ill. As the Working Committee has agreed to suspend decision on the Round Table Committee's proposals and in view of Pandit Motilal's condition, only informal consultations are possible. But Mahatma Gandhi expressed the general feeling when he told press representatives that the release of all Civil Disobedience prisoners is essential before the Congress party can take up the questions involved. If it is the main objection that the release of thousands in jail may result in intensification of Civil Disobedience, there is not much force in it as the released leaders, if so disposed, can easily raise other thousands for the purpose. The Viceroy has been content to trust the goodwill of the leaders, and it will be only a further proof of trust which is unlikely to be misplaced if the amnesty is extended to all civil disobedience prisoners. In this connection, it is surprising that prosecutions of political leaders still continue and that Mr. Subash Bose, Mayor of Calcutta, has been again sent to jail for holding Independence Day celebration which was allowed in Bombay and other places, without the usual Police interference. If Government seriously desire a favourable atmosphere, they should see that Executive action is properly co-related to Government policy and the two are not at cross purposes.

Unreasoning Invective:—The attacks on Mahatma Gandhi in some British journals for his statement on his release intended to clarify his position, are hard to understand. The liquor trade is not an integral part of British policy and its maintenance against the consensus of Indian sentiment is perhaps the most damaging indictment of British Rule. The Viceroy in his personal statement on the picketing Ordinance expressly declared that he respected the actions of those who were working for temperance reforms, and the Bombay High Court reversed the conviction of Mrs. Lukmani on the ground that picketing liquor shops to dissuade, by peaceful means, persons from buying liquor rather a meritorious social service and could not be classed as a wilful breach of the Viceroy's Ordinance. It would be ridiculous if any one believes that the scheme of Federal India now offered will make any difference to the Prohibition movement. On the contrary, it will benefit it by enabling its extension to the States, many of which are obliged to follow the British Indian Excise policy in spite of their own inclinations, as imported foreign liquor is not readily amenable to their control. One of the first measures of a truly national Indian government will certainly be the early suppression of the manufacture, import and sale of intoxicating drinks and drugs. Next, as regards cotton cloth, surely it is against economic science and equity that India which grows cotton much beyond her own needs, has a large unemployed weaver population, should depend for any part of her supply on countries which have no natural facilities for the production of cloth. It will be a denial of an elementary duty for a national Indian government to acquiesce in the present state of the cotton trade, both export and import. The Customs Tariff should be fully used to stop the import of foreign liquor and to promote the rapid expansion of the Indian mill and hand-loom industries. If the immediate total abolition of the Salt Duty is open to financial objections an undertaking to extinguish it in five or ten years and the prompt adoption of measures to carry it out will go a long way to conciliate public opinion. This will be in entire accord with Mahatma Gandhi's demand that Government should initiate these reforms pending the transfer of power to Indian hands as an earnest of their resolve to give Swaraj. The repeal of the Ordinances dealing with the civil disobedience movement follows naturally from the new policy enunciated by the Prime Minister. There is no sense in sending more people to prison while engaged in considering the release of those who are already there for the same offences.

Fundamental Rights:—We publish today the well-considered memorandum which Dewan Bahadur Ramchandra Row, the first President of the Indian State People's Conference, circulated to his colleagues of the Round Table Conference. In it, he urges the necessity, in view of the proposed federation of British India and the States, of embodying in the constitution certain fundamental rights of citizens both in British India and the States. Sir Mirza Ismail, the Dewan of Mysore, he points out, has in his scheme placed before the Conference, recognised the importance of such a provision. Although recently, citizens in British India have not been very much ahead of those of Indian States in respect of their civil rights, the British Indian system normally provides for them, and if British India were alone concerned, there can not be any objection to embody them in the constitution, though the Government of India in their Despatch did not see their way to make a definite recommendation and left the matter to be decided at the Round Table Conference. In many of the States, the idea of such rights, as the Dewan Bahadur shows, is utterly strange, and their introduction will involve a radical change in the conception of the relation of subjects to rulers. Unless, however, there is a common basis of citizenship, there can be no true federation, and we may assume that the Princes who have supported the proposal are prepared to grant these rights. There is an omission in the list of rights drawn up by Dewan Bahadur Ramachandra Row which cannot but strike the reader. He refers to the importance of a free press as an adjunct to good government and comments on its absence in most States in his memorandum. But freedom of the Press is not specifically mentioned among his eleven points, though right of public meeting and association is. Without a free Press, citizens are without the means of maintaining and exercising most of their other rights. The omission, therefore, is obviously due to inadvertence.

Freedom of India:—The Freedom of India Council organised a big demonstration at the Birmingham Town Hall on the 14th instant. Mr. Horace Alexander presided. Speakers included Mrs. Brijlal Nehru, Mrs. Despard, Professor Ranga and Mr. Fenner Brockway. The latter said there was no reason why India should not be independent and solve her own problems. The Conference, although unrepresentative, had opened the eyes of the British people to the seriousness of the situation in India. Analysing the Sapru-Reading proposals, Mr. Brockway said these could not satisfy anyone in India because most power was still reserved in the hands of the British agent. No lasting settlement can be hoped for unless the political prisoners were released unconditionally and given an opportunity to negotiate with the British, the conclusions of the Conference being regarded as new basis for discussion. Twelve hundred people passed a resolution in these terms with two dissentients.—“Hindu” Special Cable.

opinion which alone is the true strength of governments. While Mr. Baldwin spoke as if Federation is a settled conclusion, the Prime Minister emphatically declared that everything in the blue-book on the Round Table Conference is provisional. One of the important matters to which attention will be devoted in the discussions in this country, is the correct definition of the relative places of the States and British India in the federal scheme. The speeches of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State show that they have taken a full and true measure of the political situation in this country. Mr. Wedgwood Benn's speech is a complete vindication of Mahatma Gandhi.

Another remarkable speech in the debate was that of Sir Isaac Foot. He pleaded fervently for safeguards for the emancipation of the depressed classes. We heartily support his dictum that the real test of the progress of India twenty years hence will be what we have done for these people. “I am a believer in self-government for India because I believe that upon these lines there is the best hope for these people,” said Sir Isaac, who throughout maintained a high idealistic stand-point. “If I had any advice to give to future Governors,” he said, “it would be ‘let your main concern be for these people.’ They may be defenceless now but one day they will be strong as there is justice upon this earth. There is no bank that can keep back for ever the accumulated sufferings of these people.” Unseen powers at the Round Table Conference, said Mr. Fenner Brackway, had been Mr. Gandhi in jail and behind him 60,000 others. There is much in the speeches of responsible British statesmen in the House of Commons to encourage the Congress party to take a direct hand in revising and implementing the provisional conclusions of the London Conference.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, JANUARY 31, 1931.

THE ROUND TABLE CONFERENCE
IN PARLIAMENT.

One thing which emerged most clearly from the debate in the House of Commons on Monday on the Round Table Conference, was that Mr. Winston Churchill's views on the Government of India, are repudiated by all the British political parties, not least by his own. The leader of the Conservatives, Mr. Baldwin, began his speech by saying that if Mr. Churchill had followed the practice of Indian politicians of observing a day of silence, he (Mr. Baldwin) like the Liberal leader, Mr. Lloyd George, would not have thought it necessary to speak in the debate. Mr. Baldwin's speech, however, was a very important one, and since it would not have been spoken but for Mr. Churchill's, Mr. Churchill is entitled to the credit of having indirectly contributed to enhance the interest and significance of the debate. Mr. Baldwin declared that if ever he was called again to bear responsibility, he would do all in his power, subject to what had been said in the matter of safeguards, to ensure co-operation in an equal partnership to carry out the undertakings given again and again by British Governments. Only by so doing, he argued, would it be possible any longer to maintain the unity of all British political parties in relation to India, without which no British Government will have a chance of coping with the problems of Indian Government. It was just because such unity was absent in the case of Ireland, Mr. Baldwin confided to the House, Britain was faced with the alternatives of complete surrender or war, and he had accepted surrender. Such a contingency should be avoided in the case of India, and that was one main reason why he could not think of going back on the Round Table Conference, the central, almost the sole, achievement of which, he held, was the foreshadowing a United States of India. But for the acceptance by the Princes of the federal idea, Mr. Baldwin suggested that the attitude of Mr. Churchill would have been of more account. "I quite agree with what has been said by Sir Samuel Hoare and Sir John Simon," said Mr. Baldwin, "that very little indeed has been agreed to by the Conference but none the less one striking fact is the agreement in principle that we should work for a federal system. That is what I mean by implementing the work. I should consider it my duty, as far as I were able, if I were the leading party, still to use every effort in my power to bring about the federal constitution."

This, however, was not the purpose for which the Conference was called. While we attach great importance to the closer relations of British

India and the States implied by a federal scheme, and are prepared to acquiesce in the relatively slower pace of advance which must result from this unequal yoking, we cannot accept the view which makes such an essential as responsibility in the Central Government conditional on the States agreeing to come into a federation. One of the important matters which has yet to be settled, is the terms, representation in the Legislature, for instance, on which the States insist as the condition of their co-operation. There is a strong feeling even among moderate men in British India that these terms, so far as they have transpired, are exorbitant and cannot be allowed without serious detriment to the whole structure of responsible Government. It is conceivable, therefore, that agreement may not be possible on the terms of federation and if this happens, what will be the position? Is British India to be denied Swaraj unless she satisfies the demands of the Princes, however extravagant they may be? The Princes may not make exorbitant demands but what if they do? The Conservatives would insist on British India yielding, and if it does not, they would deny British India responsible Government. The Prime Minister and the Secretary of State and their party, however, take a view which is more consistent with the Viceroy's statement that the States should be afforded an opportunity of finding their place in the future Indian polity. "Speaking for myself" said the Prime Minister, "before the conference met, after a study of what had been said in India, I had come to the conclusion that even if British India alone came into confederation, or the question had to be considered by us, we should have had, by hook or by crook, to devise some means of giving some responsibility to the Central Government. Nothing would have been accepted without that. The question was, "Was it possible to give it?" If it was possible, it ought to be given. If it was not possible no agreement was possible." Mr. Wedgwood Benn was even more explicit and emphatic. No government, he said, can survive unless it has the support of public opinion. "All the struggle in India in the last year has not been a physical struggle at all. It has never been a question of force and power. We have had power in plenty. We have had police forces and armies. The struggle in India has been a struggle for the support of Indian opinion. No government can be strong unless it has moral support." All this struggle, of course, has been in British India and none at all in the States. We welcome the entrance of the States into Federal relations but unless they take their people with them, while they may add to the lathi power at the disposal of Government, they cannot add to the moral support of public

EXTERMINATING A RACE.

(By S. B. ADITYAN, M.A.)

On the New Year's day an extra-ordinary message was received in London.

A "group of savages" who inhabit the Irrawady delta in Burma had risen in "rebellion." They had emerged with swords, spears and clubs and fallen on peace-loving citizens with great ferocity. The loss of life had been regrettably heavy.

This was how the rising, against which the Burma Rifles and a Punjabi Regiment were engaged, was reported in an influential London journal. It went on to lay down that the savage species should be extinguished.

It seems easy work to exterminate a troublesome race. It appeals strongly to the imagination of the off-with-his-head tempered section of the British public.

But is the work as easy as it looks? It is recorded that the early settlers in Australia rubbed poison into carcasses of sheep or into masses of flour and placed them in the bush with the hope that the Blacks would eat them and die. On December 15, 1838, seven white settlers, charged with the massacre of thirty natives, pleaded: "It has been so common that we had no idea it was against the law."

In the case of the "tribes" of the North West Frontier, matters were not carried so far. There was talk of using poison gas on them. But the policy was not adopted.

The instance of Ireland is typical. In the middle of the last century, there was a huge exodus out of that country due, some say, to inevitable causes and others say to deliberate intention of the British Government. The Irish people emigrated to foreign countries, mostly to America, by the hundred and by the thousand.

Lord Palmerston, who later became Prime Minister, was at that time the minister in charge of Home Affairs. On the subject of the Emigration he wrote this:—"The Irish emigration will, I hope, go on, and it would be a great good thing if a large number of Catholic Celts would go off to America, so that their place might be filled by Protestant Anglo-Saxons. This is the kind of operation that is going on."

It would seem, therefore, that the operation of displacing the Irish people with the English in Ireland was fully supported by responsible politicians.

The Blacks of Australia survive. At least, the Prime Minister of Australia said so last October. The Irish race survives and thrives. Could the "savages" of Tharrawady be exterminated?

It promises to be a stiff job if it were attempted. The civilised world may not look on without criticism. Besides, the "savages" are not so primitive as made out in the Press. They are savages somewhat as the Germans were during the War—for propaganda purposes.

THE FUTILITY OF REPRESSION.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

It is admitted on all hands that a policy of repression, as a means of establishing stable government during critical times, is simply futile, and that a policy of conciliation alone is the sovereign remedy for the afflicted body politic. But, one is sorry to remark that the Government here, like the Bourbons of old, learn nothing and forget nothing.

The latest example of the same is to be found in the speech of His Excellency the Viceroy at the fourth session of the Legislative Assembly. Whilst referring to repressive measures adopted so far as a counterblast to the Nationalistic movement, Lord Irwin observed: "I am bound, so long as a movement designed to undermine and sap the foundations of Government holds the front place in the programme of the great Congress organisation, to resist it to the uttermost of my strength."

It goes without saying that such an utterance is entirely a misfit, especially, whilst an appeal is being made "that all the best elements, both here and in Great Britain, should join hands in the work of elaborating and bringing to fruition the undertaking so well begun in London and thus place the seal of friendship once again upon the relations of two peoples whom unhappy circumstances have latterly estranged," and also in view of the fact that, due to repressive measures, the Congress movement has grown in strength and extent.

This is not the only reason for throwing cold water on a policy of repression in the country. The "strong hand" system of Government is more or less a damp squib and finds no sponsor even in England at present. The Nation and Athenaeum writes:—"Amritsar, and the controversy which followed it, showed that the 'strong hand' school of thought has few adherents in the modern generation. It is based on ideas and conceptions which are essentially pre-War, and depends upon a military and Public School tradition, which is, fortunately, moribund." (Vide the "Hindu," January 12, p. 12.)

It may, therefore, be observed, in all humility, that, as repression is futile, the Indian Government, to turn over a new leaf, should adopt conciliatory methods hereafter, not only for "bringing to fruition the undertaking so well begun in London," but also for seeing "the dawn of a happier day in India," which His Excellency the Viceroy so much longs for.

SWAMI VIVEKANAND.*

[ BY SIR LALUBHAI SAMALDAS. ]

The contact with Western culture, and specially the criticisms of the early Christian Missionaries awoke in the minds of our educated and religiously inclined persons a desire to turn their eyes inwards and search for defects or exerecences that may have grown up during the Mahomedan rule, and to remove them. As a result of this inward search were started Brahma Samaj in Bengal and Prarthana Samaj in Bombay, similar to Brahma Samaj in creed but differing from it as regards reform in social customs. Both these schools accepted in main the teachings of the Upanishads, but adopted some of the practices of prayer from Christianity. Both were also keen on Social Reform, the Brahma Samaj being more advanced than Prarthana Samaj in so far that they declined to be classed as Hindus. Swami Dayanand Saraswati when he started the Arya Samaj paid more attention to the Vedas and rituals prescribed therein. His interpretation of the Vedas differed from that of the old Bhashykaras like Sayanacharya. His movement took up Social Service as one of the activities and at times Politics were mixed up with Social Service. Swami Vivekanandji whose 69th birthday anniversary we are celebrating tolay was a combination of a Bhakta, a mystic and a Social Servant. His ambition was to "restate the ancient metaphysical thought of India in terms of modern science and philosophy" and in a style which could be understood by any one having a fairly good knowledge of the English language. He did not want to mould his religion on a combination of old Hindu and other religions, nor did he desire to reinterpret the Vedas or the Vedanta; what he aimed at was to get back the pristine purity of Hinduism, chiefly Vedanta philosophy, and to preach this simpler form of Hinduism not only in India but in other countries in the West chiefly England and America. He had such deep abiding Faith in the Catholocity and all inclusive wideness and depth of Hindu religion and philosophy that he did not see the necessity of incorporating new ideas in his dissertations on the teachings of Hinduism. His ideal was religious renaissance rather than religious reform. Over and above being a Vedanti he was a devotee and as such was not against idol-worship. Superficially looking at this combination Swamiji's beliefs may appear self-contradictory; but if we examine his efforts at synthetizing the four Yogas—Rajyoga, Karma Yoga, Bhakti Yoga, and Jnana Yoga, we will find this apparent contradiction disappearing, if we fully understand the gist of his teaching. He thought Hinduism was capable of giving help and guidance to other religions. He also thought that Hinduism had been too long in a static condition and that during this period the old purity of the Religion was being concealed by a growth of all kinds of rituals and superstition. He wanted to remove those obstacles and make Hinduism as pure as it was in the period of the Upanishads and then to make a dynamic force of it and not to allow it again to stagnate. Although the Swamiji had personally renounced the world, he did not want all his disciples to renounce the world. He calls concentration in worldly affairs a Tapsya and even greatness in worldly matters a spiritual asset. In the following message he gives the essence of his Teaching. He says "Consider life to be a battle-field and work to him who comes here with a craven heart. Shy not society; serve it heart and soul. Social Service is equivalent to Divine worship. So long as life endures let it be consecrated to self-elevation, Social Service and Divine Worship." In the last sentence we have the crux of all the four Yogas. At the early age of thirty he felt the urge to go to America and give his message to all collected at the Parliament of Religions in Chicago. In quite a different sense from Julius Caesar's well-known phrase, it may be said of him that he went, he saw and he conquered.

A little before the time that the Swamiji went to America, a movement for the inculcation of teachings of the East to the people in that country and others had been started by Madame Blavatsky and Col. Olcott, the promoters of the Theosophical Society. Madame Blavatsky based her teachings more on the philosophy of Bhagwan Buddha than that of the Upanishads. Moreover without meaning any disparagement to the promoters of this Society, it may be said that a Hindu born and bred up in the country can enter into the spirit of Hinduism or even Buddhism better than any persons studying the subject from a distance, and after they had received their preliminary training in other Faiths. The Swamiji had therefore a virgin field in which to sow his seeds of Hinduism and the greatest homage is due to him for having taken the single-handed responsibility of preaching in a foreign country a religion new to the peoples of that country. By his great success at Chicago at the Parliament of Religions he enabled Hinduism to walk with her head erect and hold her own amongst other religions. One of the effects of Swamiji's mission to America was that there was practically a cessation of the revilement of Hindu religion by Christian Missionaries and others. Hindus cannot be sufficiently grateful to the Swamiji for having increased the stature of Hinduism in the eyes of other religions.

Before going to America the Swamiji toured round the greater portion of this country not forgetting my own Province of Kathiawad. He saw poverty and misery amongst the masses and was so appalled by it that he felt and said that "a hungry stomach must be fed first before spiritual knowledge could be imparted." Poverty and Spirituality in his opinion could ill go together and consequently improvement in the material condition of the people formed an important part in all his schemes of the regeneration of India. He was so much affected by the poverty he saw all round him, that on one occasion in an outburst of sympathetic feelings he said: "Let each one of us pray day and night for the down-trodden millions of India. I am no metaphysician, no philosopher, nay, no saint. But I am poor, I love the poor and feel for the two hundred millions of men and women sunken for ever in poverty and ignorance. They cannot find light or education. Let us unite our wills in continued prayer for their good." The Swamiji was not content with mere prayer; nor did he agree with the old religious teachers about the definition of the Sattva Guna. At one place he says: "Do you think that one who does not exert himself at all, who only takes the name of Hari shutting himself in a room, who remains quiet and indifferent even when seeing a huge amount of wrong and violence done to others before his very eyes, possesses the quality of Sattva?" His travels had taken him to England and America and gave him enough opportunities of seeing the tremendous power of men's faith in themselves. An English boy, says the Swamiji, will tell you "I am, an Englishman, I can do anything." "Can our boys," he asks "say the same thing here? No, nor even the boys' fathers; we have lost faith in ourselves." In making these remarks the Swamiji trenches upon politics and in his desire to train up Indians to have more faith in themselves he has been supported by all later politicians and by none so well as Mahatma Gandhi, the saint-patriot now at Yerrowda.

The Swamiji not satisfied with mere praying for the poverty-stricken millions of India, had prepared various plans for spreading education among them for making them physically strong and for improving their social and economic condition. Though he had renounced the world, he was anxious to work for the masses; though a Bhakta and Jnani he was a Karma Yogi. It may be truly said of him without exaggeration that he belonged to the type of Janka-Videhi. It is but fit on the anniversary of the departed saint, we should do what we can to help the people—a few of course—to improve their economic conditions. It is with this object that the disciples of Swamiji decided to have an exhibition of Arts and Industries of the country during the week following the Swamiji's birthday. They are quite justified in including Arts with Industries, as Swamiji was fond of fine Arts and was a gifted musician himself. When Mr. Vakil is the principal speaker and where Messrs. Dey and Dutt are the organisers, the Arts side is sure to receive as much importance as it deserves. I wish the Exhibition every success.

THE INDIAN CHRISTIAN MARRIAGE ACT.

THE HAVOC OF SECTION 68 AND ITS REMEDY.

( BY MR. KOPARGAM RAMAMURTI. )

The tragedy of Section 68 of the Indian Christian Marriage Act, and its menace to the true interests of Religion and inter-communal amity in India, have been considered in two previous issues of the Reformer (10th and 17th January). It is time that we sought out a remedy for its havoc.

It is indeed sad to reflect how much human suffering and injustice might have been avoided if only a little sympathetic insight and imagination had been allowed to play their part in the determination of guilt under this section, even apart from the question of its legitimate scope. If, instead of starting with a determined stand on the obscure and unargued Ruling of 1871 as conclusive and final and expending all powder and shot solely to demolish the acquitting Sessions Judges who, in view of that unsatisfactory ruling, seized on some plausible legal quibble or other in each case, "feeling for a way of evading," as Mr. Justice Walsh puts it, a construction of the Act which palpably offended against broad humanities and common sense, the Honourable Judges of the High Court of Madras had only deigned to ask themselves what it was that the alleged culprit had wanted and hoped to accomplish by the Marriage ceremonial which he administered with Hindu rites to a person known to be till then a member of the Christian community, the answer which they would have been forced to give to themselves would have also saved them from committing a gross injustice and inflicting an insufferable wrong.

Was it the wish of the Hindu priest to perform a Hindu marriage to a Christian while the latter remained to the end a "Christian" in the legal sense? Or was it his desire and expectation that the whilom 'Christian' would be transformed somehow by his priestly officiation into a properly wedded "Hindu"? A little reflection would convince any one that when a Hindu, be he even a Pariah, undertakes to conduct the marriage ceremony of his caste, his purpose is not to pronounce a futile mock benediction on a heterogeneous couple of different religious faiths but to "convert" the Christian party into a Hindu religiously and lawfully competent to marry the other Hindu in the course of the same ceremony.

It may be that the Hinduism of the new convert would require a broad and liberal construction, conflicting perhaps sharply in some respects with the strict orthodox view. It may be, as authoritatively declared by His Holiness Sri Shankaracharya of Kevir Pith at the conversion of Miss Nancy Miller (now Maharani Sharmishta Devi Holkar) that "to admit Christians and Muhammadans to Hinduism is not to ask those who seek it to give up their faiths, but rather to enable them to enlarge their outlook and widen their horizon and live a broader and more tolerant life, doing what lies in one's power to promote the happiness and content of the world." It may be that the family law governing Hindus under the fossilizing care of orthodox British administrators in this country, has failed to keep pace with the tremendous daily changes in the people's conception of the proper place and mission of Hinduism in the modern world. It may also be that there are differences of opinion and usage between different castes and communities, and even between different Judges of a Matrimonial Court, as to whether the preliminary ceremonial concerned with the conversion and the ceremonial proper relating to the Marriage are to be two distinct processes separated from each other by a visible interval of time or can both be disposed of together at one continuous sitting, or whether the Hindu religious rite of marriage commencing as it does with the Hindu mode of worship and ceremonial purification, is to be deemed sufficient by itself to effect the 'conversion' necessary to validate the marriage, though not preceded by a formal recantation of faith in one religion or declaration of faith in another. But in any case and under any circumstances, it should not have been possible for an Honourable High Court in India, when dealing with a Criminal charge involving such serious consequences as are prescribed by section 68, to misjudge the nature of the act which the participants in such marriage believed themselves to be engaged in and convict them of a criminal "knowledge" that Hindu marriage rites were being administered to a professing 'Christian.'

It is of course easy to be wise after the event. It is easier still to be wise with the wisdom of others. And it requires no wisdom at all to pose as wiser than one's betters, and profess astonishment at the obtuseness or callousness of one's most esteemed and eminent superiors. But, with humble respect and without seeking to cast any doubt on the legal correctness of each ruling on the facts as they were represented to the naked eye of the Court in each case, it must nevertheless be felt and regretted that no such sympathetic discernment and humane concern for consequences as might be expected from the highest tribunal of justice in the Province was ever brought to bear on any of the decisions under Section 68. Had that been done there would have been no difficulty in bringing every one of those cases under the still older and more benign precedent of 1886, namely, the classic Ruling of Justices Holloway and Innes which recognised a Christian's freedom of conversion to Hinduism and marriage with Hindu rites, a ruling which has been the parent and precursor of many such rulings by the same High Court under varying conditions, right down to the latest by Mr. Justice Pandalai in Anthony's case in September 1930. (I. L. R. 33 M. 342; Ibid 371; A. I. R. 1928 Madras 1278; 41 I. S. R. 88.)

Or, if there was a conscientious technical doubt felt by the Honourable Court as to the legal adequacy of the same single ceremony for the double purpose of Conversion and Marriage, it could at least, for purposes of assessing guilt under section 68, have held without compunction, as Mr. Justice Walsh did in 40 Allahabad, that "when a person on the eve of his Marriage resists all pressure and persuasion to be married as a Christian by a Christian ceremony, and, having by birth and connections other religious associations, deliberately decides to marry a Hindu according to Hindu rites, and does public worship to Hindu gods in the presence of his relations and friends, he is not a person professing the Christian religion."

But that was not the course taken by the Honourable High Court of Madras. It not only insisted that the Christian Marriage Act had jurisdiction to punish the performance of a non-Christian marriage to a Christian,—a view which destroyed the Muslim priest's religious and personal freedom possessed from ancient times under the Shari'at,—but also tacitly assumed as against a Hindu priest, that voluntary participation in a Hindu religious ritual made no difference to the legal status of a Christian bride or bridegroom and did not save them or the priest from criminal liability under section 68.

LEAGUE AGAINST UNEMPLOYMENT.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The times call for good-will, and it needs no prophet to declare that all that has been done to secure the peace, happiness and prosperity of India as a contented member of the Empire will come to nought if the British people in India are averse to creating the proposed League Against Unemployment with the Viceroy as President, the Governors of the Provinces as Vice-Presidents, and influential men in India as members of the League which shall be open to all races, castes and creeds in India.

As outlined in the scheme sent to the General Secretary of the Central Administration European Association, Calcutta, it will not involve any cost to the State or impoverish any person.

There is no violence so deadly as the violence done to the moral fibre of men through unemployment, and the creation of the proposed League is the most correct remedy to assure civil quiet. The request to first remove the disease—civil disobedience—and the remedy can then be applied, is now held by most reasonable men in the country to mean that once the disease has disappeared, no remedy will be needed to atone for the injury done to the moral standards of thousands now overflowing the jails which has resulted from the suppression by Lord Reading's Government in August 1923 of the League for Prevention of Unemployment.

Every intelligent person knows that the demand of the National Congress for "complete freedom from British domination and British imperialism" does not mean complete separation from the British Empire. It means a "United Empire" and will solve the unemployment problem in the whole of India and in Great Britain, and will unite the scattered States of the Empire into an organic whole. Let it not be said of Britishers in India that they knew the right path but followed a different one and thereby dismembered the British Empire.

GUJARAT HIJRAT.

We have had, published in the dailies, the impressions of Mr. Brailsford, Sir Lallubhai Samaldas, Sjt. A. V. Thakkar, Father Elwin and several other distinguished visitors to the villages of Gujarat, which have launched out on a campaign of non-payment of Land Revenue as a part of the present Satyagraha movement. They all bear abundant witness to a ruthless policy of repression and terrorism being practised on the villagers by the police and revenue officers. Farmers have been indiscriminately beaten and abused, their moveable properties have been removed to realise the revenue due far in excess of any debts due to the Government, their lands have been declared forfeited, water pumps used to irrigate hundreds of acres have been wantonly put out of action thereby damaging the standing crops, and their homes are now desolate. In addition to these, there are allegations that the police have made no attempt to protect the deserted homesteads from the activities of incendiaries nor to trace the culprits. On the other hand, they appear to have put obstacles in the way of the villagers attempting to put out the fires which have been a curious feature of these villeges in the last few months. It does not appear to us any useful purpose can be served by multiplying instances and adding to the overwhelming evidence already placed before the public by painstaking and trust-worthy investigators after personal inquiry. We have ourselves visited some of the afflicted areas and examined cases of excesses and if there has been any deviation from facts in the published reports it has been on the side of moderation and understatement.

Several of the writers have described at length the attempts made by the revenue officers to set up factions in the village communities—Barias against Patidars, Musalmans against Hindus and so on. They have, of course, condemned unreservedly such a policy of divide and rule. Is this anything new? Is it not one of the basic principles of British Rule in India? Its poison has reached even the elite who have been nominated to frame a constitution for India at the Round Table Conference in London. Why then blame the petty local officials for working in unison with the fundamentals of the bureaucratic machine in India? The transfer of a Mamlatdar or sending on leave of a Collector is not going to end the trouble as some so innocently imagine. The remedy requires more drastic measures. We have to go to the root of the matter. This policy of division is one of the main roots of the bureaucracy. The bureaucracy has to die the death before anything can be achieved in the line of unity amongst the people. Let us not treat symptoms but let us pluck out the eye that offends us.

The visitors are unanimous in the tribute they pay to the bravery and determination of the people. We found the courage and patriotism of these simple folk an inspiration to us. We are often led into believing that the towns-people are more developed and advanced than the country cousins. This is a false impression based on externals. The people who live close to nature possess an unsophisticated strength of will and character and a social solidarity that we may well envy and emulate. This migration has brought about a feeling of neighbourly unity and has been a binding factor as all common misfortunes are. Everywhere one notices pervading in the camps a kind of family affection. People are thrown together, and they share and share alike the ups and downs of life. This fellow-feeling and sympathy brings along with it a cheerful disposition as their sorrows are halved and pleasures doubled by the sharing. This in a measure accounts for the smiling faces the visitor meets in the midst of so much trouble and privations. This faith and hope in their hearts make their movements light and springing. The knowledge that they are suffering for the country brings them the fortitude that amazes the visitor. The repressive policy of the Government has only made their determination stronger as the wider spreading of the no-tax campaign in the last few weeks bears witness.

We are rather surprised that even a friend like Father Elwin should be led away into using language that might lead the reader to infer that the repression is the result of the actions of Indian officials as even a word of disapproval from British officials would have stopped the abuses. We are certain Father Elwin will be the last person to suggest the invidious racial discrimination conveyed by his words. We, for our part, make no distinction between high and low or white or brown officers. All parties form one unified whole. If anything, those who know the way bureaucracy works, are aware of the fact that the lower officials know the minds of the higher ones even better than they themselves, as officials in a bureaucracy are not guided by public opinion in their actions but by the idea of preferment and gaining the approval of those above them in the official world. This leads to a close study of the mentality of their superiors. In any case it is the system that bears the blame and not individuals unless it be those right at the top.

Mr. Brailsford and others have stated that they cannot protest as long as the Government confine its remedial measures to those prescribed by Law and they raise their voices against only those ultra Revenue Code methods and terrorism adopted. This is strictly correct. The peasants themselves hesitate even to complain of such excesses as they are out for suffering. It is only when questioned that they come out with stories of the doings of the Police. But we cannot stop at this. We have to look further and see what this "Law" is. In advanced and democratic countries "Law" is the expressed will of the people. Does "Law" in India represent such conditions? If so, then we can go no further than Mr. Brailsford as society is based on obedience to such law provided always that the Law itself is not immoral. But in our country "Law" represents the will of the rulers and not of the people. The enactments of the legislatures are mere cloaks that cover a multitude of ordinances. Although we have not been aware of the fact, India has more or less been governed by ordinances. A legislature that has no power to override the will of the executive is a mere tool in the hands of the executive. It is a mask assumed by the executive to deceive people. We know in India, the Legislatures cannot pass a bill even against the will of the bureaucracy. Even a stalwart like Pandit Malaviya had to retreat before the opposition of the officials. This being so, and as long as it continues so, there is no "Law" in India. It is a modernised despotism. The Government itself is an irresponsible body and all its so-called "Laws" are but ordinances. The Land Revenue Code is one such. Even at present, the Government is engaged in putting on the stage dress of "Law" on two of its latest ordinances in the newly constituted Assembly. The Land Revenue Code has been framed by the executive for the executive. It naturally confers the widest powers on the officials. As though this were not enough, a few months ago further powers such as to enter closed houses at any time etc., were added. A perusal of the sections dealing with precautionary measures—(section 140-145) and those providing for the recovery of dues—(section 153 and following ones)—will convince the reader that Pharaoh himself could not have exercised greater powers over his Jewish slaves than the powers given to the revenue officers over our farmers. The framers of the Land Revenue Code seem to have drawn their inspiration from the Insolvency Laws of England. The Collector appears to have much the same power over the property of the farmer as the Official Receiver has over that of a debtor from the date of the Receiving order to the date of the discharge. Under the present law, the farmers are virtual undischarged bankrupts. Can we tolerate this ignominy any longer? We have been loud in denouncing the extremely powerful weapons handed over to the executive by the Viceroy in his ordinances and these only temporarily. But we have slept over more venomous instruments handed over in a permanent form to the Revenue Officials. A great deal of the responsibility for the suffering of the Hijratists will fall on the shoulders of those of us who call ourselves educated and pose as leaders of the people. The Land Revenue Code is a disgrace to any nation with a modicum of self-respect. It will have to go the way of the salt law and be obliterated from the statute book at the first opportunity under Swaraj.

Those who know even the normal working of the measures to recover the land tax will realise the burden imposed on the peasants. Under its provisions the executive throws unendurable imposts on the long suffering peasant. It may not be out of place here to place before the reader a few samples of the exactions.

It was only last year that the bureaucracy announced with all appearances of benevolence that owing to a bad season they suspend the amount due from certain of the villages of Matar Taluka. In the case of 27 villages they were willing to take only half the assessment and only in the case of 24 villages the full assessment were to be taken. It is not necessary to discuss here the case of villages totally exempted.

Of the villages under half assessment we have examined 80 families in all from the 5 villages. Dhathal, Kathwada, Matar, Machhial and Vavadi. The result shows a loss on the agricultural working itself before charging any interest or land revenue. These families have nothing whatever to live on and yet they have to pay half land revenue. This is generosity! 58 families were examined in the four villages, Antroli, Candana, Khandhali and Shetra. These showed a small gross profit on the working of Rs. 2,150 and the half revenue these families have to pay will be Rs. 939 leaving a balance of Rs. 1211 which averages about Rs. 21 per family to live on for the year. Is it not heartlessness to charge land revenue under such conditions?

Out of the 24 villages from which the full amount is demanded we examined 13. Here again 105 families in the 6 villages Bherat, Gobhalaj, Lalwal, Maliataj, Pansoli and Vedela show no gross profit at all but have to pay the full assessment. And 160 families in the 6 villages of Alindra, Kanera, Nayaka, Pinglaj, Radhavanj and Unthela show a gross profit of Rs. 10,210 and these families have to pay Rs. 7091 as land revenue which will leave on an average about Rs. 20 per family to maintain itself for the whole year.

The best results we have seen so far is in Navagam where the 50 families examined showed a gross profit of Rs. 14,048 and deducting the revenue due from them of Rs. 4,340 we have a gross income per family of Rs. 194. Indeed they are growing wealthy on Rs. 194 per family per year! Which businessman will feel justice has been done to him when he is taxed while his gross income is barely Rs. 200 per year on which to support a family? Yet this is the case after the generous suspension of revenue in Matar Taluka!

Has a Land Revenue Code which gives a free hand to the executive to tax starving farmers any claim to disgrace the statute book any longer? Can we wonder at the terrible indebted condition of the peasantry? If the hardships of Gujarat Hijratists have done nothing else but bring to light the terrors hidden within the pages of the Land Revenue Code and finally lead to the repeal of this statute they would not have suffered in vain and generations to come will call them blessed for undertaking the travail to bring to life a peasantry free from oppression.

RIGHTS OF FEDERAL CITIZENS.

The following memorandum relating to the fundamental rights of the people of Indian States in the future All-India Federation was circulated by Diwan Bahadur M. Ramchandra Rao, the first president of the Indian States' People's Conference among the members of the Round Table Conference in London :

Now that a Federal Constitution for the whole of India, including the Indian States, is under consideration, I should like to invite the attention of the members of the Conference to a question of supreme importance to the people of the States. It has been assumed that the rulers of the Indian States who are now members of the Round Table Conference and their Ministers represent the views of the people of the States and that there is an identity of interest, between the people of the States and their rulers in regard to the problems now occupying the attention of the Conference. It is unnecessary to discuss in any detail whether this position is sound, though there are many considerations which might lead one to an opposite conclusion. In framing a new Constitution the interests of the people of the States in some of the matters now under discussion are likely to be overlooked on this theory of identity of interests between the Rulers and their people. On the other hand some of the Rulers of the States have themselves admitted that the expression "the State" does not mean the Ruler alone. For example, His Highness the Maharaja of Bikaner publicly stated in his Legislative Council two years ago that the term "State" includes not the Ruler alone but that "the Ruler, his Government and his subjects are all component parts of, and all go to comprise, a State." He amplified the same idea by saying "that if the independence of a State goes the subjects of that State forthwith lose their integrity and individuality. If the State gains fiscally, it is not only the Princes, the Governments and subjects of the State gain most. If the State loses in such matters, such loss is shared by the State with the Princes and the Government.

In these circumstances, can it be seriously contended that the people of the States have no stake or should have no voice in effecting a change in the existing relations between the States and the paramount power or in the evolution of a new constitutional tie between British India and Indian States based on the federal principle? In this connection, attention is invited to the memorandum of the Indian States' People's Conference submitted to the Indian Statutory Commission, where it was contended that the integrity and independence of the States is as much the concern of the people as of the Princes and that any change in the existing relations between the States and the Paramount Power should not be effected without their consent. The States are not at present British territory, and their subjects are not British subjects in India. The subjects of Indian States are treated in British India as "foreigners" for certain purposes, and they have sometimes been deported from British India to the States under the powers conferred on the Government under certain existing enactments. Similarly, the Indian States authorities have expelled British Indian subjects from their States and the latter have no remedy. The people of Indian States are subject to the law of naturalisation in British India, though I am not aware of a corresponding law in any Indian State in regard to British Indian subjects. A federal constitution for the whole of India must materially affect the status and position of the people of the Indian States. What will be their future rights and obligations to their own States and to the new Government of a federated India? The terms on which this double allegiance is to be imposed must receive careful consideration. It is, therefore, unfortunate that the people of the States have not been afforded suitable opportunities for expressing their own views on the subjects dealt with in the Conference and it is to be hoped that at least at subsequent stages some attempt will be made to ascertain their views in regard to the new constitutional arrangements now contemplated.

Before dealing with the rights and obligations of the people of the Indian States in the future Constitution, it is perhaps necessary to briefly state the present position. The expression "Indian State" does not connote any particular form of government. The authors of the report on Constitutional Reforms have summarised the present position in the following words :

"They are in all stages of development, patriarchal, feudal, or more advanced, while in a few States are found the beginnings of representative institutions. The characteristic features of all of them, however, including the most advanced, are the personal rule of the prince and his control over legislation and the administration of justice."

So long as this characteristic feature of personal rule does not undergo a material change, the expression "Indian State" must be taken to mean the individual ruling prince of the State concerned and has no reference to the nature of the administration of the State. The most characteristic feature of the States is the absence of the rule of law. This is admitted. At the meeting of the Chamber of Princes held in February, 1928, the Chamber adopted a resolution in favour of the introduction of the rule of law in the States and at a subsequent meeting, held in Bombay in April, 1928, the Princes reaffirmed "their abiding determination as recorded in the last session of the Chamber of Princes to ensure the rule of law in their States and to promote the welfare and good government of their subjects." It is unnecessary to dilate at any length on the bundle of rights, privileges, and obligations summed up under these compendious words "Rule of law" which is admittedly absent from the States. At present there is no liberty of erson in the States, and if a person is put in prison, there is no remedy by way of a writ of "habeas corpus" against the officers detaining the person concerned in prison. Two years ago, His Highness the Maharaja of Bikaner publicly stated that he has been considering the question of extending the principle of "habeas corpus" in the judicial administration of the State. There is no security of property. The State, in its corporate capacity, cannot be sued in the municipal courts of most of the States. The rights of association and public meeting do not exist in almost all the States. Many of the conferences of the people of the States are held outside the States on account of the restrictions placed on the holding of public meetings. There are very few newspapers in the States. The Press in all countries is one of the great instruments of good Government; it does not exist in most of the States, and where few newspapers exist, the most stringent Press regulations have been enacted, with the result that criticism of the measures of the Government in the Indian States is almost impossible.

I have so far referred to the broad features of the present system of government in the Indian States, in any spirit of hostility to the States or with a view to casting any reflections on any individual Prince or the Princes' order, but solely with the purpose of drawing attention to one of the most important features of a Federal Constitution, namely equality of citizenship rights to the people of the federating States. So far as the people of British India are concerned, they have demanded some years that the basic principle of the new constitution must be a declaration of fundamental rights and that those rights must be guaranteed in a manner which will not permit their withdrawal under any circumstances. It is not necessary to set here fully the historical and political aspects of the question and the grounds on which this demand for constitutional guarantees has been put forward. British India is unanimous on the matter.

A WAY TO A HAPPY NEW YEAR.

leave the old with a burst of song, recall the right and forgive the wrong;
forget the thing that binds you fast
the vain regrets of the year that's past; have the strength to let go your hold the not worth while of the days grown old;

dare go forth with a purpose true, the unknown task of the year that's new;
help your brother along the road

NEWS AND VIEWS.

Prof. Karve's Tour of East Africa:—A Telegram from Mombasa dated January 21, says that Professor Karve, of Poona, accompanied by his wife, arrived there by the mail boat and opened a campaign for enlisting sympathy and support for the Indian Women's University. He delivered his first lecture on Friday the 16th and addressed a women's meeting on Sunday the 8th when a small purse was presented to him. He will address a mixed gathering of Europeans and Indians, Mr. Justice Thomas presiding. Prof. Karve has suggested a scheme for providing scholarships for East African Indian girls if sufficient funds are forthcoming. During his five months' stay he will visit the important centres in this country.

A French Example:—Pierre Laval, a butcher's son, who becomes Premier of France at the age of 47, has already made history. He has included a Negro in his Ministry by appointing Daigne, Deputy of Senegal, as Under-Secretary for Colonies. Laval was a Minister of Labour in the Tardieu Ministry. Other Ministers are:—Briand, Foreign; Maginot, War; Dumont, Marine; Dumesnil, Air; Flandin, Finance; Tardieu, Agriculture; and Reynaud, Colonies.—(Reuter.)

Indian Villages Without Schools:—A Central Provinces publication gives the following figures for Indian villages:—

Indian Provinces and States	Indian Villages	Indian Schools

Gwalior	9,538	797

Total (Incomplete) — 521,957 187,289

Despite several gaps in this list it is clear nearly two-thirds of Indian villages have no school.—The Dnyanodaya.

Nizam's Gift for Home Science College:—The All-India Womens' Education Fund Association held their second annual meeting at the Red Cross Hall on the 28th, instant Lady Irwin presided. The meeting fully discussed the report of the Central Committee for starting a Home Science College and adopted it after making one or two changes and amendments. Her Excellency announced that she had received a wire from the Nizam giving Rs. two lakhs towards starting the new institution. The meeting welcomed the announcement and passed a vote of thanks to the Nizam. With a vote of thanks to Her Excellency the meeting terminated.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

Pandit Motilal Nehru:—After a gallant struggle characteristic of his indomitable nature, Pandit Motilal Nehru passed away on Friday morning at Lucknow to which place he had been removed from his residence at Allahabad on Tuesday. His removal caused surprise, as on Monday it was stated by his doctors that he had passed through a crisis. The illness from which the Pandit was suffering, however, gave little hope of recovery and it was only a question of time when it would end fatally. There is a tragic pathos in his death on the very morning when the three delegates from London, who had cabled to him to suspend judgment landed in Bombay and were due to leave without delay for Allahabad to meet him, Mahatma Gandhi and Pandit Jawharlal Nehru. His death at this juncture is perhaps the greatest loss which the national movement can suffer. A man of great determination and unbounded courage, he had yet a keen eye to the realities of politics, and while passionately eager to see India free and self-governing, he was thoroughly aware that historical conditions prescribed a certain course for achieving this goal, which could not be departed from without injury to the national cause. No two men differed so much in their externals as Mahatma Gandhi and Pandit Motilal Nehru. The ascetic setting of the Mahatma had nothing in common with the princely surroundings of the Pandit, and yet no two men worked more loyally together. And today there is no one, outside the Nehru family, who will feel himself so crippled by the loss as Mahatma Gandhi. Allahabad with its long roads and scanty traffic has the air of a deserted city. The Provincial Government has abandoned it for Lucknow and even the train from Bombay does not think it worth while to go direct to Allahabad. But Pandit Motilal had made the city the head-quarters of Indian nationalism by the gift of the noble building, his old home, which is one of the sights of Allahabad. The sorrow of the bereaved family is shared by the whole country without distinction of class, creed or province.

Pickthall's Koran:—Mr. Marmaduke Pickthall was Editor of the Bombay Chronicle some years ago and won the respect of the public by his thoughtful and scholarly writings particularly on subjects bearing on Islamic religion and culture. The sanity and wisdom of his views, reinforced by his enlightened insight into the teachings of Islam, did much to clear the ground of prejudice and misconception which have been and still are the great barrier to a complete understanding between the two major Indian communities. So long as these remain and determine their attitude to each other, the basis for their real and permanent co-operation in the national interests, is wanting and no amount of constitutional safeguards can supply its place. In a recent statement on the Indian situation, the poet, Tagore, remarked that fifty years ago the relations between the two communities were without the asperity which is conspicuous at present. The reason is that then many men of light and leading in both communities had more opportunities of appreciating each other's culture. English education has not increased such opportunities. Rather the contrary, as the standard works of English literature are, as a rule, imbued with a deep prejudice against Islam. Not many Hindus, or Indian Mussulmans for that matter, are nowadays likely to study the Islamic scripture in the original Arabic in order to understand the true spirit of its teachings, as the Raja Ram Mohan Roy did. The wide diffusion of a knowledge of the contents of the Bible, which, to our mind, is the most important service of Christian missions, rather than the making of converts, has made possible the cultural understanding which prevents the clash of the political and economic interests of East and West from becoming an abiding factor in their appreciation of each other's character and civilisation. We expect that Mr. Pickthall's English translation of the Koran, entitled "The Meaning of the Glorious Koran"; which, in view of the collaboration of eminent Islamic scholars and divines and the conscientious scholarship and devout faith of the author, may be regarded as authoritative, will do the same service for Islam among English reading Indians and others. We have been eagerly looking forward for its appearance, ever since it was announced to be in preparation. We have hastily gone through a part of the work and the impression we have gained—the first impression of a book so gained is often the most reliable—is that it justifies the claim in the Publishers' note that "it takes the reader to the heart of Islam", and that it ranks "as something like an authorized English version."

Mahatma Gandhi's Statement:—Mr. Gandhi gave an interview to the Pioneer's special representative on the 4th instant before leaving for Lucknow and said: "I am a man of peace but circumstances have made my life one of struggle. I shall, however, leave no stone unturned to attain peace. It is no joy to me to submit thousands who have childlike faith in me to suffering." Continuing Mr. Gandhi remarked: "If Sir T. B. Saprú, Mr. Jayakar and Mr. Sastri are able to explain satisfactorily that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's declaration conveys something beyond what I have been able to make out on a cursory reading and if in the light of my eleven points, I see that a settlement is possible, I shall readily advise the calling off the Civil Disobedience movement." As regards the allegations of police excesses, he said, he had a file of evidence and wanted an impartial investigation and was quite prepared to lead evidence and abide by the verdict of the tribunal. Mr. Gandhi was clearly of the opinion that Congress participation depended on two things; firstly, a satisfactory adjustment of preliminaries to the suspension of Civil Disobedience movement and secondly satisfaction regarding the Conference. "I am doing everything," he said, "to terminate civil disobedience which will be done if I am sure that a full restoration will be made, prisoners are released and an impartial inquiry is held into the alleged police excesses and generally certain other necessary adjustments are made."

The Outlook:—Some one has said that if India is ever lost to Britain it will be on the floor of the House of Commons. Recent incidents suggest that the observation may not be altogether beside the mark. When the Viceroy made his famous statement regarding Dominion status, much of the satisfaction caused in this country was washed out by the debates which followed in the two Houses of Parliament. Similarly the speeches and proceedings at the Round Table Conference, have been much watered down by the subsequent discussion in the House of Commons during which it became painfully clear that the only thing agreed upon was that British India cannot obtain responsible Government unless the States agree to join it in a federation and that the Secretary of State and Sir Samuel Hoare, the Leader of the Conservative delegation, differed regarding the significance to be attached to the conclusions in other respects. The Working Committee of the National Congress met at Allahabad on the morrow of the House of Commons debate and adopted a resolution. At the same time, Pandit Motilal Nehru received a cable signed by Sir Tej Bahadur Saprú, and Messrs. Jayakar and Sastri requesting that the Congress should await their arrival before coming to a decision on the results of the Conference, in deference to which, it was announced, the Working Committee's resolution would not be published pending the conference with the three returning delegates. Mahatma Gandhi was released the next day and he and other released leaders foregathered at Anand Bhuvan. So far as we can judge, the informal discussions among them had not resulted in any material support to Mr. Vithalbhái Patél's hasty condemnation of the work of the Round Table Conference. On the contrary, Mahatma Gandhi seems to be seeking for a way out of the impasse created by the effect of the repressive measures of Government on the mentality of the rank and file of Congressmen. The delay in releasing the latter has made his task more and not less difficult, and it is to be hoped that this initial obstacle will be removed before another week is out by Government. It might be supposed that in view of the peace overtures, there would be a mitigation of the force of repressive measures in the country. On the contrary, astonishing to relate, some of the worst excesses of the present regime have taken place since the Round Table Conference rose. One of the very worst which has aroused great indignation is the lathi charge by the Police on the women of Borsad who marched in a procession to a public meeting which had been banned by the Police. The injuries caused by the beating administered have been testified to by several persons, men and women, of standing. Their statements have not been properly met in the Press Note issued by the Director of Information on behalf of Government. Mahatma Gandhi has written to the Viceroy demanding an independent enquiry into this and some other excesses as the condition of the Congress participating in the work proposed to be done in this country in continuance of the London session of the Round Table Conference. We do not see how this modest demand can be refused. A point of great significance, though only in a negative sense, is that the Lahore Congress resolution about Independence, has for the time being been allowed to remain in abeyance and not to operate as a bar to further parleyings.

A Severe Snub:—The Bombay Government started two prosecutions of newspapers on the charge of assisting the operations of an unlawful assembly, namely, the "War Council" as the Congress Working Committee in Bombay is called. The first case was against the editor Mr. Brelvi, and the publisher, Mr. Kapadia, of the Bombay Chronicle for publishing the programme of a function organised by the "War Council." Mr. Brelvi, who was a member of the All-India Working Committee of the Congress, itself a body which had been declared 'unlawful', did not participate in the trial and was sentenced to five months imprisonment. The publisher, Mr. Kapadia, was defended by Counsel, but he, too, was sentenced to the same term, though his responsibility was merely technical. Now, Mr. Brelvi has been released under the amnesty extended to members of the Working Committee, but Mr. Kapadia continues to languish in prison! The second case was that of Mr. S. Sadanand, editor and publisher, of the Free Press Bulletin. His alleged offence consisted in reproducing a paragraph from a cyclostyled "Congress Bulletin" and a statement of a President of the War Council. After a protracted trial, Mr. Sadanand was also sentenced to a term of imprisonment on one count and acquitted on the other. He appealed to the High Court against his conviction on the first count, while Government appealed against his acquittal on the second count. The High Court has allowed Mr. Sadanand's appeal and acquitted him, and have rejected the Government appeal. Mr. Sadanand is to be congratulated on his success. The rejection by the High Court of the Government appeal against his acquittal can only be regarded as a severe snub by which, it may be hoped, the officials responsible will not fail to profit.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1931.

A DEPLORABLE LAPSE.

The London Correspondent of the Statesman describes in glowing terms the banquet given by the British Indian delegates to the Round Table Conference to British representatives and statesmen. "Never," he writes, "has a larger and more consistently distinguished and withal representative company assembled in London." He adds: "Never was better food eaten or wine drunk." He winds up his account with the remark that by universal consent the evening was a memorable one and laughter went far to undo the ravages of the hottest curry ever washed down by a superb if greatly abused champagne." If for a moment, we think of representatives of the United States entertaining people in London to a banquet at which wines and champagne were provided we cannot fail to see that the Americans in London would be holding up to British ridicule the national policy of Prohibition. This is exactly what the delegates from British India who were the hosts at this banquet, did though they seem to have been strangely indifferent to it. Prohibition is the declared national policy of India, sanctioned by a long and strong religious and social tradition, endorsed by all political parties, and accepted by the Central and Provincial Legislatures. It will be one of the first things to be given effect to with the introduction of responsible government. It was incumbent on the British Indian delegates, if they took their representative character seriously, to respect the national sentiment, even if personally some of them may not share it, and to take every opportunity of testifying to it in their conduct on at least public occasions as representatives of their country. Nothing could have impressed so strongly the British statesmen and publicists at the banquet with the reality of the demand for Prohibition and the public opinion behind it, as the exclusion of liquor from the feast, though it might have perhaps detracted somewhat from the hilarity of the occasion and perhaps the flow of postprandial eloquence. With thousands of men and women in prison and enduring other pains and penalties, there was little occasion for hilarity. We are sometimes asked,—an Indian correspondent in his letter headed "the Indian Riddle" which is published elsewhere subtly suggests the same question—why we, who have not espoused civil disobedience, should not be identified with the Indian Liberals and others represented at the Round Table Conference. Here is the answer. Our main concerns are social and the importance of constitutional reform to us is that without it social progress is now practically barred. The Gandhi programme, as we have repeatedly pointed out, is based upon the same conviction, and civil disobedience is merely a matter of method that can be abandoned without affecting its main object, and is not of the essence of the programme. It is inconceivable that the Gandhi party will so far forget its aims as to entertain Englishmen with liquor in connection with a conference to accelerate constitutional reform. It is most unfortunate that the co-operating politicians in India are almost wholly devoid of the social outlook.

A great opportunity has been sacrificed by the delegates from British India of giving a powerful impetus to the cause of Prohibition which lies at the root of many social reforms, notably of the redemption and elevation of the depressed classes. The following passages are taken from the Report of the Committee appointed by the Government of Bombay to enquire into the condition of these classes and to recommend measures for their uplift. "The question of the use of liquor and other intoxicants" the Committee observe "affects the social and economic condition of all Backward Classes to a great extent. It is a patent fact that a large part of their hard-earned money goes to the drink-shop. Large masses of these people, when asked in a body why they do not voluntarily abstain from drink reply by a counter-question "but why don't you get the Government to close the drink-shops?" They mean thereby that the temptation to drink is too great to be resisted by them at every minute of their life with so many facilities placed next door to them. When drink-shops are reduced in number or the quantity rationed to them in a Taluka or a District, the total consumption goes down and the people concerned are benefitted morally and materially." Peaceful picketing, merely by standing in front of a liquor shop and reminding those who show an inclination to enter them of the evil consequences of drink and the shame and ruin caused to their families, has practically brought down consumption to zero in a month in many places where it has been tried. The Committee proceed to state: "A very large proportion of witnesses have expressed in writing and orally their great desire for complete prohibition. Almost all the Depressed Classes and Aboriginal Tribes witnesses have told us their view that prohibition is the only solution to many of the economic ills of their classes." The condition of the Depressed Classes and the need for providing safeguards to ensure due regard to their interests, rightly bulked largely in the proceedings of the Conference. We are unable to reflect without some bitterness that the British Indian representatives should have ignored the vital importance of Prohibition from this, among other, points of view and by their conduct on this occasion contributed to enhance the difficulties in the way of achieving this reform. They have betrayed an important national interest by their weakness in allowing liquor to figure at their official banquet to British representatives,

THE INDIAN CHRISTIAN MARRIAGE ACT.

THE HAVOC OF SECTION 68 AND ITS REMEDY.

( BY MR. KOPARGAM RAMAMURTI. )

(Concluded from the last issue.)

The persecuting Missionary for his part, true to his convenient faith in the unfounded maxim that "a Hindu is born but not made," simply ignores or even denies the legal possibility of a Christian renouncing Christianity and becoming a Hindu under any circumstances. So long therefore as the Madras High Court Ruling which recognises the universal jurisdiction of section 68 remains unabrogated, he will not cease to launch such prosecutions from time to time, and the Magistrates will not cease to deem it their bounden duty to commit the victims of his religious wrath to the Sessions Court as a matter of judicial routine. Even if the prosecution fails at the end of the Sessions trial on an interpretation of fact, as happened recently at Ellore (41 I. S. R. 201), the persecutor's purpose would be more than half gained. He will have succeeded in converting a marriage party into a funereal party, striking dismay and terror into the hearts of all who had dared to disregard his admonitions and doing material and moral damage to them which no acquittal can afterwards undo, and thereby giving an unforgettable proof of his terrible Christian power to the whole countryside. By the time the Committing and Sessions Courts had done with his victims and they were told to return freely and happily to their homes, they would be more than half dead with shame and fright and economically perhaps stark dead and homeless.

But such acquittals must in the nature of things be very rare. When a Sessions Judge in far-off U. P. in Northern India felt constrained by the high authority of the Madras Full Bench to convict those whom the better sense of the assessors had adjudged "Not-Guilty" under this section, it would be absurd to suppose that the Madras Province itself is barren of conscientious Sessions Judges endowed with the sternly disciplined Roman mind which would unhesitatingly give effect to the superior court's drastic ruling in every part with machine-like faithfulness. And the ignorant, helpless and disorganised state of the Hindu communities and parties concerned easily lends itself to disaster, if it does not actually invite it.

The astounded Pariah priest, frightened at the long arm of the Christian law and its powerful priestly organization, and casting about distractedly for ways of saving himself from the upraised tiger's claw of section 68, dare not lean on nice religio-legal speculations about the right and the rites of "Conversion." But, staking his fate entirely on broad denials, he pours out into incredulous ears his fervent plea that he had nothing to do with the alleged marriage, being at the time in another place far away from the scene of offence; or, if he was on the spot at all, he was only a casual and distant spectator drawn by mere curiosity; or at the worst, he took no more than an insignificant non-priestly part in the ceremony, having been led to believe that both parties to the marriage were Hindus and seeing no reason to suspect that either of them was ever a Christian. As for the other accused, the principal of them who is the cause of all the trouble and against whom Baptismal Records and Church Registers can be produced to prove his Christian attachments and allegiance, can himself produce no documents to prove his conversion to Hinduism and cannot convincingly argue in the face of the priest's denial, even if he has the necessary intelligence, that there was "conversion" as part of the marriage ritual itself. The fate of the unfortunate priest and his luckless "abettors" is thus easily sealed and whole families of peaceful, unsophisticated village men and women guiltless of the least evil intent towards their neighbours can be marched off to jail or transported as felons to satisfy the Moloch of offended Missionary pride and so-called "Christian" law.

Here is a splendid call for Christianity in India, whether native or foreign, to assert itself and demonstrate its innate Christian spirit and neighbourly regard for non-Christian rights and feelings; to do unto others as it would that others shall do unto it. Christianity, as India loves and honours it, is simply not doing itself justice so long as it clings rancorously to the blood-thirsty weapon of section 68. We know that some esteemed Missionaries do disdain to seek its vulgar aid and are gladly content to lean on the unfailing power of Christ alone in trying moments of disappointment. But there can be no peace or amity from Christendom until all Missionaries in India in a body realise the sinful fatuity of an unholy alliance with the temporal power of a purblind law which can only oppress the ignorant poor but is powerless against the intelligent who know how to make the sequence of "Conversion" and "Marriage" apparent even to its diseased eyes.

The National Christian Council of India is like the League of Nations, representing the various Christian churches of the West which hold between them all the Missionary fields in this country, Burma and Ceylon, by mutual Mandate. We respectfully appeal to it to define and proclaim its "non-Christian policy" under section 68, for the guidance of its Mission workers and for the assurance of the non-Christian peoples of this land. In the Reformer of 11th October 1930 we ventured to bring to its notice and to the notice of its special legislative committee three defects in the Indian Christian Marriage Act which need immediate rectification for promoting the happiness of Christian families. We now confidently and respectfully solicit their attention to this fourth defect also which has proved a disastrous temptation to their religious workers and is doing untold havoc to the fair name of Christianity and to inter-communal good feeling.

It would not be deemed proper of course to introduce a section referring specifically to marriages by Hindu or Muhammadan rites in the Indian Christian Marriage Act, even for the purpose of exempting them from its operation. But it should not be difficult to achieve the same result by expressly defining the scope of the Act as limited to Christian Marriages. Section 68 also may be so amended as to make explicit the meaning which, according to Mr. Justice Napier of Madras and Mr. Justice Walsh of Allahabad, is already implicit therein, namely, that the "Marriage" penalised under its terms is no other than a "Marriage purporting to be a Christian Marriage." We earnestly hope and entreat that the special Committee of the Council working under the distinguished spiritual leadership of the Right Reverend F. J. Western, Bishop of Tinneveli, will pursue this amendment even more eagerly than the first three. If only the united Churches of Jesus Christ in India will generously come forward of their own motion to throw away the fratricidal weapon which court-made law had accidentally placed in their hands, they would exalt the Master, to whose service they have consecrated their lives, far more gloriously than if they clung to that sinful weapon and made Christianity hateful by its use against non-Christians and Christians for curtailing their religious and personal freedom.

But whatever the Christian authorities may in their wisdom decide to do, a strenuous endeavour must be made forthwith by every right-minded person in India of every religious creed to free the oppressed classes from this terrible scourge. May we not hope that all Depressed Class Missions, Muhammadan Anjumans, Humanitarian Leagues, Religious Sabhas and Reform Associations in this country will bestir themselves to investigate this problem and join hands with public-spirited M. L. O's. and M. L. A's. to get this burning wrong righted with the least possible delay?

Indian Bishops:—A correspondent writes:—"I have noticed in the Catholic Leader of the 8th January that you have stated in your issue of the 3rd January that the Roman Catholics had their Indian Bishops (3) long after the Anglicans had their Indian Bishop. Yes, it is true, the Roman Catholics got their Indian Bishops of Syrian rites as late as 1896, after long agitation, in which some of the leaders had to incur anathema (for putting forward their own rights) at the hands of the Propaganda Bishop (European) of Verapoly; among the excommunicated there was one who subsequently was made Bishop and another was the superior of a seminary. And in 1923, the first Indian Bishop of Latin rites was consecrated in Tuticorin and subsequently two other Indian Bishops of Latin rites. Even this was the outcome of a big agitation from 1917 to 1920 and excommunication at the hands of the European Bishops of the Propaganda who are not in their heart of hearts in favour of the indianisation of the Church."

W. C. T. U. NATIONAL CONVENTION.

Some months ago in a weekly paper appeared a picture entitled "They Shall Not Pass." This picture shows the residential section of a modern city, with homes up-to-date, and comfortable. At the entrance to the city stealthily approaching the homes, can be seen the shrewd and ever industrious liquor interests labelled "Expert Home Wreckers." But in the path of these destroyers can be seen a brave woman. She is determined that the evil shall not go by her into the comfortable homes, so she is saying "They Shall Not Pass."

This picture symbolizes the resolve made by many of the true daughters of India. They have purposed to help and protect Indian home life. Some of them are members of an organisation called the Women's Christian Temperance Union. At the National Convention held in Calcutta early in January, delegates were assembled from the nine divisions; Assam, Bengal, Bombay, C. P., Guzerat, Madras, Punjab, U. P., and Rajputana. At that time encouraging reports were given of work including efforts along the lines of Child Welfare, Moral Education, Research and Publication, Juvenile work and Medal Contests.

The great harm resulting from the excessive use of opium and other narcotics was again emphasized. It was stated that research had disclosed the cause of some cases of insanity, viz., the excessive smoking of hemp. It was said that some information should be given in the homes to the mothers concerning the harm of giving opium to children. Although much literature has been written, published and distributed, there is still need for some more vernacular literature, its distribution, and especially the knowledge should be shared.

"Indian mothers are not less regardful of the welfare of their children than those of other lands and there is plenty of evidence that when the harm done to the children is pointed out they will cease to follow the practice." Since it has been said that baby doping (with opium) is enormous, that the most normal effect is a general stunting of the child at the very outset of life, and the main reasons for the prevalence of the habit are ignorance, and economic pressure, is it not the duty of all informed persons to be more diligent in helping the mothers to save their children from harmful opium?

The need of scientific Temperance Instruction for the youth of India has been partly met by the publication of proper and helpful books. In some sections of India these are now being used in the schools. The thousands who know not how to read but who suffer from intoxicants do not realize the terrible harm that results from the use of drugs such as Bhang, Ganja, and Tobacco. Moreover great ignorance prevails on the subject of alcohol and its effect upon the body, few recognise that human efficiency is impaired by alcohol even in so-called moderate amounts.

A successful and encouraging plan has been and is being followed to awaken the youth and their parents to the truth, and this plan is the contest. Medal contests, poster contests, and story contests have been held in many centres, not only contestants and judges but also the audiences have been aroused from disregard or slight interest to an awakened helpful attitude. No doubt much more good has resulted than mere figures tabulate. Influential Moslems and Hindus have given their support, either by offering prizes or in actual co-operation in the preparing and giving of the contest. This is encouraging, nevertheless more contests could and should be sponsored.

The juvenile work is not a separate but an integral part of the above. It also includes the organization of groups of children who will pledge to keep themselves free from the fetters of drugs and strong drink. The importance of work among the indelible minds of childhood can scarcely be overestimated. We may well remember the statement made by Dr. Alexander Lambert, a prominent physician of New York City: "The liquor interests are ever on the alert to get hold of the young people." You recall how his experience (before prohibition) with the wrecks of humanity in Bellevue Hospital, led him to note the relation of youth to drinking. In questioning the patients he found that out of 258 cases of alcoholism all but 8 had learned to drink before they had reached the age of thirty. Prohibition dramas, songs and stories have been written and translated into several vernaculars to interest the children in good health.

Not only are babies, children and youth remembered but also adults. Mothers-in-council meetings, Moral Education Literature, better films, and translation of interesting stories are some of the major projects.

"The Indian Temperance News," a monthly magazine of merit is one very necessary and useful avenue of endeavour; it should be more widely read.

The new home for the W. C. T. U. Headquarters at Delhi is an accomplished fact and a cause for thanksgiving. Reports of the gifts for this home were inspiring; because in several cases there was true sacrifice and labour. The President asked for steady and faithful cooperation in order that all obligations might be fully met when necessary.

Other matters of personal interest might be mentioned. Delegates were elected to the World's Convention which will be held in Toronto, Canada, June 8-10 this year.

A touching and beautiful farewell was given to our much loved and honoured Miss Mary J. Campbell who has given many years of splendid and efficient service to India through the W. C. T. U. Organization.

Appreciation of labour was also manifested in the choosing of life members. Reports of the faithful work of the national organizers, Miss H. Maya Das, Miss M. Narayan Das, and Miss Marion Navalkar were encouraging. It was suggested that perhaps the number of scattered members and Honorary members might be increased.

The following were among the resolutions passed "That the Union records with gratitude the passing of the Sarda Act which stands for the betterment of women and children. The union urges all its members to create public opinion in favour of the Act so that at an early date the legislation may be really effective."

"That the Union records with regret the baneful effects of immoral and indecent films on the young minds of India and that it is strongly of opinion that there should be a strict censorship on all films imported into India.

"That the union welcome every step that may hasten prohibition and as such it favours every endeavour for local option as a step towards the ultimate goal."

Devotions, fellowship, and entertainment along with the reports gave proper balance to the whole programme. Bengal and Assam divisions as hostesses provided well for their guests, the Convention closed with the resolve to carry on "For God and Home and Humanity.

EAST AND THE WEST.

"The noble lesson read to them by this Indian reformer was destined to re-act upon themselves. Many a time that the Divine interpretation of the world—many a time had successive religions come to the West from the East. He believed it was destined to be so again. The European mind had a certain hardness in it, in virtue of which intellectual force was gained at the expense of spiritual depth; and the larger the scientific universe became, the more did it shut us up in a materialist prison, and disqualify us for passing from the laws of things to their Divine Cause of Life. It seemed in our own time as if there was to be again an apparent hostility between Science and Religion. With the Indian genius he believed it would be otherwise. While quick to absorb and appropriate all modern science, it would do so without sacrificing at the same time the Divine interpretation of the universe. It would put our hard and gross philosophy into the crucible under a more refining and intenser fire, and save many an element which we had lost. With subtler thought and gentle affections, it will go behind the phenomena which stop our way, and bring back the flood of Divine light upon the world. It was said in one of the Indian dramas that the external creation and God had been separated from one another in the human mind by the action of the demon Illusion, and that whenever that demon was destroyed they would again re-unite. That illusion was a demon that had ever haunted the Western mind; and again and again had Eastern prophets set us free. So, perhaps, it would be now; and if their Eastern friends could restore to them something of that tender mind, and of that sweet affectionate humanity of which they had an example present that evening, if they could show the way to consecrate afresh the world without and the soul within, and renew Divine relations in both, they would be returning perpetual good for transitory ill and, by redeeming their Western brethren from the European hardness, would give them the best form of forgiveness for the offences of a Clive and Hastings, and the truest gratitude for the benevolent justice of a Bantink." These remarks were made by the Rev. James Martineau at a soiree held to welcome the great Brahma Missionary, Keshub Chunder Sen, in London on the 12th April 1870, and are as true to-day as they were sixty years ago.

RIGHTS OF FEDERAL CITIZENS.

(Concluded from the last issue.)

The following memorandum relating to the fundamental rights of the people of Indian States in the future All-India Federation was circulated by Diwan Bahadur M. Ramchandra Rao, the first president of the Indian States' People's Conference among the members of the Round Table Conference in London :

The Nehru Committee appointed by the All-Parties Conference has discussed this subject at length in Chapter VI of their Report. They are of opinion that such a declaration of fundamental rights should be one of the important features of the new Constitution, and that safeguards and guarantees contained in such a declaration are necessary to create and establish a sense of security among those in India who look upon each other with distrust and suspicion. Every school of political thought in British India has advocated for some years that with a view to secure the full enjoyment of political, religious and communal equality, a declaration of rights should be embodied in the new Constitution. The Government of India have referred to this matter in paragraph 50 of their despatch, and have pointed out that "the minority communities attach great importance" to this matter. They have not been able to express any considered opinion on the subject but certain difficulties have been pointed out and the opinion is expressed that the Conference will probably deal with the whole subject.

If a declaration of fundamental rights is necessary in the case of British India, it is even more necessary for safe-guarding the rights and liberties of the people of Indian States, where the rule of law has not been as yet established. It is also obvious that such a declaration of rights cannot be enacted only for British India but that it must apply as well to the Indian States joining the Federation.

I do not wish to refer to the detailed provisions to be included in such a declaration of rights. They are set out under 19 heads in the Nehru Report (page 101). These may form the basis of discussion and they will be equally applicable to the people of the Indian States. It may be that they may have to be modified in some particulars, but they come under one or other of the following heads :—

- (1) Inviolability of person and property.
- (2) Freedom of religion and conscience.
- (3) Right of public meeting and association.
- (4) Equality of all citizens before the law.
- (5) Right of the citizens to have a writ of "habeas corpus" and trial according to law.
- (6) Right of the citizens to public employment and the exercise of any trade or calling irrespective of religion, caste or creed.
- (7) Freedom of combination and association of all citizens for the maintenance and improvement of economic conditions.
- (8) Right to bear arms to all citizens,

(9) Right of all citizens to receive free elementary education.

(10) Equal rights to men and women as citizens.

(11) Equal rights of access to all citizens to the use of public wells, public road and to all other places of public resort.

Attention is also invited to the analogous provisions in some of the older Federal Constitutions like the United States of America and Switzerland and Germany, and also to the fundamental Constitutional law of New Germany. The Constitutional law relating to some of the new governments in Eastern and Central Europe also contain many provisions relating to the fundamental law or citizenship. The Polish Constitution lays down that fidelity to the Republic is one of the foremost duties of Polish citizens. Poland guarantees to all its citizens full protection of life, liberty and property without distinction of extraction, nationality, language, race or religion. "Equality of citizens before the law" is among the most cardinal of the rights accorded them under the Polish constitution. All have access on equal terms to public office, and no distinction of birth or estate are recognized. Hence titles, as they are retained in Republican Poland, have no more significance than in Republican Germany or Republican France. Freedom of the person, of domicile, of migration and emigration, of choice of location and vocation; freedom of speech, petition, association and union; freedom of religion and conscience and secrecy of correspondences, are all guaranteed within legal limits. Particular attention is paid to the right of 'habeas corpus' and to immunity from search without warrant; sundry safeguards are placed about the citizen to prevent him from being denied access to legal justice. No censorship of the press is permitted, and daily papers and other publications printed in Poland may not be debarred from the mails or denied the right of free circulation throughout the country. There is also a constitutional guarantee of freedom to publish any results of learned investigation and research. Thus the guarantees of individual freedom seem particularly broad; their actual enforcement through the Polish judiciary will, without doubt, raise some difficulties and be apt to define in a more detailed manner the extent and limitations of such rights. In general, however, it may be said that the Polish constitution establishes individual rights in a very far-reaching manner, going further in some respects than any other contemporary constitution. The fundamental rights of Esthonian citizens are set out in the constitutional law of the Esthonian Republic. It is declared that all Esthonians are equal before law. The usual legal rights of citizens to inviolability of person, domicile, to trial by no courts other than those designated by law, the grant of right of habeas corpus are clearly provided. Freedom of religion and conscience are also provided. The provisions of some of the other modern constitutions may also be referred to and it is not necessary to go into them in great detail.

It is therefore suggested that the rights and obligations of the citizens of the federating States and of British Indians to the new Federal Government of United India should be carefully examined, clearly defined and that these fundamental rights should be embodied in the constitution. The judicial machinery for enforcing these rights remains to be considered. Indian States have been demanding for some time that a Supreme Court should be established for the purpose of obtaining the decisions of an independent body in regard to the disputes between States and between British India and the States. They have advocated the establishment of such a body for some time and this Court may be empowered to deal with violations of the fundamental rights that may be guaranteed by the Constitution to the people living under the Government of a federated India. It may be admitted that there are difficulties in investing the Court with jurisdiction in these matters, but the subject requires careful consideration.

It is a matter for satisfaction that Sir Mirza Ismail has in his scheme recognised the importance of providing for fundamental rights in the Constitution and it is to be hoped that the other members of the delegation will see their way to agree to the proposal.

WANLESS TUBERCULOSIS SANATORIUM. NEED FOR HELP.

The Editor, the Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

One of the most beneficial schemes of present-day India is in urgent need of help. According to the imperative orders of his doctors, the benefactor of Western India, Sir William Wanless, is due to leave India finally a few months hence, and the scheme for which he risked his health in coming back to India for a year is suffering from the slump in trade. There is no need to speak of India's debt to Sir William, for his record of 96,000 operations on all classes of people is known in every part of India. Sir William has set his heart on achieving something worthy to deliver India's people from one of their biggest scourges, that of consumption, and his scheme is in desperate need of funds. His own hospital has bought the site costing Rs. 31,436, and Rs. 47,993 have been contributed by public donors. A good start has thus been made and now six cottages are ready for fifteen consumptive patients and the needed houses are ready also for Doctor and Head Nurse. Sir William needs at once Rs. 2,000 to provide a water tank with pump and piping for the Sanatorium. Will not some of the Reformer's readers come to the rescue of the victims of Indian Tuberculosis? The late Dr. Sir R. G. Bhandarkar once had an operation performed on his eyes by Sir William Wanless. Dr. Bhandarkar told one of our fellow-missionaries that the most Christlike thing he ever saw was as he watched Sir William helping and healing all sorts and conditions of helpless Indian people. This is the man who is now in need of help in order that he may bestow on India his greatest and most lasting benefaction. Donations may be sent to Sir William Wanless, Miraj, S. M. C.

Yours, etc.,
J. F. EDWARDS.

BOMBAY VIGILANCE ASSOCIATION.

REPORT FOR THE MONTH OF NOVEMBER 1930.

Brothel Area:—The test case against a woman brothel keeper and her subsequent conviction and the case against a landlord and his rent collector in one of the lanes of Kamatipura have made it known in the Brothel area that the Amended Act came into force. The brothel keepers in the Area, therefore, are now engaged in finding out some ways and means to evade the law. Besides tenants of three houses in the area have received notices to vacate the premises at the end of the month. Two of these houses are situated in Sukhlaji street and the third in Kamathipura Lane No. 14. Though the landlords say in the notices that they are monthly tenants, in fact the rent ranging from Re. 1-8-0 to Rs. 3-0-0 is received daily at night. Most of these two-room tenements are occupied by three or four women each and in some cases even by seven women. After serving the notices the landlord who owns two of these houses saw the tenants personally and suggested by way of a compromise that they should write to him in reply to his notices that the rooms would be occupied by one woman only and on receipt of this reply he would withdraw the notices. The landlord of the third house has not only advised them that each room be occupied by one woman but has promised to turn the big halls into small rooms to suit this purpose and has asked them to pay annas twelve daily as rent for each of those new rooms. This compromise, I am told, is accepted by the tenants. Though two or three of those brothel keepers have taken rooms in good locality at the other end of the lane none of them has vacated the premises at the end of the month.

Outside the Area:—Several complaints regarding the brothels conducted outside the brothel area were received. Four of these complaints were investigated and it was found that the information was correct. In one of these cases the Police have taken action and in regard to the other cases they are requested to do the needful. Investigation in five cases had to be postponed for want of time.

Turkish Baths:—One more Turkish Bath was opened in Fort during the month under report.

Amusement Parks:—Six Amusement Parks were working at the beginning of the month. Four more were opened under different names and four more were closed. Two of those which have closed have removed everything while the remaining two are temporarily closed and are trying to get their licenses renewed. Of these six were on private land, one was on Public Works Department ground, one on Municipal ground and the remaining two were on Improvement Trust grounds.

Most of the stalls in the White Cities and Amusement Parks were used for games of chance of one kind or another. A wooden board with coloured squares or dots was hung in each of these stalls and the spectators were asked to throw wooden arrows on the board and try their luck. If the arrow strikes a square or dot of particular colour already announced by the stall-keeper the man would get a prize in cash from annas eight to Rupees five according to the amount paid, which is doubled. If he misses the mark he would lose his money. This was considered to be nothing but gambling and there were a number of complaints that money was heavily lost at these stalls. It seems that the attention of the Commissioner of Police was drawn to this matter and he stopped this kind of games of chance from 15th November. But still there are some such stalls going on in some such White Cities, the only difference being figures instead of squares or dots are used in the game. Most of the above mentioned stalls are still kept with boards and other things though they are not working and on asking for reasons of those being kept I was told that the proprietors of those White Cities want to move the High Court in the matter.

A detailed report as to the addresses, owners of the ground, time of opening and closing, number of employees—men, women and children—and work given to women was prepared during the month under report.

3rd December 1930.

S. S. BOY SCOUT ASSOCIATION, INDIA.

The Head Quarters Commissioner sends for publication the following information for those intending to become members of the S. S. Boy Scout Association :

As a result of demonstrations in Scouting and physical exercises by our city and village scouts before vast assemblages of delegates and visitors to the First All-Asia Educational Conference at Benares last X'mas, we have been overwhelmed with enquiries from various quarters as to how best we could help them in organising scout troops along lines specialised by our Association. To those, therefore, who are interested in this question we have great pleasure in intimating that we propose, as already done twice before, to hold an intensive training camp for scouts in Nirmal Vana at Hardwar from April 10, to July 25, 1931. The site of the camp is ideal from the scout's point of view and the generally good climate of the place will undoubtedly be conducive to the health of campers. The course intended will consist of thorough instruction in the various subjects of scouting and scientific physical exercises especially suited to the needs of Indian boys of various ages. Besides giving the campers a thorough grounding in theory, special efforts will be made to fit them for practical work by putting under each camper a patrol of boys for training. A good part of the time will be devoted to equip campers with knowledge and ability to carry on the work of rural reconstruction. While Pt. Shri Ram Bajpai, our Chief-Organising Commissioner, will be in general charge of the camp, Mr. D. L. Ananda Rao, Provincial Organising Commissioner, U. P. will be responsible for the purely scouting section and Mr. D. D. Mathur, who has received special training in physical culture in Western countries assisted by Messrs M. V. Deonalkar and Balashwar Prasad Singh, pupils of Prof. Manik Rao of Jamadada Vyayamshala, Baroda, for the physical training courses. Distinguished specialists, like Principal F. G. Pearce, Dr. Mohan Sinha Mehta, Ph. D., M. A., LL. B., Bar-at-Law and Rev. H. R. Ferger, M.A., B. Sc. and others will be invited to take up important subjects. Campers will be subjected to special tests at the end of the course and those, who satisfy the Board of Examiners, will be given special certificates of Camp Directorship.

Intending candidates should be physically fit, possess an elementary knowledge of scouting and should be recommended for admission by heads of institutions to which they belong or, by some respectable person. Each candidate will also be required to pay an entrance fee of Rs. 5, besides arranging for his own board. Lodging will be provided free of cost. Applications with admission fee should reach the Headquarters Commissioner, Allahabad by the 15th of March positively. The Education Department and the District and Municipal Boards of these provinces will be approached to give facilities to those who intend joining.

A GREAT BRITISH-INDIAN BANQUET.

The London Correspondent of the Statesman writes :

In the process of destroying constitutions by night—which is supposed to be the antithesis of the Conference function of Constitution-making by day the great banquet given by the British-Indian Delegation on Tuesday evening should rank first even among the innumerable social functions to which the Round Table Conference has given rise. Never has a larger and more consistently distinguished, and withal representative, company assembled in London. Never was better food eaten or wine drunk. Never were livelier or more amusing speeches made and listened to. Never was there better cheer, and never was the levelling and sorting influence of the present Conference more clearly illustrated. And it all followed on the most disastrous day's work in the Federal Relations Sub-Committee and plain speaking between the Aga Khan and the Prime Minister. The real cause of the substitution for the Aga Khan at the banquet of the young Maharaja of Darbhanga as presiding genius was the Aga Khan's long indisposition, which has become so serious that he was forced to visit even the great exhibition of Persian art in a wheeled chair.

It is difficult now to say exactly where the fun began. There was so much of it and the general standard was so high. The scarlet-coated announcer made his contribution very early when, in stentorian tones, he prayed silence for the young Maharaja with a short "a" in the second syllable of Darbhanga which went off like a gun and set the company in a roar of laughter. Mr. Sastri's first name had to be refused at the second or third attempt and then there followed the speech of that supreme master of English diction and oratorical style. As a politician and constitution-maker, the Round Table Conference has ruined Mr. Sastri's reputation for ever. As a satirist of Ciceronian diction and felicity of phrasing, Tuesday night's performance will make his name live for ever in London, and probably in America for there were many distinguished Americans present. It is said that the consummate ability of some of the leading Indians at the Conference has done more to break down opposition to responsibility at the centre than scores of arguments which have been employed. Not merely were Mr. Sastri's English, his delivery, his humour, and his satire supremely good, but the characterization of all the chief English actors in the Conference drama, be they never so distinguished or exalted, was as exact as it was daring and remorseless.

PLAIN SPEAKING BY THE PREMIER.

On the whole Mr. MacDonald was in good form but Mr. Sastri was a hard speaker to succeed. The Premier tried to snick some of Mr. Sastri's most difficult balls to leg, by applying some of his Ganesh aphorisms to Mr. Baldwin. His best hits were when he alluded to the greatest achievement of the Conference as being the demolition of the Indian theory that here in London the Indian warriors would find themselves opposed to a phalanx of hostile British gladiators. In truth, all that the British representatives had been able to achieve was to demonstrate that the victory would be gained directly the Indians were prepared to win it against themselves. Mr. MacDonald confirmed the impression that if British kindness and goodwill could give India Home Rule, she would have it to-morrow.

MR. PUNCH LOQUITUR.

A surprise was in store for the great company when, following on the American Ambassador and Mr. Drinkwater, the latter the representative of literature, the spokesman for the Press proved to be Mr. A. P. Herbert of Punch. Mr. Baldwin and Sir William Jowitt sat glum and Mr. MacDonald and other Labour Ministers wriggled uneasily as the last surviving rags of respectability were torn from British Parliamentary institutions by a speaker who seemed intent, if on anything, on chaffing Indian politicians out of their unassailable devotion to the forms of democracy as now practised in this country. India seemed likely, said the Punch humourist, to attain them at the moment of their abandonment in disgust by this country. Why, oh why, if there existed people foolish and quixotic enough to do the task for them, did Indians want to govern themselves according to democratic forms? The climax of democracy seemed to be a life spent in paying taxes and filling up forms. No shaving on Sundays, public admonitions for non-attendance at church, the removal of bargemen's children to public boarding schools—such was the past year's fine flower of democratic achievement in the country Indians were bent on imitating. And all the while the Press at Home was admonished not to mention India:—It was dangerous. The very word "India" was becoming as improper as the word "archdeacon." And so on; all very fine banter which captivated Pathans such as Sir Abdul Quaiyum Khan quite as completely as it did the sedate Madrassi lawyers. By universal consent the evening was a memorable one and laughter went far to undo the ravages of the hottest curry ever washed down by a superb if greatly abused champagne.

THE GOODWILL MOVEMENT.

MR. BENN FOR INDIA.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,
Sir,

There are indications that a general amnesty is impending. We hear that a second Round Table Conference is likely, and it is to be held shortly in India. I write to stress the importance of Mr. Wedgwood Benn attending this Conference. The possibility of his visiting India has been frequently hinted, and an early authoritative announcement will be warmly welcomed. Its desirability is obvious. No greater compliment can be paid to the Indian Princes and the other delegates who attended the London Conference, in the teeth of opposition and at great personal sacrifice, than by His Majesty's Secretary of State for India attending the Conference here. Mr. Benn's unquestioned sincerity and his sympathy towards Indian aspirations, befit him uniquely for the great role he will have to enact in India. Besides, the announcement of Mr. Benn's visit would provide a strong rallying-point for all those who desire an honourable settlement by constitutional methods. India needs Benn.

All eyes are now turned towards the Congress. What will be its response to the important decisions reached in London? Will Mr. Gandhi, from his pinnacle of greatness, not give a lead by making a gesture of goodwill on his part? The Congress has announced the basis of a truce. Is there any equity in a truce wherein one side is permitted to continue fighting while the other is disarmed? I ask, will Mr. Gandhi not acknowledge that India still needs England, just as England needs India? Will he not admit that there are aspects of India's debt to England that cannot be reckoned in terms of pounds, shillings and pence alone? At this critical juncture I appeal to the highest in Mr. Gandhi—to that generosity of spirit which is peculiarly his own—to realise that an honourable understanding implies a true appreciation of facts.

When Mr. Gandhi meets those three doves of peace, viz., Messrs. Sastri, Sapru and Jayakar, all India hopes that Mr. Gandhi's search "for avenues leading to an honourable peace," as he has put it, will end successfully.

It is for Mr. Gandhi now to lead India to Peace—or to pieces.

M. I. DAVID.

Chairs of Indian Culture:—The following letter signed M. S. Modak, Basim, Barar, appears in the Times (London), dated January 2nd:—"May I crave the hospitality of your columns to put forth a suggestion, namely, the foundation of chairs for 'Indian culture' at the foremost British Universities, to be filled by eminent Indian scholars, which I believe carries within itself a great potency for the good of both Britain and India? Facilities and real efforts towards a sound understanding of each other's culture would place Indo-British friendship on a cultural, and hence more lasting, basis than a mere political bargaining or an economic re-adjustment would afford. The urgency of a solution of the Indo-British problem is unquestioned. The unique gathering in London of distinguished Indians and Indian Princes should facilitate a serious consideration of this proposal, which I venture to think would be most opportune for being given effect to at the present juncture. My appeal principally is to our cultured princes, the power of whose purse could easily bring the proposal within the reach of practicability."

ABOLISH MANU SMRITI.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Will you kindly enlighten us through the medium of your esteemed organ as to how one can consistently cooperate with the so-called Jat-Pat-Torak-Mandal, when they have never endeavoured to bring before the Legislative Assembly any suitable scheme for abolishing the Manu Smritis which is the primal source of cruel treatment toward the untouchables. If eminent persons like your noble self are thus failing to suggest practical remedies for the removal of the untouchables' wrongs, then is it any wonder that artificial means to remove caste rigors merely by refusing to tell one's caste will be not only meaningless but will be likely to prove a greater injury to the cause of the minority of our poor untouchables.—Devi Dayal, Audi-Hindu (Depressed Classes) Sabha, Ferozapore Cantonment.

[The correspondent is under a misapprehension. Manu Smriti is largely a compilation of customs and practices which were prevalent in ancient India, and which are now mostly obsolete. The decisions of the High Courts and the Privy Council, and the Penal Code, constitute the civil and criminal law in force at the present day. The repeal of the Manu Smriti, therefore, will make no change in present day life, and the Indian Legislature will be engaging in a quixotic enterprise if it undertakes the operation [Ed. I. S. B.]

ANTI-CASTE DINNER.

(From a Correspondent.)

The Anti-Caste Dinner, which was held at Gurudatt Bhawan Lahore, on Sunday, the 19th January, 1931, was a great success. More than a thousand people of different castes of the Hindus—such as Brahman, Chamar, Khatri, Megh, Aggarwal, Arora, Mehtars—took part. Great enthusiasm prevailed. Depressed class people sat shoulder to shoulder with their so-called brethren. Ladies welcomed their depressed class sisters. The whole crowd took meals as one family unit. Young men were vociferous. They formed themselves into processions and their shouts of "Down with Caste System" and "Up Up with Social Revolution" rent the sky. They took out the funeral bier of the caste system and went through the whole space with these slogans. Prominent citizens of Lahore were present in large numbers.

Dr. Gokal Chand (Minister for Local Self-Government, Punjab,) having gone after taking meals, Mahashe Krishna, B.A., took the chair for the rest of the programme. The proceedings commenced with Bhajans of M. Gita Ram.

PT. VISHWA BANDHU.

After Jal-Tarang by Sharat Kumar (a boy of ten) and a melodious song by Shrimati Subhadra Devi, Gayanapraveena, Pt. Vishwa Bandhu made a strong speech, during the course of which he said that caste system was a blot on Hinduism. Referring to the medieval and Mahomedan times he said that it had never served a useful purpose, except that it might have some protective value in the past, when there was danger of Mohammaden supremacy. He made a strong plea on behalf of the Jat-Pat-Torak Mandal and exhorted the public to unite in their efforts for the removal of caste and cognate evil, the untouchability.

MRS. YASWANT RAI.

After this speech one or two young men were noisy, and wanted the chair to answer a question or two. This done, Mrs. Yaswant Rai (an English lady of Bristol) made an eloquent speech. She said that although she was unaware of the customs of India, yet whatever information she got from her husband she was convinced that caste system was at the root of the social evils of the Hindus, and that she was much delighted to see the spectacle presented here.

MRS. SWAMI NATHAN.

Mrs. Swami Nathan of Women's Conference in her eloquent and impressive speech congratulated the audience and remarked that they were better placed in the social relations with the so-called untouchables than the people of her Province. She pointed out that in Malabar, there are not only divisions and sub-divisions among the Brahmins, but the whole structure of the Hindu Society was terribly divided. There were untouchables and unapproachable in her Province, which was a real slur on the Hindu social system. Referring to the resolutions of the All India Women's Conference, she said that in Madras they had urged the Government that the column of caste in educational and other institutions be deleted, so that the children were not affected by the corrupted and narrow-minded perspective of their parents. She could not, however attach any value to the paper resolutions and stated that the real work lay in mixing up with the so-called depressed class people in our daily relations with them. She congratulated the organizers of the Dinner and thanked them for affording her this occasion to express her views on the subject.

R. B. SEWAK RAM.

After another song by Mr. Govind Dattatraya, Gayanacharya Rai Bahadur Sewak Ram said that he was very much delighted to see the many sections of the Hindus unite together and was personally of the opinion that that was the work of the Hindu Sabha. He would therefore advice the workers of the Hindu Sabha, wherever they may be, to organise branches of the Jat-Pat-Torak Mandal along with their other activities.

PRESIDENTIAL REMARKS.

After Bakhshi Somanlal's speech, M. Krishna made a few very pertinent remarks in the course of which he emphasized that there was no need of any "Shudhi" of those who were already Hindus, and stated that the distinction of castes and sub-castes must go. He sympathized with the people who have not had enough to eat, but pointed out that the idea underlying this Dinner was to show that we had no scruples to dine together no matter what our caste may be and that this purpose he was glad to say was splendidly achieved.

After a vote of thanks to the chair, the meeting dispersed.

NOTES.

R. T. Conference and the Congress:—Sir Tej Babadur Sapru, and Messrs Srinivasa Sastry and Jayakar arrived last Friday and they are in Allahabad conferring with Mahatma Gandhi and other Congress leaders with a view to persuade the Congress party to take a hand in implementing the conclusions arrived at the London Conference. The only thing really settled there, however, is that the entrance of Indian States into a federal scheme with British India is a condition of the grant of responsibility in the Central Government. Everything else is provisional and, therefore, capable of revision. Speaking in his Capital on Monday, the Maharaja of Bikaner stated that at least seventy-five per cent of the States, if not more, would come immediately into the scheme. That means practically all will, in the period which it will take to shape and adopt the new scheme, join the federation. His Highness dealt only in general terms with the conditions on which the States would join. These will have to be defined specifically before they can be considered. But even in his general terms there are one or two which do not seem to be well co-ordinated. For instance, the Maharaja said that States will have a voice only in decisions on Federal subjects, but that they will be represented in the Executive and will share the responsibility of the Executive to the Legislature. How under these conditions can there be Cabinet responsibility or even a Cabinet properly so-called? The federal idea which has been accepted in London and is regarded as fundamental by Mr. Baldwin to the consideration of central responsibility, itself requires to be scrutinised carefully before we can proceed to build upon it. In this connection, it will not do to ignore the demand among the States' Peoples' organisations, embodied in the resolutions which we publish elsewhere, that the constitutional principle should be recognised in the Government of the States as a condition to their entry into federal relations with British India. A democracy, it was laid down in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, can hand over power and responsibility only to another democracy. The people of British India can judge the intentions of the Princes only by the manner in which they respond to this reasonable demand of their own subjects. Their Highnesses cannot love democracy in British India and dislike it in their own States. The Maharaja of Bikaner's assurance that the constitutional problem in the States will be considered in their proper time, is satisfactory neither to the people of the States nor to the people of British India. The ruling Princes are not really free agents and cannot be such unless the people are associated with them constitutionally and not merely informally in the government of the States. Then, there is the question of Legislative control over Finance and allied subjects in the Central Government. Not less than 80 per cent of their net revenues, according to the Government of India, will have to be "non-votable," that is, outside the purview of the Legislature. "When a 'first charge' absorbs all but a narrow margin of revenue" they added, "the security implied by their nomenclature disappears. In such a case, the authority responsible for seeing that these payments are made has an intimate concern in the whole financial administration of the country." The Round Table Conference is said to have agreed to make over Finance to a Minister responsible to the Legislature. But he is to be beset with safeguards on so many sides that he may find it difficult to move hand or foot in any direction. Professors P. A. Wadia and V. K. R. Rao of Wilson College, have drawn up a thoughtful memorandum on this important question which they have submitted to the Working Committee of the Congress.

Pandit Motilal Nehru:—The death of Pandit Motilal Nehru has evoked a mass of tribute which for genuineness and unanimity has been never exceeded and seldom equalled in recent years. The Viceroy, the Secretary of State and the Government of India, Indian Princes, leaders of all castes and communities and members of the Central and Provincial legislatures have all with one voice borne testimony to the great place which the Pandit occupied in the national life. It is obvious that had he lived, his would have been the most potent influence in bringing about a satisfactory settlement of the problems of constitutional reform. Mahatma Gandhi has described his loss owing to the death of the Pandit in almost heart-broken terms. To outward seeming the Pandit seemed to care little for religion and he totally rejected the ceremonial and customary Hinduism. But the higher Hinduism which is enshrined in the ancient prayer for Light, the Gayatri, which he repeated with his dying breath, seems to have been very near to his heart. And nothing but the true spirit of religion could have wrought the transformation which, in the height of a career apparently devoted to worldly things, led the Pandit to a life dedicated to the cause of his country and prepared to face everything in its pursuit. It is significant that notwithstanding the loud slogans about democracy, it is the aristocratic temper of Pandit Motilal that has been most stressed in many of the warmest eulogies of him even by his Congress colleagues. India does not love demagogues.

Mahatma's Demand for Enquiry:—Pending the arrival of the British Indian delegates to the Round Table Conference who had cabled to Pandit Motilal Nehru to postpone the decision of the Congress on the proceedings of the Conference, Mahatma Gandhi, it was reported, addressed a letter to the Viceroy requesting that an independent enquiry should be instituted in six specified cases of Police excesses against peaceful satyagrahis, on which he (Mahatmaji) had definite material which he would place before the investigating Committee or Committees. Compliance with this suggestion, it was said, would be regarded by Mahatma Gandhi as a good reason for participating in discussions of the scheme adumbrated at the Round Table Conference. Conference or no Conference, it is the duty of Government to institute enquiries into allegations of abuse of power by their officers when made by responsible citizens. Mahatma Gandhi knows this quite well, and it can only be his anxiety to find some ground, which will appeal to the rank and file of Congressmen as a proof of Government's new angle of vision, for resiling from their attitude of utter indifference to the issue of the Conference, which could have prompted him to approach the Viceroy with such a request. The reply received from his Excellency is said to be not quite satisfactory to Mahatma Gandhi and statements have been published purporting to convey its contents. We prefer, however, to await the publication of the correspondence which is promised shortly. We should be much surprised if Lord Irwin has met Mahatmaji's request with a blank refusal. Perhaps His Excellency has responded with his own suggestions regarding the proper way of dealing with the complaints against the local authorities. However that may be, the conduct of the Police is not immediately relevant to the scheme of the Round Table Conference, which should be considered and accepted or modified or rejected purely on its own merits. If anything, the need to make similar abuses of power impossible in the future, should weigh more than that of bringing perpetrators of past excesses to justice, with the leaders of the Congress and the general public.

The Borsad Affair:—The Government of Bombay began well and continued so for some time in dealing with the Civil Disobedience movement. The restraint with which they met the action of the satyagrahis in the early stages, nearly led to its collapse. To save it from this end, Mahatma Gandhi who had contemplated so far only the unauthorised manufacture of salt, hit upon the idea of raids on salt depots. The Government thereupon resorted to the lathi charges which have now become unpleasantly associated with the Bombay method. The satyagrahis retorted with a no-tax campaign in some of the villages of Gujarat and Government also stiffened their methods. The exposures by foreign Press correspondents, notably Mr. H. N. Brailsford, and by responsible Indian publicists like Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, led to an appreciable improvement in Police methods in that area but there seems to have been a relapse of late. The conduct of the Police in dispersing by force a women's procession in Borsad seems to have exceeded all previous bounds, and the attempts of the Director of Information to refute the statements made by a number of competent observers as the result of their personal enquiries, have been not altogether happy. The Secretary of State in reply to a question in Parliament has declined to order an independent enquiry into this deplorable affair on the basis evidently of the information contained in the three Press Notes of the Director of Information. It is as well that he should know that these Notes have failed completely to convince people here either as being correct as to facts or cogent as to reasoning, and that his refusal is regarded as a proof that the pleas for a friendly atmosphere at the Round Table Conference are not reflected in the conduct of officialdom out here.

New Delhi:—In the natural course, the inauguration of New Delhi should be the occasion for universal rejoicing in India. We had pointed out months ago that the present was a most unsuitable time for such a function. Nothing reveals so glaringly the complete absence of the human touch between the people and the Government of India that the inauguration should have been carried out. No wonder the special correspondent of the Hindu reports that the general opinion was that it was too much of an official show and that those in charge of the arrangements failed to catch the popular imagination. Describing the unveiling of four Asoka columns gifted by Canada, Australia, South Africa and New-Zealand—the Irish Free State was not represented among the Dominion representatives—the correspondent says "altogether the first ceremony proved to be very cold and frigid from the popular point of view." The subsequent ceremonies and fetes were no better. On the whole, the inauguration week has passed practically unnoticed outside Delhi.

The Late Rev. Father Zimmerman:—News was received last week of the death in Switzerland of Rev. Father Zimmerman, Professor of Sanskrit in St. Xavier's College, Bombay. Father Zimmerman besides being an eminent scholar, was a man of broad sympathies and a warm-hearted friend. He took an active part in the work of Bombay University and was one of its most prominent figures. His death leaves a big gap in the academic and cultural life the City. It is a great loss to St. Xavier's College.

BOMBAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1931.

WHY MUSLIMS WANT SAFEGUARDS, I.

It has been a puzzle to us and doubtless to many others why Indian Mahomedans apprehend danger to their interests from the introduction of self government and why they demand safeguards. They are in several respects placed advantageously in comparison with the Hindu majority for political action. They are a solid and compact body of seventy millions free to a large extent from paralyzing caste distinctions, inspired by a real feeling of brotherhood exceeding that of any other religion, and possessing a great tradition not only of conquest and empire, but also of science, art and philosophy. A community endowed with so many great advantages, one would think, has no need to be afraid of the Hindu majority which by the way, is largely a paper one, and which owing to distractions of sect and divisions of caste, language and province, has all through its history given proof of but a feeble and spasmodic capacity for corporate political action. Mere strength of numbers is a small factor in national capacity or we should not have a few thousand Englishmen controlling the destinies of the many millions of this land. Even the total population of Great Britain falls short of the total of Indian Muslims who have the added advantage of being natives of India and not aliens from a distant island. "Few observers doubt", wrote Meredith Townsend in his Asia and Europe, "that, if the English army departed, the Mahomedans after one desperate struggle with the Sikhs, would remain supreme in the Peninsula. They are all potential soldiers; they are all capable of self-sacrifice for their faith; and they are all willing to cohere and to acknowledge one common and central authority. They know how to make themselves obeyed, and, though cruel, they do not excite the kind of hate which drives subjects to despair. They have impressed themselves upon India as the ruling caste." It is, therefore, difficult for the average non-Muslim to understand why the Muslims stand in dread of the Hindus, and some even think that the fears are not real but assumed for political purposes.

The first considered attempt to explain the Mahomedan position, that we have come across, is an able article in the Sunrise, the bright weekly journal of religious and political thought, published at Lahore, from the pen of Hazrat Mirza Bashir-ud-Din Mahmud Ahmed, Head of the Ahmadiyya Community, Qadian. (This sect was founded in 1879 by Mirza Ghulam Ahmed who claimed to be the promised Mahdi and also the promised Messiah, and expounded the doctrine of Jihad as a striving after righteousness. He died in 1908, and the author of the article under notice is his successor.) Hazrat Mirza Bashir-ud-Din's article is headed "Why are Statutory Safeguards Necessary for the Muslims" and is intended as a fairly comprehensive answer to this question. Hazrat Sahib begins by enumerating six main causes which tempt a majority to oppress a minority and proceeds to examine if any of these exist in India. The first is, "where the minority community held sway over the country in the near or remote past, and the majority community believe, or are led to believe, that the minority had been oppressing it during its regime." In such a case, he says "it has been often found that the majority community upon its coming into power has invariably tried to settle its old scores, whether real or imaginary, with the minority." Hazrat Sahib illustrates this by some historical instances one of which, at least, is palpably un-historical. The Buddhists were not "annihilated" by the Hindus in India owing to their persecution of the latter by Buddhist rulers. Buddhism was never a persecuting religion, and all the available evidence shows that Brahmanas were treated with equal respect with Sramanas by Asoka and other Buddhist monarchs. The idea of Hindus annihilating Buddhists in revenge for past persecution, therefore, has no basis in fact. Hazrat Sahib says that "the same dangerous mentality" now prevails among the Hindus, as against the Mahomedans and he produces as witness "a Hindu lady, then convert to Christianity" who was employed as tutor in the family of one of his relatives. "She was so much prejudiced against the Muslims," he observes, "that, while teaching history to her pupils, whenever she came across the story of any Muslim King, she would skip over the pages, and when pressed by the boys, she would curtly say that she knew best which part was to be taught last." With great respect to the Head of the Ahmadiyyas, this strikes us as an extremely slender thread on which to hang his ponderous theory of Hindu longing to wreak vengeance on Muslims for past real or imaginary ill-treatment of their long past generations. A convert is proverbially antipathetic to the religion which he has abandoned, and if the lady in question was really actuated by a feeling of dislike for Moslem rulers as such, it could certainly not have been due to her Hindu origin. It would be more appropriate to trace it to her adopted creed. And, after all, a teacher may in perfect good faith skip over any particular period of history without any disrespect to the personages who figured in it or to the creed which they professed. A simple explanation seems to be that this Christian lady from Mysore, was not herself well grounded and, therefore, not much interested in the Mahomedan period of Indian history. The Mahomedan rulers of Mysore were distinguished by their normally broad-minded attitude to their Hindu subjects and anti-Mahomedan feeling, wherever else it may prevail, is practically unknown in Southern India.

We do not deny that there is a traditional feeling among Hindus all over the country that Mahomedan rulers had dealt hardly with Hindu religious shrines and made forcible conversions in the past, but this feeling does not operate as an active factor in shaping the present day attitude of Hindus as a community towards Muslims as a community. For one thing, the doctrine of Karma which is implicit in all sects of Hinduism as well as in Buddhism, locates the cause of all suffering which a person experiences in his own actions in the present or previous births and makes the Hindu incapable of the "race memories" which are so acute among some other races. Educated Hindus, moreover, remember that, if an Aurangzeb showed religious intolerance, Akbar and many good Moslem rulers accepted and acted whole-heartedly on the traditional Indian principle of respect for all religions. Sir Walter Lawrence in his "The India That We Served" records that he was startled when the late Maharaja Sir Pertap Singh of Idar told him that one of his two ambitions in life was to drive the Mussalmans out of India, the other being to die at the head of his cavalry fighting for the Queen Empress. Some Rajput and other Hindu rulers might, like Sir Pertap, have cherished such an inherited sentiment towards Islam, but the mass of the Hindu people have no such feeling. On this point we can assure Hazrat Sahib and others who share his apprehensions that these are not well-founded, and are based on a distorted view of the Hindu attitude to other religions and the communities which profess them. We propose to deal with the other reasons given by Hazrat Sahib in subsequent issues of the Reformer.

THE ARMY BARS THE WAY.

The Journal of the East India Association for January prints a paper on "the Army in India and Constitutional Reform" by General Sir George S. Barrow read at a meeting of the Association held in October and the speeches made by some of those present thereon. The General endorsed and emphasised the difficulties pointed out by the Simon Commission in the way of the Indianization of the Army within a measurable period, added a new difficulty of his own which, he said, the Commission had overlooked. He disapproved of the Commission's recommendations to have two armies in India, an Imperial army under the Governor-General and an Indian Army subject to the control of the Legislature. General Barrow's criticism of the Commission's plan which has been condemned by Provincial Governments and rejected by the Government of India sums up the arguments against it very tersely. "The existence side by side of two forces," the General observes, "one owing allegiance to the Viceroy and the other to the Central Legislature, with two army headquarters and two sets of departmental services, competition in recruiting, differences over matters of accommodation, training grounds, and in many other directions, which would be the source of endless jealousies and friction." It does not moreover, solve the problem of the eventual replacement of the present Imperial Army by an Indian national army which the Commission rightly holds is an indispensable condition of a completely self-governing India.

The General is in full agreement with the Commission that the Indianization of the Army presents almost insuperable obstacles. He argues that the "martial races" of India were illiterate and without intelligence, and the intellectual races had no martial qualities. It is also suggested that the martial races lose their martial qualities if they are educated. The discipline of the Indian army at present is, therefore, not the educated discipline of intelligence but the uneducated discipline of faith in the British officer as "the son of a dominant race." In proof of his view, the General quotes what an Indian shopkeeper once said to him: "When riots are afoot, put a couple of British soldiers at each end of the street and we all feel safe." The General asked him if a couple of Indian soldiers would not do as well, but the shopkeeper merely shook his head and shrugged his shoulders. The shopkeeper probably meant only to say something which would be pleasing to the General and never expected that he would be quoted as an authority on the army question. If, however, the shop-keeper's remark was rightly understood and correctly reported by the General we should have the Indian Army entirely manned and not only officered by men of British nationality! The General does not, so far as we can see, propose to dispense with Indian soldiers and to replace them by British Tommies. On the contrary, he professes great admiration for the soldierly qualities of the Indian soldier and avers that he was merely stating "a psychological fact where dealings with his (the Indian soldier's) own people are concerned." The General does not see the inconsistency of this observation with the central theme of his paper which is that the "martial" and "non-martial" races of India are distinct, if not hostile, groups and that if the British left India the former will immediately dominate the latter. He did not pause to explain why he is so concerned for the future of the non-martial races who do not themselves seem to mind the catastrophe which he prophesies.

General Barrow's opinion, which is that generally held by Englishmen of his class, that Indian troops will not have the same confidence in Indian as in British officers, has no better basis for it than that it ministers to their self-complacency. If in civil life, as the General admitted, Indian officers acquit themselves efficiently in positions of authority, why should they not do so in the Army where the habit of obedience makes the exercise of authority largely a matter of military discipline.

The discussion on the paper was an one-sided affair. Everybody agreed with the General and Sir Michael O'Dwyer sought to enliven the audience by some fantastic stories of what Mahatma Gandhi told some of his (Sir Michael's) Indian friends. One of these is that British Army Officers should be replaced by German Officers who have been thrown out of their jobs by the Treaty of Versailles! But even Sir Umar Hayat Khan who, in his dual character of member of a martial race and of the landowning class has an intense antipathy to Indian politicians, could not help putting in a plea for more Indian officers, of his own class, of course, though he admitted that Indians did better under British officers. "Wars nowadays," he said, "were quite different from what they used to be. There were chances that fifteen or sixteen officers in a regiment might be wiped out in one day, and although it was quite right to have British officers to organize, to drill and to teach the army, there ought to be Indians who could lead their company or their squadron, because if all the officers of a regiment of Indians were killed in one day, you could promote others. Unless the present state of affairs was altered, in big wars the Indian Army would not be so efficient as one would like." Field-Marshal Sir Claud W. Jacob who spoke later in the discussion admitted the force of Sir Umar's argument and said that the contingency which he apprehended had actually twice happened to his knowledge and in his presence in the late war. But, he added, "it must be remembered that up till now our army had been exceedingly illiterate and uneducated. That had been the trouble. When you had less than 8 per cent of the whole of your population which could read and write in any known language, it was exceedingly difficult to expect such people to rise in the Army and be able to study the art of war as every soldier had to study it all through his service."

The conclusion, if the British General's opinions are to be regarded as conclusive, is that the Army cannot be Indianised and, consequently, India cannot have Dominion Status within any conceivable limit of time. This is also the opinion, strange as it may seem, of those Indians who hold that independence of the British connection should be the goal of our political aspiration, and that from the practical point of view, it requires, all things considered, not more sacrifices than the ideal of Dominion status to attain.

SEEKER AND FRIEND.*

(By BRIGADIER PIMM SMITH, SALVATION ARMY, BOMBAY.)

Henry Drummond says, 'Every real Christian is eccentric! If eccentricity alone were the mark of a real Christian, then George Fox was a Christian, for he was remarkably eccentric. But Fox was much more than merely an eccentric man; he was, to quote William Penn's description of him, 'a heavenly minded man.'

Many have written Fox's life-story, but there was room for the latest essay in this direction by Dr. Rufus M. Jones. 'George Fox, Seeker and Friend' sets the life of the founder of the Society of Friends in relation to the condition of things in Fox's own day and also shows its relationship to many things in this day.

Dr. Jones' object in writing the book has been to enable those who had but a casual acquaintance with Fox to see him as one who was a prophet of a new and better day, and to show how his spirit has operated upon society and how society has reacted to that spirit.

In his 'Varieties of Religious Experience' Professor William James speaks of Fox founding 'a religion of veracity rooted in spiritual inwardness, and to return to something more like the original Gospel truth than men had ever known in England.' In Dr. Jones' book we see the strong mystical element in Fox's character, but we see, too, that with all his mysticism he was eminently sane and practical.

This humble shoemaker from an obscure Leicestershire village was a man of sterling honesty, sincere, fearless. Religion was decadent in England, but Fox's life and work was calculated to do for English religion what Shakespeare did for English literature. There was a setting up of a high ideal, and an infusion of new life which impelled towards the ideal those who came under its power. Fox was not out to create an organisation, but an organism; not to set up machinery, but to quicken life.

So this seventeenth century villager, born of parents who were spiritually controlled and were of the stock of the martyrs, became the originator of a movement the principles of which include democracy, the equality of the sexes, the sacredness of human life and utter opposition to all war, 'even war of defence.'

It was along a stormy way that George Fox journeyed. Catherine Booth, the Mother of the Salvation Army, said, 'You cannot improve the future without disturbing the present, and in disturbing the present the disturber generally meets with a good bit of persecution.' This was certainly the lot of George Fox. No less than sixty times was he arrested and brought before magistrates, and eight times he suffered imprisonment; the prisons or dungeons, into which he was cast often being most vile and filthy places. In prison or out, however, Fox's character was the same, and again and again his imprisonment resulted in the conversion of his jailor. On the wall of the cell in which he was confined at Launceston may still be read words he wrote there: 'I was never in prison that it was not the means of bringing multitudes out of their prisons.'

Fox's great idea was that where men and women were hundred per cent Christians, the community in which they lived would be lifted by contact with them. He preached the Gospel of silence, but he was equally insistent upon practical effort, and so he planned to relieve prisoners, aid widows and orphans, educate the illiterate and generally to draw out of men evidences of the spark of the Divine which he believed was in every man.

This good man was not infallible, he may sometimes have acted unwisely, but he was ever sincere in following the light he had, and dying he was able to say: 'Now I am clear; I am fully clear.'

SECRET VERSUS OPEN DIPLOMACY.

(BY PROF. HARICHARAN MUKERJI, MIDNAPORE COLLEGE.)

It has been the fashion of the diehard politicians and newspapers to have flings at Mahatma Gandhi in season and out of season. In conformity with this amiable practice, the "Morning Post" some months ago branded the latter as an arch diplomat. In the light of this criticism it will not be out of place here to review some of his recent activities to see whether this charge can be levelled against him. According to the opinion of the Earl of Shaftesbury "the intriguing spirit, the overreaching manner and the over refinement of art and policy are naturally incident to the experienced and thorough politician." Dissimulation has been held to be an indispensable quality in rulers. Now, judged by his actions, Gandhiji will be held to be entirely free from these traits of character which adorn the professional politician. He has never tried to win cheap popularity nor has he hesitated to tell most unpalatable truths either to the princes, or the people or the Government. Rather, he has the knack of scandalising people off and on, by making most injudicious and inconvenient admissions. It was not long ago that he gave mortal offence to the Sanatanists, by telling them when he used to read the Gita. The incident also at Benares is still fresh in our memory when on account of his staunch advocacy of the Sarda Act, an infuriated mob of orthodox people tried to assault him. He possesses no over-refinement of art or policy and has never hesitated to call a spade, a spade. Likewise he has never made a secret of his intentions but has plainly given out what is in his mind and what he wants to do. His famous letter to the Viceroy written on the eve of his embarking on Salt Satyagraha is an instance in point. The Civil Disobedience Movement has been spoken of as a rebellion and the Satyagrahis themselves have been partly responsible for lending colour to this grotesque idea by using such expressions as "War Council" "peace pourparlers", etc. But nowhere have we come across a General who, before the outbreak of hostilities, will reveal his whole plan of campaign to the enemy. Such a course of action will prove his utter incompetence and will make us seriously doubt his sanity. But that was exactly what the Mahatma did when he wrote that epoch-making letter to the Viceroy and entrusted it to an Englishman for its safe delivery. Surely he will stand acquitted before the bar of humanity of possessing any diplomatic leanings whatever his detractors may say in the heat of the moment.

Secret diplomacy has been responsible for many secret alliances and engagements and hence of much international injustice and many sanguinary wars. In order to put a stop to this, articles 18-21 of the covenant of the League of Nations were introduced at the instance of President Wilson. It is highly to be deplored that in spite of the salutary influence of the League secret diplomacy has not become a thing of the past; on the contrary it is flourishing as merrily as ever. Europe has already become broken up into two armed hostile camps. France and Italy are busy seeking secret alliances with the powers of the Little Entente and Poland on the one hand and the "Revisionists" i. e. the powers dissatisfied with the award of the Versailles Treaty on the other. The political horizon of Europe seems to have become overcast and a terrible storm is brewing. Both Mr. H. G. Wells and Von Ludendorff, no mean critics either, prophesy a ghastly war in the near future. The only security seems to lie in acclaiming the Mahatma as a great Saviour who had the courage of translating into action the pious wishes of President Wilson by abandoning once for all secret diplomacy and in faithfully following in his footsteps.

M. L. A.'s Letter to Viceroy:—About 35 members of the Assembly have addressed a letter to the Viceroy urging that the Provincial Governments and district officers should do nothing to mar the far-reaching effects of the policy of conciliation inaugurated by His Excellency. The letter is dated January 30, and runs as follows:—"May we take the liberty of writing to you this letter in view of the situation created by the important statement made by Your Excellency announcing the release of members of the All-India Congress Working Committee. While appreciating the spirit in which Your Excellency's Government have taken that step, we desire to convey to you, that the recent action of the police in Calcutta followed by the arrest and conviction of the Mayor of the Corporation is likely to defeat the object, which we recognise Your Excellency has no doubt in view, namely, the creation of an atmosphere of goodwill, in which alone big issues arising from the statement of the Prime Minister can be dispassionately considered. We wish to impress upon Your Excellency, that every thing possible should be done on the part of the Provincial Governments and district officers not to mar the far-reaching effects, of the policy of conciliation so opportunely inaugurated by Your Excellency."

THE INDIAN RIDDLE.

To the Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

As a regular reader of your esteemed weekly will you allow me to write a few lines concerning your treatment of "The Indian Riddle" which appeared in your issue of the 20th December. Your attempt to create a second Mahatmaship in India for Lord Irwin is likely to meet with general approval. You refuse to believe, as some "scoffers" do, that there is no room for two Mahatmas in India. And you proceed almost immediately to dub Lord Irwin the second Mahatma side by side with Gandhiji for the following among other reasons. "Both believe," you declare "in suffering as the means of salvation, only while the one undergoes it, the other inflicts it, for the good of the country." In the opinion of several people Sir Michael O'Dwyer is the fittest person to inflict suffering even more efficiently than Lord Irwin, and hence he is to them the more appropriate candidate of the two for the Mahatmaship. But since the noble Lord's claim to the pedestal are, in your opinion, incontestable, they need not be challenged in favour of those of the gallant Knight.

Let me however offer a humble suggestion. The human mind, in most spiritual matters, thinks generally in trinities. Thus we have the Hindu Trinity and the Christian Trinity. I suggest that your Duality of Mahatmas, the one inflicting and the other undergoing suffering, both for the good of the country, may be transformed in accordance with religious tradition into a Trinity. We should therefore try to discover a Holy Ghost hovering in the shape of a dove between the Father who chastises and the Son who expiates. As competitors for the third Mahatmaship one thinks of Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, Mr. M. R. Jayakar, the Rt. Hon. Srinivas Shastri, and may I suggest, Sir, Mr. K. Natarajan.

SYMBOL OF ZOROASTRIANISM.

To the Editor, the Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I was interested in reading in your interesting paper recently an article in which were mentioned a few symbols of the Religions of the world, as—

Cross for Christianity,

Crescent for Moslem religion.

Trident for Hinduism, (Is this correct?)

Lotus for Buddhism, (Is this correct?)

What is the symbol for Zoroastrianism?

TO JESUS THROUGH GANDHI.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,
Sir,

You will perhaps remember me as your old correspondent "Perplexed." I have found America such a jumble of paradoxes, that I fear I am about as much "Perplexed" as ever. After all how little we know of life, and its infinitely complex relationships and still how utterly foolish it is to allow ones self to become entangled with doubts and perplexities, for in a great measure they act only as inhibitions to positive living, and after all we do know enough, to live and to work within the Kingdom of God.

A few weeks ago I was speaking before a small town audience on India. After the meeting a very interesting and attractive young woman came up to speak to me. She was a medical laboratory technician—born and raised in Vienna, and had been living in America for only eight years. She had been brought up a very strict Roman Catholic, but during the War had revolted against its formalism, and indeed against all religion. After coming to America she became interested in Mr. Gandhi, and began to read every thing of his and about him, that she could get hold of. Gradually she came to think that if such a great and true man and non-Christian, could regard Christ so highly that Christ Himself must be true. Thus through Gandhi she has come again to believe in Jesus.

This instance seemed to me so interesting and significant that I desire to share it with you. There is a high interest at this time in America concerning India, and for this reason speakers on India have a very cordial reception. Perhaps—perhaps—through the repercussion, this strange country of mine, so full of the love of pleasure, and of mammon and yet so full of idealism and true aspirations, may through India be reconverted to her Lord. Let us hope so.

"MORE PERPLEXED."

Marine Engineering Scholarships:—The Government of India have announced that three State technical scholarships of the value of £. 240 per annum each (inclusive of a bonus of £. 40) tenable in England for the training of Indians in Marine Engineering will be awarded in 1931. The training in Marine Engineering consists of (i) workshop service (i. e. practical training in the construction and erection of marine engines), and (ii) sea service. The total period of training will extend from six to seven years. Of this four to five years will be required to complete the training at such private firms of marine engineers as may be arranged by the High Commissioner for India. This period of workshop apprenticeship will be followed by training for 18 months at sea in a foreign-going ship, arrangements for which will also be made by the High Commissioner. The scholarships will be awarded after a competitive examination which will be held at different centers in India on the 20th April 1931 and the following days. Rules and conditions for the grant of these scholarships and the rules for the competitive examination for the selection of candidates for the scholarships have been published in Part I of the Gazette of India, dated the 24th January 1931. Applications for entry to the examination must be made on the prescribed form copies of which can be obtained from the Secretary to the Government of India, Department of Commerce, New Delhi, and they must reach that Department on or before the 20th March 1931.

BISHOP CHITAMBAR ON PROHIBITION.

Under the auspices of the Women's Christian Temperance Union of India there was a well attended meeting on Friday evening January 23rd, in the East Street Methodist Episcopal Church, Poona, presided over by the Rev. Bishop Brenton Badley, when the new Indian Methodist Bishop, the Rev. J. R. Chitambar of Lucknow, delivered an address on the liquor traffic in India and the duty of the Christian Church in relation to it. Mr. Badley said it was not far from Poona about 60 years ago that a young Brahman was led to Christ and after his training in Wilson College he went to Allahabad. About 50 years ago a son was born to him and that son was now to speak as a Methodist Bishop in the Brahman city of Poona in the Presidency where his father found Christ. Dr. Chitambar, who a few years ago was the President of the All-India Conference of Indian Christians, began by saying that in coming to Western India he felt he was returning to his Fatherland. There was need to speak of total abstinence among Christian people, he said, and he greatly preferred the term 'total abstinence' to the term 'temperance.'

Bishop Chitambar's three main points were: (1) Psychology and Drink; (2) Attitude of Christians to Drink; (3) What should be done to meet this situation? He first dealt with the psychological aspect of the drink question. The scientific and social aspects had been emphasized widely but we needed to think more of its psychological effects as well. For alcohol is a narcotic, which lulls the senses to sleep and Psychology points out its deadening effects on these. It is well known that alcohol blunts the capacity for self-criticism; as for example, a drunkard laughs at others and never at himself. Alcohol disturbs the motor co-ordination, and produces such stupor as to slow down muscular reactions. Hence a motor-man who drinks is disqualified. Nowadays because a moderate drinker suffers these things gradually, he also becomes a social problem.

We need to make clear to our Hindu and Muslim friends that the Christian religion neither enjoins nor sanctions drinking alcohol. The examples of Noah and Lot and others, even in the Old Testament, show how the drinking practice is condemned there, and on the other hand abstinence is commended; the Rechabites for example. 'Look not upon the wine when it is red,' says the Bible. What could be plainer than that? Or what clearer than this? 'No drunkard can enter the Kingdom of Heaven.' Drink as the enemy he had once preached on, and one of his hearers reminded him afterwards that Jesus said 'Love your enemies.' 'True' replied the bishop, 'but Jesus never said that we must swallow our enemies!' What then is our Christian duty concerning the drink trade? There are two hopeful facts: (1) the well nigh universal awakening in India against this traffic, and (2) the active part taken by India's women in the anti-liquor movement. I sometimes feel ashamed as a man and as a Christian when I see the achievements of the women of the W. C. T. U., and when I see those of India's so-called non-Christian movements on this subject. Such work is not merely social: it is saturated with prayer all over India.'

Co-operation, persuasion, education and legislation—these are the four necessities of the hour in India. We must all co-operate whether we be Christian, Hindu, Muslim, or whatever we be. We must persuade those who have the drinking habit to give it up. I wish to emphasize the educational method, for prohibition can never be achieved by legislation alone. Legislation is essential but without such conviction as is produced by education the task can never be accomplished. The only hope ever for American prohibition, said Mrs. Sayer, the daughter of the late President Woodrow Wilson on her visit to India, lies in educating the coming generation. Prohibition must fail unless it is part of a social and economical ideal the realization of which enriches the opportunities for happiness in life; and self-discipline is an essential element of the prohibition ideal. India, which is so poor, must be freed from the clutches of the drink demon. Ours is a battle for righteousness.

For right is right, since God is God,
And right the day must win;
To doubt would be disloyalty,
To falter would be sin.

Before the above speech a Social was held the same evening at the Taylor High School to welcome the delegates, as well as Dr. Chitambar, when over one hundred people from various centres were present.—The Dnyanodaya.

BOMBAY SOCIAL SERVICE LEAGUE.

The following is a brief summary of the Report of the work done by the Social Service League, Bombay, during the year 1929:

MASS EDUCATION.

During the year under report the League maintained 9 night schools out of which one was Anglo-Marathi, two Anglo-Gujarati, four Anglo-Urdu and two night high schools. The total number of students on the rolls was 386, the daily average attendance being 246. Six of these night schools receive grants-in-aid from the Bombay Municipality.

There were three standing libraries and three reading-rooms and 30 boxes of the travelling free library maintained by the League during the year under report. The standing libraries contain in all 8,318 books and pamphlets in Marathi, Gujarati, Urdu and English, and the total number of books issued during the year was 5,648. About 127 persons took advantage daily of the three reading rooms. During the year under report boxes of books from the travelling free library were supplied to ten centres, the total number of books issued from these boxes being about 3,000.

Ten lantern lectures were arranged under the auspices of the League at different places during the year under report.

THE TEXTILE TECHNICAL SCHOOL.

In this school theoretical and practical training in spinning and weaving is imparted to millworkers through the vernacular. At the beginning of the year there were 33 students on the roll at this school. The attendance was adversely affected by communal riots in the City. Eighteen students appeared for the annual examinations and 13 of them were successful. At the end of the year under report there were 33 students on the roll, the daily average attendance being 24. The general strike of the millworkers also interfered with the regular attendance of the students. The condition of the school has since, it may be mentioned, much improved as regards both the number of students and regular attendance. The school continued to receive grants-in-aid from the Bombay Municipality and the Committee of Direction for Technical Education (Bombay Presidency).

PUBLIC HEALTH.

During the year under report the total number of patients treated at Bai Bachubai Kanji Cursondas Charitable Dispensary for Women and Children was 21,627 (11,311 women and 10,316 children), the daily average attendance being 72. On behalf of the Arya Mahila Samaj, milk was supplied free to needy mothers and children at the recommendation of the lady doctor in charge of the dispensary, the cost of the milk thus supplied and borne by the Arya Mahila Samaj during the year under report being Rs. 821-4-0. This dispensary receives a monthly grant of Rs. 75 from the Bombay Municipality.

FREE EYE TREATMENT.

At the Madanpura Settlement of the League Dr. S. R. Machve of the Blind Relief Association treated 2,400 poor eye patients during the year. Of these 60 poor patients who could not afford to buy spectacles were supplied with the same free of cost by the Blind Relief Association.

SANITATION WORK IN THE CITY.

During the year under report two sanitation rounds were arranged, one through the Workingmen's Institute and the other through League's Head Office. The Municipal Commissioner and other municipal officers were in the party in the former, in the course of which some of the worst slums in F and G wards were visited. The latter was arranged for inspecting some of the insanitary places in C ward. Some complaints regarding unsatisfactory drainage and other matters were also made to the municipal authorities on behalf of the public.

WORK FOR WOMEN.

The activities of the League for women are conducted through the Mahila Mandal, a body specially constituted for the purpose under the auspices of the League. In the year under report, the work for women was being carried on at two centres, viz., Parel and Vile Parle. The total number of students on the rolls was 206, the daily average attendance being 150. Sewing and cutting fancy work, handicrafts (the making of paper-flowers and cane-work), drawing and pen-painting are the subjects which are taught at these classes. During the year under report a Home Nursing class and a Health Volunteers' class were also organized. Several lectures were also arranged on subjects useful to women, two of these lectures being lantern lectures. The industrial classes for women have been registered with the Educational Department of the Bombay Government and the Director of Public Instruction has been pleased to sanction an annual grant-in-aid.

INDUSTRIAL SETTLEMENT AT BELGAUM.

One of the Life-Workers of the League is in charge of the Industrial Settlement at Belgaum. The Settlement work consists of practical measures for the reclamation of the Criminal Tribes. The expenses of this work are met from capitation grant and other grants received from the Government. During the year under report, the number of registered settlers was 110 and the total population of the Settlement at the end of the year was 226. The League's Worker in charge of the settlement looks after sanitation, education and recreation, and also sees to it that the Settlers get remunerative employment for maintaining themselves and their families. A scout troop consisting of 24 scouts and 8 cubs has been organized in the Settlement, and also a co-operative credit society has been organized with a view to provide facilities to the settlers for depositing their savings and obtaining loans at a cheap rate of interest when needy. The League's Worker in addition to his duties as manager of the Settlement looked after, in the year under report, 33 families at their villages, these families having been allowed to live in their respective villages on probation. The Criminal Tribes Settlement Officer has remarked in his report that the Settlement has been very ably managed by the League's worker in charge of that work.

WORK IN THE FIELD OF CO-OPERATION.

During the year under report, 42 co-operative credit societies were working under the League's supervision. The membership of the societies was 3,482; working capital Rs. 1,66,530; share capital, 65,768; and the reserve fund 30,805. During the period under report, loans amounting to Rs. 1,03,663 were advanced to needy members and recoveries amounting to Rs. 94,498 were made. During the same period six village societies were organized in Kalyan Taluka, and two co-operative stores were organized, one at Chembar and the other at Ambernath, and 25 meetings were held and eleven lectures, some of them with the aid of the lantern slides, were arranged for co-operative propaganda.

RECREATION FOR WORKING CLASSES.

The Indian gymnasium attached to the Parel Settlement of the League was taken advantage of by about 55 men daily, during the year under report. About 15 men attended the Lathi Club at the Workingmen's Institute. During the year under report 38 dramatic performances were given in the Damodar Thackersey Moolji Hall. The Sahakari Manoranjan Mandal which is an amateur dramatic club formed under the auspices of the League and run on co-operative lines gave 18 performances during the year.

PROPAGANDA WORK AND TRAINING FOR SOCIAL WORKERS.

The League conducts a quarterly journal called "The Social Service Quarterly." The Marathi Quarterly the "Samaj Sevak" had to be discontinued in the year under report for want of adequate public support. The League maintains an Information Bureau and Register of Charities and a Library of books on social service. In the year under report, a Social Workers' Training Class was organized as in the previous year, and 71 persons enrolled themselves as students of this class. Thirty-one lectures were delivered by 18 ladies and gentlemen on eighteen different subjects.

In the year under report, the views of the League's Managing Committee were called for by the Bombay Opium Enquiry Committee and the Royal Commission on Labour in India. Written statements answering the respective questionnaires were sent, and also oral evidence was given on behalf of the League before the Royal Commission on Labour.

INDIAN STATES' PEOPLES' CONFERENCE WORKING COMMITTEE'S RESOLUTIONS.

The Working Committee of the Indian States' People's Conference passed the following resolutions at its meeting held on 6-2-31 at the Servants of India Society's hall when Messrs. Abhyankar, A. V. Thakkar, Seth Govindlal Shivalal, A. V. Patwardhan, Lakmichand Doshi, Banchhoddas Gandhi, Kakalbhoj Kothari, Rangidas Kapadia, Niranjan Sharma and Bapalal Doshi were present. The resolutions are forwarded to the Secretary of the Indian National Congress to be placed before the Working Committee to be held shortly for its consideration in the event of the Congress agreeing to enter into negotiations with the Government for drafting a Constitution for India.

RESOLUTIONS.

The Working Committee of the Indian States' People's Conference deeply mourns the loss the nation has sustained by the sad demise of India's beloved leader and a great sympathizer of the Indian States' people, Pundit Motilal Nehru at this critical juncture in the nation's life and conveys its heartfelt condolence to President Jawaharlal and family in their great bereavement.

The Working Committee of the Indian States' People's Conference welcome the idea of a federation provided that statutory provisions are made in the constitution guaranteeing that the representations of the States in the federal legislature shall be by direct popular elections and on lines analogous to units of British Indian Provinces and not by nomination by the Princes.

This Committee further resolves that there should be a declaration of rights for the people of the States embodied in the federal constitution such as the liberty of person, property and conscience, freedom of speech and association, and liberty of the press and that remedies against arbitrary executive acts and isolation of fundamental civic rights are duly provided for.

This Working Committee views with serious apprehension the creation in the new constitution of the office of a Viceroy to represent the Crown in relation with the States.

This Committee appoints a committee of Prof. G. A. Abhyankar and Sjt. A. V. Thakkar to draft a memorandum presenting the case of the Indian States' people for submission to the Working Committee of the Congress.

This Committee further resolves that a convention of the leading workers of the Indian States be convened in Bombay, at an early date for the purpose of considering the position of the States' peoples in the coming federation and appoints for the purpose a committee of Sheth Govindlal Shivalal Motilal as Chairman, Sjt. Lakmichand Doshi as Treasurer and Messrs. Rangidas Kapadia and Kakalbhoj Kothari as Secretaries.

The Committee adopts Mr. Banchhoddas Gandhi as a member to fill up one of the vacancies.

This Committee vehemently condemns the gross abuse of the Foreigners' Act of 1864 against a large number of Indian States' Subjects who have not only been residents of British India for years but also own landed property and have vested interests and source of their livelihood in British Indian territories.

SERVANTS OF INDIA SOCIETY, TRICHINOPOLY.

The Trichinopoly Correspondent of the Hindu writes:— Soon after the District Board Meeting terminated, a meeting of the select members of the District was held, with Sir T. Desikachariar, Kt., in the Chair. Messrs. Venkata Subbiah, Suriyanarayana and K. G. Sivasamy Iyer were present at the meeting, representing the Servants of India Society. Sir T. Desikachariar explained the objects of the meeting and pointed out the necessity of an organisation of a Trust for the retention of the services of one of the members of the Society to carry on public work in this District. Mr. S. Ranganathan, I.C.S., Collector of Trichinopoly, detailed the services rendered by the Society in different parts of the country, with special reference to Flood Relief, Rural Reconstruction work etc. He brought to the notice of the members who were present that the Malayalis residing in the Hills were being very badly treated and on account of heavy indebtedness to the extent of a lakh and a half, one of them had gone to the extent of mortgaging his daughter to his creditor. They undoubtedly sought help from the public workers like the members of the Servants of India Society. If they could so arrange to keep one of the members in this District permanently in their midst, they could turn out substantial work amidst the poor and distressed people. They should make it possible to have one of the members of the Society to continue to work in this district for which a sum of Rs. 2,000 a year would be required. He suggested that each Taluq Board might contribute Rs. 100 and three Municipalities another Rs. 100 each while the District Board might ungrudgingly pay a sum of Rs. 1,000. He requested the members that were present at the meeting to consider this. Mr. Venkata Subbiah gave an account of the various works that were being turned out by the members in different parts of the country. He said that one of the members of the Society Mr. K. G. Sivaswamy Iyer had been doing intensive cooperative work in one corner of the Kulittalai Taluk as the area in which he was engaged needed his attention. He had been devoting special attention to the Adi-Dravidas, starting panchayats, organising leagues of young men who would in future become citizens of the community and also opening of schools, promoting thrift society and carrying on temperance work under the guidance of the District Temperance Committee. The main question that should engage them was how to make the stay of one of them permanently. The society was prepared to place the services of its men at their disposal, provided they could find funds for their retention here. Mr. T. M. Narayanasamy Pillai, M.L.C., President, District Board, then moved the following resolution:—That a Trust having an organic connection with the Servants of India Society be formed in Trichinopoly District to continuously carry on general welfare work in the District—moral and material improvement of the people of the District. That a request be made to the President and Council of the Servants of India Society to continue the services of a member of this District. That an amount of not less than Rs. 2,000 per annum be raised in the District by subscriptions and donations for upkeep of the works and establishment. That money be raised by subscriptions and donations from individuals for carrying on the various activities of the Trust. That the Local Bodies and Municipal Councils be requested for help. The resolution was carried. Sir T. Desikachariar, in his concluding remarks requested Mr. Ranganathan, Collector, to influence the prominent Mirasaders of the District during his tour and to enlist their sympathy. He suggested the registration of the Trust of a charitable society with a definite programme of work and the members of the Local bodies be admitted as ex-officio members of the Trust. Mr. T. V. Somasundaram Pillay proposed a vote of thanks to the President and to the District Collector and said he was particularly glad that the Collector was willing to serve for the cause of the poor, the distressed and the disabled and on behalf of the District Board, he thanked the Collector for his co-operation.

NEWS AND VIEWS.

A Blot on the R. T. C.—The Indian Social Reformer has rendered a distinct public service by protesting against the un-Indian act of the delegates from India to the Round Table Conference in entertaining British statesmen with liquor at the banquet given by them to the latter in London. 'Never was better wine drunk,' says The Statesman which speaks of the 'superb if greatly abused champagne' on the table of the Indian hosts. We entirely agree with our contemporary when it concludes that these delegates from India 'betrayed an important national interest by their weakness in allowing liquor to figure at their official banquet to British representatives.' In view of India's religious and traditional attitude to liquor, such an act was a scandal, especially since an increasing number of official functions are held all over Britain without liquor.—The Dnyanodaya.

When Gandhiji will come to Ahmedabad :—Seth Ranchhodlal, a prominent mill owner and the leader of a batch of Dharasana who recently came out of jail, had sent the following telegram to Mahatma Gandhi, on 4th February, at Allahabad. "Wire probable date arrival Ahmedabad." Mahatma Gandhi sent the following telegraphic reply:—"Probable date—attainment of Swarajya."

Proposed Women's Central College :—Her Excellency Lady Irwin has issued the following appeal: "The All-India Women's Education Fund was founded in 1929 for the promotion of education among women and girls. I was elected the first President of the Association and a special committee was appointed at the first annual general meeting in 1930 to enquire into the various suggestions for carrying out the objects of the Association. This Special Committee met in August 1930, and it was decided at the annual meeting of the All-India Women's Education Fund Association in January 1931 that a Central College should be founded on the lines recommended in the report of the Special Committee. The College is to be for all India and will be situated in Delhi. It will include research work in educational methods. The staff and students will study the life of the Indian child and its relation and response to environment with the object of evolving a method of education most suited to Indian psychology and Indian conditions. Training will be given in Home Science. All over India, there is a desire for extension of Home Science training in the education of girls. Special courses in Home Science will be provided for which diplomas will be given. The ideal of the college will be to send out trained teachers in all subjects with a new attitude towards education, which will enable them to carry out methods applicable to varying conditions. A school will be an essential part of the institution for carrying out the work of both research and training. As the work expanded it is intended to open other schools in rural areas. Thus, a definite effort will be made to carry out the aims of the All-India Women's Conference on education and Social Reform of establishing an education which will be natural and national and equally capable of application to all spheres of life. A sum of at least twelve lakhs for the endowment of the institute and an additional lakh for initial equipment is required at present, making in all thirteen lakhs. Generous donors sympathising with the objects of the Association subscribed when it was first started and before a definite scheme for the college had been drawn up. A widespread sympathy has been expressed with the aims and objects of the Central College which we now propose to establish, and I appeal with confidence to all those who realise the vital importance of education among women to support us and help us to achieve our purpose. It is my earnest desire that, before I leave India on April 18th, I may know that a sufficient sum of money has been contributed to enable the college to be started. Donations and subscriptions should be sent to any branch of the Imperial Bank of India in India or England or to the Treasurer, Mr. G. Kaula, O. I. E., 2, York Place, New Delhi. All remittances will be acknowledged by the Honorary Treasurer, and lists will be published periodically. Copies of the report may be obtained from the Honorary Secretary, Mrs. Rustomji Faridoonji, Hyderabad (Deccan).

NOTES.

Irwin-Gandhi Conversations:—As the result of the strenuous efforts of Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and Messrs. Jayakar and Srinivasa Sastry, the Viceroy invited Mahatma Gandhi to a private and personal interview which lasted four hours on Tuesday and was continued for about two hours on Wednesday. On Thursday, the Viceroy, rather unexpectedly it seems, invited Mahatma Gandhi to see him, A Press Note issued from Viceroy's House, New Delhi, stated: "His Excellency the Viceroy granted a further interview to Mr. Gandhi. It is understood that various matters emerging from the discussions are now under examination and it is possible some days may elapse before a further stage of the discussions is reached." More or less intelligent conjectures of what passed at the interviews, have been published. The fact that the Governors of Bombay and Madras are staying at Viceroy's House and that Mahatma Gandhi has sent for the members of the Working Committee, show that important discussions are either in progress or are likely shortly to take place. The Maharajas of Bikanir and Bhopal have also been sent for. As the result of these parleyings, it may be decided to call a sort of convention of all parties, at which the outlines of a constitution can be framed after thoroughly exploring all aspects of the Indian problem. The principle of the federation of the States with British India has received general acceptance, but in working out details it is necessary to have the co-operation of representatives of the people of the States who must at least be assured that their interests will not be lost sight of. Owing to their not being represented directly at the London Conference, they have been sending their representations to the Working Committee of the National Congress, which they expect to take up their cause. If a Federal scheme is agreed upon in broad essentials, the next important question is as regards the constitution and functions of the Central Government and the Legislature, which involves highly controversial questions. For the present, we need only express our great satisfaction that his Excellency the Viceroy, for his part, seems determined to leave no stone unturned to facilitate an agreed settlement and that Mahatma Gandhi, on his part, is equally keen on assisting to bring about the happy consummation.

The Census:—We publish elsewhere a communication from the Jat Pat Torak Mandal giving an account of the agitation which has ended happily in the Government of India accepting the request of the Mandal to permit Hindus who do not want to return their castes at the Census to leave the column blank in the schedule. Nobody, we may say, expects that caste will be abolished by merely omitting it in the Census. The object of the Mandal and its supporters in pressing for the change was merely to emphasize the unimportance of this institution in a study of the demographic conditions of the Indian population. It seems that the Bengal Government, not evidently liking to see a column blank, has ruled that "race" may be substituted for caste. We do not know what idea the Bengal Government has of race which is a much more recondite and controversial matter. The Government of Bombay, too, has been moved by a like motive to introduce a new classification of Hindus into Advanced, Intermediate and Backward classes, in the next Census. This piece of information is furnished incidentally in the course of a Resolution issued this week in the Educational Department on the Report of the Depressed Classes Committee. No such classification is contemplated for other communities, though there must be advanced and backward sections in all communities. The instruction, it is stated, has been issued in the Political Department, so, no doubt, there must be profound political reasons for this division of the Hindu community.

A Marriage Law Anomaly:—Our valued contributor, Mr. Kopargam Ramamurti, has rendered valuable public service by exposing the anomaly and the injustice of the present state of the law, as interpreted by the Madras High Court, relating to marriages of Christians with non-Christians. The provisions of the Indian Christian Marriage Act relating to such marriages stand clearly in need of amendment. The Bishop of Tinneveli, in his letter to Mr. Ramamurti, which we publish elsewhere, recognises the need of amendment in some respects pointed out by him, though on this particular matter he does not think it necessary to make a public declaration of his views, presumably because it concerns non-Christians as much as Christians. The present anomalous state of the law, is well brought out by the two cases of Hindu Christian marriage which are reported in this issue. In the first case, the parties were married under the Special Marriage Act of 1872, which requires them to declare that they do not profess Hinduism or Christianity. The marriage was attended by many Christians and was the occasion of much festivity. In the other case, the Hindu priest who married the parties was prosecuted under the Indian Christian Marriage Act and was ordered to pay a fine of Rupees ten, the Judge, being obliged to convict the man, adopting this way of marking his sense of the technical nature of the offence.

Anti-Indian Propaganda by Missionaries:—

In his letter which we publish today, Mr. Manilal Parekh who recently returned from a world tour, calls attention to the anti-Indian propaganda carried on by some Christian Missionaries when they go to their native land either on leave or on retirement. We have received from time to time similar complaints from Indians abroad accompanied by cuttings from newspapers in proof of them. On the other hand, we know for a fact that some other Missionaries have been utilising their hard-earned leisure to enlighten their people on Indian aspirations, and we have always regarded Mr. J. F. Edwards, to whom Mr. Parekh refers, as one of them. By his strong advocacy of Prohibition in India, he has done a service to the national cause which cannot be over-estimated. We are bound to say, however, that his avowal that he described, in his speeches in America, Pandit Jawharlal Nehru as a Communist and an Atheist, has come as a shock to us. Whether the Pandit is the one or the other is not the point. What astonishes us is that Mr. Edwards should have thought it right or even relevant in an exposition of the Indian problem to Americans to seek to create a prejudice against the President of the National Congress by appealing to the economic and theological bias of his hearers. Whatever Pandit Jawharlal's personal views may be on these matters, the Congress movement must be judged only by its declared programme. As a fact, the Pandit is neither a Communist nor an Atheist. He is a Socialist just as Mr. Ramsay Macdonald is, and as for his religious views, he is, we suppose, as much devoted to his ancestral faith as any other educated Indian of the present day. We may add that India long ago passed the stage when religion centred chiefly on a god with a lathi in one hand and lollypops in the other. Gautama Buddha was severely silent about God and so was Kapila, the Sankhya philosopher, whom nevertheless, the theistic Gita extols as the greatest of the Perfected Ones. As regards the question of non-Christian contributions to Christian missionary institutions, raised in Mr. Parekh's letter, the latter have undoubtedly conferred many benefits on Indians, although we think that the humanitarian character of their service is sometimes obscured and will be better appreciated if it were not associated as part of a proselytising programme. We think that when contributions are received from non-Christians, the donors must be allowed, in fairness, a voice in the management of the institutions for which they are received.

Government and Corrupt Practices:—

Last week's Bombay Government Gazette contained the announcement that the Governor-in-Council has removed the disqualifications imposed under the law on Sir Vasantrao Dabholkar, Dr. R. T. Nariman, Messrs. Ram-chandra M. Bhat and Dinshaw Cowasjee for corrupt practices at the last Council election in Bombay. This action of the Government in setting aside the disqualifications is shrouded in mystery as no explanation has been vouchsafed to justify the notification. The gentlemen above mentioned were found guilty of a corrupt practice by a special tribunal presided over by Dewan Bahadur K. M. Jhaveri, and were declared ineligible for election or nomination for five years in any of the representative bodies in the province and outside; and this fact was duly notified in the Bombay Government Gazette hardly a month ago. What has transpired to justify the reversal of the Government Order since then? It is as much in the interests of the gentlemen concerned as that of the public for the Government to state the grounds on which the disqualifications have been set aside so promptly. What amounts to a condonation of corrupt practices by the Government in these cases will, we are afraid, affect the purity of future elections. Government under the law has, no doubt, the power to relieve men found guilty of corrupt practices of the legal consequences of their offence, but it owes a duty to the public to explain why this power has been exercised in this case. It is wise even for a bureaucracy to take public opinion with it as far as possible, and not to seem to dictate to it from on high. If there have come to the notice of Government extenuating circumstances in this case, the fact might have been stated. The public have no interest in having the gentlemen concerned victimised. It will in no way detract from the authority of Government, if it takes the public into its confidence in such matters.

U. P. Naik Act:—Our Central and Provincial legislatures are not over-hasty in enacting social legislation. It was with much difficulty that the United Provinces Legislative Council passed the Naik Girls' Protection Act which was placed on the Statute book in 1929, more than a year ago in the areas where its operation is most needed. But the Provincial Government has not yet seen fit to bring the Act into force. By this inexplicable delay the very purpose of the enactment has been defeated. In the districts of Almora, Nainital and Gharwal, which are known as the Naik area, there prevails the system of bringing up girls for immoral purposes either by the parents or by others. The Seva Samiti of Allahabad has been doing for a number of years excellent reform work among the Naiks to persuade them to give up this evil custom. By the failure of the Government to enforce the Act there has been, we understand, a set back to the work of reform. A well-informed correspondent writes: "For close upon eight years it has been a difficult affair to induce the Naik parents to give their daughters in marriage instead of letting them out for immoral purposes or sending them to prostitutes to learn the heinous trade of prostitution. The economic condition of the hill tribes is always very meagre but the present depression has brought to bear upon them still greater calamity and they have again openly begun to take to the former habit of letting out their daughters to lead a life of shame. The abeyance of the enforcement of the Act has added to the evil and blunted the edge of our operation a great deal."

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1931.

WHY MUSLIMS WANT STATUTORY SAFEGUARDS, II.

The second reason which, according to Hazrat Mirza Bashir-ud-din Mahomed Ahmed, leads a majority to attempt to destroy a minority, is cultural and social superiority of the latter which leads the majority to fear the minority. Hazrat Sahib holds that this factor also plays a part in Hindu-Mahomedan differences at the present day. The Muslims, he observes, do hold a position of real cultural and social superiority in India. He proceeds to adduce as evidence of this superiority (1) the total absence of untouchability, (2) the general feeling of social equality which exists "to an appreciable extent", (3) remarriage of widows "more or less in vogue", and (4) the comparatively few ceremonies which have to be observed on occasions of marriage, among Muslims. The instances given by Hazrat Sahib cannot be regarded as indubitable proofs of the cultural and social superiority of a community. The existence of untouchability is a great blot on Hinduism but the mere absence of it does not constitute cultural or social superiority. Their treatment of Negroes in the United States, for instance, does not make North Americans culturally or socially inferior to South Americans where colour prejudice is said to be virtually unknown. As for the remarriage of widows, the Dowager Begum of Bhopal in her autobiography states that it is forbidden in aristocratic families among Muslims, which means that, amongst them, as amongst Hindus, the prohibition is rather regarded as a sign of superior social status. There are communities in India among whom fewer ceremonies are observed on occasions of marriage than even among Muslims but they cannot on that account alone be held to be socially or culturally superior to Muslims. It is, therefore, impossible to generalise as regards the relative social and cultural position of communities. We have ourselves pointed out in our first article that Muslims are in some respects better organised for political action than Hindus. If to this is added the claim to social and cultural superiority, there should be the less reason to apprehend being over-ridden by a mere numerical majority without many of these advantages. Particularly, by a majority of Hindus who throughout their history have shown no disposition to destroy the religious and social integrity of even small minorities like the Jews, Syrian Christians and Parsis.

This is also an answer to Hazrat Sahib's third reason, namely, that it is "an incentive to the majority to oppress a minority when there is an element of permanency in the latter, i. e. the presence in it of some such quality as prevents it from losing its identity." This is true of majorities professing proselytising religions but Hinduism from ancient times has consistently adopted the policy of allowing other religious communities not merely freedom but also incentives to follow their own modes of life and worship. It is true that Islam, unlike the other ancient religions domiciled in this country, was not content with freedom for itself but aspired to dominate over other religions. But when it found that this was impossible, it also fell in with the Indian tradition. Akbar was the direct successor in this respect to Asoka. There was another reason too for the tolerant attitude to Hinduism which Islam adopted in course of time. In its origin, Islam was a protest against the abuses which had crept into Judaism and Christianity but Hinduism, as Muslim scholars soon realised, was a different problem.

Hazrat Sahib's fourth reason, is rather inconsistent with his third. It is "the presence in it (the minority community, namely, Muslims) of such potentialities as to go to make it a progressive community threatening the position of the majority and making it afraid lest the minority should some day be converted into the majority." There may be some ground for this opinion in the Punjab, but we certainly do not find any evidence of such an apprehension among Hindus in other parts of the country. Nor have there been any conspicuous signs of a general movement in Hinduism towards Islam. A few Hindu girls have married Mahomedans recently. But religion had little to do with the marriages as in almost every case they were contracted under the Special Marriage Act which requires the parties to declare that they do not profess any of the old established religions. Such unions rather show that the religious barrier to social relations is ceasing to influence individuals of either community. Christian girls have married Hindus in like conditions. These incidents rather go against Hazrat Sahib's plea for stabilising existing communal differences by statutory sanction. In this connection, we may mention a curious experience which befell us last year. We received in the ordinary course a letter for publication purporting to be written by two Hindu women undergraduate students in Allahabad, recommending that Hindu girls should by preference marry Mahomedan husbands for certain reasons stated in the letter. Before publishing the letter, we thought it necessary to send it to Allahabad for verification. As the result of enquiry at the addresses given it was found that there were no undergraduate girls in Allahabad of the names given in the letter.

Hazrat Sahib's fifth reason is perhaps the most important and it may be stated at length in his own words :

"The Indian Muslims, in conformity with their religious traditions, consider the Muslims all over the world as their brethren, and feel most strongly moved by their woes and sufferings. These brotherly sentiments are reciprocated by the foreign Muslims, and even if they are not in a position to actively help one another, there is no doubt that they feel grieved to learn of their misfortunes. Under the circumstances the majority community in India is sure always to remain suspicious of the Muslims and obstruct their progress. This is not an imaginary fear. Do not the Hindus complain that Muslims do not regard themselves as the sons of the soil and are inclined to keep relations with foreigners? The Hindus may not be asking it in so many words; but the question, no doubt, arises in their minds—what will be the attitude of the Indian Muslims in the event of a war between India and Afghanistan, Persia or Arabia? Will they not support their brethren across the border? If they do, then certainly there will always be present an element of weakness in the Government of India. God alone knows, what the Muslims will do if such a contingency arises; but the suspicion which has more than once found expression from the Hindu leaders will, no doubt, continue to obsess the Hindu minds, and they will naturally think it to be a service to the motherland to hamper the progress of the Mussalmans."

It is true that there is such a suspicion among some Hindu leaders and even among some nationalist Mahomedan leaders. But, in our opinion, it may be dismissed from our minds as being opposed to history and commonsense. First, as to history: Indian Mahomedans have fought for their Government against other Mahomedans in the north and south of India, in the days of the Moghul Empire. They have fought for the British Empire against Afghans, Arabs and Turks, in recent times. On the ground of commonsense, Indian Mahomedans would not care to have their homes pillaged by Afghans or Turks merely because the latter happen to be Mussalmans. They know full well that they are in the same boat with their Hindu countrymen and must sink or swim with them in the trackless sea of international politics. While, therefore, we do not attach the least importance to this suspicion, we must say that we were rather taken aback by the readiness with which Maulana Shaukat Ali consented to the offer of a last resting-place to the remains of his patriot brother in Jerusalem.

The sixth and last reason given by Hazrat Sahib is the fear of exploitation by the majority of the economic backwardness of the minority. Exploitation is bad whether carried on by a majority or a minority, and it is as often the case that a minority exploits a majority as a majority a minority. In other words, the fact of majority or minority does not count in economic matters. "Just as most of the wealth of Europe is due to the backwardness of Asia," writes Hazrat Sahib, "so is most of the wealth of the Hindus due, directly or indirectly, to the backwardness of the Muslims. The Muslims are not traders: the Hindus, therefore, monopolise all the advantages of trade. Muslims are not factory-owners: as a result, the whole profit of industry is being enjoyed by the Hindus: Muslims are few in the higher professions, for example, law, medicine and engineering:

therefore, the Hindus are reaping the whole benefit of these professions. Muslims are neither financiers nor bankers: the banks, therefore, add only to the Hindu wealth. There are few Muslim contractors: the profit of this business also, therefore, goes to the Hindus. Muslims are backward in education: as a result, the Government posts mostly go to the Hindus, and they alone derive most of the advantages of the Universities. In short, in every economic field Muslims are lagging behind, and the result is that Hindus are growing richer at their expense. The Hindus are, therefore, aware that an awakening among the Muslims will mean loss to them as a portion of the country's wealth will then be appropriated by the Mussalmans."

The proposition that most of the wealth of the Hindus, is due, directly or indirectly, to the backwardness of the Muslims, will not bear examination. In the first place there is nothing to show that taking the Hindu community as a whole it is proportionately more wealthy than the Moslem community. Then, as Hindus were in India long before there were Mussalmans, it might be argued that the latter must have got all their wealth from the former! In the second place, Hazrat Sahib's categorical statement that Muslims are not traders or factory-owners will be regarded with surprise in other parts of the country where they are pre-eminently both. It is, therefore, clear that economic backwardness has nothing to do with religion and is really due to the same causes as economic backwardness of large bodies of Hindus and Christians. These causes can be remedied by suitable fiscal and financial policies which are no wise different for Muslims than for Hindus. The exchange ratio, to take one instance, affects both in the same way, so does the salt duty and the land tax.

We have in this and the previous article set forth the six principal reasons of Mirza Bashir-ud-din Mahomed Ahmed for Indian Mahomedans requiring statutory safeguards, merely indicating where we thought he was not correctly informed in respect of historical or contemporary facts, and of the psychological and social factors involved. Mirza Sahib's reasons, it will be noticed, rest largely on hypothetical and a priori grounds. His position is, in fact, that the Hindu majority face to face with a minority like Muslims can not but be unjust and oppressive to the latter unless prevented by statutory safeguards. This is clearly brought out in his concluding paragraph where he asks: "When the English industrialists, thousands of miles remote from India cannot view with equanimity the industrial development of India, fearing lest it should affect their interests adversely, will the Hindu traders living in India suffer to see their Muslim compatriots going ahead in the commercial field?" In the next article we intend to state our view of the Mirza Sahib's reasons and to examine how far the real difficulties of our Mahomedan countrymen are amenable to statutory safeguards.

SATYAGRAHA.*

[ By J. C. KUMARAPPA. ]

Man is essentially an animal and in many cases it is impossible to distinguish the nature and character of a human being from that of a brute beast. The line of demarcation is indeed faint. It is by a very gentle gradation that we reach the heights of spirituality. The majority of human beings hardly ever attempt to breathe the pure air of the higher regions and are content to remain on solid earth. Animals settle their differences by force, that is, by an appeal to the sense of touch—the feeling of pleasure and pain on the body. The one that is capable of inflicting the greatest pain on its opponent succeeds in keeping away its rivals. Might was right. In early days of man's development he still followed this method but as he advanced in civilisation there were other things that brought about pain besides injury to the physical body. He began to appropriate material objects and called it wealth and this in its turn brought about distinctions of birth and position. These yielded him pleasure and depriving him of these caused pain. The wealthy and the high born began to lord it over the poor and the lowly. The criterion had shifted from strength to wealth and position. When the standard was strength individuals settled their differences by combats and duels. This system held its own until recently when these methods were made illegal and society took upon itself to adjudicate by an appeal to wealth and position—by fines and imprisonments. In both these ways society seeks to inflict pain on the erring one and the appeal is subjective as in the case of brute force. It is also limited in its application. It only works where there is to be found some measure of acquisition and pride, and when it comes to the lowest stages it is powerless. Many a criminal commits a crime seeking imprisonment so that he may not starve. He has nothing to lose by going to prison and he has everything to gain. In such cases society reverts back to the first stage and appeals to his physical pain and orders flogging. This is all to do with the regulation of individual life.

When we come to consider group life, we always notice a lag. The group does not advance at the same rate as individuals. Differences between two groups are settled still on the basis of the first stage by an appeal to brute force. The object is to inflict physical pain in the group. In international disputes still Might holds the whip hand. The motives for advancement are material gains and pride of place. As between nations we are yet in the brute stage of development. Nation vies with nation in arming itself to the teeth. The wealth of the people is being burnt away in smoke and explosives. A large percentage of the expenditure incurred by governments is for organised and mechanised murder, euphemistically termed 'Defence.' They have reduced to a scientific basis the slaughter of innocents. The victims are led to that fate under various dopes labelled 'King and Country.' Most of the so-called advanced nations of the West are in the grip of such coarse ideals. The motivating force is called 'Imperialism' and the object is to add to ones possessions.

An advance on this primitive stage was conceived by the formation of the League of Nations which is an attempt to introduce into group life conditions of regulation prevailing in individual life, settlement of disputes by argument and moral persuasion with the final threat of outlawry held out to the recalcitrant member. This attempt has not made much headway as it does not tackle the problem at its vital parts. The nations are not democratic enough yet to be sufficiently sensitive to be regulated by such an appeal.

All these methods appeal to the selfishness in man and to his susceptibility to pain physically or humiliation socially and so are subjective in their nature. They degrade both the combatants to the brute level and often even below that. They leave behind them a rancorous bitterness seldom softened with the passage of time. The successful and victorious one under such circumstances is almost always conscious of having wronged the other party and is living in constant expectation of a reprisal and is never at ease. Wrongs cannot be remedied by such methods nor can we look that way for peace and brotherhood. That way lies murder, pillage, famine and pestilence.

All these years man had in his possession one potent way lying latent with him. He had not developed it on a large scale. It has been used occasionally in the past but seldom on an universal scale. This way is the way of love. God is love, and this is a divine way. God is omnipotent and so is this, God is omnipresent and Satyagraha is Universal in its application. It is best used where the cord of love is strongest, father to son, mother to daughter, and husband to wife. Wherever there is a human heart there Satyagraha can be practised. It ennobles public life, it purifies political life, and it widens national life. Love is all pervading and satyagraha works everywhere. It is but natural under the prevailing atmosphere that our attention should centre round the political sphere.

Then what is the nature of this instrument and wherein lies its secret? Unlike all other methods we have seen so far Satyagraha is objective. It does not look at the effects it produces on the one 'attacked,' the incidence of pain and suffering is shifted from the attacked to the attacker. The 'strong ones' in a satyagraha are those with the greatest powers of endurance. This accounts for the attraction satyagraha has for women. In a world regulated by satyagraha men will form the weaker sex.' The spread of satyagraha implies the domination of women. Women are coming into their own. This fact also accounts for the curious phenomenon we observe in our country today. The erstwhile 'purdah' ladies form the crack regiment of our national militia and are arrayed in the thickest of the fight for freedom.

The secret of Satyagraha lies in the fact that it appeals, not to the senses, but to the highest in man. It does not compel the opponent to yield because he can do nothing else but it strives to elicit the noblest in him, and allows him to act on his own and not under a duress. You can beat a child into doing what you want for fear of the cane. This often produces evil effects on his moral character as he may still want to do what he originally wished to do out of your sight. But if you appeal to the highest in him and convince him that what he was about to do was wrong then it is immaterial whether you are near or far, he will never do that which he knows to be wrong. The way of force is patch work and when the tear comes, its second state will be worse than the first. Force builds on sand but love builds on rock. As long as world peace is based on force it will be in an unstable equilibrium only to be upset by the least disturbance, but a world founded on satyagraha can weather safely the severest of international disturbances. With the mechanisation of warfare the word 'peace' bids fair to disappear from our dictionaries, if even what is termed civilisation continues to exist for a while. Under the regime of force the vanquished is humiliated but under satyagraha both parties retain their honour and, if anything, their later relationship is closer and more pleasing than the first. Satyagraha maintains the dignity of man both during and after the struggle.

There has been a great deal of talk of disarmaments. Resolutions and conferences can achieve nothing as long as the principle of appeal to force continues. The best way to disarm any one is to remove the point of attack. Extract the fangs, the cobra becomes a harmless worm. As long as people fear pain, poverty and position the one who can raise these spectres is the one who holds the field. Banish these and the mightiest dreadnought will not sell for scrap iron. This is the central idea of the frailest of men who has not even a sufficiency of fat to cover his skeleton but who, at this moment, holds at bay the mightiest of Empires the world has ever seen. We see this secret clearly when we analyse the eleven cardinal observances of Sabarmati Ashram. The first two—Truth and Love—are the governing factors, the third and fourth—chastity and control of the palate—are directed towards eliminating pain or subduing pleasure, the fifth and the sixth—non-stealing and poverty—are to banish the glamour of wealth, the seventh and the tenth—physical labour and removal of untouchability—aim at levelling society and eradicating the evils of birth and place. The other three—Swadeshi, fearlessness and tolerance—are results. When we eliminate wealth, pleasure and position from our outlook and become immune to poverty, pain and low estate we extract the fangs of the dragon of violence that is stalking the world today. I do not see in the present struggle, India merely fighting for her freedom but—a contest of far-reaching effects—for the mastery of soul force over physical violence, of spiritual values over materialism, of universal brotherhood over imperialism. If this succeeds, man vindicates his dignity as a human being and we shall shout "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" But if we fail—which God forbid—man sinks to the level of brute beasts for centuries yet to come.

Satyagraha is not a passive force, as many imagine. It is mightier than the might of the implements of wholesale murder. It does not spit out blood and fire but delights in truth and non-violence which are of its very essence. It may not be as spectacular as the dropping of bombs and booming of cannon, nevertheless its effects are everlasting. It does not destroy life but it trains its armour on all that is immoral and aims at uplifting. It does not leave a trail of sorrow, suffering and distress in its wake. Many mistake non-violence to signify lack of energy. Mental, moral and spiritual non-violence taxes the most dynamic persons. We have to be non-violent both in thought and deed. This does not imply using soft words and comfortable language and bearing injustice passively resigning oneself to fate. We have to be strong and fearless in the denunciation of wrong wherever we may find it. The real criterion of non-violence is the absence of the will to inflict pain. Pleasant words may be spoken with a view to causing pain, this is violence. The harshest words spoken against evil with a pure intention of pointing out the wrong cannot be called violent without a perversion of the meaning of the term. We have to, ceaselessly and untiringly, probe into the evils that are eating away the manliness of the nation even though such bringing to light may be painful to those who are the victims. Where pain is caused incidentally in an attempt to remove an evil it is wrong to term that violence. The surgeon's lancet is not an instrument of violence while he who says to his brother "Thou fool" is in danger of hell fire. A frowning face may pierce deeper than steel. What is said may be nothing but the way it is said may lead to murders. It is the intention behind the deed that matters.

Ex-Sultana of Turkey:—Begum Shahadath and Princess Senia, the wife and daughter of the late Sultan Abdul Hameed Khan, the deposed King and Sultan of Turkey arrived at Hyderabad from Singapore via Bezwada on Feb. 2 and are putting up in Mr. R. Viccagee's Hotel, Hyderabad. They can neither understand nor speak any foreign language except Turkish and a little of English. It is expected that they will forward a petition to H. E. H. the Nizam with a request to grant them a monthly pension (wazeefa) for their maintenance as they are in great distress since the death of Sultan Abdul Hameed Khan during his deposition in Switzerland.

CASTE AND THE CENSUS.

Those who are interested in the abolition of Caste will be pleased to learn that the Jat-Pat Torak Mandal (Society for the Abolition of Caste System), Lahore has been in correspondence with the Government of India on the subject of declaration of "nil" in the column of Caste in the case of those persons who do not believe in it. A memorial was sent by the Mandal on 18th August 1930, important portions of which are given below :—

"We can safely assert that the number of men and women who would not like to have their caste recorded in the Census papers would be very large. It is therefore necessary that Your Excellency may be pleased to instruct the Census Department to meet the wishes of such people and thereby have accurate information collected for the coming Census.

We understand that this privilege has already been extended to the Sikhs and Ad Dharmis of the Punjab, and there is no reason why it should not be accorded to other sections of the Hindus. To record caste against the name of an individual when he does not believe in it would be forcing caste upon him.

It may be urged that the column of caste provided in the prescribed form will have to be filled up. We respectfully submit that no harm will be done and there will be no breach of any essential rule if in the case of persons who repudiate caste the column of caste is left blank, or if it is considered essential to make an entry, the entry should be No Caste or Nil. The Census clerks are not expected and should not import their personal knowledge into the Census operations.

We shall therefore feel very much obliged if Your Excellency be pleased to direct the Census authorities to issue a circular to the Census staff on the same lines as has been issued in connection with the Sikhs that no one be forced to state his caste and that no entry should be made in the column of caste when none has been given or the word No Caste or Nil only may be entered in the column of caste where a person concerned does not believe in it.

In reply to this memorial the Government of India communicated their views in a letter dated 1st November 1930 appended below :—

(1) "I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your memorial, dated the 18th August 1930, which has received the careful consideration of the Government of India. A record of caste to which the Mandal objects is necessary to obtain correct demographic data of the community and provision has therefore been made in the Census Act requiring persons to answer the questions prescribed by Government, including a question as to caste.

(2) Though Government have every sympathy with the desire of the Mandal to abolish any anti-social features that may appear to the Mandal to be involved in the caste system, they do not consider that the mere fact of not stating caste in the Census returns will have any effect in that direction.

(3) In the case of all persons who have actively ceased to conform to the caste system and who have accordingly broken it in their marital or commensal (inter-dining) relations, but who do not belong to reforming or schismatic communities such as the Arya Samaj or the Sikhs or Jains, a return of "nil" will be both accurate and adequate and will be accepted by enumerators, particularly where they have personal knowledge of the accuracy of the householder's reply.

(4) It is not possible to go further than this or to make a general dispensation from the necessity of returning caste in the case of people who observe it in practice, whatever their theoretic or sympathetic inclinations, or to take any steps which will make it difficult for the Census Department to get from the general public, information desired for the general good and for the obtaining of accurate measurements of social progress."

In para 3 of the letter given above it is stated that Hindus who do not belong to any of the reforming or schismatic communities, such as the Arya Samaj or the Sikh or Jain, can make a return of "nil" under the heading 'caste' provided they have actively ceased to conform to the caste system and have broken it in their marital or commensal relations. It further states that this entry of "nil" will be facilitated if the enumerator has personal knowledge as regards the accuracy of the householder's reply. There are two objections to this course. In the first place, it seems improper that enumerators should scrutinise the validity of returns and it would be more correct if the declaration of a person that he does not believe in caste is considered sufficient as in other cases, and no one is compelled to furnish proof that he has broken his caste before a return of "nil" can be made in the column of caste. There is a large section of the people who have no faith in caste and who would gladly break it in their marital and commensal relations if a suitable opportunity affords itself. Every facility should be given by the Government to this class of persons to break from the shackles of caste if they desire to do so and all unnecessary obstacles in the way of their recording "nil" in this column should be removed. The Government should issue instructions to the enumerators that a declaration of non-belief in caste should suffice.

The second objection to this plan is that according to it a discretion is vested in the enumerators and they are expected to judge the accuracy of the householder's declaration in the light of any personal knowledge which they may possess. It is an undesirable thing for enumerators to sit in judgment over declarants, and instructions should be issued to them not to import their personal knowledge but to abide strictly by the statements of the declarants.

The most reasonable plan is that no enquiry should be made as to the propriety of a person making a return of "nil" in the column of caste but that his declaration should be considered as sufficient and conclusive. When a person declares that he is a Christian or a Mahomedan or a Hindu, it is not necessary for the enumerator to make any enquiries whether he conforms to the practice of the sect or religion of which he is a member. On the same analogy a person's declaration of his non-belief in caste on conscientious ground should not harrass him by entering upon any investigation whether and to what extent he has broken caste in the matter of marriage or inter-dining.

It cannot be denied that the policy of the Government of India for obtaining a return of caste on the ostensible ground of general good and for obtaining data regarding social progress has tended to a large extent to perpetuate the evil of caste. In this connection it is pertinent to invite the attention of the public to the views of Mr. Middleton, who was originally Superintendent of Census Operations in the Punjab in 1921, quoted in Census of India Report, Vol. 15 pp. 343, 344 and given below in full :—

“My intention was to confine these chapters almost entirely to statistics. I was going to point out that the learned treatise on caste included in past Census Reports (which are in reality quite extraneous and unnecessary as part of the Census) has led to a tradition that the Census officer is an arbiter on caste questions. I decline to take up that position. I would have no decision in caste disputes, but would have mentioned the aspiration of such people as the Ahluwalias with all sympathy. I had intended pointing out that there is a very wide revolt against the classification of occupational castes; that these castes have been largely manufactured and almost entirely preserved as separate castes by the British Government. Our land records and official documents have added iron hands to the old rigidity of caste. Caste in itself was rigid amongst the higher castes, but malleable amongst the lower, we pigeon-holed every one by castes, and if we could not find a true caste for them labelled them with the name of an hereditary occupation. We deplore the caste system and its effect on social and economic problems, but we are largely responsible for the system which we deplore. Left to themselves such castes as Sunar, Tarkhan and Lohar would rapidly disappear and no one would suffer. The large number of people who have refused to record any caste at this Census is a sign of progress and the breaking of customary bonds, it is no reflection on the administration of the Census. Personally I am very strongly in favour of all caste statistics being abandoned at the next Census, though in this I probably go further than most Europeans. Government's passion for labels and pigeon-holes has led to a crystallisation of the caste system, which, except amongst the aristocratic castes, was really very fluid under indigenous rule.

“There is no justice in labelling a Government official whose ancestors have worked in similar capacities, as a Sunar, a Tarkhan, or any other term denoting a menial occupation with which his family has no connection whatever. Nor is there any good to be obtained from constant reiteration of the doubtful fact that Ahluwalias are of the distilling and wine-selling castes.

“If the Government would ignore caste it would gradually be replaced by something very different amongst the lower classes. It is the inflexibility of the lower castes more than of the higher that paralyses the Indian's efforts at economic salvation, and that inflexibility is not inherent in the caste system itself.”

The Government of India did not agree with the views of Mr. Middleton and caste entries were made as before. Whatever justification there may have been for the recording of caste in the past Censuses, there seems no reason why that practice should be continued any longer, particularly in view of the new conditions introduced by the reforms outlined in the recent declaration of Mr. MacDonald. If India has to have Responsible Government at the Centre and in the Provinces, which is now a question of time only, it is imperative that the foundations of the Indian nation should be laid on a sound basis and every feature of Indian social life, which militates against true democracy, should be eradicated. It is unnecessary to go into the question whether the Government of India has or has not in the past exploited the differences of religion and caste. In the light of new changes, however, the Government of India should abandon a practice, which is out of date and retrogressive.

The public, however, would be pleased to learn that the following resolution, to be moved by Dr. Sir H. S. Gour, has been tabled in the Assembly on this subject, and it is hoped that the Assembly would give the correct lead on this point, and would help to kill the demon of caste from the social life of this, country.

RESOLUTION.

“The Assembly recommends to Government that instructions be issued giving liberty to Hindus enumerated at the ensuing census to state whether they do or do not belong to a caste, and that this liberty be given not only to those who have in their marital or commensal relations proved their dissociation but also to those who have ceased to regard themselves as belonging to a caste and have conscientious objection to stating it.”

The right of the Hindus to declare themselves as Hindus without being obliged to state that they belong to any particular caste, has engaged the attention of the public for a long time, in view of the circular of the Census Department to the effect that no Hindu would be entitled to declare his caste as “Nil”, unless he can show that he has renounced his caste by some overt act, such as inter-marriage or the like, which is inconsistent with the observance of caste. Several Members of the Legislature, headed by Sir Hari Singh Gour, took up this question. In a letter, addressed by him to the Home Member, he pointed out the inexpediency of insisting upon the mention of caste in the case of Hindus who had conscientious objection to it. A deputation of the Legislature waited upon the Home Member and the Census Commissioner, to whom Sir H. S. Gour explained his view point. The Home Member was sympathetic and finally decided to permit Hindus, who did not wish to mention their caste, to return it as “Nil” in the column prescribed for it.

The Census Commissioner assured Sir H. S. Gour that instructions will be sent to the enumerators accordingly.

Mr. Har Bhagwan, Assistant Secretary of the Jat Pat Torak Mandal writes under date February 16 :— The Census Superintendent of Bengal has issued instructions for the entry of race in the case of those Hindus who have conscientious objections to the entry of caste in census papers.

NON-CHRISTIAN CONTRIBUTIONS TO CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY INSTITUTIONS.

I.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Mr. J. F. Edwards' appeal published in one of your latest issues for funds for the T. B. Sanatorium started at Miraj raises many important questions to which the attention of the public needs to be drawn. Some of these missionary institutions and especially hospitals are financed by the non-Christian public to the extent of even 75 per cent, a fact about which the public is entirely in the dark. In the face of such a fact, the question naturally arises, should the public give money for institutions over which they have no control and in the management of which they have practically no voice? This question becomes all the more important when these institutions belong to a system which is out to subvert the national religions of the people. These questions are being faced to-day in a very proper manner by the Chinese people and the Government there in regard to Christian Missions and we too need to do the same even more so, especially as Christian Missions in India are far more imperialistic than they have been in China or anywhere else.

I should also add one thing more. Mr. J. F. Edwards who has made this appeal and who in season and out of season tries to show that he is a sincere friend of India, was in the United States of America sometime back and he represented the Indian National Congress as a Bolshevist concern. To the American public Bolshevism is like a red rag to the bull and Mr. Edwards had not the least scruple in misrepresenting our culture and civilization, our institutions and religions and even our present political movement together with its leader Mahatma Gandhi all the time, and we must ask the question: How far we are going to allow this sort of thing to be done by those who pose as our friends before ourselves and also before the world, and then try to paint us as dark as possible?

For the last ten years I have been trying to reform (if I may use such a term in all humility) the work of Christian Missions and Churches in India, but I was getting convinced even before I went to the Western world and I am now fully convinced from what I saw of the propaganda carried on by missionaries in their own countries to get money, a propaganda in which they have shown the worst side of our life almost exclusively, that the Christian Missions are imperialistic through and through, and as such they have no place in our life and society. I shall have occasion to speak of all this later on at length. Meantime, with this for the present,

Harmony Home,
Rajkot C. S.
10 Feb. 1931.

Yours, etc.,
MANILAL C. PAREKH.

II.

MR. EDWARDS' REPLY.

The Editor, Indian Social Reformer,
Sir,

I deeply appreciate your kind courtesy in forwarding for my comments Mr. Parekh's letter. The attack made on myself I propose to treat as quite subordinate to the attack made on Indian Christian Missions.

In view of the fact that Government itself has stated that at least one hundred million people in India are without medical help of any approved kind, surely criticism of any appeal to help in dealing with the awful scourge of tuberculosis in India comes with bad grace from any Indian patriot, especially from one who has been so providentially delivered from it as has my friend Mr. Parekh. Even if 'the non-Christian public' were financing Mission hospitals 'to the extent of 75 per cent.' (on which see below), would not this same public be receiving far more than value for their money? In that value are to be included the following items:— 'The taking of bribes is against the principles of Mission hospitals. Low-caste and out-caste people are treated with consideration. In the women's hospitals arrangements are adequate for purdah women.' But let us look at the official returns. These show fourteen and a half lakhs of rupees as 'local receipts,' which is the nearest equivalent to Mr. Parekh's term 'non-Christian public,' though these 'local receipts' also include 'gifts from the West.' Over against this are to be placed the total budgets for the 152 Mission hospitals in India which total over thirty-eight lakhs. My friend's '75 per cent' will not bear examination. The Miraj hospital figure in this connection is that 99 per cent and more of Indian donations are used for medical relief of Indians. As for the 'control' and 'management' of these Mission hospitals, does any one imagine that if public-spirited Indian citizens were forthcoming to save the overburdened doctors and nurses from the heavy administration of these hospitals the medical workers would not welcome such help with open arms? And I would ask my friend another question? Does he honestly think he is doing a Christlike thing in criticising an appeal for medical help in a land where the medical needs are so appalling? Take for example, this terrible need of a Tuberculosis Sanatorium in Western India, the appeal for which he so unfortunately criticizes. Does Mr. Parekh realize that in one city alone which he probably visited in America, the city of Chicago with its population of three millions, there are as many beds (950) in its one Sanatorium as there are in all the sanatoria of India with its population of 320 millions? Or take infant mortality. Does he realize that in this city where I am now writing, the city of Poona, 592 infants out of every thousand are dying in the first year of life, while the corresponding figure for another city he must have visited,

New York, is 74 and that for London is 60? What connection, pray, has this charge about the supposed 'imperialistic' temper of Christian missionaries with these ghastly needs of India's people? I am inclined to ask, if my friend will forgive me, what imperialistic spirit was shown by Sir William Wanless when he was operating on over 96,000 Indian sufferers of all classes and creeds; or when he and his colleagues were training over two hundred Indian doctors which they have sent out all over India; or when Sir William set such an example in Miraj Hospital that when the Maharajah of Kolhapur, the leader of India's untouchables, was asked where he got his great idea of doing justice to these oppressed people he simply replied 'From the Miraj Hospital.' While my friend has been out of India missionaries have themselves condemned all imperialism as vigorously as himself, the British missionaries in their manifesto in early November and the American missionaries at Cawnpore last month. Of the utter sincerity of that condemnation no better proof is needed than the daily mission of mercy shown by India's 228 foreign missionary doctors and 179 foreign missionary nurses.

Mr. Parekh's personal attack on me does not concern me half as much as does the foregoing question. But if anyone can charge me with imperialism after reading my 14,000 words against our British liquor policy in India, now reprinted as a pamphlet (entitled Liquor and Opium in India) which I am informed was used in the Round Table Conference, and if anyone cares to charge me with "misrepresenting Indian culture" after they have read my Life and Teaching of Tukaram, pronounced by The Servant of India as "the model Life of Tukaram" despite the hypothetical imperialism of its author!—then they are welcome to their opinion. As a matter of fact I invariably began my public utterances in the West by stating in so many words that I disapproved both of the Mias Mayo line of treatment or of that taken by those who speak with one voice in India and another in the West. Fortunately, moreover, both my speeches and interviews during furlough in Britain and America are on record. The latter are summarized in the interview from The Methodist Recorder of late 1929 which you most generously quoted in full in the Reformer; and I acceded to a request to print the former (my speeches) as a series of articles in the weekly Dnyanodaya soon after my return to India. My friend does not say when or where I made the statement he attributes to me, nor the source of his strange information. The nearest approximation to my having "represented the Indian National Congress as a Bolshevistic concern" was when I affirmed that Pundit Jawaharlal Nehru was an avowed Communist and Atheist, a statement I have repeated at least twice in my weekly columns the past six months, so I did not go out of India to say that.

I would ask my friend in conclusion whether he will not best help the dear India we all so much love by supporting such constructive schemes as that inaugurated by Sir William Wanless to accomplish which Sir William is risking his very life during his months in India.

Yours etc.,
J. F. EDWARDS.

AMENDMENT OF INDIAN CHRISTIAN MARRIAGE ACT.

The following correspondence has passed between our contributor, Mr. Kopargam Ramamurti and Bishop F. J. Western of Palamcott, regarding the amendment of the Indian Christian Marriage Act, and it is published with their permission:

The Right Reverend F. J. Western,

Bishop of Tinneveli, Palamcott.

I am delighted to receive your letter of enquiry dated 3rd instant, and respond to it most cordially. I am much obliged to Mr. Philip, Secretary of the National Christian Council, for his kind introduction.

To my mind, at least four major amendments are urgently called for in the Indian Christian Marriage Act:—

1. Section 88 should be so amended as to ensure, instead of negating as it does now, the validity of Hindu Christian marriages solemnized under the Act.
2. A new section must be provided making it punishable for a man married under the Act to marry again in the life-time of his first wife, even if he renounced Christianity before the second marriage.
3. A new section must be added making the Indian Succession Act applicable to every person married under the Act, whether Christian or non-Christian, and to the issue of such marriage.
4. Section 4 or Section 5 or Section 68, or all, must be so amended as to make it clear that the "marriage" referred to is "marriage purporting to be a Christian marriage," in order to preclude the prosecution of non-Christian priests.

The first three amendments are needed for the welfare of Christian families. The fourth is necessary to remove a disastrous temptation which is doing untold havoc to the fair name of Christianity and to inter-communal good feeling.

I earnestly solicit a clear and unmistakable declaration of policy in regard to the last point by the National Christian Council of India at an early date for the guidance of Christian workers and the assurance of the non-Christian populations of the land.

It will also redound to the glory of Christianity if the united Christian Church of India will hasten to come forward of its own motion to undo the grievous wrong which a mistaken course of decisions in the High Court of Madras has made it possible for Christian workers to inflict on non-Christian families with the aid of Section 68 and the police.

If the Christian Church, however, cannot find strength enough to voluntarily forego the fratricidal weapon which court-made law has accidentally placed in its hands, an awakened sense of self-preservation will no doubt give necessary strength to the victimised communities to wrest that weapon by suitable means. But the heat and feeling inevitably aroused in the process of the struggle will not redound to the glory of Religion or promote goodwill among men. No religious people, be they Christians or non-Christians, can wish for or feel proud of such a contingency.

I beg of you as the appointed convener of the Committee of the National Christian Council of India to hasten up this last piece of Legislation even more eagerly than the first three. India is bleeding at too many points and distracted with too many sorrows. It is time that all Religionists united to bind and heal rather than tear any further.

As desired by you I am sending by Book Post six of my articles which appeared in the "Indian Social Reformer" of Bombay. I also enclose with them a personal letter from Mr. Paul Appaswami, author of your publication on Christian law, on the question of Section 88. I request that such of the papers as are marked as returnable in the accompanying list, may kindly be returned at an early date after taking necessary copies.

Yours respectfully,
(Sd.) K. RAMAMURTI.

From,

The Rt. Rev. F. J. Western, M. A., Bishop of Tinneveli.

Dear Mr. Ramamurti,

I am very grateful for your letter of the 9th December and the papers you sent me, and return herewith those which you wished back. I am very grateful to you for allowing me to keep the others.

We shall certainly deal with the first three of the amendments which you suggest as desirable. As regards the fourth, one difficulty is that various lawyers have told us that it would not be proper to have a section referring to marriages by Hindu rites in the Indian Christian Marriage Act, and that legislation on the point in question should be made otherwise.

My own view is that it should (in whatever way may seem suitable) be laid down that the status of the marriage should follow the rite used, so that when a non-Christian marries a Christian by the Christian rite, he will be bound by the monogamic and other consequences of a Christian marriage, and that correspondingly when a Christian marries a non-Christian by non-Christian rite, both partners should be subject to the effects of marriage as understood by the religion the rite of which was used.

Thanking you again for your kindness.

Bishopstowe,
Palamcottah, S. India. } Yours sincerely,
29th December 1930. } (Sd.) FREDERICK
TINNEVELLI.

TWO HINDU CHRISTIAN MARRIAGES.

The Bangalore Correspondent of the Hindu writes under date February 8:—"Malvern," the residence of Mr. B. Rama Rao in Queen's Road, put on a gala appearance this evening, when the marriage of Miss Enid Enakshi, the famous film "star," with Mr. Mohan Bhavnani, a pioneer in Film Industry in India, was celebrated with great éclat. Miss Enakshi is an honours graduate of the Queen Mary's College and is a familiar figure in the film world. Mr. Bhavnani comes from Bombay. Bhavnani is a Hindu and Miss Rama Rao is a Christian and the marriage was therefore solemnised through the Registrar of Marriages, Act XV of 1872. By 5 p.m. the residence of the bride was filled with the elite of the city and the guests on arrival were received by Mrs. and Mr. Rama Rao and led into the decorated parlour, specially erected for the function. The bridal pair soon arrived and the cake was cut amidst cheers. Dewan Bahadur W. L. Venkataramiah proposed the toast of the couple. The guests then took refreshments and tea. The couple were the recipients of numerous presents. Those present included Messrs. K. Matthan, Dr. S. Subba Rao, N. S. Subba Rao, Raghunatha Rao Sahab, and Jep Pura Sahab, Dr. Mylvagan, Rev. J. Koil Pillai, Rev. D. Jacob, J. R. Isaac, Mrs. and Mr. O. V. Reddi, Mrs. and Mr. B. Balasubramania Aiyar, Mr. C. P. Guandran, Mr. S. Gauapatisundaram, Mr. Ernest Kirk and others.

The Coimbatore Correspondent of the Hindu writes under date February 2:—Mr. J. A. Byers, I. C. S., Additional Sessions Judge, delivered judgment to-day in a case in which one Sankaran of Dharapuram Taluk stood charged under Section 68 of the Indian Christian Marriage Act with having solemnised a marriage between a Hindu woman, Dheval and a Christian, by name Vedanayagam alias Palani, on the 23rd May last year in Ponnapuram village in Dharapuram Taluk. The Rev. Rangaramanujam sent word to the parties that it was against the provisions of the Act but the marriage was celebrated in spite of his warning. Thereupon he sent a letter to the Collector of Coimbatore who forwarded the same to the police who charged the accused. The accused pleaded guilty in the Sessions Court and prayed for mercy. His Honour took a lenient view of the case and fined the accused Rs. 10 with imprisonment till the rising of the court. Mr. K. V. Krishnaswami Aiyar, B.A., B.L., appeared as amicus curiae.

NEWS AND VIEWS.

The School Slate:—The School slate, says a writer in the Manchester Guardian, may some time take its place in the museum besides the horn book of Shakespeare's day. It has been relegated to the limbo of forgotten things, along with the slate pencil, made of a softer stone, which was apt to share in producing piercing discord to disturb the serenity of a movement when all the members of a junior class were laboriously engaged in setting down letters or figures. It was not the most sanitary of school requisites—there was always a temptation in cleaning it to ignore the sponge or the specially damped rag—and, no doubt, few in the scholastic world regretted its banishment. But the production of the school slate in the day and generation of its widespread use gave considerable employment in the slate county of Caernarvon. Earning capacity has been transferred to the makers of copy-books, pens, and ink; there remain to remind one of the past activities rusting machines and equipment in a few buildings which do not happen to have been turned to other uses since the last school slate was made and clamped into its frame. There was at one time an almost world trade in these school slates. Little scholars of many Continental countries and of India and China, I was told, traced their lessons on Caernarvonshire slates. Now there are only derelict school slate mills.

NOTES.

The Borsad Affair:—We have received a copy of the Report of Messrs. R. R. Bakhale and Karpandas J. Chitalia, members of the Servants of India Society, on the happenings at Borsad on 21st January. There have been several accounts by reliable enquirers—men and women—of the use of violence against women by the Police on the occasion, but the Director of Information had tried his best to discredit them all in three communications. We are curious to see how he will meet this carefully considered Report based on information gathered at first hand on the spot by two members of the Servants of India Society. They have summed up their conclusions at the end of the Report and we quote some of them in their own words: The Borsad police mercilessly beat the women without any regard to Government instructions, and the attacks were most severe and brutal. The allegation regarding the Borsad people arming themselves with lethal weapons is baseless and an after-thought calculated to justify the police action and discredit the non-violent nature of the processionists; that no stone and no dust were thrown at the police and no brickbats were used; no policeman was injured; the allegation that some women were carrying stones is untrue; that the actions of the police, whether they were drunken or not, were such as would put to shame the conceivable actions of even the dead drunk; that, in our opinion, the Borsad happenings form one of the dark episodes in the recent history of India and that they have tremendously lowered the British Government in the eyes of the public. The Report gives a detailed list of the injuries received by 44 women, whose names and ages are stated, and concludes by specially thanking the ladies who so courageously came forward, gave their accounts, and stood their examination by the two gentlemen. Many of the injuries were inflicted with the butt-end of rifles. Many of the blows were directed at the back and loins of the women. Pulling by the hair and kicking were frequent. "Divali Ben, wife of Jivabhai, aged 28, with a child of 18 months. Police came from front and gave one blow to the head of the child. Swelling still visible and seen. She held her hand in front of the child to protect it when one blow fell on her left arm." Dahi Ben, aged 25, had a baby of 7 months in her arms. She was stamped upon with booted feet, was given four blows on her back, and when she asked the Policeman not to hurt the child, she was pulled by her hair and when she fell on her face, was given four kicks on the hips and loins. There was an incidental remark in one of the Government communiques which struck us as requiring explanation. It was that the majority of the armed police at Borsad are not Gujaratis but that they understood the language of abuse used by the crowd. From enquiries which we have been able to make, Gujaratis are not, it appears, averse from employment in the Police force and are employed. What was the reason for enlisting non-Gujaratis in the Borsad area at present? We have been repeatedly told that "divide and rule" is not a principle for which Government has a liking in this country. The employment of non-Gujarati armed police in a Gujarat district, seems suspiciously like acting on that principle.

Mr. J. C. Kumarappa:—Readers of the Reformer need no introduction to Mr. J. C. Kumarappa. His essays and lectures have been published from time to time in these columns. He comes of one of the oldest and most respected Christian families in Southern India. He had his professional education in England where he secured the diploma in Accountancy and established himself some years ago as a Chartered Accountant in this city. At the call of Mahatma Gandhi who discerned in his writings the note of sympathy with the poor, he gave up business and became a Professor in the Vidyapith, with the complete change in his dress and mode of living which it involved. He has been carrying on an investigation into the economic condition of the rural population in Gujarat and had, we think, accumulated material for a report on about forty villages. A noteworthy thing about the old Christian families in the South is that though they adopted Christianity they did not give up the traditional culture and ideals of family life which they inherited. They, therefore, lived in all things but worship in close touch with the parent community and were held in high regard. Mr. Kumarappa's uncle was a great Tamil scholar and composer, and his writings and songs which were inspired by a truly religious spirit, were equally popular with Christians and Hindus. No wonder, therefore, that Mr. Kumarappa is today a passionate champion of Hindu culture and outlook, so much so that we have now and then found it necessary to qualify his idealisations. Another thing about him, is his implicit faith in the teachings of Jesus and his impatience with its loss of vitality in organised Christianity. Downrightness and sincerity are his conspicuous qualities. Though a great admirer of Mahatma Gandhi and though he has given up all at his call he does not hesitate to differ from him whenever he thinks differently. A clear thinker and lucid writer, Mr. Kumarappa is one of the finest types of Indians of the younger generation. He has been sentenced to one year's imprisonment because he would not give security not to write seditious articles in Young India. Sedition, as defined in the Indian Penal Code, is such a wide term and the executive and judicial functions are so inextricably interwoven in the Indian administration, that when a person is prosecuted for the offence, he is virtually convicted and sentenced also. It would, therefore, be vain to discuss whether the particular writings mentioned—if any were mentioned—in the order demanding security, did or did not amount to sedition as it is ordinarily understood by people of commonsense. According to this meaning, nothing is sedition except what is intended to subvert the State. The severest and most unreasonable condemnation of the shortcomings of the measures or composition of a Government is not sedition unless it is accompanied by action calculated to overturn the State. Mr. Kumarappa is a strong critic but he is the very reverse of a revolutionary and the purpose of his criticisms is more often than not to rouse the conscience of the Government rather than the people against Government.

The Bombay Municipal Corporation Incident:—The Bombay Municipal Corporation can not be congratulated on its achievement last Monday. One of its members had given notice of a motion to present an address to Lord Irwin on the eve of his departure. We have the very highest respect for the Viceroy personally as one of the finest spirits of our time but his record of administration so far is not one to evoke popular enthusiasm. It has rained Ordinances during the last few months. Several thousands of men and women have been put in jail for offences created by these Ordinances of the Viceroy. Complaints of police excesses have been pouring from all parts of the country. The Viceroy under whose regime these things have taken place, has no claim upon a popular body like the Bombay Municipal Corporation to be honoured with a parting address. Lord Curzon did not issue a single Ordinance, and not one man was prosecuted for a political offence in his time. Yet the Bombay Municipal Corporation under the leadership of Sir Pherozeshah Mehta would not entertain the proposal of an address to him. If, as we hope and trust, the negotiations now pending at Delhi eventuate in a settlement, the position will be wholly changed, and public opinion will be in a better position to appreciate the strenuous efforts of His Excellency to leave India happy and contented in the enjoyment of self-government within the British Commonwealth. The proposal to present an address at present was wholly premature and ill-conceived, and was bound to provoke opposition. The demonstration against the proposal on Monday was, therefore, nothing strange and, but for the action of some Congress volunteers and others in forcibly preventing members from entering the Corporation Hall and the lathi charges on them by the Police, it would be hardly worth noticing. It is high time that the Congress leaders in the city asserted their authority over the rowdy element which of late has been forcing its way to the front. Mahatma Gandhi's emphatic insistence on truth and non-violence in his speech at Delhi—the first important one which he has made since his release—has been called forth by complaints which have reached him from several places including Bombay City. The complaints which have appeared in the newspapers, regarding the violent obstruction of some of the Congress volunteers, are justified. We do not see, however, why people who resent—and rightly—comparatively mild violence at the hands of Congress volunteers, have no word to spare for the severe violence of the Police in using their lathis to disperse an unarmed crowd. They seem to assume that violence by authority is not violence. But violence breeds violence by whomsoever it is used.

Mass Production in Agriculture:—The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, issues a weekly Information Service which furnishes valuable information on current topics covering all phases of activity and not merely such as are labelled "religious" in the theological sense. In the last issue, there is the following interesting note on the application of mass production to agriculture, which merits the consideration of those who regard large scale cultivation as the panacea for the ills of Indian agriculturists. "Large-scale farming seems to advance slowly and one hears it said frequently that the widespread application of it is inevitable or that it will bring about agricultural improvement. It is alleged in favour of large-scale farming that it permits the employment of expert management, takes advantage of the specialization of labor and makes for lower costs per unit in purchasing and marketing. On the other hand, experience indicates that the techniques of mass production in manufacturing cannot all be carried over into agriculture. Seasonal influences are very great and machinery is thus apt to be idle for long periods; workers cannot be concentrated as in manufacturing; distance is a handicap to efficiency; the "motor conveyor" which has been such an important factor in the development of mass production cannot be used in agriculture, except in certain grading and similar processes. Thorough studies by the United States Chamber of Commerce indicate that large-scale farms are no more profitable than the family-sized units. The mechanization of agriculture goes rapidly on, of course, through the use of machinery which is adapted to the family-sized farm."

but it is too much to say that the one is superior to the other in any way. Further, while a backward community may require safeguards, one which claims superior social and cultural status should not stand in need of any. Hazrat Sabib will agree that it is impossible to have it both ways.

SAFEGUARDS, III.

Hazrat Mirza Bashir-ud-din Mahomed Ahmed has made a solid contribution towards the solution of the Hindu-Moslem problem, by his categorical statement of the reasons which inspire in his co-religionists distrust and fear of the Hindu majority. It is not necessary to agree with him regarding these reasons on their merits. If we have understood him aright, Hazrat Sahib in putting forward these reasons has not necessarily committed himself regarding their validity in every case. This is clear from the hypothetical form in which he has stated some of his strongest points. It is because we are led to think that he has an open mind and is free to consider reasons which may be urged on the other side, that we venture to press on his consideration a few points which he seems to have overlooked. The main thesis of his paper is that the differences between Islam and Hinduism are fundamental and there can be no compromise between them. If it can be shown that this is not the case, the foundation of Hazrat Sahib's argument must necessarily be shaken. There are numerous illustrations which can be adduced to show that Islam has compromised with Hinduism not only on social questions but even on points of religious doctrine. Here is one which, it will be admitted, goes far to contradict the facile belief that Hinduism and Islam are as poles asunder and can never meet. In his illuminating little book "Islam, the Religion of Humanity," published by the Theosophical Publishing House, Adyar, Syed Abdur Razzaque observes of Pir Sadrad-Din who was head of the Khoja sect about the year 1430: "In accordance with the principles of accommodation practised by this sect, he took a Hindu name and made certain concessions to the religious beliefs of the Hindus whose conversion he sought to achieve, and introduced among them a book entitled Dasavatar in which Ali was made out to be the tenth avatar or incarnation of Vishnu." The idea of incarnation is abhorrent to the stern monotheism of Islam, and a "concession" on this doctrine, even with the ulterior object of making converts, cannot but be regarded as a compromise on an essential with Hinduism. If a Christian sect should arise, as it may, which holds that Jesus Christ was the eleventh Avatar of Vishnu, it will be hard to maintain that there is no common ground between Christianity and Hinduism. Yet such a development, would not be so serious as the evolution of the Khoja sect in Islam, because the Incarnation doctrine is now integral in Christianity but repugnant to Islam. His Highness the Aga Khan, the present head of this sect, was by common consent accepted as the first member of the British Indian delegation and the spokesman within it of the Muslim group at the Round Table Conference. If further proof were needed of sympathetic mutual understanding by the two communities we may refer to the admirable interview, reprinted elsewhere, which Begum Shah Navaz accorded to an English journalist on Indian Womanhood. The advent of women in our public life is by far the most hopeful portent for an early settlement of communal differences.

So far as Muslim apprehensions rest on the fear of Hindu reprisals for ancient wrongs, they are easily shown to be unnecessary. The Hindu, as we pointed out, is a firm believer in the doctrine of Karma, and whatever he might have endured he quite naturally puts it to his own unliquidated account of past misdeeds and seldom cherishes for any length of time a grudge against his oppressors. If any Hindu might have been expected to cherish such a sentiment, it was Shivaji, the great Maratha soldier—statesman, whose avowed object was to establish a Hindu empire. Mahomedan historians who have execrated him as an idolator, however, have borne testimony to his religious toleration and the respect he invariably showed to the Holy Koran and to mosques. Vincent Smith in "the Oxford History of India" quotes the Mahomedan historian Khafi Khan as follows: "He (Sivaji) made it a rule that whenever his followers went plundering, they should do no harm to the mosques, the Book of God, or the women of any one. Whenever a copy of the sacred Koran came into his hands, he treated it with respect, and gave it to some of his Mussalman followers." This is all the more remarkable as at the same time a different policy and method was being followed on the other side of India under the orders of the Emperor Aurangzebe. Vincent Smith only a few pages later devotes a whole section to the wholesale destruction of Hindu temples, including some of the most sacred at Benares, Muttra and other places, mosques being built on their sites. There are many Muslim shrines throughout the country which are revered by Hindus, and this can scarcely be if Hindus are imbued with a spirit of hatred to Islam. Hindu leaders want political freedom in order primarily to work out the many social readjustments that have been long necessary to enable the community to cope with modern conditions, and they fully realize that they cannot carry out this great task if they had side by side to carry on communal skirmishes with their Muslim countrymen or other minorities. In the two communities, there have been many men and women of outstanding character and achievement,

MY FACE.

How little does one know of himself? This was forcibly—and accidentally—brought home to me the other day in this way. I was sitting—lying to be exact in an easy chair—in the office and was reading a review of Natalie Rokotoff's "Foundation of Buddhism" in the Mahabodhi, describing the growing interest in Europe in Buddhism. The reviewer, the Vice-President of the Buddha Society in London, Mr. B. L. Broughton, said that the Soviet attitude which was hostile to all other religions, seemed to be partial to Buddhism. The Soviet Government had established a Buddhist Institute at Leningrad and a chair of Buddhist Philosophy at Moscow. I was absorbed in reading and it was some time before I noticed that some one was waiting to see me. One of the things which puts me out—it does others also, I presume—is to encounter a sudden interruption while reading or writing. I can only describe the physical pain I feel on such occasions by relating an incident which happened to me. Not long ago they had invited Sir P. C. Ray to Bandra to speak on Swadeshi. I was asked to preside. We two were the sole occupants of the small, improvised and rather shaky platform, and had to sit in close proximity. Suddenly in the middle of his address, the learned Doctor, in order to impress on his audience his message that they should now look at the national problem from a new angle of vision, took hold of my head with both his hands and sharply twisted it to one side. This he did not once but twice. It hurt me and I thought it prudent to keep my eye on the athletic Acharya to avoid a third attempt which might have given a permanent twist to my head. I recall the sensation I felt on that occasion here as that is how I feel when interrupted in reading or writing. Only a few days ago, a Sadhu walked into my room and peremptorily demanded a few minutes for his business. I had just then opened Pickthall's Koran which I had been eagerly looking forward to for many months. I told the Sadhu that I was busy but he would not listen and, then, I completely lost my temper. It aggravated my irritation to think—as I could not help doing even in my excitement—that when I was trying to get some insight into Islam, this representative of Hinduism should seek to divert my attention to himself! After he left me, however, I felt quite ashamed of my outburst and it gave me only slight satisfaction when I learnt that the Sadhu was not perhaps the genuine article. Anyhow, I made a resolve that I should try hard to get over my proneness to irritation when interrupted in reading or writing.

That is why, when Mr. Mahalingam claimed my attention while reading the article on Buddhism, I assumed a particularly patient attitude, put aside the Journal, and invited him to tell me what he wished to say. I am glad that I did so because I discovered then the startling truth that few men know their own faces. Mahalingam is a prodigy in his way, and like many other prodigies hails from the South. His special gift is that of taking in at a glance any human face which he sees and of transferring it to paper in three or four minutes with pen or pencil. The first gift, he told me, had come to him naturally, and the second, too, he had acquired without any technical training whatever. I became much interested in the matter as I have myself a very poor memory for faces and it is one of my frequent miseries to fail to recognise people who are entitled to think that they are no strangers to me. The practice of sending in one's card, is not a formality but a necessity in the case of persons afflicted with this defect, but Indians as a rule rather resent having to observe it in visiting fellow-Indians. The defect is partly due to short-sight but largely, I think, to one being more interested in the ideas rather than in the personal peculiarities of people one meets. It is seldom that I look at the title-page in reading a book which interests me, and quite recently I fear I embarrassed an American author whom I had met before by complimenting him on a book which another American Professor had written! Mahatma Gandhi seems to have the gift of memory for faces in a large measure. I have been often struck by the facility with which he would speak a few words of personal recognition to every one in a large group and one could see from the brightened eye of the person spoken to that Mahatmaji was seldom wrong. This is a sort of divine gift as the Psalmist says God calleth the stars by their names and they answer Him. Mahalingam showed me several sketches of prominent Bombay men which he had made as quickly as photographic snapshots. His complaint was that though many appreciated his work, his not having had a European training, was a handicap to his devoting himself wholly to his art, though he himself thought such training altogether superfluous. The average Indian, even though he be a vehement nationalist, has a sneaking regard for foreign recognition. In the old days, some sort of scholars and teachers went to Benares to establish their claim to All-India recognition. Nowadays, one has to seek it in London and New York. It is to be hoped that some wealthy appreciator of Indian talent will be forthcoming to give Mahalingam the few thousand rupees which will enable him to acquire the title to seek the patronage of his countrymen with more confidence of success.

At the end of our talk, Mahalingam suggested that he should sketch my face and as it was to be only a matter of a few minutes, I could not refuse. Also, I suppose I felt flattered by this young genius including me in the galaxy of Bombay's sketchworthy notables. In less than five minutes, as I sat looking at a screen, he had sketched me in pencil. He handed me the sketch, and asked if it was a true likeness. I looked at it, but really could not say whether it was my face or some one else's. I told Mahalingam so, and was relieved when he replied that there was only one man in Bombay who could recognise his own features in a portrait, and that was Dr. Deshmukh. But is it not strange that one should not know one's own face? No doubt, we see it in a mirror, but we recognise the reflection in the mirror as our own because we know that we are looking into it and not any one else. I have before me as I write a cupboard, one of whose doors is faced with a mirror. All the day long, I see the sparrows—the cheerie lok as our Marathi servant calls them—crowding before it to catch their reflections which they seem to take to be real birds. They turn and twist and flutter and twitter before the mirror, and although the reflection repeats each turn faithfully, still they are not satisfied that there are not other birds behind the glass. Merely because, I think, they are incapable of the abstract ideas that things are reflected on a glassy surface.

WARFARE: CHEMICAL AND ELECTRIC!

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Practically all mankind has listened to speech and music in the air. Either now travels round the globe in eight minutes. For some years past physicists have been hunting a method of spreading death and destruction as widely and effectually as we now spread speech and music.

From Britain comes the latest news. Last November the British Association of Chemists were told at Liverpool that "an efficient death ray is no mere figment of the imagination. Researches are being carried out with invisible rays of such power that they would be capable of exterminating whole populations." Three years ago the best (or worst) they could do was to incinerate one man at three miles distant; but we are advancing in knowledge and power.

Moreover our chemists have been equally busy and successful, for Professor Lewis writes me that his gas, Lewisite, is about thrice (2·9) as deadly as any used in the late war to end war. Who one realizes that the U. S. Arsenal at Edgewood was nearly ready to turn out 13,000 tons of poison gas a month, and the number and size of air-planes now available to disperse the stuff, it is not difficult to realize that all the talk of "Security" is simply misleading chatter unless all nations agree to really outlaw war, as they are pledged in honour to do, and to settle all differences by Justice, to administer which an International World Court has been established.

PRACTICAL IMPLICATIONS OF SATYAGRAHA.*

It may not be out of place here to take a look at ourselves. If International Fellowship means anything it stands for the love of our neighbour. It has as its motto "Under heaven one family." Are we living up to that? Members of such a body should have as their example the parable of the Good Samaritan. On the other hand, I am afraid, the Fellowship has been like the priest and the Levite. They have passed by on the other side. We have not as yet heard the voice of the International Fellowship raised in protest of the atrocities that have been going on under its very nose. It is futile to say that the Fellowship does not take part in politics. Your love if it is genuine cannot work departmentally. Even if that is granted for argument's sake, is it politics to beat a man to death? Or to hammer all and sundry? Politics or no politics if humanitarian considerations have no place in the Fellowship then it is a sham and we might as well close down our doors. Hypocrisy eats into our soul. Let us have the courage of our convictions. Only a few weeks ago I was discussing this matter with one of our responsible members. He, in all seriousness, advanced the argument that as some of our members are Government servants we have to steer a middle course and it is not wise to dabble in politics. This is a queer kind of family love. If a sister is raped by a policeman we must not say anything as that may be politics. You can have no Fellowship without love and love knows no limit, caste, creed, race or wealth. We cannot serve God and Mammon. The choice is before us. Such members who cannot rise to the ideals of the Fellowship should resign and not drag the Fellowship with them. That is the only course open, unless this aspires to be only a tea-drinking or snuff-passing Fellowship. We cannot compromise with evil. It is better to have no Fellowship organisation at all than to have one that is neither hot nor cold.

It is not possible to consider the practical implications of Satyagraha without a reference to the alternative—War. Those of us who have witnessed at close quarters the carnage in Europe between 1914 and 1918 know what devastation violence wrought to humanity. Even in England which was comparatively remote from the front, people lived under nerve-racking conditions. London was itself within the terror stricken area. Several went mad with fright. Before even the advent of conscription all kinds of social pressure was used to impress young men into the fighting forces. The coming of conscription only saw most humiliating and pathetic sights of men living in hiding to avoid the slaughter house of Europe. A social organisation that allows of the cruelties of fox hunting and stag hunting turned its attention to man hunting. Only the other day I read of a hind being hunted and after a run of about 24 miles, the wretched animal, out of sheer exhaustion, got into a public house, where the landlord held it till the dogs arrived to tear it to pieces, and the worst part of the story is, amongst the hunters were three English women and they witnessed the final scene. This is narrated by the Manchester Guardian without a word of protest but, on the other hand, it states it to be a record run. Can we wonder when women, the custodians of kindness and gentleness in a race, descend to this, that our Bishop and Christian Missionaries stand unmoved by the Lathi charges? These merciless stag-hunting tactics were used against men to catch them to be blown to smithereens in the fields of Flanders and France. The men marched to the trenches often to avoid the ignominy and death that awaited them if they turned back. There are innumerable instances of officers being shot through the back by their own men. The whole gory traffic in the lives of men degraded man below the level of brutes. And today we find the coarsening caused by the orgy of murders that took place under the plea of making the world safe for democracy. The fineness of feeling for one's fellows has worn away and the sense of humanitarian considerations follows different standards. We see signs of it in the callousness with which British journals refer to brutalities practiced in India to maintain 'Law and Order.' Even the Rt. Hon. Srinivasa Sastri has the heartlessness to speak of the repressive policy as 'a few lathi blows and a few imprisonments.' As long as they do not see wholesale slaughter of unarmed people and raping and pillage the order of the day, they think the Government is civilised. What a fall! Violence degrades both parties to the contest.

From this tale of violence let us turn to one of the 'fronts' in our 'war' for freedom. Anyone who visits the villages of Gujarat, where the no-tax campaign is going on, cannot fail to be impressed by the nobility of human nature that is in evidence on all sides. They have not been recruited at the point of the bayonet and their discipline is not one of fear of those who lead them. They are drawn by cords of love which until only a few days ago emanated from behind the prison bars of Yeravda. Their faith in the cause has made them abandon their dear homes of their own accord. In the midst of all that will make for misery they go about with a joyful countenance. The effect of Satyagraha is elevating. It builds up the character of the fighter and raises them to the highest level their natures are capable of. But for the coarsening effect, we have already seen, the world war had on the belligerent nations the influence of Satyagraha would have been felt sooner. The hardened hearts take longer to melt, but our faith in the ultimate goodness of human nature persuades us to believe in the ultimate triumph of Satyagraha. The greater the range between the parties the longer it takes to achieve its end.

Before we proceed to consider the actual items on the programme of our struggle it may be well to understand the standpoint from which we view the Government. Unless we constantly keep this in mind we shall not be able to grasp the full significance of many of the Congress manoeuvres.

We believe that sovereignty rests with a people. Law is the expressed will of the people. A government is intended to serve the people and therefore should be subject to the will of the people. In other words the legislature should have the power to turn out the executive. Only under such conditions can the government claim the obedience of the people to laws which are after all the constitutional expression of their own will, provided, always that the laws in themselves do not run counter to the ideals of the best in the land, otherwise, even the will of the majority may be immoral and then it would be fit and proper to disregard such laws. On the other hand, a legislature which passes Bills initiated by the executive without the power to turn out the executive, can have no pretensions to the obedience of the people as such laws are only veiled forms of despotic firmans. They are, in effect ordinances clothed with the appearance of democracy. A government run on such laws cannot lay claim to the unquestioning loyalty of the people as it is essentially a despotism. Such a government cannot be truthfully called 'A government by law established.' When such a government talks of enforcing 'Law and Order' it merely means in simple language they wish to force the will of the executive on the people which is of the essence of tyranny.

When we apply these accepted principles of democracy we find the Government of India does not satisfy the test. We feel that it is the bounden duty of every man who seeks after truth and righteousness to do his utmost to put matters right. This is the fundamental conception on which the whole movement is based. The satyagrahi has no enmity with any person. We have nothing against the individuals forming the bureaucracy personally. The bureaucratic system is harmful to both the Britishers and the Indians. It is degrading both. The British public owe it to themselves to see that India is made responsible for her own government. Only those who have the power to change conditions, but do not bestir themselves to do so, can be held responsible for the acts of the bureaucracy. I have often seen excuses made for the Viceroy to absolve him from blame attaching to measures launched by him on the score that he himself is a victim of a system. This is wrong. Members of the bureaucracy can be excused as they are merely wheels in a machine. But the Viceroy who holds office only for five years is expected to bring an unbiassed mind and to rise above the grooves of official routine and be able to take a detached view of affairs. One who does not or is not capable of doing so is a failure and on his shoulders will rest the blame for any misdirection of policy. No one can escape liability on the ground of being a creature of environment. The best among men create their own circumstances under which they work. The bureaucrats may be victims of circumstances but not so the Viceroy. While we are justified in placing the responsibility for actions on the Viceroy we do not bear any illwill towards the man. We strive to distinguish even in the officials between the machine and the person.

As regards ourselves we are sure we can attain Swaraj only when the nation is purified of evils and is relieved of handicaps. The satyagrahi should not be self-centred; he seeks the welfare of his neighbours, especially the poor and the helpless. Our programme ought not to harm anyone but should be beneficial to all parties engaged in this struggle. Of course, our avowed object is to break the bureaucratic system.

With these two points in mind let us examine the programme of the satyagraha movement. At the start we had three objectives. The abolition of the Salt Tax, the eradication of liquor trade and the boycott of foreign cloth. At present it is hardly necessary to go into the details of the Salt Tax as most people are aware of the evils attendant on this levy. The incidence of this tax is mainly on the poor on whom the burden falls heavily. The repeal of this law has been again and again asked for with no response from the bureaucracy. We look upon it as an immoral tax and hence it has been given one of the first three places in our programme. The method of breaking the law was by manufacturing salt, as this was a subsidiary industry in many villages before it was mercilessly destroyed and the present monopoly was created. Later on it was decided upon raiding salt depots, which we regard as illegal hoards of people's property. The salt law breaking does not injure any one but adds to the betterment of the masses, it disables the bureaucracy financially and thus fulfills eminently the requirements of a satyagraha programme.

When the satyagrahis refused to give up the salt packets in their possession and the Government resorted to force to extract these, in response to a protest from me in the press one of my good missionary friends wrote to me that the refusal of the satyagrahis to part with their salt was not worthy of a satyagrahi or a Christian as it is contrary to Christ's teaching where he bids us 'let him who would take the coat have the cloak also.' I was rather surprised at the gross misreading of the "Sermon on the Mount" here involved. Jesus there was talking of individual dealings. The satyagrahis are fighting as trustees of the poor and what they held was trust property and could not be disposed of so easily. We have to safeguard trust reposed in us with our lives, if need be. Again, the teaching of Jesus concerning the going two miles instead of one is a misapplication as there Christ was referring to one in need of the company and desired it. I am perfectly certain that if the policemen, who demanded the salt, stood in need of salt for their personal use the satyagrahis would have gladly supplied more than their requirement. The policemen were not actuated in their demands as individuals but as part of the bureaucratic machinery. To reduce the situation to its lowest denominator it was the demand of the bureaucracy, which we held to be an usurper of people's rights, for property rightfully belonging to the people, the demand itself being based on Salt Law which as we have seen earlier is no law but a despotic ordinance under the exterior garb of law. You will agree that on moral grounds the satyagrahis had no other option but to resist unto death such a demand.

FREEDOM WITH SAFEGUARDS.

(BY MR. KOPARGAM RAMAMURTI.)

In the "Hindu Illustrated Weekly" of 25th January and 1st February, is given a remarkably interesting and vivid account of the famous Monkey Farm maintained at Grimaldi in the South of France by Professor Voronoff who is described as "one of humanity's most ambitious benefactors."

Curious as it may seem, the problems which beset the keeping of these useful but fickle animals in contentment and control throw a flood of light on the task which must have confronted the responsible officials of the Round Table Conference.

"The great difficulty is," explains the experienced Professor, "to devise a method which will prevent the creatures from escaping and yet provide a good imitation of freedom that they do not realise the difference."

That they must be given the freedom to climb is obvious, for "climbing is to monkeys what swimming is to fish." Therefore trees must be provided in plenty for their benefit—like "Ministerships."

But at the same time care must be taken to prevent undesirable leaps which may take them beyond the reach of the Professor's humane services. He has therefore thoughtfully chosen a Plateau for their use, "isolated by very deep steps down which the most adventurous simian would hesitate to jump."

But then the artful agile things might "swing themselves out of the picture by the tree-tops." To prevent this he has wisely decided to "separate the place by sets of bars, carried above the tops of the trees."

SAFE-GUARDS I

The ungrateful creatures however might then stupidly suspect that they are caged, and becoming discontented and unhappy, fail to produce gland-bearing young. The learned Professor therefore has declared his intention, that the bars shall be put "so high above their heads that they will be unaware of them and continue to think themselves free to go where they please."

FREEDOM I

There is only one drawback to Professor Voronoff's great humanitarian enterprise. Unlike India, the Grimaldi Farm does not feed its keeper, though it makes him famous. It does not produce its own food. On the other hand, it has to be fed and housed and kept clean, healthy and comfortable by the Professor himself at an enormous daily cost to his own pocket. Which at any rate proves his philanthropic mission.

Happy Simians! Blessed with a Divine gift of gland which every Round Tabler and practically every Indian might envy!

INDIAN CHRISTIAN MARRIAGE ACT.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Your leaderette in the Reformer of the 21st instant about a marriage law anomaly contains one inaccurate statement, and that about the Hindu Christian marriage which you say was attended by many Christians. That marriage, you will find from the report of it in the Hindu published in your issue of the 21st instant, was performed under Act XV of 1872 i. e., the Indian Christian Marriage Act and not under Act III of 1872, the Special Marriage Act, as assumed by you. The only anomaly in this event is not so much that it was attended by many Christians and was the occasion of feasting but that the parties ignored the provisions of Sec. 88 of the Act under which the marriage was celebrated. That section is referred to by Mr. K. Ramamurti in his letter to the Bishop of Tinnevely published in this very issue of the Reformer. It runs: "Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to validate any marriage which the personal law applicable to either of the parties forbids him or her to enter into."

This section has a marginal note: "Non-validation of marriages within prohibited degrees." But, in a recent case in Bombay, Saldanha v. Saldanha 32 Bom. L. R. 17, it was stated that the words used in Sec. 88 do not justify the limitation suggested in the marginal note, that the personal law applicable is the personal law as to prohibited degrees. Mr. Justice Blackwell who stated this adds: "I think that the expression 'personal law' in the section would include any personal law, apart from any personal law as to the form of the marriage, which forbade either of the parties to enter into a contract of marriage with one another." Mr. Justice Kemp in his judgment states: "It is well established that marginal notes must not be referred to for the purpose of either limiting or extending the words of the Act itself."

When this is the state of the law you will find that the legality of a marriage between a Hindu and Christian celebrated under Act XV of 1872, the Indian Christian Marriage Act, is not above question. In this particular instance one wonders how such an event was allowed to take place with all these festivities by a person who was occupying till recently the post of a District Judge. Or as Mr. Ramamurti says the interpretation of the Indian Christian Marriage Act is to be of a special kind for the Madras Presidency, whether it is of Sec. 68 or of Sec. 88.

Yours, etc.,
K.

MAHATMA GANDHI'S SPEECH AT DELHI.

Mahatma Gandhi made his first important speech after his release from jail at Delhi on the 20th February. The following is the Associated Press report of his speech:

Mahatma Gandhi began by offering Id felicitation to his Muslim brethren. He said on such an occasion and in the presence of such an unprecedented gathering his thoughts went to Maulana Mohamed Ali whose death had pained him a great deal. Ever since he had returned to India from South Africa he had thought of Delhi as the Delhi of Maulana Mohamed Ali, Swami Shradhananda and Hakim Ajmal Khan, so much so that even now though their physical presence was to be missed their unseen presence could still be felt. He was equally pained to miss on such a critical juncture the presence of Pandit Motilal Nehru whose death was so recent that their eyes were yet wet with tears.

TALKS WITH VICEROY.

Mahatmaji, continuing, said: "I know you are all anxious to hear something from me of the talks I am having with the Viceroy. I am afraid I may not take the public into confidence about what happened between his Excellency and me. For one thing I am pledged not to do so and, secondly, it is not going to help us. But I may say this much, that these talks have been conducted in a most friendly manner and with much sweetness. What will be the result I cannot say. The result is in the hands of God. It is His will that will prevail. Your duty is that you must continue to do what India expects of you."

TRIBUTE TO WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

"Dr. Ansari belonging as he does to Delhi has naturally spoken highly of the part played by Delhi. But I am a witness to the great sacrifices that have been made throughout India and I can say that Delhi stands comparison with any other province. For that you deserve my congratulations. Here as elsewhere the part played by women is indescribable. When the history of this movement comes to be written the sacrifices made by the women of India will occupy the foremost place, and just as with women so also with children. Their wonderful awakening has fortified me in my faith that God is with us in this struggle. These young folk had never been organized for such work and had never been trained for it. How they came to achieve all this I have not been able to divine, nor has any one else whom I have consulted been able to enlighten as to who guided them. Only God could have done so. But remember that in the sacred battle whatever sacrifices you have made are trifling. Let them not puff you up with pride."

EFFORTS TO BRING ABOUT PEACE.

What we want for India is Purna Swaraj and who can calculate what further sacrifices India will have to make to achieve that goal. I assure you that I am doing as much as is humanly possible to bring about peace, so that people may not have to go through further suffering and sacrifices. But everything is in God's hands and if it be not His will that any understanding be arrived at then I will have to tell the people that they must be ready for much further suffering and that the sacrifices that we have made are as nothing before the sacrifices other nations have made for the sake of freedom.

TRUTH AND NON-VIOLENCE.

But there is a reason why we have not had to suffer as much as other nations. It is as clear to me as daylight. The reason is that when we pledged ourselves to achieve Purna Swaraj we also took the vow that whatever we do in furtherance of the goal would be in consonance with truth and non-violence, and when I think of the part played by the whole of India, especially by the rural population, I think we have substantially fulfilled the pledge of truth and non-violence. But I cannot deceive myself, nor will I permit you to deceive yourself. We have followed truth and non-violence, but we have not made them an article of faith. They have been to some a matter of policy. But even if you have accepted it as a policy you may not act or think in terms of violence. So long as you adhere to the policy the very thought of untruth or violence is a breach of the pledge. You will remember that at the Ahmedabad Congress this matter was thoroughly threshed out in the presence of leaders like Hakim Ajmal Khan and Dr. Ansari and after a full deliberation it was decided that so long as we adhere to our policy of truth and non-violence, so long are we bound to adhere to truth and non-violence in thought and deed. The slightest breach of that pledge means a breach of faith. I may tolerate the allegation that Indians are not fit for Swaraj, but I cannot for a moment tolerate the allegation, if it were true, that my countrymen were untrue and dishonest. I cannot think of a greater tragedy than that those who believed in God were ungodly and guilty of a breach of faith. Such people are not fit for freedom. They are fit for slavery and worse.

EXCESSES CONDEMNED.

'For this reason I have always laid the greatest stress on the point that it was open to you to abandon the policy and adopt a different one, but so long as you pin your faith to truth and non-violence do not deceive yourself or the world. Therefore when I heard that there had been some excesses on the part of our people in the picketing of foreign cloth I was deeply pained. I have not been able to investigate into the allegations. But you know that in 1921-22 I expiated for the excesses by suspending the movement. That sort of expiation is today out of question. But I must say that wherever these excesses are going on they must stop.

A NOTE OF WARNING.

Mahatma Gandhi continued: 'It is better that dealers in foreign cloth continue to sell it and those addicted to drink continue to do so than that we resort to excesses in picketing. But there is another danger I wish to warn you against. If we take to these excesses we shall be opening the door for self-destruction when we have Swaraj, for there will then be no third power with machine-guns to intervene and restore peace. We shall be fighting one another and fratricidal war will spell destruction. If, therefore, you have the slightest apprehension in your mind that picketing cannot be done without resorting to excesses you had better be done with it. I want you to remember that I am an expert in these matters. I am sure we have in the past done considerable picketing without the slightest resort to violence. Do not be afraid that the moment we eschew the excesses our work will fall through. I would ask you not to worry. Rest assured that the man who is asking you today to keep to your moorings must have some alternatives to suggest, but I shall not dwell on it today. I have received letters of complaint and I am making enquiries. It is possible that we have committed mistakes. I will ask all Congress workers to consider these carefully and correct whatever mistakes we may have been guilty of. I appeal to you to eschew all excesses. You may like to know what I mean by excesses. I invite the curious to come to me for the explanation.
