"This Conference deeply deplores the effect of early marriage on education. It emphatically condemns the custom of allowing immature boys and girls to become sraters. It calls for the Central Government, and the provincial Legislatures to follow the precedent set up by the Indian States of Baroda and Mysore, Rajkot, Kas.hmir, Gondal, Indore, Lumbi, Bundi, which have raised the legal age of marriage. This meeting demands that the legal age of marriage for girls and boys be made 18 and 8 respectively. While welcoming Rail Satchar Harbilas Sardar's attempt to pass legislation prohibiting early marriage, this Conference strongly protests against his proposed ages of 12 and 15 and calls on him and the Select Committees to amend his Bill in conformity with this resolution."

"This Conference also reiterates its demand of last year that the age of consent be raised to 16 years and supports Sir Hari Singh Gour's Bill as a step towards this."

Her Highness the Rani of Mandi moved the resolution as a next speech. Others who spoke on the resolution were Mrs. Rohm, Mrs. Perouz-dia, Shirinshuni Jamunadevi Bhatiri, Mrs. Basil, Begum Jafar of Bhopal, Shrimati Kansole of Indore, Mrs. Shantker Uma of Mysore, Shrimati Saravanadavi of Lucknow and Mrs. Shukla. The speakers criticized at length the evils of child marriage and urged the womenfolk to move heavens and earth and not to take rest till this blot was removed from the fair face of India. Shirinshuni Jamunadevi of Jaipur quoted Shastras to prove that the child marriage was against the dictates of Hindu Dharmas. She challenged the conservative Pandits to prove the contrary. Her speech was very much appreciated.

The following was the last resolution of the day:

"This Conference is of opinion that girls' schools should be inspected by women who have general and technical qualifications."

Mrs. Huidekoper moved the resolution, while Miss Raffi, Miss Dawson and a number of other ladies supported the resolution. The Conference session ended at 8-40 p.m., and loud cheers, when delegates left in a procession of cars to Qutub.

THIRD DAY.

The All-India Women's Conference continued its session on Thursday, the 9th February at Sarawati Bhawan. A larger number of ladies were present at today's deliberations than yesterday, including Lady Irwin. The backwash of women in education formed the main topic of today's discussion of a number of resolutions which were ultimately adopted by the Conference. It is understood that the level of the speeches delivered showed a spirit of earnestness and urged immediate and effective action. The most important resolution which was carried today held that compulsory primary education was essential for girls and urged upon the Government and local bodies to make necessary financial provision for this purpose and to make special grants for Moslem and other girls who suffered from the disability of purdah.

The Conference recognised the imperative need of a greater number of training schools for teachers and urged upon the Government to take immediate steps to start such schools in every centre where they did not exist. It was pointed out and finally passed that as far as possible women teachers should be engaged in the primary stage of education, both of boys and girls, which in fact be wholly the concern of women teachers. The organizers of classes were instructed to include domestic science, fine arts, literary, industrial, and general subjects, as also girl guiding, in their lessons.

The Conference recommended that all-India fund for the promotion of women's education be established, and appointed a sub-committee to collect funds and to submit a scheme for its administration to the standing committee.

Rs. 30,000 was collected today as a result of the appeal of the Begum of Bhopal, and herself and her daughter-in-law announced subscriptions of Rs. 5,000 and Rs. 2,000, respectively, while the two princesses of Baroda promised Rs. 1,000 each.

After the termination of today's session, the delegates were taken to the Assembly hall and special arrangements had been made to show them the working of the Assembly.

FOURTH DAY.

After the adoption of eight more resolutions and the election of office-bearers, the All-India Women's Conference concluded its sessions to-day.

The Conference appointed four sub-committees to carry on the work of the conference during the year.

Mrs. Cousin (Madras) introduced a resolution urging the Government to nominate at least two women in the Central Legislature to protect the interests of women, especially in regard to the pending legislation on Child Marriage and Depraved children. Mrs. Cousin pointed out that the need for such legislation was keenly felt by the delegates when they listened to the discussion on Sir Hari Singh Gour's Age of Consent Bill in the Assembly.

Miss Saraladevi Mehta (Bombay) supported the resolution, remarking that women were not content with
THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

...cradles only, but that they really wanted to rule the world.

Mrs. Rustamji (Hyderabad), who was one of those who represented the women's case before the Muddiman Committee, declared that women were absolutely necessary in the legislatures to safeguard their interests.

The conference then resolved to send a representative to Honolulu to attend the Pan-Pacific Women's Conference, for which an urgent invitation had been received. Mrs. Sarojini Naidu's name was suggested and finally accepted. It is understood that Mrs. Naidu will sail for America in May next.

Mrs. Das (Bihar) next proposed that women be given adequate representation on all educational boards which controlled primary, secondary and university education, and on all text-book committees. The motion was accepted. A desire was expressed to utilise cinema films for educational purposes in schools, especially in rural areas, and the conference passed a resolution to that effect.

The motion which raised a good deal of controversy and discussion was the one dealing with agricultural education, and which was proposed by Mrs. Saraladevi Choudhurani (Bengal). It advocated the introduction of teaching of agricultural subjects in schools, colleges and training colleges, the institution of scholarships for girls and the appointment of women agricultural officers and demonstrators.

The opposition was led by Mrs. Mayadas (United Provinces).

After much discussion, an amendment proposed by Mrs. Shastvedaker (Central Provinces) was passed.

The amended resolution suggested the introduction of agriculture as a compulsory subject in rural schools and as an optional subject in cities.

Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya was re-elected Secretary of the Standing Committee for the coming year.

Mrs. Besant, addressing the Conference, declared it had been one of the most hopeful signs for India that her daughters were taking an active part in public affairs. Women had not equal franchise with men in India; and India was one of those countries where the opinion of women was taken into consideration, and reverence for women was inculcated. She contended that the voice of Indian womanhood was of supreme importance for the welfare of the world. Woman, she said, saw far more than man, and was more practical than him.

PRESEIDENT'S CLOSING ADDRESS.

In her closing address to the conference, the Begum Mother of Bhopal paid a tribute to Lady Irwin for her wholehearted sympathy with the movement, which encouraged them to believe that their effort in the cause of education would bear fruit in the same way as Lady Dufferin's for the provision of medical relief. The speaker laid particular importance on the teaching of domestic economy, domestic science, nursing and hygiene, because it was a training which made good mothers and good wives. They should consider the question of establishing model schools for training of these particular subjects.

Alluding to the question of child marriage, the Begum Mother of Bhopal pointed out that the Law of Islam had also given the option of repudiating marriage to the child-wife on attaining the age of puberty. But modesty and renunciation were the essential peculiarities of India's womanhood; and this right was therefore seldom exercised by Mahomedan girls married by their guardians at a tender age.

Proceeding, the President expressed her disappointment that the conference was not alive to the need for encouraging their own mother tongue. She took exception to the conduct of the proceedings in English, which was not in keeping with the spirit of true national progress. Their progress would be very slow if they did not adopt a language which might be understood by all classes of people. She hoped the conference would be an accredited medium through which the women of India could approach the Government for the satisfaction of their claims.

SWAMI DAYANAND AND BRAHMACHARYA.

(By A Tamil Anta Kumari.)

There is a beautiful sentence in the Upanishads stating that if a Sage touches a dead wood, it sprouts while leaves and flowers spring forth from it. Metaphorically speaking there is some truth hidden in it. Hindu society was almost a dead one during the 19th century. When Dayanand Saraswati touched them especially in the Punjab, a new life has sprung. There is life and animation everywhere in the sphere of Hindu life. Thousands of enlightened Hindus will shortly be celebrating the Dayananda's Day of Illumination which coincides with Mahasivarathri Day. It will not be out of place to write a few words on the views of Swamiji on the importance of Brahmacarya. He felt the evils of early marriage when he saw the men of the country as the worst weaklings of the human race. He saw that unless the ancient Brahmacarya was revived there would be no hope for the country. He divided the Brahmacarya into three classes—The lowest, intermediate and the highest, lasting 24, 44 and 48 years respectively. During this period he should keep perfect control over his passions and devote himself to the acquisition of knowledge and of culture. These help to produce the noblest qualities in body, mind and soul. In the words of Upanishads he calls the persons who do not observe Brahmacarya as foes who rule their own career. By observing the intermediate Brahmacarya he says that one becomes a lion among men, a terror to the wicked and an asylum to the good. Apart from the future happiness, the worldly glory belongs only to those who observe celibacy. Any one observing the highest order of Brahmacarya acquires perfect knowledge, strength, wisdom, good qualities etc. He reinforces his arguments by quoting Susunatha an ancient medical authority. The human body can be divided into four stages—Period of Adolescence—from 16th to 25th year, period of manhood from 25th to 40th year, maturity about 40th year. He says that the 40th year is the fit time for marriage. A girl under no circumstances should be married before 16th year. Swamiji advocated neither the right asceticism nor the restrained asceticism. He compares the mind of a Brahmacaryi to a skilful rider who keeps his horses under control. He alone can achieve the heart's desire who is a master of his senses; he who allows himself to become their slave soon loses his character. He says the people of India, a the present day, who are involved in the aforesaid false practices, remain destitute of the advantages of Brahmacarya.
machiavels and education, are consequently sunk in ignorance and afflicted with diverse diseases. He calls upon the Rulers also on their imperative duty of removing all obstacles in the way of observing Brahmmacharya by the students. To girls also he advocates Brahmmacharya if they wish to bring forth heroes and learned men.
I think his advice is still fresh. I only wish that the Aray Samaj who are now celebrating his day of Dawn should now organise an order of Brahmmacharies on the model of Scout Movement to revive the good system.

NEWS OF THE WEEK

Prohibition in Bombay. - The consumption of country spirit and of toddy has continued steadily to decline, says the Government of Bombay resolution on the administration report of the Indian States department. Diminished consumption in the Presidency, the resolution adds, is to be attributed not to the spread of temperate habits but to the general depression and to the unfavourable character of the season. The consumption of foreign liquor on the other hand registered a considerable rise due to the increased prices of country spirit and also to a certain extent to the growing predilection of the working classes for beer, as steps on the path of total prohibition. The Government can point to the policy of rationing supplemented by such measures as gradual reduction in the number of country liquor shops and in the hours of sale, while the consumption of country spirit has considerably decreased and the revenue shrunk proportionately. The Government however are unable to view the results achieved up to date with unmixed satisfaction inasmuch as they do not represent the radical change in habits and inclinations of the population. Failing to obtain country spirit at the price which they can afford the people resort to cheap foreign liquor in spite of its license fees having been more than doubled. Smuggling of country spirit is also on the increase and its total prevention is difficult owing to the existence of several Indian States on borders of British districts. All still worse counteracting factor is the extensive and organised scale on which illicit distillation is carried on. A further cause tending to nullify the good effects of prohibition measures is the newly acquired habit of ganja-smoking which is supplementing, if not supplanting, the drink-habit in parts of Deccan.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 25 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conservating the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislation in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Com-paines as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

The Conference in Nautch at The Late Maharaja's Palace, Madras.

A. W. Aiyar in December last during the Social Party in Madras, the Maharaja, it was said, had had two days of fever and had been taken on the platform of the Allahabad station for a train to go to Lucknow, when he was arrested and deported. The manner in which the arrest was carried out has shocked the public mind. The Maharaja, whatever his sins, was certainly entitled to be treated with consideration which was badly lacking in this case. The orders of Government raise important issues relating to their authority over Indian rulers.

We little thought when we met Mrs. Chandrasekara Aiyar in December last during the Social Conference in Madras that she would be taken away so soon from our midst. Her end, coming as it did in so sudden and tragic a manner is a great blow to the cause of women's advancement in this country for which she worked wholeheartedly and un sparingly. Besides her many and varied qualities, she possessed the rare gift of eloquence which was a happy combination of wit and practical common sense. Mrs. Cousins who was closely associated with her in all her activities writes in the Hindu as follows: "A sense of dédication will sweep across the hearts of thousands of girls, women and men to-day, particularly in South India, at the tragic news of the passing away of Srimati Parvati Ammai of Bangalore. The circumstances which led to her death were the culmex of the spirit of self-sacrifice which ruled her entire life. Everyone knows how she was the leader of every movement in Bangalore connected with the advancement of women and children throughout South India also for she was one of the Central Committee of the Women's Indian Association. She was one of the Vice-Presidents of the Mysore Constituent Conference for the All-India Women's Conference on Educational Reform and chosen last November as one of the Delegates to Delhi. She was undecided about coming but the possibility of the occasion being used to secure a Deputation to His Excellency the Viceroy about the prohibition of the marriage of girls under 16 and the service she could render that Deputation decided her to undertake the hardships of the journey. Her husband accompanied here and they arranged to stay with friends in Delhi. The morning after her arrival she faintened while taking oil bath and fell against the stove which badly burnt her forearm and leg. She narrowly escaped losing her hand. Qualified medical aid was secured at once and although she was unable to attend any of the Conference functions she phoned her daily accounts of all that was happening to keep the girls' interest tittered. She visited her a couple of hours before I left Delhi and she then seemed well on the way to recovery though she had had two days of fever and had been taken to the hospital. I visited her a week ago and the shock of her death has been quite unexpected. Her heart, her eloquence, her unerring energy her great intelligence, were consecrated to the upliftment of her sex and her country."

She was undecided about coming but the possibility of the occasion being used to secure a Deputation to His Excellency the Viceroy about the prohibition of the marriage of girls under 16 and the service she could render that Deputation decided her to undertake the hardships of the journey. Her husband accompanied here and they arranged to stay with friends in Delhi. The morning after her arrival she faintened while taking oil bath and fell against the stove which badly burnt her forearm and leg. She narrowly escaped losing her hand. Qualified medical aid was secured at once and although she was unable to attend any of the Conference functions she phoned her daily accounts of all that was happening to keep the girls' interest tittered. She visited her a couple of hours before I left Delhi and she then seemed well on the way to recovery though she had had two days of fever and had been taken to the hospital. I visited her a week ago and the shock of her death has been quite unexpected. Her heart, her eloquence, her unerring energy her great intelligence, were consecrated to the upliftment of her sex and her country."

A Maharaja Interned: Monday morning papers contained the sensational news of the arrest and deportation of the ex-Maharaja of Nabha in the Punjab to Kodikanal, in the extreme south, the reduction of his allowance from Rs. 25,000 to Rs. 10,000 a month, and the deprivation of his title and the privileges associated with. An official communiqué stated that the Maharaja had been engaged in royal activities in contravention of his undertaking at the time of his abdication and that Government had, therefore, decided to take those measures against him. The Maharaja was waiting on the platform of the Allahabad station for a train to go to Lucknow, when he was arrested and deported. The manner in which the arrest was carried out has shocked the public mind. The Maharaja, whatever his sins, was certainly entitled to be treated with consideration which was badly lacking in this case. The orders of Government raise important issues relating to their authority over Indian rulers.

The curious part of it is that the matter cannot be raised either in the Indian Legislature, where a motion for adjournment was disallowed, or in any international tribunal. The Indian Princos's position is, indeed, anomalous. He has, it would seem, neither the rights of a private citizen nor the immunities of a foreign ruler in British India.

The Religion of Thomas Hardy: We always look to the Catholic Leader for some original comments and are seldom disappointed. The following will be of interest to our readers:—"We referred in a recent issue to the impurity of conducting a religious service in Westminster Abbey over the ashes of Thomas Hardy, the great poet and author. Canon Barry, writing in the Catholic Times, says Hardy was an unbeliever and asks what could have justified that Requiem, 'where every hymn and prayer implies dogmas that he rejected, hopes that he would not entertain.' He had long given up belief in religion and his books expressed a philosophy 'which even friendly critics termed pessimism, but the genuine name was atheism'. Yet an elaborate religious service was conducted over his ashes by the Anglican Dean and Chapter of Westminster Abbey. One wonders how the Anglican Church could pay such homage to an unbeliever. 'In Revelation,' comments Canon Barry, 'myth, sacred ritual just an aesthetic performance, the Gospel a legend? St. Paul may be buried in the pulpit of the Abbey; but Thomas Hardy's tomb is henceforth to be a shrine, a place of pilgrimage for those who deny God and despair of the life to come'. We do not know what proofs, except the opinion of another dogmatist, the Catholic Leader, has for calling Hardy an unbeliever, but so far as we have been able to make them out, had great points of affinity with the Hindu view of the solidarity of the universe and the inexorable sequence embodied in the law of Karma. Thomas Hardy was a thorough believer in the moral order of things, though he was no slave to dogmas and was full of the charity that beseeched all things, believed in all things, hoped all things and endured all things. He was a pessimist only in the sense that he realised that life was not only all beer and skittles and that sweetness and sadness follow each other like light and shade.

Industrialism in India: Modern industrialism has come to stay in India and it is futile to arrest its growth. This is only a proof that all countries are drawn into the vortex of the world forces whether they wish it or not. Industrialism when born of its evils is more a blessing than a curse. Sir Atul Chatterjee has rightly pointed out in an article, "On Indu-trialism and Indian Life" appearing in the International Review of Missions that industrialism is not incompatible with Indian ideas. While giving credit to the Government for the present laws regulating labour, Sir Atul has not a word to say about the part played by the people in pressing for those enactments. Then again we are not able to share the unbounded faith that Sir Atul has in the infallibility of the people of the West, when he says that Indians devote themselves to the improvement of condition of industrial workers are apt to make mistakes and calls upon men and women from the West to in-pipe and guide them. Clearly, there are few of the type of Sir Atul who suffer from infidelity complex.

A Suggestion: We publish elsewhere a short report of the interesting debate at Benares on the proposal of Mr. S. K. Das to establish a public school in India. The suggestion of Prof. Seshadri that the money collected be distributed among existing schools is good but Lala Lajpat Rai writing in the People has advanced a far better one. He says — "The All-India Women's Educational Conference held at Delhi during the past week was an event of great importance. In one of the resolutions they have decided to raise an all-India fund for the promotion of women's education. It seems to me it was the present Law Member to the Government of India, could be induced to devote the enormous fund he has collected for establishing a public school for Indian boys for the education of Indians. It would be most welcome if it were not the con-ent of the donors, but that can be easily obtained. A public school such as is planned by him and which will be presided over and managed by English teachers will be another white elephant feeding on the finances of India. The truth is that so far as boys' education is concerned we are not so badly off as is supposed by some. If anyone believes that English teachers will be interested in producing Indian patriots he is not only mistaken but possibly lives in a fool's paradise. The public school in England is the product of centuries of English history. To implant a school of that kind in India for the benefit of a few hundred boys is an entirely mistaken idea involving a huge waste of money and effort and energy. But if that money was diverted to the formation of those for which the facilities that already exist are so meagre and in dequate it will be a great boon to the country." L. Laj's suggestion is a timely one and we hope the Executive of the All-India Women's Conference will sanction Mrs. R. Laj's proposal.

Nautch at Wedding: We were under the impression that a nautch party at a wedding was a thing of the past but we have reason to believe that it is not so. It is not a little surprising to find that educated men and women should find nothing incongruous in requisitioning the services of nautch girls at a function to which so much sanctity is attached as marriage. Do they stop to consider the effect of the procuress of these girls of uncertain reputation on the minds of the young bride and bridegroom and also on those who grace the occasion with their presence? Great, indeed, must be the discomfiture of those who have consented to objection to such entertainments. It is for our young men to stand for all that is pure and righteous and to dissuade their parents from including undesirable items in the programme of their weddings.

The Age of Consent Bill: A Correspondent writes — The All-India Women's Educational Conference in its last week at Delhi demanded that the legal age of marriage for girls and boys be made 16 and 21 respectively. Instead of 12 and 15 as contemplated by Mr. Haribhakt Sarda. Sir Har Singh Gujaur urges in the Legislative Assembly the penalisation of cohabitation with unmarried girls below the age of 16 and with married girls below the age of 14. The Act of 1925 penalises cohabitation with unmarried girls below the age of 14 and married girls below the age of 15. If early marriage is a bad it has got to go. It has been proved beyond doubt that it is bad in so far as it leads to the certain decrease of the country's vitality and perhaps certain increase of the death-rate. No nation can afford to cherish a custom, however hoary and however decently attired in Sastri's garbs, which threatens its progress and even its continuance in enough efficiency. But the Brahmana Mahasabha of Madras evidently think otherwise. In a memorial submitted by them to the Viceroy they have made it pretty clear that they have little sympathy for any attempt that seeks to revise a 'domestic institution' such as marriage. They also deny the State's right of interference in such institutions especially in view of the fact that 'the British Government is bound by a solemn pledge of religious neutrality towards the Hindu inhabitants of this country. The memorial further supports the existing Hindu marriage custom by saying that even English marriage is not a sine qua non. The law of England is that no boy can be married before he is sixteen and no girl can marry without the one-parent's consent. But however it is not a marriage if she reaches the age of twenty-one. Of course parents or guardians of girls can put them through marriage as soon as they are in the world if they like, but such a thing is simply unheard of there. They have better sense than that. And suppose the law of England in this matter is what the memorial says it is a bad thing hardly becomes a good thing because the bad thing is found in more than one country. Sir Har Singh Gujaur neatly drives the point home when he says that should the Government refuse support to his Bill based, as it is, on elementary justice the idea would more widely get abroad that they are all the time thinking that the weaker sex is the easier it is to rule them. There is really only one solution to the question of this early marriage and that is to put an end entirely with to it. The deobulisation of young boys and girls is no laughing matter. One need not be a social reformer to see this. One need only be a lover of home. It must be put a stop to not because people of Miss Mavry's type now and then deride our jokes but because we ourselves are jesting at us in grim jokes with all knowing, we are. There is after all no fun in giving a slowly but surely killing thing a holy look. Ordinary is good but it is not always religious to simply shut one's eyes.
OBSTACLES TO SOCIAL REFORM

We reprint to-day from the English journal called "Foreign Affairs" a very forceful article from the pen of Mr. C. F. Andrews on the prospects of social reform under the present system of Government in India: "It is extremely difficult," he writes, "for people in England to understand that British rule in India constantly stands in the way of progressive social reform, acting as an obstruction." In Mr. Andrews' opinion, this is a necessary consequence of the foreign character of the Indian Government. He likens foreign rule to strychnine an injection which may stimulate a sickling patient, but an overdose of which will kill him outright. "Perhaps, it was for this very reason," he adds, "that John Stuart Mill characterised foreign rule as no rule at all but only a kind of anarchy masquerading under the name of Government. It lacks the primary requisite of growth, namely, organic assimilation." Besides this fundamental defect, there is the recurring kind of misunderstanding, intentional and unintentional, that the Government is not in a great social reform. India is extremely difficult," he writes, "to see the result of such speeches as to make the boycott of the Statutory Commission by a thoughtful patriots more certain than ever." He points out how in the early days of British rule in India some great social reforms were carried out by the Government with the support of enlightened Indian leaders like Raja Ram Mohan Roy. This came to an end when Imperialism and commercial exploitation became the inspiring motives of British policy. "Every day," writes Mr. Andrews, "my own conviction—slowly and painfully formed—has grown stronger, that the rule of the foreigner is now definitely standing in the way of healthy social reform." Mr. Andrews has been asked, as many of us have been, whether the lot of the depressed classes would be bettered under Swaraj. He answers unhesitatingly: "Unhesitatingly I would say that to-day the strongest forces working for emancipation are to be found outside Government circles. If the British rule were to cease to-morrow, the depressed classes would at once be brought into the foreground of the national programme." One example is sufficient to illustrate the truth of this proposition. Nothing will more powerfully help the realisation of the so-called sparrow classes at the present day, as the aboli- tion of the liquor traffic. The Hindu and Mahomedan religion strictly prohibit the use of intoxicating drinks, and the depressed classes are the greatest victims of the liquor trade. The bulk of the Excise revenue of Government is collected from the miserably small earnings of these classes. Indian opinion strongly in favour of prohibition. In his presidential address at the All-India Conference held in Delhi at week Sir Parsbovatnandas Thakur calls said that in India where millions of the inhabitants are total abstainers, to the shame of the Government of India, the most serious difficulty is the revenue consideration. If Government are ever set about the uplift of the depressed classes, they must at once set about preparing the ground for the introduction of prohibition within the next 10 or 12 years. If they do not do so, their professions are of little value.

The debate which took place on Thursday in the Legislative Assembly on the resolution of Mr. Jayakar asking the Government of India to send instructions to all Provincial Governments to provide special facilities for the education of untouchables and other depressed classes and for opening all public services to them, throws much light on the real situation. Mr. Jayakar stated that one of his reasons for bringing up the resolution was to clear up the impression that Government were anxious to help the depressed classes but that they were prevented from doing so by the people. He called attention to the statement of the Punjab Government in reply to a question from a Hindoo member why untouchables were not enrolled in the Police, and urged that Government should not wait till all sections of the community agreed to accept untouchables on an equal footing to grant them equal opportunities of serving in all branches of the Public Service. J. J. Lajpat Rai was not content with the general recommendation contained in Mr. Jayakar's resolution, and moved an amend- ment demanding that a crore of rupees should be set apart for the special benefit of the depressed classes. He said that the sum was not too much in view of the fact that these classes were said to number 60 millions "a figure put up arbitrarily by Government for political exploitation." This was at once corrected by the Government spokesman, Mr. Bajpai, who said that their number was twenty-eight and a half millions and not sixty as has been loosely stated. Mr. Bajpai gave a very encouraging account of the progress made in education by children of these classes. Their number at school had increased by 100 percent, while of others had risen only by 33 per cent. He explained the special measures taken by the several Provincial Governments to advance these classes, and declared that all of these had been initiated by Ministers since the introduction of the reforms. There was a dramatic incident in the course of the debate. When Mr. Thakurdaas Bhardwaj, who said he was an orthodox Hindu, was speaking, an English member asked him if he would shake hands with an untouchable. Promptly came the answer: "I will even eat with him." Mr. Lajpat Rai's amendment was rejected, and Mr. J. Jayakar's motion with slight amendment was adopted by the Assembly. There is, no doubt, that the spirit of nationalism is fast possessing the mind of the Indian people, and it is the true solvent of class and communal inequalities. A larger measure of political initiative to the people will greatly accelerate the pace of social progress.
The Brahmo Samaj of Mangalore is a dynamic entity. It came into being as a result of an eloquent and a silent Socio-religious revolt of the unprivileged Hindas against the vested interests of Brahminism which by making religion a close-preserve had denied them the elementary consolation of worship. To the late Mr. Arsappa belongs all the honor of having laid the foundation of the Holy of Holies fifty-seven years ago and gathered within its broad expense the religionless, the islic, the Brahmans, and the religionless Brahminism which by making religion a close-preserve had denied them the elementary consolation of worship. some much-needed rest, Mr. of anonymous benefaction whenever cited into the work, the monumental Depressed Classes Mission.

The keynote of Mr. Ranga Rao’s lofty labors was his religion. Very early in his life, he sought the haven of Brahmosm from the parochial cult of Madras. Broadest of all broad churches, its plain ministry and its profound mysticism satisfied his soul and stirred up in him, what would otherwise have been vitiated, the desire to sacrifice his strength and his superiority secured by accident of birth for uplifting the weak and the lowly. In the name of the new faith, he first exemplified his household and his relations from the deadly operations of the early marriage regulation and in the teeth of biting alms allowed his three girl children to grow up into ideal maidenhood—the eldest of whom is Mrs. N. Subba Rao, the inspiration of the new womanhood of Mangelore, the second is the wife of Dr. Subbarayan, the Chief Minister to the Madras Government, the first Brahmin lady to break the hoary convention by marrying the non-Brahmin of her choice,—and the third a member of the Madras Educational Service who unlike other girls to whom marriage is something inevitable and not obligatory as it should be, remains in single blessedness. Under his guidance, all his relations and friends quickly followed his lead, so much so that before long he had the pleasure of seeing not only one but twenty more who took to the family life, and the peace and order of law.

It cannot be assimilated, It continues merely as something external. So it tends to come to grief, when it deals with internal affairs.

Mr. C. F. Andrews writes in the current number of "Foreign Affairs":

It is extremely difficult for people in England to understand that British rule in India constantly stands in the way of progressive social reform, acting as an obstruction. Yet so often has this happened of late, in practical experience, that most thoughtful Indians have bitterly come to the conclusion that without Swaraj being obtained, further social advance is almost hopeless. Even those who are most favourable to British rule are inclined to take this view, when questioned about the future relations of the two countries.

The tragedy of foreign Government, even when benevolent and efficient, is this, that it remains foreign. It cannot be assimilated. It continues merely as something external. So it tends to come to grief, when it deals with internal affairs.

Thus, while the rule of the foreigner may at times give the shock needed to startle into new activity a decaying social order, it cannot keep the inner life perpetually responsive. To take a convenient analogy, the injection of strychnine may stimulate the sinking patient, but an overdose of the same strychnine would be fatal.

Perhaps it was for this very reason, that John Stuart Mill characterized foreign rule as no rule at all, but only a kind of anarchy masquerading under the guise of Government. It lacks the primary requisite of growth, namely, organic assimilation.

Inevitable Misunderstandings

Since this aspect of foreign rule is not immediately apparent to those who view it from a distance, it may help readers in England if I give two illustrations that elucidate this lack of adaptability involving inevitable misunderstandings. The examples I take are extremely slight in themselves, but their consequences have been important.

The former of these happened twenty years ago, Lord Morley spoilt one of his finest speeches by calling Indians "natives". I can vividly remember, even today, the scene, when the leading professor in our college at Delhi read out in the Common Room Lord Morley’s words, giving a faint stress to the word “natives” wherever it occurred. There was a perceptible resentment on the part of all those who were present. The conciliatory object of Lord Morley in making that speech was altogether lost, though the college staff was not unkindly disposed. It is quite relevant to note, that this breach in modern etiquette in speech goes on quite unchecked in both House of Parliament, Lord Birkenhead commits the same offence to-day. No one takes the trouble to correct the offenders. Indians themselves say bitterly: “What can we expect. We are a subject people, and we must drink the cup of our humiliation to the dregs.”

Some illustrations, illustrating this misapprehension, may be of service in laying bare the nature of the misunderstanding.

Lord Morley held an address before the Missionary Society in 1882, when the leading professor in our college at Delhi read out in the Common Room Lord Morley’s words, giving a faint stress to the word “natives” wherever it occurred. There was a perceptible resentment on the part of all those who were present. The conciliatory object of Lord Morley in making that speech was altogether lost, though the college staff was not unkindly disposed. It is quite relevant to note, that this breach in modern etiquette in speech goes on quite unchecked in both House of Parliament, Lord Birkenhead commits the same offence to-day. No one takes the trouble to correct the offenders. Indians themselves say bitterly: “What can we expect. We are a subject people, and we must drink the cup of our humiliation to the dregs.”

ALBERT WILLIAMSON.
The second example is much more recent. It refers to Lord Birkenhead himself. Nothing was farther from his mind than to hurt the feelings of educated Indians at the very time when he wished to pacify them. Yet, reading his conciliatory speech, I could see at once that it bristled with provocations. He declared with unqualified conviction that he would never, never have omitted a re-presentative of the depressed classes, if Indians had been appointed to the Statutory Commission—blindly oblivious to the fact that when South African Dominion Status was granted, nothing whatever was done to represent the interests of the African natives, who are exactly parallel to the depressed classes in India. Indians are not slow in instituting comparisons, when hypocritical professions are made of a superior right- eness. Earl Winterton's speeches were equally provocative; but since he habitually indulges in haughty, offensive arrogance, nothing better was expected of him.

The net result of such speeches was to make the boycott of the Statutory Commission by all thoughtful patriots more certain than ever. This lack of intimate contact between the two countries paralyzes; high statesmanship can hardly exist in such a medium. The foreign rulers, realizing that they are disliked, try to rule cautiously. They lose that courage which is necessary for great enterprises of reform. The one outstanding act in India, where such reform was accomplished, was the abolition of Sati, or widow burning, owing to Lord Bentinck's cooperation with Raja Ram Mohan Roy. But this was due to the happy coincidence of two remarkable personalities. It was rather the exception that proves the rule.

PLAYING FOR SAFETY.

The normal routine, which has become a rigid convention, is for the foreign ruler in all social matters to "play for safety." He dodges the plain issue, fearing an upheaval. A Mustafa Kemal Ghazi can carry out sweeping social changes, because his hand is on the pulse of the people over whom his sway is almost absolute. He is their hero and supreme patriot. But a Viceregal, however noble-minded, is rather like a suspected enemy, who comes over from England to exploit India's weaknesses. This suspicion of British rule in India has become deep as life itself, and even noble acts come under its misname.

It has been my daily experience for nearly a quarter of a century to watch the course of events in India, with an eager longing for advance in humanitarian directions. Every day my own conviction—slowly and painfully formed—has grown stronger, that the rule of the foreigner is now definitely standing in the way of healthy social reform. Even with the very imperfect Legislative Councils, under the Reform Act of 1919, progress has been far more rapid than under the autocracy which preceded. But it has not been rapid enough; and the official vote is continually given for reaction. It has been a commonplace of these recent years to watch the British Government in India relying for its support on those nominated and elected members who stand out for black conservatism without progress. Government officials have been told to go into the lobby side by side with these conservative reactionaries.

A CRUCIAL QUESTION.

It may be asked, in criticism of what I have written, whether the depressed classes themselves would stand to gain or to lose under Swaraj. This is a crucial question. Unhesitatingly I would say that to-day the strongest forces working for their emancipation are to be found outside Government circles. By far the most powerful movement for their upliftment is the National Movement. If the British rule were to cease to-morrow, the depressed classes would at once be brought into the foreground of the national programme. Japan was able partly to solve its own "untouchable" problem, because it had the matter in its own hands from the very first. But in India the spirit of reform is continually defeated by a lagged administration. While writing this, I am not unmindful of the fact that the rule of law in India, without respect of persons, has been one of the most persistent causes of whatever upliftment has already been made. But here again the evil of foreign rule is apparent because the one person who claims exemption and privilege under the law is the foreigner himself.

All that I have tried to state cannot be reason out here. But what may carry conviction is the fact that the conclusions I have reached have been against the natural bent of my own mind, when I first came out to India many years ago.

THE DEAD HAND.

I can see that I have left three vital questions almost without a direct answer:—

(1) Will the acknowledged social evils, which have grown up along with the whole caste system, especially those relating to child marriage and widow re-marriage, be remedied more quickly under Swaraj, or will their removal be retarded?

(2) Will the purdah system, leading to the unhealthy seclusion of women among the higher classes, especially in Northern India, be brought more quickly to an end under Swaraj, or will it be strengthened?

(3) Will the existing absence of elementary rights of justice and civil freedom, noticeable in many of the Indian States, be relieved more speedily under Swaraj, or will its area increase?

My own personal experience has been that all these necessary changes are being retarded rather than accelerated under the present system of Government. It is true a slight "speeding up" immediately appeared, when the semblance of Swaraj was given under the Reform Councils. But the unsatisfactory and half-hearted character of those reforms soon led to the very real and ablest Indian statesmen giving them up, after having tried them, as being essentially unworkable. That initial impulse, which promised to lead to something, has now died away; and the suspicion of British rule has darkened every prospect. One of the finest members of the Indian Civil Service said to me: "The best that can be said for Dyarchy is this; it is absolutely impossible to continue it. By its very nature it drives us forward to something more responsible." The greatest of all hindrances to rapid social progress to-day is the almost complete lack of confidence between the rulers and the ruled. In such an unhealthy atmosphere no thoroughly healthy social reform is possible.
The more practical way of handling the problem is to go to the root of the matter by tackling the question of child marriages which really brought about co-habitation at an early age." I may here state that I am against declaring marriages contravening the Bill invalid. I would insert in it the penal provisions as in the Bombay Bill of 1887 or in our Bill by Dr. S. Muthulakshmi whether it is a 'Child Marriage Bill' or an 'Age of Consent Bill'; both must contain a penal clause punishing the parties who bring about such unions. To use the words in the memorial, the question is, which provision would "be found (more) difficult to enforce." The Mahasabha must admit that marriage is an act which is made public as soon as it takes place; and that consummation can take place without its being known to anyone besides the two parties to it. I personally know of three cases where such consummation took place in secret, and was known only when the girls were in an advanced state of pregnancy. Even assuming it is known soon after it takes place, how can it be proved when a prosecution is launched without a medical examination of the girl? And is the Mahasabha prepared to support such examinations? The bride has to go to her husband's house on various occasions; and the chances of their husbands meeting them are frequent. Owing to the segregation of boys from girls from childhood, the knowledge of sex relations is very negligible among us. Such is the fear of our law-givers that it is enjoined that even a brother and sister must not be together alone. How can our boys thus brought up, with their heads filled with sexual relationships contained in trash novels so widely read and with ideas got from cinema films, exercises any control over their passions, when they have the chance of meeting their child wives? Once the havoc now being caused by early consummations is admitted, the only proper remedy lies in the way of prohibiting early marriages. An 'Age of Consent Act' is bound to be a dead letter; a 'Child Marriage Act' is very likely to be a success and affords the only remedy.

The cry that religion is in danger is a myth. Do the Sastras anywhere say that marriages after puberty are invalid? There is an express statement in Manu to the effect that if a Brahmin is not invested with the sacred thread before his 16th year, he loses his right to wear it? Is there a provision to the effect that a girl forfeits her right to get married, once she attains puberty? The Catholic Church also views marriage as a sacrament and so there is nothing peculiar in our Sastras taking the same view. Even assuming for one moment that a Sastric direction is violated, humanity requires that there should be a transgression. How many other Sastric injunctions are Brahmins violating and why not add one more to it for the sake of checking a social cancer? The memorial, although emanating from the Brahman Mahasabha, speaks for all Hindus, and how such a right is arrogated is not clear." It is well-known that Brahmis, who make a living by officiating at and partaking of dakshina and free feeding given at marriages, are being exploited to raise a cry by telling them that the effect of the Bill would be to diminish the number of marriages during the next 7 to 10 years. It is a sign of the times that the other two twice born castes, and Hindus in general have not joined in this cry.
THE PUBLIC SCHOOL SCHEME.

The Benares correspondent of the Tribune reports the following debate—The Education Week and the Education Exhibition which have been organised under the auspices of the Teachers' Training College, Benares, were opened amid a representative gathering of ladies and gentlemen by Mr. V. N. Mibha, I. C. S., Collector, and District Magistrate, Benares, on the 13th instant. An interesting debate took place yesterday afternoon on the following subject:

"That, in the opinion of the House, India does not need the Public School proposed by the Hon'ble Mr. S. R. Das."

Prof. P. Seshadri presided. A large number of ladies and gentlemen, both Indian and Europeans, attended the function.

Rev. B. D. Deane in moving the proposition said: "In the first place, an English Public School with a foreigner as Headmaster is inconceivable, so that the scheme to employ an English Headmaster defeats from the very first the hope of creating a true copy of an English Public School. Even an assistant master in an English Public School if he is a foreigner, as for instance the French Master, gets well "ragged." If the true public school atmosphere is present in the proposed school, then there will be little chance of the foreign staff escaping their share of "ragging" as in England. India does not need this type of "Khichri" School, and to establish an institution that is a close copy of a Public school in spirit and tone a far larger foreign staff than that proposed would be necessary, and that would be most unwelcome in the general state of present day political feeling, and offensive to National self-respect. Furthermore, Public Schools are fed by the so-called "Preparatory Schools," schools run by private venture, with small numbers and high fees. From what sources the proposed school is to be fed, is not mentioned by the Hon'ble Mr. S. R. Das. Yet they are an essential part of an English Public School system. It is doubtful if India can supply men for superintendence of the boarding houses at the present stage. And yet boarding schools in every land are in danger of becoming sinks of moral looseness, unless there be great sympathy and thorough vigilance on the part of the house master. The dangers in India are not less than in England in this respect. This, however, is only a question of time.

"What Indian parents do need is a first class institution, the name of which carries prestige, and which will give a boy a start in life; equal to that of an English boy, a school near home and where Indian food is served and Indian friendships are formed, and all this along lines suited to the genius of India.

"Finally the proposed school is not wanted because it cannot supply the united religious atmosphere which is so characteristic of the Public School Chapel. The foreign Headmaster will have to suppress his religious ideals in dealing with boys of another faith than his. The result of this on those who are to be our future leaders will be to increase the materialistic, visionless atmosphere already spoiling our present education.

"In conclusion, the real need is for steady growth and development of present institutions by the generosity of benefactors and the self-denials of the teaching profession, by experiments and the formation of sound traditions and high standards. Along these lines any one of our present institutions may attain a position ever superior to the position of an English Public School."

Mr. H. R. Venal opposed the motion. She wondered at the position adopted by the Rev. Deane with regard to the public school scheme of Mr. Das. She did not look upon the scheme as one providing English needs to the Indian boys but one which would satisfy Indian needs as English public schools did in England. It was not satisfactory to send Indian boys to English Schools because they would not be able to appreciate English atmosphere and would come back filled with feelings and spirit which would satisfy English conditions of life only. But it was desirable to turn out Indians as Indians and not Indians as Englishmen. The present era was a great constructive era and therefore was an opportune time for the creation of a public school.

It was difficult to describe public school spirit. However, public school was always independent of "Party Politics" and was independent of State control. The training in citizenship and moulding of a youth's character on the right lines were the most difficult tasks before a Modern School and can be best given effect to by a Public School only. Therefore there should be at least one model school established in India in which all the conditions of a Public School should be secured. In this school boys would attain a standard of excellence which would enable them to play the part of leaders in various activities of the country. An attempt would be made here to remove the barrier of caste, creed and colour. The School would form within itself an atmosphere of one life and one common humanity, which would lend such influence as would be most beneficial to the students in the practical walk of life.

With regard to the controversy of the Headmaster in the scheme of Mr. Das she said that an Englishman was suggested to be appointed as a matter of expediency in the beginning but if an Indian was found out she had no objection to his being appointed. Concluding she said that instruction should be imparted through English but vernaculars should be made compulsory.

Prof. Puntambekar in supporting the motion delivered a vigorous speech during the course of which he emphasised that the factory type of education with foreign spirit all round it would not be suited to Indian conditions as had been suggested in the scheme of Mr. Das. The idea behind the scheme seemed to be to recruit men for Public Services from this School. The whole scheme was naturally wrong and if given effect to would denationalise the cause of education. Dr. Jadunath Prasad supported the motion. His contention was that even in England the Public Schools required overhauling and there was a feeling against these schools, Mr. Ramchandra Shukla opposed the motion.

After some further discussion in which opinions for and against the motion were put forward, the motion was put to vote and declared carried by an overwhelming majority.

Prof. Seshadri in expressing his opinion on the question said that the past history of public schools in India did not support the cause of any more attempts being made in that direction. The Rajkumar Colleges in India were failures and the influence of education which these schools imparted was demoralising and did more harm than good to the country. He was emphatically of opinion that no such School as has been proposed by Mr. Das should be established but the money collected so far for the purpose should be distributed among the schools preferably at Benares.

After a vote of thanks to the Chair the function terminated.

THE DELHI PROHIBITION CONVENTION.

The Prohibition League of India which was founded in New Delhi on January 80th 1926, held its first biennial session on Saturday the 18th February in the Y. M. C. A., New Delhi but owing to an important Assembly debate the Chairman Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas could not be present to deliver his inaugural address which has been postponed till next day's meeting and the Honorary General Secretary, the Rev. Herbert Anderson presented his report for the past year and some not very important matter was discussed.

The Secretary in his address said that the League though not having achieved very much in the way of total prohibition had distinctly shown its need and value in three directions. Firstly it has kept before the public the fact that prohibition is a religious, social and moral question touching Indian life in every direction; secondly it has been of value in giving prominence to the fact that the present arrangements in the excise administration of both the Imperial and provincial Governments are unsatisfactory though based upon a desire to prevent the evils of excess, actually protect the liquor traffic from the will of the country as a whole and thirdly the value of the leagues' work during the past two years is evidenced in the strong opposition it has aroused. Forty-one associations have been affiliated to the league and although there are some that have not as yet joined owing to financial or other difficulties, the present membership includes every large and important organisation in the provinces of Madras, Bengal, Bombay, the Punjab and the U. P. and such inter-provincial temperance associations as the W.C.T.U. and the I.O.G.T. He then briefly discussed the position in the provinces and Indian States crediting Bombay with leadership in an avowed prohibition ideal. The C. P. and Berar province next and the Madras Province next. Of the Indian States he said the Bhavnagar State was a prohibition state and one of the few that preferred Indian to British means of excise administration while Bhopal having lost Rs. 15 lakhs of revenue in five years to the benefit of neighbouring States had replaced prohibition with regulation.

The Secretary read a message from Lord Cley that the President of the Anglo-Indian Temperance Association of London expressed that the association though ceasing its activities in 1929 will however function as consultative body to the League here.

Other items of interest were that Dr. Herode of Lucknow the president of the Anglo-Indian Temperance Association of London expressed that the association though ceasing its activities in 1929 will however function as consultative body to the League here.

The meeting for today concluded with the Executive Committee desiring to place on record its clear and considered judgment that the total prohibition of traffic in alcoholic liquors and poisonous drugs should be the goal of the excise policy of the Imperial Government, all provincial Governments and the Governments of the Indian states. Keeping in view the difficulties of the introduction of a national policy of prohibition, a period of ten years is sufficient, in the opinion of the Executive Committee in which to introduce the necessary changes in policy for the accomplishment of that end.

Continuing their second session on the 19th the delegates of the Prohibition League of India were welcomed at the Massey Hall, Y. M. C. A., New Delhi by Dr. S. W. Shirreff who as a medical man said modern science was hastening towards a complete agreement with prohibitonist views on the detrimental value of alcohol as a beverage. It was a poison from which India detained immunity.

PRERIDENTIAL ADDRESS.

Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas in his presidential address said that watching the serious expansion of the liquor revenue at Bombay he had been some years ago a strong prohibitionist and his determination to help that cause was strengthened when in England by his connection with the Anglo-Indian Temperance Association and his president Lord Cley. In India where millions of the inhabitants are total abstainers, to the shame of the Government of India, the most serious difficulty is the revenue consideration. This has prospered in proportion to the degradation of the drinkers.

GOVERNMENT SHAME.

It is now time to call a halt and the first legitimate demand of the prohibitionists throughout India, both to the Imperial and provincial Governments that there should be no further expansion of excise revenue.

Their second demand was that the Central Government must come to terms with the provincial Governments towards a common goal of regulation and restriction with an ultimate view to total prohibition. A sane, sound, well thought-out policy is overdue if the present strong complaint against the Government is to go. The great illiterate masses must not be faced with the temptation to drink thrust upon them as it seems to be to-day.

THE EXAMPLE OF BHAVNAGAR.

The history of prohibition in the state of Bhavnagar where the Raja and the Dewas have succeeded in setting an example to all Indian states and British India too has shown the splendid social benefits of a policy that refused to put temptation in the way of its people.

Sir Purushottamdas appealed to the many friends of the movement to see that it was more worthily financed and more heartily supported.

After the presidential address the meeting elected its officers and an Executive Committee for 1928-29, adopted the financial statement, referred its draft local option bill to the affiliated societies and transacted necessary business.

The public gatherings, two yesterday and two to-day, have been large and enthusiastic and although political excitement over the Simon Commission interfered somewhat with the meeting, the League continues its work in a spirit of hopefulness.

AN APPEAL TO THE CONGRESS AND CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The present Immigration Law of the United States contains a clause which excludes all Asians. Interpreting the provisions of this law, courts have cancelled the naturalization papers of Indians who had renounced their British citizenship and received papers giving citizenship in the United States. As a result, three persons—approximately 45 in number—have become stateless persons. We believe that the cancellation of the naturalization papers of those, who in good faith have been admitted to American citizenship, is an outstanding national wrong which has done inconsiderable injury to America's moral influence in India and the East. In the interest of national good faith we urge the United States Congress to take immediate steps to restore American citizenship to this group.

We believe that the very existence of the Asiatic exclusion clause is an unnecessary racial discrimination. Restriction of immigration is justifiable provided it is fair. The application of the quota basis to Oriental countries would restrict immigration from those countries to so small a number as to constitute neither a social nor an economic problem. On the other hand, our intimate knowledge of India lead us to believe that the selective process applied to her applicants would add a valuable contribution to the life and culture of the United States. In view of the effect of such discriminatory legislation on racial relations throughout the world we feel that it is our duty to protest against the exclusion clauses.

As American citizens in the Orient we feel the gravest concern for the international position of our country. So long as the Congress does not enact remedial legislation, both in the case of the small groups that have been disfranchised, and in the matter of oriental exclusion in general, we cannot successfully repudiate the charges of insincerity in our national professions of equality of opportunity. We strongly protest against the discriminatory clauses, as we consider them a violation of good faith and of international ethics, an affront to the people of India, and a source of deep racial resentment and antagonism. They are therefore a violation of Christian principles which we hold to be the surest guide in international relations.

We urge the substitution for the oriental exclusion clauses of such legislation as shall apply without unfair discrimination to every people, granting privileges of citizenship in the United States to those who duly qualify regardless of race, creed, colour or nationality.

Signed,

The above signatories will be very glad to furnish any further information that may be required by citizens of the United States. Enquiries may be directed to Mr. D. F. McClelland, Young Men's Christian Association, Esplanade Madras.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The Maharaja of Nabha: The Foreign and Political Department have issued the following communiqué regarding the Maharaja of Nabha:—Under the conditions whereby the Maharaja Ripudaman Singh, now known as Maharaja Gurucharan Singh was permitted to sever his connection with the Nabha State he undertook to remain loyal to the Government. It was expressly laid down at the same time that in the event of his failing to act accordingly, the Government reserved the right to modify or annul the other conditions, attaching to his severance from the State. From the evidence in their possession the Government of India are satisfied that Maharaja Gurucharan Singh has repeatedly taken part in disloyal activities since his departure from Nabha. He has been clearly warned of the consequences which a continuance of such conduct would entail, but this warning has been without effect. The Government of India have accordingly been compelled to pass orders that he shall be deprived of the title of Maharaja and of all rights and privileges pertaining thereto, that his allowance be cut down from Rs. 25,000 to Rs. 0,000 a month and that he shall, until further notice, take up his residence at Kodainallur in the Madras presidency. His son Tikha Sahib who becomes Maharaja in his stead will be formally installed on the gadi of Nabha at the earliest opportunity.
TheSimon Commission and the Assembly;
In the Assembly Lala Lajpat Rai's resolution urging boyc cott of the Simon Commission was carried by 68 against 62 votes. An interesting post is revealed by an analysis of the division list on Lala Lajpat Rai's resolution. 137 took part in the voting and 2 remained neutral, namely Mr. Kabibuddin Ahmed (non-party) and Sir Victor Sassoou (European group), while three who attended the session, but were absent at the time of voting were Mr. Parooon (Swarajist), Mavri Muhammed Yalub, Deputy President (Independent), and Mr. Abdul Haye (Independent). Eight members have dnot attended the present session of the Assembly. The majority to-day consisted of 67 elected non-officials and one nominated non-official, Mr. N. M. Joshi. Analysed on communal lines it was composed as follows: Hindus 51, Muslims 14, Sikhs 2 and Buddhists 1. The minority consisted of 26 officials and 36 non-official members, of whom 13 were nominated non-officials and 23 elected non-officials, the latter consisting of 12 Muslim elected members, 9 Europeans, and 2 Hindu elected members namely Sir Hari Singh Gour and Raja Hargobind Prasad. Commenting on this the Indian Daily Mail writes:—"Attempts to minimise the signicance of the overwhelming victory of the popular side in the Legislature on the ground that there was but a small majority of six votes will not bear scrutiny.
Indeed an analysis of the voting, and the circumcstances characterising the atmosphere of the debate clearly show that the victory is a real triumph for the non-officials. It shows also, as nothing else could have done, that on the question of the Statutory Commission the various political parties are completely united, whatever their differences on other matters. The voting on the resolution was 68 for and 62 against.
The fictitious nature of the Government's strength in the Assembly is easily ascertained. Of the 62 votes which they gained 25 were those of officials, 14 of the European members and about a dozen of nominated members. The 25 votes of the official members should as a matter of equity, be treated as but a single vote for those members are there to record their votes for the Government on any and every question.

Christian Missions in India: With reference to the letter which we publish to-day from Mr. Raghunath Row who writes from Geneva, we may say that Christian missions of the present day, at least in this country, are, with several exceptions, as a class, distinctly sympathetic to Indian nationalism. The exceptions are survivals from a past vanishing past, and are even now a not very influential minority. Many Christian missionaries, if we judge rightly, have become extremely sceptical about the method of organised proselytism as followed hitherto being the best or most desirable means of spreading the Christian influence amongst non-Christian peoples. They also realise that the profession of Christianity is often accompanied by the practical repudiation of Christ, and that the Christian nations of today are more heavily than some non-Christian races. Serious religious thinkers among Christians and non-Christians find to an increasing extent that while Christianity divides Christ himself, it is reconciling the nations and communities. The greatest influence for good in the future will be exercised by men of this class, and we think it is an influence altogether beneficial to the country. Mr. J. P. Andrews is the ideal missionary of Christ, though in order to become that, he had to renounce his character as an ordained clergyman of the Christian Church. We are, therefore, in entire agreement with Mr. Raghunath Row in thinking that India should not look at missionaries as a dispensable factor in her national life. If we had a hundred Andrews among us, our national progress would go forward with a thousand-fold greater velocity.

Amnesty and the Philippines: We take the following from the World Tomorrow, the well-known New York review. The observations have a deep significance for us in India as well: "And as the people of Nicaragua go to Managua, we congratulate Colonel Simon on the public spirit which prompted him to accept as difficult a mission. He has our best wishes and is likely to be in need of sympathy before many months. If he satisfies Washington, he is sure to be unpopular in the Island, as there is an irreconcilable difference between the policy of the present Administration and the desire of the Filipinos for complete independence. We have long maintained that the chief barrier to Filipino independence is the widespread conviction in this country that we are now governing these people better than they could do it. At least, that is the reason the American people give to themselves. Perhaps they are self-deceived. It may be that rubber and naval bases are the real reasons for prolonging American rule. But human beings usually cower self-interest with a cloak of idealism. It is so much more satisfying to seek personal gain when one is convinced that thereby mankind is being blessed. We repeat what we have said many times, that self-government is preferable to externally imposed good government. We hope that the new Governor General will throw the weight of his influence on the side of progressive self-government leading to complete independence for the Filipinos at an early date."

Kanarese in Bombay: Mr. S. D. Nadkarni in the letter which we publish to-day maintains that the Kanarese are a language with some other language allied to Marathi. He refers to a letter which he wrote to us in 1926 but we may refer him to the letter in which we cited our authority. Mr. S. M. Edwards (quoted by Mr. Malabari in his "Bombay in the making"), who was a student of old Bombay history, wrote that as a Bombay Consultation dated January 31, 1670 a Code of Laws was ordered to be drawn up, "But it is worth noting," Mr. Malabari adds, "that these laws were ordered to be translated into Portuguese and Kanarese. The reference given to Kanarese over the other vernaculars then in vogue in Bombay is explained by Mr. Edwards by the fact "that the early populations of these islands was in a large extent of some other Dravidian origin." We may add that Mr. Edwards knew the differences between Kanarese and Konkani, and, further, that the figures sculptured in temples have their counterparts in Bomh India, though their vogue has long ceased in Western India.

A Lady Member in the U. P. Council: We commend the action of the U. P. Government in nominating a lady member to the vacancy that occurred recently in the Legislative Council. Mr. E. Ahmed, a nominated member, representing the Indian Christian community resigned his membership as he was leaving for Europe. Mrs. Ahmed Shab, the wife of the member, was nominated to the vacancy. The United Provinces is the first State to enjoy the distinction of having a lady member in its Legislative Council. For at least some time to come, until they are well-organized, the only entry opened to women to legislative chambers is through the door of nomination. The U. P. Government have done well to recognize this fact which has been ignored by the Governments of the so-called advanced provinces. The presence of a lady member in the council besides serving to keep the many questions affecting women in the forefront will inspire the women to do and dare. While welcoming Mrs. Ahmed Shah's nomination, we wish to point out that the task before her is clear. Women's education is still in its infancy in the pr.vince, and the lady director must work to direct it towards its improvement and expansion. Then again the twin evils of purdah and conunduriam, which are serious impediments to girls' education, should be removed by legislation.

Lady Sadasiva Iyer: The Indian Ladies Samaj, an association for the protection of the minor girls of the Devadasi community, was founded in 1924. The triennial report recently issued pays a warm tribute to Lady Sadasiva Iyer as the president of the Ladies Committee of the Association. The report says: "Lady Sadasiva Iyer, as the President of that Committee, has been the moving spirit of the association and directed the work with so much devotion and ability that her previous development has inspired courage, confidence and hope in the minds of the younger generation as to its future prospects and usefulness to the Hindu Society. Lady Sadasiva Iyer regards the cause of social reform has been based on love and sympathy, her tender and noble heart has been deeply touched by the sufferings and the degraded position of one section of the women population in this unfortunate land. She, as a good and pure woman having enjoyed the full benefit of an organised and a happy family life, has extended her helping hand to those deprived and fallen, not in a spirit of condolence, not with an air of superiority, but in that consciousness of a woman helping another of her sex who has been placed in an unfortunate position not of her own individual choice, not of her own free will but by the pernicious custom of the land and the unjust manumition of the Hindu Society. Let us also, sisters, inherit that spirit from that queen amongst women. Let us educate women as we call ourselves, many of whom being lacking in quality, take it in steps, take it in steps from her noble example and walk in her footsteps."

Anti-Indian Propaganda: It is usually found that propaganda of the nature carried on by the Christian missionaries is carried on in the West through every possible medium. In the December issue of the Medical Women's Journal, an internal and medical publication, contains accounts by two women physicians about child marriage, child birth and social corruption in India. The article in question is written in the vein of Miss Mayo's book but the conclusion which we quote below is interesting as it shows up the motive underlying it: "D. orbs are needed everywhere; nurses are needed; some one is needed to come out and devote her life to the training of these young women, and in teaching the people the danger of early and of dirty, and to try to prevent these children from being married when they are so small, and trying to bring forth before they are fitted by nature for this task."

We are further informed that the article contains an account of the good work carried on at Fatehgarh by the lady director of an agency staff, and that an appeal is made to the women in America who have had training to come to India to help in the work. Here is a splendid opportunity for the superwoman of the West.

The Baroda Marriage Bill: Mr. Nagindas Amulkhatri writes to the Bombay Chronicle: I have gone through the provisions of Child Marriage Prevention Amendment Bill of the Baroda State and I have come to the conclusion that it is most disappointing to a very large majority of the people. They believe that the law will not be an advantage to them unless unless the measure has been directly brought home to them. Hence and the silence in the matter on their part should not be taken as a consent to the Bill. Silence on their part is due to the people I am sure, is due to the people being disinterested in the measure as if it is not intended to be of any good to the people it is passed as it is. Provision of fine only for marriages of girls between 10 and 14 and of boys between 14 and 18 is meaningless. People mostly spending hundreds and thousands of rupees on each marriage will take pride in avoiding the law by payment of Rs. 100 if found guilty or on payment of bribe to the crime investigators and, therefore, by this provision the amending Bill will meet the same fate as the Samvat year 1920 Act has met. It is absolutely essential that no more, at least 24 hours impounding be done. It is only for the New Act for marriages of girls between 10 and 14 and boys between 14 and 18 to carry out the object of the Act, and if huge caste Clauses are to be prohibited for marriages of girls between 14 and boys under 18. As at present framed, the measure is considered by almost all right-thinking persons as if the State is some 50 years back taking into consideration Laws on his subject of Mary Rajot. Limbdi, Indore and other States. I believe, I am expressing the views of the mass of the people when I say that all marriages of girls under 14 and boys under 18 years of age should be made null and void. I request all right-thinking persons to protest against the present provision with a view to make it appropriate to the year 1924 A.D.

The Poona Seva Sadan Society: The wonderful progress made by the Poona Seva Sadan Society is recorded in the annual report published recently. The rapid growth and expansion that all the members of the institution are put up to the proof that if the women of India are backward, it is entirely due to lack of facilities. Many men and women activities are all carried on under an active and efficient direction and special importance is attached to social service. It is interesting to learn from the report that the institution had sent out more than 350 workers trained by itself, through the Presidency and outside, after securing for its own work at various centres women trained by itself entirely at its cost. In order that the women from castes can take full advantage of the Society's many activities, the Society opened branches at Baranati, Satara, Ahmednagar, Sholapur, Bombay, Alibag, Nasik, Nagpur and Guigar and conducts classes and classes at Daulat Waq, Indore and other places. Another hindrance of benefit that all the activities taken by the Society is the help required to the poor and the sick by the free distribution of milk, medicine and clothes. We hope the appeal for funds issue, by the Society will receive enthusiastic response from all quarters. It testifies to the popularity and also to the non-sectarian character of the institution that it has been receiving help from Government and private contributions as well as from all sections of the community and the lay public. In short, we once more associate ourselves wholeheartedly in its request to all men and women, whatever their means may be, to render such help as lies within their power and thus help to lighten the burden of Society.
CONVERSION AND MARRIAGE.

The ex-Maharaja of Indore's resolve to marry an American lady as his third wife while his two previous wives are alive, has raised three questions bearing on Hindu social and religious ideas. Can a Hindu contract a valid marriage with a non-Hindu? Can a non-Hindu be converted to Hinduism so as to be eligible for a valid Hindu marriage with a Hindu? These are the two main questions. The third is, can a Hindu take a second or third wife in the lifetime of his first wife? The question whether a Hindu, remaining a Hindu, can contract a valid marriage with a non-Hindu, has been raised more than once but, so far as we know, it has not been definitely settled. In one case several years ago, a Hindu who married an English woman while he was studying in England, subsequently tried to get out of the marriage by pleading that as a Hindu he could not get a valid marriage with an English woman who was moreover a Christian. A case for alimony was instituted in a British Court, but friends intervened before it came up for trial, and arranged a compromise. In another recent and very similar case, a similar plea was not upheld by an Indian Court and the husband, who believed, was ordered to pay an allowance to his English wife. There is a case now pending in India in which a Hindu ruling Prince is reported to have refused to give the same plea. Public opinion in this country has never looked with favor on attempts to get a marriage declared null and void on this ground. The ancient Hindu lawgivers threw the cloak of legality over every possible union between a man and a woman, even including what we should now call race, in their great anxiety to safeguard the legitimacy of the progeny. When the man—because it is the man who has most often raised the point—and woman enter conjugal relations into the woman, he certainly intended and led the latter to believe that they were entering into a legal relation. It should not be open to him after living with a woman as his wife for some time, to raise the plea that he was not legally married to her. The crux of the matter is the belief in the mind of the woman at the time of marriage. If Hindu law forbids the marriage of a Hindu with a non-Hindu, a Hindu who does the forbidden act, ceases to be a Hindu, and must, according to every consideration of equity, be held to have married the woman according to the law governing her. He cannot be allowed to claim the protection of his religion from the consequences of an act which he did wantonly in violation of its precepts and which has had the effects of changing the status of the woman.

But does Hindu law and practice forbid conversion of non-Hindus? We are not aware of any Hindu organised proselytising mission having existed at any time, though even the Vedas make reference to Rishis who established themselves as pioneers in lands which lay beyond the territories of the Aryans. In fact, Ashrams of the Brahmins often brought in their train the political expansion of Hinduism as the result of the social and religious assimilation by the outward tribes of the teachings and practices recommended by the religious pioneers. Within historic times, Greeks, Scythians and many alien peoples were taken into the fold of Hinduism. In fact, until the Mahabharata penetration of the country, Hinduism re-awakened many alien elements to its sacrileges. Even the Jews and Syrian Christians who settled in the country centuries before the rise of Islam, became Hinduised in all but their religious ritual. The process of admission was facilitated by the fact that each new group became a caste by itself, autonomous in all respects, and without producing any change in the internal economy of other castes. The method, in fact, was very similar to that of the British Commonwealth of nations, which may be called the political or autocratic part of the Hindu social commonwealth of caste.

In the present case, the American lady if accepted by the Dhanger caste, to which the Hokari belongs, will ipso facto become a Hindu, entitled in all respects to the rights of members of that caste. It may be mentioned that the Maharaja's second wife was similarly admitted to that caste before her marriage. Incidentally, it may be pointed out as an illustration of the democratic element in the caste system that the Maharaja's social position is subject to the rules of his caste in the admission of which the poorest man has the same votes as the wealthiest and most high-placed individual.

It is evident in the present case that his caste has raised objections to the admission of the American lady and it is, therefore, apparently thought better to have her conversion performed by a Shankaracharya who, however, has no authority to admit her into the Dhanger caste.

The third question is whether a Hindu is allowed to take a second or third wife during the life of the first wife? The answer is, he is, but subject to certain strict conditions, the best-known of which is if the first wife has not borne him a child, more particularly a son. Even then he could, under the strict letter of the law, marry again only with the consent of the first wife. These wholesome qualifications, however, have fallen into disuse, and the Hindu law as administered by the Courts, recognises a general and absolute right on the part of a Hindu male to contract polygamous marriages. The ancient Hindu law did not certainly contemplate a second marriage when a man had a son by his first wife. But, as we said, the wholesome restrictions of the law have become obsolete, and a Maharaja, especially when he is a ruler, can do much what he likes.

The Government of India at first would not recognise the marriage, but it subsequently changed its mind. The proposed third marriage is not approved by many people. But there are some who regard it, as the Shankaracharya of Kurukshetra does, as "a crushing reply to Miss Mayo." It is, however, also to be feared that the only result of Hindus refusing to accept the American lady, might be lead to the parties embroiling Islam as the only other means of having their marriage performed.
THE TASK OF THE SIMON COMMISSION.

(By Mr. Raghubir Narain Rowl.)

Some of my American friends have drawn my attention to the following passage in the dispatch of the London correspondent of the New York Times on the eve of the Simon Commission's sailing from England. It appears in the issue of January 20th of that paper: "In the background in England will be merchant and industrial interests--who hold that the experiment in modified home rule shows disastrous results and hope the Commission will recommend limitation. Their views are shared by the Anglican Church Missionaries who seem to feel that an Occidental bureaucracy is impractical when administered by Orientals. Conformist Missionaries differ, particularly on the wisdom of giving the Indians control of the educational system, 'Moslem and Hindu graduates from our schools have frequently devoted their talents in Indian Legislatures to curtail our religious teaching' is the way one leader phrases it." Obviously the author of this dispatch is unaware of education being in the list of transferred subjects and of the decision of an Indian Church. Possibly he is thickening of his reader's prejudices and participates in them himself. Considering that this is so and also that Americans make a great point of withholding the control of the education department from falling into the hands of the Filipinos it is needless to attach any serious significance to the above remarks. But it raises the important question of the relations of foreign missionaries with Eastern States. That is a topic of the hour not only with us but also in China, Japan, and Turkey. In the last mentioned country it is of the important and powerful missionary interests and the Government's earnest desire to acquire the goodwill of the United States, the policy of making every educational institution adobe to the State regulations is strictly exercised. I had occasion to take part recently in a meeting addressed at Geneva by the Secretary of the Institute of Pacific Relations (to whose Congress Sir Frederick Whyte went lately) and he said that the missionary question was one of the outstanding issues in the Far East to-day. To the eager enquiry of a Quaker girl as to whether the large number of American missionaries who had left China would return, this American's reply was: "Many of them won't, fortunately." Because, the political complications they unnecessarily bring into the situation had so wearied him. I have had personally some experience of the Protestant missionaries at least, in India, and during my stay in Europe I have welcomed every opportunity of contacting this excellent body of workers. I would add if I may that I should like to acknowledge gratuitously the greater understanding of life which not only Christ's teachings but also the mysteries of the Christian Religion have brought me, though I am technically a non-Christian. In viewing this problem, on account of Christianity as an influence against evil, on account of the Indian Christians amongst us, and the large amount of first rate humanitarian work which the missionaries do in India, we may not look at it as a dispensable factor.

The persons quoted by the American journalist are probably survivors of a previous age, but if Christian countries will send us cultural ambassadors, we are entitled to look forward to having adequately qualified persons. After first hand knowledge of a large number of Christian organisations out in the west my conclusion is that here also the West does not give us its best.

REFLECTIONS.

(By 'Rationalist')

1.—ON A "RELIGIOUS" LAMP-POST.

"The essence of religion is that it functions differently in different minds. It is as well that it does so, because it makes tolerance imperative, and without tolerance the religious life of any country must become an impediment to progress." Thus a contributor recently in these columns. The article was a plea for keeping "Religion and Politics" apart, and with its motif no thoughtful reader could disagree. But on reading the two above sentences in it I was reminded of a joke which a picnic party enjoyed some years back. Our boat was moored at night near the "ghost" (landing-place) of a riverside village. On top of the "ghost," in the middle of the road leading to the village, a lamp-post was standing, jagged and ant-eaten, supporting a lantern from whose cob-web-covered glass-panes a few dim reddish sprinkles of light struggled out, making the darkness around and the shadow beneath the post all the more dense by the contrast. One of the party struck by the scene wondered what else was the lamp so shabbily kept. Another answered: "Oh, don't you see? The lamp must be burning just to warn passer-by off the post, lest they run their heads against it." In other words, the lamp was there for the sake of the post (to warn people off it) and the post was there for the sake of the lamp (to support it). The lamp and the post were together calculated to foster the virtue of carefulness in walking; and without this virtue the village passer-by could not reach their destination in safety.

So, you see, we have religion, which must produce "religious" differences; these differences are necessary to teach us tolerance; without tolerance we cannot live in peace; and without peace we cannot progress. Therefore 'religious' differences are needed for peace and progress.

But religious differences make for peace and progress as truly as blisters make for health and the advancement of medicine. For, if you cause a blister on your body, you will have to learn how to pontilic it in order to get cured, and the knowledge is bound to advance medical science in your case. The blister is for the puss, and the pustule for the blister, and both for the sake of health and hygiene.

That is the result of the lamp-post religion lies in the condition of the lantern on the post. The lamp of religion may be all right, and quite useful, too, to guide humanity on the safe way, safe at any rate for privilege and priestcraft; but its ill-kept condition—the soil-covered glass around—makes all the difference. The soil-covered glass is 'organised religion'. Almost all the departments of human thought and action lend themselves to organisation, but 'religion,' as we commonly understand it, is not one of these. 'Religion,' in its usual acceptance, is concerned with the Supernatural; and the Supernatural, being super-\[\text{\textit{s}}\]ensual, admits of no direct appeal to sense experience. Hence it is that all ideas of the Supernatural necessarily and admittedly differ from one another, in a manner and to a degree not possible to be predicated of our perceptions of Nature. So it comes about that there are as many 'religions' or 'gods' as there are men and women,—at any given moment; for the individual's religion or god undergoes changes as the mind of the individual himself (or herself) undergoes changes from time to time. Bearing these facts in mind, we can see how 'organised religion' is a contradiction in terms. Hence for any one to try to organise religion, i.e. to base human relations on any theory about the Supernatural, is either a fraud on others, or a self-deception, or a mixture of both. Here's the rub about 'religion'. Because 'religion' is organised, it makes for differences, as it cannot but. These differences go to embitter human relations, to a degree to which no other differences can go; for in these latter there is always an appeal possible to our common human sense, while in the matter of the Supernatural there is none that can be made. It is only a sample of our 'religions' differences, that the sanity of secularism dawns, i.e. the rigidity of religious organisation is relaxed—we learn the 'virtue' of tolerance by necessity—the lamp is cleared of the enveloping soil—the path is made safe for progress. What happens is, we begin our journey 'religiously' with a stumbling-block, the creation of our own ignorance, vanity or stupidity. That evolves, or we exercise, the self-discipline, prudence or foresight necessary to overcome it. We first let our bowels be clogged wilfully or negligently and then have to search for purgatives.

Now the attempt to regulate our natural, concrete, external, human relations by any theory of the Supernatural is what is generally known as religion. But it had better be called theocracy. Strictly speaking, it is not religion but theocracy, that is the mother of what are called 'religious differences.' And these are not only not inevitable, but are bound to disappear as fast as theocracy disappears. And theocracy recedes as Natural Science advances. And be it noted, Natural Science comprehends both the physical and the mental aspects of Nature. Natural Science is tidy, while theocracy is sooty, the negation of science. True religion, being one of belief in, or any sort of attitude (including doubt and disbelieve), towards the Supernatural, ought to be the affair of the individual's own mind or heart. To let the Supernatural interfere with the Natural is theocracy. As falsehoods are many, while Truth is one, so are ideas of the Supernatural many. So it is that we have the phenomenon of 'as many men, so many gods.' When one ambitious 'god' (i.e. the man behind the god, and working in his name) tries to bring or keep under his sway as many other 'gods' as possible, we have theocracy. And so come in the hateful differences of religion.

II.—On the "Lamp Post" at Phansavali.

"Prativadi-bhayankar," meaning 'Dangerous to Opponents,' is the title borne by a Swami from the South who has installed himself in a newly built temple in a quarter known as Phansavali in Bombay. It is the same that kept to fame in connection with the Natarajan-Ambedkar incident of some months ago. But the more one hears of that "dangerous" Swami and remembers the sanguine hopes entertained of him in some quarters, the more is one disposed to pity him. The Phansavali temple inaugurated with such dazzling tom-toms and glowing discourses on Vedanta, has only proved to be, as was feared a rallying-point for social obscurantists. What we now find is only a sample of the religious lamp-post transported to the soil of Bombay from that brightened quarter where Swamis and Acharyas have accumulated, and men 'and women decayed. Here is the Swami's latest, which must be rescued from oblivion for the use of any Mayo that may come along in future years to conduct investigations into our 'spiritual' heritage.

His Holiness Jagadguru of Prativadi Bhayankar Math has sent a memorial to the Viceroy, concerning the Sarda Bill. (Hindu Child Marriage—Bill), which was introduced in the Simla session of the Indian Legislative Assembly on the 15th September last.

His Holiness protests that the whole Bill is against the Royal proclamation, affects a most important ceremony of the Hindus, and threatens to take away their right of religious liberty and compels them to do things against their Sastras. He contends that marriage is not a contract for sexual love or life but to discharge debt to God, Rishi and Pitri, and cannot therefore be dissolved. The Legislative Assembly consisting of infantile and heretical religionists, is not competent to decide on such an important question to the Hindu community. If the Bill is passed into law, it would prove to be calamitous to the community and not a blessing. He requests His Excellency to be pleased to refuse to give his assent to the Bill and to take steps to prevent social and religious questions to be discussed by the Legislatures. (The Bombay Chronicle, Feb. 13, 1928, p. 10.)

We may note in passing that His Holiness has sent his S.O.S. call for the protection of the Sastras to one who is an 'imetical religiousist' himself, viz. the Christian Viceroy; and that he has done it in the 'Barbarian tongue,' English, in breach of the Sutra text which forbids one ever to resort to a 'Barbarian tongue', even though one were in imminent danger of death (न देवतावर बालसाहि को रहित करितील). In his hurry to protect the Sastras His Holiness seems to have forgotten this Sutra precept. It is not for a 'heretic' to quote Sastras to a Swami, but it is clear that His Holiness has also acted in clear breach of the rule that the Sastras are not to be expounded to any but the "twice born"; for His Holiness has done it to the Mithecha Viceroys! Perhaps in this Kali age the privilege is reserved to Swamis, not only to expound the third of the three "debas"—the duty of begetting a son to put one's Eiris (forebear) at ease as regards the continuation of their line—but to violate the Sastras in the very act of calling for their protection!

Now for the S.O.S. itself. It is the old cry of "religion in danger," again. The tactic has served "obstinate conservatism" in perpetuating itself on a patient humanity so well and so long, that it is time all concerned were reminded that there are inevitable limits to the doctrines on which our holy slarmists claim to take their stand—the doctrines, namely, of the subject's right of "religious liberty" and the State's duty of "religious neutrality." As an eminent thinker of the last century put it, "if a Thug makes the strangling of travellers his religion, we do not allow him the free exercise of it." There is a significance in this remark to which some of us of this generation may not be alive. To the Thug, we must note, the practice of Thoggee was as much a "religion" as the practice of "child-marriage" is to the Swami of Phansavadi. That the exercise of his "religion" meant a horrible death to innocent travellers confiding in him, mattered as little to the Thug as it does to the Swami that his "religion" of "child-marriage" means the forcing of the hardships of premature motherhood on innocent little daughters of his confiding followers. Sutters, too, was a "religion" to the pandi of Ramohanan and Bentinck's days. But let His "Dangerous" Holiness of Phansavadi preach Sutte to-day, and he will soon know to his cost how very dangerous it is to his own peace of mind and body.

In his call to the Viceroys the Swami tries to conjure with the word "sacrament" and declares that marriages must be indissoluble, as if the Bill he was protesting against was a Bill for legalising divorce. But the Swami is not alone in this trick. Nowadays such phrases as "Sacrament" and "indissoluble tie," which are the least one could think of applying in their true sense to the orthodox Hindu marriage, are being strangely overdone in these very circles in the interest of reaction.

Well if the marriage tie is "indissoluble,"—what prevents such ties being added to one another, without "divesting" any? Is there anything in that phrase which prevents one from marrying as many times as one likes—divorce, of course, being out of the question? Apparently nothing. And neither the Sutras nor the custom of the "orthodox" prevents a man from having as many wives as he likes, not one after another, but any number at the same time. Still the tie, or rather ties, can continue "indissoluble" by the simple expedient of not permitting a divorce or dissolution of marriage to be formally effected. Yes—that "indissoluble tie" idea looks perfect—or almost so. It only needs to be applied to men and women alike. So, let each woman have as many husbands as she likes, not necessarily one after another (which is the modest plan of widow-marriage), but all at the same time—not even the Pandava precedent being allowed to limit the number of co-husbands to five. And of course, on the Pandava precedent, each of the co-husbands must be free to have as many wives as he likes. Well we don't expect the "indissoluble tie" advocate to be either inconsistent or solemnly partial to his sex or orthodox in practice of Thoggee.

He need not fear to be a wholebogger in pursuit of his own views. If only the word 'divorce' or 'dissolution' is not mentioned, these views can result in nothing worse than so many tangles of perfectly indissoluble ties!

To be plain with it, I have never been able to make out any significance whatever in that phrase as applied to Hindu society, about marriage being a "tie indissoluble even in death"—except only that a formal divorce is to be barred. For there is nothing at all in the phrase as it is worded, nor in orthodox Hindu thought, as it obtains to-day, which excludes the possibility of such "indissoluble" ties being added to "indissoluble" ties ad lib. As the phrase stands, we may have a cluster of ties, none of which may be taken as "dissolved"—even after nature's dissolution.

It is a phrase we have borrowed from the West. There the rule of monogamy (that a man or woman should have only one wife or husband at a time)—divorce in certain circumstances, as well as the death of either party, being held to 'dissolve the tie,' and hence to permit a second, yet monogamous, marriage) has already been established—thanks, however, not to the Christian 'Sastras,' but to Greece—Roman Rationalism; and the phrase 'indissoluble tie' is used to denote the further restriction advocated by the puritans, but not yet enforced, that an individual whether male or female (not the female only as, among Hindus) should marry once and once only—neither legal divorce nor the death of either party being held capable of 'dissolving the tie.' But among us Hindus, the rule of simple monogamy for both sexes having yet to be established, the description of marriage as an 'indissoluble tie' is one which our orthodox finds convenient to trot out only to ban the marriages, though monogamous of widowers, even of those so-called widows who have never been wives, but have been dubbed widows for no other reason than that some males with whom they were made to go through some 'religious' ceremony are dead. To our much-married Sastris and Pandits the "indissoluble tie" can mean nothing more and nothing less than this one-sided ban on monogamous remarriage. But it was reserved for the "Dangerous" Swami of Phansavadi to trot out the phrase to ban, not re-marriages, but any marriages except child-marriages!

TOLERANCE.

(Ex Dr. Clifford Markham, Ps. D.)

One of the most precious of human virtues is the virtue of tolerance. To totally disagree with a man and yet to respect him for the sincerity with which he holds his opinions is no easy matter. The most of us are not made that way. We have our pet prejudices and we nourish them with the same tender care.
that the gardener bestowed upon the plants in his garden. When another man presents an opinion at variance with our own it seldom occurs to us that this new opinion may be right. How can it be, it is not ours. And so we have cleavages in human society.

The history of intolerance is one of the saddest sections in world history. It has come to expression in the church, in politics, in science, in the arts and in education. It has led religious leaders to their death. It has dethroned kings. It has led seekers after truth into exile, and has destroyed both men and institutions. Tolerance is the product of no age and no country. It is found in every generation and in every land. It flourished in the civilizations of old, and it flowers in our more modern civilization. Wherever the mind of a people becomes fixed; wherever its loyalties become centered about some idea; whenever feeling is excited to a position above that of reason there is a fruitful field for the crop of intolerance. The world war furnishes the outstanding example of our own time. When a nation is plunged into conflict with another nation there is no time for halting between two opinions. He who is not with us is against us, and is so treated. There is no opportunity for analyzing motives. There is no place for the voice of reason. The war must be won, and to win the war it made a united front. And so we have our propaganda bureaus pouring forth their messages of hate toward the enemy and idealizing all that is connected with ourselves.

Unfortunately, however, that which might be justified in war has carried over to the time of peace. In every nation we have the 100 percent patriot who can recognize no good in any other nation. In every nation we have the self-appointed guardians of liberty and law seeking to save the country from so much seen or unseen menace. Witness the crop of post-war dictatorships, and the more recent campaign of the mayor of Chicago to save Chicago and the United States from the alleged machinations of the King of England.

The land of India has for centuries been noted as a land of tolerance. The genius of Hindustan has been declared to lie in its inclusiveness. Many of us in the West have looked to India with longing eyes, seeking to discover her secret. We have marvelled at the continuity of this great and ancient civilization. And to some of us has been given the opportunity of coming to India to learn.

The present strained communal situation has caused me to wonder. It has compelled us to dig down in an endavour to discover the actual roots of intolerance. And for one at least it has raised one question. Has not perhaps, much that has passed for tolerance been more passivity? Passivity approaches tolerance, but there is a difference. In the state of passivity I am unconcerned as to what my neighbour does. His beliefs and expressed opinions bother me not one whit. I do not care. My tolerance, if tolerance it may be called, is wholly uncreative.

But today the situation is different. Passivity is giving place to questioning. My neighbour’s thoughts and actions are submitted to careful scrutiny. It is a well recognized principle that we tend to fight the hardest against new ideas which seem to us to be most reasonable, but which if accepted would upset our established habits of thought. Perhaps this explains in some measure the bitterness of the communal struggle. Hindus and Muslims alike are each recognizing that there is good in the other. The night of indifference and passivity is passing, and the day of cooperation is dawning. A struggle is in process, but from the struggle there will arise a new nation, strengthened because it has been bought with a price—the price of careful questioning and the general appropriation of that which is good. In other words, tolerance is becoming creative.

"THE DRAVIDIAN RENAISSANCE."

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In your leading article of the 11th February there are two statements which I believe you should like to see corroborated, and one which I am sure I should like to see corrected.

(1) You have cited the authority of Pargiter for believing that the Indo-Aryans were a race autochthonous to the Himalayan regions whose members migrated from the North-West of this country onwards rather than—a popularly believed by "orthodox" antiquarians—that they came in from that direction. It is interesting to note, and one may note the fact with-out committing oneself to either side of the controversy, that Pargiter’s view was also independently arrived at by Giacomo Bond, the renowned Italian researcher into Roman antiquities, who died in 1925. According to Wickham Steed, who wrote an obituary sketch of the archaeologist in his Review of Reviews (about October of that year), Bond believed that the Latins of the Aryan stock reached Europe from Northern India through Persia and Asia Minor. The belief drove him, Mr. Steed observes, ‘to the conclusion that he must look for light upon the religious beliefs and practices of the founders of Rome in ancient Sanskrit writings, especially in the Vedas. He made no secret of his belief which, to many, seemed to verge on lunacy. What could be more sinister than to link India with the Forum?” Bond found the guidance he sought in the Vedas. The dead were to be buried in ground sloping towards still waters. The sloping ground was there. All he had to do was to find in the Forum the early Latin burial ground, the protohistoric necropolis. It must be, he was sure, near the Sacred Way. He was right. He did discover prehistoric black earthware urns containing human ashes near the Sacred Way. “Blind scholarship may see madness in him,” remarks the obituarist; “but his achievements place him among the artists who have been the guardians of the treasures humanity has learnt to spell as culture.”

(2) You state that the British in their early days in Bombay used the Kanarese language along with English for their official proclamations on the island. If you will look up the Reformer of March 13, 1926, you will see in it a letter headed “The ‘Kanarese’ of Old Bombay—and Mr. Edwards.” In it, it has been shown how the ‘Kanarese’ we come across in old Bombay records does not mean what is now understood by the term but quite a different thing. There is no evidence, in fact, that at any period within historical times Bombay was inhabited by any considerable body of speakers of the Dravidian language called Kannada or Kanarese. But a reference to Hobson-Jobson, that monumental work on Indo-European terms compiled by Yule and Burnell, will show you how the Portuguese, the predecessors of the British in the rule of Bombay, applied the terms Canari and Canarian (as they do sometimes even now in a derogatory sense) to the native Goanese and their tongue called Konkani which is a dialect of Marathi. Evidently the early Portuguese confounded the Konkani tongue with the neighbouring dominant language, Kanarese, of the Vijayanagar Empire of which Goa was once an outpost. Later, perhaps the Portuguese extended the term Canari to either the standard or the dialectal Marathi which was in use in and around Bombay and Sائette, and was nearly the same as the vernacular of Goa, their principal base on the Konkan coast. Their English successors seem to have followed the Portuguese in calling the Marathi vernacular of Bombay Island by the same wrong term anglicised to Canaree until after a few years they replaced it by the correct term. Surely the Kanarese of old Bombay has as little to do with the Kanarese of Kanara as Brittany has to do with Britain. It was a pure misnomer which misled even the official historian of Bombay, the late Mr. S. M. Edwards. Having taken occasion to correct him on the point through this journal, I had sent the cutting of it to him in England a short time before his untimely death.

(3) With regard to Dravidian borrowings in the supposed pure tongue Sanskrit of the Aryas, the late German scholar, Dr. Kittel, in his essay prefixed to his Kannada-English dictionary shows how Sanskrit is indebted to Dravidian languages for the names of many vegetable products, in particular the spices, cotton, rice and some other grains, and a number of animals, all of which in early times—there is reason to suppose—were peculiarly indigenous to the tropical or southern parts of India. (By the way, the fact is often overlooked that much the greater part of India lies outside the Tropics, in the temperate zone.) It is quite natural that the northern Aryans, when they adopted from the Dravidians such products of tropical nature as were new to them, should have adopted also the Dravidians’ names to denote them. In this they were no unlike our Swadeshi Pandits who insist on coining unmanageable mouthfuls to denote the scientific things and ideas they have borrowed from the West.

ADIDRAVIDAS AND TEMPLE ENTRY.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I beg to point out to the public at large in the following few lines that the Adi-Dravidas as a body are not lagging behind caste-Hindus and others of various denominations in their faith in all-loving God and that, on the contrary, their devotion to the Supreme being is both deep and sincere; and that on these grounds alone, they have every right to claim the privilege of entering temples along with others.

I beg to allude to an incident in my own village North Elluppi which only goes to strengthen the position I have taken in this matter as follows:

In 1926, the Adi-Dravidas here before putting in their darkest application to the revenue authorities at Chuyan, North Arcot District, S. India, prayed before God Vinayaka that they would install a lamp at his altar, if their darkest affair ended most favourably to them. Such a vow as this made by these unlettered but simple-minded, honest men should not be treated by any stretch of imagination as one made in the spirit of bargain, pure and simple, but it should be viewed at as an incident in their life unfolding their deep but crude expression of their faith in the great Comforter. Indeed, He blessed them with 17-49 acres (dry) in August last and true to their vow so splendidly made, the Adi-Dravidas concerned installed a lamp on 16-1-25 before God Vinayaka and in the presence of the local gentry.

Mention should also be made, in this connection, of the practical sympathy evinced by Government in this matter which is also to be taken into account, if one is to be impartial.

Such incidents as the one cited above occurring daily in some part of the country or other, and illustrating their faith in the loving God, would, it is hoped, go a long way in solving the problem of Temple entry satisfactorily to the Adi-Dravidas in the near future.

North Elluppi, 11-2-21. B. Govindan,

THE CHALLENGE OF ISLAM,

Sirдар Iblal Ali Shah writes in the Indian Review, Madras—

The lessons of current history seem to have been lost upon those of us who still disbelieve in the existence of the Challenge of Islam. It is essential to appreciate the point that this modern movement is not synonymous with Pan-Islamism; for Pan-Islamism has been grievously misunderstood in Christendom, chiefly, perhaps because it was misused by its modern protagonist, Sultan Abdul Hamid, who gave it an aggressive tone. And although this “revivalism” has all the soul force of the former thoughts yet in conformity with its limited aspirations, it should be non-aggressive. It is exactly in this difference that its greatest strength lies. Bewildered by the fact that modern civilization is marching phalanx after phalanx into its very heart, it gives a clear call to the faithful to muster strong under the banner of Islam, and “revive” its ancient, but fading, glory.

After explaining the difference of the two movements, it might appear paradoxical, but it nevertheless is true, that the parent trunk of the “modern revivalism” tree is undoubtedly Pan-Islamism; the new had grown out of the old; in the nature of things it could not have been otherwise. Now, let us see how this phenomena evolved itself; and to do this, one will have to go back a little to the origin of Pan-Islamism.

The very first indications of Pan-Islamism date back to the declining days of the reign of Sultan Abdul Hamid; he perceived a rapid growth of public opinion, not only amongst the Turks, but also in the Arab race, which threatened his personal power and prestige.

The young Turkish party had passed the embryonic stage, and in the desert, the Pan-Arab movement was rapidly spreading. Observing these cross-currents he quickly organised a scheme of personal consolidation, harnessed the sympathy of the clergy and inveigled Syed Jamaluddin Afghani—a great scholar and philosopher of my own country of Afghanistan—into his scheme. The necessity of the strength of Islam was preached far and wide; propagandists roamed from Bokhara and Java, to Morocco, and exhorted the faithful in the name of religion, to look to Abdul Hamid for moral and political resurrection. But under the pretexts of these events, a great movement of "awakening" due to western impact, had caught the imagination of the people; the clergy were fast losing their hold, because educated men would no longer swallow dogma. Democratic principles in the life of the people were weighing the scales against the thraldom of autocratic potentates; modern conception of liberty was driving the effete conceptions of the Eastern Governments to the wall. But whilst all these forces were at work, this battle was being fought behind closed doors, for Abdul Hamid was watching.

Forces of economic life had, however, become too great, and the cumbersome structure succumbed to its own weight. A Western wave passed over Turkey, and the Sultan was swept off the deck. Then the War came and completely revolutionised the ideas of men. old and young, Turk or Afghan. Age-long fetters were broken; the world of 1914 ceased to live; the priests of Islam continued to make desultory attempts to bring the flock back, but none would return to the old fold. Westernisation had won the day, even in the slumberous East. Empires rose and fell. Sultans, Khattifas, Shahs, Amiris, and desert Chiefains were dethroned. The social order was completely altered; with the result that the East became more Western than the West itself, the pup had outrun the instructor. The surging tide of scientific civilization of the West had carried everything before it, as it broke wave after wave upon us in Islamic Asia. And the matter of great concern was that it did not make us better men because the movement being essentially foreign to our mentality and outlook on life, struck us as spectaculær, overpoweringly fresh, full of economic allurements, and we drank of the stream much more than was good for us. We yelled for Nationalism where no nationalism existed; we striving after a representative form of Government in a land where generations had lived and died under benign autocracy; we spoke of religion but lightly.

In diplomatic affairs, Islam had been altered materially. The Nationalist Government in Turkey had led the way, chiefly through Western impact, and the ideals of French culture were beginning to be noticed in Angora. In Persia, the downfall of the Kachar dynasty proclaimed, led to uncertainty as to whether order could not be tolerated; in Afghanistan, likewise, the fact that the third son of the late Amir ruled the country, and ruled it well, was sufficient proof of the rising public opinion; and, above all, the idea of a Grand League of Muslim Nations—with the sympathy and co-operation, shall we say, of the Russians—was not devoid of potentialities both grave and wholesome. The ferment amongst the student community of India and Egypt was but the first sign of yet another superwave of Westernisation, which threatened to further rend asunder the heavy veil of dogma with which the priests in Asia covered the eyes of the younger generation. Last, but not the least important, was the question of the Khila.

The Calviniastic tendencies of the people of Nejd had been kept at white heat by the guiding spirit of their devout leader, with the consequence that Ibn Saud's zealots have not only wrested the power out of the hands of the Sharifian family, but have also been called upon to prepare a new interpretation of the "shirk". Ibn Saud's cult broke down the barriers which priest-craft has been increasing with each successive generation. Indeed, the guiding principle of the working of the Grand Muslim Conference at Mecca—which I attended in June last—showed very clearly the thoughts that actuated the efforts of the Wahabi. What he does strive after is that there should not be any "break-away" from the true spirit of Islam. At the outset, many had feared that, as the guardian of the Holy Shrines of Islam, might perpetuate an orgy of iconoclasm, but recent events in the Hijas have shown that Ibn Saud was fully aware that, by assuming the reins of the Hijaz Government, he was committing himself to a gigantic enterprise, in which a disregard of the religious susceptibilities of respective Islamic sects would detract from his influence, and he marvellously stayed the hands of many a zealot pruse to go to excesses in "driving the liberalism out of Islam." He is fired by a formidable zeal for cultural reform, both in the Hijaz and amongst quite a large number of foreign Muslims who have learnt to value his advice. Nevertheless since his accession to the throne of the Hijaz a year ago, all over the Muslim World, frequent voices of dissent, even of vehement denunciation, have been raised against the advent of the Wahabi in Mecca. The Perisan Majlis once postponed its meeting as a mark of resentment, an "Indian Committee of the Clergy," styled Khudam al Haramain of Lucknow, made no end of noise and the affair leading to the return of the Holy Carpet of Egypt during the last pilgrimage season not only brought down the anathema of theologians of Alhasan, but also public opinion in Cairo was greatly excited. Feelings at one time ran so high that an Egyptian newspaper proposed that the Egyptians should immediately convene an All-World Muslim Conference, when a mandate should be secured to oust Ibn Saud from the Hijaz, and beat his army back to Najd. Campaigns of Mohammed Ali of 1819 were freely recalled to mind. In these connections, we must, of course, bear in mind the cross-currents of Islamic politics before crediting such anti-Wahabi movements.

There are now no competent observers of world diplomacy who cannot agree that a spirit of Revivalism has definitely set in in Islam after the first wave of the revolt has passed. It has also been shown that there has been no revolt against the essence of the faith but an insulation against the throned of the Clergy and the autocracy of Eastern monarchs. When once these two factors were destroyed, Islam has gained its strength and is fast assuming the solidarity of its former years. And it has been asked whether such the religion of the Prophet presents a menace to Christianity. I venture to answer this in a negative sense. For when the Christian faith itself is reeling under the impact of scientific materialism, which constitutes a very real danger to any system of morality, the Islamic danger to it, if any, can only be of a secondary significance. And I feel convinced that the modern conception of exclusive material gain is not bringing the life of men and women an inch nearer their original creed. Challenge there is in Islam to-day, but that is a challenge to the materialistic instincts of man, an instinct which never sustains peace in the world for long.

ALL INDIA WOMEN’S CONFERENCE.

The full text of Mrs. P. K. Sen’s address at the All India Women’s Conference held at Delb: ‘I deem it a great privilege to be with you all and to take my humble share in this Conference. I have great pleasure in supporting the Resolution that women be given adequate representation on all Boards which control Primary, Secondary and University education and which control the selection of text books. I am by no means an educationalist. But I have had the privilege of being associated with several educational institutions and, while working for them, I have been faced with problems which I feel, must be problems common to us all. Coming as a delegate from Bihar my first duty is to press on this Conference the claims of primary education which is the foremost need of Bihar at the present moment. But I venture to think the day will soon come when we in Bihar will have to consider the equal claims of secondary education and all the ways and means for higher education of women. Thus the problem that faces us in Bihar is essentially the same as elsewhere in India, namely, how to view the education of women as a whole.

Nearly sixty years ago the late illustrious Keshab Chander Sen with the far-reaching vision of genius framed a comprehensive scheme of female education for the Victoria Institution which was founded by him and which still exists as one of the largest educational institutions of Calcutta. I cannot do better than any his words that what we have to do is to build up a scheme that would secure the development of the true type of Indian womenhood on a basis that should be both natural and national. But this lofty ideal of education was not accepted till recently. The main cause of the present unsatisfactory condition of female education is that up to now whatever has been done for the education of women has been done by men. Women alone would understand the needs and requirements of a girl’s education. Our ideas as to what constitutes true education of woman have been changing. About twenty or twenty-five years ago, the idea of passing University examinations and competing with men seemed to be uppermost in the minds of the progressives. The University and also the Government Department in charge of education—at least in Bengal, and Bengal then included Bihar—would encourage nothing else, and would withhold aid unless the curricula were the same as those prescribed for the other sex. The tendency was for all examinations to be shaped after the same model and not to admit of variation in the case of members of our sex. If I am right, the tendency is somewhat different now. It is rightly believed that as a matter of principle whatever is open to men should also be open to women. At the same time it is not, thought necessary to insist on the education of man and woman being uniform in every respect. On the contrary, it is recognised that woman has a distinctive place and function in the economy of society. Hence her education must be such as to enable her to fulfil that function to the best of her ability. Those who from special aptitude, or by compelling circumstances, wish to compete with man must find the path clear of obstacles. But the larger majority must be left free to equip themselves for the discharge of their duties as ideal mothers and homebuilders.

For the purpose of such equipment special emphasis must be laid on a change of curricula suited to the requirements of our sex and on the inclusion of such subjects as Hygiene, Domestic Science, Motherhood and Child-Welfare, Music and Fine Arts etc.

But it is not enough to speak of woman as the mother and the home-builder. From home-building to nation building is but one step. And the Indian woman has to realise her responsibility in the building up of India's nationhood. The system of education that prevails in our educational institutions is in urgent need of reform.

As at present conducted, it is a source of enormous strain on the minds of students and often makes them life-long invalids. And as our illustrious President Her Highness the Begum of Bhopal very rightly pointed out to us yesterday in her most elevating Presidential address—"the need for reforming the present system of examinations is universal and the more our girls are spared the strain by the provision of some other tests of proficiency the better it would be for them." So we cannot do better than to lay emphasis on this most vital question of girls' education, and we trust the Boards controlling education will see their way to reforming the curricula so as to render them best fitted for education of our girls on national lines. The best way of attaining this object is to have women on the Boards of education to help them.

With these words I have much pleasure in introducing the resolution.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Memorial to the late Mr. Ranga Rao: The Public of Mangalore, in meeting assembled, places on record its deep sense of the loss sustained by the Public by the demise of Swami Tanwaranandji (better known as Jal Sahib Kud nai Ranga Rao) and its high appreciation of the invaluable services rendered by the deceased in the cause of the social and religious reforms including the uplift of the Depressed Classes in particular and hereby conveys its sincere condolences and heartfelt sympathies to the members of his family in their sad bereavement and irreparable loss. This meeting further resolves that steps may be taken and necessary funds raised to perpetuate the memory of the deceased in a suitable form and that a Sub-Committee consisting of the following gentlemen with power to add to their number be formed for the purpose. Members of the Committee, Dewan Bahadur N. Subba Rao, A. Shriivasa Pai, A. B. Shetty, N. N. Suvarna, M. Venkataappa, Pandit Dharma Dev, Rev. A. Schosser, and G. K. Davadar.

Poona Beva Sadan: The League of National Public Health Interchange Delegates, who numbered about a dozen and a half, devoted nearly two hours on Monday, the 13th inst. during their very brief stay in Poona, to pay a visit to this Society's Headquaters. They were received at the entrance in the absence of Mr. Devadiar by Mrs. Yamunabai Bhat, Miss Dwarkabai Bhat and Mr. Nateswar, and were taken to the Main Hall. Mr. Nateswar thus briefly explained to them the scheme of work and the distinguished visitors were then shown round the various Departments including the Training College, the High School, the Infant Welfare Centre etc. The fact that the Society mainly concerns itself with the education of Adult Women and that nearly 60 of women taking advantage of the facilities are widows trying to be self-supporting was vividly brought to the notice of the Delegation.

As the Delegates appeared very keen upon getting fuller details about the medical activities of the Society, Dr. Ranade and Dr. Gokhale made speeches detailing full account of these activities of the Society, which mainly embraced the training of Indian Nurses and Health Visitors as well as giving facilities for the women medical students taking up the L. C. P. S. Course. Thus about 36 women are receiving training in Nursing and an equal number are attending the Medical School. All the members of the Delegation appeared to be thoroughly satisfied with what they saw and one of them thanked the principal workers of the Society for having shown them round at a very short notice, Colonel Graham, Public Health Commissioner with the Government of India, after extolling the Society's work in his remarks, has expressed a wish to see such work multiplied two-fold and extended over India. A group photo was taken at the end of this somewhat hurried and unique function.

The Late Sir Ramanbhai Mahipatram: We deeply regret to record the death of Sir Ramanbhai Mahipatram of Ahmedabad. Sir Ramanbhai had been alive for some time, but he went on as usual with his professional and social work. We did not expect that his end would come for some years yet. Sir Ramanbhai faithfully carried on the tradition of his family as one of the pioneers of social and religious reform in Gujarat. He was the life and soul of the Ahmedabad Prarthana Samaj. His simple and devout faith did not estrange him from the orthodox Hindu community which, notwithstanding that Sir Ramanbhai put into practice social reforms regarding marriage and caste, continued to regard him with great respect. Sir Ramanbhai was actively associated with the Municipalities of Ahmedabad of which he was President for several years. Sir Ramanbhai was a staunch Liberal. But he did not take a prominent part in politics which, in fact, had only a minor interest for him. In his social work, he was greatly helped by his wife and in his turn, he gave her all his support in her special activities for the upliftment of women. The most striking feature of Sir Ramanbhai's character was the total absence of all aims in the way in which he gave effect to his convictions on social and religious matters. He never adopted an attitude of defiance, and never cared to pose as one engaged in a heroic task at tremendous sacrifice. He did what he thought right, and never complained of opposition passed on him by friends or opponents. He was in all relations of life a model man, and his memory will be long cherished by his numerous friends.

The Late Lord Sinha: The sudden death of Lord Sinha which took place at Barampore in the small hours of Monday morning, has cast a gloom over the whole country. Lord Sinha has been subjected to somewhat severe criticisms in the Indian Press for sending a message of welcome to the Simon Commission. It was well-known that he was out of touch with more recent developments in Indian politics and both he himself and the public had come to feel that he was no longer an active influence in Indian politics. His message to the Commission, which the educated classes generally resent as an insult to India, was, therefore, regarded as an unqualified for intervention on his part into a sphere from which he had voluntarily withdrawn himself. Whatever little feeling there was on this account has, however, been totally forgotten and concessions have been quite prominent in rendering homage to his high character and genuine patriotism as Lord Sinha's personal friends. Necessarily realized more than he did himself that all the pretensions and honours that had come to him—he was the first Indian member of the Government of India, the first Indian Parliamentary Under-Secretary in a British Government, the first Indian Governor of a province and the first Indian to be raised to the British peerage—were due to the rapidly growing strength of Indian nationalism rather than to his great personal merits and abilities which but for it would have been allowed to waste their sweetness in the desert air. In his own quiet, way, he worked to advance the national cause in every direction. He took a keen interest in the progress of the social movement in particular and regarded that it could not proceed faster. In a letter written just two months ago, Lord Sinha expressed his pleasure at the success of the last National Social Conference, adding: "I wish the pace could be greatly accelerated; but take comfort when I remember the wise dictum of Lord Bacon that "if the forces of custom, simple and separate, be great, the force of union, populous and complicated and calculating, is far greater"; and only those who are actual workers in the social field can realise the enormous difficulties in their way. Patience must be our watchword. The difficulties were great as they seemed to Lord Sinha, and they have steadily diminished. The prospect of social reform was never brighter than it is today. To a certain extent, this is the direct consequence of the awakened political consciousness of the country, which enables it to see the details of social life in their proper perspective, and Lord Sinha's part in the great awakening is second only to that of none."

The Late Mr. S. M. Rajaram Row: The Wednesday Review was founded twenty-five years ago by Mr. S. M. Rajaram Row who died a few days ago. Before his paper was started Mr. Row was a regular contributor to the columns of this Journal. It was a special merit of Mr. Row's venture that he started it in his own native town of Siragam—the head-quarters of South Indian Valibnayam, but possessing very few facilities for successful Journalism. That Mr. Row established his paper and was able to make it what it has become, speaks volumes for his energy, perseverance and innate ability. Judging from the tone of the Wednesday Review, it is not surprising that he should come to have lost faith in the capacity of his countrymen to manage their own affairs, and to have been, therefore, lured into an almost gratuitous attitude to the present administrative and political system.
The ex-Maharaja of Indore’s Marriage: A valued friend asks why we have not strongly opposed the third marriage of Sir Tukoji Rao Holkar, the ex-Maharaja of Indore, with an American girl who is shortly to be converted to Hinduism. The reason is simple. The rulers and ex-rulers of Indian States are almost all of them polygamous—Maharajas who have only one wife can be counted on the fingers of one hand. Sir Tukoji Rao is not one of this small group. He married a second wife, whose Christian baptism and education are now disturbing the Hindus. This second woman is willing to become the wife of a Hindu. The Hindus have often opposed this, for it is a preliminary to her conversion to Hinduism with the knowledge that it is a preliminary to her marriage. We do not, as we have often said, approve of proselytism, in any shape or form. The Hindus are following the example of some Mussulmans and Christians and have organised missions to convert people of other faiths. There seems to have been difficulty at first in getting Hindus to convert this American girl, but it was resolved as it was reported that a Mussulman had invited the Maharaja and his bride to embrace Islam in order to remove all obstacles in the way of their union. We are informed that a picture of Miss Miller, a Hindoo, and the Maharaja should become a Christian, divorce his Hindu wife, and then marry Miss Miller! The lengths to which religious enthusiasts will go in order to add to their trophies is incredible to ordinary men. Martin Luther is reported at the second marriage of a friend of potestate on the ground that the patriarchs of the Old Testament were not monogamous and that Jesus Christ did not expressly repudiate them on that account.

A Reply to Miss Mayo: We reprint today the first of two articles which appeared in the first number of the Atlantic Monthly, the premier monthly review of the United States, giving a detailed and convincing repudiation of Miss Mayo’s calumnies against Indian men and women. The author is the Rev. Aiden H. Clark of the American Marathi Mission at Ahmednagar. Mr. Clark’s criticism has stung Miss Mayo to fury and she is reported to have attacked him in a speech which she made in New York since the publication of the article. In the course of her remarks, she made some statements in her characteristic, irresponsible way. With reference to them Mr. Clark sends us the following: “The article has been called to my attention by Mr. R. B. Bajpai in Miss Mayo’s New York lecture appearing in recent issues of various Indian papers. In this article Miss Mayo is reported as stating that she has received word that my wife, who is now in America, said about her book “every word is true.” Miss Mayo spoke humorously of the supposed disagreement between my wife and myself in this matter. Since I had written an article for the Atlantic Monthly, (reprints of which have appeared in the February Indian Review and the Young Men of India for March), pointing out some of Miss Mayo’s most glaring errors, whereas my wife was reported as saying, ‘every word is true.’ In this way she sought to discredit rather than frankly to meet the evidence of my article. Now it so happens that my wife wrote a brief statement about Mother India which appeared in the December Missionary World in which, while admitting the truth of the book she characterized it as “one-sided and out of focus.” She has thus put herself on record in print in a way to make it clear that she did not say ‘every word is true.’ It also happens that I wrote entirely through my wife’s efforts that my article, which has so greatly disturbed Miss Mayo, was published in the Atlantic. She not only secured its publication there but also had a reprint of it and is presently in position in her lectures. In fact she is absolutely at one with me in regarding Miss Mayo’s book as a gross caricature of India and in her whole-hearted efforts to do everything in her power to correct its errors and offset its evil effects. Instead of our disagreeing in regard to this matter we have been working together on it in closest cooperation.”

Brahmans and the Depressed Classes: At Mangalagiri, near Guntur, a Brahman young man has opened an Ashram for the education of depressed classes. He is a social worker and has nothing to do with politics. The Commissioners visited the Ashram and Sir John Simon added the following entry in the visitor’s book:—“The Indian Royal Commission paid a visit to the school today and will preserve a most pleasant impression of what they saw and heard. They wish to congratulate the headmaster and his staff on the good work being done and the pupils on the excellent singing and recitation. It must be a real satisfaction to every patriot in India to see this work done by Indians on behalf of their less fortunate fellow citizens and the Commission wishes to express its sincere admiration and sympathy.” Lady Strathcona, one of the Royal Commissioners, wrote:—“I am delighted with all I have seen here and warmly congratulate all their enthusiasm and talent.”

Social Hygiene: The Educational Review, Madras, writes:—“On the recommendation of the National British Social Hygiene Council whose General Secretary, Mrs. Naveen Koile, visited this country some time ago, arrangements are being made by some of the British Universities for one year diploma courses for Indian teachers in Social Hygiene. The Universities of Aberdeen, Liverpool and London have already issued special syllabuses and we hope that Indian teachers will take advantage of them in large number, especially as there is no special provision for the teaching of social hygiene in this country. In each University, the work of the course will be carried out by the co-operation of the Departments of Zoology, Botany, Geography and Anthropology and Education and would be arranged to occupy the full time of the students. During vacations opportunities will be provided for students to attend special conferences on topics suited to their needs; to visit special schools and institutions of suitable type, and to attend demonstrations of educational apparatus and methods. All communications from Indian teachers who intend to take advantage of these courses should be addressed to the Registrars concerned.”
TREATING SYMPTOMS.

We have received a copy of a pamphlet by Mr. F. G. H. Anderson, Commissioner of Settlement in the Bombay Presidency, on a Government Bill which has been introduced in the Bombay Legislative Council, known as the "Small Holdings Bill." The object of the measure is to stop the excessive subdivision of land and to promote the re-consolidation of holdings which have become excessively scattered and fragmented. It is a well-known fact that owing to the Hindu law of equal division of property among sons, and the break-up of the joint family system, individual holdings in many cases have become too small for profitable cultivation. Where they are not too small, they are often scattered, that is to say, consist of several parcels of land separated from one another. The Bill proposes to check this double process by facilitating the sale and transfer of fragmented land to neighbouring owners, and the consolidation of scattered fields in the same way, so as to make them economically paying. The evil undoubtedly exists. It is not due so much as Mr. Anderson says, to the increase of population, as to the disappearance of village industries which provided a supplementary work as well as income to cultivating farmers. We remarked above, to the break-up of the joint family system, which is going on under the stress of modern ideas. Even now it is not impossible to improve the economic condition of the cultivator by promoting village industries and, in fact, it can be better promoted in that way than by the present Bill. The chief thing is to enable the villager to remain in his village. So long as he is in the position of reconstructing village life, but if he is cut off from his moorings, which is often the case, his position is much worse, he will inevitably drift to urban areas in search of work, and go to swell the proletariat of our towns. The fragmentation of land is a symptom and not a cause of economic degeneration. If the cultivator were in a healthy economic condition, the normal processes of supply and demand will suffice automatically to check excessive subdivision of land.

The provisions of the proposed Bill will either remain a dead letter or will increase the already large class of absentee land-owners who spend their days in the towns and have their lands cultivated by hired men, probably, as very persons from whom they acquired them under the new scheme. The law of equal division of property among a man's children is a sound and equitable one, while that of primogeniture is an arbitrary and inequitable one which finds few favourers among social thinkers. In fact, there is a growing demand that daughters also should have an equal share with the sons of their parental property. That the fragmentation of and waste is evident from the fact that the same tendency has been operating in the social structure of Hindusism. The ancient four castes have become subdivided into nearly four thousand castes and sub-castes. Social disintegration sets in like physical disintegration when vitality is lost or at a low ebb. It has been found in practice that it is more difficult to get two sub-castes to unite than to get their members to give up caste altogether. The land question like the social question should be considered as a whole. The main defect of bureaucracy is that it has no faculty for appreciating the human factor in administration. If men and women were like the pawns on a chess-board, there can be no better system of government than bureaucracy. The methods of a business man and those of a statesman are very different from each other. It is only now, and that in very exceptional instances, that the importance of the human factor is beginning to be recognised as an essential principle of business and industry. And this, he is noted, is largely due to the influence of conditions—the act of a statesman.

PERILOUS PROGRAMMES.

(By Dr. Clifford Manshardt Ph. D.)

One of the pleasant pastimes of civilized humanity is that of programme making. Of organizations there is no end, and each organization must at some time or other hold a conference, appoint committees, pass resolutions, and lay down a programme for making the world better. We have our social organizations, political organizations, religious organizations, scientific organizations, industrial organizations and organizations of every other kind and variety. And each of these organizations has a programme. From the earliest days men have dreamed of Utopia.

Some have hoped to make the world better through force. Alexander the Great and the Caesars of Rome are typical of those who have placed their hope for world improvement in a strong central state. Others have adopted peaceful programmes, and have sought to unify the nations through treaties, agreements and through arbitration. The Holy Roman Empire and the Hague Courts are typical of such endeavours. Others have brought forward programmes of political reconstruction, of substituting autocracy for democracy, or replacing autocracy by democracy. Others find the basis of social conflict in the economic situation and hence we have many types of economic adjustment proposed as panaceas for the world's ills. Others would improve 'the world through edenics, through religion, or by the propounding of a new philosophy. No matter what the ill may be, some individual or organization is ready to step forward with a remedy.

The difficulty with the most of these solutions is that they regard the world as static. Each group looks at the world as "It is," and then visualizes a new order different in many particulars, with each man occupying his place according to a pre-arranged picture. We have ten points, a constitution, or some other device which when adopted will bring about the desired end. But when things begin to get too clearly defined it is time to take a warning. The programme is becoming perilous. No matter how fine a scheme may appear on paper it is bound to fail if it is conceived simply upon the stationary relationships of space.

Speaking generally, men are divided into two classes of thinkers—the men who think in terms of completion, and the men who think in terms of process. There is a certain sense of satisfaction in conceiving the final. To be able to call a problem solved, and then to turn one's attention to something else affords genuine pleasure. But unfortunately the world does not then stay put.

One of the sensations of the last industrial season was the appearance of the new Ford automobile. Several years ago Henry Ford standardized his low priced car for mass production and prepared to receive the profits. For a time they came, but it was not long before other low-priced car manufacturers began to make improvements and the Ford sales began to drop. Mr. Ford did not hesitate. Despite the minute standardization of every part and detail, Mr. Ford embarked upon a policy of improvement—resulting in the replacement or re-designing of over fifty per cent of the production machinery. Approximately $22,000,000 went into factory preparations before the first new car was finished. And with a knowledge of the man and his methods, it is safe to say that Henry Ford is ready to receive yet more light, and to go on to new achievements. His way of thinking has changed from that of completion to that of process.

The process thinker regards each advance as but a step more on the way. A programme is not an end, but a means. Just as a man in climbing the mountains ascends one peak and then sees another hitherto, unknown peak awaiting him and calling him higher, so life is a continuous revelation and call to improvement. It provides no safe halting place where the social leader may finally hurl his banner and say, "Here I remain." Perhaps it is for the reason that the world possesses so many tired and retired radicals.

In his "New Machiavelli," H. G. Wells gives us the story of a young man's entrance into the field of politics. He was a candidate for Parliament and after a strenuous campaign was returned a winner. He went to Parliament with the highest ideals, but the first session with its attendant confusion was a great disillusionment. "It dawned upon me," he said, "that I wasn't particularly wanted in the House, and that I should get all I needed of the opening speeches next day in the Times... Whatever happened in this Parliament, I at least was determined to attempt something. 'By God,' I said, 'I won't be overwhelmed. I am here to do something, and do something I will. But I felt for that moment that I could not remain in the House.'"

"I went out by myself with my thoughts into the night. It was a chilly night, and rare spots of rain were falling. I walked along the river and as I leaned upon the parapet close by a lamp stand of twisted dolphins—I prayed.

"I remember the swiftness of the tide upon the water, and how a string of barges presently came swinging and bumping around as high water turned to ebb. That sudden change of position and my perplexity at it, sticks like a pin through the substance of my thoughts. It was then I was moved to prayer. I prayed that night that life might be in vain, that I in particular I might not live in vain. I prayed for strength and faith, that the monstrous blundering forces in life might not overwhelm me, might not beat me back to futility and a meaningless acquisitiveness in existent things.

"'Break me, O God!' I prayed at last. 'Disgrace me, torment me, destroy me as you will, but save me from self-complicity and little interests and little successes and the life that passes like the shadow of a dream.'"

May this be the prayer of all programme makers! —Hubbert Lectureship: We are glad that Sir Rabindranath Tagore has consented to deliver the Hubbert Lectures in the Oxford University this year.
INDIAN LABOUR IN CEYLON.

(By Spectator.)

I disembarked at Colombo with an Indian labourer. He was a bell-metal worker in the city. He played the good Samaritan to me in the boat in which I crossed over from Tuticorin. He continued his kind offices during my stay in Ceylon, indeed, longer than I needed, and sometimes even to my embarrassment. I liked his company, and he would leave me on no consideration.

We went together to his lodgings. It was a big house, but sheltered a population not quite unworthy of an ordinary village in India. If the challenge is made I can type here straightway the names of a hundred persons who lived in that house. They, however, made a delightfully happy family. They cooked their food, washed their clothes, fetched and carried and earned about a rupee a day each. They told me that on an average each saved Rs. 15 a month. Most of them did job-work and almost invariably found something to do every day. Some of them were permanently employed in big shops. As I lived with them for sometime I could see that they led extremely frugal lives and thrived on honest labour. Such of them as could read spent their leisure time in reading the "Ramayana," or "Mahabharata" while the others listened.

But the same thing cannot be said of all the labourers in the city. It takes all kinds to make the world of Indian labour in Ceylon, and as it is over seven hundred thousand there must obviously be things that sadden no less than things that gladden. But the Indian labourers in the towns of Ceylon can be better off in Ceylon than in India if they care.

It is however only a very small fraction of the labour that flows from India to the island that seeks or finds employment in towns. The bulk of this labour is recruited from India by agents called Kangani and is employed in the numerous tea and rubber estates of the island. These estates are mostly owned by European planters. There are about six hundred thousand Indian labourers working in these plantations. In fact, these estates mostly depend upon India for labour.

Of this India has plenty. Nearly all the labour required is drawn from South India. The poorer districts of the Madras Presidency and those suffering from scarcity yield most of the emigrants. In the year 1926, 104,746 estate labourers emigrated from India to Ceylon. Trichinopoly sent 35,300 hands, Salem 12,934, Tanjore 8,536, Madura 5,510, the State of Pondicherry 5,918, Travancore 611, Mysore 373 and Cochin 105. These figures are an excellent index of the economic conditions of the districts. Conditions in Trichinopoly and Salem must have been akin to famine to drive so many of their useful inhabitants for estate work in Ceylon.

The welfare of such a large number of labourers must naturally be of some importance. The Government of India have their Agent in Ceylon to look after their interests. The Agent has little power but great responsibility. He cannot lay down the law to the planters. He will be able to discharge his responsibility in the measure in which he possesses the power to persuade. On the other hand, it should not be difficult to prevail upon the planters to treat the emigrants justly as, since the existence of the estates largely depends upon labour from India, it is manifestly their interest to do so. Major J. W. Oldfield who, at the time of my visit to Ceylon, was the President of the Planters' Association told me that it was their ancient and just claim to treat the Indian emigrant labourers generously. I have bad little reason to doubt the sincerity of what he told me from all I heard and saw. The mind of the average planter is not, however, over-sympathetic to the labourer.

Mr. S. Ranganathan, M.A., I.O.M., who left Ceylon some months ago was the Agent of the Government of India for the last four years. Combining as he does real ability, persuasive reasoning and quiet tact he, I think, was able to make the estate labourers in the island much better than he found them. The trend of his mind can be best understood from a brief sentence in which he states the case of labour, "The criterion which matters is whether every Indian labourer is well off in Ceylon, not whether he is better off than in India." It can hardly be denied that he is generally speaking, perhaps, better off in Ceylon than in India. It can hardly be contended that he is yet well off in Ceylon judged by the standards that are prevalent in the island. But he is making good enough progress.

"Overcrowding on estates," says the late Agent, "was pronounced at the end of 1925. It is less to-day; but I have to repeat that on some estates housing arrangements are not adequate even now." Mr. Ranganathan has some vigorous words to say regarding the inadequacy of medical relief in the majority of estates. He speaks of "the utter inefficiency of the average estate dispensary and advocates the establishment of a dispensary for every group of 750 labourers under a trained apothecary and having a trained midwife. He, however, admits that the planters of Ceylon are becoming conscious of the need for change and allotments with approbation to the excellent improvements that have already been affected by some of the estates. Infantile mortality among the labourers is decreasing. "This year's rate is a striking improvement on the rate recorded in 1924," which was 256 per thousand births. Mr. Ranganathan says that almost every labourer suffers from 'hookworm.' "The Ceylon Government have," however, "instituted an extensive 'anti-hookworm' campaign in the planting districts." Every estate will soon have a school as a result of the movement inaugurated by the Director of Education in Ceylon. Nearly hundred estates have either started schools or will have them soon. This is certainly encouraging. But an equally disheartening thing to note is that in the year 1925 the Indian labourers spent Rs. 30 lakhs on drink supplied at the taverns. Mr. Ranganathan pleads that every adult labourer should be given the local option vote. The Planters' Association regarded the suggestion impracticable. "The last word, however, remains with the Ceylon Government, and has not been said," remarks Mr. Rangathan. The Agent has also advocated the establishment of co-operative stores in the estates. The Standard Wage Ordinance which has now become law must greatly improve the condition of labourers. The Ordinance fixes standard rates of wages for the Indian labourers in the estates, makes the issue of a one-eighth basket of rice to each working man and woman with a non-working child obligatory, fixes the rates for piece work, makes the issue of good rice to the labourers at a fixed price obligatory, enforces regular payment of wages into the labourers' own hands and prohibits the employment of children under ten years of age. Mr. Rangathan hoped that the Standard Wages Ordinance would soon be followed by a Medical Wards Ordinance and a Housing Ordinance.

It would thus be seen that the condition of Indian labour in Ceylon is, perhaps, better than its condition in India itself, and that it might soon become satisfactory, wherever it has not already become for a country like Ceylon where the standard of comfort attained is high. It must, however, be remembered that a good many Indian labourers return every year to India with no intention of crossing over again. That means that the new Agent has to continue the work of Mr. Rangathan with the courage and sincerity that distinguished it.

LATE MRS. CHANDRASEKHARA IYER.
The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.
Sir,

I have much regret to learn the sad news of the death of Mrs. Chandrasekhara Iyer of Bangalore at Delhi where she had gone to attend the second All-India Women's Conference held in the second week of this month. I first saw Mrs. Chandrasekhara Iyer in the last Indian National Social Conference at Madras when she made a homely and telling speech on Women's Rights in Tamil. To be sure there was no flash of rhetoric in the speech but she indubitably made out a strong case for the abolition of all inequalities in the matter of marriage laws, adoption and guardianship of children and inheritance of property between man and woman. Indeed, she focussed in herself the revolt of Indian womanhood in the South against any kind of inequality in all relations between man and woman. Her death is, indeed, a great loss to the women's movement in the South. It may be truthfully said of the late Mrs. Chandrasekhara Iyer that she died in harness. May her noble soul rest in peace!

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM.
The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.
Sir,

It is a really healthy sign for the country that child widow marriage is gaining ground everywhere. Such marriages however have been very rare among influential families of the orthodox South Indian Brahmins. Under the social circumstances in which we are placed, it required indomitable courage and an iron will to break through old prejudices. The higher sub-castes of Brahmins have to this day consistently stuck to their old customs like a glorious heritage. The Bhargava community which is an admittedly advanced section of the Ghauri, Brahmins of the Northern part of the country realised the necessity of child widow marriage about 18 years ago and passed a resolution favouring that reform. But social prejudices die hard and even the most advanced members of the country did not evince the necessary moral courage to set an example in the matter. Now at last after 18 years, Pandit Gauri Shanker Bhargava of Ajmer, a leading member of the community, has set the example and arranged to perform the marriage of his younger brother Mr. Indra Bhan with a child widow in an influential Bhargava family of Rewari, the centre of Brahmin orthodoxy in this area.

The family of Pandit Gauri Shanker Bhargava is well known not only in Ajmer-Merwara but throughout India, specially owing to the unselfish services rendered by him during the non-cooperation days. His grand father, Munshi Ghansam Ram Bhargava was one of the leading legal practitioners of the Ajmer Bar. After him came Mr. Gauri Shanker's father, Munshi Phul Chand who is still remembered throughout the province for his sense of justice and independence as an Extra Assistant Commissioner in Ajmer-Merwara. This family is connected by marriages with some of the well-known families of Northern India, amongst whom mention may be made of the family of Mr. Nawal Kishore of Lucknow.

The bride-groom Indra Bhan is famous in Ajmer for his self-sacrifices. He has been a leading spirit of the Seva Samiti Boy Scouts. He has voluntarily undertaken the lead in this matter. Though himself a bachelor, he declined the hand of several Virgins for the sake of the Reform. We congratulate him on his noble resolve. The spirit shown by the ladies of the family is simply commendable. Pandit Gauri Shanker's mother cannot be praised too much for the great courage displayed by her in sanctioning the marriage.

Prominent leaders of the Hindu country like Dr. Moonje, Lalajal Rai, Dr. Gopinath Chaudhry, Shastri Pandit Shanker and others are expected to attend the marriage ceremony which will take place at Rewari on the 8th March, 1928; and thus give their moral support to the Reform. A few days ago the Sada ceremony took place in the presence of a distinguished gathering amid shouts of "Jai" in honour of Parvati Devi, the mother of Pandit Gauri Shanker Bhargava, Katchery Road, Ajmer.

Yours etc.,
2nd March 1928.

THE HINDU MISSIONARY SOCIETIES.
The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.
Sir,

'To be out for conversion' for conversion's sake is not a formula which any responsible body will keep before itself as its guide. The orthodox group of a great religion has to keep watch and ward over the treasures of one's religion; while the reforming party who are the pioneers of the future have to use their direction in adopting measures and changes suited to the altered conditions of the times. The conversion movement of the Hindu Society, ought not to be a reckless experiment to secure questionable additions to the Hindu fold as such. It will do us no good in mimicking the exact methods of the Christian Missions working in India. It is highly dangerous to imitate
'the follies, follies and incapacities' of the ruling race in any matter whatsoever. Religious conviction must be the basis upon which conversions should take place as a rule in general. The main mission of the Hindu Missionary Societies is obviously to admit people back to Hinduisn who had lost it in various ways.
Our is not a proselytizing religion like Islam or the brotherhood of Christ. Occasionally, people born and brought up in other religions may be admitted to Hindusm, but on no other ground except that of deep religious conviction. There is no pleasure in counting the number of people who follow a particular religion.
It is the quality of the individual unit that determines the dignity of a particular corporate religious belief.

The social aspect of the question is equally delicate as it is dangerous. Our differences—social as well as religious—are not few and far between. Nor with respect to these is there any definite solution yet in sight.
We are arranging our own houses, putting things in order, minimizing differences and in fact adopting our means to suit our altered circumstances. At such a time like this, when the work of Hindu Missionary Societies is proceeding in healthy channels there should be no wild excursions. Let our missions keep at arm's length such conversions. The Arya Samaj, the Brahmo Sama, the Prarthana Samaj and the Hindu Missionary Society of Bombay are some of India's leading Institutions, that have rendered and are rendering valuable service to the cause of Hindu religion. The services of Swami Vivekananda in acquainting the Western world with the subtlety and beauty of the Vedant philosophy, are ever fresh in our minds. By means of his poetry and drama, our world famous Dr. Rabindranath Tagore, has well and, perhaps, almost conquered some of the mighty and deep thinking beauty of the world and thus planted the banner of Hindusm high up in the domain of religion. Though the services in this direction of these and many more great men and women of India are such that any great nation may be proud of them, yet the work before us, Hindus and especially before the Hindu Missions is of a very complicated nature, demanding great caution and an equal amount of patience. No Hindu Missionary Society ought to use its dignity, and forget its sense of propriety in undertaking the performance of a religious conversion. It should lend no countenance to legal quibbles and diplomatic differences. To cure the defects of Hinduism, to supplement it by forms and practices necessitated by the changing world of ideas and relations and to aid and perform conversions with a good motive behind—such is the chief work of our Missions. Let it be remembered that conversions are meant to be a cure for religious minds.

A REPLY TO "MOTHER INDIA."

The Rev. Dr. Alden H. Clark of Ahmednagar contributes the following article under the heading, Is India Dying to the Young Men of India?

In "Mother India," Miss Katherine Mayo presents India as a sick man growing daily weaker, dying body and brain, of a disease that only himself can cure.

What this disease is, she states, in the following way:—
"The whole pyramid of India's woes, material and spiritual,............. rests on a rock bottom physical base.
The base is simply this, his manner of getting into the world and his sex life thenceforward." To support this contention Miss Mayo marshals a mass of quantations. India vividly of her own investigations during some months of feverish activity in India, and makes some startling general assertions which, if proved, would go far to establish her claim.
"Are Miss Mayo's charges true?" This is the question that a perplexed Western public is naturally asking. What I propose to do in this article is to prove beyond any reasonable doubt, that her basic assertions are not true, that she has leaped with magnificent agility from one-sided and limited evidence to her general conclusions and that India remains the same land of mingled ed sorrow and hope, darkness and vision, weakness and strength that she was before Miss Mayo made her very American whirlwind tour. Above all, I shall show that India is on the upward road with her face toward the morning.

Miss Mayo's chief sin against India was her almost complete blindness to every evidence of health and progress and her morbid over-emphasis on every evidence of sickness and decay. The pity is that she has gather-med material that, used discriminately might have stung India to the speeding up of reform. It seems to me that she had a fresh and very powerful message on the hateful effects of sex exaggeration and on other outstanding evils, if only she had been able to present it in a balanced and friendly way. If she had pictured the encouraging aspect of things with the same emotional effect with which she depicted the discouraging aspect we who have been working for decades for India's physical and social uplift would have welcomed the book as an ally. As it is, the net effect on India of its publication is angry reaction rather than reform.

"Mother India" has struck a blow both against truth and against inter-racial understanding and good-will. By its extreme attack on Indian life it has stirred Indians to bitter defence and has opened the door for similar much-raking attacks on America and Europe. Indian writers, smarting under this "Drain Inspector's Report," as Miss Mayo cleverly calls this book, are opening before the eager eyes and noses of the Indian public the noble desire of our own divorce statistics and nitelife. It is only human if, profiting by Miss Mayo's example, they draw unwarranted generalizations from specific instances and do all in their power to cheapen Western civilization in Indian eyes. So far as the influence of this book goes it is calculated to lower the tone of civilization by stimulating people in both East and West to interpret each other by everything that is low and beastly.

Now let us go to the facts. In so doing we shall emphasize those that form the first third of the book and the heart of its argument—those in regard to sex and motherhood. Still, in passing, one cannot forbear point out that the letter part of the Mother India is marked by the same emphasis on everything negative and neglect of everything positive that make the first part an offence. Omissions, misstatements and misunderstandings bob up so frequently that, if one were to try to hit them all, he would have to be a ten-armed Irishman, with a shield in every hand.
Take, for example, the problem of food for cattle dealt with at some length in Chapter XVII, Miss Mayo speaks of grazing lands and the feeding of rice stalks, which have little food value, and clearly implies that, aside from some green fodder in some districts, this is all that the cattle have to live upon. "By January," she says, in regard to India's cattle, "starvation begins in earnest." In this statement she entirely ignores the millets which are reaped in October and February and which as the Indian Year Book rightly says—"constitute one of the most important group of crops in the country 'supplying food for the poorer classes and fodder for the cattle." Sorgum is the principal millet, has large thick stalks that make splendid fodder. In the farmer's eyes the fact that this is a fodder crop is as important as the fact that it is a food crop. In travelling through India Miss Mayo must have seen mile on mile of fields full of waving millet. In the villages she could not fail to note the great stacks of this fodder. In good seasons farmers sell much to the towns and store enough for two years' use of their cattle. It seems to me to keeping with the accuracy of other parts of this book for the author, in writing on the food of cattle, wholly to neglect to notice that Indian farmers, aside from great areas of grazing land, devote about 40,000,000 acres to good fodder crops and then to sum up the chapter with the assertion: "they will not raise food for their mother, the cow.

In Western India, to my personal knowledge, the farmer and his family have an affection for their cattle, each one of which is named. In times of scarcity the family deprives itself in order that the cattle may be fed. In her concluding chapter Miss Mayo asserts that this book states living facts and that "these can easily be denied but they cannot be disproved or shaken." But here her general assertion that "they will not raise food for their mother, the cow" has been very easily disproved. Nor do I recollect a single one of the twenty-nine descriptive chapters of the book which does not create the sombre impression by a similar method. Just as here Miss Mayo omitted the 40,000,000 acres of good fodder crops, so throughout she omits or minimizes the greatest margin of favourable evidence that is ready to her hand and concentrates on the ugly and nocuous.

Miss Mayo gives great prominence to quotations from Rabindranath Tagore which she presents as though in them Tagore expressed his approval of child marriage. In order to give this impression she has suppressed in her quotation the two all-important words "as said India." In the passages where she quotes as representing Tagore's own opinion he was, as these words clearly indicated, presenting not his own but the orthodox Hindu view.

Later in the same essay he gave his own exalted conception of marriage, in which he accords to woman a position of absolute equality with man. Yet Miss Mayo holds him up to scorn as the advocate of child marriage! Miss Mayo can offer Tagore no adequate recompense for this absolute misrepresentation. She quotes with great appreciation Miss N. H. Bose of Lahore. Miss Bose whose integrity no one questions, flatly contradicts three statements put into her mouth and calls a fourth "quite inaccurate." She says, for instance, that Miss Mayo's report of the pandit of tottering age teaching girls through a curtain used to be true 40 years ago, but that now pandits teach "without purdah." When the author deals in this cavalier and careless fashion with quotations from books and from persons named, what reliance can we place on the large number of her quotations from unnamed witnesses, especially when some of these quotations clearly bear within themselves the mark of misrepresentation?

Miss Mayo tells the story of the mixing of filtered and unfiltered water in Madras, as an indication of what can be expected from Indian control of affairs. How could she have heard this story without learning the striking fact that this water was universally known as "Molony's Mixture," that Mr. J.C. Molony, an able officer of the Indian Civil Service and Municipal President of Madras, was primarily responsible for it, and that he was backed in this war measure, which was so carefully done that it had no bad effect, by the Europeans of the Municipality? These facts Mr. Molony himself has made public. Her case against Indian political control is indeed in a desperate state when she is driven to use "Molony's Mixture" to bolster it up!

Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya writes—

The All India Women's Conference on Educational Reform marks a new era in the history of the women's educational movement in India. The unqualified success the conference attained when it met at its second session, points to its growing popularity and power, and establishes for itself a firm footing on the strength of its own importance. It was the most representative Women's Conference ever held in India, every province and also many of the Indian States being well represented. Women of every caste and creed worked with a unity of purpose, knowing no distinction, recognising no barrier, all filled with zeal and unbounded love for the great cause. The Muslim ladies attended in far larger numbers than they had ever done at any other public gathering and the presence of H. H. the Begum of Bhopal seemed to form a link between the two sections of the Indian community, each with its own culture and tradition, trying to synthesise the diversity and hand down the rich union to their posterity.

Two Resolutions passed at the conference dealt with various subjects of diverse interest. While reiterating the old demands of last year, it made considerable additions. Special mention may be made of the resolution asking that agriculture be made a compulsory subject in schools in rural areas and optional in all other schools and colleges. Women have now begun to realise how sadly divorced the present education is from the daily needs of the rural population, thus defeating its own end. It also recognised the value of cinema films in education and 'favoured their case,' in schools, particularly in rural areas, for educational purposes. The Conference once again stressed the necessity of giving a fuller representation on all educational boards as well as Text-book Committees, for unless women have the fullest opportunity to study and investigate the matter and have a voice in the shaping of the educational policy, education will not progress on the right lines. It also requested the Government to nominate without delay, at least two ladies in the Central Legislature particularly in view of questions of social legislation, such as child marriage and Devadasi, coming up.

The question of child marriage was treated as one of great importance. Special reference was made to it in the Presidential address. The resolution as passed by the Conference condemned the custom in strong terms and called on the Central Legislature to support the ban by bringing in the necessary legislation. While welcoming PaI Saheb Sarda’s Bill on this question, it protested against the age limit in the Bill and asked the sponsor as well as the Select Committee to raise the age for girls and boys to 16 and 30 respectively. The resolution was followed up by the Conference women waiting on a deputation to the Viceroy and the leaders of the various parties in the Assembly.

WORK OF THE CONFERENCE

The conference has embarked upon its second year a very definite and clear cut plan of work. During the first year of its existence the Conference had devoted itself mostly to the task of bringing about a general awakening among the women, thus doing the spade work in creating the necessary soil in which the fruitful seeds of future work have now been sown. The Standing Committee of the Conference has appointed 4 Sub-Committees to deal with matters which it considers of vital importance for the general progress of education. The Committees deal respectively with the drafting of a special curriculum based on the ideal of the Conference, creation of new text books, the question of the training of teachers and to carry on a campaign for the raising of the marriageable age. The work of the Sub-Committee will prove of very great interest not only to educationalists but the country at large, since this is the first instance when women have come forth in their own independent capacity to investigate into these problems and give a definite shape to their views on these matters which are bound to bring in a fresh influx of ideas and add to the quality of education and particularly of women.

To put the Conference on a sound financial basis a Central Fund called the All-India Women’s Conference was started during the Conference Session itself and nearly Rs. 80,000 were subscribed on the spot. H. H. the Begum mother heading the list with Rs. 5000. The collections will be carried on by a Committee formed from among the delegates to the Conference, with Mrs. Faridoonji of Hyderabad (Deccan) as convener and 2 representatives of the Imperial Bank Hyderabad (Deccan) as joint Treasurers. A Sub-Committee has also been formed with Begum Habibullah and Mrs. S. R. Desa to start collection work immediately. The Funds will be utilized to carry on propaganda and other work of the Conference and also to help the work of the Sub-Committee.

The women had set to work with remarkable earnestness and a strong practical instinct, to create new destiny for their county and they seemed to have struck the right keynote when they laid it down that the spirit of social service be insulated at every stage of education.

One can almost see the day when they with their originality of vision and strength of purpose, will have attained their goal.

WOMEN’S RIGHT TO INHERITANCE

A mass meeting of the women of Baroda was held on Tuesday evening (6th instant) at the Maharajah Theatre to voice the opinion of the women of the State on the legislative measures proposed by His Highness the Maharajah’s Government for entitling to a certain extent the Hindu women to inherit the property of their husbands and parents. Mrs. Sharda Sumant Mehta presided. Her Highness the Maharani of Baroda, Shrimati Shaktunata Raje and several other ladies of the Royal family were present among others.

Mrs. Mehta, at the outset, explained the outlines of the measures proposed by the Baroda Government and said that it was the first time the women of Baroda had met to consider a problem of their rights. It was a red-letter day in the history of the movement of the emancipation of women in Gujerat. The condition of Hindu women as existed was simply abominable. Mrs. Mehta drew a vivid picture of the horrors of Hindu widows who in spite of some of them being wives of rich men had to lead a life of a pauper because the law makers of the land did not choose to include the wife’s right to inheritance. The law in the case of Muslim women was entirely different. They were entitled to inherit the property of both the husband and the father.

A DEPLORABLE FACT

Continuing, Mrs. Mehta said that it was deplorable that the Englishmen who were born of free mothers, in whose country chivalry was at its best, where women were considered equals of men, should have framed such laws in India as have deprived women of their rights as human beings. She deplored even more the attitude of Indian Nationalist leaders who were trying to establish Swaraj without the women of the country on their side. She concluded with an appeal to emancipate the woman first and give her the same rights as man. “This done,” Mrs. Mehta declared, “you will not have to go far to get Swaraj.”

MAHARAJA’S ADDRESS

Her Highness Maharani Chimanbai, addressing the meeting, condemned in very strong terms the contemptible manner in which Hindu widows were treated by the society. She said: “Unless we women are economically independent our fate is sealed. To fight for and get this economic independence women must educate themselves first. Unless you are educated, you would not be considered fit. Unless you are educated, you would not understand exactly the position in which you are rotting. I, therefore, insist on female education as the first and foremost step for the amelioration of our sex. I do not believe in repairing our past glories. It does not at all matter to me whether my ancestors thousands of years ago were sages or brutes. What we must think about is our present condition.”

BEGUN CHARITY AT HOME.

Continuing, Her Highness referred to “Mother India” of Miss Mayo and said that though most of the libellous allegations against the women of India in that book were absolutely false and unfounded there were some which deserved the careful attention of the well-wishers of India whose duty it was to do away with the wrong done to women. Unless it was done, it was no use asking for national independence. It was always wise to begin charity at home and Her Highness reminded of it to Indian leaders who were clamouring for Swaraj. Unless social conditions of Indians improved there was little hope of a good government in the country.

Concluding the Maharani asked her hearers to take advantage of the many social legislations provided by His Highness the Maharaja Gaekwad such as the "Prevention of Child Marriage Act," the Compulsory Education Act, etc., and continue to fight for all the elementary rights of human beings.

WANTED EQUAL STATUS.

A resolution demanding an equal right for unmarried daughter to share equally the father's property with her brother or brothers and the 'right for the widow' to share equally the property of her husband with her sons and unmarried daughters was then passed unanimously.

The meeting then dispersed with a vote of thanks for Her Highness the Maharani and Mrs. Sharda Mehta.

WOMEN'S EDUCATIONAL REFORM.

To popularise some of the resolutions passed at the All-India Women's Educational Conference, recently held at Delhi, a public meeting was held on 29th instant at the Gokhale Hall, under the Presidency of Dr. (Mrs) Muthulakshmi Reddi. A large number of ladies and gentlemen attended the meeting.

Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi said they were met to welcome back their delegates to the All-India Women's Educational Conference and obtain from them firsthand knowledge about the success of that Conference. She referred to the death of Mrs. Chandrasekhara Aiyar and hoped that they would follow her noble example in the cause of social reform.

LATE MRS. CHANDRASEKHARA AIYAR.

The following resolution was then moved from the chair and carried:

"This public meeting of women and men of Madras expresses its sorrow at the tragic and most unexpected death of Mrs. Chandrasekhara Aiyar of Bangaluru and offers its heartfelt sympathy and condolence to Mr. Chandrasekhara Aiyar at the sad bereavement and separation caused to him and futher records its appreciation of her services in the Women's cause and feels that her loss to the country at this juncture is irreparable."

Mrs. Lakshmana Rao, one of the delegates to the Conference, who could attend the meeting owing to indisposition had sent a message through her daughter, in course of the letter she stated that the Delhi Conference was a unique gathering of the womanhood of India. Within a short time the conference was able to gain the respect and esteem alike of the people and the Government and encouragement from the Native States. This was because women had come to realise the greatest need for reforms. They had faith and hope and confidence in what they had set their hearts to do. Educational advancement was at the root of the national well-being. When women progressed and helped men in all their activities there could be no doubt as to the future success. She then pointed out how the response from other provinces in the matter of funds for the Con-} ference to carry on its work was fair and hoped that Madras would not lag behind in the matter.

Delhi Conference Resolutions.

Miss Baker addressed the meeting next. She said that it was a healthy sign of life amongst women of India that so many different aspects of education were touched upon at the Conference. The speeches made showed the breadth of outlook. The main important resolution passed was one relating to compulsory education for girls. If India was to go forward her masses should be educated. Difficulties were not impossibilities and difficulties should be overcome. The next resolution was regarding the raising of the marriage age. This had a close connection with education in that when girls were married they nearly always stopped away from school. In this matter public opinion was far more important than legislation. They should realise the evils of child marriage and the absolute necessity for compulsory education. Need for physical training for women was another matter discussed at the Conference. It was also urged that there should be women members on all educational bodies, not only to look after the interest of women but also to put forward women's point of view as regards men's education. They also passed a resolution for appointing women to inspect schools in country districts. Though it would be a hard task for women to go about in village parts it was very essential because they could understand children's mind better than men. It was also urged that at every stage of education the spirit of social service should be inculcated in children. Teaching of agriculture in village schools was emphasised. They discussed the necessity for starting nursery schools but did not pass a resolution to the effect. In conclusion, the speaker said that they wanted to put women's education on the same ideal as men's. They looked to the public to help them to carry those ideals into realities.

An Appeal to the Public.

Mrs. Cousins pointed out that the number of delegates at the Delhi Conference was more than three times the number who attended the Poona Conference the previous year. About 83 different constituent areas had sent their delegates. All creeds, castes and interests were represented. At the opening ceremony the women showed their power of organisation. All the arrangements were beautifully made. For the first time in the history they were accorded a public welcome by the municipality. A large number of men, including members of the Legislative Assembly attended their session. It was made clear that when women entered public life they would bring more beauty into it. There was much eloquence at the Conference. There were very few written speeches. Vivid interest was played at discussions. Another characteristic of the Conference was the spirit of comradeship and unity. They were able to know much of each other and each other's religious ideas. Every one felt the need for speeding up women's education so as to reach the same level as men. They felt that education was of vital importance for carrying forward every reform. The delegates visited the Legislative Assembly and it so happened that Sir H. Gour Bill was being discussed at that time. They were able to find out the attitude of Government in the matter and how they stood in the way of women's reforms. This filled them with indignation and they waited on H. B. the Vicereiy for a deputation. They urged upon His Excellency the necessity for having an equal number of men and women on the Committee to which Sir. H. Gour’s Bill might be referred to. His Excellency had promised to put women in that Committee, though he did not specify the number. They next went in a deputation to the members of the Legislative Assembly. Phulji Motilal Nehru assured them that their cause would not suffer through any action of the Swarajists. In conclusion she appealed for public co-operation to carry on their work.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The Girgaum Co-operative Conference: The Hon. Secretary writes: The Girgaum District Co-operative Institute has decided to hold the Co-operative Conference on the 25th of March 1925, and Mr. B. S. Breif, Editor of the Bombay Chronicle, has kindly consented to preside on the occasion. This being the first Conference of its kind that the District is organizing it is expected that the ladies and gentlemen of the District will show great enthusiasm in making the Conference a great success.

Badakhshian Ashram: R. C. A. The Ashram, a branch centre of the Ramkrishna Mission, has, within the short period of a year of its existence, proved its usefulness by its silent activity. It has been holding regular classes on the Vedanta philosophy and has emphasized the harmony underlying all forms of religion by celebrating the birthdays of Buddha, Srl Khristos Jesus Christ and other world teachers. It has been helping with money a few deserving poor students. Lastly it has done splendid relief work in Cambay, Baroda and British territories affected by the last disastrous flood, which work has been highly appreciated by the local people and the newspapers. Now it proposes to celebrate the ninety-third birthday anniversary of Srl Ramkrishna on the 19th March, 1925. If sufficient monetary help be forthcoming the feeding of the poor will be a special feature of the occasion.

Widow Marriage in Bombay: Under the auspices of the Widow Marriage Association Bombay, the marriage of Mr. Shirechan, son of Garamwall, with Shrimati Keshba (widow) daughter of Bhadu Vandivelkar of Maharastra was celebrated with great pomp and show in the Araya Samaj Mandir, Kakadwadi, Girgaum, Bombay. The Hall was quite full with interested public. The ceremony was one of the most solemn and impressive part because it was intercaste and inter-provincial. The learned pandits of Aiyé Sinha] performed the ceremony according to the Vedic rules. The function was made interesting by beautiful songs just suiting to the occasion. Light refreshment was given to all present. The sum of Rs. 85 was contributed to the funds of the different institutions from the bride-groom side. The ceremony came to a close with the prayer for the long life and prosperous combination of the bride and bride-groom. In short it was one of the most important and highly attended ceremony in the Araya Samaj.

Prof. Raman’s Discovery: Prof. C. V. Raman, F.R.A., Calcutta University, has made a discovery which promises to be of far-reaching effect in the scientific world. Shortly after the publication of Compton’s discovery, other experimenters sought to find whether a similar transformation occurs also when ordinary light is scattered by matter and reported definitely negative results, Prof. Raman with his research associates took up this question afresh, and his experiments have disclosed a new kind of radiation from atoms excited by light. The new phenomenon exhibits features even more startling than those discovered by Compton with X-rays. The principle feature observed is that when matter is excited by light of one colour, the atoms contained in it emit light of two colours, one of which is different from the exciting colour and is lower down the spectrum. The astounding thing is that the unlike colour is quite independent of the nature of the substance used. It changes, however, with the nature of the exciting radiation and if the latter gives a sharp line in the spectrum, the second colour also appears as a second sharp line. There is in addition a diffuse radiation spread over a considerable range of the spectrum. Prof. Raman’s discovery is almost incredible as it is not indicated by existing theories of radiation.

FIRE INSURANCE.
MILLOWNERS & SHIPPERS OF INDIA.
Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establish their own Insurance Companies for covering the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have not helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislation in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

“The Mask Conversions, Shatras and Unsealability, Simon Commission at Mada. Widow Marriage Association, Lord Sima and Miss Mayo, Miss Miller’s Conversion, A Reply to ‘Mother India,’ Indian Statutory Commission, News of the Week.”

NOTES

The City College and Hindu Festivals: We are sorry for the trouble in the City College Hostel in Calcutta. The College is conducted as a Brahmo Samaj institution but the majority of students are Hindus as in many Christian Missionary Colleges. The Hindu boys in the College Hostel, it would soon, wished to celebrate the Sarasvat puja, in honour of the Hindu Minerva, but the principal, Mr. Heramba Chandra Maitra, who is a very distinguished educationist but a rather strait-laced Brahmo Samajist, prohibited it as an idolatrous function. A College is not a Church, nor a Hostel a Mandir. The boys go to the College for education and the Hostel for the time being is their home. The idea of taking advantage of the necessity of Hindu students to join the City College for secular education, to force on them the creed of the Brahmo Samaj, is not fair either to the students or the Samaj. We are sure that Keaj Ram Mohan Roy would not have approved of it. If prohibiting the puja in the Hostel, it is but one step to prohibiting it in the homes of the boys. The Principal knows very well that if he attempts to enforce his principles in the students in their homes, he will not succeed. To try to force it on them while temporarily under his jurisdiction in the Hostel, seems to us to be likely to produce either hypnotism or revolts. Many Christian missionaries have come to realise that it is better to be an idolator than an atheist, and they respect the sentiments of their Hindu pupils. It is surprising that Principal Maitra should adopt an attitude which, so far as the information available to us enables us to judge, strikes us as being narrow and out-of-date.

Lord Sinha’s Charities: We reprint elsewhere a letter written by Mr. N. N. Sirsar in which he points out, in repudiation of Miss Katherine Mayo’s calumny, the social benefits of Lord Sinha to his native village of Kairpur. We had not noticed this in our reading of Miss Mayo’s book, until Lord Sinha himself called attention to it. friends in England have been pressing for an English edition of the reprint of our articles in reply to that Lord Sinha should be requested. Miss Mayo’s book, and one of her suggestions is to write an introduction, in asking to be excused, Lord Sinha wrote: “I doubt if it would be of much use for me to write a foreword for the proposed English edition of your articles in reply to Miss Mayo’s “Mother India.” Personal rancour may be attributed to me, as she devoted half a chapter to vilifying me—an enronymously but sufficiently clearly to indicate whom she meant. I trust you will excuse me if I keep clear of the controversy, which is also getting stale now.” Mr. Sirsar says that Lord Sinha refused to have his benefactions advertised in order to robust Miss Mayo’s calumny.

Inter-Communal Harmony: Anglo-Indian officials and journals have been scoffing at the failure of the several Unity Conferences to find a solution for inter-communal differences. We do not believe in sudden panaceas and the slow progress that is being made in this matter is at least a guarantee that the steps agreed upon will not be retracted. That progress is being made, was well shown in the debate in the Legislative Assembly this week on the proposal to introduce in the Frontier Province an elected legislature and Ministers responsible to it for the transferred subjects as in other provinces. The question has been discussed for the last five years, but while Mahomedans were in favour of the reform, a section of Hindus hesitated to agree for fear that the Hindus who are a small minority in the province may not receive just treatment from the Mahomedan majority. The all-Parties Conference which has been sitting at Delhi, however, decided that the reforms be adopted, and when the matter came up before the Legislative Assembly, Lala Lajpat Rai, on behalf of the Hindus, gave his hearty support to the proposal which was adopted with a division. One question which has been creating controversy, is thus put out of the way, and there is every reason to hope that other questions too will be settled in the same broad and liberal spirit.

Statutory Commission and Nanto: The Simon Commission is evidently carrying on its investigations thoroughly. We publish a letter from Mr. George Joseph calling attention to the fact that in Tanjore and Madura the Commissioners were entertained at state parties by the Presidents of the respective District Boards, the one a Christian and the other an Eropean. Many years ago on the persistent agitation of social reformers nanto women were excluded from entertainments given to high officials. The advent of the Statutory Commission, however, has brought to the front reactionaries who apparently feel that they have now a clean slate to start with.

Catholics and Conversations: Referring to our remark in a recent issue that many Protestant missionaries have become sceptical about the method of organised proselytism, the Catholic Leader observes: “This may perhaps be true of some Protestant missionaries, but is wholly inapplicable to Catholic missionaries. They are not here merely to spread the influence of Christ but to Christianise all those whom they possibly can. And Christianity does not mean a vague belief in Christ and a theoretical appreciation of His moral teaching but a practical acceptance of His philosophy of life. Christianity is a religious system, involving a rule of faith and a rule of conduct. Catholic missionaries never try to convert any one by unfair methods, force or fraud, but by persuasion—by exposing the truth and the excellence of the Christian religion." The implication apparently is that Protestant Missions are not equally against the use of objectionable means of making converts. That is a point which may be left to Protestant missionaries to answer. What we meant was that Christian missionaries are realising that mass conversions do not solve any problem, but merely transfer the responsibility for their solution to one group of religionists to another.

Who are Christians? The Leader in the paragraph quoted above says Christianity involves a rule of faith and of conduct. But in the next paragraph it writes in a different sense, "Many Hindus think that the precepts intended for the close followers and chosen disciples of Christ and those intended for all the faithful, though these latter too are not prescribed from continuing to the ideal of perfection. As for the so-called Christian nations which are they? Many European Governments and peoples have ceased to be Christian. In America there are to-day 63 million unbaptised people. Pr. Ronald Knox writing in the Universe says that one-eighth of England consists of Catholics and practising Anglicans, one-twentieth of Non-conformists and "the rest a nation without a God."

Statistics are not available for other so-called Christian countries. With large numbers of people unregistered by the waters of baptism, can these nations be called Christians? If we understand the acceptation, Christ's "counsels of perfection" are not obligatory on all Christians but only on his "close followers" and "chosen disciples," though even others "are invited" to conform to them. To be called "Christian nations", and many European governments and peoples have ceased to be Christian, notwithstanding that they are not obliged to follow Christ's "counselling of perfection"!

Lady Member in C.F. Council: We welcome the nomination of Mrs. Anusuyabai Kale to the Legislative Council of the Central Provinces and Berar. Mrs. Kale was sworn in on the 8th instant and received the congratulations of the President and other members. While acknowledging them in her maiden speech she said, "While I fully appreciate the compliment paid, I do not deceive myself into thinking that it is a personal compliment. I am too keenly aware of my many shortcomings. I have no value for it as a compliment paid to the cause which I have been called upon to represent. I interpret it as a signal of the fast changing spirit of the times. It is a sure recognition of the growing consciousness among the women of India about their own special needs, rights and privileges and a desire to be heard in all matters which vitally affect them. In accepting this responsibility I am only following the recommendations received at the All-India Women's Conference on Educational Reform. On behalf of the women of this province I sincerely thank the honourable members of this Council for the initiative they took sometime ago in removing the sex disqualification for the membership of this Council. But for that act, the women would not have been given the opportunity to make a report before the women could take advantage of the political rights. In these days of communal representation and the reservation of seats for the backward classes, it would be extremely doubtful if women will have a chance at the polls.

A Goa Donation: The following was published in the Times of India on the 15th instant. The voluntary recoveries of Gavada Christians to Hinduism, in thousands, in Goa territories has roused the clergyman there to action. The latest advices from Goa to the Hindu Sabha here state that Messrs. Anandmurti and Ganpatiboa, the precepts intended for the close followers of the local authorities of the Goa Government, the following members of the Bombay Legislative Council: We welcome the nominations of Mr. Lalji Desai, P. R. Rao Bahadur Kambli, Vice-President, Bombay Legislative Council; Mr. R. G. Savarkar, Dr. M. A. Chidchuk, Dr. N. D. Savarkar, R. A. Gore, S. L. Silam, S. K. Pupala, L. R. Fains, D. M. A. Voltar. The signatures include all castes of Hindus Brahmins, Marathas, Bhillas, Dambus and the Scheduled classes. Portugal is now a Republic and there is no state religion, and if the local authorities fail to give redress the matter should be taken up to Lisbon.

MANAGER'S NOTICE:

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, MARCH 17, 1928.

THE NASIK CONVERSION.

In admitting Miss Nancy Miller to the Hindu fold on Tuesday at Nasik, Dr. Kurtzoth maintained that the gates of Hinduism from the earliest times had been open to all new-comers but from some extraneous reasons they had been closed, the most important of which was the loss of political independence by Hindus. Owing to their position of dependence, he added, Hindus had been forced to close up their ranks and limit their society to those who were born in it. This, of course, is quite correct. It is a well-known fact that up to the time of the Mahomedan conquest, Hinduism received into its fold many different races who migrated from other countries. At the same time, there does not seem to have been any conversion, as evidenced by the existence of distinct communities such as Jews, Syrian Christians and Parsees who were certainly in India before the Moslem conquest. Dr. Kurtzoth said that there was authority in the Vedas for the admission of non-Hindus and that if Christians and Mussalmans were not specially designated as eligible for admission, it was because there were neither Christians nor Mussalmans when the Vedas were composed. In an important respect, conversion to Hinduism, according to Dr. Kurtzoth, was different from conversion to any other religion. When a person became a Mussalman or a Christian, he gives up his previous religion. Conversion to Hinduism, however, does not involve any such incident. "To admit Christians or Mahomedans to Hinduism," said Dr. Kurtzoth, "is not to ask those who seek it to give up their own faiths but rather to enable them to enlarge their outlook and widen their horizon and live a broader and more tolerant life doing what is in one's power to promote the happiness of the world. That is in short the essence of Hindu Dharma." In accordance with this view, Miss Miller, now Sharmiakt, in acknowledging the congratulations of the vast concourse which had assembled on the banks of the Godavari to witness the ceremony of her conversion, declared that in formally severing her connection with the Christian Church, she was not giving up Christianity. "For," said she, "I know nothing in the true religion of Christ that can be discarded without disadvantage. I hope the true spirit of Christianity will continue to be with me and be a source of inspiration in the days to come and it is indeed a great consolation to feel that the true spirit of Hinduism not only tolerates such an attitude as mine, but welcomes it as being essential for seekers after truth."

The conversion of Miss Miller has a significance apart from her contemplated marriage with the Maharaja Holkar. One swallow, it is true, does not make a summer, but it is also true that a straw shows which way the wind blows. The necessity for relaxing the bonds of Hindu society has been felt for several centuries past. The bhakti movements of medieval India all more or less aimed at reconciling the conflict of creeds. The Brahmo Samaj and the Arya Samaj did the same in modern India. The Rau akshbbta Mission under the guidance of Swami Vivekananda was the first movement towards universalising Hinduism without any break to its continuity with the past. Swami Vivekananda emphasised the Vedanta as the root-principle of the Hindu religion, and maintained that it was open to all to follow in whatever country, religion or social environment they might be born and brought up. Dr. Kurtzoth's exposition of Hinduism is substantially identical with that of Swami Vivekananda. The new Hinduism, as it may be called for convenience' sake, does not want to uproot any of the great religious. It wants Hindus to be true Hindus Mussalmans to be true to Islam, and Christians to be true to Christ, and it postulates that the brotherhood of humanity can be achieved and can only be achieved in this way. Curiously enough it was a highly valued Mussalman friend who made some years ago in these columns the suggestion that the term Hindu should be applied to all natives of India whatever their race or creed, as is being actually done in America at the present day. It is a noteworthy fact that the conversion of Miss Miller has aroused very little serious opposition from orthodox Hindus, though the prevailing opinion is not favourable to the marriage which is to be the sequel to it. It may be assumed that the consensus of Hindu opinion accepts the principle of admitting to Hinduism persons born in other faiths and in other lands. This is nothing less than a revolution involving fundamental and far-reaching social consequences. The consequences may not appear at once; it may be years before they fully disclose themselves. But there can be no doubt whatever that the direction has been irrevocably set of the future development of Hindu religion and society. It means the doom of the caste system and its inseparable incident of outcastes beyond the pale. That this stupendous result should follow from the seemingly trivial act of two individuals, will not surprise those who have made a study of the great movements which have lifted mankind from the rot of the past, and placed it on the level road of social and political progress. Takoji Rao Holkar and Miss Nancy Miller may be merely leaves blown about by the wind of their own impulses. But the wind itself has its origin and direction in sources and causes beyond the range of our present-day knowledge. Nor need we dismiss without a thought the fancy which imagines a relation between Miss Katherine Mayo's denunciation of Hinduism and Miss Nancy Miller's acceptance of it not merely intellectually but socially and spiritually as well. No reply to Miss Mayo could have achieved, for one thing, the publicity which Miss Miller's conversion has undoubtedly done. Open-minded people all over the world, who have read Miss Mayo's book, will ask themselves how another American woman has been chosen this very time to embrace a religious act so full of iniquities as Miss Mayo's Hinduism. Dr. Kurtzoth's address and Miss Miller's statement which we publish today will be scanned for the answer in millions of homes all over the world.
SAstras and Untouchability.

(Mr. K. A. Chandrasekhar.)

"Hinduism is in danger" is the cry which often one hears from all platforms of India to-day, social as well as political. There is no doubt much truth in this statement. There is something wrong at the bottom of our social life and if we are unable to adjust our social conditions in the light of one religion, then that religion itself may die. It should therefore be the endeavour of every citizen to make his religion pure, noble and healthy. How was Hinduism able to stem the tide of foreign invasions and attacks for the last so many centuries? It was able to do so by the timely arrival of reformers who purified Hinduism by removing all injurious to its healthy growth. To-day Hinduism is at its lowest ebb, and it is perhaps left to persons like Mahatma Gandhi to revitalise it. But it is an irony of fate that many pandits take cudgels against him for his advocacy of social reform, which, viewed in all aspects, is essentially a process of purification of Hinduism. It is a pity that these cultured pandits fail to grasp the situation and understand the true meaning of the sastras.

The genius of our ancestors consisted in their wonderful grasp of the situation and the consequent adaptation to the existing circumstances. When Upashishad became lost in dogmatic controversies Buddhism came to the rescue of humanity with its simplicity and morality; when canonical culture and useless learning made religion inhuman, the Bhagavadgita became the guide to all virtuous people; when ritualists succeeded in imprisoning the living faith in rigid creeds, prophets like Sankara and Ramana rescued the people from cant and false religion. Again what is the attitude of the Hindus to the Vedas? It is one of trust tempered by criticism, "trust because the beliefs and forms which helped our fathers are likely to be of use to us also; criticism because however valuable the testimony of the past ages may be, it cannot deprive the present age of its right to inquire and sift the evidence. Precious as are the echoes of God's voice in the souls of men of long ago, our regard for them must be tempered by the recognition of the fact that God has never finished the revelation of his wisdom and love." We are therefore unworthy of our ancestors if we fail to understand the true implications of our sastras.

Take the question of untouchability. According to our sastras, "one becomes a Brahmin by his deeds not by his family or birth; even a 'chandala' is a Brahmin if he is of pure character." Caste is there'ore a question of character, and as a matter of fact some of the great sages worshipped Brahmins were half-castes and brachydactylic. Vasiitha was born of a prostitute, Vyasa of a fisherwoman and Parasara of a chandala girl. All these facts speak out the genius of our ancestors. But, what do we find to-day? However great and virtuous an untouchable may be he is discarded and degraded. He is not allowed, even if he wants to reform himself. What is the guilelessness of the story of Nandanar? It is intended-ed as an eye-opener to the more arrogant among us. It is intended to show to us all the possibilities of even a chandala. Are there not rogues among Brahmin, to-day who are worse than untouchables? Are there not saints among untouchables who can be ranked with the highest of Brahmin? Is not the holy mission of Sri Ramana a violent protest against the tyranny of the so-called high classes? No pandit can deny all these facts. Sri Krishna says clearly in the Bhagavadgita, "Those who take refuge in me even of inferior birth, they also attain the highest state." The passion for perfection burns with as keen a flame in the desistute as well as the opulent, the weak as well as the strong. As Prof. Radhakrishnan says in his own inimitable way "love is not the possession of a class; nor is imaginative piety a commodity to be bought in markets." So the pandits who talk much of religion and God, have practically no ground to base their arguments. They talk much of sastras, but, as a matter of fact, they have not got the sastric sanction behind them. So both from the sastric point of view as well as common sense point of view we can boldly assert that untouchability is a blot on Hinduism. When there is no clear distinction between castes, when there is no clear allotment of functions among various communities, how is it possible to brand a considerable section of our countrymen as untouchables? Are the pandits prepared to brand all high class people who are vicious as untouchables?

Even questions like temple-entry and widow marriage can be solved by a true interpretation of our sastras. There is no doubt that the sastras are our guide. But even those who want to base their actions on sastras can solve many of our social evils, if only they enter into the spirit of our religion. It is high time for us to do away with the devil of superstition and face facts. Let not the obstacle to our progress be ourselves. It is therefore the duty of everyone of us, especially students, to raise our social status one more to the height of grandeur even as ancient India gave its torch of civilisation as a jewel on the forefront of Asia's pride.

SIR,

Since you have always stood for social purity, I venture to draw your attention to one of the features of the coming of the Simon Commission. In Tanjore and here in Madura, the presidents of the District Boards chose to entertain the Commission at social gatherings. That, however, is the business of the hosts and the guests. But with reference to one matter, the public has reason to complain. On both occasions, nautch girls were present. I submit we have the right to protest against the presence of these women at entertainments to a body that is supposed to be engaged in the task of adjudging us in the matter of civilization and good morals. The sadness of the performance is emphasised by the fact that Mr. Paniniśevam, the President of the Tanjore District Board happens to be a Roman Catholic, and Mr. Poulious here is a European.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

Madura,

March 7, 1928.

Yours etc.,

GEORGIO JOSHD.
WIDOW MARRIAGE ASSOCIATION.
The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Under the auspices of “Sir Gangaram Trust, Lahore” Widow Marriage Associations have been opened in various places of Gujarat province, in Ahmedabad, Broach, Surat, Madia, Ananda Dakore, Baroda, Navvari, Chikhil, Bulaer, etc. Those who are interested in this cause may correspond with the Secretary of local Association who will give you all the information required regarding the cause. Widows or Widowers who wish to get themselves remarried may apply to the Secretary of Local Association or Pandit Navarata Vidyalukan, Vidhva Vibh Sahayak Sabha, Bombay 4. The guardians of the widows are requested to take special interests in the cause.

Yours etc,

Navarata Vidyalukan,
Organiser V. V. V. S. Sabha.

LORD SINHA AND MISS MAYO.

In the course of an article to the Englishman, writes the Leader, Mr. N. N. Sircar, one of the leaders of the High Court bar in Calcutta and a personal friend of Lord Sinha for many years, writes —

Lord Sinha’s public acts and his career are matters on which there will be many contributions by competent persons.

I desire to bring out an incident which shows a trait in Lord Sinha’s character, which, though well known to his intimate friends, may be beyond the knowledge of the general public.

I refer to his abhorrence of being in the limelight and a deep-rooted objection to publicity of any matter in which he was concerned. In Miss Mayo’s Mother India, a book which has received such publicity, mainly due to the utter lack of sense of proportion and want of judgment of those who arranged for Town Hall meetings and resolutions in Legislative Councils over the publication, there is a chapter headed ‘A Counsel of Perfection’ (Ch. XVI). In this chapter Miss Mayo narrates a conversation with a Hindu nobleman who is an ‘eminent lawyer’ and whose name Miss Mayo has not disclosed as ‘it would be a disgraceful requital of courtesy to name the gentleman just quoted.’

This Hindu lawyer is no other than Lord Sinha—a fact confirmed by him. It is known to some of his friends, that the interview took place at 17, Blyssum Row—Lord Sinha’s residence.

VILLAGE IN BENGAL.

At this interview Lord Sinha is reported to have complained about the condition of villages in Bengal—and the inadequate attention paid to them by the Government. Lord Sinha: it is stated, said:—‘But surely, surely, they could have done more and faster. And they let my people starve.’ Miss Mayo then proceeds to cover Lord Sinha with ridicule and sarcasm, by stating that this wealthy man, ‘with the income of an eminent lawyer of New York,’ has done nothing for his village (Raipur) though it is ‘but a comfortable afternoon’s ride away from his home.’

As Lord Sinha never cared to advertise himself, he did not care to inform Miss Mayo that the facts are that the pucca school building at Raipur has been constructed at Lord Sinha’s expense, that both the village school and the village dispensary have always been maintained by him, and permanent provision has been made for them, that he paid Rs. 10,000 to the Agriculture Institute of his district, and that his acts of help and charity to his village and villagers have been too many to be mentioned.

When Miss Mayo’s book was published in London it happened to be there. Lord Sinha’s attention was drawn to the gross injustice done to him by Miss Mayo—and in fact a contradiction, for publication in the press, had been drafted for him, but Lord Sinha refused permission for its issue.

MISS MILLER’S CONVERSION.

Miss Nancy Miller the bride-elect of Sir Tukoji Rao Holkar the ex-Maharaja of Indore was converted to Hinduism at Nasik on the 13th instant at 8.30 a.m. The ceremony of conversion was simple, Miss Miller squatted on the floor in Indian fashion opposite half a dozen priests who chanted Sanskrit hymns and mantras from the Vedas. Homa (fire offering) was burning near by to which were offering ghee (butter) and from time to time holy water was being sprinkled on Miss Miller signifying purification, Miss Miller nodding her acceptance of purification every time.

That Miss Miller was taking deep interest in every ceremonial was evident from the fact that a Hindu gentleman seated next to her tried to explain their meaning from time to time. She was wearing a necklace of small deep blue glass beads such as worn by ladies of Maharashtras, red glass bangles round her wrists, only one on each hand, and a diamond ring. All the time her aged grand-mother was seated behind her on a chair watching with interest all ceremonies. At the conclusion of “Homa” and Suddhi (purification), Miss Miller walked up to the place where Jagadguru Shri Shankaracharya was seated and received his blessing touching his feet.

Shankaracharya next presented her with a neecklace, sweets, brocade sari, bodice and red powder in a way signifying that her Suddhi was complete. Then priests one by one and also pandits gathered them and up and blessed her, Miss Miller gracefully acknowledging their offers with folded hands, “Hindu Dharmam kalyanai” or “God blessing Hindu religion” went up from assembled Hindus, thus bringing the functions of the morning to a conclusion.

CONGRATULATORY MESSAGE AT PANCHAVAT.

A public meeting attended by over twenty thousand persons was held this evening to bless Devi Sharmashita or Miss Nancy Miller as she was hitherto known upon her admission to Hinduism. Tremendous enthusiasm prevailed among the largest audience ever seen in Nasik. It was a vast sea of human heads stretching far away to right and left. The meeting was held on the bed of the Godavari river at Panchavati and presented a memorable scene. Beginning from the shamiyas the huge crowd rose in tier after tier right to the topmost point of vantage on the western bank of the river, besides occupying all the available vantage ground including house-tops and terraces. Among those present in the shamiyas were many European ladies and gentlemen. Hundreds of Hindu ladies also took part in the meeting. When Miss Miller in her Indian dress accompanied by ladies of the Holkar family and attendants arrived at the pandal she war granted with applause. The same manifestation of love and goodwill was shown towards Shri Shankaracharya when he arrived a few minutes later. Though the speakers were hardly audible even a few feet away the audience remained good humoured throughout. After some welcome songs and poems had been recited Miss Miller made a speech expressing her gratitude to those who had helped her in the conversation. Dr. Savarkar also made a short speech in Marathi.

NEW ERA IN HINDUISM.

The Shankaracharya next spoke blessing Miss Miller and explaining his reasons for the unprecedented step in modern Hinduism that he had taken.

SPEECH OF A GITA.

Among the tokens of regard and appreciation presented to Miss Miller is a miniature Gita enclosed in a miniature silver casing. Miss Miller expressed her heart-felt thanks to the President and members of the Committee and the volunteers. She concluded by saying that service would be her greatest ambition and this announcement was received with applause.

A number of speakers paid eloquent tributes to the Shankaracharya who they declared amidst applause had unfurled the flag of remissive Hindu religion.

Princess Tarabai, sister of Sir Tukojirao, thanked the audience for the enthusiastic reception accorded to them and for admitting Miss Miller to Hinduism.

At the conclusion of the proceedings Miss Miller touched the Shankaracharya's feet in the Hindu style and said farewell since she and her party are returning to Barwaha by Calcutta mail.

SHRI SHANKARACHARYA'S SPEECH.

The following is the authorised version of the speech delivered by the Jagadguru, Dr. Kurtukoti at the monster meeting on Tuesday evening at Nasik in connection with Miss Miller's "Suddhi" ceremony.

We are meeting here to-day under the shadow of a great event in the history of the Hindu Dharma. The admission of Miss Miller to Hinduism is a historic event and you all have witnessed the great enthusiasm which marked the ceremony this morning. It has given me the greatest pleasure to have admitted her to the Hindu faith. It may seem to you the most unprecedented thing. For generations the gates of Hinduism have remained shut in the face of those who have sought its truths. It is no new thing. The gates of a religion are called revealed while others are dualistic and Christian philosophy is said to be another religion. But Hinduism teaches us to look upon the world as God, and to understand that all religions do not rest on the same truth. But why should one look upon others as ours? The Bible does not answer this question. Why should one do so? That is because it is essentially dualistic and Christian philosophy is dualistic. There is no philosophy in the world which is non-dualistic except the Vedant one. So other religions have to look to Vedant Philosophy for their support. Besides other religions maintain that the world was created by God. But Hinduism teaches us to look upon the world as God. It is no wonder that such a faith as ours should make a powerful appeal to others or that Miss Miller should have been attracted to Hindu philosophy.

Universal Religion.

In this connection I may refer here to a visit that a German professor, Dr. Otto, paid to me recently. He said to me how great was the need of a universal religion acceptable to all embracing the essentials of all religions in this world, less dogmatic and more humane, and he propounded his ideas in a manner that was bound to carry conviction. But I pointed out to him that there was already such a religion; only that its essentials had not been properly appreciated. Hindu Dharma is the most broad-based religion containing some of the highest truths that are required to make religion acceptable to the great majority.

Viewed from this standpoint it is hardly necessary to stress unduly the urgency of Hinduism once more being made a living and growing organism. Judged from this point of view the Suddhi-karma of Miss Miller which was performed this morning is full of greatest meaning to Hindu faith. Though it seems a small affair to some of you who are apt to connect it with an individual, and view it from different stand-points, I am fully convinced that it makes the beginning of a new era for Hinduism. The event has to be considered from four main points (1) the Philosophic, (2) Dharmic, (3) Historical and (4) Pragmatic or practical.

DIFFERENT VIEW POINTS.

I shall deal with these in their order. From the philosophic standpoint the ceremony that we have witnessed to-day is a matter of great rejoicing to me. It shows the inherent greatness of Hindu philosophy, for the simple reason that it marks out the Hindu faith from other faiths. It may not generally be known that all the religions do not rest for their support on their philosophies. This accounts for the fact that some religions are called revealed while others are dualistic. The Bible says: "Love thy neighbour like thyself." The Bhagwad Gita enjoins the same truth. But why should one look upon others as ours? The Bible does not answer this question. Why should one do so? That is because it is essentially dualistic and Christian philosophy is dualistic. There is no philosophy in the world which is non-dualistic except the Vedant one. So other religions have to look to Vedant Philosophy for their support. Besides other religions maintain that the world was created by God. But Hinduism teaches us to look upon the world as God. It is no wonder that such a faith as ours should make a powerful appeal to others or that Miss Miller should have been attracted to Hindu philosophy.

SIDDHIKARMA AND ITS SIGNIFICANCE.

There are some to whom Siddhi-karma may seem inconsistent and contradictory. But these are people who look upon Hinduism in a restricted sense. And because of this they hold that Hinduism is not a praelytying religion and that it cannot take new recruits. But such a view is an erroneous one. A discerning eye will readily see that the Hindu faith is far from being too narrow and limited is capable of absorbing new forces and withstanding new shocks. Some people ask what is your spiritual authority for admitting foreigners. If I may answer a question with another question where has Vedic Dharma recognised the existence of other religions? There is a Vedic text which clearly says that Dharma is a foundation of the entire universe. Vedic Dharma embraces all points essential to human welfare, and it is therefore natural that it should cover everything conducive to the well-being of world. All other faiths are obviously extensions of isolated creeds comprehended within the limits of Vedic Dharma. For instance Christ enlarged upon the tenets of peace while Mahomed selected the creed of aggressiveness as the governing factor of its creed. In the same way of other faiths as for instance Jainism which lays stress on Ahimsa or non-violence. There is no need to enlarge upon this side of the matter. But Hinduism contains all these truths which are scattered among many religions and all faiths. It enjoins upon its followers to act according to special conditions keeping in view the welfare of the world and promotion of the brotherhood of man as the sole aim of their faith. This is not all, Chaitanya teaches that God is impersonal. Hinduism does not deny that God is impersonal. But at the same time it recognises that God is super-personal meaning thereby that He can be personal without losing His omniscience and omnipotence.

TOLERANT HINDUISM.

Thus you will see that Hinduism does not oppose those who hold the belief that God is impersonal nor do they exhort those who believe in His personality. People are free to offer worship to Him in his personal aspect. It is clear that Hinduism shows the greatest tolerance for both schools of thought—those who recognise the personal conception of God and impersonal character that is attributed to him. So there is nothing which is opposed in reality to Hindu Dharma or which does not fit in with its conception of Universe. There is about it no sense of difference in regard to Dharma. But those who think that the part is the whole may be taken into the fold of those who regard part as the part and the whole as the whole. At the same time Hindu faith affords the broadest platform to all those who possess different talents and wish to contribute to the sum total of human happiness and the perfection of their sibhs.

DHARMA ENLARGES FAITH.

Therefore to admit Christians or Mohammedans to Hinduism is not to ask those who seek it to give up their faiths but rather to enable them to enlarge their outlook and widen their horizon and live a broader and more tolerant life doing what lies in one's power to promote the happiness and the content of the world. That is in short the essence of Hindu Dharma.

HISTORY OF CONVERSION.

Now as to the Historical aspect of conversion of Sudhí there are innumerable instances of the admission of foreigners to Hinduism. From the time of Mahabharat to the time of Asoka and Chandragupta and even almost to the times of the Mogul invasion there have been many number of instances of such conversions. You might have heard about Arjuna's marriage with Ulipi and Ulipi according to modern historical research has been recognized as an American woman. Then there is Kaavya Muni who Bhavishya Purana relates went to Egypt brought 10,000 recruits and had them taken into Hinduism and absorbed within the four Varnas. It is related of Jarashag Rishi that he married a Naga Ranya and treated her as his Dharma Patni. Nor can a reference be omitted to Asoka and Chandrakesh which foreigner after converting them to their own faiths. There are innumerable inscriptions and coins and literature extant on the subject and these are published and some of these researches have been embodied in recent publications of Indian Antiquity.

IMPORTANCE OF EVENTS.

From the practical point of view it is hardly necessary to emphasize the importance of the event. Too much stress cannot be laid on the significance of the admission of Miss Miller to the Hindu faith. Some difference of opinion has been expressed mainly on account of the possible sequel to the Shuddi karana. Some people have taken strong exception on the score that Miss Miller is to be married to the Maharaja Sir Tukojirao Holkar. I have no wish to discuss the aspect of this matter which is purely personal to the parties concerned. The most important consideration would be the admission of a seeker who wants to be taken into the Hindu faith out of her or his inborn conviction and admittance for the faith. It cannot be denied that the ultimate intention has been bearing on the question, but the question cannot be solely determined on that ground alone nor can be allowed to reflect a sense of responsibility. I want those who are objecting to the conversion on the ground of the proposed marriage to consider whether a doctor would be justified in refusing medical aid to a sick man on the ground that if the man is restored to health it proves dangerous there. But that the man proves dangerous there are other agencies to take note of it and deal with it. Such should also be the attitude of all informed persons concerning the admission of foreigners to Hinduism if they seek it in a true spirit of devotion and sincerity.

The position today in regard to Miss Miller's conversion is not much different. She has conceived a great regard for Hinduism and has expressed a sincere desire to be admitted to that faith. Is it just or fair? I ask, to refuse her the solace of a faith which has appealed to her powerfully and evoked her intense admiration?

Exception has been taken on the ground that these mixed marriages should not be encouraged and the conversion of Miss Miller is said to be an encouragement in that direction. It is difficult to endorse the view though one may be inclined to sympathize with the doubts entertained by these people. It seems to me that there is some confusion of thought and a difference between this case and other cases. Here is a woman who sincerely desires to be taken into her new faith and it seems to be unfair to deny her the opportunity. The matter has to be judged on its own merits free from any preconceived notions or prejudices and it is no less important to bear in mind the fact that Miss Miller has given a categoric under-taking that she would remain true to her new faith and maintain its truth. In view of this if any undesirable consequences follow from such conversions, society would be able I am sure, to deal with these cases. But I do not think that anyone would be justi realize my most cherished desire. It was during my school days that I read some of the most fascinating portions of your ancient books as translated into English. Obviously it was not possible for me to grasp their inner most meaning, but all the same they had for me a peculiar charm. My interest in the civilization of India was suddenly roused when I met nearly two years ago one who has been the primary cause of the change through which I am passing now. As our acquaintance developed into friendship my desire to know and understand India became stronger. Old impressions of her great religion, her beautiful mythology and wonderful philosophy were revived. It was a delight to read more on these subjects and I have since had the pleasure of discussing them with the few Indians whom I met from time to time. I soon began to feel a change coming over me.

Although I was fully conscious of the fact that my knowledge of Hinduism was very limited and that a closer study was essential for acquiring deeper knowledge of it, yet I had sufficiently realised that Hinduism could give me all I needed for guidance.

FIRM BELIEF IN CHRIST.

I must at the same time tell you very frankly that it is not without pain that I sever my connection with the Church for I know nothing in the true religion of Christ that can be discarded without disadvantage. I hope the true spirit of Christianity will continue to be with me and be a source of inspiration in the day to come and it is indeed a great consolation to feel that the true spirit of Hinduism not only tolerates such attitude as mine but welcomes it as being essential for seekers after truth. So far as my inquiry goes Hinduism allows the greatest latitude in matters of faith or belief such as conception of God, the purpose of the universe and the nature and meaning of life and indeed it was this fact more than anything else that enabled the sages of old to bring into existence that most marvellous philosophy which had been and will always be a storehouse for the world from which to draw wisdom and enlightenment. I have no doubt that Hinduism will enable me to live a larger and fuller life and I trust that with the help of your Holiness and other brothers and sisters I shall have in time to come a deeper knowledge of Hinduism and realise its great purpose.

HINDU AMBITION.

May I ask you all always to look upon me as one of you and for my part I shall not only be a Hindu but will ever strive to be not an unworthy member of this Hindu community, to which I have now the privilege to belong. Before closing I feel it a duty to offer my heartfelt thanks to your Holiness, to the President and the members of the Working Committee, to the local Dhanger community and all the volunteers whose sincere efforts have made the ceremony of my admission to the fold of Hinduism such a success. I realise how stupendous was the task not only in bulk, but also in quality and this fact makes the expression of my thanks inadequate. May I also take this opportunity of expressing my grateful thanks to all those who were so kind as to send me numerous messages of sympathy and goodwill and offers of help. May I conclude by saying that service will be my highest ambition.

Let me turn now to the general presentation of the question of sex and motherhood which occupies the first third of the book and is the centre of Miss Mayo's position. She gives the kernel of the matter in the "Argument" when she says:

"Take a girl child twelve years old, a pitiful physical specimen in bone and blood, illiterate, ignorant without any sort of training in habits of health. Force motherhood upon her at the earliest possible moment. Rear her weakling son in intensive vicious practices that drain his small vitality day by day. Give him no outlet in sports. Give him habits that make by him, by the time he is thirty years of age, a decrepit and querulous old wreck and will you ask what has sapped the energy of his manhood?"

It is clear that Miss Mayo gives this as the typical picture of Indian sea life and as the source of most of the illhealth of "Mother India." Let us look at a few of the above statements:

"Take a girl child twelve years old, a pitiful physical specimen in bone and blood."

I have travelled in North India and South India but know best the villages and the towns of Western India. I remember vividly the first impressions of the village women of Western India, formed by my wife and myself in 1904. We were surprised by the fine physical development and carriage of most of them. Many of our American visitors have expressed the same idea. The frontpieces of "Mother India" show an untouched woman, probably of North India. So far as one can judge by the picture she is a perfect physical specimen with the light of health on her face and in her eyes. By the joint authors of the Census of 1901, say:

"No one who has watched the sturdy Jat women lift their heavy water jars at the village well is likely to have any misgiving as to the effect of their marriage system on the physique of the race." "Among the Rajput both sexes are of stouter build than the Jats but here again there are no signs of degeneration."

The vigorous were engaged in a large proportion of Indian women grinding grains, bringing water, working in the fields. It is not their great, but decreasing physical handicap. That there are in India millions of weak girls is an awful fact. That there are also millions of strong, healthy girls is also a fact. A fact, testified by the census official and by many observers. Characteristically, Miss Mayo ignores this second fact in making her sweeping generalization that the Indian girl is a "pitiful physical specimen in bone and blood."

But the main force of this first sentence in the "Argument" comes in its culmination in the second, which says:

"Force motherhood upon her at the earliest possible moment."

This is the thesis that Miss Mayo emphasizes and reiterates. It is clearly the most serious count in her indictment of India. On Page 22 she says:

"The Indian girl, in common practice, looks for motherhood nine months after reaching puberty, or anywhere between the ages of fourteen and eight. The latter age is extreme, though in some sections not exceptional; the former is well above the average."

The statement that motherhood at eight is in some sections not exceptional is simply fantastic. No proof nor even evidence for this is offered. The earliest case of motherhood that Miss Mayo puts in her book which she gives any record of was a girl in Bombay who was married to be nine and a half years old at the time of motherhood, a case so strange and unusual that it received much attention from the medical profession. If a child-mother of eight years old anywhere was to be found it is very clear that Miss Mayo would have gone a long way to see her and describe her condition. Even the credibility of the most uncritical readers will scarcely swallow this sheet, unbuttressed assertion. Probably the author makes it on the basis of stories which have arisen because, as the Census of 1921 states in Vol I, page 127, "There is a strong inclination (in giving ages) to favour certain numbers, such as 2, 8 and 12."

"Owing to the obloquy incurred by Hindu parents who have failed to marry their girls before puberty there is a strong inclination to understate the age of unmarried girls who have reached this age." In this matter Miss Mayo seems to have been the victim of parents who blindfolded to some troublesome inquisitor that their daughter was 8 years old.

To prove the general charge of very early motherhood Miss Mayo brings in a number of interviews with unnamed medical witnesses: some quotations from speeches in the Legislative Assembly, an account of a few cases seen by herself, and, most important of all, a quotation from an essay forming Appendix VII of the 1921 Census which reads: "It can be assumed for practical purposes that every woman is in the married state at or immediately after puberty and that cohabitation, therefore, begins in every case with puberty."

With this material before her it is not altogether strange that Miss Mayo should have come to the conclusion that fourteen is well above the average age of first motherhood. The speeches in the Assembly would seem to one who did not understand the ways of Indian speakers to offer strong evidence, but their influence is discounted by the two besetting sins of such speeches, which are exaggeration for the sake of making a striking effect, and a strong tendency to generalization from local experiences. Miss Mayo has herself commented on the conflicting nature of the evidence of the speeches and rightly stresses the above statement from Appendix VII of the Census as her most important piece of evidence. Yet here as elsewhere, her generalization ignores an important part of the evil denounced before her. Later, on the same page on which the author of the Appendix VII says that cohabitation begins with puberty, he states that his Punjab investigator discovered that "in the majority of cases the first child is born in the third year of effective marriage." Apparently he is the only Census investigator who studied this question, but there is no reason to suppose that this finding would not be true of other parts of India. Indeed I myself have examined the record of the Maternity Hospital of the Seva Sadan in Ahmednagar in the Bombay Presidency for the years 1923-27. Early marriage is more prevalent in this Presidency than in many other parts of India, and is the rule in Ahmednagar, yet of 90 cases of first motherhood of Hindus treated by the staff of this Hospital both in the Hospital itself and in the homes of..."
the people, none were younger than 14, only one was 14 and the average age of first motherhood was 18.3 years. 78 per cent of the cases were classed as "normal."

These facts go beyond those of the Punjab investigator in indicating that, even in cases of child marriage, first motherhood comes at an age when it can generally be normal.

It is clear that the author of the Appendix meant his statement that "cohabitation begins in every case with puberty" to refer to the part of the Indian population among whom child marriage prevails. In the tables of statistics which form the body of the report it is more than once stated that only 399 out of every 1,000 girls are even married at the end of their fifteenth year. Indeed, to call especial attention to this fact the Census officer has also presented it in the form of a graph. (See Vol. I, pages 164-5.) About 60 per cent of Indian girls are thus almost seventeen before motherhood is possible for them. They are seventeen or eighteen before it is probable.

Mrs. Margaret E. Cousins, Honorary Secretary of the Women's Indian Association, enumerates the different classes and castes in India among whom marriage later than the age of sixteen is the rule and estimates that the total is 200,000,000. This corresponds roughly with the Census figures of 60 per cent not married till the completion of their fifteenth year.

INDIAN STATUTORY COMMISSION.

Messrs. J. W. Shore and S. R. Stewart, the Secretaries of the Commission have issued the following notice:

The Indian Statutory Commission invites the submission of written statements or memoranda, both from official and non-official sources, from representatives of local bodies, and responsible individuals on any of the subjects which fall within the limits of the enquiry which it is about to undertake. Before the Commission returns to India in October a programme of its sittings in various centres will have to be drawn up. The written statements or memoranda now called for should be prepared and sent to the offices of the Commission as soon as possible in order that the Commission may appreciate the main issues to be raised and proposals to be urged before it hereafter, and in order that it may make arrangements beforehand for the orderly conduct of its subsequent enquiry.

Such written statements or memoranda as are ready before the Commission leaves India on March 31st should be sent by registered post addressed to "The Indian Statutory Commission, Camp, India." After this date the Commission will maintain its own Office in India, where further memoranda will be received on its behalf. They should be sent by registered post addressed to the "The Indian Statutory Commission, New Delhi Office, New Delhi," from which office they will be transmitted to the Office of the Commission in England.

Twelve copies of each memorandum are required in the first instance. Further copies may be called for hereafter, if the proposed Indian Committees are set up in time.

It is most desirable that these memoranda should be delivered to the Offices of the Commission as soon as possible, and in any event not later than June 1st next. If for any special reason particular documents cannot be delivered till later, the Commission will be glad to be informed of the circumstances and will do its best to deal with them, but the organization of the Commission's enquiry makes it essential that the written material, much of which has doubtless already been prepared, should be promptly presented.

The terms of reference under which the Commission is acting are as follows:

It is "to enquire into the working of the system of government, the growth of education, and the development of representative institutions, in British India, and matters connected therewith," and it is "to report as to whether and to what extent it is desirable to establish the principle of responsible government, or to extend, modify, or restrict the degree of responsible government then existing therein, including the question whether the establishment of second chambers of the local legislatures is or is not desirable."

The Commission has already had the advantage of informal interviews with important and representative bodies and deputations both at Delhi and in several Provinces, and has been much assisted by these interviews in appreciating the nature of some of the main questions it will shortly begin to investigate.

The Commission attaches special importance to the written material which it is now inviting, for in many cases the memorandum will speak for itself, while in other cases the Commission after considering the memorandum (with the assistance of Indian Committees if these are appointed) will intimate whether it desires to hear oral evidence in support of the memorandum and will endeavour to make the most convenient arrangements as to when and where this oral evidence shall be taken.

Every memorandum should be dated and signed by or on behalf of those who present it, and should give the address to which any communication from the Commission regarding it should be sent. As already stated, there will be many cases in which the memorandum submitted will themselves sufficiently convey to the Commission the view of those submitting them, but in cases in which it is desired to tender to the Commission oral evidence in support of any memorandum, the documents should end with a clear statement giving the name and address of the witness who will be ready to come forward, if required, for examination, and cross-examination.

Memoranda submitted in a representative capacity should contain a clear statement of the nature, extent, and membership of the organization submitting them. When a statement is put forward on behalf of a class of persons, the Commission wishes to have a sufficient indication of the number of individuals who actually authorize it.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Buddhist Temple for London: It is stated in a Reuter's message that the site for a Buddhist temple has been purchased near Regent's Park and will probably begin at the end of April. The temple will cost £10,000 sterling and will accommodate some three hundred worshippers.
Sir Hugh Clifford Carries His Tray: An interesting note on changing social habits as contributed by Sir Hugh Clifford, Governor of the Straits Settlements, in a message published in the magazine of the Singapore Y.M.C.A.: "Some weeks ago I had the pleasure of taking midday meal in the building opened to members of the Association for the purpose in Singapore, I personally inspected all the arrangements; filled my tray at the counter; and subsequently enjoyed an excellent luncheon at a moderate price. I have been told that some people do not greatly like the practice of having to wait upon themselves which is essential in an institution of this description which aims at providing a good meal at the lowest possible cost. I would remind those who have any feeling of this kind that the practice to which they take exception is universal in most business centres in America today, and that the habit of doing as much for oneself as possible, and of depending as little as may be upon others, is a thoroughly healthy one.

Twenty years ago, when I was Colonial Secretary of Ceylon, Tamil boys of good family could not be induced to go to school unless they were provided with some person of meaner degree to carry their school books for them through the streets of their native town. Today, I am glad to say such snobbery appears to the children of the present generation to be something altogether incredible. I suggest to any people who feel reluctant to accommodate themselves to the practice in vogue at the Y.M.C.A. Tiffin-Room, that a few years hence their feeling in the matter will be regarded as equally amusing by the generation which will by that time have grown up in Singapore."

Women's Rights: Mr. Kale and Mr. Bhatavadekar have arranged a series of lectures for the betterment of women, which will be given on a property, Mr. G. V. Deshmukh, bar-at-law, in opening the lecture series said that the Hindu widow's condition in a joint Hindu family of which the male members were living was helpless and pitiable. Her right to maintenance was not enough. A change in the law in this respect was necessary not only to improve her condition but for the propagation of Hindu society. Hindu Sangathanists knew that the most weak points in the structure of Hindu society were untouchability and the condition of Hindu widows, and to remove this helpless condition of Hindu widows remarriage appears to the children which is contributed to the Legislative Assembly and create opinion in the country in their favour. Women must start an organization such as an all-India Hindu women's rights to property league. A special feature of Hindu society was its joint family system, and it, in its turn, rested on the highest self-sacrifice of Aryan women. No Hindu can forget Sita and Draupadi, who left a bright heritage for Hindu women. He said it would be advisable to divide women into two classes, such as daughters and sisters, and the other class, viz., wives and daughters-in-law. The lecturer then briefly referred to the quantum of share enjoyed by each Mahometan woman and the extent to which the Parsi woman had a right to property.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 15 or 20 countries of the world have been for 80 years taking effective steps to establish their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premium in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislation in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES
A Point of Afghan Law: One of the most noticeable features of post-war European mentality, is the disposition overtly or covertly to cry down the social practices and moral standards of Asiatic nations which it is no longer possible to regard as social inferiors. The most lurid illustration, of course, was furnished by Miss Katherine Mayo, but the Mayo touch is observable on all sides. A recent instance is the story of the Afghan King's emancipation of a German woman who had married an Afghan. It was stated that when the husband died his widow, according to Afghan law, became the slave of his brother who offered to marry her but was rejected. Reuter's agent who sent the message from Berlin might have seen that a slave has no rights and that if the woman had become her brother-in-law's slave, there was no question of his offering to marry her and her refusing the offer. But in matters affecting Asiatic, European publicists as a class abdicate the exercise of the most elementary rules of reasoning. The Afghan King and Queen have been acclaimed wherever they went, and it is the fashion now to ridicule them as it used to be. But even in reporting an act of generosity the temptation to insinuate something discreditable to their rulers, could not be resisted. The experienced journalist can easily detect the propaganda current in an apparently matter-of-fact statement of news. The man in the street, however, is apt to take it at its face value, and in the involutions of the brains of many of them, the idea must have found unconscious lodgment, that Afghan wives become slaves of their husbands' brothers when they become widows. This will colour their judgment of Afghan men and things so long as they are not told that the whole thing is a myth.

A Contradiction: We are, therefore, glad that the Consul-General of Afghanistan in India has sent a categorical contradiction of the statement to the Press. His Secretary writes: "I am directed by the Consul-General his Majesty the King of Afghanistan in India to strongly refute and contradict the misstatement published lately in the Indian press under the heading "The Afghan King's Clemency about a German" The facts run as follows: - An Afghan named Abdulla married a German woman, and brought her to Afghanistan. He subsequently died, leaving four children behind. Now according to the Afghan Law, the widow was quite free in her movements, and she could go to her country if she chose to return, but the children being Afghans were taken under the care of the Afghan Government for their mother was not paid sufficient to meet her expenses which she could not afford otherwise in her widowhood. She lived in Afghanistan as other Afghan people. Nobody made her a slave, because there exists no law of any kind of slavery in Afghanistan at all, nor the German Legation at Kabul purchased her freedom. In such state of affairs it is absurd to say that the widow became the slave of her husband's brother, or was forced to marry him."

Sarda Marriage Bill: The Select Committee of the Legislative Assembly has made important changes in the Bill for the prevention of child marriage, introduced by Mr. Harbidas Sarda. All of them were suggested in these columns. To begin with, the Committee has extended the scope of the Bill to all marriages, and not only among Hindus but among all communities. Next, it has substituted fine or simple imprisonment as the penalty for performing marriages within the age-limit prescribed, and omitted the provision making such marriages void. The age-limit for girls has been raised by the Committee to 15 from 13 in the draft Bill. We presume that the clause obliging Magistrates to license marriages below the legal limit on the mere application of the parents or guardian, has been dropped. The revised Bill is to be re-submitted for public opinion, as the changes made are fundamental. We are sure that the revised Bill will meet with a very much larger measure of support than the original Bill. In fact, we cannot think of any reasonable person raising any objection to its provisions which are of a mild and moderate character.

Untouchables Sects: "Gayatri": It will gladden the hearts of those who have been working for the uplift of the untouchables that more than 1,000 untouchables were invested on the sand instant with the 'sacred thread,' which had so far been denied to them by the so-called high-caste or orthodox Hindus. They were later initiated into the sacred mantra of "Gayatri," the pronouncement of which by an untouchable or even a Saura was considered a sacrilege by the privileged classes. It is further stated that the whole ceremony, which was conducted at the Damodar Thackersay Hall, Fareed, under the auspices of the 'Samaj Samata Sangh,' or the 'Social Equality League,' lasted for about two hours, and it was no doubt a step in the solution of the problem of untouchability. This event is the right method of raising the status of these classes and we congratulate Dr. Ambedor, president of the 'Samata Sangh,' on their first attempt in this direction. The 'Gayatri' is the greatest gift in the most ancient prayer conceived by mortal man. It is a prayer for light. In his "Hymns from the Rigveda," Prof. MacDonell writes: "To Savitar is addressed the most famous stanza of the Rigveda (III, 62, 10), which has been a morning prayer in Indian homes for the last 4,000 years. This is called the Savitri, from the name of the God invoked, or Gayatri, from that of the metro in which it is composed:

May we attain that excellent Glory of Savitri the God,
That he may stimulate our thoughts."

Sir Narayan Chandavarkar made it the text of one of his most inspiring and eloquent addresses at the Indian National Social Conference in December, 1903.

The Marwari Social Conference: We print today a report of the work done by the Agrawal Mahasabha. The Marwari Community is a powerful commercial community and has all along been noted for its extreme orthodoxy. The record of its work which we publish shows that there has been a great awakening among its members and earnest efforts are being made by enlightened leaders to relieve the community of social abuses injurious to its health and prosperity.

The first Conference of the Agrawal Mahasabha began its sittings yesterday amid scenes of great enthusiasm. The orthodox section of the community did its best to thwart the holding of the Conference but the Reformers, headed by Seth Beniprasad Dalma, have shown a bold front and great credit is due to them for their courage and enthusiasm in the cause of social reform.

Girls' Education in U. P.: Thanks to the presence of the only Lady Member in the Legislative Council of the United Provinces, the question of girls' education is receiving the attention that it deserves. Mrs. Ahmed Sani in her maiden speech in the Council emphatically stated that the time had come when they could no longer neglect girls' education in that province. They are in complete accord with her suggestion that some means should be devised by which a gentleman who neglects to get his daughter or daughters educated should be prevented from becoming a member of the Council. That some such drastic step is necessary is seen from the fact that only 55 per cent of women are literate in the province. But it is gratifying to learn that there are various influences working for the expansion of girls' education. The Director of Public Instruction's promise to provide all necessary requisites for this matter will we trust, bring the province in line with the others which have made considerable progress in Women's education.

Indians in Guiana: How misplaced is the trust reposed in the British Parliament to safeguard the interests of Indians in the Colonies is evident by the passing of the British Guiana Bill in the House of Commons. The object of the Bill is clearly to restrict the measure of self-government enjoyed by the representative bodies in Guiana and vest the control of the Colony in the Governor and the Secretary of State. In other words, it is a move calculated to concentrate power in the hands of the Whites and to secure their supremacy. Such a step is bound to spell disaster to the Indian settlers there.

The Indians in the Colony constitute 45 per cent of the total population. Their presence is indispensable for the material welfare and the progress of the Colony. So far they have been on a footing of perfect equality with the other communities and their relations with them are not marred by humiliating disabilities as in other Colonies. If they are not left in the peaceful enjoyment of their rights, their resolve to quit the place is the only course, compatible with self-respect, open to them. It is for the Government of India to make representations in this matter without delay.

The Jaffna Hindu Education Board: This Association started four years ago has been doing excellent work. In the first year there was only one school with 110 children on the roll. In the second year the number of schools has increased to 23, with 2,450 children on the roll. In the third year the number of schools was 32 with 4,000 children on the roll. In the fourth year this number has increased to 40 with 5,900 children on the roll. At the last annual general meeting of the Board, Mr. M. S. Rasaratnam made a striking speech in the course of which, he said: The Hindu Board of Education was organised in a spirit of service, to serve their religion with the ultimate ideal of self réalisation. There was the field for the Hindus for service and realisation. In the palmy days of the Tamil, three organisations provided the field for such work. They were the school, the temple and the home—all linked together indissolubly for the service of an ideal. The school was at that time a noble and the home served both. That had been the state of things in the Hindu society of those glorious days. But now the schools are monopolised by foreign missionary societies, the temple by the managers of the houses by selfishness. The speaker went on to assert that the school, the temple and the home must be linked together and the family man, or Brahmin, to take his rightful and praiseworthy position as the connecting link of the Brahmachari (in the temple), the sannyasin (in the school) and the Sannyasin, the man who had renounced for worship, by giving the support and help necessary for their work.

Flood Relief in Orissa: Mr. Lakshminarayan Sahu the only member of the Servants of India Society at cuttack was entrusted with the work of flood relief in Orissa. He has issued a report of what he had done to alleviate the sufferings of the people caused by the unprecedented floods. Much has been done by way of distribution of cloths and grain but the chief difficulty lies in the reconstruction of houses for those rendered homeless. More than 5,000 houses have been reconstructed and they are estimated to cost Rs. 30,000. Mr. Sahu says in his report that if the houses are not reconstructed in two months' time, before the monsoon sets in, the whole problem will be more difficult. Indeed Mr. Sahu's appeal for funds should meet with adequate response from the people of all parts of India. The city of Bombay, as noted for its philanthropy, should lead the way in this matter.

We wish to draw the attention of the Local Central Relief Committee which came into being during the Gnejhar floods, to the needs of Orissa. The Committee should make a portion of the balance of the money at its disposal, available for the stricken in the sister province. There is not a moment to lose. Timely help is what is needed.

Delegates to Labour Conferences: The names of delegates to the International Labour Conference for the year 1922 are now available. The Government delegates will consist of Sir Atul Chatterje, who will also lead the delegation, and Dr. Paranjpe, Dr. Rayweg, Director of Industries, Punjab, is expected to be one of the advisers. The employers' delegate will be Mr. Narottam Moree, and his advisers are Mr. Shanmukkam Chetty and Mr. D. P. Khaitan. The Labour delegate will be Dewan Chanan Lal with Mr. J. C. Rose of Jharia and Mr. Mahbubul-Haq as advisers. It will be seen that the entire Indian delegation to the Labour Conference will be Indian.
THE HINDU REFORMATION.

THE HINDU REFORMATION.

BOMBAY, MARCH 24, 1922.

THE HINDU REFORMATION.

Even a casual observer cannot fail to be struck by the fact that Hindu society today is in a state of violent ferment. All the problems, social and religious, that have confronted it during ten centuries seem to have come to a head, and to demand that they shall be solved now and at once. The Brahmin non-Brahmin controversy, the revolt of the depressed classes, the Hindu-Moslem conflicts, and the women's movement are the most diabolical and outstanding problems of the hour. Faced with such an upheaval on all sides, the Hindu reformer may well despair of the society ever emerging as a living whole from the great turmoil in which it is plunged. Disintegration, complete and inevitable, may seem to loom in the near distance as the consequence of this sudden upheaval at the foundations. The fact that the political power for the time being is in alien hands and, therefore, not available for the purpose of composing the differences and conflicts of ideas in this social welter, may seem to aggravate the prospect. It is not only that political power is in alien hands, but the reformer is obliged as a condition of progress to engage in a conflict with its present repositories in order to get a proportion of it in his own hands for the purpose of strengthening them in the fight against ancient wrongs buttressed by bigotry, ignorance and superstition. The Indian Intelligentsia has thus to wage war on all fronts so to speak, without a sufficiency of resources either in men or money. The stoutest hearts may quail at the magnitude of the task. The Himalayas, however, can be crossed if the explorer had a map of the mountains to guide him. The Indian reformer, likewise, guided by a study of the several problems which beset him, may find that their multiplied and innumerable symptoms are apparent only and that there is the clue, which, if he gets of, will lead him safely through the baffling labyrinth.

No one, so far as we know, has done more to discover the clue and make it available to the Indian reformer, than the late BabuGovind Das. He, and his better known brother, Babu Bhagvan Das, have made contributions to modern Indian thought of first-rate practical importance and value. Deeply versed in the ancient Hindu as well as in modern European culture, with a sympathetic understanding of present day conditions, they have shown a genius for constructive suggestion possessed but by few at any time and particularly now. Their detachment from the activities of political and social agitation, lend serenity to their outlook on the national life. The late Mr. C. R. Das recognized this when he sought the help of Babu Bhagvan Das as the most competent adviser in framing a constitution for a self-governing India. In some respects his elder brother, Babu Govind Das, was a clearer thinker than Babu Bhagvan Das and had a surer grasp of realities. His books on "Hinduism" and "Governance of India" are most valuable contributions to a right understanding of the religious and political outlook of thoughtful Indians. These were published during his lifetime. His posthumous book "Hindu Ethics," lays down the principles of the religious and social regeneration of the Hindus. Babu Govind Das, so his brother tells us in his "Introduction", which in itself is a very thoughtful review of Hindu social conditions, felt that this would be his last work and wished that their two names might appear together on its title-page. The few details which Babu Bhagvan Das gives of the personal life and public services of his late brother, show that he was a man endowed, notwithstanding the handicap of an asthmatic complaint nearly all his life, with a vast amount of public spirit combined—a rare combination—with a sensitive shrinking from publicity of any kind. The present work, as Babu Bhagvan Das says, is a powerful plea, supported by concrete facts and practical suggestions, for the freeing of all the life of the Hindu from the octopus-grip of sacerdotal authority, hypocritical priest-craft and false religiosity.

We discarded long ago as untenable the view that a selfish priest-hood is responsible for all the evils afflicting the Hindu or any other society. The priest like the politician is a child of his time. Authority can be and has been abused by the secular monarch or Minister as by the sacerdotal hierarch. Hypocrisy is not a monopoly of priest-craft: state-craft is at best nothing but organised hypocrisy. Almost the only thing in this book which we find ourselves in sharp disagreement is the frequent references to the priest and his craft as almost the sole source of the corruptions of Hindu Society. Hinduism in the ultimate analysis is a religion of plain living and high thinking. It is by no means an exception in this respect to other great religions. Islam and Christianity, Buddhism and Zoroastrianism, likewise, are fundamentally at one in this respect. Whatever may be the sins of the priesthood—they are many for the simple reason that the priest like anybody else is a man with the weaknesses of men—it has been almost the only agency which has held up at least in theory the ideal of a life above and beyond this life, and but for which mankind would have long ago sunk to the level of brutes. Those of us who have outgrown the need of priestly guidance, to whom, in fact, it has become utterly intolerable, should not in our impatience overlook the immense service of priests for religion and civilisation in human history. Even now, though we do not need priests, we very much need consecrated lives devoted to the good of humanity. Babu Govind Das himself was just such a consecrated life. India wants many more of such men to lift her from the depression that has settled on her. The signs and portents which we see on all sides are the harbingers of a brighter day. Babu Govind Das tells us how we can quicken the advent of this day by putting aside all customs, practices and prejudices and ordering the details of our personal and national life on the broad principles of the higher Hinduism.
The Province of Gujarát in general and the city of Ahmedabad in particular are certainly poorer to-day by the death of Sir Ramanbhai Mahipatram Nlkanth. The late Sir Ramanbhai had worked in the fields of Local Self-Government, Gujarát Literature and social and religious reforms for more than a quarter of a century. To many superficial observers, the work of the late Sir Ramanbhai in the field of Local Self-Government may appear as pro-government work. But those, who think like that do bodies were jeopardized, no body fought for them fields limits, laid down for their powers. As everybody knows, the late Sir Ramanbhai held the appointment of the chief officer. Every jealons of the bad court and brought the appointment of the chief officer. From that moment the anti-noncooperators was taken out of the Ahmedabad Municipality and they were not make their own branch and they are bound to live so long as the Gujarát language lasts. Sir Ramanbhai held a unique place in Gujarát Literature. He was always free from the petty-mindedness and jealousy, which fortunately we at present notice in some of our literary men. He was like a bridge between the advocates of sanskrítized diction on the one hand, and those of simple homely style in the other. In his writings we find a happy harmony of the richness and beauty of sanskrítized diction and the simplicity and attractiveness of the homely style.

In the matter of Social Reform what the great Banade was to the whole of India, Sir Ramanbhai was to Gujarát. Though in his own life he was a radical and uncompromising Social reformer, he was by no means intolerant and aggressive. Not only had he full sympathy with many a small worker, working in his own humble way in any one or two items of the Social Reform programme, but he was also in constant touch and correspondence with almost all the workers in the field of Social Reform in Gujarát high as low. All sought his advice and he unenthusiastically gave advice to all and encouraged all. Nobody was too low or too insignificant before him. His optimism was unbounded and without caring for the derisive smiles of the sceptics, he often narrated the small achievements of humble workers as so many progressive steps for reaching the goal of Social Reform.

Great as the achievements of the late Sir Ramanbhai were in the fields of Local Self-Government, Social Reform and Gujarát Literature, they were not the sole factors of his greatness. Behind all that, was the man in him. Kind and gentle, obliging to a fault, Sir Ramanbhai was a true type of a perfect gentleman. He never did an unkind deed nor said a harsh word. If there was any man in Gujarat, of whom we can say that he had no enemy, surely, that man was Sir Ramanabhai. He was deeply religious. His sermons in Ahmedabad Prarthana Samaj reveal to us the depth of his religiousness. Many a young man must have taken inspiration and moulded his life from these sermons. It is a great pity that these sermons are not available in a compact book form. If the members of his family or the members of the Sir Ramanabhai Memorial Committee try to collect these sermons and publish them in one compact book form, they will render a valuable service to Gujarati literature by adding something that is rich and beautiful to the religious literature of Gujarati.

ALL INDIA MARWARI AGRAWAL MAHASABBA
A BRIEF SURVEY OF ITS WORK

(By Mr. R. N. AGRAWAL)

Since the time the ball was set rolling by Baja Rammohan Roy, the father of Indian national movement or, strictly speaking, that of social reform its spirit has inspite of all the obstacles in the way so much affected the country that every section of the great Hindu community is seriously busy with the removal of evils from which it suffers.

The All India Marwari Agrawal Mahasabha represents this spirit. Although it is meant for all the Baja Agrawals in the country, its work so far has chiefly lain among the Marwari Agrawals. The Marwari community being mostly educated and worldly, old, old rotten ideas and superstitions it was thought proper consciously or unconsciously to start the movement for reform among the Marwari Agrawals. The credit to take the initiative in founding the Agrawal Mahasabha and then to carry it to far through all the storm and stress goes chiefly to that notable figure among the community—Seth Jansaldji Baja. It is no exaggeration to say that Jansaldji is the life and soul of the community. It is his shrewd vision, his catholicity and his sterling example of self-sacrifice that have set not only the Marwari Agrawals but all others among the community thinking seriously about themselves—the condition in which they are. He is who has thrown a bombshell among the Marwaris and their ideas about social reform are changing rapidly.

The old uneducated and orthodox castes may deride and denounce him, but the educated and the youth among the community see with him. We may not agree with some of his views but there is no denying the fact that his name will go down to posterity for the bold stand he has taken. In fact, it is men of his type that sow the seeds of revolution.

It was 10 years back that the All India Marwari Agrawal Mahasabha was started by him. He had seen fully that unless there was some organisation of the sort, the fate of the community was doomed.

Here one may naturally point out the w. righteousness of such an institution. It may be condemned as a sectional organisation and thus an obstacle in the way of national unity and progress. The in doubt that the multiplication of such organisations leads, to a certain extent, to the disruption of national life and it is in very few cases that while working for the reform of the community they keep the national welfare as their goal. They easily fall a prey to communal and sectional jealousies.

But the other side of the question is also to be taken into consideration. Although the social conferences both all India and provincial held annually and also other efforts have done a good deal in changing the atmosphere, it has often been found difficult and very difficult to interest all in the movement. Experience has shown that unless the various communities have their different organisations and through them carry on the work of social reform, the appeal from an All India Conference falls flat on them. Though the evils affecting the various castes and subcastes are the same as those affecting the Hindu community, it has been found to be more convenient to awaken them to a sense of responsibility through their respective organisations.

As a matter of fact, social reform among the various sections of the Hindu community leads and will lead to the breaking up of the barriers existing between one section and the other. The history of the national movement in India bears testimony to the fact that with the advance of social reform in the country fight for political freedom has also gone further. Doctor Besant in her book “India a Nation” has very ably presented this view. But for freedom from superstitions and rotten customs and beliefs, there would have been no national awakening in the country. Hence one should not feel pessimistic about the future of the sectional organisations striving for social reform. They are like rivers faulling at last into the vast ocean. Even they go astray, the forces let loose in the world to-day cannot allow them to do so. Either the Hindu community should reform itself and regain its pristine glory in a new form or it should go to the wall.

Happily, as one of its aims clearly lays down, the All India Marwari Agrawal Mahasabha stands not only for social reform among the Marwari Agrawals but also for the gradual merging of its identity into that of the vast national movement. And the history of the Mahasabha fully bears out this fact. It has, whenever occasions have arisen, always identified itself with the national movement in the country. Its resolutions besides dealing with the question of social reforms in the community also clearly speak of its views about political, economic and such other questions.

As regards the work it has done in the direction of removing the social evils from the community it has with the exception of widow remarriage and the removal of uncontinnshity tackled every other burning problem of the day. The question of foreign travel although not discussed on the platform of the Mahasabha has been practically solved because there is no opposition to it. And if there is any, it is a cry for the wilderness. The way for every Marwari is now open for going to any part of the world and thus enriching himself with new knowledge and new light.
Expenses that went to huge proportions on occa-isions of marriage and other ceremonies and that in many cases were the cause of ruin have been greatly reduced. People have begun to realize that it is sheer economic waste to spend so much money in marriages and that the money so saved could be utilized in a better way. The hardship and crying anxiety that such marriages used to entail have led them to make them simpler and worse.

It is very rare these days to find people engaging maunth girls and even if one does so, he is not looked with the same regard as it used to be the case in former days. It is seldom that they have fire works and such other paraphernalia used on such occasions. Festes that meant an expenditure of several thousand have been greatly simplified and an effort is now made to see that unnecessary waste of things does not occur. The wedding parties that formerly consisted of two hundred to eight hundred persons were like armies marching on an expedition contain now from thirty to hundred persons.

But the MahaSaba has achieved very great success in the prevention of child marriages and marriages in old age. As a matter of fact, these are the two evils that have brought so much misery to the community.
But for these evils, there would have been no question of widow remarriage. Since its very inception, the MahaSaba raised its voice against them. Through press and platform it impressed upon the minds of the people the urgent need of removing them and it is as a result of this consistent and constant propaganda that these evils are severely condemned in the society. And even if such marriages occur, the MahaSaba grudges no expenditure in preventing them.

Besides, it is impressed on the people that there should be marriages between suitable matches, care ought to be taken on both sides that the boy and girl should be of proper age and that both should be healthy and in no way deformed.

As regards the question of widow-remarriage, there is unhappily lot of controversy over it. So far as the attitude of the MahaSaba, circumstances as it is at present, towards this question is concerned it has declared it more than once. Still those who have always been the opponents of the MahaSaba are decrying and denouncing it and declaring from home-tops that the MahaSaba is the supporter of widow remarriage. The fun is that in their zeal to oppose and blame the MahaSaba they have mixed political questions with social ones and it is really a pity that the foremost among them have welcomed the Simon Commission because thereby they hope to prevent the passing of the Sarda Bill and such other progressive measures of social reforms.

However, if widow-remarriage be condemned and stigmatized as against Sanatana dharmas may we humbly ask those who do so as to what they have done for the protection of millions of unfortunate widows whose miserable lot can draw tears from everybody's eyes? It may be said without the least fear of being contradicted that though lacs of money has been spent over Punchaparas and over the erection of Dharmshalahs which in many cases are absolutely unnecessary, there is not a single widows home maintained by the Marwari Agrawals.
No effort has so far been made to alleviate their sufferings, to educate them and to prepare them for the hard lot in which they have been thrown. Needless to say that the question of widows is such as cannot be avoided so easily otherwise the community must go to the wall.

Apart from the prevention of child marriages and marriages in old age—the two root causes of the increase of widows—every effort should be made to alleviate their sufferings.

Besides there are other directions in which the community has done very little. Education is the panacea for all evils but the community is very backward in this point and sufferings.

There is, therefore, a very great need of spreading and popularising education among them, particularly among the females.

Besides, purda should be removed and there ought to be a change for the better in our dress particularly that of women and change in manners. The distinction between the Marwari and non-Marwari Agrawals ought to be removed. There is no denying the fact that the Marwari community of which the Marwari Agrawals form an important part is very much unpopular in the eyes of others for this backwardness.
They should, therefore, improve their condition to enable themselves to vie with others in the struggle for national freedom.

The tenth session of the All India Marwari Agrawai MahaSaba is going to be held this year in Bombay on 23rd, 24th and 25th March. An earnest appeal is, therefore, made to all the well-wishers of the MahaSaba as well as those in any way interested in the cause of social reform to muster strong on the occasion and not to allow the reactionary forces to have their own way.

STUDENTS AND POLITICS.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sirs,

It is a moot question if students should or should not be allowed to bear a hand in current politics. Mr.
Jadunath Sarkar likes them to mind their studies and cultivate self-discipline unimpaired of the events and emotions of the times. In his address to the students of the Calcutta University at its last Convocation Mr.
Sarkar said:

"It is a commonplace truth of economics that the employment of immature lads in factories is not only harmful to their health but also hinders the growth of a class of efficient adult labourers. Similarly, the youth who prematurely leaves his studies or practical training incomplete, in response to the noble instinct of patriotism, is sure to realize, in his hours of calm reflection, that he is really showing reverence to our Great Mother by laying before her the cheap and useless offering of an undeveloped body, an immature mind, a bazily learnt art or craft, an undisciplined will. . . .
Let him make his choice between the eternal verities on the one hand and the popular delusions and misrepresen-tations of the hour on the other, between the away of reason and the insurrection of the passions, between holding his strength in reserve till the proper time for its use and making theatrical premature demonstrations, between self-discipline and moral anarchy."

This is a very picturesque and persuasive language and whether its logic be great or small it compels reflection.

On the other hand, commenting on the boycott of the Simon Commission Mahatma Gandhi wrote in his Young India of Thursday the 9th February 1928.

"I could not but admire the courage of the students of the government colleges in abstaining themselves from their colleges for the sake of the national cause. All the world over students are playing a most important and effective part in shaping and strengthening national movements. It would be monstrous if the students of India did less."

This is a great and fundamental difference. The illustrious Vice-chancellor of the Calcutta University asks the students to make themselves perfect before starting to interpret their power and patriotism in action. The greatest living Indian patriot-prophet, no doubt, thinks that perfection is not to be had away from the schools and colleges of the day. Mr. Sarkar is a academic a noble aspirant after perfection, which, perhaps, like tomorrow may never come, Mahatma Gandhi is a worker amidst the dreams and hopes of living suffering men. It is easy to see why they differ.

But that does not afford any help in the solution of the question. Nothing, perhaps, will. For it is one of those things on which the last word will not be said until the last man says his last word. Meanwhile some students will take part in politics and some will not. In some countries, for example China, more students will take part in politics than in others, for example India.
And the fact must remain that youth is a force, an energy untouched by pale thought, and if it could be safely harnessed to the problems of the day the result will be, for all one can see, satisfactory both to the students and to the country they represent. However one might as well call to mind certain underlying principles in this connection.

Pictorially, there is, there can be, no end to the educative process for education is co-extensive with life. You cannot ask a student to finish his education before he begins life, of which politics is a part. One cannot "complete" prosecute to the full, one's education if one does not enter life and stand, according to one's capacity, in its rushing stream. It is, therefore, at best a fictional comfort that we derive from the idea that education is ended when school or college education is ended.

Secondly, self-discipline seldom rises ready-made from the sort of education that our schools and colleges dispense. Experience is an indispensable aid to self-discipline and that experience is best which one acquires from one's own life. It is in men of action that we often come across the greatest measure of self-discipline.

Thirdly, actions depend for their success on the understanding of those who attempt them. If one understands that one might handle it also. And since the greatest book on education is the book of life there cannot be any harm in permitting students to read its pages; if they are able to catch the run of its language. Indeed if they catch it well and wisely, they will have caught hold of the very best educational instrument that has even been devised.

Therefore, the question really is whether the students understand politics at all when they take part in them
When a young man reaches the age of 18 or thereabouts his mind, if it had not been systematically suppressed, must be in a position to understand most things.
It follows that rightly educated young men and women above the age of 18 can and ought to take part in the action and thought of the day. It is even the duty of educational institutions to give the young under their control the opportunity to take such part. This may not be the accepted academic idea but seems to be a workable idea still.

"BARBILLY CONVENTION."

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

During the Bareilly Convention of the American Mis-ion, held from 7th to 11th March 1928, I have been able to experience one particular thing that, that an American is capable to conduct services to European as well as Indian congregations while an Indian cannot. Is it because of colour difference?

The Methodist had two speakers this time. 1. An American lady (Miss Caffray). 2. A well known Christian sadhu (Sunder Singh). The former had the opportunity of conducting services in both the Churches, but the latter in only one.........The Hindustani Church.

More than ten times, I would have heard the English Pastor announcing a good many things in favour of the Sadhu but the English audience never heard him speaking in their own language. No matter how much an Indian capable or spiritual be, he can never be thought capable to give any kind of assistance to Anglo-Indian, European or American in methodism. Perhaps this is why, because they do every thing through the guidance of Holy Ghost and being perfect themselves spiritually.

Bareilly.

Yours etc.

A REPLY TO "MOTHER INDIA".

These Census figures are in line with the only scientific investigation into the age of first motherhood that has yet been made public in India. Dr. Miss M. I.
Balfour, M.B., of Bombay has been gathering data on this subject for two years. She herself kept a record of 304 Hindu mothers of Bombay delivered of their first babies and has gathered the regular reports of the Madras Maternity Hospital for 1922-24 and of several hospitals in other parts of India. She gives figures in the Times of India for October 10th 1927, of which the following form an abstract:- "Of 6,500 cases of
covered by these statistics none were under 13 years of age and only 42 were under fifteen. The average age for first marriage in Bombay was 18.7 years and in Madras 19.4 years. Both in Bombay and in Madras between 85 and 80 per cent. of first marriages were over 17 years old. This is in general what the Census figures would lead us to expect. I have consulted an American lady doctor of 24 years of Indian experience in regard to the applicability of these statistics to India as a whole. She thinks that the average age of mothers with first babies in such Maternity Hospitals would be at least as low as that of those in the ordinary Indian home. Maternally cases are generally brought to hospitals only in extreme need and the youngest mothers are most apt to be in extreme need.

Of Dr. Balfour's attested cases from many parts of India less than one per cent were mothers before they were fifteen. Our last Census shows 60 per cent of the girls of India not even married till they are sixteen or older. Yet Miss Mayo has asserted that fourteen is well above the average age for first marriage. Here again her extreme statement fails under the weight of the facts. Now first marriage at 18 years, or even 16 years, has an absolute different complexion from first marriage at an average of under 14 years. It is too young, but the entire physical vitality of the race is not measured by it, as it would be if the average were under fourteen years. Thus the investigations of Dr. Balfour and the Census figures of 1921 disprove Miss Mayo's most important assertion and the one on which, as she herself has made clear, the argument of her book largely rests. This disproof makes clear one reason why the Indian race is not dying. Its vitality is preserved in part because first marriage below fifteen years of age is rare, and at 16 to 19 is the rule.

The Census throws another interesting light on this same general subject. There are many more young boys than girls in India. Yet in the categories from 50 years on there are very nearly the same number of men and women. (See Census of 1921, Vol. I, page 328.) Now it is clear that if any large proportion of Indian women were forced to motherhood at the earliest possible moment and if the horrors of child birth were ordinarily what Miss Mayo paints them to be, Indian girls would be killed off in very large numbers by this terrible process, as she indicates that they now are. But the Census shows almost the same number of women as of men over 50 years old. It also shows that the chances of life of the Indian female are 237 as good as those of the Indian male. These figures are open to no other interpretation than that the cruel abuse of young girls, while occurring far too often and forming a terrible blot on the Hindoo social system, is proportionately rare and that the life of Indian women, as a whole, is almost as healthy as that of the men.

In this connection Miss Mayo ignores the vitally important fact, also pointed out in the Census of 1921, that the age of marriage is rapidly rising. The figures show that in 1911 there were 555 girls per thousand unmarried at the end of their fifteenth year while in 1921, there were 601. The movement to raise it further is constantly gaining strength. Here is what Mrs. Cousins has to say on the subject:—

"The awakened women of India have for the past ten years, through their organizations, been asking the Government to raise the Age of Consent; the Social Reform Conferences have been doing the same since Raja Ram Mohan Roy's day. Ten thousand women for one district alone have sent a petition to Government to raise the Age of Consent. The representatives of over 7,000 more women, who had assembled to discuss educational reform, also asked Government to enact legislation making marriage before 16 years old for a girl a penal offence. All these facts Miss Mayo fails to note. Instead she descends to untruthful invention, when she says: 'The Bill for raising the age of Consent to fourteen was finally thrown out, buried under an avalanche of popular disapproval.' There was not a meeting held all over India to express disapproval of the raising of the Age of Consent. The facts of the matter were that on the first voting on the Bill the section referring specifically to the raised age was passed by a majority of two, even against Government opposition, and it was disagreement regarding the amount of punishment and the Assembly tactics that broke the majority for the Bill as a whole."

Both in principle and in practice India is making marked progress in this vital reform.

Again let me turn to the statement in the "Argument":

"Give him no outlet in sports."

No outlet in sports? Did Miss Mayo not see the little children all over India with their tops and marbles, their kites and their various ball games? Did no one give her opportunity to witness the wild excitement aroused by a wrestling match in village or city? Wrestling is India's favourite sport in which the children and youth of every class but the highest freely participate. Did she nowhere come into some town or city at the hour when schools close in the afternoon and see every available open space crowed with children and young men playing football, cricket and other games? Was she not taken to see the fine, enthusiastic scouts, troops of boys and even of girls and groups of cubes that increasingly flourish in almost every city? Did she not visit any of the supervised playgrounds maintained by the Indian Municipalities of Bombay, Lucknow and Madras? I opened a little playground in the thickly peopled portion of Bombay into which an average of a hundred children a day crowded. Within two blocks of us were two other much larger playgrounds which were well used and even then the streets around us contained their groups of playing children. It is doubtless true that Indian children play less than Western children but they practically all play and millions of them play hard. It is as difficult for me to believe that Miss Mayo could go through India without coming into contact with the great and fast growing athletic development of her youth as it is to think that she saw none of the 40,000,000 acres of fodder crops, yet in all this book supposed to deal primarily with the health of India, aside from a brief statement in regard to the difficulty of getting school girls in Bengal to take exercise, the only reference to this subject which I find is this sentence in the \"Argument\":—"Give him no outlet in sports.\" Such a state of facts falls by its own weight.

"Give him habits that make him, by the time he is thirty years of age, a depraved and querulous old wreck—\n and will you ask what has sapped the energy of his manhood."

Sometimes I play in tennis matches against two South Indian Princes. Indian Rajas are supposed to have indulgence open to them from childhood. These men are 52 and 56 years old respectively, yet they play well through all the matches and tournaments of the season and have the ruddy look of health on their faces. In my own city of Ahmednagar I belong to the principal tennis club. Here we have a pair of Brahmans—a class among whom early marriage prevails—one 48 years old and the other 55, who can beat any pair from among the British military officers and civilians of the town, young or old. Up to the time when he was 45, for steel-nerved play, when the score was badly against us, I have never had a partner to equal the older of these men. There are plenty of active players among the Brahmans in our club who are over 40 years old. I have to do with an Indian who is still bale and hearty, an active force in the community, who goes daily about his business. He was reared in an ignorant Indian home and has always lived in the common atmosphere of India, but, at 82 years old, be to-day gives no signs of physical break-up. Almost anyone with experience in India could indefinitely multiply such facts as I have here given. That in India age often comes on too soon and that sex exaggeration, among other factors, probably plays a considerable part in this, I freely admit. But I personally have never met any "decayed and querulous old wretch" of thirty unless there were some definite disease like tuberculosis to account for this. The Census of 1921, Volume I, page 128, shows that out of every 1,000 of the Indian population 114 men and women in almost equal numbers were over 50 years old. The corresponding figure for the United States is 141. The number of Indians in this group is increasing, but even now is about 80 per cent of that of Americans and is an indication of fair vitality. (To be continued.)

Purdah System.

Mr. S. M. Fossati writes to the Non-Brahmin Youth:

"Woman has no soul"—is a charge which its enemies are never weary of levelling against Islam. A perusal of the Quran and the accredited saying of the Prophet Mohamed, will reveal to the impartial and unbiased student how baseless that charge is. I do not propose here to discourse on the status of woman in Islam. Such of my readers as are anxious to know anything about it may profitably refer to Moulan Khiwal's masterly treatise entitled " Position of woman in Islam." The following quotations from the Quran and the traditions speak for themselves: "Paradise is at the feet of thy mother." "The best of you is he who is best to his wife." "And surely ye have rights over your women and your women have rights over you." Islam is life to be lived and not a bundle of theories to be discussed. However ideal the position of woman in Islam might be in theory, in actual everyday life it is most unsatisfactory. Especially in India at the present time, the treatment meted out to Muslim women is a libel on Islam. Just as a tree is judged by its fruits, so is a religion judged by the life its votaries live. It is therefore small wonder that the treatment accorded to women by the generality of Musalmans in India has forced non-Muslims to the conclusion that woman in Islam has no soul.

I propose in what follows to briefly indicate that purdah system is quite foreign to Islam and does not have behind it any religious sanction.

The Arabs before the advent of Islam were a barbarous race who regarded their women as mere chattels and child-producing machines. The hatred of women in pre-Islamic Arabia was so implacable and deep-seated that when a female child was born it was buried alive. Whatever might have been the indignities, hardships and humiliations to which Arab women were subjected, they were never kept in seclusion. There was no purdah system. They moved about freely wherever they chose. With the advent of Mohamed, the status of woman legal, social, political and moral was raised. All the disabilities under which they were smothering vanished. The grant of equal rights and privileges to women, roused their sense of duty with the knowledge that emancipated Muslim women acquired a greater sense of self-respect and responsibility than their pagan sisters. This positive historical evidence conclusively proves that greater freedom for woman does not lead to immorality but makes them more moral. So long as the Arabs remained in their microcosmic desert world unphilosopically outside influences, their men and women enjoyed the utmost freedom. But with the expansion of the Muslim Empire, the Arabs came into contact with Byzantine and Persian civilisations. There is irrefutable historical proof to show that purdah system was prevalent in ancient Byzantium and Persia. It was specially in vogue amongst the ladies of the upper stratum of society. When there is an impact of civilizations and two individuals or nations come into contact with each other, there is mutual give and take. This was true of the early Moslem conquerors who emerged from the Arabian desert. The conquered Greece took the conqueror Rome captive. The Arabs adopted the purdah system from the conquered race.

City is the birth-place of civilization. Fashion is usually associated with civilization and flourishes in the city. Fashion has been defined as the eccentricity of the aristocratic woman hardened into fact. Purdah was regarded as a mark of civilization and was adopted by all those whose passion was fashion. It was only confined to the city. God made the country and the country folk refused to cover their faces with anything artificial. Man made the town and the townsmen muffled their faces with veils. The peasants are a practical people. They possess that uncommon commodity commonly called common sense. They refused to adopt the purdah as it not only interfered with their health but was also a hindrance to their work. So even in those days it was town women who appeared with a veil. The peasantry have consistently stood against that most unhealthy and inhuman system and even to this day they do not follow it. When town women went to the country they discarded the veil and when they returned to the town they donned it again. That is short is the history of purdah system in Islam.

Dr. Sulaiman in his presidential address to the social section of the All-India Mohammedan Educational Comfereance, has propounded another theory. He says that in the Middle Ages the minority of Muslim invaders of India found themselves in the midst of an alien majority and as they had to live an active outdoor life and could not always be by the side of their women, the only course open to them in that age of battle and brigandage was to keep their women in seclusion. He adds "Thus were Indian women denied that liberty which their sisters enjoyed in Turkey, Afghanistan and Egypt." But a moment's reflection will show how untenable this theory is. Turkey, Afghanistan and Egypt were not Moslem countries, They were conquered by Mussalmans. The first Muslim conquerors of those countries found themselves in the midst of an alien majority even as the early Moslem invaders of India, and yet they never kept their women in seclusion. No one with a modicum of historical knowledge can ever say that the non-Moslem populations of those countries were more civilized, docile and peace-loving than the inhabitants of India. I am inclined to think that the womenfolk of the early Malays of those countries, were exposed to far greater dangers than their sisters in India, in those remote days. So it cannot be said that seclusion in India was reorted to as a means of protecting women. Prof. Habib is emphatically of opinion that purdah system was in vogue in India, specially amongst the Rajputs from whom the Muslim invaders copied it.

When we examine the religious aspect of purdah system, we find that the Quranic injunction to women is not to display their (seenanath) that is ornaments. There is no mention of purdah. What is insisted upon is that women must not expose their persons in a very licentious manner. The dress worn by our Hindu and Parwee sisters is quite in consonance with the injunctions of the Quran. The following passage from Hamilton's translation of the Hedaya, an undisputed authority amongst Mussalmans supports my view. It is not permitted for men to look at strange women except in the face and palm of the hands, which is allowable, because women being frequently concerned in business with men such as giving, taking etc., it would therefore subject them to great inconvenience. If these pretensions are conceded, whence there is no room for leaving them bare. It is therefore transparently clear that purdah system has no religious sanction behind it.

A custom however absurd and alien it might be, when it comes to stay in a community, after the lapse of a few years assumes a religious air and is even invested with sanctity. The priest whose duty is to trade upon the ignorance of the gullible masses, by pre-pussuing old customs and practices, like the proverbial Devil who quotes the Scriptures, with his ingenuity and fertile imagination, so interprets the Holy Writ as to support his view. That is exactly what the Mullah does to-day with regard to this admittedly iniquitous and un-Islamic practice of purdah.

Purdah system whatever might have been its advantages in the past, it is admitted by every honest Mussulman, has now out-grown them. The Pasha or the Pasha in Turkey lived in a palatial buildings surrounded by orchards and gardens so that the denizens of the harem could move about freely, take exercise and enjoy fresh air and sun-shine. With the increase of Muslim population the middle class and the lower class came into existence and they could not provide their women with the same comforts and conveniences as those enjoyed by high class ladies. They had therefore to live in small tenements with no fresh air, no sun shine and no opportunities for recreation and exercise. Intestinal and pulmonary diseases took a heavy toll of life. Turkish nation was not only degenerating physically but was also dwindling numerically. The thinking section of Turkey was very much perturbed and the committee of Union and Progress put in the forefront of its programme for national reconstruction, emancipation of women which, as every one is aware, has been completely achieved under the liberal rule of Mustapha Kemal.

The condition in India to-day is much worse than what it was in pre-Kemalist Turkey. The recent Mortality Report of Madras ought to open the eyes of every right-thinking Mussalman to the conviction that if Mussalmans should live they must at once discard purdah. The one sure cause of the physical degeneration and intellectual decay of the Muslim community is purdah system.

It is argued that purdah system is a mark of chivalry and Mussalmans as a chivalrous people ought to preserve it. I am not prepared to admit that it is an outcome of chivalry for chivalry does not consist in shutting up women within the four walls of the house thus killing them with kindness which is much worse than killing them with cruelty.

There is nothing more mischievous than to suggest that the purdah system was instituted to prevent them from going astray. Trust begets trust. Shutting women up within the four walls of the house is a gross reflection on their good faith. Immorality is not peculiar to women. It is equally rife amongst men. If purdah system could be an effective check against immorality men and women alike ought to be kept in purdah.

It is a world of changing humanity is progressing. Mussalmans must either perish. The leading Islamic countries have discarded purdah. The croaking of the conservative Mullah can no longer stem the tide of Islamic progress. I believe in the inherent vitality of Islam which has never been opposed to human advancement. Just as in politics the sedition of one generation becomes the imperial loyalty of another, so in theology the heresy of one generation becomes the orthodoxy of another. If this generation were to condemn the protagonist of the feminist movement as heretics, the next generation would canonize them as saints. Signs are not wanting to show that Muslim women of India are determined to discard purdah. How glorious and chivalrous would it be for Mussalmans to assist their womenfolk in their efforts to emancipate themselves from this most perilous system which has wrought the physical, intellectual and economic ruin of the Muslim community!

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Memorial Services: Rev. V. R. Subba conducted a special divine service in the Ahalyashram Hall of the Depressed Classes Mission Society of India, Poona Branch, at 8 a.m. on Monday, the 15th, in memory of the Late Lord Sinha and the Late Rai Sahib K. Ranga Rao of the Late Swami Ishwarananda of Mangalore and dwelt in his address on the salient features of the noble work they did during their life time.
Nautch Girls Banned: In the course of a detailed description of the marriage celebration of the ex-Maharaja, Sir Tukoji Rao Holkar with Devi Sharmishta, which took place on a grand scale at Barwaha on the 17th instant, the correspondent of the Times of India writes: A particularly interesting feature of the celebrations was the total absence of the nautch girls for which Indore functions have previously been so famous. From the very moment the marriage decision was made Sir Tukoji Rao Holkar and his future bride definitely decided that there should be none of that old time gaiety. It is true that half a dozen dancing girls of considerable reputation were present in the crowd, but I was definitely and authoritatively informed that they were there as invited and unwanted guests. At any rate their enterprise in looking for business went unrewarded for a further editor has gone forth that there is to be no dancing or singing at those celebrations."

Austalian Girl Condemns "Mother India": An Associated Press message says: Diwan Bahadur T. Ramgacharia purchased several hundred copies of Sir, Natarajan's booklet, "Reply to Mother India," and circulated them to people to have had met in Australia. He received many interesting criticisms in condemnation of Miss Katherine Mayo's book "Mother India." This book is an insult—a deadly one—to an ancient civilization, and can only tend to produce racial discord among the boys and girls. Miss Mayo has done well to have remembered that: "There is so much bad in the past of us, and so much good in the worst of us, that it well behoves any of us, to talk about the rest of us." and so judged Indian life accordingly. For, if we search for evil, evil will not disappoint us by its non-appearance, to matter in what country we sojourner. The cheapness of this book, for it is indeed cheap and unworthy of a woman, is most clearly shown in the author's disgusting suggestions concerning Indian women's morality, how abuser to judge a whole nation of people by exceptional cases. An utter lack of rational thought and sportsmanship is shown throughout; and if people read this book with an open mind, realizing that so old a civilization could not have continued to exist under the moral conditions depicted by Miss Mayo, there can be no doubt that it will fail in its purpose, which seems to belittle India, Indian people, their moral and religious life in the mind of the world. It is very difficult indeed for us to judge a foreign people. Their ways are not our ways. To start out to write of a country as Miss Mayo did, one must have a very unbiased mind and that is where Miss Mayo failed. The social side of life so well illustrated in "Mother India" can be found in our own country, unfortunately. Nevertheless, that does not brand a whole country as immoral.

Notes:
- Mahatma Gandhi and Christianity—The Bishop of Manchester speaking at the Christian Missionary Conference at Jerusalem, says a Reader's message, expressed the opinion that if Mr. Gandhi who, perhaps, was the greatest man on earth, were a Christian he would better succeed in finding his ideal, and his energy would succeed in moralising and spiritualising Christian civilization. If Mahatmajji is in the least disposed to consider his converse to Christianity as a 'business proposition,' the great return promised by the Bishop of moralising and spiritualising Christian civilization would be a very great inducement for him to do so. He has publicly stated, however, that there was a period of his life when he seriously considered the question and came to the conclusion that it was best for him to remain and work as a Hindu, imbued with Christ's teachings, than become a Christian and cut out from his ancestral home and not certain of finding root in the new soil to which he would have transplanted himself. The fact that Mahatma Gandhi has become a Christian is due to the influence and spiritual forces in the world, without giving up his ancestral faith, while millions of Indians who have become converts have not yet produced a Gandhi, would seem to show that Mahatmajji's judgment was not at fault.

To our knowledge, there are hundreds of Hindus who have made a deeper and more fruitful study of Christ's teachings, in the sense that they have tried honestly and sincerely to live up to them, though, of course, few have come up to Mahatmajji's level, than any corresponding number of professing Christians. Why should 'Christian Civilization' refuse to be moralised and spiritualised until Mahatmajji enrols himself as a Christian? The Bishop, perhaps, did not mean this, and we shall gladly make any correction which may be dispensed with by a fuller report of his communications.

Penalising Married Students: We learn from the Educational Review for February that the Board of High School and Intermediate Education in the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh has resolved that Effect from the year 1928 no married students except those who are married before July 1928, will be admitted to the High School Examination from a recognized institution and mail only candidates may appear out of married candidates. It was also resolved to request the Director of Public Instruction to amend the Education Code accordingly. We do not quite understand the meaning of the resolution. Married boys are not debarred from joining a recognised High School but they may not appear for High School Examination except as private candidates. We do not know if there is any difference in the standards required of candidates from recognised schools and private candidates, and, therefore say whether married men will be put to any extra trouble owing to the rule. If so it is not as if forty years ago, most of the greatest Indians of our time, would not have found admission to recognised schools for that is evidently what the rule is intended to bring about. We hope the desire of the Board to advance social reform, but it has, we must say, not chosen the right method. Scholarships for unmarried boys will be perfectly unobjectionable, and will involve no injustice to married men. We do not expect that Government will sanction this rule which, as the Educational Review observes, will be penalising youth for the sins of their elders.

The Simon Commission's Lapses: The Indian Witness, which is the organ of the Methodist Episcopal Church, has some severe comments on the presence of Sir John Simon and other members of his Commission at music entertainments at Tanjore and Madura. Our contemporary regrets to see prominent co-operators, who are regarded by opponents of the Commission as political reactionaries, exhibiting themselves as moral and spiritual reactionaries. The Witness writes: "Dancing girls in India do not have good reputations, in fact, ordinarily, if not always, they are prostitutes. Not many years ago it was customary to entertain the guests at social gatherings in honour of important persons but sentiment against the practice has been growing steadily and is now very strong throughout the country. Protest has come from the better elements in all religious communities. Social reformers have held the custom responsible for retarding the movement for more social freedom for women as many men have been unwilling for their wives and daughters to attend public social functions where they would feel humiliated and disgraced by the presence and performance of women of ill-fame." Our contemporaries are quite right in declaring that the sinlessness of the performance is made more poignant by the fact that the Presidents of the District Boards are nominal Christians, the one an Indian Roman Catholic and the other a European. Sir John Simon is the son of a nonconformist clergyman and he and most, if not all, of the other members of the Commission are members of Christian Churches. It is to be hoped that they will soon know enough and care enough to refuse to permit exhibitions by dancing girls at functions in their honour." We are quite sure that it was the ignorance of the members of the real charmers of the employmen which led them to give countenance to this.
a poignant illustration of the disadvantage, to put it mildly, of sending out to India a Commission composed of men who have no previous knowledge of the forces struggling for mastery in the social life of the people. Incidentally, the Indian Witness expresses its opinion of the composition of the Commission and of the opposition to it. It says: “To us the appointment of a Commission and the decision of great parties and sections of the population to boycott it have been equally foolish; Lord Birkenhead threw away the opportunity a Secretary of State for India has had in twenty years and the boycotters have shown how futile and are throwing away their opportunities with equal recklessness.” This is the view of a Christian missionary organ who looks at the political situation from a reason for it was not hidden.

Conversion and Polygamy: The Indian Witness comments on the conversion of Miss Miller to Hinduism and marriage as the third wife of Maharaja Tukoji Rao Holkar, writes: Even The Indian Social Reformer in a leader entitled “The Nasik Conversion” has no word of protest against the conversion, though the sinister reason for which it was undertaken is not hidden, but seize the occasion for a homily on the alleged inclusiveness of Hinduism, and even points to the conversion as a reply to Miss Mayo’s denunciation of Hinduism.

Our contemporary has evidently not followed our comments on the affair. We have pointed out that two distinct issues are involved in the matter: Conversion to Hinduism and polygamy. As to the first issue, we have said that we are against all organised proselytism, though we cannot blame Hindus for resorting to it in self-defence in the face of Christian and Muslim propaganda. Polygamy we have condemned in any shape or form without number, and we have now made out that it is excusable in the Maharaja. Our contemporary claims that we had no word of protest against the conversion though the sinister reason for it was not hidden. To our mind, the fact that the motive was not hidden but perfectly open is rather a point in favour than against the parties to the marriage. Can our contemporary say that missionaries, who have condemned or have in the majority of cases been actuated by spiritual motives, though these, no doubt, are always alleged for their conversion?

The Rani of Mandi has started an All-India Child Marriage Abolition League. The objects of the League are to arouse and educate public opinion throughout India against the institution of child marriage, and to attain the goal of 16 years as the minimum age of marriage for girls, and 18 years as the minimum age of marriage for boys. In order to make the organisation countrywide, the All-India Committee shall appoint a member from each province and wherever possible from each State or States Agency to form provincial committees. Similarly the provincial committees shall appoint men and women to form District Committees, and urge on them the necessity of holding public meetings, arranging lectures at schools and colleges, distributing literature and get-brochure and similar organisations to go round singh propaganda songs. About the beginning of next year, an annual meeting of the All-India Committee and representatives of the provincial committees will be held for the purpose of discussing policies and reporting progress, etc. The headquarters of the All-India Committee will be situated at Delhi, or in Simla according to the season.

The All-India Committee of Child Marriage Abolition League is presided over by the Rani of Mandi and among its members may be mentioned Kunar Shri Fatteh Singhji of Limbdi, Mr. T. Rangachariar, Maharani Suniti of Patiala, and Mr. Cowasji Jehangir (senior). Our contemporary has evidently not followed our comments on the affair. We have pointed out that two distinct issues are involved in the matter: Conversion to Hinduism and polygamy. As to the first issue, we have said that we are against all organised proselytism, though we cannot blame Hindus for resorting to it in self-defence in the face of Christian and Muslim propaganda. Polygamy we have condemned in any shape or form without number, and we have now made out that it is excusable in the Maharaja. Our contemporary claims that we had no word of protest against the conversion though the sinister reason for it was not hidden. To our mind, the fact that the motive was not hidden but perfectly open is rather a point in favour than against the parties to the marriage. Can our contemporary say that missionaries, who have condemned or have in the majority of cases been actuated by spiritual motives, though these, no doubt, are always alleged for their conversion?

The Indian Witness has understood the point of our remark about the coincidence when a priest comes to celebrate Mass. As Dr. Goodier says, though we call them Christians, one does not appear to be purists. It appears, that at places where tourists were not dead in India.

The Leader’s Comment: The Leader’s opinion on the presence of Sir John Simon and his colleagues at nautch entertainments is not without interest.

Whatever the Simon Seven may be they do not appear to be purists. It appears, that at social gatherings organized by the district boards of Madura and Tanjore to welcome them, there were present nautch girls. Mr. George Joseph in a letter to the Indian Social Reformer has protested against the presence of these women at entertainments to a body that is supposed to be engaged in the task of educating the public in the matter of good conduct and good morals.” To him “the sadness of the performance is emphasized by the fact that the president of one of the boards was a Roman Catholic and of the other a House of Lords. Mr. Joseph is lacking in imagination, and appreciation of the resourcefulness of the organizers. The Simon Seven were perhaps not considered to be sufficientlyiert for getting together and indulging in nautch. If crackers and fire-works are used in one place to ensure a popular welcome to the commissioners why not nautch girls in another?

About 5000 people of all communities assembled at Gilder Tank Grant Road on the 18th instant, to welcome back Bombay jail bars, Russia-Bangure and Adi Hakim, Parsi youths, who left Bombay Gilder Tank, on 18th October 1928 on a round the world tour on bicycles. They cycled through 27 countries keeping as far as possible to land going, to the islands, then by sea again to Japan and back to India again, the entire portion of China and Burma. Lady Cowasji Jehangir (senior) in a speech, said she was proud to welcome these intrepid young record breakers. Then a message of appreciation from the Governor, Sir Leslie Gooden, was read out and short speeches by tourists themselves followed. Each stressed the fact that the trip was not undertaken as a wager but to show the world that the spirit of sportsmanship was not dead in India.
THE SARDA MARRIAGE BILL

The Select Committee of the Legislative Assembly has greatly improved the Bill for the prevention of child marriages introduced at the Simla session by Mr. Harbilas Sarda. The Bill as drafted by him proposed to make all marriages of girls below 16 years void. In order to meet the case of those parents who were not prepared to go so far, the Bill provided that Magistrates on application should grant licenses for the marriage of girls who were 11 years of age. These were the main provisions of the Bill which was published in the Indian Social Reformer of October 22, 1927. The Bill was referred to a Select Committee of the Assembly inspite of the opposition of Government who wished it to be circulated for public comment and criticism. During the interval of six months which has elapsed, several public bodies have expressed their cordial approval of the object of the Bill. Women's associations and conferences in particular have enthusiastically supported Mr. Sarda's Bill, while at the same time they have suggested the raising of the minimum marriage age for girls to 14 and even 16. The most remarkable feature of public opinion at the present day is the very general support given to the Bill by all except a few ultra-conservative and orthodox bodies. More than this, two Bills which have been introduced in the Provincial Legislative Councils of Bombay and Madras, have further helped to focus public support to legislative action to put an end to child marriages.

The main points in Mr. Sarda's Bill on which improvements were widely desired were, first, the scope of the Bill, secondly, the minimum age and thirdly, the penalty to be prescribed. As regards the first, it was pointed out that child marriages prevail not only among Hindus but also, though in a lesser degree, among other communities. It was, therefore, suggested that the scope of the Bill which was proposed to be confined to Hindus only, should be enlarged so as to apply to all child marriages irrespective of the creed or community of the parties. The Select Committee, we are glad to see, has accepted this suggestion and made the Bill applicable to all communities. The second objection was that the minimum age prescribed in Mr. Sarda's Bill, particularly for girls, was too low, and that it should be raised to at least 14, if not 15 years. It was urged with considerable force that there is already a strong tendency to keep girls unmarried up to 15 or 16 years, and that 11 and 12 years which was fixed in the draft Bill, was not sufficient protection against the evils of too early marriages. The Select Committee has seen the force of this argument and raised the limit to 14 years for girls. We are sorry to see that the veteran leader, Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, has dissented from this improvement and wishes to keep it as the age-limit. We hope he will see his way to accord his influential support to the change made by the Select Committee, which is a very moderate one in the present conditions of society. We would also suggest that those who are for a higher age-limit, should accept the minimum proposed by the Select Committee. When a girl remains unmarried up to 14 years of age, the Rabbon is cross, and after that it is a matter purely of family circumstances whether she is obliged to marry at 14 or is allowed to remain unmarried till a much later period. Orthodox opinion should not be unnecessarily ruffled by proposals which are far in advance of present-day practice. Even in Europe, the legal limit is comparatively low, but public sentiment sanctions only marriages far in advance of it. It will do the same in this country as education progresses, and as ideas of freedom, political and social, acquire a dominating influence upon our minds.

The third and, in some ways, the most important improvement which has been adopted by the Select Committee is the substitution of penalties in the shape of fine and simple imprisonment for the offence of absolute child marriage in place of making them civilly void as proposed in Mr. Sarda's Bill. In our comments on the Bill we laid great stress on the danger of making marriages civilly void or voidable, as the consequences of it may be very serious to the issue of such marriages even after the lifetime of the parents. Such cases have happened, and it is against public policy that any law should with eyes open increase the opportunities of their happening. So increase in the age-limit can be made if the consequences of an infringement of it are to be the utter and absolute nullity of marriages in which it may occur. Draetic laws which cut athwart widespread social practices produce almost invariably in their application a plentiful and prolific crop of perjury. There is only one point—one that is a very serious one—which the Select Committee has overlooked in its consideration of the Bill. We have urged again and again the vital importance of introducing the monogamous principle in the marriage law of the land. To raise the age of marriage to give education to girls, and at the same time leave the door open for polygamous marriages, without any sort of restriction, seems to us to be pave the way for grave trouble. It may not be possible to make monogamy compulsory in the Bill but a permissive clause may be introduced permitting parties who wish their marriages to be monogamous to tack on that incident to them. Once a declaration is made to this effect, it will, of course, be irrevocable and binding upon both parties during their life-time.

A Courageous Lead.—A Bhopal correspondent writes: "A noticeable feature of the session of the Legislative Council of the State which was opened by His Highness the Nawab Sahab today, (27th instant) was the presence of His Highness' daughter, the Heir-Apparent, who sat next to her father without the veil. The Princess is a mere young girl and her head in discarding the "Purdah" will have important reaction on the social life of Indian Musulmes."
THE FALL OF AN EMPIRE.

An Extract from Ernest Barker, British Political Historian.

(By Mr. Wendell Thomas.)

The Roman Empire will always elicit human interest and sympathy because of its huge majesty. The decline and fall of this vast structure is specially important because it marks the beginning of Western Europe. But the greatest significance of the fall of Rome for the present time lies in the warning it gives to its modern successor, the British Empire.

The Government of Rome was not an expression of the common will, but a ferro-concrete building containing one hundred and twenty million human beings. Administrative despotism was coupled with financial oppression. The ruling system was Civil Service plus favouritism. State officials lacked originality. The defect of any Civil Service is want of initiative. Only the Emperor had the power and right of initiative, and he could not use it because he could find no response in the enormous, sullen machine at his disposal. Wheels revolted, but made no progress. Any state needs social thinking playing upon the government organs. It needs democracy, with its parties, press, platform and parliament in which social ideas may be vented and social purposes discussed. Rome had none of this. Its society was not conscious of itself. There was no invention either in science or in every day life. Rome could have saved herself from the irruptions of the barbarians if only she could have invented some new military tactics.

The state was overburdened with a too expensive superstructure of administration, which regulated industry with meticulous care, and stereotyped society in general. Taxes were enormous. The later Empire was forced to adopt collective rule because of failure of individual enterprise. A gulf widened between the civil and military sides of government, to the detriment of both sides. The soldier class became a caste, and the country suffered the horror of an army putting the mailed fist into civil society. Generals became sleek household favourites of the emperor, and the populace was diverted with the spectacle of handsome boshed guards. In the third century the soldier became dominant. Two groups of soldiers arose: native Roman and foreign barbarian. The prime minister became master of both soldiers; often he himself was a barbarian, and the soldiers preyed on the citizenry. The only approach to democracy lay in the provincial councils, but even these were not allowed to vote taxes. Nationalism was unrecognized, and patriotism subordinated to the ceremony of worship paid to the ‘divine’ emperor. But nationalism survived with its language smothered underground, and finally burst into flame to hasten the fall of the imperial monster. One of Rome’s chief mistakes was her failure to recognize nationalism.

As in political regime, so also in social structure, Rome was a rigid ferro-concrete building. By the end of the third century, society had gone back to the system of payment in kind, for money had vanished. Gold, the most precious of precious metals, was exhausted, for East and West had been drained of its loot. The core of the empire degenerated into silver-washed alms of tin and lead. And even these were kept in bags which were not removed from the treasury. As might be expected, the result was a chaos of prices. During the reign of Diocletian, the government resorted to compulsory price-fixing, and for the same reasons, that held during the recent World War—a limit of money and a state seige. This policy was of course, unfavorable to the large middle classes whose trading business rests on fluid currency. This same class was moreover heavily taxed, taxed out of proportion to its means. The Government adopted the device of making a body of town councillors collectively responsible for the internal revenue of the town. And these councillors were of the middle classes. The vicious result was a great exodus from the middle class: its members tried to escape up into the privileged class of officials, down into the class of serfs, and even sideways into the Church and the army. And these attempts to escape were successful: the middle class disappeared. This was the fundamental cause of the ruin of the empire.

Classes deteriorated into castes. There was a tendency to let the town councillor be succeeded only by his son. The same with the serf and the artisan. The nobility also became hereditary, and society became divided into two huge castes, the upper and the lower. There was no natural or logical selection of professions or occupations, no incentive to advancement, no hope of progress. The articulate ancient world did not work: all mutual and executive labour was thrown on to slaves. There was little industry, and little room for industry. Agriculture was almost the only work. The over-large estates of the nobles were cultivated by gangs of slaves who were herded into work-houses and driven into the fields like so many hounds. Owing to the severe depression, these slaves did not multiply in sufficient numbers to maintain the stock, and so their numbers had to be replenished by new victims dragged in from wars of conquest. But when conquest failed, even this source of supply was cut off, and hence slavery ceased from sheer, death of slaves. Then serfdom arose. The slave was given family and soil to keep him alive. He was tied to the soil, and the soil, to him. And still society was clowen in twain; the idle rich oppressed the over-worked poor.

Perhaps at this time the empire suffered one of those climatic cycles in which the very land itself dries up. Cultivation becomes restricted, and the uncultivated areas breed malaria. Impoverished and infected, the human body ceases to reproduce in its accustomed way. Augustus, who ruled as early as the first century, offered special privileges of the state to any man who could achieve three children; and if by chance any man should reach to the supreme level of eight children, he was led in triumph through avenues of applauding crowds at times of festival. Rome sank to half its former population, only in Egypt, where the people basked in the bene fit of the fractifying Nile, did the population remain stationary.

The fall of Rome is a chapter in the book of conflict between nomad and seafaring peoples. The Romans, in their faro-concrete building, were a seafaring people facing the nomads outside. The Arabian desert has been one perennial source of nomad movements of expansion, and the great flat and grassy steppe from the River Odor in Europe to the Great Wall of China is another. The nomad tribes of a sudden get on the move with their tents and camels, and something begins to happen in China, in India, and in the Roman Empire. The greatest problem of civilized nations has been how to keep out the nomads. If you build a wall, they will overpower it. If you post a garrison they will eventually overwhelm it. The Chinese managed to exclude the nomads by the very thickness of their population; the nomads could not find a way in! But the Roman Empire had become a vacuum, and 'Nature abhors a vacuum.' So the imperial shell was shattered by the impact of the mass of fertile Germanic tribes who in turn were pressed from behind by the Huns.

Such was the fall of Rome. What fell was not a nation, race or country, but a system. There was no extinction of Roman stock. Latin culture survived. But the empire perished. And the cause of its death was itself. Rigid bureaucracy, excessive taxation, militarism, caste, national suppression and slavery are the flesh and blood of imperialism, and imperialism dies because its flesh and blood are corrupt. The luxuriant and sexual vice of Rome have often been held up as the cause of her decay; but these are only symptoms. Given an idle ruling caste, such vices are bound to appear, but the root of the trouble lies in the condition that permits an idle ruling class.

We have here no conclusion with regard to the British Empire, but material for thinking. A superficial inspection of the modern world reveals that the present fanning empire is no exact replica of the past one. It is even doubtful whether the British realm can now be called an empire at all: many prefer the term Commonwealth, and many believe the term fits the facts. But on the other hand imperialism still persists to some extent, and its oppressive effects are only too evident. Our task is not to make condemnation an end in itself, but to use it as a means to clear up and improve the situation.

REFLECTIONS.
(By 'Rationalist')

I.—On the Education of the Sexes.

Our girls, they say, should be educated differently from our boys. It is urged that there should be one kind of education for our house-keepers, and another for our office-seekers—I beg your pardon, I mean our office-goers. Well, I say, let it be so. Let there be two kinds of education, and therefore two kinds of schools, one for each. Let all those who would be house-keepers go to the house-keeper school, and all that would be office-goers go to the office-goer school. Only let the principle of self-determination have its way here also as in high politics—which means that we should let our boys and girls choose what they would be, whether house-keepers or office-goers, and consequently which kind of school they should go to.

When this choice is allowed to both sexes, it may be found that most girls prefer the house-keeping line and most boys the office-going line. But what we are concerned with is the fact that there are bound to be some girls who will prefer to be office-goers, either because they have the aptitude for that line or because they have not the aptitude for the other line and think they would be more useful to themselves and to society as office-goers than as house-keepers. Similarly there may be some boys who will prefer to be house-keepers, either because they have the aptitude for that line or because they have not the aptitude for the other line and think they would succeed better as chefs, butlers, culinary artists, doctors, teachers, clerical artists. Now, what we men in our selfishness, and women in their foolishness, do is to seek to restrict all individuals of one sex, viz., the female, to the house-keeping line, whether they like it or not, whether they have the aptitude for it or not,—while the individuals of the other sex are allowed a free choice and have the run of both the office-going and the house-keeping lines.

It is this one-sided regime, this denial to one sex of self-determination in the matter of choice of life's profession, which all lovers of social justice are bound to condemn. They must do their best to set it right, not merely for reasons of violating an abstract principle like justice, but because the vindication of it in this case means the advancement of social efficiency. For the distribution of functions according to individual aptitudes in society means making the best possible use of all the available talents and energy of the units, as this alone can make for the greatest advantage of the whole. Sex monopolies, like caste monopolies, mean the sacrifice of the interests of society for the immediate good—the seeming gain—of a section. The enforced waste of talents, which must result when law or custom denies any member of society opportunities for the exercise of his or her talents in the spheres they are best fitted for, ought to be treated as a crime against society. No system of monopolies, whether based on caste, sex, race or creed, can continue long without lowering the morale, weakening the solidarity and sapping the independence of the whole body politic that is maintained on the system. So, our leading men and women, beware how you set a limit to the ambitions of any group by caste or sex within the nation, for you would not that a limit should be set to the ambitions of the nation itself.

II.—On the Religion of Thomas Hardy.

The Reformer had occasion recently for some stimulating remarks on the religious belief of the late Thomas Hardy. While I should think that the objection of both Canon Barry and the Catholic Leader to the form of the funeral service gone through for the Rationalist Hardy at Westminster Abbey was correct, at any rate from their point of view, I believe the Reformer's true description of Hardy's creed—evoked as it was by the Leader's remarks on the subj... must go to provide the much-needed corrective to the habitual theocratising of its 'Catholic' contemporaries. My own opinion is that Thomas Hardy, as he was too hard-headed to believe, was also too self-respecting to pretend to believe, in a 'fool's paradise' with the fashionable crowd. As to the propriety of repeating traditional forms of religion over the body of a free-thinker, surely clergymen like posts may be allowed to use language inherited from a darker age, and give it the brighter sense suited to this. Does not doctors speak of 'lunacy' while disbelieving that the moon (luna) has anything to do with it, and astronomers speak of 'survives' and 'sun-down', though they be good Copernicans? Are not Christian theologians, aye, even fundamentalists of the Catholic Leader type, constrained to seek a 'modernist' interpretation for the Bible story about Jehovah creating 'in the beginning' a succession of days and nights and mornings and evenings and afterwards the sun? I suppose, even an atheist may, quite consistently with his creed, bid his friends a 'good-by' even knowing that the word was originally 'God be with you.'

Knarese in Bombay.

The Editor the Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In the note 'Kanarese in Bombay' in your issue of the 3rd inst., you mention a letter which I wrote to you in 1928 and to which I have referred in my letter 'Dravidian Renaissance' printed in the same issue, you refer me to one footnote to the former letter, in which you say you cited your authority. Please allow me to point out that there is no footnote to that letter, in proof of this, a minor point of more recent Bombay antiquities. I would refer you once more to the Indian Social Reformer of March 13th, 1928.

Well, you have cited your authority and I have cited mine. I say, it was up to Mr. Edwardes to ascertain what precisely was meant by the term 'Canarese' (the spelling with the initial K, by the way is quite modern) which he found in the early Bombay records. What he evidently did was to take the term in the only sense which he knew, viz. the modern sense of Kannada, and to ignore the contemporary literary evidence, in the so-called 'Canarese' itself as well as in Portuguese and English, which should have shown him how wide of the mark his observation lay. The inference he drew a posteriori about the race of the early inhabitants of Bombay from the mere circumstance of their vernacular having been at one time called 'Canarese' seems to me to be on a par with the inference, if such a one were to be made, that before the European advent the whole of America was inhabited by emigrants from India, from the fact that the Europeans called the inhabitants 'Indians.' Note that Mr. Edwardes' dictum that the early inhabitants of Bombay were of Dravidian origin is incorrect. It may be true by itself. But any attempt to deduce from racial origins, or to square with reference thereto, the notion that any considerable body of Bombay inhabitants at the comparatively late period in question spoke the Dravidian language called Kanarese must strike any one who knows all there is to be known on the subject as no better than the sort of antiquarian lore which Mr. Pickwick exercised on 'Bill Stamps His Mark.' I say, let us make sure of our facts and then speculate. Is there any evidence except the word 'Canarese' that the inhabitants of Bombay Island in the 17th century spoke the Dravidian language called Kanarese? The Portuguese records are clear on the point; and the fact that the laws were ordered to be translated from English into Portuguese as well as 'Canarese' is significant. The possible ignorance of the Portuguese language on the part of Mr. Edwardes cannot be pleaded as an excuse for such blatant supericialism as he has betrayed into on this point; for the relevant excerpts from the Portuguese records were available to him in English in the scholarly work, among others, of Col. Yulef and Dr. Burnell. I think, even the Encyclopaedia Britannica might have helped him on the point. If he had cared to go through the documents, he might have learnt that the Portuguese authorities themselves of the period had come to recognise that 'Canarín' was a misnomer of theirs for Marathi dialects of the Konkan coast. The misnomers of pioneers die harder than others: as witness 'the West Indies,' the American Indians the 'Cannikins,' on the East Coast—almost in the heart of Tamilnadu, 'Malabars' for Tamilians in Ceylon, and 'Moro's,' i.e. Moros or Moors, for the Mabasmands of the Philippine Islands in the Pacific. So the mere fact that a vernacular into which a law-code was ordered to be translated by the British authorities in Bombay was called 'Canarese' by them is not sufficient to indicate its nature. Is the code in the so-called Canarese available to-day? Possibly not. But there are many literary remains dating from that period concerning that 'Canarese,' including a grammar of the language entitled Arte de lingua Canarín whose contents leave not a shadow of doubt that by 'Canarese' (or 'Cansrin' in Portuguese) is meant some form of Marathi. To say that Mr. Edwardes knew the difference between Kanarese and Konkani is just not relevant. If he knew it (which is doubtful), the knowledge evidently did not help him to the truth; because he either did not care, or was unable to inspect the so-called Canarese version of the laws, on which he hastened to antiquarize. The early Europeans in India did almost all their writing and printing in Roman characters only. So even if Mr. Edwardes could distinguish between writings in the different Indian vernaculars by noting the scripts, even that much knowledge could not avail him if, as is likely to be the case, the 'Canarese' version of the law-code was issued in Roman characters.

Now let us look at this fact independently of such authorities? At the period in question the whole of Bombay Island or rather Peninsula was inhabited by various Hindu castes, Kolis and Kunbis predominating, and there were also some Parhbus and a few Brahmanas. All of these like their castemen on the mainland opposite have been Marathi in speech. 'There is no tradition among them that their ancestors spoke the Kanarese language (truly so called), as there would most probably have been if the language had survived on the island as late as the latter part of the 17th century. We know also that at that period large numbers of the inhabitants had been converted to Christianity by the Portuguese, and some of them made literate in Portuguese language. There were also some Portuguese and a large population of mixed Indo-Portuguese descent who spoke Portuguese.

These facts account for the Portuguese version ordered to be made of the law-code. Though Marathi is their home-tongue and Portuguese a language of foreign introduction, a literary tradition of the latter language still lingers in the community of Catholic Christians at Bandra etc., on the island, to the community to which the genial and versatile "Kakha" Mr. Joseph Baptista, belongs, and which calls itself "East Indians"—rather paradoxically, seeing that they live in the West of India though not in "West Indies." Now the question is:

What language did the rest of the islanders speak and write? On the mainland opposite for hundreds of miles round the language spoken and written was Marathi and no other,—a fact there is no evidence to doubt, and all to support. The Portuguese called the language 'Canarin,' wrongly as they themselves recognised later on, when they were more advanced in the knowledge of the country, its people and languages. The Portuguese ecclesiastics and a famous Boghali Jesuit who was in their service wrote, their Christian missionary works in the same language. In the earlier days they called it "Canarin," later on indifferently 'Canarin,' 'Moratin' or 'Concanin,' and finally dropped the use of the first name, except as a rather derogatory nickname for the native Christians of Goa and neighbouring parts. But in no case do we find the actual language of those works to be the Dravidian language known as Kanarese or Kannada. No doubt Kannada is a language of great antiquity, which had a highly developed literature at a time when Marathi was yet in its infancy, and was once spoken over a much wider area than to-day. But in the face of the above facts to insist that the 'Canarese' we find mentioned in early European records of Bombay was the Kanarese truly so called is to imagine a colony of Kanarese people on the island who after a brief period of influence under the Portuguese suddenly, vanished soon after the advent of the British, leaving no other trace of themselves but the name which has become the subject of this correspondence, and which the Kanarese themselves are beginning to repudiate as an outlandish name, preferring to call their language Kannada, and themselves Kannadigas or Karnataka.

CALCUTTA CITY COLLEGE INCIDENT.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Permit me to refer to your criticisms published in the Reformer of the 17th March on the recent incident in the Calcutta City College hostel on the occasion of the last Saraswati Puja. I am afraid the statement of the City Council published in the Indian Messenger of the 6th March has escaped your notice. From this communiqué it appears that it was not the performance of the Puja that was prohibited and it is stated that if the students had approached the authorities in a proper spirit the latter would have helped them. What was objected to was the surreptitious introduction of the image in the hostel compound and the subsequent attitude of the boarders. Your allusion to the Christian Missionary College is not clear. Is it meant that these Missionaries permit the boarders to worship Hindu Idols within the precincts of their hostels? In Upper India there are many Educational Institutions in charge of members of the Arya Samaj, and so far as my information goes the authorities do not allow idol worship in their hostels. There must be some Maharashtrian students in the Christian hostels and I am in charge of members of other denominations. Do you think the authorities will permit them the celebration of Maharram by bringing the fursans in the hostel compound? Where is the line to be drawn?

What would have the late Raja Ram Mohan done in such matters is only a matter of conjecture. Perhaps he would have, like the late Sanand Dayanand, made a clean sweep of the idols and the idolatrous ceremonies.

Yours etc.,

Jubbulpore,

24th March 1928.

HARBILAS SARDI'S BILL.

SELECT COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

Details are available of the Select Committee's report on Mr. Harbilas Sarda's Bill against child marriage. The report is signed subject to minutes of dissent by five members.

In the course of the report the Committee says: The object of the Bill as introduced in the Legislature was to impose restraint upon the solemnisation of child marriages and the method adopted was, broadly speaking, that of declaring all marriages of boys or girls below a certain age to be invalid. The Bill has been circulated under the orders of the Government of India and has elicited a strong expression of feeling that it is objectionable, both on religious and other grounds, to interfere with the validity of a marriage which has been performed.

In our opinion these objections are at present insuperable, and we have accordingly acted upon a suggestion which has been widely made, that the Bill should effect its purpose of restraining child marriage not by declaring such marriages to be invalid but by imposing punishments upon those who participate in them. We, therefore, set ourselves the task of reconceiving the Bill with this object in view.

PRINCIPLE UNCHANGED.

To begin with we consider the propriety of our action in so materially amending a Bill whose principle had been accepted by the Legislative Assembly in referring it to us, and we came to the conclusion that the principle of the Bill which had been endorsed by the Legislative Assembly was the principle that child marriages should be restrained by legislation and that it was open to us to vary the method of imposing the restraint from that contained in the Bill to another which is undoubtedly in accord with public opinion and seems to ourselves the only method which is at present expedient. Nevertheless, we do recognise that the substitution in the Select Committee of what is formally a new Bill is an unusual step, and we desire that the further stages in the Bill should be undertaken deliberately and only after public opinion has been fully elicited on its details.

TO APPLY TO ALL CLASSES.

The Bill as introduced refers to Hindus, Jains, Sikhs, Brahmans, Arya Samajists and Buddhists and was a measure relating to the validity of marriage. As we propose to amend the Bill by making it a measure imposing criminal penalties on participants in a child marriage, it must be applied to all classes. The Bill, as amended, would include all religions, sects, and castes and would be based on a uniform principle of the invalidity of child marriages. This would give it a character of universality and would ensure that it would not be open to the objection of discrimination against one class of people or another.

The Bill as amended would be a measure of general application, applicable to all religious communities and castes throughout India, and would be based on the principle of the invalidity of child marriages. This would ensure that it would be fair and impartial in its application, and would be in accord with the wishes and feelings of the vast majority of the people of India.

The Bill as amended would be a measure of practical application, aimed at promoting the welfare of the community and preventing the practice of child marriages. This would ensure that it would be effective in practice, and would be in accord with the wishes and feelings of the vast majority of the people of India.

The Bill as amended would be a measure of religious application, relating to the validity of marriage. This would ensure that it would be in accord with the wishes and feelings of the vast majority of the people of India.

The Bill as amended would be a measure of moral application, aimed at promoting the moral welfare of the community and preventing the practice of child marriages. This would ensure that it would be effective in practice, and would be in accord with the wishes and feelings of the vast majority of the people of India.

The Bill as amended would be a measure of cultural application, relating to the validity of marriage. This would ensure that it would be in accord with the wishes and feelings of the vast majority of the people of India.

The Bill as amended would be a measure of educational application, aimed at promoting the educational welfare of the community and preventing the practice of child marriages. This would ensure that it would be effective in practice, and would be in accord with the wishes and feelings of the vast majority of the people of India.

The Bill as amended would be a measure of social application, relating to the validity of marriage. This would ensure that it would be in accord with the wishes and feelings of the vast majority of the people of India.

The Bill as amended would be a measure of political application, aimed at promoting the political welfare of the community and preventing the practice of child marriages. This would ensure that it would be effective in practice, and would be in accord with the wishes and feelings of the vast majority of the people of India.

The Bill as amended would be a measure of economic application, relating to the validity of marriage. This would ensure that it would be in accord with the wishes and feelings of the vast majority of the people of India.

The Bill as amended would be a measure of administrative application, aimed at promoting the administrative welfare of the community and preventing the practice of child marriages. This would ensure that it would be effective in practice, and would be in accord with the wishes and feelings of the vast majority of the people of India.

The Bill as amended would be a measure of legal application, relating to the validity of marriage. This would ensure that it would be in accord with the wishes and feelings of the vast majority of the people of India.
marriage it seems invidious that it should be restricted to these particular communities since child marriages do occur, though not so frequently in other communities. We propose, therefore, that the amended Bill, should be general in its scope and apply to all classes and communities in British India. The first provision which required our decision is also the most important, namely, the determination of the ages of boys and of girls below which participation in their marriage should be punishable. After much discussion we decided that this age for boys should be eighteen years. For girls we considered the ages eleven, twelve and fourteen, and finally came to the conclusion that we should adopt the age of fourteen. We recognise that these ages will be regarded by many people, whose opinion is entitled to great weight as being too high, but we also recognise that there is a strong body of opinion particularly among those who advocate social reform which will not willingly accept any lower age. We also gave weight to the considerations that there are communities in India among whom the marriage of girls under fourteen years of age is infrequent, and that backward elements in those communities might regard the fixing of a lower age limit in statute as a recognition by the State of that age as being a suitable age for marriage and even an encouragement to adopt it. These decisions that the limiting of the age for a boy should be eighteen and that for a girl fourteen are embodied in sub-clause (a) of clause 2 of the Bill as amended by us.

The next important principle to be determined was the interpretation of the phrase "Participates in a child marriage." In other words which of the possibly numerous persons in any way concerned with a child marriage should be liable to punishment. We decided that the following classes should come within the penal provisions of the Bill, namely, (a) male adults who marry young girls, (b) persons who perform any essential ceremony of a child marriage, and (c) parents and guardians who promote or permit a child marriage. Our decisions as regards (a) were not so simple and were arrived at only after much discussion. To begin with, we have concluded that it is not expedient to punish a woman who marries a young boy as cases of this sort are rare, and in most of them the woman is likely to be so young that she is entirely under the control of her parents and should not be made criminally liable. Further even in such marriages the new Act will not be imperative as the other contracting party will be a child and the guardian of the child and persons who solemnise the marriage will be punishable.

Male adults and Penal clause.

The first point to be decided as regards male adults is the age at which they should be regarded as responsible for their own actions and, therefore, criminally liable if they contract a child marriage. We have decided that the ordinary age of majority is a suitable limit in these cases, but we also recognise that young men between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one are still under the influence of their parents to a considerable extent and we considered it inexpedient that these boys should be sent to jail for undertaking a free course of action in which they might not have been entirely free agents. We have decided, therefore, that where a boy between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one marries a child he shall be liable to a fine, and that where a man above the age of twenty-one marries a child he shall incur the full penalty prescribed for offences under the Act. We have, therefore, provided separately in clause 3 for a fine of Rs. 1,000 for offenders above the age of eighteen years and under twenty-one, and in clause 7 we have made a provision that imprisonment shall not be imposed on those offenders under any circumstances. Clause 4 relates to offenders above the age of twenty-one years.

Punishments.

The next point which we decided was the extent of the punishment to be provided generally for offences under the Act and this we have fixed at simple imprisonment up to one month, fine up to Rs. 1,000 or both. These punishments appear in clauses 4, 5 and 6 of the amendment Bill.

These decisions cover the substantive law contained in the Bill. We have added to them certain provisions of procedure which are designed to avoid the risk of frivolous prosecutions and harassment. We considered these provisions to be very important safeguards in a measure of social reform directed against a custom so long established and so widely prevalent as that of child marriage. It may be that in future these provisions may be abrogated and the penal provisions of the Act allowed to operate in a normal way, but for the immediate future at least we are strongly of opinion that we must go cautiously. In pursuance of this policy we have provided in clause 8 that only courts of Presidency Magistrates and District Magistrates shall have jurisdiction in cases concerning child marriages.

In clause 9 we have provided that cognisance may be taken only upon a complaint made within one year of the solemnisation of the marriage. In clause 10 we have laid down that a court, unless it dismisses a complaint, shall in all cases make a preliminary inquiry under Section 322 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1898. In clause 11 we have added a provision requiring the complainant to give security for the payment of any compensation that may be awarded against him under Section 290 of the same Code.

Title of Bill changed.

In view of the altered machinery of the Bill we have re-drafted the long title and the preamble to the Bill. In sub-clause (1) of clause 1 we have also recast the short title and in sub-clause (2) we have provided that the Bill shall extend to all classes in the whole of British India. In sub-clause (3) in accordance with the policy of caution, which we strongly advocate, we have provided that the Act shall not come into force until the first day of April 1930, by which date we trust the provisions of the Bill will be widely known among all classes and communities. To this end we recommend that Government should take exceptional measures in publishing the Act as finally passed. The Bill, though it still carries on its original purpose of imposing restraint upon child marriages, has been so materially altered by us that in our opinion it requires re-publication. We propose that no further step should be taken to pass the Bill, in the present session of the Legislative Assembly and that between now and the next session the Bill should be published as widely as possible in Boghiai and in all important Vernaculars. We desire to emphasise strongly this need for deliberation and wide publication.
Mr. Crerar's Opinion.

Five members have appended their minutes of dissent. Mr. Crerar, the Home Member of the Government of India, makes it clear in his minute of dissent, that while the Government accept and support the principle of raising the minimum age for marriage of girls, and quote a resolution adopted by the Sanatan Dharma Sabha, under the chairmanship of Pandit Malaviya, in support, if any legal protection be necessary for girls in respect of the consummation of marriage, that may be afforded, says Mr. Sinha, by further raising the age of consent. At a time when a large number of people regard marriage as sacrament, it is necessary to put the marriageable age low, and await the success of the new law before further raising the minimum age.

Kumar Ganganand Sinha considers that twelve should be the minimum age for the marriage of girls, and quoted of respect to the consummation of marriage, that may be afforded, says Mr. Sinha, by further raising the age of consent. It is time, he says, to put the marriageable age low, and await the success of the new law before further raising the minimum age.

Child Marriage Bill.

When legislative business was taken up to-day (26th inst.) all the Swarajist members, except Mr. Acharya, left the House.

Mr. Harbilas Sarda moved that the Child Marriages Bill, as reported upon by the Select Committee be recirculated for eliciting opinions on it. Mr. Sarda said that the Bill, which had been for six months before the public, had received almost unanimous support from all classes of the public throughout the country. The Select Committee had dropped the clause relating to the invalidity of child marriages and had instead penalised such marriages. The measure had been made applicable to all the communities in India. He acknowledged the assistance given by the Home Member, in his sympathetic attitude of the Government.

Mr. Crerar said that the measure had the support of the Government as it was based on sound lines.

Mr. Acharya's Opposition.

Mr. Acharya opposed the motion for recirculation, and desired that the Bill should be reintroduced, as it had been considerably altered by the Select Committee. He, representing a large and influential section of the Sanatanists, was opposed to the measure, which furthered social reform through penal legislation. The Government had no right to interfere with the religious customs of the people. If they did disregard the opinions of millions of people, the latter would rise in revolt against them.

Mr. Muhammad Yakub supported the Bill, the provisions of which, he said, was to be applied to all communities. He said that a large number of learned Hindus believed that this Bill did not interfere with their religious tenets.

Mr. Acharya questioned the accuracy of this statement.

Mr. Yakub congratulated the mover on bringing forward this measure, and the Government, in their attitude towards it.

People's Approval Assured.

Sir Har Singh Gour said that medical opinion was agreed that about 80 per cent of the girls in this country did not attain puberty before the age of fourteen. Therefore, the age limit proposed by this Bill was right. He did not agree with Mr. Acharya's remarks. On the other hand, he opined that legislation which prevented infanticide and matricide would be received by the people with a chorus of approval.

Pandit Viswanarayan admitted that there was an influential section of the Hindu community which was opposed to this legislation but at the same time, there was a stronger body of public opinion which welcomed this Bill. Referring to Mr. Acharya's remarks he said. I am a keen Hindu than Mr. Acharya, but let me tell him quite plainly that his interpretation and conception of Hinduism is responsible for the degradation and weakness of our religion. Swami Ramanath had said that Hinduism was an aid to progress and was not a reactionary religion, but if this religion stood in the way of progress, then they should do away with it.

Mr. Birla said that although he was an orthodox Hindu, he was strongly in support of the Bill. Mr. Acharya had said that the Government had no right to interfere with the religious customs of the people, but said Mr. Birla, qutes was a religious custom. Would Mr. Acharya preach abjectism? Mr. Acharya had further said that if the Government voted for the measure, there would be a revolt against them. The agitation, in Mr. Birla's view, would be against those who voted against the measure.

The motion for recirculation of the Bill was carried.

A Reply to "Mother India".

(Concluded from the last issue)

Miss Mayo made the assertion that seven or eight out of every ten male Hindus who have means to command their pleasure are sexually impotent at twenty-five or thirty years of age. Anyone familiar with the fertility of Indian families would find it hard to accept this astonishing state of serious consideration, yet, like other repulsive assertions to "Mother India," is it of the sort that even when entirely disproved, easily fits in lotion in people's minds and poison their thought. In Vol. I, page 163, of the last Census Report it is stated that Mr.
Sedgwick, in his study of this subject in the Bombay Presidency, estimates the "productive age" for most of the population as from 15-40 and for Parisis, who marry later than others, as from 20-45. Child marriage, which doubtless lowers the productive age is more common in the Bombay Presidency than in any other part of India. In Appendix VII of this Census Report, to which Miss Mayo has annexed as an unquestioned authority, the author after widespread and painstaking investigation of "the fertility of marriage life," takes 40-45 years as the time of "the complete reproductive life" for India as a whole. These facts make it clear that the charge that the Indian man of 25-30 is often impotent and that at thirty he is a decrepit and quailing old wreck, is grotesque.

Thus the thesis of Miss Mayo's "Argument" upon which her "Mother India" is built falls to the ground. A fortiori contention is definitely disproved by statistics. Its most offensive charge she has wisely made no serious attempt to prove. Its sentence about "no outlet in sports" is so glaringly false that it requires no disproof. I have offered strong evidence that the statements in every other sentence are greatly exaggerated if not untrue.

Should I now add to my argument the weight of the most reliable opinion? Miss Mayo, in a naive and amusing way, guarded herself against any effect of expert opinion in India by disposing summarily of us all. We missionaries are looking for our support at home and to the effects our statements upon Indians and so cannot tell the truth. The position of the official imposes the "policy of the gentle word," Indians see the problem only partially. India is a dying man with no one, anywhere, enough his friend to hold the mirror up and show him plainly what is killing him. Miss Mayo regarded herself as the only one left to do this and so, single-handed, shouldered the task. Let me venture to call her attention to what a few, who know their India well, think of her effort, Mrs. Margaret B. Cousins, who is neither a Government servant nor connected with official or missionary circles and who for twelve years has lived in intimate friendship with the women of India, in an article in the October "Young Men of India," says:

"While my experience corroborated a large number of her facts and illustrations regarding sex, health, touchability, and the treatment of animals, I aver that the total impression she conveys to any reader, either inside or outside India, is cruelly and wickedly untrue. Unless read in conjunction with supplementary books on other aspects of India's life and culture, or unless it is withdrawn from circulation outside India, it will create nothing but race resentment and a fortune to its cleverly stupid authors. All the sins of India which Miss Mayo marshals with such weight of depres- sion are balanced by her own sins of omission."

Next turn to one of India's ablest missionaries, Miss M. M. Underhill, in a very temperate review in the "International Review of Missions" for October, 1927, she says:

"The book shows throughout a lack of any back-ground knowledge of India; and, what is more serious, it shows a lack of appreciation—one might almost say of, power to appreciate—in face of a civilization foreign to previous experience. For example, Miss Mayo quotes freely from Mahatma Gandhi, but has completely failed to understand either the man or what he stands for in India. One cannot help asking, "Does Miss Mayo know even now much more of India than she did before going? We doubt it,"

Mahatma Gandhi whom Miss Mayo seems to look upon as the one frank fighter against India's greatest abuses, says of "Mother India" in the course of a long article:—

"The book is without doubt untruthful. the facts stated even now truthfui .......Nor are all the authoresses' quotations of isolated facts truthfully stated, The book bristles with quotation torn from their context and with extracts which have been authoritatively challenged."

He says that Miss Mayo has taken liberties with his own writings and misreported his position. He warns Americans and Europeans against the book.

The Executive Committee of the National Christian Council of India, which represents all Protestant missions and whose Executive includes one of India's ablest woman doctors, has issued a statement on "Mother India" over the signatures of the Rev. Dr. N. Macnicol, a well-known authority on India Mr. P. O. Philip, an honoured Indian leader and Miss A. B. Van Doren, an American, who has lived in intimate contact with Indian girls and women for over twenty years. Here are a few extracts from this statement:

"Yet we, representing a body of men and women who are in close touch with the people and are conversant with their every-day life, unhesitatingly assert that the picture of India which emerges from Miss Mayo's book is untrue to the facts and unjust to the people of India. . . . . . Beauty and culture, kindness and charm, religion and piety, are to be found alike among the highest and humblest. Miss Mayo leaves no room for these in her picture. . . . If this unsympathetic recital of evils, which are deep-seated enough but not universal, as the book seems to imply, leads to despair of any progress or to embitterment of the relationship between the Indians and Europeans or any weakening of the joint effort being made for the betterment of the people of India, the result will be disastrous to both India and the West.

"We have faith in India and India's future. We have faith that she will be able, strengthened by the spirit of God, to obtain deliverance from these evils. We earnestly desire that East and West should co-operate to this end in a spirit of love and understanding. Our fear is that this book may, by its lack of understanding, its exaggeration and its falsity, make such co-operation more difficult for both sides."

I will cite only one more opinion. It is that of the acknowledged leader of the Social Reform Movement in India, Mr. K. Natarajan, Editor of The Indian Social Reformer. To those of us who have worked with him or followed his work for a generation know him as a fighter for truth and progress, a man of great understanding and balance of judgment and a consistent promoter of the cause of Indian women. How Miss Mayo could think of studying the condition of Indian women without consulting Mr. Natarajan it is hard to conceive. It is the sum total effect of the book on this man, who is the fearless leader of social reforms in India, that is to me most interesting. Because he thought that it was calculated to injure the cause of social progress in India that he devoted a series of articles to it. This man, whose great life purpose Miss Mayo professes the desire to serve, is stirred by her book to such anger as I have never before known him to show. Far from being the only true friend of India he sees in Miss Mayo a sinister enemy. In his eyes she shows "mortal aversion to things Indian" and "bitter animus." In the "palpable fiction" of the story of the narrow-chested students and fly blows Russian leaflets he sees the purpose "to excite prejudice as much as possible in order to make her readers receptive to her horrors." He calls the statement about the rearing of children in intensive violent practices a "trigid, calculated lie." He says, "Not only has Miss Mayo grossly exaggerated the extent and nature of actual evils but she has, as we shall show, freely indulged in half-truths without any attempt to verify them." Now I do not associate myself with Mr. Natarajan's attack on Miss Mayo's sincerity, yet I cannot see how one can resist the conclusion that in this last statement he is in the main correct. Her casual assertions about the average age of motherhood are proved, both by Census figures of marriage and by carefully gathered medical data, to be mistaken. Her downright mis-statement of the absence of sport from children's life is only a glaring instance of the inaccuracy that pervades the book.

India is not, as this book would indicate, a human beast dying of its indulgences, its cruelties and its corruptions; she is a mighty and attractive people whose remarkable vitality is carrying her through many evil customs and mistaken ideals to a new day of hope and renewed vigour of life, in which she is purifying herself for her great and distinctive part in future world service.

ISLAM IN INDIA.

Under the auspices of the Madras University, Dr. J. N. Siccar delivered the fourth of the series of six lectures on "India through the Ages" last evening at the Christian College Hall. A large number of professors and students were present. After shortly recounting the subject matter of his previous lectures, Dr. Siccar proceeded to trace the rise and decline of Mahomedanism in India. He addressed the gathering as follows:

The Muslim conquest of India differed fundamentally from all preceding invasions in one respect. The Muslims came to India as a new element which the old inhabitants could not absorb. The Greek, Scythian, Mongolian and Parthian invaders had, a few generations after their settlement in this land, been completely Hinduised in name, speech, manners, religion, dress and ideas.

In the second century before Christ, a Greek named Heliodorus, the son of Dion, when travelling in India on an embassy, could adore Vishnu and escort a column in honour of that Hindu god. Men considered it quite natural that he should do so and take to himself the title of a Bhagavat or Vaishnav. [Scenographer pillar inscription.]

But Islam is a fiercely monotheistic religion. It cannot allow any compromise with polytheism or admit a plurality of deities. The God of Islam and of Christianity—like the God of Judaism, which was the parent of both these creeds—is "a living and a jealous God." He cannot tolerate any companion or sharer in the hearts of His adherents. Hence, the absorption of the Indo-Muslims into the fold of Hinduism by recognising Alla as another of the numberless incarnations of Vishnu and Muhammad as an inspired Saviour, was impossible. Therefore, Hindus and Muhammadans—earlier, later on, Hindus and Christians—had to live in the same land without being able to mix together. Nothing has enabled them to bridge this gulf. The Indian Muslims have throughout the succeeding centuries, retained the extra-Indian direction of their hearts. Their faces are still turned, in daily prayer, to a spot in Mecca, their minds, their law-codes, their administrative system, their favourite reading, sought models from outside India—Arabia and Syria, Persia and Egypt. All Muhammadans have the same sacred language, erudite literature, teachers, saints and shrines, throughout the world, instead of those being restricted to India, as is the case with the Hindus.

The Hindus were willing to absorb the Muslims; they wrote the Alla-punishad and went perforce into making an avatar of the Emperor Akbar. But the Muhammadans would not yield on the cardinal points of their faith, nor accept the few convention necessary for entering Hindu Society. They clung to the Quranic precepts: "The polytheists are unclean; let nothing unclean enter the Kabah."

This was the cardinal difference between the Muslim settlement in India and all the other foreign immigrations that had gone before it. Another equally important characteristic of the Muslim element in India was that from 1200 to 1600 their State and Society retained its original military and nomadic character—the ruling race living merely like an armed camp in the land. It was Akbar who, at the end of the sixteenth century, began the policy of giving to the people of the country an interest in the State and making the Government undertake some socialistic functions in addition to the mere police work it had hitherto contented itself with doing. Up to Akbar's time the Muslim settlers in India had been in the land but not of it.

MUSLIM CONTRIBUTION TO INDIA:

What were the gifts of the Muslim age to India? They were ten:

1. Restoration of touch with the outer world, included the revival of an Indian navy and sea-borne trade, both of which had been lost since the decline of the Cholas.
2. Internal peace over a large part of India, especially north of the Vindhyas.
3. Uniformity secured by the imposition of the same type of administration.
4. Uniformity of Social manners and dress among the upper classes irrespective of creed.
5. Indo-Saracenic art, in which the medieval Hindu and Chinese schools were blended together. Also, a new style of architecture, and the promotion of industries of a refined kind (e.g., shawl, inlaying, khanah, muslin, carpets etc.).
6. A common lingua franca, called Hindustani or Rekhta, and an official prose-style (mostly the creation of Hindu munshi writing Persian, and even borrowed by the Maratha chiniyas for their own vernacular).
7. Rise of our vernacular literature, as the fruits of peace and economic prosperity under the empire of Delhi.
8. Monotheistic religious revival and Sufism.

(c) Improvement in the art of war and civilisation in general.

The intimate contact between India and the outer Asiatic world which had been established in the early Buddhist age, was lost when the new Hindu society was reorganised, and set in rigidity like a concrete structure about the eighteenth century. A.D., with the result that India again became self-centred and isolated from the moving world beyond her natural barriers.

Thus, the classical period, being a time when there were official records, etc., the Hindu no longer went outside, as they had done in the Buddhist age, only many thousands of foreigners poured into India and some Indian Muslims went abroad every year.

"Through the passes of the Afghan frontier the stream of population, and trade, flowed peacefully into India, from Bukhara and Samarqand, Bahlil and Khurasan, Khustain and Persia, because, Asafian belonged to the rule of Delhi, till near the end of the Mughal Empire (1739), through the Bolan Pass, leading from India to Quandahar and Persia, as many as 14,000, camels and of merchandise passed every year in the reign of Jahangir, early in the 17th century. The ports on our western coast were, so many doors between India and the outer world that could be reached by sea. From the eastern port of Masulipatam, belonging to the Sultan of Golconda up to 1637 and thereafter to the Mughals, ships used to sail for Ceylon, Sumatra, Java, Siam and even China."

The two hundred years of Mughal rule gave to the whole of northern India and to much of the Deccan also, an insight of official language, administrative system and coinage, and also a popular lingua franca for all classes except the Hindu priests and the stationary village folk. Even outside the territory directly administered, official titles, court etiquette and monetary type were borrowed, more or less, by the neighbouring Hindu Rajas.

All the twenty Indian subahs of the Mughal empire were governed by means of exactly the same administrative machinery, with exactly the same procedure and official titles. Persian was the one language used in all official records, etc. Officdials and soldiers were frequently transferred from one province to another. Thus, the nature of one province felt himself almost at home in another province; traders and travelers passed most easily from city to city, subah to subah, and all realised the imperial oneness of this vast country. (1) MUSLIM INFLUENCE ON FINE ARTS.

In the domain of fine arts, the richest contributions of the Mahomedans are a new style of architecture (especially palaces and tombs), the Indo-Saracen schools of painting, and artificial gardening.

1. The earliest Muslim paintings to reach India namely those from Khurasan and Bukhara, we see complete Chinese influence, especially in representing the faces, rocks, sheets of water, fire and dragons . . . . In the court of our truly national King Akbar, this Chinese or extra-Indian Islamic art mingled with pure Hindu arts—those traditions had been handed down unchanged since the days of the Ajanta frescoes and the Bharhat and tillora reliefs. Thus Muslim art in India under-

I do not here refer to the Hindi religious poems of an earlier age, like those of Kabir (d 1518), Dadu and Nanak (1469-1538) because they were not literature proper, but more in the nature of aphiroms intended to be committed to the memory and transmitted orally.

Nor do I refer to the Persian literature (other than history) produced in India under the patronage of Akbar and his successors, because it was an exotic. Many of the Persian poets of the Delhi Court down to the middle of the 17th century were emigrants from Persia. Such were Mahomed Jan Qa'da, Taliba Amuli and others. Their productions have no life, no value as literature.

Urdu came into being in the 18th century, but only as a vulgar spoken tongue, despised by authors and cultured society. It became a literary language in the north only in the late 18th century; Wall of Aurangabad (c. 1710) having been its first recognised poet of note. But the southern Urdu or Rekha had produced good poetry more than a century earlier.

The literary impulse given by the peace and prosperity of Akbar's long and successful reign and the patronage of that emperor and his vassal princes, led to a wonderful flowering of the Indian intellect at the close of the 18th and the first half of the 19th centuries. To this period belongs the curious corrupt Sanskrit history of Bengal entitled "Shahib-Subbadaya," the Persian writings of Chandra-bhan Brahman, a courtier and a diplomat of Shah Jahan, and the Hindu works noted in the "Mishra-Bandhu Vînud," I.

Influence of Islam on Hindus.

Let us now consider the result of the impact of Islam—both creed and society—on the Hindus and the reaction of Islam to its Hindu environment during the many centuries that these two faiths have lived together in the same land. Cunningham, the historian of the Sikhs, as early as the middle of the nineteenth century thus described the moral effect of the Muslim conquest—

"The influence of a new people, who equalled or surpassed Kastraityas in valour, who despised the sanctity of Brahmanas, and who authoritatively proclaimed the unity of God and his abhorrence of image—began gradually to operate on the minds of the multitude of India. New superstition emulated old credulity. Pars and shaibds, saints and martyrs, equalled Krishna and Bhairav in the number of their miracles, and the Mahomedans almost forgot the unity of God in the multitude of intercessors whose aid they implored." (3)

That was one effect, the growth of popular superstition; but something higher soon followed. I quote Cunningham again:

"The first result of the conflict [between Hinduism and Islam] was the institution, about the end of the 14th century, of a comprehensive sect by Ramanand of Benares. . . . He seized upon the idea of man's equality before God. He instituted no nice distinctive observances, he admitted all classes of people as his disciples. About 1400, the mysterious (i.e., mystic) weaver Habit assailed at once the worship of idols, the authority of the Quran and Shastras, and the exclusive use of a learned language."

But it is historically incorrect to hold as Hunter and some other European writers have done, that the monotheistic and anti-caste movements among the Hindus in the Middle Ages originated in Islam. We know that all the higher thinkers, all the religious reformers, all the sincere devotees among the Hindus from the earliest times, have proclaimed one and only one supreme God behind the countless deities of popular worship, and have declared the equality of all true adherents and placed a simple sincere faith above elaborate religious ceremonies; they have all tried to simplify religion and bring it to the doors of the common people. Hence, what really happened after the Muslim conquest was that these dissenting or reforming movements among the Hindus received a great impetus from the presence of the Mahomedans in their immediate neighbourhood. The example of Islamic society acted as a solvent on Hindu prejudices.

Many sects arose which tried to harmonize Islam and Hinduism and to afford a common meeting ground to the devout men of both creeds, in which their differences of ritual, dogma and external marks of faith were ignored. This was the averted aim of Kabir and Dadu, Nanak and Chaitanya. They made converts freely from Hindus and Muslims and rejected the rigid orthodoxy of the Brahman and the Mulla alike.

So, too, the Sufi movement afforded a common platform to the more learned and devout minds among the Hindus and Mahomedans. Unlike the above-mentioned popular religious movements of mediaeval India, Sufism never extended to the illiterate people. It was essentially a faith,—or rather an intellectual, emotional enjoyment—reserved for the philosophers, authors, and mystics free from bigotry. The eastern variety of Sufism is mainly an off-shoot of the Vedanta of the Hindus, and it rapidly spread and developed in India from the time of Albar, under whose fostering care Hindu and Muslim thought formed a close union, with help from many Persian emigrants of liberal views. Albar's mantle as an eclectic and peacemaker in religion fell on his great-grandson Dara Shukoh, who openly declared that he had found the fullest pantheism (tawhid) in the Vedanta only and prepared a Persian translation of fifty of the Upasnishads and another work bearing the significant title of Majmu-ul-baharain or "the mingling of the two oceans" which explains for Persian readers the technical terms of Hindu pantheism, with their parallels in Sufi terminology, in order to facilitate the study of the subject by members of both creeds.

In short the popular religious sects founded by the saints and the Saffi philosophy tended to bring the ruling race and the subject people closer together.

Historical Literature.

Another gift of the Muslims to India is historical literature. The chronological sense was very imperfectly developed among the Hindus, who are apt to despise this world and its ephemeral occurrences. Before the Islamic conquest, they produced no true history at all.

On the other hand, the 'Arab intellect is dry, methodical and matter-of-fact. All their records contain a chronological framework. The historical literature of the Mahomedans in all countries has been vast and varied and well furnished with dates. We, therefore get a solid basis for historical study. The Persian chronicles which were written under every Muslim dynasty in India and in every reign under the Moghals not only preserved materials of study in themselves but had an example which Hindu writers and Hindu rulers were not slow to imitate. Thus a new very useful element was introduced into Indian literature, and in the 17th and 18th centuries it formed a magnificent body of all the histories, biographies and letters into account.

The cultural influence of the centuries of Muslim rule was necessarily widespread. Hunting, hawking and many games became Mahomedanised in method and terminology. In other departments also, Persian, Arabic and Turkish words have entered largely into the 'Hindu', 'Bengali', and even Marathi languages. The art of war was very highly developed by the Muslims, partly by borrowing from Europe through Turkey, and to a lesser extent through Persia. The empire Moghal army served as a model which Hindu Rajas eagerly imitated. The system of fortification was greatly improved by the Mahomedans in India, as a natural consequence of the general advance of civilization and the introduction of artillery.

The Muslim influence was naturally most felt on the system of administration, the Court ceremonials and laws, the military organisations and arms, the lives of the upper classes, the articles of luxury, fine arts, architecture (other than religious) and gardening. In social life and even the titles and office procedure of Hindu officials, the Moghal Empire set the fashion which the Hindu Rajas often slavishly copied. In Hindustan and Madras Hindu States, the official language even to-day is Urdu and the Persian script is used instead of Deva Nageri.

The basis of the revenue system was indigenous and a combination of the village organisation that had come down from before recorded history, but the official arrangements, titles and method of record keeping were due to the Perso-Sarasce model imported by the Muslim invaders, and these were borrowed by the Hindu States. [Mughal Administration, 2nd ed. ch. 6 p. 113]

The use of gunpowder was introduced and cavalry came to great prominence eclipsing the elephants of the old Hindu days. The animals now ceased to be so rare and continued as a mere transport agency.

The Muslims, leading generally a more luxurious life than the Hindus and being a predominantly city population (except in East Bengal), encouraged several manufactures and fine arts. They were more tasteful and elegant than the Hindus in their daily life and even in their ways—which the richer Hindus and particularly the official classes copied whenever they had the means. By the agency of the Mahomedans, new articles of food and new styles of cooking were introduced. In architecture, perfumed art, and (though not so completely) in music and dancing into the Muslim royal family guided the taste of the entire society.

Paper was introduced by the Mahomedans, as the Arab word "Kirash" proves. Thus, books could be multiplied, in a more attractive and durable form than by scratching on palm leaves. The illumination of manuscripts is an art which went to the Moghal Empire and from Akbar's time onwards Hindu and Sangekrit works were finely copied and illustrated for the sake of Hindu Rajas, while the Persian book illumination and calligraphy then done in India enjoyed deserved fame in Europe. We owe to the Mahomedan influence the practice of diffusing knowledge by the copying and circulation of books while the earlier Hindu writers, as a general rule, loved to make a secret of their productions.

The best musical men of the age were the yamani holkars or Muslim physicians practising the Graeco-Arab science and were daily progressing by keeping touch with the west.

The Muslim had seen the foreign traders of India (if we leave out the European sojourners in the land). This naturally resulted in a greater expansion of their minds in comparison with those of the stay-at-home Hindus. In the Persian language, a traveller man, mandal.djan.dada is rightly considered as a model of wisdom and culture.—The Hindu, Madras.

THE INDORE ROMANCE.

Columns after columns that are being devoted in the daily press to the Maharajah Halkar-Miller marriage, writes the Hilmada Nagara, seem to suggest that there is something phenomenal behind it. This is not the first marriage of this kind that has taken place. The instance of Dr. Ketkar of the Dayanandits Mandali, who married Miss Edith Cohen, a German lady, now Mrs. Shreekantbhai Ketkar, after her conversion to the Hindu faith, would readily occur to many of our readers and no great fuss was made about it then. Another marriage might be noted in this connection. Recently a poor Hindu maiden married a poor Mahomedan, we refer to the Kish-Pannaikar marriage of course, and there were columns of denunciatory writings in the press and Hindu meetings were held to condemn the so-called outrage. This latter was at least after all a purely personal affair. The Indore romance introduces an era of revolution in the ranks of orthodox Hindu Society and yet from the Shakinas and Shamas onwards there is a note of laudation running throughout in all their pronouncements on the topic, The conversion of an American girl to Hinduism by itself, and taken apart from its sequel is a unique event and is quite in consonance with the new evangelistic outlook of neo-Hinduism, such as that of Swami Vivekanand. But the sight of a marriage of a presumably cultured American girl and her connecting to be the wife of an ex-Muslim, not to mention the Muntax Begum interlude, spoils the effect of what may have been otherwise welcomed as the restoration to the Hindu faith and culture of its original elasticity in admitting aliens within its fold. It is a historical fact that aliens were once admitted as mazats within the fold of orthodox Vedic Hindustan. It is thus the ideal successors of foreigners like Kanbhiro and others came in the next generation to be called Hindu Durbar and Vihari Daman, distinctive Hindu names. Insoluble are the ways of Providence and very often great causes are promoted by unworthy instruments. It was thus in the reign of Henry VIII, known to English History, ushered in the era of Protestant reformation in England and inspired to his succession the title of Defender of the Faith. By Tukojirao and Miss Miller, now Devi Sharabai, might achieve similar fame in the history of Hindu sociology. Who knows?

To Perpetuate Sir Ramanbhai’s Memory: At a meeting of the Gujarati Vernacular Society held on the 20th inst., a resolution was passed to set aside a sum of Rs. 5,000 in memory of the late Sir Ramanbhai who was for many years the secretary of the body. Out of the interest of this sum a gold medal will be awarded every year to the student who stands first in the B. A. examination of the Bombay University with Gujarati as a subject and a series of books known as Ramanbhai series will be published dealing with such subjects as literature, history, and social reform.

Bombay Social Service Conference: It has now been decided to hold the second session of the Bombay Social Service Conference on Saturday, 14th and Sunday, 15th April 1928, at the Malabar Memorial Hall, Harvey Road, Gamdevi, Mrs. Sarojini Naidu has kindly consented to preside on the occasion. Papers have been invited from competent persons on (1) Vigilance Work and (2) Village Reconstruction and it is proposed to print and distribute them among the delegates some days before the commencement of the Conference so that the delegates may get some time to consider the problems as they are presented before them in these papers and arrive at some mature and well-thought conclusions. Papers have so far been received from Swami Sambudhanand and Mr. R. K. Daslachani on "Village Reconstruction" and from Dr. Miss Jerbanoo M. Mistry on "Prostitution," Mr. H. W. Bryant of the Y. M. C. A. and Mr. A. V. Thakkar of the Bhil Seva Mandal have also promised to contribute papers on "Vigilance Work" and "Village Reconstruction" respectively. The following institutions have joined the Conference: (1) Social Service League, (2) Servants of India Society, (3) Seva Sadan Society (4) Y. M. C. A. (5) Y. W. C. A. (6) University Settlement, (7) Bombay Presidency Women’s Council, (8) American Marathi Mission, (9) U. F. C. Mission, (10) Arya Mahila Samaj, (11) Rashtriya Sri Sabha, (12) Knoresh Mandal, (13) Y. M. Zoroastrian Association, (14) Gokhale Education Society, (15) Bombay Presidency Baby and Health Work Association, (16) Nagpada Neighbourhood House (17) Shri Jain Mahila Samaj, (18) Bombay Ladies’ Branch of the National Association, (19) Bombay Vigilance Association, (20) Bombay Provincial Co-operative Institute, (21) Prarthana Samaj, (22) Social Service Training Centre for Women, (23) Society for the protection of Children in Western India, (24) Model Relief League, (25) Students’ Brotherhood, (26) Parsi Charity Organization Society, (27) Port Co-operative Institute, (28) Marathi Thespeological Federation, (29) Bombay Co-operative Institute, (30) Patheare Prabhu Mahila Samaj, (31) Gujarati Hindu Sri Mandal, (32) The Young Zoroastrians, (33) Grant Road Parsi Association, (34) Mutual Helping Society, (35) Kanara Catholic Association. Those institutions that have not joined already should do so without delay and thus help the Managing Committee to make the Conference a success. The subscription fee for institutions is Rs. 5 and for individuals Rs. 2. The Reception Committee Membership is Rs. 3. Invitations to the various social service institutions are being sent to co-operate with the Bombay Council of Social Workers under whose auspices the Conference is to be held, and it is expected that many more will soon join. For further information please write to Mr. D. S. Savardekar, Secretary, Social Service Conference, Servants of India Society’s Home, Girgamu.

Purity League Formed: The importance and necessity of rooting out the various evils of prostitution by removing the brothels in the City formed the subject matter of a number of speeches delivered in Bombay on the third day (17th inst.) of the anniversary celebration of the Bombay Prarthana Samaj when a Purity League was founded for the City to work in conjunction with the Samaj, Mr. K. Natarajan, Editor, Indian Social Reformer, presided over the meeting. Mr. V. N. Chandavarkar, Municipal Councillor, Mr. H. W. Bryant, Mrs. A. Gokhale and Dr. Khushal Nowrang were among those present. Mr. Bryant emphasising the importance of the work that the Purity League had to do, urged the necessity for legislation in regard to prostitution in the City and said that they should stand for one and the same moral standard to men and women, for rooting out international traffic in women and children and should labour for the emancipation of the slaves in the brothels of Bombay. Mr. Chandavarkar deplored that the status of Indian womanhood had been lowered and that Government were not taking action to see that prostitution did not exist in the City. He was not satisfied with the part the City Corporation played in the matter and wished that all the nominated members of that body should be ladies because in that case their case would be better understood and represented there. The Chairman in winding up the proceedings said that it was a matter in which he had taken interest for the last so many years. It was a very difficult problem to tackle because it was fundamentally a social question. Prevention was better than cure and unless the very source was touched there would be no salvation. One important work they should do in this matter was to introduce total prohibition in India, for, side by side with liquor trade, prostitution existed. That was the most vital point in the whole thing. Housing condition in Bombay was another matter which was equally important. Men alone could not be blamed when considering the evils of prostitution, women were also equally to blame. Men and women should co-operate in creating a high responsibility in social and economic matters. Otherwise no reform was possible.

Shuddhi and Portuguese India: An A. P. message states that in reply to the telegram sent by certain members of the Bombay Legislative Council to the Governor General of Portuguese India regarding the arrest of Shuddhi leaders, the Chief of the Cabinet says that the said telegram contains several incorrectitudes which His Excellency wants to elucidate. The three Hindus mentioned in the telegram namely Messora, Anandamurti, Ganapatibawu and Shastribawu, were not arrested but they were at the disposal of the police for enquiry, as the police were in receipt of a report regarding their being in league with persons who were acting in a manner contrary to law, coercing the natives who did not want to become Hindus, this being against the spirit of absolute liberty of creeds which His Excellency desires to be maintained. The following telegram has been received in Bombay from Mr. Khiragar of the "Masur Ashram" from London: "Anandamurti, Ganapatibawu and Shastribawu, the Shuddhi leaders were brought to Castlerock and released after being threatened with lifelong internment if they again entered Goa."

NOTES.

Women's Property Rights:—Social reformers have not laid much stress on the property rights of women, generally speaking. It is not because they under-rated the importance of the question, but because they were afraid that to raise it prematurely would add to the volume of opposition to the reforms urgently needed to relieve women of the hardships which pressed on them most heavily. Thus, the reformers agreed to the disinheritation of a widow who exercised the right of remarriage conferred on her by the Widow Marriage Act. As the large majority of the people have little property to bequeath to their children, the question of the property rights of women affects only a small minority, and on this ground too the matter was not pressed to the front. The position now, however, is much improved. The opposition to social reforms has practically died out, education of women has advanced, and women enjoy the franchise on the same terms as men. The time, therefore, is opportune to bring up the question for settlement, and Women's Conferences and Associations have taken it up in right earnest.

Mr. M. R. Jayakar in an important address which he delivered at a Women's meeting at Delhi, pointed out that the ancient Hindu law was very equitable and that the disabilities of women in respect of property rights at the present day are largely due to the misinterpretation and misapplication of that law by British Indian Courts guided as they are by the rulings of the Judicial Committee of the British Privy Council which settles points of Hindu law six thousand miles away from India. This illiberal tendency of British Courts was commented upon by Sir Henry Maine over fifty years ago. We hope Mr. Jayakar and other eminent Hindu lawyers will draw up a Bill dealing with the disabilities of women in regard to property, which, we are sure, will receive the cordial support of educated opinion in the Country.

The Sarda Marriage Bill:—The Modern Review approves of the Sarda Marriage Bill as revised by the Select Committee of the Legislative Assembly. It will not, it says, materially affect the marriageable age prevalent among the educated classes. But as the illiterate and uneducated masses, it adds, form the vast majority of the people of India, strenuous and ceaseless educative work must be carried on them. Our contemporary proceeds to observe: “So far as Bengal is concerned, those who are or called political leaders and their followers must pay greater attention than they do at present to the prevention of outrages on girls and women. For, higher marriageable age for girls would mean the keeping unmarried of large numbers of girls of a mature age than at present. The risk to Hindu girls would be greater than Muslim girls, because purdah is stricter among Muslims and because statistics show that Hindu girls are victimised in larger numbers by Muslim and Hindu ruffians than Muslim girls are by Hindu and Muslim ruffians. In writing this we do not indirectly suggest that purdah should be made stricter among Hindus. What we suggest is that Hindus, young and old, should be more courageous, willing and able to protect girls and women than they are, and girls and women should also be taught the arts of self-defence.”

Coming from the organ of advanced social opinion in Bengal, we are surprised at these observations of our contemporary. It is not the business of politicians but of the police to prevent outrages on women. Does the presence or absence of the purdah materially affect the risk of such outrages? If so, there must be more outrages in non-purdah provinces, like Bombay, Madras and the Central Provinces than in upper India? We are not aware that this is the case. In fact, we think that this is not the case. Then, again, we should like to have a sight of the statistics which, the Modern Review says, show that Hindu girls are victimised in larger number than Muslim girls. Prima facie, we should say that cannot be, as women not injured to the purdah are likely to be able better to look after themselves, and girls who do not observe purdah or observe it less strictly are generally more resourceful in an emergency than women who are brought up in strict seclusion. If actually a larger proportion of Hindu girls go astray, there must be other counteracting causes, and the raising of the marriage age and education of girls will bring about in their train other necessary reforms calculated to make women strong-minded and self-reliant.

Parsi Law Reform:—So long ago as 1865, two Acts were passed, one to regulate marriage and divorce, and the other to deal with succession, among Parsees. Before that, in both matters marriage and succession in the community followed the rule of custom administered by Anjumans or Panchayats of the caste elders. Even now outside British India, the Anjuman system is in force.
The Parsi Marriage and Succession Acts largely reproduced the provisions of the Christian Marriage and Succession Acts which, again, were based on the corresponding British Acts. The most important change in marriage law was that monogamy was made obligatory on Parsees in British India. Divorce was provided for in case of adultery by wife or husband, but a peculiar provision was adopted in the case of the latter to the effect that the adultery should be with a woman who is not a prostitute. If the husband could show that his irregularities did not extend to family women, and was wholly limited to prostittutes, his wife could not get a divorce from him.
Public opinion has advanced, far beyond that stage, and there has grown up among Parsees a strong demand to have the law brought into conformity with current ideas. A Committee of leading memers of the Community, was appointed four years ago to suggest revisions in the Parsi Marriage and Succession Acts, and the Committee has issued its report. In the Marriage Act, the Committee recommends the omission of the divorce section and the substitution in its place of a new section more in accord with modern ideas. In addition to adultery, some other grounds are introduced as grounds for divorce among which the most important is change of religion on the part of either husband or wife. To quote the exact terms, divorce can be claimed "where the defendant has exchanged his or her profession of Zoroastrian Religion, for the profession of some other religion". A marriage, according to this clause, implies a promise on both parties to stick to their religion or at any rate not pervert to any other religion. If the two parties agree to live together notwithstanding the conversion of one of them to another religion, the proposed amendment does not prevent their doing so. What it does is to put in the bands of the unconverted party the power to divest himself or herself of conjugal obligations on the ground that the other party has left the religion of their forefathers.

Mr. Satrty, In South Africa;—The Right Hon. Srinivasas Satrty, we are glad to learn, has agreed to an extension of his term, of office as Agent-General to the Government of India, by six months. He went there, on the understanding that he would not be required to stay there for more than a year. But the work has developed so admirably in his hands, that it will be a pity if he has to leave them unfinished. At the eapest request of Indians in South Africa, and with the ready consent of the Government of India, he has agreed to stay on for a further six months. New problems relating to the interpretation to be put on the Treaty of Anglo-Boer Agreement are cropping up almost every month, and we should not be surprised if Mr. Satrty finds himself obliged to remain longer than six months in the country. He is not the man to turn back after putting his hands to the plough. Meanwhile, his friends in India will be pleased to learn that his health has greatly improved, that he is taking long walks, and, according to the latest information, he plays tennis without experiencing undue fatique.

An Excellent Lead:—Writers the Bombay Chronicle.—Her Highness the Heir-Apparent of Bhopal deserves to be congratulated on her courage in giving up the purdah at the opening of the second session of the Legislative Council of Bhopal by Her Highness the Nawaab, Sahib.
We have no doubt this royal example will be widely followed. The purdah, as it is now in vogue in India, has never been enjoined by Islam.
It is a pure convention based partly on "false notions of respectability." Whatever may have been its utility in the tumultuous medieval day, it is in the present peaceful times a cumbersome, unesthetic, and unhygienic fashion. That is why we welcome any distinguished persons dropping the fashion, as the rank and file then become bold enough to follow their example. Doctors in Bengal have attributed the wide spread of anemia among the Muslim women of the province, than among the Hindu women to the effects of the purdah. We hope the next All-India Conference of Muslim women will make short work of the pernicious practice. In this connection, we call attention to the striking letter which we reprint from the Young East of Tokyo, on "Monogamy in Islam."

Change of Press. The delay in the printing of this issue of the Reformer is due to our printing work being transferred from the Tata Vivekchandra Press to the Bombay Vaibhan Press from the current month.
THE CITY COLLEGE INCIDENT.

"Our comments on the trouble which arose out of the prohibition of Sarawati Puja by the students residing in the Ram Mohan Hostel attached to the College at Calcutta has called forth some protest. We print today a very courteous letter giving expression to it. We may say at once that we were wrong in putting the blame for the incident on Principal Ramkrishna Chandra Maitra who, it seems, only gave effect to the orders of the governing body of the college which, the Modern Review says, consists of Brahmo and Hindu members. The College Council in a communiqué dated 1st February, a copy of which has been kindly sent to us, points out that according to a Hostel regulation "boarders are free to perform their daily worship individually according to their own religious beliefs, but no festival shall be held in the hostel without the previous permission of the Principal." This is evidently cited to show that the students residing in the hostel were fully aware that they should not celebrate any festival in the hostel unless the permission of the Principal had been first secured. "No objections", the Council observe, "have ever been placed in the way of students performing their Puja outside. As a matter of fact, every year the authorities allowed the boarders to take part, without let or hindrance, in the celebration of the actual puja in buildings very near the premises of the Hostel. Not only so, the boarders always held the love-feast in connection with such pujas within the Hostel itself." We cannot help being surprised that the Council do not see that all this militates against the view that the performance of the puja is an act of idolatry incompatible with the principles of the Brahmo Samaj, a society whose members own the College. If the puja is objectionable to the Brahmo proprietors, it should be objectible whether performed within a particular building or in some other building "very near to it." The College authorities cannot take credit for allowing the students to do something outside their premises, since they have no power to prevent their doing so. The fact that they claim to do so, only shows that their objection to the puja is merely a local and technical objection and not one which affects any fundamental principle involving religious convictions. We quite recognise that the students in not obtaining the permission of the Principal, as laid down by the Hostel regulation, were guilty of a gross illegality, and, further, we join the Modern Review in condemning unreservedly the acts of rowdiness, indiscipline, disrespect to the Principal, and arrogance of their fellow students who did not leave the hostel in protest of the action of the College authorities. Any penalty which the authorities may think fit to impose on these disorderly students, will be thoroughly well-deserved and will evoke no feeling of sympathy in our minds for the misguided students.

We must nevertheless express our inability to follow the line of reasoning of the College authorities and their supporters in justifying the prohibition of the puja in the Hostel. The Modern Review understands that at present almost all the boarders of the Ram Mohan Boy Hostel are Hindus. For all practical purposes, therefore, the Hostel is a Hindu hostel for the time being, though technically it may be open to students professing other religious faiths as well. In our previous comment on the incident we pointed out that the Hostel was not a Church. The Modern Review reports that it is not a temple either. Quite true. But a Hindu puja is not solely a temple affair, and domestic worship is more important in Hinduism than temple worship. A Hostel in which almost all the boarders, for the time being, are Hindus, is, to our thinking, more in the nature of a Hindu home, whoever the owner of the building happens to be. The boarders presumably pay rent for their accommodation and fees for boarding charges. Can it be seriously contended that because the owner of a house is a Christian, those who tenant it must observe the practices of Christianity or at least abstain from observing those of any other faith? The Regulation cited above shows that festivals are not prohibited, only they should be celebrated with the permission of the Principal. The Principal, it follows, has full authority to give his permission to the celebration of festivals, and the second communiqué of the Council urges that "far from interfering with such pujas, the Principal has, for several years past, deputed some Hindu professors to help the students in these celebrations." We are sorry for having applied the epithet "street-faced Brahmo" to Principal Ramkrishna Chandra Maitra, because this shows that his hatred of idolatry is not so ingrained as to come in the way of his deputing his Hindu colleagues to help in the celebration of the puja. The Regulations of the Hostel do not lay down that the Principal should not permit idolatrous Hindu festivals to be held in the Hostel, as they should and would have done if the fundamental principles of the college authorities were opposed to such celebrations. We may say at once that we do not think that hatred of idolatry is by itself a sound basis for a religion. Indeed, there may be an idolatry in the hatred of idolatry. In Indian mythology heroes of gods often attained Suaages as well as lovers of gods. The psychological truth that hate is but a mask of love, was never more fully grasped than by the ancient Indian myth makers. Sarawati, the Hindu Minerva, is the proper patron saint of an educational institution with high ideals such as those for which City College and its devoted Principal stand, and it is a great pity that the trouble should have arisen about Sarawati Puja.

The repercussion of a controversy of this kind on the Brahmo Samaj itself, is a matter for very serious consideration. We know that there is a section of its members—and their good faith and high purposes are unquestionable—who would have the Brahmo Samaj as distinct from Hinduism as Christianity or Islam. In passing, we may remark on the anachronism of this school when Christian Missionaries are striving hard to make the Christian Church in India continuous with the ancient religious culture of the country. For our own part, we are convinced that if this separatist tendency gains ground in the Brahmo Samaj, the Samaj must fade and wither like a plant whose roots have been severed from its stem. Raja Ram Mohun Roy, Maharishi Deendayal Nath Tagore, Banade, Bhandarkar and Chandavarkar regarded Brahmoism as the highest and purest form of Hinduism. There is another point. The Indian Renaissance is very jealous about conserving every particle of the past which has the slightest cultural or character value. The City College, if it is to play the part in this movement which its history and ideals qualify it so greatly to do, cannot set itself up against this conservative impulse which springs out of the instinct of national self-preservation.

BASAVA.

THE REVIVER OF LINGAYATISM.

It is with a view to make the readers of the Indian Social Reformer acquainted with the life and character of one of the sublimest spirits that ever graced the ranks of high souls, that I have here chosen to write an article. Basava is one of those dazzling lights that bursting forth from amid the impenetrable cloud which enveloped the fate of a people, rose to lead his religiousists to a better type of national existence, and to display in his own life and character an example of mighty self-sacrifice, of noble self-endurance, of ardent love for mankind, of steadfast hatred for tyranny and of ineffable devotion to the Almighty. The Lingayats look upon Basava as the incarnation of Nandi, the vehicle of Shiva on his body. Shiva acted as a guardian angel to Basava in the form of Sangameshwar of Kappad.

In his boyhood Basava often resorted to the temple at Kappadi to seek instruction and inspiration. The riddle of the universe presented to him in a serious and solemn form “what is this universe? Where have we come from? Whither are we going?” were such of the problems that engaged his mind. He was not more than eight years old when he pondered over such problems and sat in contemplation of them for months together in the temple of Kappadi which was situated at the confluence of the rivers, Malapahari and Krishna. But this stage of scepticism was only transitory. A flash of light shone across his mind bursting forth divine splendour which fully enlightened him. It is amazing to know that as a boy of eight he had acquired mastery over the Vedas and Upanishads. The attention of the readers may be drawn to a close analogy between the life of Basava and Jesus of Nazareth. No one community can claim them as theirs but they are world-figures. Both of them came as saviours of mankind as a whole. Both of them suffered severe persecution for the cause of truth, right and justice. Basava was a son of God like Christ.

When Basava was playing with his playmates near a river a boy named Krishna fell into the river and was drowned. Basava was accused of drowning him. Krishna’s parents fell upon Basava with great rage. Basava pleaded his innocence in vain and at last called out Krishna to come out of the water. To the great surprise of the crowd the boy rose up and came to him. This miracle spread his name abroad. Basava often indulged In the worship of the Linga to such an extent that he became unconscious of surrounding objects and fell into spiritual ecstacy; His parents were much troubled at observing his peculiar habits. Now the turning point in his life was drawing near. As Basava had completed his eighth year, his parents thought of investing him with the sacred thread. Priests were called for the purpose but Basava made a stout protest against undergoing the ceremony. He said that he was bound by the Veerashaiva cult and not by the Brahmin cult. He showed his profound knowledge by expounding to his father the superiority of Veerashaiva doctrines. He resolved to forsake the comforts of a happy home for the sake of his faith. He made a fair bid for liberty with his elder sister Nayakambika and came to the temple of Kappadi. Here he is said to have become conscious of a call to revive Veerashaiva faith. Here he gained a large number of followers by his preaching.

Basava and Christ were both messengers of God. They had no attachment for worldly things. They had forsaken everything, even father and mother. Basava said, "First believe in God and everything accompanies you of its own accord." When Shiva's votaries approached him for alms Basava gave even his wife's garment to them. He regarded worldly life with great horror, for he said, "I am like a frog taking shelter under a serpent's head not knowing that the serpent will make a meal of me." "I am afraid of two things" says he, "I am afraid of other's women and other's wealth for they are like serpents to me and I have no fear for anything else." Same is the attitude of Christ towards riches. When a young man came to him and asked him, "Good master, what good shall I do that I may have eternal life?" "Go and sell that thou hast and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven." (Mathew 19) was the reply. Like Christ, Basava was accused of keeping company with publicans and sinners. But Basava making an emphatic defence of it, said, "The humble and the downtrodden and not the well-to-do that required good company." Even the thieves who on one occasion had entered Basava's house dressed like Lingayats wearing artificial Lingas on their body, were turned into real saints by the magnetic influence of Basava. They repented for their past sins and swore to follow the path of virtue.

Basava's intellectual qualities were undoubtedly of an extraordinary kind. He had a quick apprehension, a retentive memory, a vivid imagination, and an inventive genius. His ordinary discourse was lively and was abounding with aphorisms which are even now popular among all. He was abstemious in his diet, simple in dress and moderate in other habits. Basava had in him an attractive personality. His face was so symmetrical and beautiful that it disclosed his greatness. He had resolved to be jealous in discharge of the precepts of his religion, not to injure his coreligionists, never to swerve from promise, to be the steady friend of the pious, to be humble and benificent to Shiva's votaries, never to give room to the feelings of lust and to constantly defeat the six enemies, viz., desire, passion, hatred etc.

Marriage and Ministership.

The pilgrims that used to come to the temple of Kappadi spread the glory of Basava far into the corner regions of the country. Baladeva who was the prime minister to king Bijjala of Kalyan dynasty ruling at Kalyan, heard Basava's fame and sent an offer to Basava to give his daughter Gangambika in marriage to him. Baladeva being a Lingayat resolved to give his daughter to Basava who was also a staunch Lingayat. Basava accepted the offer and his marriage was celebrated at Kalyan with great pomp. Within a short time after marriage Baladeva died and the post of prime minister fell vacant. Bijjala having heard of Basava's genius invited him to accept the post in response to the king's offer Basava came to Kalyan from Kappadi. At that time when he paid a visit to the king a letter fell from heaven. All learned men of the court declared their inability to read the letter. But Basava was successful in deciphering it. The letter contained that eight hundred and eighty million gold coins were buried by the former kings beneath the throne. When the king caused the ground to be dug up, he found the treasure. His admiration for Basava increased and he confirmed his ministership. The king gave his foster-sister Nandambika in marriage to Basava who converted her to Lingayatism from Jainism before marriage. Certain Jain and Brahmin authors have thrown aspersions at Basava by inventing fictitious stories. One of them is that Bijjala had married Basava's sister, Padmanavati of whose existence no Lingayat writer has referred. Another story is that Bijjala had illicit connection with Basava's elder sister, Nagalambika. Nagalambika was a nun of high order and an authoress of a moral work. Another story is that Basava caused the death of Bijjala by a poisonous fruit. All these stories are based on grandmother's tales as the story-writers themselves say, e.g., Dharanipandit, a Jain author of Bijjalacharitram.

It was from 1160 to 1168 A.D. that Basava wielded the powers of premiership. During this period he introduced great reforms. He increased and stabilised the army. He started irrigation work, encouraged foreign trade, built bridges and canals, levied tolls, patronised great scholars and saints and brought finance to a rising condition. At the same time Basava was also vigorously carrying on his religious propaganda. He had great devotion to Lingayat priests, viz., the Jangamas and he was feeding 15,000, of them every day. Certain people became jealous of Basava's fame and they told the king that Basava had embezzled money from the treasury. The king listened to the words of the sycophants and took Basava to task. But Basava on every such occasion proved before the king that he was free from such corruption. But there were other forces at work that brought Basava into conflict with Bijjala. Basava's proselytising work was an eye-sore to Bijjala. But it reached its climax when Basava caused an inter caste marriage to be gone through between the daughter of Haralaya an outcaste and Madhuvaya's son, a Brahmin. The king, on hearing this, became mad with rage and caused the eyes of Haralaya to be pulled out. Basava could no longer bear to see his followers persecuted in such a cruel manner. While leaving Kalyan, the Basava Puran mentions that he directed his followers, Jayadeva and Bommaya, to punish Bijjala. A short time after Basava's departure from Kalyan, Bijjala was murdered. Basava went to Kappadi and became one with the God. (To be continued).
CALCUTTA CITY COLLEGE INCIDENT.

The Editor, Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I have been much pained to read your comments on the Saraswati Pujah affair in the City College.

I beg to send herewith two statements issued by the City College Council and, may point out that they have so far not been contradicted in the papers. From the statements it will appear that far from imposing the principles of the Brahmo Samaj upon the students of the City College Hostel, every facility was given them for the performance of the Pujah near the Hostel buildings. Nor is there any restriction placed upon individual religious worship even within the Hostel compound (vide Rule 15 of the Hostel Rules). You will also find from them that the boards of the Hostel were guilty— not only of breach of discipline with regard to the particular rule but also of rowdism and boisterous proceedings which, I am sure, you, like all sensible educators, will deplore.

The disciplinary measures taken by the Council were based upon this nearly and objectionable behaviour on the part of the particular boarders. I may also point out, other and more serious acts of intimidation and assault in which boarders of the Hostel took a very leading part. I hope you will condemn them as severely as it may be necessary for you to do.

The City College is an institution established by Brahmans and managed by the Brahmo Samaj Education Society. The first principle according to which it is guided is—"To promote the cause of education in its highest and widest sense; to make that education comprehending of the mind, heart and body and founded on a theistic basis—conduce to the good of man and the glory of God" and therefore consistently with these fundamental principles, no image worship can be allowed within the College compound or within the compound of the Hostel which forms an integral part of the Institution. But the College Council has taken a very liberal and tolerant view of the whole matter as is evidenced by the following resolutions passed by it—

"The City College Council is of opinion that attached messes be established for orthodox students of any community; provided that at least 35 intending boarders belonging to the same community may apply for the same; provided also that no financial burden be imposed on the College funds.

"Subject to the supervision of the Principal and the Council in matters of discipline, such messes shall be managed by committees appointed by the Council consisting of three members of the staff belonging, preferably, to the same community.

"As a first step to the carrying out of these principles arrangements be made for the establishment, in the next session, of an attached mess for accommodation of orthodox Hindu students."

Some members of the Council and well-wishers of the College outside it, having very kindly come forward to contribute to the fund that may be necessary to raise for the upkeep of attached messes proposed, it resolved that their offer be thankfully accepted."

As your paper has made for itself a reputation for impartiality, may I hope that you will kindly reconsider the case in the light of new facts?

Yours etc.,

Calcutta, 21st-8-93.

BAREILLY CONVENTION.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The question of Mr. "S. W. H." in the Indian Social Reformer cited the 24th March 1923 is very interesting. In the first place the initials are a veil that hides the real man. If Mr. "S. W. H." is a Christian, I do not think he has acted in a Christian manner to complain of a second person as a third person. If the Methodists in his opinion had offended his notions of the orthodoxy of Christianity he ought to have told the Methodists about it in their own newspapers. The Indian Witness or the Kashi Hind.

I do not think Mr. "S. W. H." knows very much concerning the Methodist Episcopal Church in general or the Convention westwards Bareilly.

In the last Central Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church held at Bareilly the leaders of the morning meetings were Dr. S. R. Chittabruna, Rev. James Devanesen, Ongole David and Mr. H. K. Mukarji, Miss Callisy and Bishop Titus Lewis. Were these all Americans? or was the Central Conference a purely Indian body? Methodism does not countenance any racial or colour bar. It gives equal rights to all and respects the talents in every individual.

Bareilly Convention is a smaller Convention as compared with the Kasik Convention. Sadhu Sundar Singh in his European tour of 1922 (in which he preached almost all over Europe to Europeans) spoke on 23rd July 1922 (Wednesday) at this big Convention at which fully 5,000 were present. How many Indians were there. Mr. "S. W. H." did not speak to Europeans? Look what that Convention said about his address—"Sadhu Sundar Singh at the Convention—A memorable and impressive meeting witnessed by the Indian public." It is not because of any racial or colour bar that the Sathu does not speak publicly to the Europeans in India. An Secretary of the Saharanpur Convention I asked the Sadhu once to speak at the English meetings, but he begged to be excused.

I am very much afraid that Mr. "S. W. H." has written without any serious consideration of the imputation he brought against Methodism.

He must be careful in talking about the Holy Spirit as he will commit an unpardonable sin. He tries to make jokes in the light manner. The
THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

Sir,

I have read an article regarding the above written heading in your far famed and esteemed paper in its March 26 number, on page 474, by S. W. H.

In the first place, I am wonderfully shocked to learn that he could experience only one thing in particular out of that great Convention in which souls were lifted to higher realms in spirituality and whose main theme was to get a thorough vision of one's own self rather than to criticise this individual or that or look down upon this or that administration.

Secondly, if S. W. H. considers himself to be the greatest apostle of the world brotherhood he must be the last man to notice as to who spoke an Indian pulpit on who was the preacher in an English congregation.

Thirdly, I am sure he was not present in that Convention wherein the speakers for both the English and Indian congregation were appointed by no one to know the precise reason why Miss. Onslay and Sardam Bunder Singh were to speak as they spoke. Therefore, his particular conclusion, that this was done due to colour prejudice is altogether absurd. Sardam Bunder Singh having come after speaking at the Rajputana and other Conventions and suffering from some pulmonary trouble was too tired and weak to take more than two meetings and if in these two meetings he had spoken at the English Church the Indians would have brought a suit on Sardam's name saying, “Bunder Singh mingled with the European only but has broken our people.” Under the circumstances then, it was wise for the speakers to have acted what they were requested to do by the Convention Council of Arrangements.

As far as American Methodism is concerned, leaving out individual cases who may have colour prejudice in themselves, there is no such thing existing in the unit organisation. I can cite cases which are true to the fact, proving my statement.

There are two Indian Principals of two important Methodist institutions in U. S. A. under whom several well educated Americans are working; there are quite a few Indians; District Superintendents under whom there are working several American ladies and gentlemen. This can be applied to the whole of India. Then in the matter of other elections for responsible posts e.g., Secretaries and Treasurer, instances are not too few to be cited, where the Indians are working as chief and the Americans as their assistants.

If S. W. H. has expressed his last statement by way of sarcasm I can with certainty and sincerely say that the Holy Spirit is working in the hearts of both the Indians and foreigners to unite in the bonds of common brotherhood of man and fatherhood of God and the time has come where fault-finding and distinctive criticism will not take as far on the road to successfully seeing one Shepherd over one, look, but where real co-operation for the performance of noble things and heartfelt sympathy for the cause of others will work wonderfully.

Yours etc.,

HANDO SINGH ENTERS.

PLACE OF HINDU WIDOWS IN THE SOCIETY.

(By Mr. N. B. Dhola).

“A widow is preferable for the purpose of a marriage,” so chose Mahatma Gandhi as reported in an old daily of Bombay. Gandhiji by his own preference which at first sight looks rather out of the way has no doubt honoured the unhappines with lost husband, but at the same time he has evoked a fresh storm of ridicule and abuse upon his head.

“Who should marry whom?” is certainly an complicated question, and who can give a delicate and balanced reply? That widows may remarry if they choose, requires no serious mention; but to say and opine that a widow is a preferable partner in the marriage business, is to place an uncommon weight upon the ordinary appreciative powers of the general public. It is not possible for any one to understand the subtle implication involved in the opinions of Mahatma Gandhi as quoted above. Even a child may ridicule Mahatma Gandhi now-a-days. But how many are there who would first consider an unpleasant view point from all sides and then go in for a cogent criticism? Whatever is said out of the routine, is at once dubbed over-hasty critics as being outside the pale of pure rationality.

We are told times out of number that a Hindu marriage is a sacrament and not a contract. Its sacrosanct character may be a prominent feature at the time of the wedding ceremony. But afterwards, as time flies on, the married couple has to adjust itself and its affairs in a practical and business-like manner. The romance of sentiment, if there be any, wears away very soon. The colour of love has to fade in due course. What remains of a marriage for the most part and for the longest while, is the useful, practical and business aspect. And therefore as a matter of fact marriage does become a real ‘business’ of life of the wedded partners in its strict commercial sense. A wife must be such as would be capable of managing the house-hold in an economic and respectable manner, while the husband has to be good and sufficient enough to handle the earning and other side inside works. He must grant, at least usually, does ‘homa rule’ to his, better half. The more experienced and shrewd the minister of the ‘Home department’, the more happy, will become the family life of a man, meant by nature and his constitution to be a fit fellow to run after the roaming and outside concerns.
There is no use contending the proposition that experience as such—be it in any department of life has a special value of its own. What commercial man or for the matter of that any man of ordinary prudence and common sense does not know that "it pays" to have the services of an experienced and confidential assistant or partner? And in so far as the marriage affair is businesslike and commercial, we have to apply all these considerations to its which weigh with us in carrying out our various professions and concerns. That a widow should be preferred for a marriage means to us no more than another way of saying that an experienced partner at a wedding is better than an inexperienced one. Instead of two raw people running the dangerous race of a marital life, very many times it appears safe and desirable to have one of the two partners knowing the ills and pitfalls of life and some of the sure ways to meet them. What is experience except a practical acquaintance with life and its ways as such? And while dealing with the useful and convenient portions of a marriage—portions meant for wear and tear and not as a holiday gear, experience is bound to have a superior claim at least with those to whom a marital life is not all the while a romance and a joy-ride!

What is meant by the seemingly queer observation that a widow is preferable partner for marriage, is that the range of selection should not be limited. Tradition and custom should not be allowed an undue advantage over comfort, convenience and utility of a varied order. Time may teach experience but what of those who have little time to wait? A man or a woman of an advanced age if they have it in their mind to change their solitary (single) life for a marital, it does not matter if they choose young or inexperienced partners. They will be complimentary to each other; the deficiencies of the world's ways in the one will be supplied by the shrewdness and worldliness of the other.

Of course no body is going to pitch the claims of widows against those of virgins for marriage purposes. It is all an affair of convenience and mutual selection. A young man not having any elderly person in his household may find it more to his convenience to have a matronly (childish) wedding partner. While on the other hand, a middle-aged man wanting a wife, may not inapily choose a widow of advanced age as his re-marriage partner, with full experience to manage a household. So, speaking particularly of Hindu widows it will not be fair to restrict their scope of choice for a reorganized life. And if any one has the originality to recommend them in reference to intending bridegrooms who set more store by experience and convenience than to airy love and drowsy romance, no injustice is done to the differing tastes of society gentlemen at large who are perfectly at liberty to secure the company of virgin partners with capital experience of a negligible type. When in real life, we know that a young professional man has to seek the services of an experienced clerk or a senior patron, and that without such aid he comes to grief and fares ill, there is no wisdom in denying the dignity or deprecating the utility of 'experience' in all the vital concerns of life.

Why fight shy of the position when the simple principle, efficacious elsewhere, is applied in the important field of a marriage partnership? Marriage may be a sacrament amongst the caste-Hindus; none the less is it a contract and in that capacity 'experience' cannot but weigh and prevail.

THE CHILD MARRIAGE BILL.

Bao Sahib Harbilas Sarda, M.D.A., has issued the following statement to the Associated Press.

The Hindu Child Marriage Bill introduced by me in the Legislative Assembly on the 14th September 1927 and referred, after full discussion, to a Select Committee, was circulated to Local Governments by an executive order of the Government of India. The Bill has now been before the public for six months and during this time, public opinion has, in an unmistakable manner, given its strong support to it. Representative Conferences, Maha Sabhas, Associations in all provinces have supported the Bill. They include: The All-India Women's Conference held in Delhi, the Indian National Social Conference held in Madras, the Arya Conference of the Arya Samaj of India Bureau, Africa, the All-India Maha Sabha Conference, the All-India Jain Conference, the All-India Agarwals Mahasabha, Benares, the All-India Namdeo Samajwini Conference, the All-India Kshatriya Conference, the All-India Gour Mahasabha, the All-India Agarwals Mahasabha, the All-India Marwari Agarwala Mahasabha, the All-India Marwari Agarwala Mahasabha, the All-India Marwari Agarwala Mahasabha, the All-India Marwari Agarwala Mahasabha, the All-India Marwari Agarwala Mahasabha, the All-India Marwari Agarwala Mahasabha, the All-India Marwari Agarwala Mahasabha.

What of the position when the simple principle, efficacious elsewhere, is applied in the important field of a marriage partnership? Marriage may be a sacrament amongst the caste-Hindus; none the less is it a contract and in that capacity 'experience' cannot but weigh and prevail.

When I first introduced the Bill, it was a civil measure because Government then favoured civil legislation as stated by the Hon. the Home Member in his speech in the Assembly on the 15th of September 1927 and I, wishing to take the i of least resistance and anxious to enlist Government's sympathy, did not make it a criminal measure. I confined the operation of the Bill to Hindus only as there is a fundamental difference of opinion between the Hindus and Muslims with regard to marriage, the former regarding it as a sacrament, the latter only as a civil contract and also because there is enforced widowhood amongst the so-called higher classes of the Hindus, while no such thing exists among the Muslims. Now, however, that the Bill has been made a penal one, it has been decided that it should apply to all communities, Hindus, Christians, Parsis and others.

There is an unanimity of opinion in the country and Government is committed to it that legislation should be undertaken to put a stop to child marriages in India. There is also general agreement that those who solemnise child marriages should be punished. The two outstanding points on which some difference of opinion exists are (1) up to what age should a marriage be held as child marriage and (2) what punishment should be awarded to those who perform such marriages. The Select Committee has decided that all marriages of boys below 18 and by an overwhelming majority that all marriages of girls below 14 should be made punishable. The Committee have also decided that in no case should a girl marrying below 14 is to be punished and boys under 21 contracting child marriages should be punished with a fine only but those over 21 with a fine or simple imprisonment not exceeding one month or both. The Hon'ble Member on behalf of Government is committed only to this that legislation to stop child marriages must be undertaken but will be guided by public opinion as to the age and form of punishment.

The Moslem opinion is dead against lowering the minimum marriageable age of girls below 14 and there is hardly any reason why Hindus whose interest in the well-being of their own community is as strong as that of Moslems in theirs should want the age to be fixed below 14.

As regards punishment, I may bring to the notice of the public, the opinion of the Bombay Social Reform Association of which the late Justice Sir Lalubhal A. Shah was President, communicated to me by Justice G. D. Malgachi, Vice-President of the Association. It says "The Council desires that the Bill should be modified penalising the performance of marriages below the prescribed ages by imposing imprisonment without the option of fine on any of the parties to the marriage if major and the parent, guardian and priest taking part in or facilitating the performance of such marriages." I may add that the Legislative Assembly of Baroda have found it necessary to impose imprisonment in lieu of the fine for breach of the provision of the Child Marriage Act.

It is apprehended that those who are opposed to all social reforms will start an agitation against the Bill, and it is therefore necessary that all Indians who have the good of India at heart should begin work in right earnest in this matter of the most vital importance as to the well being of the nation to educate public opinion and to focus it on the provisions of the Bill. I particularly appeal to the women of India to be up and working so that no stone unturned to see that the Bill becomes a measure of adequate marriage reform and to show that as it primarily affects their well being and their future happiness they are fully conscious of their power to shape their future destinies.

I must acknowledge here that the Government have rendered every help in facilitating the progress of the Bill and that the attitude of the Hon'ble Member has been sympathetic and helpful. We must offer our gratitude to H. E. the Viceroy who has taken great interest in the matter and whose kind help has enabled the Bill make such good progress.

DOES ISLAM ENJOIN POLYGAMY?

Mr. T. Kimura writing in the October (1927) issue of this review under the heading "Women in Buddha's Eye" observes: "Mahomet allowed the people to have five or six wives." Judged by the moral standard of the present day, writes Mr. A. H. Muhammad Zahir, such is unallowable violation of morality. Gross misrepresentation like this of Prophet Muhammad and Islam has been carried on for centuries in the West by the Christian missionaries. They, knowing that Christianity could not stand a day against the rational teachings of Islam, took care to keep the real Islam out of the reach of their flock and to present before their eyes such caricatures of Islam that would be repulsive even to look at. They began to misrepresent its belief, its marriage laws and its conception of marriage. It has been asserted that Islam degrades the female sex and that it enjoins polygamy. These Christian priests ought to have known that as long as the Holy Quran remains with the Muslims intact as it was revealed to Muhammad, it will not be possible to misrepresent it for ever. Anybody can go to the Holy Quran to see what rights it confers upon woman. It is deplorable to see that even the people of Japan have become victims to this anti-Islamic propaganda carried on by the unscrupulous Christian missionaries. This is due to the fact that the only Islamic literature available to the Japanese people is from the Christian sources.

It has been asserted by the learned contributor that Islam enjoined polygamy, whereas nothing could be further from the truth. To regard polygamy as an essential in Islam would be an unpardonable mistake. Islam is an universal religion. With its world wide mission comes the necessity of providing for the requirements of all ages, countries, and civilisations. Besides, the substantial laws—the Code of Islam, the Holy Quran—provide certain ordinances which are, in effect, remedial laws, depressing their abuse, and laying proper restrictions on their use,
The Indian Social Reformer

Prophet Muhammad found polygamy practised amongst the people of all countries. He with a deep insight into human nature, could not ignore any one of the aspects, least of all an aspect of such importance as this. If he had condemned polygamy, it would only have resulted in the misery and loose morality which have become—nay, have always been—prevalent in the monogamous countries of the world. He, therefore, under Divine inspiration laid down:

And if you fear that you cannot act equitably towards orphans, then marry such women as seem good to you, two and three and four, but if you fear that you will not do justice (between them) then marry only one or what your right hands possess; this is more proper, that you may not deviate from the right course (the Holy Quran Al-Nisar, ver 3).

This is the only verse of the Quran from which permission to marry more-than-one wife is derived. This verse neither enjoins polygamy nor permits it unconditionally. It allows it under certain circumstances only and that permission, too, is given on a very strict condition, that if you cannot deal equitably and justly with all, you shall marry only one. The extreme importance of this provision, more especially when we remember the meaning which is attached to the word ADAL, equity, should not be lost sight of. The condition amounts in reality to virtual prohibition.

But whereas polygamy is permitted, monogamy is commanded. Then again, according to the Holy Quran, if a man does not preserve equity between his wives, he commits a sin. There is, and has been since the beginning of the world, no other religion which has made polygamy a sin in certain circumstances.

The verse which permits polygamy, was revealed after the murderous battle of Chod, wherein many male members of the Muslim community were killed; thus seriously reducing the male population. Many young girls had been made orphans, many married women widows, and it was necessary to protect them all. Here then, was a situation which made polygamy a necessity. There were more women than men.

Muhammad, being a religious teacher and a moralist could not recognise any such thing as "unmarried mothers". Modern society may condone or wink at adultery, Muhammad could not. If he had not permitted polygamy, even under restrictions, then he would never have deserved that respect both as prophet and as social and moral reformer which he commands today, from all impartial and unbiased thinkers.

But the Holy Quran does not stand in need of any elaborate interpretations to make its meaning clear on this point that polygamy is allowed under strict, very strict, and limited conditions, and that the Holy Quran declines to give any sort of license for looseness:

And you have it not in your power to do justice between wives, even though you may covet it. (The Holy Quran, IV, 129).

This verse, read with the verse, that gives conditional permission for polygamy, leaves no room for any doubt that Islam has discouraged polygamy, and in so doing has adopted its usual course of appealing to human nature.

Christian missionaries in the West have not only attributed polygamy to Islam as if it were a purely Islamic institution, but have tried to make it an obligatory injunction upon every Muslim to have more than one wife. Mr. Kimura seems to have been more or less misled by these hostile writers of Islam in this respect.

In short in Islam monogamy is the rule and polygamy is the exception.

Task Before Indian Women.

At the concluding sitting of the Arya Samaj Anniversary held in Toliwara on Saturday, March 3d, Mrs. Ramaswari Nehru who presided delivered an inspiring speech. She referred to her old acquaintance with the Arya Samaj. At Bangalore she participated in the activities of the local Arya Samajists. She recollected with pain as well as pleasure her first meeting with Swami Shri Ramdas when he went on his long tour in Burma in the year 1920. They had both travelled together in the same train going to Mandalay from Rangoon as they were both invited to attend similar anniversary celebrations and had talked on various subjects of importance to the country at that time.

Address to the Country.

Proceeding she said that the Arya Samaj has been the greatest asset to the country in bringing about its renaissance. The great power generated by its founder Swami Dayanand increased in volume till it set into motion the great machinery of reform spreading out the length and breadth of the whole of the Punjab. No other organisation in the country, religious or political, has yet been able to touch the fringe of the wonderful organisation of the Arya Samaj. Every district and town in the Punjab has got a little Arya Samaj and one or more girls’ schools attached to it. These activities are not confined to the province or the country, but Arya missionaries have gone far to the colonies and Burma to preach the gospel of reform. The great Gurukul of Hardware, the Kanya Maha Vidyalaya of Jullundar, the Anglo-Vedic College of Lahore are the standing monuments of sacrifice and capacity for constructive work of the Arya Samajists. Much has been done by the Samaj but it is little of nothing compared to that which is yet left undone. There is no end of work to be done in India before India will be able to hold her own before the advanced nations of the world. And as it is the rule of the world that more is asked of him who gives and much is expected from him who works. I appeal to you, the ladies of this Samaj to exert yourselves and do yet more for the uplift of this most unfortunate and especially for the amelioration of the condition of its women.

TALK BEFORE WOMEN.

"It is only women who can best accomplish this work for they only know where reform is needed and what disabilities they are suffering from. It is the women alone who best know where the shoe pinches.
We shall therefore have to take our reform into our own hands. For this purpose we shall have to cultivate a spirit of public service and of co-operation amongst us. That is a great lesson which we have to learn from the Western countries. Union is power in every case and place. A single jute fibre is extremely frail and can be blown away by a breath of wind but many fibres twisted into ropes can chain elephants and move ships. We must sink our individuality in work, think of the cause more than of ourselves and forget and forgive and give and take.
These are qualities which every child is expected to learn at home but nothing more than those simple qualities are required for the success of our cause."

EVILS TO BE REMOVED.

Continuing Mrs. Nehru said "The list of the evils we are suffering from was long. Ignorance, Purdah, early marriage, enforced widowhood were a very few of them." She pointed out how women in India suffered from unjust marriage and inheritance laws.
There existed no restriction on men at present to marry more than one wife. Even many educated men kept their wives confined to the four walls of the home. These conditions are most humiliating for a woman and even if one woman suffered from them it was a blow to the self respect of all. Mor-over daughters were given no share in their father's property, nor were widows entitled to a share in their husband's ancestral property. All this hampered the free growth of womanhood.

WOMEN'S RESPONSIBILITIES.

"But," she said "along with these rights which we must strive to attain we should never forgot our own responsibilities. At the present stage of our country's development much is expected of us and nothing more is needed beyond the exten-tion of ourselves from homes to our cities or even localities. Much quiet and solid work will be done if the residents of each locality take it on themselves to look after the needs of their own locality. If we look to the sanitary and medical needs of such locality and help the municipality in supplying the work of health officers will be much lightened.
The same can be done with regard to education.
If we cooperate with the Municipality with regard to the every day work of our lives, we can do much good to ourselves and to the country. But for this perpetual watch and alertness much sacrifice is needed. Let us hope we would not be found lacking in these qualities."

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA:

Do you know that 20 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 50 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the Insurance policies in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies.
The patronage of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.
More Social Legislation:—It is stated, on what authority we have not been able to ascertain, that the Government of Bombay are likely to bring forward a Bill in the Provincial Legislative Council to penalise marriages of men of over 45 years with young women of less than 18 years of age. Marriages in which there is a too great disparity of age between husband and wife often lead to unhappy consequences, and it is desirable to avoid them as much as possible. But punitive legislation is hardly the most suitable means of bringing about a wholesome public opinion in this matter. Child marriages, that is, the marriage of girls of tender age, are on a different footing, and physiological and humanitarian considerations justify legislation to put an end to them. Even here, however, it is necessary to proceed cautiously so as to obviate impetuous reactions of alarmed conservatism. As the result of years of social reform propaganda, there is at the present time a strong public opinion in favour of legislation on the lines of Mr. Sarda’s Bill as recast by the Select Committee of the Legislative Assembly. When that Bill becomes law, girls will cease to be married under 14 years of age, and this will accelerate the growth of a strong sentiment against unequal marriages. Even now, such marriages are not the rule anywhere, and are often agreed to as a last resort by parents who are at their wit’s end to get their girls off their hands before they reach the age imperatively prescribed by custom or from the pressure of economic causes, or from pure avarice. There is no rule of caste or custom sanctioning unequal marriages and the public sentiment is decidedly deprecatory of them. The proposed law can be easily evaded by an elderly man bent upon marrying a girl under the prescribed limit by merely postponing the actual marriage until after the limit is past. Social legislation when it is well-considered and carefully devised is of great help to social progress, but it may become a retarding influence if it is based on sentimental and emotional grounds.

Education and Marriage Age:—Accurate Social Statistics are difficult to collect without a special organization; educational institutions can do this easily. The Deccan Education Society of Poona has been at work for several years past giving statistics of married students in the reports of the institutions which it controls. There are at present seven of these, including two important Arts Colleges and two High and three middle Schools. The report of 1926-27 gives the following figures, Fergusson College, Poona, had 1,261 students of whom 201 were married; Willingdon College, Mangli, had 386 students of whom 115 were married. The New English School, Poona, had a total of 1,927 students of whom 52 were married, 28 of these being under 15 years of age. The New English School, Satara, had 711 students of whom 25 were married, the number at and under 15 years being 14. The Navin Marathi Shala, Poona, an Anglo-Vernacular School with four standards only, had 617 students, none of them married. The highest age of students in this school was 12. There seem to be some girls also, as some of the prizes went to them, but the report throughout speaks of boys. The Mavji Madhavji English School at Umbergaon, with five standards had 58 students, only one of whom was married, and that one was 11 years of age and attending the first or lowest class. Out of 69 boys in the New English School Hostel, at ages ranging from 12 to 21, the number of married were 6. These figures show that in the places and among the classes who resort to the Deccan Education Society’s institutions, married students in Colleges are not a small percentage, and that they are exceptional in High Schools and practically non-existent in middle schools.

East and West:—We reprint to day from the Prafulla Bharad, the monthly organ of the Ramkrishna Mission, a striking letter from M. Romain Rolland to Swami Ashokananda in which the great French savant gently rebukes the Swami for claiming the Vedanta as the special and peculiar product of the Indian mind. M. Rolland points out that this is not the case, "The two Vedanta principles which you mention to me", he writes, "have been familiar to me from my childhood without my having been able to have the slightest knowledge of India, and it's thought. Whence did they come to me? They are diffused throughout the world far more than you imagine." This is precisely what people in India feel about the truths of Christianity. The distinction between East and West, Europe and Asia, is a highly artificial— the creation, in fact, of the nineteenth century. The East is no more spiritual than the West, neither is the West any more materialistic than the East. In Asia the terrific aspect of European civilization is more in evidence than its benign aspect, it is because fear of Europe has for about two centuries been a dominating sentiment in Asia. We do not say that the fear has been groundless. Fear, however, is the offspring of conscious weakness, and a determined effort to be strong, is the readiest way of casting it out. The men and women in both continents who help both to realize that they are one in fundamental things, are doing the highest service to humanity, and among them stands in the first rank, M. Romain Rolland.

Women Students' Hostel:—The Bombay Presidency Social Reform Association has issued its report for the three years ending December 31st, 1927. During the period the Association had the misfortune to lose some of its leading spirits. Sir Narayan Chandavarkar, Sir Ramkrishna Bhandarkar, Sir Gokuldas Parekh, Sir Lalubhai Thab, Mr. B. N. Blajekar, and more recently Mr. Dayaram Ghumal and Sir Ramnubhai Mahapatram, have passed away. Mr. Justice Madgsonkar and Mr. Justice Patkar, we are glad, are keeping up the traditional connection between Hindu Judges of the High Court and the leadership of the social reform movement. Messrs. D. G. Dalvi, N. M. Joshi, Bhagwandas Machavandas and V. N. Chandavarkar, the present Secretaries, form an able and energetic band who should be able to put new life into the Association. The apparent slackness in its activities is largely due to the fact that social reform within the last few years has entered on a new phase, and requires to be approached from fresh points of view. Among the constructive work of the Association, is the Hostel for women students, a very much needed institution in Bombay. The funds available for the Hostel have reached a low ebb and the report calls attention to the need of finding means of continuing this excellent institution. It will be a great pity if the Hostel has to be closed for want of funds, and we earnestly trust that the generosity of friends will enable the Association to establish it on a permanent basis.

Sanatorium at Tambaran:—Dr. Muthu the eminent Indian Tuberculosis specialist has rendered a distinct service in the field of human hygiene by concentrating on the scheme of establishing a sanatorium for open air treatment of those afflicted with the fell disease, tuberculosis. Thanks to his strenuous efforts, an ideal site in Tambaran has been secured and the foundation stone of the first set of buildings, consisting of sanatorium hospital, convalescent blocks and quarters for the medical staff, was laid this week. Dr. Muthu's scheme is known as the Garden Colony Scheme and is the first of its kind in India. It has a four-fold aim in view:— (1) To treat patients in the curable stage; (2) to deal with suspected and pre-tuberculous cases so as to prevent tuberculosis altogether if possible; (3) to educate the people in matters of hygiene and sanitation and inculcate in them a love of fresh air and country life; (4) to show that it is man that makes disease, not microbes, and that given fresh air, good nourishing food, a quiet, healthy environment he can more or less banish disease. The scheme is the outcome of Dr. Muthu's 30 years' experience in sanatorium work abroad. It is increasingly coming to be recognized by the medical profession that drugs play a very small part in the curative process and that the wonderful recuperative power of nature is an all-important factor in the cure of the sick. Dr. Muthu has laid the foundation of the treatment on latest scientific lines for tuberculosis and thus conferred a boon upon his countrymen who can do no less than accord a liberal support to his scheme.

Indian Renaissance:—The Indian Daily Mail writing on the renaissance of Indian art as illustrated by music, dancing and dramatic performances given in Bombay in which cultured and educated Indian women took part, makes the following suggestion:—The new movement deserves encouragement and it also needs co-ordination. An Indian Renaissance Association with ample funds is needed for both purposes. Without such an organization, efforts are bound to be sporadic and to entail unjustifiable sacrifices on the part of those who, from wholly disinterested motives, are striving to revive and raise the standard of Indian art under modern conditions. The greatest credit is due in particular to the talented women who are taking a leading part in the new movement. They are rescuing the arts of music and dancing from the hands of professional mesh, and bringing them to their ancient high status in Indian life. Princesses and ladies of noble families sang and danced before the shrines of ancient India, and considered it a religious duty. They were the true mavaddas, a name which has now come to be applied to a very different class of women. The time is not distant when these great arts will once more flourish as valued accomplishments of women of education and refinement in every home in the land.

A New Book on Buddhism:—The April number of the Mahabodhi, the monthly journal edited by the Anngrika Dhammappa, reprints a letter from Sir Hari Singh Gour to Rai Babbadur Pandit Sheo Narayan, in which the former refers to his forthcoming book on Buddhism. Sir Hari Singh writes: "I have printed and sent out for publication in England a work on the spirit of Buddhism in which I have essayed a complete survey of the life of the founder and his tenets. It is in point of size the largest work yet composed on the subject, while in its scope I believe it will be found to be most exhaustive."
INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, APRIL 14, 1928.

DHONDO KESHAV KARVE.

We join cordially in the felicitations which a very wide circle of friends will offer to Prof. D. K. Karve on the 18th of April which is his seventieth birth-day. When the history of Indian progress during the last half-century comes to be written, Professor Karve's name will fill several illuminating pages of it. His one great aim in life has been to help the redemption of Indian women from cramping social customs. The position of the Hindu widow is the most outstanding of such customs. Young girls at tender ages are made to go through the legal form of marriage and instances are not a few when they become widows before they have been wives. Young Karve could not but feel for the lot of the young girls doomed to life-long widowhood. The remarriage of such widows was the obvious remedy. The most practical form in which the reform could be helped was to marry a widow himself. Professor Karve was not the man to shrink from sacrifices. He had already pledged himself to devote his life to the profession of a teacher by becoming a life-member of the Deccan Education Society. The income guaranteed to him was a mere pittance. Many men in similar circumstances would have hesitated to take up the additional burden of odium which marriage with a widow was sure to bring upon him. In those days the burden was a very real one, and if it has become very shadowy since, the credit belongs to pioneers like Professor Karve. By his marriage, he redeemed one Hindu widow from enforced widowhood, but this was not enough. There were thousands of others who needed help, and Karve's heart yearned to do all that he could to help them. He became an enthusiastic worker in the cause of social reform, particularly the remarriage of widows. He founded the Widows' Home at Poona.

After a few years' experience, it seems to have occurred to him that remarriage was not the only or the surest way of helping Hindu widows. Remarriages are liable to accidents as well as first marriages. The remarried couple may not hit it off well together. Orthodox Hindus were deeply prejudiced against the remarriage of widows, misrepresenting the reformers as aiming at the compulsory and wholesale remarriage of all Hindu widows. Karve's first step was to make it clear that all that the reformers wanted was that the ban on remarriage should be removed. The legislature had already made it lawful for Hindu widows to remarry. Social opinion lagged behind, and the performance of a few remarriages did not appreciably accelerate the pace of reform. Karve was thus led to think of a more effective way of advancing the cause of women's emancipation. It struck him that the best way to help widows was to help them to help themselves. Education was the master-key which opens all doors in the social citadel. He would devote himself to educating young widows though for the time being it meant the slowing down of the remarriage reform. The Hindu Widows' Home at Hinge was the outcome of this resolve. But in order to educate widows, he must first get them into the Home. Orthodox families would not send their widowed daughters to a Home which was conducted by a man who had himself married a widow, and who was one of the protagonists of the remarriage movement. Faced by an analogous dilemma, the Raja Ram Mohun Roy stood aside from the management of the first English school which he had been mainly instrumental in establishing in Calcutta. But there were others whose orthodoxy was beyond reproach to shoulder the management of the English School; while if Karve severed his connection with the Widows' Home, it would have inevitably collapsed for want of another equally willing and capable worker. The interests of the institution should not be sacrificed to personal scruples. By a bold stroke Karve declared that no widow who was being educated in the Home should be remarried while she was still an inmate of it. There has been and must continue to be a difference of opinion regarding the rightness from the strictly moral point of view of this drastic ruling. But Professor Karve is a man of action, with a clear idea of the distinction between morality and moral scrupulosity which paralyses action instead of compelling it.

Still Karve's mind was not at rest. Education of widows alone was a small corner of the problem of Indian women's uplift. Moreover, the emphasis laid on widowhood as a qualification for admission to the Home which had developed into a boarding school, was calculated to perpetuate the invidious distinction which Hindu society made between widows and other women. The great thing to do to relieve widowhood of its worst feature was to wipe out this distinction. The existence of separate institutions was itself a means of separateness. Some such considerations led to Karve merging the Widows' Home which for some time had been maintained as a distinct institution in the Girls' High School which he had established by its side. This step paved the way for the next and most important development of Professor Karve's work, the crown and consummation of it, namely, the famous Women's University at Hinge Badruk. This institution has been fortunate in attracting the sympathy and munificence of the late Sir Vithaldas Thackersey who has bequeathed: 15 lakhs of rupees as an endowment for it. The somewhat rigid lines of distinction, which were conspicuous in Mr. Karve's early plans of this University, between men's and women's education, have become softened by the lapse of time and as the result of experience. The Statutory Universities, moreover, are modifying their own courses in the direction of giving a larger scope for the vernaculars, which is now almost the only fundamental principle of the Women's University. The time is not, therefore, distant when the Women's University will become incorporated in the system of Indian education, and not stand out of it as a rival or antagonist. The co-ordination of all educational activities in the country is an urgent necessity both as a measure of economy and as a means of reaching a standard of maximum efficiency. The Women's University is a monument to the selfless devotion, the tireless industry and the ardent zeal of Professor D. K. Karve for the emancipation of Indian Women.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

(By Ms. N. Lakhsmian)

The recent public utterances of some prominent non-Brahmins revealed a change of mentality among the promoters of the non-Brahmin movement in the Madras Presidency. Sympathetic and impartial observers of the trend of events during the recent session of the National Social Congress held at Madras were able to say that a new spirit is beginning to permeate the movement, a spirit of catholicity embracing Brahmins as well as non-Brahmins. In fact, The Indian Social Reformer clearly stated in January last that at an early date the basis of the party will be enlarged so as to make opinion and not birth the test of admission to its membership. It further observed that the responsible leaders of the non-Brahmin movement realise that there is a considerable section of Brahmins whose views are, in no essential respect, different from those which they themselves hold, and as patriotic men, they are anxious to remove from their party the stigma that it excludes any individual or caste on the score of birth. It was of course inevitable that, during the recent ministerial crisis, His Excellency the Governor of Madras should ask his chief Minister Dr. Subbarayan to select two gentlemen to act as his colleagues. It is however significant that the Raja of Penukalai should also be invited to take part in ministry-making and gladly agree to the inclusion of a Brahman in the Ministry that was hitherto a close preserve of non-Brahmans. The monopoly complex is also removed by the selection of a leading non-Brahman as Law Member of the Madras Government.

The Tribune of Lahore says that the very fact that Mahatma Gandhi had got the Congress to adopt, first, the spinning, then the yean, and ultimately, the Khaddar-wearing, franchise was interpreted as showing that his attitude towards even truly indigenous cotton mills, was not so sympathetic as it might have been, as the mill owners themselves and a large section of the public have liked it to be. Gandhi's latest opinion regarding the true function of mills in our national economy shows that either that impression was wrong or the Mahatma has now changed his opinion. The creed of non-co-operation or the cult of the charka is not unalterable like the code of the Medes. The Tolstoyan creed has been adversely commented upon by some writers like Mr. Bernard Shaw. But can any one say that Mahatma Gandhi's message of non-violence will be unacceptable to War-weary Europe?

It has been pointed out that Miss Mayo's book is "an imitation of the scenario of a cinema show." In fact the film actress Miss Nazimova has done her part to the complete satisfaction of the author of Mother India. Miss Mayo is reported to be now travelling in France and planning to publish French, German, and other translations of her Indian Novel. This is the next stage in spreading her "international poison." By the time the Simon Commission returns to India Miss Mayo would have given a finishing touch to her nefarious work which began against the fitness of the Philippines for complete independence. An experienced publicist like Sir Sankaran Nair has thought fit to refer to the Mayo touch "in the Philippines in his recent article in the Contemporary Review.

It is very touching to be told that Lord Sinha refused to have his benefactions advertised in order to rebut Miss Mayo's calumny. There is no parallel in the world for the deepening poverty in India and the most poverty-stricken provinces in India are obviously Bengal, Bihar and Orissa. Lord Sinha had intimate and personal knowledge of the helpless condition of the masses in these parts of India and no wonder that he complained that Government "let my people starve." Periodical floods and the ever-present malaria in Orissa and, in Bengal, aid to the misery of the villagers. Nearly a quarter of a century ago, Poet Rabindranath Tagore started the rural reconstruction movement in Bengal and when I visited Sri-Niketan or the Viswabharati Department of rural reconstruction at Sarul last year, I was told that Lord Sinha was one of the active members of Sri-Niketan. The Sarul farm is near his village Raipur, and at the invitation of Lord Sinha the rural workers trained under such a well known expert as Dr. Rajani Kanta Das (now of the International Labour Board at Geneva) had just then begun an economic survey of the village of Raipur. Babu Kali Mohah Ghose of Sri-Niketan who recently toured in the Nisam's State will be able to furnish the latest information on the subject.
BASAVA.

(Concluded from the last issue).

HIS SOCIAL REFORM.

BASAVA was pre-eminently a social reformer. In him there was a rare combination of a religious reviver, a political genius, a great philosopher and a social reformer. His sole intention was to make Lingayatism a universal religion and bring all people into a single fold and thereby terminate their differences and quarrels. The miserable condition of the untouchable class made a strong impression in the heart of Basava. He converted most of them to Lingayatism and helped to make their life sublime. He was a close friend of the depressed and the suppressed classes and an indefatigable foe of the oppressors. He converted Champa a huntress, Upall a barber, Swati a fisherman and Sunita an outcaste. He converted to Lingayatism prominent Brahmans like Kesava Raja, Nachirajara Bacherasa, Jayadeva Nayak and Jains like Pushpanda and Neelambika. He raised the status of women to that of equality with men. He stopped child-marriage and encouraged post-puberty marriage. He condemned in strong terms the ill-treatment of women. He allowed women to study various sciences like men. He had admitted such learned women like Nagambika, Mahadevi, Neelambika and Muktaidevi to his academy of philosophy. These women were highly proficient in philosophy and each of them has written a book. The founding of the academy of philosophy is a monument which marks a new era in the history of the world philosophy. The distinctive feature of his academy was that he admitted untutored men to it. With regard to his social reform “The Times of India” in 1917 wrote: —

“...it was a distinctive feature of his mission that while illustrious religious and social reformers in India before him had each laid his emphasis on one or the other item of religious and social reform, either subordinating more or less items to it or ignoring them altogether, Basava sketched and boldly tried to work out a large and comprehensive programme of social reform with the elevation and independence of womanhood as its guiding point. Neither social conferences which are annually held in these days in several parts of India, nor Indian social reformers can improve upon that programme as to the essentials. As was in substance remarked by the late Sir James Campbell, whose knowledge of Indian history was phenomenal, the present day social reformer in India is but speaking the language and seeking to enforce the mind of Basava.”

HIS RELIGIOUS REVIVAL.

Basava is not the founder of Lingayatism but is only its reviver. Mr. E. F. Rice in his history of Kanarese literature has written as follows:

“Lingayatism or Veerashaivism did not originate as is often mistakenly thought with Basava in the 12th century. He was only the propagator and reformer of what had been from ancient times one form of religious faith and practice. Unlike some who call themselves Saivas, Lingayats are worshipers of Shiva exclusively. The one thing which is their peculiar characteristic is the wearing of Linga, a symbol of the deity on their person. The investiture with the Linga is the most sacred rite of childhood; the Lingayats are strictly vegetarians in diet, and on this account all other castes except Brahmins, will eat food cooked by them. As they do not admit Brahmin claims to pre-eminence, there is hostility or aloofness between the two. Basava indeed taught that men of all castes and even outcastes were eligible to enter the Lingayat community.”

In the latter part of Atharvavara Veda the system of wearing Linga has been elaborately treated. Renukas who elucidated the doctrine of Veerashivism to the sage, Agastya, is considered to have lived two thousand years before the Christian era. There is a reference to this in Chaitravodhaka. Anandagiri in his Shankeradigwijaya mentions that Shankara discussed with Jangamas who wore Lingas on their heads. We know that Shankara lived in 800 A.D. The king Jayasimha III of Chalukya dynasty ruled from 1016 to 1040, A. D. Mr. Flete in his “Dinasties of Kanaree Districts,” writes that Devandashimaya had converted Suggaladevi, the wife of Jayasimha III. Suggaladevi caused her husband too to be converted to Lingayatism through the same Guru. The five chief religious monasteries of the Lingayats are even now existing from time immemorial. One is situated at Kedar in the Himalaya mountain, another at Benares, the third at Srishalla mountain, the fourth at Ujjayani in Madras presidency and the fifth at Balehalli in Mysore State. From the situation of these places all over India it is reasonable to suppose that at one time Lingayatism was widespread. Neither Jain nor Brahmin writers have hitherto maintained that Basava founded these monasteries, nor have the Lingayat writers written so. The inscriptions at the Benares monastary show that in 631 A. D., Jayananda, the king of Benares gave Jangamapura as a grant to that monastery which is called Jangamwadi Mutt. There are so many other instances which go to show that Lingayatism existed before Basava.

The Basava Puran says that Basava incarnated on earth to uplift Veerashaivism which had decayed owing to the lack of a great teacher. Basava made no innovations either in religion or in philosophy. What he did was to preach and write its doctrines in a most easy and attractive style. Like Buddha he won the masses through the instrumentality of the vernacular. Vedas and Agamas which were the backbone of the religion, were beyond the intellectual reach of the common people. Basava elucidated Vedic and Agamic doctrines in a very easy vernacular dialect. He wrote Shatashala Vachana, Kalajnana Vachana, Mantragoppya etc., which were popularly studied and acted upon. Thousands of people become the followers of Basava. There was such a religious upheaval that innumerable saints came to Kalyan to see Basava. Some sycophants told the king that Basava had gathered an army to rise into a rebellion against the king. At the same time many Lingayat scholars sprang up and they wrote books on religion and philosophy. The impetus that Basava gave to this new movement was so enormous that its force was carried up to the middle of the 19th century when Shadaxari, the great Lingayat poet commenced his "Rajasekhava" with an invocation to Basava. From the time of Basava up to 1650 A.D., there were nearly 330 Lingayat poets.

Basava only upheld the essential doctrines of Lingayatism rejecting dogmatic beliefs and practices. He fortified the foundations of a protestant form of Hinduism. He may be aptly called the Luther of Lingayatism. For the treatment of Lingayatism and its philosophy, it requires an independent article of which I hope to acquaint my readers later on.

FURDAH.

(A YOUNG MAHOMEDAN.)

Though the custom of Furdah is current in other countries, yet no race has adopted it so strictly as the Mahomedans in India who observe it to the extreme of caution. The Indian Mahomedan regards with reverence the custom of Furdah, and esteems it as most necessary, as though it were God's order. The longer I contemplate the custom the more I become convinced that it is an evil. In India if a strange person hears the voice of a woman, then it would be said of her, that her purdah had been broken. The face is hidden, but India has made the purdah of the voice. The evil custom of Furdah helps to keep the people uneducated, causes boys to be brought up in an unmanly way and it makes Indian women timid and superstitious and is a hindrance moreover to their physical and mental development.

Women thus living in Furdah, never get the fresh air which is very essential for health. Not a single time can it happen that they are able to take the fresh air when they are tired, after having finished the family tasks. The poor creatures are always breathing impure air; so the result becomes evil. It is ignorance that compels them to live in purdah. A good God can never have ordained such a custom. An educated woman will never like to live in purdah, because education has enlightened her mind and she knows all the evils of it, which uneducated women bear up under.

Do we forget our old history when the women took part in war, fought by the side of men with the forces? Often conquest depended on the schemes and proposals of the women. They appeared in hospitals, giving medicines, putting on bandages, and looking after the wounded. Women is the greatest and most faithful comrade of man, who will, if need be, give her life for the man she loves. When they were fighting and nursing the wounded, did they require a purdah as nowadays? No, they were the goddesses of chastity and modesty and were a pride to their country. Women were found side by side with men in all departments of life and their work found equal to that of men as regards merit. These were the women that at times encouraged disorderly forces, they changed death into conquest. Then what is the argument that men have taken away the freedom of such a good and useful living being.

Men made them so accustomed to purdah that they have acceded it as of immemorial usage. If now we give them freedom, they will not allow it as they are so accustomed to the purdah, and regard freedom as an indignity. Whenever one talks to older men, they answer, we are not ready to disgrace our women. It is a sorrowful time, did women require purdah as nowadays, or at that time did anyone say "We are not going to disgrace our women" no, there was no necessity for it. As we know the system was introduced in the first instance to prevent the improper association of men and women. The excessive use of a remedy may become a poison. Sati among Hindus was observed for centuries. When reformers rose to make an end of it, most Hindus resisted them, but now it is recognised as contrary to the Sastra. Hinduism is the same religion as before but Sati is illegal. When a religious reformer states his work, most are against him, but if he is sincere, in time his teaching is accepted. The same rule will apply to the system of Furdah.

Unfortunately we consider our women are only fit to clean the house, cook and wash the babies. We do not think that they have a place in the progress of our country. This is the reason our country is backward and full of ignorance and superstition. We have made them our slaves, they are bound by our orders and cannot disobey us. God can never intend this. When our women have their proper place alongside of us, India will be happier, healthier; children be stronger and a more wholesome system of morality and national honour will come into being.

PROF. KARVE’S LIFE-WORK.

Mr. V. M. Joshi, writes in the Servant of India, Poona:

The 18th of April is to be gala-day at Hingne where the 70th birth-day of Prof. D. K. Karve is going to be celebrated with great joy and solemnity by his pupils, co-workers, friends and admirers, under the presidentship of the Hon'ble Mr. G. B. Pradhan, the Minister of Excise and Forests to the Government of Bombay. Prophets are rarely honoured in their own country and more rarely still during their life-time. But society in some of its lucid moments, after subjecting the prophet to prolonged and severe tests, sometimes, as in this case, recognises its heroics and honours them without waiting for their death. Prof. Karve, like other prophets, had his share of misunderstandings, micro-presentations and vilifications, but fortunately he has long since cultivated all these and won a corner in the hearts of his countrymen (who at any rate the cultured portion amongst whom) now see in him one of their greatest servants in the best and noblest sense of the word. It may not be inopportune if one avails himself of this occasion to review the achievements and gauge the potentialities of this remarkable personality. The book of his life has not had its fais yet and judging from his health, enthusiasm and previous record it has possibly several unwritten chapters recording developments full of interest and edification to future generations. But enough material is already with us to make its study profitable. For reasons of space (and time too) the present writer proposes in this article barely to indicate the incidents of his life and the main current of his activities and then to dwell at some length on what perhaps are the most interesting questions in regard to his life, namely,

1. In what sense and to what extent is it true that he repeatedly transferred his love from one philanthropic activity to another, and

2. Was or was not such transfer of love justifiable?

MAIN INCIDENTS.

Born in 1858 in a very poor family. (which, by the bye, was in the time of the Pun was rich enough to have thousands of rupees owing to it from the then Government of Berar), Prof. Karve passed his matriculation in 1881 and his B.A. in 1884, not without the obstacles and difficulties which poverty entails. Taking up service as a teacher of mathematics in the Cathedral School at Bombay, he sked out the meagre pay with private tuition which hardly left him any time or energy for the study of Master, does some degree. Without the half-mark of that degree he could however show abilities which led the late Hon’ble Mr. G. K. Gokhale to invite him in the year 1891 to work as Professor of Mathematics in the Fergusson College. The invitation was accepted and Prof. Karve joined that College in November of that year. In April 1892 he was admitted to the life-membership of Decan Education Society which he served till 1914, when he retired and devoted himself to the work of Hindu Widows’ Home, which he had already founded in 1896 and for which he had been spending all his leisure hours. Before proceeding further we must here stop a while to note how his attention was drawn to the question of the education of widows. Prof. Karve, who was married at 15, lost his wife in the year 1891, leaving a son behind her. Being too good and too wise to marry a virgin of 13 or 14 at the age of thirty-three he remained a widower until 1905, when, by a happy chance, he came across a father who thought of having his widowed daughter remarried and who persuaded her to marry Prof. Karve, whose consent he had no difficulty in securing. The significance of the step cannot be fully appreciated, unless one remembers that widow re-marriage was considered by the high-caste Hindus even in the last quarter of the 19th century as more or less a sin. The first widow-remarriage in Poona occurred in 1874, and for the next one which was Prof. Karve’s we had to wait for as many as 19 years. After his remarriage with a widow, he became an active member of the Society for the Encouragement of Remarriage among Widows, which he soon founded. In 1885 he got the name of the institution changed into “The Society for Removal of the Ba against Remarriage of Widows” with a view to placate the orthodox section of the people and also to leave no ground to have the motives of its members misunderstood, for as a matter of fact none really desired that all widows, irrespective of age, inclination or circumstance, should remarry, although all desired that there should be no artificial obstacle or restriction against remarriage.

An apparent transfer of love from one philanthropic endeavour to another followed three years after, when he founded the Widows’ Home Association. Providing facilities for the education of widows rather than encouragement of widow-remarriage or removal of the ban against the remarriage of widows henceforth absorbed almost all his energies and his attention, to the inevitable detriment of direct work in the cause of widow-remarriage. But Prof. Karve felt that the latter problem had better be tackled indirectly and that success was sure, more complete and more radical by means of a flank attack than by a frontal one. The Widows’ Home at Hingne, progressing from day to day and year to year, could however maintain and educate not more than 40 widows after an existence of eight years, and Prof. Karve thought that if he could open the doors of the school at Hingne to virgins, he would be indirectly helping the cause of widows by broadening the minds and enlarging the outlook of the future women of India, without in the least adding to the expenses of the institution. Maidens were indeed being admitted to the institution but that was by way of exception to solidify and to give some idea of the institution. Maidens were indeed being admitted to the institution but that was by way of exception to solidify and to give some idea of the institution. Prof. Karve, believing as he did that the education of girls would facilitate and hasten the solution of the problem of the widows, started another institution—his new love—at Hingne, for the education of virgins. Two co-wives could more easily and smoothly work together than two such institutions, having similar aims and situated at a distance of a few yards only. Jealousies and petty bickerings followed and they were not certainly mitigated by the strained economic condition of both. Prof. Karve had indeed a band of workers who had pledged themselves to do selfless work but after all they too were human, and with all their sincerity and zeal (for none could deny them the credit for their work) they had to admit the force of the logic of Ahmedabad, the same logic of facts. The B.B. Society of the band of M. A. of the University, 80 years ago, ceased to be a mere group of like-minded workers who proposed to work like Jesuits supplying the need of trained lady-teachers, but those who were working in the direction of girls born and yet to be born in India, who wanted an education suited to them and to their environment, an education which was not to be an exact replica of what was meant for boys, but one which would take into account their peculiar physical and mental characteristics, and make for the fullest development of all that was best in them, without being carried off the right track by the unnecessary and unnatural emphasis on the teaching of English as a language and on its use as a medium of instruction. English, to take the last point first, was to be made a compulsory subject in the high schools and colleges affiliated to the new University, but overstressing it was to be avoided and as regards its use as a medium of instruction, it was to be discarded in favour of the use of the vernaculars, not chiefly with a view to their development but with the view of providing the most natural and the most effective means of learning the various subjects. The idea was taken from the Japan Women's University, a report of whose work had reached him in 1915 and had served to solidify and to give a definite form and colour to his more or less vague and indefinite views on the matter. The University had the good fortune in 1920 to secure the princely donation of Rs. 15 lakhs under certain conditions. Its finances are gradually improving, its accumulated fund now amounts to nearly Rs. 125,000 in 34 Government papers, and its income comes to Rs. 16,000 to Rs. 20,000 per year in addition to Rs. 52,000, which comes by way of interest on the late Sir Vithaldas Thackersey's gift.

It maintains a college of its own and gives grants-in-aid to another college conducted and maintained by an independent body. It finances and conducts two high schools for girls, one at Bombay and the other at Poona, and gives grants-in-aid to girls' schools conducted on its lines at Hingne, Satara, Belgaum, Malvan, Ratnagiri, Sangli, Surat, Baroda, Ahmedabad, Bhanvagar and Bombay. It has sent out 47 graduates, one of whom has written a highly commended thesis on Indian dramaturgy and has taken her P. A. degree, which corresponds to the M. A. of the other Universities. With a view to supplying the need of trained lady-teachers for primary schools, it gives substantial help to the Training College for Ladies at Hingne. The certificates were for some years not officially recognised by the Department of Education, which, however, has now consented to recognise them on certain conditions which the Senate of the University will in all probability accept. The entrance examination of the University (corresponding to the S. L. C. examination of the Bombay University) has been officially recognised so far as admission to the medical schools is concerned, on one condition, which is perfectly reasonable, namely, that the girl seeking admission must have Mathematics and Science for her matriculation. Out of the 47 graduates sent out from the University, about half a dozen are conducting, or are responsible for conducting, girls' schools and more than 25 are working as teachers in girls' schools, many of them aided by Government.

HINDUISM AND CONVERSION.

During the last few years an attempt has been made in Northern India on a considerable scale for the conversion of non-Hindus to Hinduism. The Shuddhi movement, as it has been called, is not apparently intended to be confined to apostates from Hinduism who have embraced other religions like Islam or Christianity. If the descendents of those who have lapsed from Hinduism can be brought back into the Hindu fold after some generations, there is no reason for any distinction between their case and that of persons whose ancestors were not members of the Hindu community at any time. If reversion of the descendants of an apostate is justifiable, conversion also is equally proper. The movement raises a fundamental issue, whether conversion to Hinduism is possible or not. The most spectacular case in which this issue has been forced upon the public notice is the conversion of Miss Miller, an American lady, by the Shankaracharya of the Carvar Pith. The question whether conversion to Hinduism is legally possible has not, so far as I am aware, been the subject of any legal adjudication. It is open to doubt whether there is any textual authority forbidding such conversions. It would be, however, idle to deny that the Hindu Smritis or canon law proceeds upon the assumption that caste is a matter of birth and not of adoption. The system of Hindu law is a system of personal law binding upon the members of the caste organisations recognised by it. It is not a system of territorial law claiming allegiance on the ground of residence within a particular country. The applicability of the Hindu code to any particular person would depend upon the answer to the question whether he has been admitted by Hindu society, or is recognised by it as a member of their body. If Hindu society chooses to admit a stranger within its fold, it is not for the Courts to say that the society had no right to do so. It is essentially the right of each society to decide for itself any matters of this kind and it is not for the Courts to fetter the discretion of the community or tie it down by any rules or prescriptions. Here the question arises, what exactly is meant by Hinduism. Does it mean merely a body of religious tenets and ethical rules or a social organisation, or both? As a matter of fact, it is the social organisation with its peculiar characteristics that would seem to be connected by the term Hinduism rather than any particular religious belief. Far be it from me to say that Hinduism does not imply any religious belief of one kind or another, but there is no system of theology in the world which has allowed such a vast amount of intellectual freedom to its followers in matters of faith and doctrine, and sanctioned such large varieties of religious belief. We have all a more or less vague idea of what Hinduism is, but it would baffle the ingenuity of the learned to lay down a comprehensive and at the same time sharp and logical definition of Hinduism. It is the accommodating capacity of Hinduism that has enabled it in the past to absorb many communities and many religious beliefs and to resist the shocks of collision with alien and hostile races and religions. One thing that has enabled it in the past to survive the impact of so many attacks is the social structure to which it has tenaciously clung. But this very structure, founded upon the development of the caste organisation, which has been the strength of Hinduism in the past, is now proving to be a source of weakness to itself and to the country and Nation at large. No one can deny the right of any person or community to convert others by persuasion to his or its own religious belief or the right of any society to receive any stranger into its bosom. That the caste organisation of the Hindus was not always so rigid as it now appears is clearly borne out by history. That several of the tribes and communities with which the Hindus came in contact were gradually admitted within the pale is borne out by historical evidence. The enlagement of the Hindu pantheon itself is one of the obvious results of this process. Several members of foreign tribes which invaded the country like the Greeks and the Scythians became Hindus and of some of them received the Kshatriya status and rank. The means by which this assimilation was effected might have been conversion or legal fiction or some one or other of the devices familiar to us in ancient history. Evidence of the resort to fictitious theories may be found in one of the oldest Smritis. There is a text of Gautama in his Dharmasastra which states that according to some authorities, the Yavanas (i.e. the Greeks) were the offspring of mixed marriages between men of the Kshatriya caste and women of the Shudra caste. This interesting text is an illustration of the many fictitious theories which might have been employed for the purpose of reconciling society to the inevitable adjustments to new social environments. That society has a right to act for itself in these matters cannot be gainsaid by any reasonable person. Whether in any particular case, the action of any particular section of the community can be regarded as an expression of the will of the community is a question upon which it is impossible to lay down any rules. The first steps of the social reformers are like those of the men who start to establish a right of way through an enclosed field. After several successive instances, what was at first an unauthorised innovation tends to become a well-established right of the public. There is no doubt that the conversion of Miss Miller will be looked upon in many orthodox quarters as a flouting of public opinion and that it may be deplored as subversive of the very foundations of Hinduism. On the other hand, there must be large numbers among the educated sections of our countrymen who would welcome this event as marking an epoch and as a proof of the continuing adaptability of Hinduism to the conditions of the time. I for one am disposed to congratulate the Shankaracharya who sanctioned, and assisted in, the conversion of Miss Miller on his high moral courage and patriotism in broadening the foundations of Hinduism and promoting national progress. It is the first shot fired into the citadel of the exclusive organisation of Hindu society. The first faint cracks are visible and there can be no doubt that they are bound to widen into a breach sufficiently to allow of its being stormed in the near future. We may be told by social die-hards that there is hardly any race or society in the world which has not got its colour bars and racial and caste prejudices, but the existence of such prejudices is no proof of their desirability or of their fitness for survival under modern conditions.

VEDANTA AND THE WEST.

Mr. Romain Rolland wrote in 1927 to Swami Ashokananda seeking information about the Ramakrishna Mission, its activities and progress. After expanding the principles of Vedanta the Swami concluded by saying that many Western authors of the 18th and 19th centuries showed traces of Vedanta influence on their thoughts. These be attributed partly to the dissemination of Indian culture by Western Orientalists and partly to the teachings and literature of Swami Vivekananda and his monks. Romain Rolland's letter which we extract from Prabuddha Bharata in reply to the Swami's letter is interesting in that it shows that Western culture is essentially the same as the Eastern.

Dear Swami Ashokananda,

I cannot thank you sufficiently for your excellent letter which has come at a time when you are suffering so greatly from your demands. Nothing could have better filled up the gaps in my knowledge and enlightened me on the actual position of the Ramakrishna Mission in face of the social problems which present themselves in India as in the world of to-day. I shall make use of these valuable reports in the final chapters of my projected work.

For the work is not yet written nor has even the preparatory outline been commenced. For a little over a year I have been collecting the essential materials; and (according to my usual custom for each of my works), I allow the fire to be covered by the ashes until all my papers be in order. It would be difficult to make up a quick collection of impressions on so great a subject; it is necessary to allow oneself to think over them in silence; I hope that, during this coming winter, I shall be able to devote myself entirely to this work...

My sister and I are extremely grateful to you for sending the numbers of "Prabuddha Bharata" Review, which we read with a keen interest, and for the "General Report" of the Mission. We have deeply valued the important books on the life of Sri Ramakrishna and of Swami Vivekananda. Here are those which we still need:

1. Jnana-Yoga
2. Bhakti-Yoga
3. Up Master
4. Abercrombie's European Travel

If it would be possible for you to send them to us we should be deeply grateful.

Your letter of September 11 has made me still more the great joy of your Mission and the fruitful wisdom of its calm and silent work. I shall imprint myself with these thoughts. On one point only I would present to you some observations. It is incontestable that a relationship reveals itself between the Vedantic ideas and many of the ideas and tendencies which are appearing now in the West. But I do not think that this is an effect (at any rate for the greatest number of them) of the modern diffusion of Vedantic ideas. In reality, unless this relationship rests on the identical foundation of human nature, and above all on the great Indian-European family. Whatever may be the agreements which unite the languages (and in consequence, the thoughts) called Aryana, of Asia and of Europe, these agreements are surely traced back to far distant times. Pascal has said these beautiful words in his Pensées (it is God who is looked upon to speak to men who are in despair at not having found him): "Thou wouldst not seek for me if thou hadst not found me."

When I happen to read in any of your sacred texts of India or in your philosophers and poets, one of these revelations, which goes to my heart, I do not discover it as a new thought, I recognise it as one of my childhood thoughts. It was written in me from all eternity.

It would be lessening the Divine, the Eternal, to imagine that there is a handful of grains in the hands of certain chosen men of a chosen race. The Eternal has sown himself with full hands over the whole field of humanity. The earth is not everywhere so fertile that the seeds may germinate in some places it grows and produces fruit, in other places it sleeps. But the seed is everywhere. And turn by turn, that which is sleeping, awakes; and that which was asleep, seek out the Sun. The Spirit is always in movement from people to people, and from man to man. And no people and no man holds it. But it is the fire of the eternal life in each one,—the same Fire. And we live to feed it.

The two Vedantic principles which you have expressed to me, have been familiar to me from my childhood,—without my having been able to have the slightest knowledge of India and its thought. Whence did they come to me? They are diffused throughout the world far more than you imagine, as well in a certain Christian mysticism (Eastern in origin) as in part of Hellenic culture (which she [Greece] also possessed through her great thinkers, from Pythagoras to Plotinus, passing through Plato until all men may think, and which place roots in the Vedas of Asia and Egypt as in Europe). And for us, men of the 19th century, we have had this magnificent fountain of idealistic pantheism—music—the powerful German music, and above all the heroic religious music of Beethoven. It was to us a metaphysic and religion without words,—a Yoga-revelator. If you know it well, you would see that the West has also in it its sublime discipline of being concentrated and absorbed in the Eternal. And the aspect of this German crowd of people swallowed up in the wonderful harmonies of a cantata or a mass of J. S. Bach is equal in its silence its intensity and its burning ecstasy to the most devoted religious adorations of India. Add to this, that in the domain of pure thought the strong current which comes from Socrates, the Dutch Jew of the 17th century, which has its full æsthetic century later in Goethe, whose substance we have not yet exhausted, and in the great German idealism of the beginning of the 19th century.

The Divinity of man and the Spirituality of life are two sets of faith for many of the highest spirits of the West and all time. One can even say that the first of these was the main inspiration of certain of the thinkers who made the French Revolution. And although that has, by the misfortune of every precipitated action, set human
Mr. KELKAR ON SHUDDI MOVEMENT.

The following extract is from Mr. N. Kelkar's presidential address at the recent session of the Hindu Mahasabha Conference held in Jabalpur:-

"The word Shuddhi movement is understood by many people to mean a movement for only re-conversion—reconversion to Hinduism of only those that were Hindus originally but were subsequently converted to another faith. But I take it that the word was never intended to possess that limited or restrictive sense. It implies the admission to the Hindu-fold also of those who were never originally Hindus, but seek for the first time to come into that fold. And in this respect I cannot but draw your attention to an event which recently took place at Nasik. That event is the conversion of an American maiden, Miss Nancy Miller, to Hinduism at the hands of Shri Shankaracharya, formerly Dr. Kurkitkki. There may be extraneous reasons for the worldwide advertisement which this conversion received in India, in England and in America. But the importance of that event is colossal enough by itself. This conversion has received the approval of the whole Hindu community, and I offer my respectful congratulations to Shri Shankaracharya, not only for his great imagination, but also for the strength of mind which His Holiness has shown in eschewing in a practical manner a great fundamental 'dogma' of Hinduism. We appreciate his courage at a time when other spiritual authorities, bearing the same title and enjoying the same eminence, have been fighting shy of coming to close grips with realities. They seem to know the spirit, if at all they know the letter of the Hindu Dharmastra. Wanting in self-confidence, they wistfully look for support in quarters which are dominated by an ultra-orthodox spirit. But the advisers from whom they seek guidance possess little knowledge and less responsibility.

Well, the glamour of a no-change policy cannot last long in religion as well as politics. In the first place, there is nothing in the religious texts against the admission of Non-Hindus to Hinduism. The essence of Hinduism is not only religion, it is social. It is not a mere dogma but a democracy. The correct idea about Hinduism is not deductive, but it is inductive. It is not the religion that makes the Hindu, but it is the Hindu who makes Hindu religion. It is not as if there was only one single body of revealed religious doctrine which was to govern the Hindu community to the end of time in the smallest detail. Physically, the Hindu race existed before what we call the Hindu religion came into existence, and the community which calls themselves Hindus, has perfect right to modify its religion as it likes in course of time. For the supreme purpose of Dharma is the ‘maintenance and well-being or the Dharma of the community professing it; and no community in this world can go on eternally with immutable laws and rules of conduct. In the heart of every religion, there is a small gyroscopic machine by God in the form of the instinct of self-preservation, and it never fails to react, when it finds the body of the religion and the community losing its balance and falling headlong to destruction."

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

- BOMBAY-SATURDAY, APRIL 21, 1923
  - No. 34

Notes.

The Future of Indian States: — Bombay has seldom had so many ruling Princes and their representatives assembled together as during last week. More than a score of them have come to Bombay to present their case to the Butler Committee (to enquire into the relations of the States with British India) which is leaving for England today. The people of the States have had no access to the Committee which has dealt so far only with the Chiefs. Perhaps another Committee may be shortly appointed to go into the question of the relations of the Princes with their people. The exception given to the Butler Committee has been in striking contrast to that accorded to the Simon Commission. The former has been lavishly feted in the States which it visited, while the latter in several places were confronted by black flag emblazoned with the motto “Go back Simon.” The Prince demand is briefly that they should be confirmed in their Treaty Rights. The British Indian demand is for self-government. In meeting the demand of the Princes, the British Government will have to devise some formula which will bring the -monarchical system of the States in line with the democratic spirit of the times. In refusing the demand of British India, they will have to satisfy the democratic sentiment of the world that bureaucracy is more consonant with it than self-government.

Another Conversion Case: — The Patna High Court has delivered its judgment in the case of Sita Devi against the Maharaja of Tikari. The relevant facts are that Miss Elsie Caroline Thompson, an Australian by birth, became a convert to Hinduism and married the Maharaja in 1909 according to Arya Samaj rites. In April, 1913 the Maharaja executed an annuity deed agreeing to pay her Rs. 3,000 per month for her life and the payment was charge on certain property mentioned in the deed. In July 1915, while Sita Devi was in England another deed was executed by the Maharaja whereby Rs. 15,000 per annum out of the annuity previously settled on her was settled upon her heir, successors in perpetuity. Subsequently her allowance was stopped and the present suit was brought by Sita Devi against the Maharaja for the enforcement of these two deeds executed in her favor in 1913 and 1917. The defendant, Maharaja admitted the execution of the documents mentioned in the plaint but pleaded that they were executed solely in consideration of the plaintiff being his wife and on her assurance that she would act up to the ideal of a Hindu wife. He also contended that according to Hindu Law the plaintiff being a Christian Lady could not by her alleged conversion become a Hindu and no lawful marriage could have been possible between them.

An Important Judgment: — Mr. Justice Kuilwant Sabay and Mr. Justice MacPherson delivered their judgment on Wednesday, the Associated Press has sent a bare summary. Their lordships held that the marriage was legal and valid. In regard to the first document, which granted a life annuity of Rs. 3,000 per month, they held that it was a maintenance grant made to a Hindu wife but she had forfeited it because she had been proved to have been unchaste. With regard to the second document, which was a grant of Rs. 1,250 per month, they held that this was not a maintenance grant but a deed of gift which was fully operative. Their lordships therefore gave her a decree in accordance with this document. It is obviously desirable to postpone comment on this document until the full text is available. But this much is clear that their lordships held that the conversion of a non-Hindu to Hinduism makes the latter a Hindu and eligible for a valid marriage with a born Hindu in the eye of the law. This point, so far as the Bihar is concerned, is now settled law, unless and until the Privy Council, if an appeal is carried to it, decides otherwise. If the Privy Council confirms the judgment on the ground that an Indian Court is the proper tribunal for judging the progress of social ideas among Hindus, the law will be settled for the whole of India on the lines of the Bihar judgment. Meanwhile, other High Courts in the country will be bound to take note of that judgment and if they think it necessary to differ from it, should give weighty reasons for doing so. In any case, an important first step has been taken and we may await the result with confidence.

Injunction Against Second Marriage: — We take the following from the Bombay Chronicle. “An application to restrain the husband’s second marriage was made before Mr. Justice Miran at the High Court yesterday by Harbadabai, a minor-Hindu girl. The defendant is Keshavlial Nathuall the husband, and his father and mother. The parties are Agarwal Marwari. Narbadabai stated that when she was married to the first defendant, the latter had agreed that he would not marry again during her life-time. In breach of that agreement, her husband was going to marry another girl very shortly. She, therefore, prayed that an interim injunction may be issued against her husband to restrain the marriage. His Lordship ordered a notice of motion to be issued against the defendants with a short dated summons returnable on 8th May." An agreement in restraint of marriage is void on grounds of public policy, and the decision of the High Court in this case will determine whether that rule applies to a second marriage during the life-time of the first wife.

Indian Fiscal Policy:—Opponents of self-government for India, represent that there is no real demand for it on the part of the masses and that it is wanted only by a small minority of the self-governed. The object of the Indian policy is to exploit the ignorance of the people for their own self-aggrandisement. Assuming that this is correct, is it a conclusive argument in favour of foreign rule? It cannot be denied that the present rule is essentially foreign rule, because though there has been a considerable increase of Indian personnel in high offices, policy except in comparatively minor matters is framed in England by a member of the British Government. This system has existed from the year 1858 when the Government of India was taken over by the British Crown from the East India Company. Less than twenty years after this transfer of power, the British Government imposed on the policy of industrial "laissez faire" which had been adopted by Great Britain some thirty years previously. The policy suited British industrial conditions admirably, and British economists exulted it and proclaimed it as the only sane and sensible policy for all countries. No other country, however, was deceived by its rhetoric—for it was mostly rhetoric—but India was compelled to make it the basis of her customs policy to the detriment of her own long-standing industries. This brought about a complete economic confusion and India had to start a new on altogether new lines to build up a new system on a principle whose suitability to her conditions was never tested.

The End of Laissez Faire:—One result of the recent war has been to alter the industrial conditions in Britain in relation to the rest of the world, and British statesmen and economists have been obliged by the realities of the situation, to throw their cherished policy of "laissez faire" over-board. The British Liberals who were the special custodians of this policy have completely repudiated it. The repudiation of the Industrial Inquiry Committee of the Liberal Party, drawn up by influential Liberal economists like J. M. Keynes, W. T. Layton, H. D. Henderson, Ramsay Muir and B. S. Rowntree, and endorsed by Mr. Lloyd George, Sir Henry Samuel and Mr. V. V. Dhrivasra Iyengar, Advocates, made her first appearance in court on the 17th instant and that she declared to a press representative her intention to set up practice. We congratulate Miss Anand Bai on her personal success in effecting a breach in the old barriers of the profession of law. Now that the lead has been given, there will not be women wanting in the presidency, who will be eager to become lawyers. The gift of the gab that women are admitted to possess will be an asset to them in the profession. We particularly welcome the courageous decision of the young lady as widening sphere of women's usefulness and as evincing the determination on the part of women to be satisfied with nothing less than perfect equality with men. We wish Miss Anand Bai every success in the profession of her choice.

 Widow Marriage Helping Society:—We are asked to announce that a society bearing the above name has been started by some members of the Prarthana Samaj from the new year. The object of the society is to act as a medium between widows and gentlemen intending to marry and help them. Those gentlemen and widows who wish to marry through the Society are requested to correspond with the secretary, giving all particulars. All correspondence will be kept strictly confidential and should be addressed to Secretary, Widow Marriage Helping Society, Prarthana Samaj, Girgaon, Bombay 4.
The Social Workers' Conference was started five years ago as an All-India annual function. The need for such a Conference may be briefly stated. The Social reform movement in India began as a movement of domestic reform and has practically remained so all these years. It began with the suppression of sati which was not, as is generally supposed, carried out by a mere fling of the British Government but was strongly advocated and supported by Indian intellectuals headed by the illustrious Raja Ram Mohan Roy. Ishwar Chandra Vidyasagar by a logical sequence attacked the prohibition of the remarriage of Hindu widows, and he was followed up by later reformers with campaigns against child marriages, the illiteracy of women, and against other restrictions and hardships injurious to their physical and mental development. In thus concentrating their early attention on the education and emancipation of women, the reformers were guided by a sound instinct behind which was a practical necessity. A man can face the world more boldly in the maintenance of a cherished conviction, if he was not hampered by hindrance and opposition, active or passive, in his own household. Many great reformers, it is true, have had to struggle against both domestic and popular opposition. But their reforms began to strike root in the social soil only when as the result of their perseverance the conscience of their female folk was enlisted in their support. In fact, social reform is largely the bringing round of women in a society to the realisation of the need and advantage of a given change in the established order of things. When this is done, the reform becomes part of the national heritage and may be safely left to work its way through all the different social strata. To take a current instance, every American whom we have met recently says that the repeal of the Prohibition Amendment in the constitution of the United States is out of the question as the women of America are as a body convinced of its benefit as a means for safeguarding their home life and the proper bringing-up of their children. The Indian social reform movement could only carry on hesitatingly—deal with reforms which went much beyond domestic life because it had to wait on the progress of women's education to enable it to widen its scope so as to cover a larger field. Caste and the removal of untouchability have of late years been given prominence at social conferences, partly, no doubt, because of their political significance, but largely because they lie on the frontiers of the Hindu family, and are within the sphere of influence of new ideas which have begun to remould family life.

The questions included in the category of Social Service are of a different kind. Broadly speaking, they have arisen not so much out of a felt social necessity as out of an apprehended one. The apprehension itself has been imparted, so to speak, by external influence either of Christian missions or contact with Western ideas generally. Social Service, as distinguished from Social Reform, is understood to cover the whole range of social re-adjustment to modern sanitary and social ideals. What is known as Social Reform in Europe and America is, roughly speaking, tacitly understood to be the sphere of Social Service in India. Social Workers are workers in this field and the Social Workers' Conference is intended to be a Conference of such workers. Social reform, as pointed out above, growing out of a felt necessity has progressed along a continuous line steadily expanding at each stage to higher levels. Social work, on the other hand, has necessarily been patch-work by the very condition of its origin without any organic connection between its several parts. Rural welfare, labour organisation, and sanitary housing—to take three prominent subjects—engage the attention of many workers, but they have originated without any reference to one another and are being carried much in the same way. The object of the Social Workers' Conferences is to provide a common meeting ground for workers in all parts of the field who can compare notes and devise means of bringing their activities into sympathetic correlation. The first Bombay Social Workers' Conference was held last year and the one held this year on Saturday and Sunday last at the Malabar Memorial Hall of the Seva Sadan was the second. Most of those present were men and women who are actively engaged in some kind or other of social service, and who can, therefore, speak from their own experience on the subjects taken up by the Conference. In fact, these subjects, as will be seen from the resolutions placed before the Conference, were selected because workers who have devoted themselves to them particularly, took a leading part in the proceedings. The speeches at the Conference, in consequence, were almost without exception informing and instructive and while there was plenty of light there was a total absence of heat within.

The Conference was in no sense a communal affair. Hindus, Musalmans, Parsees, Christians, Europeans and Americans were there and cooperated without the least effort in the proceedings. Women were quite, as conspicuous as men in the gathering. The Conference was thus an object-lesson in public work which all could join without distinction of caste or creed.
RANDOM THOUGHTS

'Adi-Dravidas', 'Adi-Karnatakas' and 'Adi-Hindus' are names of recent growth, which the Depressed Classes respectively of Tamilnad, Adbhra, Karnata, and Indi generally, have adopted for themselves. These names mean literally the 'original Inhabitants' of Tamilnad, Adbhra, etc., or of if you like, the 'original Dravidas'... and 'the original Hindus.' The propriety of these coinages has been called in question. But whatever one may think of it, the propriety of the old term 'Untouchable' has always been a puzzle to me. I shall show how this term 'untouchable' is untenable even from the orthodox Hindoos standpoint. Literally all 'untouchable' is one who cannot well be touched; and per sonata a 'touchable' is one who is well be touched. But we know that whether a 'so-called' touchable touches an 'untouchable' or is touched by him, something spiritually undesirable is supposed to result. It followed that both parties are mutually untouchable. That is, the propriety of calling one of them 'touchable' and the other 'untouchable'?

It might be said that the touchables are so-called because they all are (or are supposed to be) mutually touchable. If so, the untouchables also might be called touchables, as they too can be taken to be mutually touchable. It is not true as a matter-of-fact that all so-called touchables are mutually touchable, nor in fact are all so-called untouchables mutually touchable. There are gradations of untouchability—ranging, as it does, from untouchability proper to unapproachability, unapproachable, unseeable, and unmentionable.

(Cf. the Marathi euphemism—charya, the laity, &c.—of the big house—used by Brahmanes; especially when in the novels or ritually pure states, to denote the poor despised Mahar, the latter being unmentionable as such.) Unapproachability is in some form or other permeates Hindoo society through and through, being in fact the essence of the caste system. Yet it would be true to say that the line of division between the so-called touchables and the so-called untouchables is more marked than that between any two castes of either of those divisions. But the question is, if the touchables are so-called because of their mutual touchability (real or supposed)—why may not these 'untouchables' also be called touchables? because of their mutual touchability (real or supposed)? As nobody, I fear, either among the reformers or the orthodox can answer the question satisfactorily, I propose that reformers at least should, following a suggestion of Mrs. Saraswati-Chabitramma's, call all who are for observing untouchability, by the more appropriate term 'touch-en-more' while the so-called untouchables continue to be called 'Adi-Hindus'; the suppressed Clauses of the like.

Taking the other terms of this unthinkable Shastra of untouchability we may note that unapproachability denotes something mutual just like untouchability; and so if 'untouchables' cannot be used to—denote only one of two mutually unapproachable classes. But the rest, viz., 'untouchable, unapproachable' and 'unmentionable', may well stand, because it would appear that unapproachability, unseeability and unmentionability are not mutual in operation as untouchability and unapproachability are, e.g., a Nayadi is unseasleable by a Nambudiri, but the latter may well be seen (or peeped at) by the Nayadi from his duly distant concealment, without the Nambudiri being polluted thereby.

HOLKAM MILLER'S MARRIAGE

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

With regard to the Indore marriage one might let the matter pass as only another instance of the unpleasant vagaries of a certain type of Indian princes if it were not that it is difficult to refrain from expressing astonishment that this disagreeable marriage is being made a matter of rejoicing and self-congratulation among a section, let us hope, only a section of the Indore public, rather than a cause for lament and humiliation. Though the writer is neither a Hindu nor an Indian, yet his given beyond expression to have to believe that any Hindu ecclesiastic could be found to be a party in such a travesty of convention and propriety, which brings this divine and venerated religion into contempt. Moreover they do not understand that a western woman to whom countrymen polygamy is anathema, who can make a polygamous marriage with her very own, who can barter her spiritual honour by yielding an alien religion merely as a 'pike-oner' to enable her to carry out a contract, would not be considered by western society as an acquisition to its rank, and this society will wonder why her entree into their midst should be made a matter of complaisance.

Yours etc.,

A LOVE OF INDIA.

[While we share the correspondent's objection to polygamous marriage, we are unable, in view of the fact that religious conventions for marriage purposes are not unknown in European Royal families even in our own time and that no blame has been held to attach to the clergy who officiated at such conversions and marriages, to set up western opinion as a irreducible tribunal in such matters!]

BARELY CONVENTION—REPLY

Sir,

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Several objections have been raised in certain Methodist papers as well as in your valuable journal dated the 7th instant to my notice of 28th March, 1928, under the heading of "Barely Convention."]

My deduction as to the existence of colour prejudices in the Methodist Mission was not made from the fact that Sadhu Sunder Singh was not given an opportunity to preach in the English Church, but the fact of the existence of colour prejudices in Methodist Churches and Mission was only strengthened by the instance of the proceeding of the Bareilly Convention. Indian Methodists Mission employees are certainly to be excused for their attempts to defend the mission policy for the simple reason, that the majority of them of their ancestors have been converted from the depressed class of the society and have been raised to the position which Indians in the past failed to give them. Well this is namad salat, and we must be glad for their expression of loyalty. On the other hand the expression of our American brethren, especially that of the Editor of the Indian Witness, Lucknow, in recognizing the fact of the existence of colour prejudice make us all feel happy. When the disease is realized and not ignored, there is every hope of its remedy.

I need not further dilate upon the point of colour prejudice as it is an obvious fact which no sincere and truth loving man can deny. The Editor of the Indian Witness speaking of my letter in its issue of 11th April 1923 remarks as follows:—"However it may be accepted, for it is not a fact that services for English-speaking congregations have been maintained in many cities of India for decades without an Indian ever occupying the pulpit? Are we sure that colour prejudice has not consciously or unconsciously contributed to this result?" The commentative fact is that this colour prejudice is not only found among European and American in India but is so very universal in Christian countries and Christian Colonies. In an American Journal, the Messenger, Prof. Hoffert, Chicago University, writing on the Mission propaganda quotes an instance as follows:—"When a white priest had a charge of the coloured church. At his death, men of colour married his tais to its last resting place. That "niggers" should carry the coffin of a white priest caused a stir in the town." The above professor further writes that a man seeing that stir in the city, exclaimed:—"If that is Christianity, I do not want it." Instances can be multiplied, for further reference, readers are requested to consult the Travel Diary of a philosopher by Count Herrman Keyserling, London, 1925, pp. 201 and "Europe and Islam" by Sir Thomas Arnold, in Western races of the World, Vol. V.

Will the readers of the Indian Social Reformer note that the Baroda Central Conference was an Indian Conference, and it had nothing to do with Anglo-Indians, Europeans or English Church, and hence it is not an extra-ordinary thing for Indians to lead the spiritual meetings, and yet I would ask Mr. Amar Dass, who were the real heads of the proceedings of this Conference, remembering the Conference exists for the Methodist Church in India? Is not this Conference under the sole guidance of foreigners, with Indians as mere puppets?

Further the complaint has been made that I should have told the Methodists my opinion of the convention and the names of two papers are given. I am glad to have this opportunity to reply, that I have sent number of articles to both these papers but they were always considered by their Editors not fit to be published. My last articles on "Protestant against protestant" was returned with the remarks "full of erroneous thoughts." If my initials are mailed to the ordinary readers of the I. S. R., at least they should not be mailed to the respective Editors of the above papers. Mission Editors are tied by their Mission policy and as such I pity them.

They cannot and dare not to write a word against, the general policy of their Mission, amen if they be expressed through a correspondence.

The colour question is the question for whole of India, and it is only right that when Mission journals refuse to voice my feelings, I should seek the aid and medium of our other Indian non-mission journal whose policy is "I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice; I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse—I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard." I would appeal to Messrs. S. W. H. and H. S. Peters to learn this lesson of bold policy from our non-Christian, paper and fear nothing.

Bareilly Cant. Yours etc.,
S. W. H.

With reference to the above, we extract below the comment of the Indian Witness, the Methodist organ:

We are confident that our brethren who have replied to S. W. H. are correct in their insistence that colour prejudice had nothing whatever to do with the fact that Sadhu Sundar Singh spoke only in Hindustani at the Bareilly Convention. We do not feel however that we can afford to boast that there is no colour prejudice in the Church. The process of purification has not reached such a stage yet as long as the Church is continuing to reach out and lay its hands upon unregenerate men and women, it will not be able to claim complete freedom from colour prejudice, unless such prejudice shall be reduced throughout the world to much smaller prevalence than is now the case but we are convinced that the Church has long been fighting this evil and is fighting it more vigorously to-day than ever before. Colour prejudice is not a disease from which only people with white skins suffer. Like other sins it is common to all races. Some African tribes consciou of the devil's skin white man and an old story current in Japan is that when God made mankind he first put too much colour in and made an African and then failed to put in quite enough colour and made a Caucasian and that it was only after considerable experimenting that he made a real success and produced the first Japanese.

It would not be right for us to attempt to say where colour prejudice exists in the Church for that would involve passing judgments for which no man is qualified but we believe that the correspondence initiated by S. W. H. should be made to yield benefit to the Church by easing pastors of English-speaking churches and those in charge of Conventions where English and an Indian language are both need to consider whether the highest spiritual interests would not be served by a more frequent selection of Indian ministers as speakers in English services. However it may be accounted for, is it not a fact that services for English-speaking congregations have been maintained in many cities of India for decades without an Indian ever occupying the pulpit? Are we sure that colour prejudice has not consciously or unconsciously contributed to this result?

CALCUTTA CITY COLLEGE HOSTEL

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer

Sir,

Allow me to thank you for the courteous treatment my communication received at your hands; and also for the unambiguous manner in which you have expressed your disapproval of the acts of rowdism and indiscipline in the City College Hostel.

I have not, however, been able to appreciate your criticism of the attitude taken by the City College Council towards the performance of image-worship in the Hostel. You have said that “If the puja is objectionable to the Braho Proprietary, it should be objectionable whether performed in a particular building or in some other building very near to it”. It is; but for Brahmos alone. The City College authorities have never questioned the right or propriety, of Hindus performing their pujas according to their religious convictions. They only refuse to be identified with such celebrations. As I have pointed out in my previous letter, allowing the performance of Saraswati Pujah within the College precincts or within the compound of the Hostel which forms an integral part of itself does tantamount to such identification and participation. The objection is, therefore, not mere local and technical but fundamental, involving religious convictions. The resolutions of the College Council as quoted by me in my previous letter are very clear and definite on this point. They allow orthodox students of any community perfect freedom of religious celebrations but, at the same time, safeguards the fundamental principles for which the College stands.

I am constrained to observe that you have not been able to differentiate between a hostel and a rented house. The hostels have been established for exercising general supervision over the student-boarders, a supervision which no landlord ever thinks of exercising over his tenants. The relationship between the Principal and his students is, surely, different from that existing between the landlord and his tenants. Even in the latter case we know of landlords making it a condition precedent that no religious observances antagonistic to his conviction should be performed within his house; and what will we say of a tenant who after renting the house on the above condition proceeds deliberately to break it? You have pointed out that the Hostel rules “do not lay down that the Principal should not permit idolatrous Hindu festivals to be held within the Hostel”; and that “they should have and would have done so if the fundamental principles of the College authorities were opposed to such celebrations.” Permit me to say, sir, that the Hostel was meant for students of the City College—irrespective of caste or creed—and with due respect to this fact only such rules as were of universal application were framed and no mention was made of particular religious rites.

I entirely agree with you when you say that a religious movement, if it losses touch with the ancient culture of the country, must fail and wither. I, however, hold that the Brahma Samaj has throughout its history made itself continuous with the highest and the purest in the real ancient religious culture of India. It has sought to revive the Upanishadic tenets of Hindu faith. We, Brahmos, worship the Supreme Being celebrated in the Upanishads. But we never forget that the Brahma Samaj has its universal aspect as well. Its development in Hindu India is bound to be peculiarly Hindu; but its development in Christian and Moslem countries must perforce be coloured by their own tradition and culture.

The Indian Renaissance may be “jealous about conserving every particle of the past which has the slightest cultural value”; and this conservative impulse may “spring out of the instinct of national self-preservation.” But renaissance is not mere conservatism; it brings new knowledge and rejects whatever is found untenable in the light of its new ideals, nor can every rite or ritual be regarded as full of character and cultural values simply because it is old. National self-preservation is necessary; but much more necessary is national uplift and development. No nation has ever progressed by self-preservation alone. Every nation has to keep itself in close touch with the thoughts prevailing in the world; it has to reform, conserve and adapt in accordance with the requirements of its regeneration.

As I have sought to explain the attitude of the College authorities in this letter I shall be highly obliged if you kindly publish it in the next issue of your paper and send a copy to the above address.

Yours,

Amitakumar Sin, 14-4-26. Member, City College Council.

VILLAGE RECONSTRUCTION IN GUJARAT.*

There were abnormally heavy rains over the whole of North Gujarat in the end of July last. This fall of huge quantities of water was spread over the four closing days of July, and measured from 30 inches to about 69 inches. The normal rainfall in this north part of Gujarat is only 25 to 30 inches spread over three months of the rainy season. The deluge of water had to find its way some how or other to the sea. But the streams and small rivers that drain the country side were all found too small, too shallow and narrow for the unexpected task put on them, and could not carry the immense quantities of water in the short space of four days. The natural result was that they all overflowed their banks and submerged the scores of villages situated on their banks. In many cases people of such villages had to run away for their life, leaving all their belongings behind, and seek shelter on higher ground. Fortunately big rivers like the Mahi and Sabarmati did not overflow their banks; they could contain the immense volumes of water that were thrown in them. But small rivers like the Meshwa, Vatra, Shedi, and Vishwamitra were simply huge torrents rushing past at a terrific speed destroying villages, uprooting age-old trees, breaching railway banks and road-bridges that came in their way, and devastating the whole country. The damage done was heavy beyond calculation and stupidized the people concerned.

Besides the damage due to floods in riparian villages there was the damage caused by collapsing of houses in all other towns and villages situated on higher lands in the affected area. The heavy rains were accompanied by very heavy South and West winds, whereby the rainwater was pumped into the joints of brick or stone walls, as if by millions of syringes at a time, thus weakening the cementing mud or mortar, and bringing down walls (especially on the South and West sides) and houses. Thousands of houses thus came down involving their owners in a loss, aggregating to lakhs and crores of rupees.

IMMEDIATE HELP.

The news of this disaster spread like wild fire all over the country. It moved the whole country in a way it had rarely done before, and every one was moved to do his bit to help the distressed people of Gujarat. Bombay, the greater part of the trade of which is in the hands of Gujrati-speaking people, not only sent money in thousands and lakhs, but sent men 'in hundreds to render what personal assistance they could. The immediate help rendered by Bombay and other towns was wonderful whether it was of the supply of cloth, grain, cooking utensils, eatables or blankets. Though means of communication were mostly cut off, helpers from outside ran to the ruined villages in whatever way they could by wading through miles of muddy water, or in boats, or by bullock carts. Gujaratis will remember for many a year to come the regular scramble made by benevolent people from outside to carry help to them in their hour of great need.

CHEAP GRAIN AND SEED SHOPS.

The one great relief that was given by the relief organisations to the distressed people was by opening shops for selling grain and seed at cheap rates, varying from 10 to 25 per cent. below cost. Lack of acreage of land had to be resown, and huge quantities of stocks of grain that had been carried away or submerged and made unfit for human consumption, had to be replaced. If all this work had been left to the ordinary market dealers, the prices of food stuffs would have risen considerably, land would have remained unsown and the disaster would have been doubly ruinous. But by spreading out a net-work of the Samitis' relief shops, the unofficial organisers were able to establish a sort of control over the market, without any compulsion or legislation, for a period of three to four months, when the worst period was tided over. From the cash loans advanced to cultivators by Government and by their wages, they were able to purchase their seed and grain from these shops, and thus they were set on their legs once more.

REBUILDING OF HOUSES.

But the next important question of rebuilding of houses was kept back till the end of the rainy season, i.e., till the end of October. The relief organisations, non-official and official, were planning in their minds how to begin it, but they had no time to go into the details thereof till the more urgent necessity of seed and grain was satisfied. Once they were free from that work, they took upon themselves independently of each other of damage to house property, to estimate the amount of total damage. These were compared and laid before Government with a view to see in what way relief could be given, and how much charity was needed for rehousing the poor resourceless people in villages, and how much money was necessary to be given as loan on easy terms to people for rehousing. Roughly speaking, a crore and a third was the estimated damage, about twenty lacs were needed to be given in charity to poor and indebted people, and about a crore in loans on low interest (3 to 6 per cent.) repayable in ten years maximum by instalments. This loan money was found by Government from the large famine fund, which is a cash reserve fund, available at short notice for purposes of famine relief, but diverted in this exceptional case of flood relief for an equally legitimate public purpose. The large amount of money required to be given in charity (20 Lacs) for housing of the poor, was found partly by Government and partly from the public funds, chiefly by the Bombay Central Fund. The loan money is being distributed at present, and reconstruction work is fast progressing. Wages of artisans and labourers in their building trade have risen, and the months of April and May 1928 will see hundreds and thousands of houses going up. But even with all the available assistance coming forward, a certain proportion of the houses will remain unbuilt for various reasons, in the details of which we need not get.

CHANGE OF VILLAGE SITES.

Villages situated on the banks of small rivers had learnt a very hard lesson during the flood. People of scores of such villages had not only lost their everything, but had to run away for dear life, with their cattle, to higher places. When they had recovered from the first shock, they began to talk of shifting their whole village to more elevated sites, so as to be beyond the reach of further equally high floods. In many cases higher sites were found and purchased either by private negotiation or by recourse to compulsory clauses of the Land Acquisition Act. But it must be said that notwithstanding the Government help for acquisition and purchase many of the new land being found for the villagers, many villages have not taken advantage of the facilities given. Vested interests, specially the owners of substantial houses that were left un-affected by the flood, opposed the change and prevailed in many cases. Conservatism too was responsible for not shifting in several cases.

WELLS DESTROYED.

One disastrous effect of the flood was the complete destruction of village drinking wells. Wells in the alluvial soil of Gujarat are not founded on rock, but on soft sand, with the flood water several feet on the top of a well, and the bottom of the well was on unstable foundation like sand, the masonry wells collapsed like card houses, and in place of a fine-built well fifty or sixty feet deep you had left a hole or a pit only ten or twelve feet deep. Not only were they filled up by sand and earth but the masonry thereof crumbled like pebbles and made its own grave. Hundreds of such wells have been destroyed, village wells used for drinking and also those used for field irrigation. No relief from any source for repairing and renovating these wells has yet been given or is expected to be given, except for the drinking wells of depressed classes or untouchables. The Bombay Central Fund has allotted Rs. 53,000 for this work and work is in progress, whereby poor untouchables will be able to have a large proportion of their damaged wells restored by the next rainy season.

PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS.

Public buildings like Dharmashalas, schools, libraries, temples, mosques, village chowras (or chavdi) have also been destroyed in hundreds. Nobody has been able to make a complete census of this loss, but there is no doubt that it has been tremendous. Fortunately the Central Fund has been able to set apart for the work of repairing public Dharmashalas and schools and libraries a sum of Rs. 75,000 from which grant the work will be commenced shortly. But it is far from expected that the work will be finished in this working season. It will have to be carried on in the next season, i.e., after the next rains.

COMMITTEE CO-OPERATION.

It should be said with satisfaction and pride that in all the relief work that was done after the flood, there was good co-operation between the non-official workers, chiefly members of the Gujarat Congress Committee, the Bombay Central fund, and Government officials. In the first few months of the work the Gujarat Committee was much in evidence. It was that Committee, headed by Mr. Vallabhbhai J. Patel, which commenced and organized relief operation on a large scale, and set the ball rolling. The Government officers headed by Sir Chimanlal Mehta, thereafter toured in the affected areas, gained first hand knowledge of the effects of the flood and planned to give liberally out of the Provincial revenues as Tagavi to cultivators and from the famine Insurance fund for housing purposes.

SPECIAL SOCIAL SERVICE CONFERENCE.

The Bombay Social Service Conference held its second session on Saturday in the Malabar Memorial Hall, Harvey Road, Bombay, and was largely attended. In the absence of Mr. Naidi who has been away from Bombay on account of her daughter's illness, Mr. K. Natarajan was voted to the chair.

The Government helped by Sir Chimanlal Mehta, thereafter toured in the affected areas, Miss B. A. Engineer, Chairman of the Reception Committee, in welcoming the delegates and giving the history of the movement said the first conference was held in Bombay in 1925 under the presidency of Sir Lalubhai Samaldas. Its origin was this. In 1923 the fourth session of the All-India Social Conference met in Bombay and on its conclusion its reception committee decided to form itself into a new association, known as the Bombay Council of Social Workers, with Sir Lalubhai as its President, with a view to strengthening the All-India Social Service League and keeping up its activities in the different parts of the Presidency. "This Council of Social Workers," Miss Engineer said, "aims at providing frequent opportunities to the social workers to meet and study important social problems, surveying the field of social work in the city and collecting information of the work that is being actually done by organizing conferences of the kind we are holding to-day. It is under the auspices of this Council of Social Workers that this second session of the Bombay Conference has been organised. At the last conference, Mr. Joshi, the chairman of the Reception Committee, had expressed the hope that similar Councils would be formed in important places like Surat, Ahmedabad and Poona, and the Bombay Council would develop into a provincial body, but that hope has not been realised yet and till that is done, it is not possible even to attempt a social survey of any city or town."

Programme of Work.

In 1925 the Conference was invited to hold its second session in Poona, and the invitation was accepted, but for some reason or other, it could not be organised then and the Executive Committee of the Council decided to hold it in Bombay this year. There are different views about the objects of such a conference. Some people think that it should be a deliberative body. We hold the view that its main object should be to educate public opinion with a view to concerted action being taken in regard to social problems and also to provide facilities for discussing methods and principles of social work. I admit it is too early yet to judge whether this is the correct view, but experience gained in this direction will serve for our future guidance. At the last conference held in Bombay the subjects taken up for discussion were housing, unemployment, adult education, untouchability, prison reform and village sanitation. This time the subjects selected were prostitution, village reconstruction, prohibition, unemployment and primary education, subjects equally important and demanding immediate attention. We are glad to say that as many as 33 different Associations have joined the Conference this year. This in itself is a great encouragement to the social workers. It is said that the ideal of social service is as old as humanity. Some 26 years back the gospel of social service in Bombay or for the matter of that in India, was but little known and less preached. It is only in recent years that a civilising wave, if I may be allowed to say so, has spread over the country, and social service has now come to be recognised as an essential part of our every day religion. It is a matter of great satisfaction that the spirit of social service is now abroad in this great city, and that our young men and women are becoming more and more imbued with a desire to be of use to those that need help. There are many aspects of social service and there is an immense field for social workers, but let it be borne in mind that the one essential element of true social service is a keen and live sympathy with the suffering humanity and an earnest desire to ameliorate its lot. True social service transcends all limitations of colour, caste, or creed. It is an offering made to humanity; in all humility, in the spirit of an ardent devotees without any expectation of reward or gain. Self-advertisement and self-gloration do not find any place in the code of a true worker.

Mr. K. J. Dubash, General Secretary, read messages of sympathy with the Conference, some of them being from Mrs. Naiden, who expressed the hope that the keynote of their deliberations and schemes of social service would be love, vision, faith and sacrifice.

President's Address.

Mr. K. Natarajan in his inaugural address pledged at the outset that there should be co-ordination in the work of this Conference and that of the National Social Conference. The difference between the two seemed to be that while one of them dealt with questions that touched upon the susceptibilities of a sect or creed, the other handled problems which had no reference to any sect or creed. That being the case the Conference of social workers would have a separate existence for some time to come. Proceeding, Mr. Natarajan said, in India at present there were several movements rising, but there was no co-ordination among them, and the result was that each of the movements was developing as a sort of revolt against the existing order of things. Take for instance the women's movement. He was impressed by the fact that among the most prominent women workers there was a bitterness of feeling against society as personified in men as the authors of all the troubles of women. He put it that if women were to lay all their difficulties at the door of men, men would also say that women were the source of their difficulties. He urged that this and other social questions should not be approached in a spirit of bitterness and revolt, but should be considered in a spirit of charity, toleration and reverence. It should be remembered that old customs and manners that had come down to them must have originally come into existence owing to the conditions of life which then prevailed at the time, and he thought that before trying to change them by a revolutionary method they should make themselves sure that the changes they sought to make were of a higher and a better kind. He concluded by suggesting that the authorities of the University should arrange for the students of their School of Sociology now and then to go out in the different parts of the city as social workers and in that way acquire practical experience of the problems they were studying.

The Conference adjourned to Sunday, when resolutions were considered.

RESOLUTIONS.

The Conference met again on Sunday last when several resolutions were passed. The resolution that this Conference lends its whole-hearted support to the Marriage Bill of Rai Bahadur Harbilas Sarda as revised by the Select Committee was moved by the Chair.

II.—PROSTITUTION.

(i) (a) This Conference considers that the brothel is the chief ally of the procurer and the pimp, and without it, it would be practically impossible for them to carry on their nefarious trade. It further enables them to ill-treat, torment and to exert an overpowering influence over their victims. (b) This Conference while expressing its gratification at the action taken by the Government of Bombay and the Bombay Legislative Council for passing the Bombay Prevention of Prostitution Act of 1923 and the Children Act of 1924 is of the opinion that the evils of commercialised vice will not be adequately tackled unless (i) brothels are made illegal and (ii) steps are taken to remove the tolerated vice district in the City. (c) This Conference recognises at the same time the material difficulties in the way of suppressing brothels immediately. It, therefore, recommends that the policy of closing the brothels should be carried out by gradual stages, within a period of three or five years. It is further of opinion that the existence of brothels in crowded residential localities and on the main tram routes and in the vicinity of schools, is detrimental to the morals of young persons in so far as it leads to the immature arousal of the sex interest in children and young persons. Moreover it gives a glaring gratuitous advertisement to the haunts of commercialised vice. (d) Therefore this Conference recommends that Government be moved to take action in this matter by introducing necessary legislation and also to deport all foreigners openly practising prostitution in the City. (ii) This Conference also recognises the necessity for imparting knowledge about the facts of life (sex hygiene) and the intimate relationship between Prostitution and venereal disease. (iii) This Conference advocates the abolition of certain customs such as Devadasis which lead to this evil. Proposed by:—Mr. H. W. Bryant. Seconded by:—Dr. Miss Jerbanoo Mistry, L. M. & S.

III.—INTERNATIONAL TRAFFIC IN WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

This Conference records its appreciation of the work of the League of Nations in appointing a Body of Experts on Traffic in women and children. The Report recently made public of their investigation in 23 countries is a revelation of the scope and extent of the Traffic in the West and of its relatedness to Eastern Countries. This Conference records its satisfaction that 23 out of 43 countries who are members or non-members of the League of Nations have abolished licensed houses. In view of the world significance of this evil, and the necessity for co-operative measures to root it out, this Conference earnestly requests the League of Nations to extend the Enquiry of the Special Body of Experts to India. Proposed by:—M. Kanji Dwarkadas, M.A. Seconded by:—Dr. P. N. Darnawala, Bar-at-Law.

IV.—VILLAGE WELFARE.

(a) This Conference is of the opinion that with a view to attain effective village reconstruction it is desirable that life in every village should be gradually ameliorated and advanced through such agencies as Village Planning Societies, Village Social Service Leagues and Co-operative Literary and other Societies and Leagues. (b) A net-work of such Societies and Leagues should be spread out all over the Presidency controlled by one Central Board so that rural life might become a unit in the process of the growth and development of our Indian Nationality thus yielding the greatest good of the Country from every utilitarian point of view. (c) This Conference commends to the notice of the public and Government the experiment in Rural Welfare Work carried on by the Deputy Commissioner, Gurgaon District, for the last six years, and suggests that experiments on similar lines be instituted in consultation with prominent rural workers in the Presidency. Proposed by:—Mr. A. V. Thakkar, L. C. E. Supported by:—Mr. H. K. Dadachanji.

V.—UNEMPLOYMENT.

"This Conference urges that effective measures be taken for relieving unemployment by the following amongst other methods. (a) By organizing efforts so as to help boys towards the end of elementary and secondary grades of education to make a choice between further training and entering on a practical career (suitable to the brains and means of the boys) so as to provide for suitable bifurcation, by means of vocational training, at the right stage and prevent overcrowding in the literary, legal and medical institutions and professions. (b) By introducing and developing cottage industries in every District. (c) By establishing employment exchanges in industrial centres, launching schemes of unemployment insurance, framing programmes of public relief works for periods of trade depression and other measures." Proposed by:—Mr. F. L. Bharucha. Seconded by:—Dr. T. C. Khudawala.

VI.—PROHIBITION.

(c) This Conference appreciates the declaration of the Bombay Government for total prohibition as the goal of its excise policy and urges that with that end in view all intoxicating drink and drug shops be abolished, inspite of financial loss caused thereby, as early as practicable. (d) This Conference draws public attention to the still existing menace of the liquor traffic in western India, to the large proportion of hard-earned money spent on liquor by the working classes, and to the close relation obtaining in so many cases between alcohol and prostitution as well as to other evils moral and social and appeals to the public to work in every direction to urge upon Government the necessity of carrying out of the above policy and so remove this great evil and social temptation. (b) This Conference, while recording its gratification at the fifty per cent. reduction in the consumption of country liquor in the Bombay Presidency during the past five years, urges upon the Government the imperative and immediate necessity of embodying in a definite statute an uninterrupted continuation of rationing as would yield a five per cent. annual decrease in the liquor supplied to the people of towns and ten per cent. to those of rural areas.

(c) This Conference also urges upon the Government of India the necessity of bringing its policy in regard to foreign liquor in line with the policy of prohibition in the Presidency until such supplies are terminated. Proposed by: — Mr. D. D. Gilder, Seconded by: — Mr. W. E. D. Ward, B. A.

VII. — PRIMARY EDUCATION.

"This Conference urges that in view of the profound state of illiteracy existing at present throughout the length and breadth of this Presidency and having regard to the far-reaching evil consequences thereof on the social, moral, political and economic life of the people, effective measures be taken by the Government of Bombay as well as by all the Municipalities, local boards and other public bodies concerned to introduce and spread free and compulsory primary education in the whole of the Presidency without any further delay." Proposed by: — Prof. V. G. Rao. Seconded by: — Mr. Keshav Desai.

VIII. — LIBRARY MOVEMENT.

"In view of the necessity of providing facilities for acquiring cultural and general information to the public and of preventing such persons as have received only a little primary education from lapsing into illiteracy, this Conference urges the Government, Municipalities and Local Boards to start public reading rooms and libraries in towns and large villages where they are not at present sufficiently in existence, especially, circulating Libraries for groups of villages in close vicinity, and to encourage private institutions and public efforts in organising reading rooms and libraries by giving liberal grants-in-aid for the purpose." Proposed by: — Mr. S. V. Phadnis, B. A. Seconded by: — Mrs. K. Shaff Tsyabji.

IX. — LEGAL AID.

"This Conference approves of the aims and objects of the Bombay Legal Aid Society, which is doing very useful work in rendering legal aid to such persons as are not destitute of money, seeks relief in a Court of Law, and appeals to the public in general and the members of the legal profession in particular to give their support to the Society in all possible ways." Proposed by: — Mr. N. H. Pandya. Seconded by: — Mr. B. G. Kher.

NOTES.
The Bombay Mills Strike—Contrary to the indications at the end of last week, the strike of mill workers in Bombay city has rapidly extended and on Friday, the 27th instant, practically all the mills had ceased working. The sinister feature of the present strike is the manifestation of a spirit of aggression which was so conspicuously absent in previous strikes during the last eight years. The originating cause of the strike was the introduction in a few mills of the reform recommended by the Textile Tariff Board, namely that each worker should mind his own interest and sentiments of his workers, the worker too must be absolved from the corresponding obligation. The immediate cause is that the Indian employer class needs to be educated to its responsibilities as much as the workmen. Government and the public cannot look on with indifference on the situation. Nearly 150,000 men are out of work, they are bitter and already there are signs that they are not likely to confine themselves to pacific methods. Mahatma Gandhi's gospel of non-violence might have had something to do with the peaceful character of previous strikes. That gospel has now worn thin. The situation is fraught with serious danger. The worst of it is, as in politics, the reactionary policy of people in power, has undermined the influence of moderate leaders, who find themselves superseded by others who favour extreme courses.

Economics of Khaddar.—This is a book of 220 pages by Mr. Richard B. Gregg (Ganesh & Co., Madras, Rs. 1-5-0) which we strongly recommend to serious readers as a model of scientific treatment of a popular subject. This is not to express agreement either with every step in the author's argument or every one of his conclusions. The book deserves a more detailed notice which will be given in a subsequent issue. Mr. Gregg has had seven years of practical work and study in industrial and labour problems in America (much of it in cotton mills) and he has devoted nearly three years in India to the study of the Khojard movement. With his main conclusion that hand-spinning and weaving is the most suitable side occupation for the rural and agricultural population during seven or eight months in the year when they have practically little to do, there will be very general agreement. If the movement from the start has not claimed more than this, it would have encountered very little opposition. It is the well-meant attempt to push khadder forward, and that as the Khojar Association would support, and that as the university have come forward to continue the Hostel, and five students and Dr. Jagmohanda Jagadamba would have encountered very little opposition. Much of this prejudice has now evaporated and the promoters of the movement too have considerably moderated their claims for Khojard. To Mr. Maganialal Gandhi, whose sudden death at Patna has saddened many who had known him personally, belongs the credit of placing the new movement of Khaddar on a scientific and rational basis. His untimely death is a great loss to the movement.

A Touching Tribute—Mahatma Gandhi writing of Maganial in Young India pays a touching tribute to his many great qualities. He says:—"He was my hands, my feet and my eyes. The world knows so little of how much my so-called greatness depends upon the incessant toil and drudgery of silent, devoted, able and pure workers, men as well as women. And among them all Maganial was to me the greatest, the best and the purest. As I am envisioning these lines, I hear the sobs of the widow bewailing the death of her dear husband. Little does she realise that I am more widowed than she. And but for a living faith in God, I should become a raving maniac for the loss of one who was dearer to me than my own sons, who never once deceived me or failed me, who was a personification of industry, who was the watchdog of the Ashram in all its aspects—material, moral and spiritual. His life is an inspiration for me, a symbol of the dignity of the country and the supremacy of the moral law. In his own life he proved visibly for me not for a few days, not for a few months, but for twenty-four long years, now alas all too short—that service of the country, service for humanity and self-realisation or knowledge of God are synonymous terms."

A Hindu Ladies’ Hostel for Bombay:—While commenting on the last report of the Bombay Presidency Social Reform Association, we remarked in these columns that it was a great pity that the Association intended to close down the Hindu Ladies’ Hostel which it was conducting for some years, for want of adequate financial support, and that as the Hostel was supplying a great need, we expressed the hope that the Association would see its way to continue it. We are glad to learn that some ladies realising that a Hindu Women Students’ Hostel is a great necessity have come forward to continue the Hostel. The particulars available are as follows:—A Committee with Mrs. Jayakar as President, Lady Jagunohandas and Mrs. D. N. Sirur as Vice-Presidents and Dr. K. Kasabhi Novrange as Secretary, and five other members, has undertaken to look after its management. It is proposed to transfer the Hostel to a better locality, preferably New Gandevi side, but until a suitable house is secured, the Committee proposes to utilise the same building recently in the occupation of the Hostel at Thakurdwar. Students seeking admission to the Hostel are requested to communicate with Dr. K. Kasabhi Novrange, Labour Road, Gandevi, Bombay, who will be pleased to supply all the necessary information. From the above it is clear that the New Managing Committee has taken over the Hostel from the hands of the old committee rendered by these ladies to save the hostel from extinction will be appreciated by women students as well as the general public. Further developments of the Hostel will be watched with great interest.

Indian States Manifesto:—On Friday the 19th instant, on the eve of the Butter Committee’s departure to England, an important resolution was passed at a Conference held in Bombay, at which 35 ruling Princes and as many representatives of States were present. The resolution is in the form of a manifesto containing declarations regarding the policy of Indian States towards constitutional reform in British India and in their own territories. The most important of these are that the Princes undertake to the moral and material progress of their subjects the advantages resulting from an equitable adjustment of fiscal and economic issues between the States and British India; that they express their determination to ensure the rule of law in their States; and that they express their sympathy with the aspirations of Association, which they regard as legitimate. The first undertaking is not happily worded. It conveys the impression that the duty of the Princes to advance the moral and material progress of their subjects is to a certain extent contingent on the equitable adjustment of their fiscal relations with British India. The importance which the Princes attach to the “rule of law” as distinguished from personal rule which they are supposed to favour, is significant of the change of outlook which has come over many of them. Apart from these, the mere fact that the Princes, by adopting these resolutions in open Conference, have voluntarily invited the judgment of British India and the world at large on the future conduct of their administration, is of the happiest augury.

The Tikari-Sita Devi Case:—It is understood that there will be an appeal to the Privy Council against the judgement of the Patna High Court in the Sita Devi-Tikari case, which we noticed last week. The result of the appeal will be awaited with great interest throughout the country.

The Late Lord Sinha’s Fortune:—The Bihar Herald understands on good authority that the late Lord Sinha left about a crore and a half. The eldest son, the heir to the barony, has been left Rs. 55 lakhs, two other sons twenty lakhs each, another son and Lady Sinha a monthly allowance of rupees four thousand and each of his three daughters one lakh and the same sum, to charity. The entire accumulation, says our contemporary, was from his income at the bar. During his official career, he made no savings whatever.
INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, APRIL 28, 1928.

SERVANTS OF THE PEOPLE SOCIETY.

We have received a copy of the report of the Servants of the People Society of Lahore for the year 1927-28. Appended to it is a summary of the work done by the Society since its inception in 1920. The Society was started by Lala Lajpat Rai on the model of the Servants of India Society of Poona, in connection with the Tilak School of Politics which he had founded a year earlier. The school was subsequently merged in the National College, and when the college ceased to exist, the educational work of the Society has been confined to arranging lectures on different political and social topics. The main activities of the Society now consist of Social Service work and political propaganda. "The idea from the very first has been," writes Lala Lajpat Rai, "to produce a kind of national missionaries whose sole object would be to devote the whole of their time to national service, in a spirit of service, without hankering for promotion or for furthering their worldly interests. They are contented with the allowance given to them by the Society, and they live a life of comparative poverty, which is a noble ideal by itself. They do their work in a spirit of sacrifice and service and in their own way, they are a kind of beacon light and example to others." There are six life members, besides the Founder-Director, Lala Lajpat Rai, seven members under training, two probationers, one assistant, and four associates. Life members must be graduates of an Indian or foreign university or have some equivalent educational qualifications. They get during their training from Rs. 50 to Rs. 60 a month with an additional sum of Rs. 10 if they are married men. After training a member starts on Rs. 75, is allowed Rs. 90 a month after five years, and Rs. 100 after ten years. If married he starts on Rs. 100 and gets Rs. 110 after five years. A monthly allowance of Rs. 10 per child, runs a rule, shall be granted up to four children. In addition to these allowances, house rent from Rs. 25 to Rs. 40 a month is allowed. The lives of members are insured for Rs. 4000 and the premisses are paid by the Society. The rules provide for privilege, casual and sick leave for the members. On the whole, the Servants of the People Society's scale is on more liberal lines than that of the Servants of India Society, though we have not seen any recent rules of the latter to-day.

Besides the sphere of religious institutions, observes Lala Lajpat Rai, the Servants of India Society of Poona and the Servants of the People Society of Lahore are the only organised missionary societies engaged in general national service. The Sabarmati Ashram also trains workers, but the atmosphere there is semi-monastic, and hand spinning and weaving with farming are the main features of the training imparted in that institution. The Lahore Society, like its Poona prototype seems exclusively to be intended for men. Work for and among the depressed classes forms a large part of the work of the Servants of the People Society in the Central Punjab, the report says, the depressed classes uplift movement has created a wonderful awakening and has assumed all the characteristics of a mass movement. This it adds, is in a large measure due to the whirlwind propaganda carried on by the Achut Uddhar Mandal, the special committee for the elevation of the untouchables, appointed by the Society. The Society's mission strictly excludes religious proselytism. The Mandal's propaganda includes village tours, magic lantern lectures and practical efforts to relieve Balmiki, the sweeper class, from the burden of forced labour for officials and non-officials. Jathas or huge organised processions play an important part in rousing enthusiasm both among the depressed and the higher classes for the work of the missionaries. Their impressive march through numerous villages, it is claimed, engenders mass awakening among the people. Dewars or conferences are another effective means of creating interest in the cause. In the section on education, it is interesting to read that the Society does not favour special schools for untouchable children. "At Batala," says the report, "we tried the experiment of maintaining a special school for the sweepers. For a time it went on very well and was a great success but eventually it had to be closed. From the educational point of view, as from the point of view of removing untouchability the separate school is an unsound proposition." This has been our own view and we are glad to see it confirmed by the Society as the result of its experience with separate schools. To instil into the minds of children the idea that they are a class apart and can attend only institutions especially meant for them, is a great obstacle to the emancipation of the depressed classes. The Society, therefore, concentrates its efforts on getting children of these classes admitted into the ordinary schools, and we are pleased, but not surprised, to learn that its efforts are being attended with success and that hundreds of boys are being admitted into such schools. The Hindustan public, except in a few very narrow groups, is by now quite convinced of the necessity of removing the restrictions upon the untouchables, and requires only a slight pressure from men of influence to waive its objections to their free admission to public places. If we may make a suggestion to the Society, it is to devote more attention to the education of girls of the depressed classes than to those of boys. One educated girl as a factor of social amelioration is equal to a score of young men. The Society rightly lays stress on the drinking habits of these classes as one of the chief causes which keep them depressed. "Rural reconstruction and labour organization are other subjects which claim the attention of the Society. It runs a Girls' School in Bhavnagar, and maintains a circulating Library of books for women in Lahore. The Society conducts the English weekly, People, and the Urdu daily Bande Mataram both published at Lahore.
RANDOM THOUGHTS.
(By 'RATIONALIST'.)

"Widow-remarriage" presents another case where reformers should remember to reform their phraseology. We have been using that term where we ought to say "widow-marriage," simply. We might correctly say "widow-remarriage" when we mean the second (or third etc.) marriage of a widow who has already been married once as a widow. Otherwise we ought to say either 'woman-remarriage' or 'widow-marriage' only. What we have been doing is to make a confusion between the two as grammarians say—by taking a bit of both the expressions.

The same holds for similar other expressions like 'remarried widow,' where 're-married woman' or 'widowed woman' is meant.

On the occasion during last Christmas at Madras the Editor of this journal happened to remark on a certain incident of Maratha history. Having read it in a Marathi paper years before, I later had occasion to use it in a local campaign against untouchability. The following account is a measure one based on that in the Asam magazine:

At Kalambi, a village not far from Miraj the capital of one of the Southern Maharatta States, lived Shidnak the Mahar (i. e. a member of an untouchable caste of that name in Maharashtra) looking after a troop of fighting men drawn from his casta. It was Shahu Maharaj, grandson of Shivaji, who conferred on Shidnak the Inamari or hereditary chieftship of that village, which continues in his line to this day. A grandson of this Shidnak was present with his troop at the battle of Kharda in the year 1795 A. D. The Mahar captain had pitched his camp alongside those of other Sardars of the Maratha army. Some of them taking offence at the proximity of the Mahar encampment to their own, carried their complaint to Savai Madhavrao the Peshwa. But the Peshwa gave his decision in favour of the Mahar. In the battle that followed the Mahar troop conducted itself most gallantly. It was rewarded for its part in it with due honours and an Inam. Sardar Patvardhan used to treat the Mahar troop with great respect. And at Poona every year on the occasion of the Dasara ceremony this troop had the honour of leading the parade procession.

I have reproduced the story here not only that it may be better known to readers of the Reformer, but that I might know from the Editor of it the source as I got from, if he remembers it. In Telang's essay on the Marathi Chronicles which is appended to Ranade's Rise of the Maratha Power, an attempt is made to indicate on the strength of a number of anecdotes gleaned from Marathi historical records how a self-directed society such as that of Maharashtra in the days of its independence tends to use the political initiative it possesses to outgrow its cramping social inheritance, or at any rate how the exigencies of an active political and military life may galvanize for a time even the encrusted bones of a too conservative society. The incidents drawn upon in the essay might be mere 'straws', and Telang himself appears none too confident in drawing his conclusions from them. Yet it is certainly an optimistic note which he strikes on the whole with regard to the episodes he has discussed; as though "his hopeful draw" was his verdict for the self-governing Hindu Society of Maharashtra in its struggle against the inertia of blind custom. Be that as it may, I should think that among those episodes none might have more fittingly been included than the one narrated above. Indeed I have an impression that Mr. Natarajan referred his knowledge of this episode to his reading of Telang's essay. But when, come back from Madras, I went over its pages, I was much surprised not to find it there.

Well, I may add that the present holder of the Kalamari Inam, Sardar Khandnak, Rajbah Isamdar, appears to be a very enlightened and public-spirited gentleman, to judge from a letter of his which appeared during August last in Bakshirat Bidrat or "Outcast India," a Marathi fortnightly edited by Dr. Ambekar. If Mr. Khandnak has in his possession any striking facts about the history of his ancestors likely to be of interest to students of Hindu Social history, and the Editor of the Reformer could find room for them in his paper, many a Reformer reader, I am sure, would be indebted to them both.

Mr. N. Lakshmanan writes:—Sir Edwin Arnold in his preface to The Light of Asia says that the extravagances which disfigure the record and practice of Buddhism are to be referred to that inevitable degradation which priesthhod always inflict upon great ideas committed to their charge. It is however interesting to note that The Reformer discarded long ago as untenable the view that a selfish priesthood is responsible for all the evils afflicting the Hindu or any other society. The rank and file among the present-day reformers are not for taking such a stance and detached view of the role of the priest in the evolution of society. The priest is not to be tolerated even to play the part of a fossil. According to this school of thought the right method of raising the status of the untouchables is not to invest them with the "sacred thread." As for allowing them to recite, "Gayatri," well, this prayer is available to all in English transliteration and Post Tagore in one of his lectures on "Personality" delivered in America has enabled every seeker after truth to treasure this ancient prayer as the common possession of mankind.

A SILENT WORKER.

A 'widows' pădă' jeeringly so-called in those bygone days is now transformed into 'A women's University.' And what was the power one may ask which has effected this mighty change during living memory of many? Simple is the question and equally simple is the answer. It was no wizard's power that wrought this change. Pure, simple, whole-hearted, honest and straightforward work and faith in that work—that is the key of Prof. Karve's life mission at Hinagd. Gifted persons and industrious workers are there, but to few it is given to have the good fortune of seeing their ideas inhabiting healthy forms and shapes and running into working institutions. The task set before himself by Prof. Karve was by no means easy and its achievement by no means cheap. Nor is the work so far done by him nearing its end, much remains to be undertaken and much more is yet to be worked out. All the same, the base work being the most arduous of the task has been effected so very ably and selflessly, that the successors in this field of work will have henceforward a comparatively smooth sailing. When political work was regarded as the only work worth the name, when workers in the social field were styled as 'effeminate incapable', Prof. Karve commenced his campaign in the neglected corner of a widows' institution. How can one express and describe this day, Hindu society's angle of vision towards its widows—an object of divine displeasure and social persecution of a varied type? A widow—especially when she was childless was no more than a domestic drudge with no personal rights and pleasures of her own. 'Remarriage for widows' was looked upon with great disfavour. To dare to do any such thing in those days was to bear social and orthodox estracism of a virulent character. It was at such a time that Prof. Karve showed uncommon courage and fearlessness by marrying a widow, who has now proved herself to be a fitting and worthy partner in the high mission of his life i.e., regeneration of women and elevation of widows. Mrs. Karve also is a single-minded and strenuous worker in the aharam at Hinagd. Prof. Karve's words of wisdom and deeds of valour left no space for philosophical speculation.

The first and foremost aspect of Prof. Karve's life that strikes even a comparative stranger and which is well-known to his friends and colleagues is that he is a silent worker without the limelight of advertisements. When school-master is abroad along with his brother-in-arms the newspaper, one would have expected Prof. Karve to figure before the world as a mighty worker in the women's cause, trumpeting his selflessness, patriotism and what not. But we know, he has done no such thing. Public opinion—that shadowy, elusive and unsubstantial thing after digging his footsteps with ridicule, opposition and persecution has at last recognized his merit and is now hanging on the outskirts of his well earned fame. Booker T. Washington, that world famous figure may very well be compared with our Maharshi of Hinagd. The uplift of Negroes was dear to the one, regeneration of widows is near to the heart of the other. Subjection of women in India and slavery of Negroes in Europe and America will show many common points and sympathetic chapters in their history on a parallel scale. The simple life, the truthful ways and an unassuming personality—these had fallen to the lot of Booker T. with our Maharshi Anasasheb. Both are examples of a simple but remarkable phenomena rare in the history of the world. Prof Karve has done so much for Indian women and widows for which they cannot be adequately grateful to him. A new angle of vision with respect to widows and women is the creation of Prof. Karve; and however great he might be generally as a worker for the cause of Indian womanhood, our dear Anasasheb whose 71st birth day was celebrated appropriately at Hinagd on the 18th inst. will be remembered by generations to come as an unselfed and pure champion of widows, as the founder of Widows' Home.

SEVA SADAN FOR MADRAS.

We are glad to publish the following appeal of Mr. G. K. Devaher, Hon. Organiser and General Secretary, Poona Seva Sadan Society and Janakibai Bhat, Lady Superintendent, Poona Sevan Sadan Society.

Now that the Women's Home of Service till now managed by the Women's Indian Association, Adyar, has been taken over by the Poona Seva Sadan Society and is made the nucleus of its Branch at Madras, it may be of interest to our countrymen all over the Presidency to know in brief something of the work which the Society has been carrying on in Poona and Bombay and other towns in the Bombay Presidency and other Provinces of India.

The Poona Seva Sadan Society is primarily engaged in the work of Adult Women's Education. It has several Branches in the Bombay Presidency and in Nagpur and Gwalior. Besides, there are many Associated centres of work where work was started with the help of women trained by the Poona Seva Sadan. The number of Adult Women receiving practical instruction in various subjects and branches of work to render them useful for careers of social service is to-day roughly over 500 though the total number of women and girls on the rolls of various classes scattered all over the places is about 1,000 including some duplications. The number of women who have been trained as nurses, midwives, and doctors, is more than 100. Sixteen hostels are maintained in different places providing education, residence, boarding and training in Domestic Science, to women and girls numbering 400. In addition there is a Home in Nasik maintained for orphans and helpless women which serves also as a work of Rescue Home. The Society manages a small Maternity Home and two Creches in Sholapur to take care of children of about 300 women employed in two Cotton mills managed by a European Company (Bombay Company), in Sholapur. Five Maternity Hospitals, Nursing Homes and Dispensaries are run in addition to Seven Infant Welfare Centres and Anti-natal Clinics. During its existence for 18 years the Society has been able to train over 350 women social workers who are rendering useful service in all parts of the country. Most of these workers amongst whom there are doctors, nurses, midwives, health visitors, governnesses, child welfare workers, sewing and singing mistresses and music teachers, have been trained at the cost of the Society. The enormity of the task undertaken by the Society to run the various institutions and maintain a large number of free boarders etc., will be evident from the fact that the annual expenditure incurred by the Society now exceeds Rs. 2,50,000 of which only Rs. 50,000 is secured from different sources including Government grants.

The Women's Home of Service Madras.

The Poona Seva Sadan Society has at the instigation of friends and wellwishers in Madras undertaken this further liability of running the Women's Home of Service in Madras. It is proposed to conduct the Home more or less on the lines of the Institutions conducted by the Society in Poona and elsewhere, of course making such modifications as are suited to local conditions. The Society cannot be expected to conduct the Institution on efficient and progressive lines such as those that have received approval and support from all quarters, unless sufficient funds are forthcoming. In view of the thoroughly non-sectarian character of the work we trust unstinted financial support will come forth from all quarters irrespective of caste, creed or race. Madras has won many laurels in various fields of activity and social work is by no means neglected. But the work of the training of adult women, which is a very important factor of social work has not, so far as our limited knowledge goes, received that emphasis and attention which it needs especially at a time like this. We have no doubt that the Madras Branch of the Poona Seva Sadan Society will be enabled to do its best to further this branch of social service particularly at a time when there is an ever-increasing demand for more trained and qualified women workers in several fields of national activity and country's advance along progressive lines.

Already a beginning in this direction has been made by one of the most leading and public-spirited citizens of Madras, the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Venkatasubba Rau, by placing at the disposal of the Poona Seva Sadan Society a munificent sum of Rs. 10,000 to be used by the Society freely for the development of such work in this part of the country on the lines of the work conducted by the Society in Poona and other places. There are also several other friends, whose names will be announced later, who have promised financial support in aid of this scheme. Our own view is that the normal development of such work in a big city like Madras will involve a large initial outlay in addition to recurring charges amounting to nearly Rs. 20,000 per annum for the first one or two years. Our Society's work in Poona alone costs it to-day not less than Rs. 1,50,000 a year.

We, therefore, appeal to friends of the cause of women's education in particular and social reform in general to extend to us both their moral and material support in enabling our Society to carry out the work undertaken here and thus to serve the people of this Presidency.

MUKUL C. DEY.

As a youth in his teens Mukul Dey attracted attention in the very limited circles in Bengal where artistic ability is prized, as a draughtsman of marked ability and originality. Not less remarkable was his unflagging industry and in early days at Shantiniketan—for, as is inevitable in Bengal, his talent found early recognition and stimulus from Rabindranath Tagore—he drew ceaselessly, and, in many cases destroying drawings as soon as they finished, for he had set himself a standard which did not permit scamped work.

Now of the treasures, then only vaguely assessed, of the Buddhist caves at Ajanta and Bagh awakened in him a resolve to study these masterpieces of Indian painting in an intensity never attempted before. His pilgrimages to the caves, the months he spent there in solitude and hardship while he made copies of the paintings, and the searching study which he gave to his task are described in "My Pilgrimages to Ajanta and Bagh," Published in London three years ago. The service which Mr. Dey rendered by introducing the cave frescoes to the Western world through the medium of his copies has been recognised by the foremost critics in Europe; apart from that important aspect, the venture showed that the young artist was capable of facing discomforts, for the sake of his art, that would have daunted all but a few.

He was to give further proof of this indifference to discomfort. Although he had, achieved a reputation as a disciple of the classic art of India's Buddhist period he was strongly attracted by the art of the West, and particularly by the medium which has hitherto flourished only in Western countries. This medium is etching. Mukul Dey decided that if he was to achieve mastery of technique of etching he must seek instruction elsewhere than in India. With very few resources beyond his indomitable enthusiasm and a few letters of introduction from friends in India to artists at Home, he set out ten years ago upon his travels.

These travels took him through Japan, where he worked for a time with Shimamura Kanae and Yokoyama Takanori, and America, but the most important period of his exile was spent in England. In London he studied both at the Slade and South Kensington, obtaining the diploma of the latter school and winning prize for printing in tempera and engraving—honours which no Indian had secured before. He was poor, a condition not uncommon in art students, but he had the advantages of youth, seal, and one or two valuable friendships. Mr. Moirhead Bone, the greatest of living English etchers, and an unerring friend of youthful promise gave him advice and encouragement, and Mr. Laurence Binyon and Mr. Campbell Dodgson, of the British Museum, were others who appreciated his talent. Their faith was rewarded when Mulkal Day revealed his strength in a series of mural decorations at the Wembley Exhibition and in tempera paintings shown at the Royal Academy.

Finally the reward for hard work and labour was realised when the Indian artist gave an exhibition of his paintings and engravings at his own studio in London. Not only were the critics appreciative but the public gave practical evidence of interest by buying his work to an extent unusual in the case of a young artist's first exhibition. Mulkal Day might well have resolved to continue a career which had begun so auspiciously in London. But, in spite of his interest in Western art, the call of his own country was stronger than the comfortable assurance of further success in London. He has returned to India.—The Englishman.

JOSEPHINE BUTLER.

On April 24th was held in Westminster Abbey a service of Thanksgiving for the work and example of a woman who suffered during her life a greater measure of abuse, misunderstanding and actual physical danger than has often been the lot even of a Prophet of God. And yet, in spite of this notoriety, there are numbers of people to-day who ask: "Who was Josephine Butler, and what was her work and message?"

Josephine Butler was born on April 25th, 1812, and her hardy open-air youth was spent on the wind-swept hills of the Northumbrian Border. Her father, John Grey, Dilton, was a distinguished pioneer in agricultural matters, and his home was visited by Continental as well as English farming experts—and thus Josephine's childhood was open to early international interests.

But these were not the most important impressions that she received—for it was profoundly affected by the great movement for the abolition of the slave trade, in which he found scope for that moving passion for justice—that reverence for the value of cool human personality, however undeveloped or degraded, which his daughter inherited from him and which were the keystones of her life.

From John Grey and his wife, Hannah Annett, a descendant of the Hengkapts, she gained her intensely real consciousness of the Presence of God and her wonderful hold on the truths of religion, while at the same time she inherited the tolerant understanding of religious differences which made her, loyal daughter of the Church of England as she always remained, a friend and co-worker with members of other denominations—notably the Society of Friends.

The education of girls in those days was less systematized than it is to-day, and perhaps for that very reason it seems to have been very stimulating for women of exceptional ability. The home teaching which Josephine and her sisters received sent her forth into the world with a brain that had been taught to think clearly and logically, with a sound knowledge of history and a good command of modern languages—with cultivated tastes and considerable artistic attainments.

On January 8th, 1882, she married George Butler, a man in every way intellectually, morally and spiritually worthy to be her husband, son of the then Dean of Peterborough. The Oxford to which she went as a bride was an Oxford which to us seems almost as far off as that of the Middle Ages, but the new life was beginning to make itself felt, and George Butler was one of the early reformers. Educated women were few in numbers in a celibate Oxford, and the Butler's house soon became a centre for stimulating social intercourse, while Josephine enjoyed to the full the opportunities which her new life brought her of intellectual and artistic development. But, at the same time, she began to realize what was for her a new and tragic side of life. The double standard of morality which it was her life-work to fight against confronted her when she found that one of Oxford's wisest and best leaders felt that it would not only be inexpedient but wrong to attempt to bring home to a young man a sense of his share in the sin which had led a girl—mother to infanticide and a prison cell.

She was unprepared at the time to combat the larger issues, but she could help to save the victim, and, with her husband's approval, give to her and others a shelter in her own home.

After Oxford, at Cheltenham and Liverpool, as a schoolmaster's wife, she knew many young men intimately, and exercised over them the wonderful influence which caused Frederick Myers to say of her that she introduced him, not to the encumbering forms of Christianity, but to its heart of fire. Englishwomen were awakening to new aims: the struggle for the franchise had begun, the fight for entrance into the medical and other profession, the demand for greater facilities for Higher Education, and a share in the privileges of the older universities. With all these movements Mrs. Butler was in sympathy, and for some years was Chairman of a North of England Council for Women's Education, of which Miss Clough was secretary, and this made her one of the earliest supporters of Newnham; while Prof. James Stuart brought her into contact with the University Extension Movement.

It is usual to speak as though the great tragedy of her personal life was a turning point in Mrs. Butler's career—but her passionate love of justice and her recognition of the value of each human soul was already impelling her to the task of rescue and prevention. Still, it is true that the fatal accident which, in a moment of joyous reunion after a holiday, swept her one beloved little daughter from her arms gave her a peculiar tenderness for the girl-children to whom a worse fate than death had come,
In the days of her bereavement, when she longed to meet those who were more miserable than herself, she visited the oakum-picking sheds at Brownlow Hill, Liverpool, and her method of approach to the unfortunate girls there was that of a mother who had lost her daughter, and once more would carry them home with her to re-create by love.

At Liverpool came the call to her great crusade. The Contagious Diseases Acts had been passed successively in 1864, 1865 and 1869, almost without the knowledge of Parliament or people—but public opinion, medical, religious and social, was so much in their favour that it seemed as if the Government of England was to be prostituted by a system which made it the procurer of vice for her sons.

Josephine Butler had seen something of the working of the system of State regulation of vice on the continent, and she saw clearly that it was a negation of the Justice of God in that it implied that He had created men with natures incapable of obeying the moral law which nevertheless He had laid down for them.

In her life of her husband she tells us how hard was the struggle, and with what complete knowledge of all its implications she obeyed the call. Few pictures can be more pathetic than the one she draws of herself with her cheek pressed against the study door, praying for strength to enter and tell husband of her resolutions; and few nobler examples of Christian courage and chivalry can be found than the response of that noble man when he bade her go forth to her task in God's name, never heeding the results to his work or her reputation. Richmond's picture in the National Portrait Gallery shows us what the woman was like who went forth as the champion of the outcast and the degraded. Beautiful with a beauty which was as a transluent vase through which the utter purity of the nature shone forth, gifted with charm in no common measure, with a lovely voice and a gracious manner, she possessed also a sound judgment and an educated mind.

"When Mrs. Butler was there, no one could look at any one else—no one wanted to hear anyone else speak, says one who is still alive to remember those days. "No one who met her could ever be the same man again," says another.

Her first public meeting was at Crewe, where the railway men welcomed her with an intelligent appreciation of the position which was a forerunner of the unflagging support that through all the campaign was given her by English working men and women.

The Ladies' National Association for the Abolition of Government Regulation of Vice (which is now the National Association for Moral and Social Hygiene) was founded in 1869—and issued a Protest "That these Acts infringed the rights of Englishwomen—rights which had been theirs since the signing of Magna Carta; that they removed every guarantee of personal security as far as women were concerned—by placing them without trial, on suspicion only, under the power of the Police; that they were unfair in that they penalised on sex alone; that they made the path of evil more easy for young men by the removal of moral restraint, and were ineffective in combating disease. We hold that we are bound......to try to deal with the causes of the evil......and that with wise teaching and more capable legislation their causes would not be beyond control." Nearly 2000 women signed this protest, among them some of the best known names of the time, but the campaign was a long one, and it was not until 1888 that the final repeal of the Acts took place.

All through those long years Mrs. Butler was the soul of the movement, and against her the forces of evil did their worst—the Press was against her, and if her speeches were reported they were misrepresented.

It is almost impossible in our more tolerant or less excitable age to believe the lengths to which the opposition went. At the Colchester Election she was refused a bed in every hotel in the town even those belonging to the candidate whom she was supporting, and was only rescued with difficulty from the violence of the mob. At Pontefract, where she was speaking to women in the upper room of a warehouse, the straw in the floor below was set on fire, and a gang of hired rouges invaded the room in so threatening a manner that she had to leap down a trapdoor to safety.

In 1874 it was decided to carry the war on to the Continent, and Mrs. Butler went on a pilgrimage to France, Italy, Switzerland, etc.—finding everywhere men and women who were opposed to the state regulation of vice, and only needed the inspiration of such a leader to give their opinions public utterance.

In march, 1873, the International Abolitionist Federation was founded. And now a large number of countries have abolished State regulation of vice, from Norway in 1856, to Germany in 1927.

The International Convention of the League of Nations in 1921, and the reports on the White Slave Traffic of 1927, are a final justification and triumph of the policy of Mrs. Butler and her friends last century. But her achievement is something wider than the repeal of an iniquitous system. It is largely due to Josephine Butler and those who worked with her that there has been a healthy change in ordinary public opinion on moral questions and that a double standard of morals is no longer openly maintained by average people, or innocence, confused with ignorance. There is still need for her spirit among us—lest we level down the moral standard of one sex instead of leveling up, and we must still watch carefully against legal enactments and police measures which lead to the restoration of some system based on......false "principles." "Nothing endures that is founded on injustice." "There is no evil in the world so great that God cannot raise up to meet it a corresponding beauty and glory which will place it out of countenance," REPIES TO MISS MAYO.

Dr. Paranjpye's Refutation.

Dr. R. P. Paranjpye, in an article in the “Daily Mail” on “The Truth about India’s Women” replies to Miss Mayo’s “Mother India”, “the lurid pages of which have caused deep resentment among the people who feel that she has taken some isolated facts distorted others and shows altogether such disregard for truth that no reasonable person should attach any weight to her account.”

As regards marriage Dr. Paranjpye explains that the theoretical ban against girls remaining unmarried after puberty has virtually disappeared and as regards disparity in ages he says, “the evil is rapidly disappearing both because the marriage age of girls is rising and also because to a certain extent widow marriage is not as unpopular as it used to be.” He says that the castes totalling eighty per cent of Hindus allow both marriage of widows and divorce. If a widow leads a miserable existence it is the exception and not the rule.

The Foullest Lie

Dr. Paranjpye adds: “It is the foulest lie to say that widows in India habitually lead immoral life. Their general behaviour compares very favourably with that of spinsters and widows in any country in the West.” Quoting the phrase “the Hindu loves the woman he marries, while European marries the woman he loves” Dr. Paranjpye comments: “This has saved India from the practical breakdown of the marriage system we see in America where in some cities there is one divorce per two marriages.”

Dr. Paranjpye admits that there are evils and India welcomes the help of foreigners like Mrs. Annie Besant, Mr. C. F. Andrews and Sister Nivedita but resists “the wholesale condemnation of our social system and libel upon our women at the hands of a woman blind to similar evils among her own people.”

Problems for Miss Mayo’s native Home.

Referring to a recent press interview in Berlin in which Miss Mayo said that she wrote the book “from a sense of duty to India as well as to her own people,” Dr. Paranjpye asks “Is it too much to hope that she will next take up problems nearer home and use her undoubtedly abilities to turn fierce light upon the condition of the Negroes and the coloured races in America, to the state of law and order in Chicago, to the divorce laws in the various states, to the activities of the Ku Klux Klan to the administration of the prohibition law, to oil scandals to the various other evils in her own country and not to insult the manhood and womanhood of a whole country, simply because it is down.” Reuters.

BOOK OF LIES.

Mr. S. K. Ratcliffe’s former editor of the Statesman, Calcutta, delivered an address on “Mother India: A British View” at the Community Forum New York. The following summary of the address is extracted from the Bombay Chronicle:

“Reaching back 3000 years ago we find that the system of society prevailing among the Hindus was substantially the same as it is today, and this fact reveals to us the extraordinary and marvellous power of continuity and endurance of the social order we have under consideration. A system characterized by the vices and degeneracy Miss Mayo attributes to the Hindu Society couldn’t not by any means have lasted one-tenth as long as this one has. On a minute examination we notice three factors in the Hindu social system which arouse hostility of the Westerner immediately: 1—Caste System, 2—Untouchability, 3—Treatment of women, including child-marriage and purdah. And we shall look into all three to find out the truth about them.

An extraordinary system.

Now, caste-system is a most extraordinary and fascinating system that any student of history of civilization has ever known. It is peculiarly suited to the conditions; nature and temperament of the people of India. The system itself however is to be found among all people everywhere. Not a great many of you perhaps realize it but these very great and fortunate United States have one of the most acute and rigid caste-system prevailing here. My own country, the United States have it. Many of the European countries have it. To be sure it has a different form in other places, but its existence is undeniable. On arriving in India one finds that the Englishmen and women residing there observe the same attitude of distinction and discrimination towards the Hindus and Mahomedans as the Hindus do in their own community. Miss Mayo wrote an article in an American periodical in which among other things she claimed that ten of ancestors came to this country in the Mayflower and I fail to understand what other purpose she could have had in her mind in doing so but that of feeling some caste or class distinction. Now this system has been the foundation of which Hindu Society has rested all these centuries. It is true that in course of time its observance has added to it features which have caused some sort of harshness and worked injustice to certain sections of society, but it cannot be disputed that on the whole it has been exceedingly useful to the race, and has served some very laudable ends. As for injustices there is no social system so perfect that its adoption or operation does not cause injustice to a group in the community. Besides, of these faults none is more conspicuous or eager to remove, than the Hindus themselves. Any one can easily find out the amount of vigorous opposition there is in these days to the objectionable features of the caste system among the Hindus themselves. Mahatma Gandhi has been consistently opposed to it and his influence is bringing others into line.

What I have said of the caste-system more or less applies to the question of untouchability also, because the latter forms part of the former. Many Hindu organisations and leaders in India today wage unceasing war against this evil. Brabho Samaj, and Arya Samaj and the poet Tagore and the Mahatma are the outstanding figures in this field. Tremendous progress has been made in that direction of late, and I hear that in many places the untouchables are being granted civic and social and even religious privileges like the members of the caste.

Early marriage is another one of the customs which though associated in the popular mind with only the Orient are practiced practically all over the world. Every one will admit that until rather recent years early marriage was widely practiced in Europe. In several of the European countries it still exists. In America itself, and direction of late, and I hear it against "Sutee" was abolished by law in India. But it would be all.conotries of Europe only the Orient are who know India that does not mean the same thing made possible. But after the marriage the child goes to her father's house and stays there until maturity has dawned on her. It is only then and not until then that the marriage of a Hindu is consummated. In this connection I am sure the thing that misleads and shocks the Westerner is the presence of a large number of child-widows whose bodes are as indissoluble as those of their grown up sisters. Hindus of the present and last generation have been awakened to the inequity of that practice and have made considerable progress in the direction of removing this disability from such widows. Some of you would know that the age-old system of widowhood was abolished by law in India. But it would be a mistake to suppose that British Government alone could have done it. It was a great Hindu reformer, Raja Ram Mohan Roy, who did most of the missionary work by which the enforcement of the law against "Sutee" was made possible.

Coming down to the other statements of Miss Mayo, one finds the book heavily documented. But reference to the sealed authorities quoted by her one finds that they are scores of years old. She has drawn heavily on literature which was old and out of date when I went to India twenty-five years ago. And the India I saw has changed with even a greater rapidity than before. When she quotes speeches from the reports of the Indian Legislative Assembly she almost invariably misinterprets them. In many cases she misuses and distorts them, in most cases she tears them out of their context thereby falsifying their meanings. An obvious example of her misinterpretation or misunderstanding is her misquotation of Tagore's view on early marriages. I know it for certain that Tagore's family has for generations been the strongest proponent of marriages of adults and if you were to look up the girls of the house of Tagore you would be surprised at the accusation of the poet by Katherine Mayo in her book. If I were to look at Katherine Mayo's book I should be surprised at the misinterpretation of the objects of present day according to the author. A great fault of the foreign writers on India is the fallacy of generalising in sweeping terms about everything Indian. Miss Mayo does that with a revenge. You know how many misguided India and particularly Bengal, but that country has not been consigned to the oblivion of Babylon or Nineveh. The secret of that lasting capacity is in the personal, moral and spiritual outlook of the Hindus. If you go to the holy city of Benares and watch the hundreds and thousands of the pious and devoted worshippers gathered there you would realise the source of the strength and endurance of the Hindu customs and laws. Miss Mayo's statements are fantastic, verging on wildness, when she charges the Hindus of being sex-ridden. She cannot possibly know the people if she really believes that to be true. If her charges were true the Hindu would have perished a millenium ago. In her article I just mentioned she says she wanted to gather root facts about Indians. I have no hesitation in telling you that she is the only person who has visited India and totally failed to hear and feel the people's extraordinary lovely character, their patience, their endurance, dignity, spirituality and the unmatched beauty of their lives. By chance she got her way into India. She went through the country incensed at the stories she was told by the English civilians against the Hindus, and with closed eyes, seeing only that which she has set down in her book. Her purpose was as is implied in her book purely imperialist, the same as she had in writing the "Isle of Fear," namely, to show that the natives were so low that they should never, or certainly not for a very long time, be given the reins of their own country's government. True to her viewpoint, she suggests that the British Government should plot out, if necessary by force, all the incitement she found in India. She would not hesitate in the case of bayonets for accomplishing her purpose. Does she know that a great many deaths caused in India are the result of what we and not India did. While we were engaged in fighting away our native diseases the plague and Influenza, India lost 6 millions lives by these diseases imported in India by Europeans.

The truth is that Miss Mayo's book has an obvious political purpose and has had certain very definite results. The chief of these results is that to-day the relationship between India and England has become more estranged than it ever was since the Mutiny. Of course part of the fault lies with the present Secretary of State for India, who appointed a purely British Commission. I do not think Lord Bathurst is the best person to deal with India, for which he does not care a bit. But there should be no mistake about the fact that the unanimity of all parties that prevail in India in feelings of anger and resentment against West—end of course, England—was made possible primarily by the storm of indignation aroused by Miss Mayo’s book. She admits frankly that she is a friend of the British who have aided her and helped her in her work. But I am sure those very British who helped her must be curzing themselves for having done so, because of the results of her trip. She has done a direct act of colonial disloyalty, and thus, of course, England has done a grave and appalling injustice to India and created a moral feeling between the East and West that generations will pass before the injury done by her is repaired."

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Colour Bar Act.—Mr. C. F. Andrews interviewed concerning the news that the Colour Bar Act will not be applied to the Indians in Natal stated that this announcement was of first-rate importance. If the Colour Bar Act had been applied it would have very seriously damaged the Indian interests in Natal and would have jeopardised the Indo-South African Agreement.

Mr. Andrews further said this represented the third important piece of good news which reached India since the Agreement signed in 1927. The first was the definite appointment of the provincial commission on Indian Education in Natal and the second was the withdrawal of Clause 104 of the Liquor Bill by which 16,000 Indian waiters were affected. This third piece of good news was of even greater importance than the second for while the clause in the Liquor Bill was restricted employment of the Indians in one trade only, the Colour Bar Act would have been applied to all trades in which machinery was employed. It would have thus affected far more the Indian workmen than the Liquor Bill and thus would have very seriously injured Indian skilled trade in Natal. It might easily have affected as many as 16,000 Indian workmen and also would have shut all avenues for the future. It was a matter of great relief to find that it will not be applied.

Brahmo Samaj Centenary Essay.—On the occasion of the celebration of the Brahma Samaj Centenary a number of medals and prizes are to be awarded to the writers of best essays on the following subjects:

1. The Brahma Samaj and Sramaner Moulani Roy.
2. The work of the Brahma Samaj during the last hundred years.
3. Open to boys and girls of High Schools.
4. Open to boys and girls of Higher Secondary and Middle Colleges.
5. Open to girls of General Education.
7. Malay.

The essays must reach the undersigned on or before the 30th June, 1921. H. C. Sarker, Secretary, Brahma Samaj Centenary Committee, 120-2, Cornwallis Street, Calcutta.

New India’s Example.—Secunder writes:—One refreshing feature of the New India is the first issue of which is before us, is the lead which, to ideals and traditions, it has given to Indian newspapers in excluding advertisements of alcohol and betting items. As our readers are aware Secunder has consistently followed the same line. The propriety of this procedure cannot be questioned. Newspapers, which stand for Prohibition and the suppressing of the betting evil, cannot accept any moral justification open out its columns to liquor advertisements or betting items. It would be a proud day indeed for India when every Indian newspaper accepts this principle and rigorously excludes all such objectionable matter from its pages.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 53 years, taken effective steps to establish their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies.
The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Com-

The Bombay General Strike:—The general strike in the Bombay textile industry continues and all the mills in the city remain closed. The two wings of the Labour leaders have effectcd a sort of compromise, and have formulated demands to be presented to the Mill-owners’ Association. There is no demand for an increase of wages: the demand is rather that there should be no cutting down of wages, either directly or indirectly, and that important changes in the economy of the mills bearing on workers should be introduced in consultation with them and with their approval. Some of the proposals are on the face of them extravagant and, perhaps, not seriously intended to be pressed. In discussion with the owners, the issues will no doubt be narrowed down, and there is good reason to hope that in the course of the next few days a satisfactory understanding will be reached. If the present strike leads to the setting-up of some permanent machinery to deal with industrial disputes by way of prevention rather than by curative treatment after an outbreak, it will not have been altogether an evil. It is high time that the public realised that this is not a matter between employers and workers and that its own interests are vitally involved in the avoidance as far as possible of the strike method of adjusting the relations between the two.

The Jamshedpur Strike:—The Bombay general strike has been thrown into the shade by the lock-out which the Tata Iron and Steel Company have been forced to declare in some departments of their works at Jamshedpur. A highly organised modern industry is very liable to be brought to a standstill by the action of a handful of workers whose labour keeps up the continuous supply of power needed to keep the works going. This is what has happened at Jamshedpur. The men who keep the boilers and blast furnaces at work having struck on grounds which are somewhat obscure, the Company had perforce to close down the section of the works which depended on them for power and production. The strike at Jamshedpur is all the more inexplicable as the Tata Steel Company had only recently announced a generous scheme of bonus to employees—the first of its kind in India. The Company issued last week a tract in which are enumerated the special benefits enjoyed by the employees. It is reproduced among the news items. The concessions are of a substantial kind, and are provided by few other concerns in India at present. Since the above was in type information by competent authorities has been received that sections of the strikers have returned to work. The strike of 20,000 men in the Railway workshops at Calcutta is also giving cause for grave anxiety. The men are other strikers of a similar character, the largest of them in the cotton mills of Jamshedpur. The agricultural industry is not unaffected by the wave of discontent. The passive resistance movement at Bardoli, where the cultivators have organised an opposition to the enhanced assessment demanded of them, is becoming serious and if not dealt with sympathy and imagination, may develop into an agrarian movement which will not be confined to Bardoli or Gujarat or even to Bombay Presidency.

Child Marriages in Mandi:—The Mandi Child Marriage Act has been recently passed which places the minimum marriageable age at 13 and 15 for boys and girls respectively. The age limit of 13 years is low and the Raja Sahib in the firman in which he has given his assent to the Act, feels called upon to offer some explanation. The question of early marriages has been engaging his attention ever since he assumed the Government of his State three years back. He feels, however, that, although 13 years is not sufficiently high as a limit for girls, as there is some religious sanction behind early marriages, it is better to proceed circumspectly. He also observes that the age of 13 for a girl is not fixed "for all times", which shows that an improvement is contemplated in course of time. The other provisions of the Act penalise all the subjects who take active part in the performance of any marriage which is in contravention of the provisions of the Act, whether the marriage is performed within or outside the state territories. The Act further provides for the stopping of such a marriage by an injunction issued on reliable information by a competent authority. The Raja Sahib does not make any mention of the penalty indicated for a breach of this law. The reasons put forward for so low an age limit for girls are not quite convincing, and we are inclined to think that 14, which the Committee on the Sarda Bill have recommended as the proper age limit would... that Egypt had ceased to be a protectorate and was thenceforth an independent sovereign State. Four points were reserved for future settlement, but in view of the categorical statements in the forefront of the declaration, it is reasonable to conclude, that the settlement, however it was and whenever it was made, would be compatible with the sovereign independence of Egypt. Now, if there are two things which are incompatible with the idea of sovereign independence, they are a foreign army of occupation and the possession of veto by a foreign power over domestic legislation. The British Government have ever since the declaration of 1922 been trying to get the Egyptian Government to accept a Treaty on the basis of a more or less permanent location of British troops in Egyptian territory, for the purpose of safeguarding the Suez Canal and European interests. This the Egyptian Government cannot see its way to do and even the late Prime Minister, Sir George Curzon, was most anxious to come to a friendly settlement with Britain, could not admit this demand. He resigned and was succeeded by Nahas Pasha, leader of the Wafd or Nationalist party.

Warship Diplomacy:—Great Britain was determined to force a settlement, and finding no other way of doing it, pounced upon a Bill relating to public meetings which was half way through in the Egyptian Parliament, and demanded that its further progress should be stopped as its enactment would endanger the safety of person and property of foreigners. The Egyptian Government took no notice of this overweening pretension, whereas British warships were ordered to Egypt. The Egyptian Government is no match for Britain in military strength or naval power, and Nahas Pasha, submitting to superior force, got the Bill adjourned to the next session of the Egyptian Parliament. The matter rests there for the present. Britain has gained its immediate point, but at the expense of the last shred of moral justification for its position in Egypt whose sovereign independence it had solemnly proclaimed to the world six years ago. The British method of dealing with Egypt is not very different from that of the grocer who offers attractive terms for his goods but when he secures them, he will not give cargo to the boy who offers custom tries to compensate himself by short-weight, adulteration and other devices well-known in his trade. The same has been the case with India where the Declaration of 1917, watered down into the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms, has been further whittled down in several respects and has been ostentatiously set aside in the constitution of the Statutory Commission.

An unsavoury Practice:—A practice in Bombay in which the general begrudgingly brought to notice is that workers of the untouchable classes are not admitted to the weaving department. This has been sought to be explained by the fact that men have to work in pairs at the looms, and that breakages of yarn have to be at right by fingers wetted by saliva. The workmen of other castes, it is said, draw the line at salivary contact with untouchables. The practice is insanitary in any case, and the substitution of a more hygienic one in its stead will incidentally eliminate this difficulty in the way of the untouchables.
PARSI SOCIAL LEGISLATION I.

Marriage and Succession among Parsis in British India are regulated by two special Acts passed in 1865 at the instance of the leaders of the community. Both the Acts, were framed on the general lines of the English Acts of the corresponding period. Dr. K. K. Dadachanjee in his minute, appended to the Report of the influential Committee which has drawn up proposals for the revision of the two Acts, says of the Marriage Act that, with the single exception of Ashirwad being required for the validity of Parsi marriages, there is nothing essentially Parsi about the Act. He makes a similar remark about the Succession Act also. Prior to the two Acts, Parsi marriages and succession were governed by customary law administered by caste panchayats elected by members of the community. The marriage customs of Parsis in those days were not dissimilar to those of the Hindus. Child marriages were common. The octogenarian veteran, Sir Temulji Nariman, said on a public occasion not long ago that he was married at the age of five to Lady Nariman at the age of three, and that their married life extended to a period of seventy-five years. The only exception was that widow remarriage and divorce were permitted by Parsi custom. The Panchayat was not bound by rigid rules, but exercised a wide discretion in keeping with the prevailing sentiments in the community and the sense of equity of its members. For example, Dr. Dadachanjee says that divorce was granted by the Panchayats for about fourteen specific reasons and in addition “any cause deemed sufficient” by them. According to the customary law of Succession, the father and mother of a person pre-deceasing them were entitled to double the share of his property which went to each of his children. These are two typical instances in which the Acts departed from the customary law. Under the Marriage Act, adultery was made the sole ground of divorce, in accordance with the English law. The right of parents to a share of the property of children who died before them, was likewise abrogated by the Succession Act, this also in keeping with English ideas of family relationship.

The Acts have been in force for over 60 years now, and there is a strong feeling in the community that they need revision in important particulars. It is noteworthy that the Marriage Act prescribes no age limit. The only reference to age is that in the case of persons under 21 years of age, the consent of parent or guardian is necessary for the performance of a valid marriage. The Act provides that marriages under it shall be monogamous. The only section which may be said to have a bearing on child marriage is that which provides that “in any case in which consummation of marriage is from natural causes impossible, such marriage may, at the instance of either party thereto, be declared null and void.” Child marriages have virtually ceased among Parsis in British India, the last Bombay Census reporting only a few stray cases. The actual proportion of married persons, 47 males in a thousand and 7 females in a thousand, under ten years of age, suggest that they were perhaps subjects of Indian States where the Act is not in force, temporarily resident in British Bombay at the time of the Census. Monogamy has become the rule. In these important respects the Marriage Act has been of much service to the community. The provisions which call most urgently for change are those relating to separation and divorce. Dr. Dadachanjee's suggestions need not be taken at their face value, but there seems to be a general feeling in the community that the rigid provisions relating to divorce have been the cause of much avoidable hardship. There is no majority report as such to show why certain changes are proposed in the Act: the proposed changes are merely shown against the present law in parallel columns with a few brief observations as to their nature and extent but it is plain from this statement that the Committee feel that a thorough overhauling of the law is needed in respect of separation and divorce. The Marriage Act provides for three forms of relief to couples who do not pull on well together, namely, separation, divorce and nullity. Lunacy or habitually unsound mind, is a ground for declaring a marriage null and void, as also the impossibility from natural causes of consummating it. Cruelty, serious personal violence, and openly bringing or allowing a prostitute to remain in the place of abode of a wife by her own husband, are causes for judicial separation. Adultery on the part of a wife is ground for divorce, but not on the part of the husband. It should be “adultery with a married or fornication with an unmarried woman not being a prostitute” or rape or an unnatural offence. Taking the separation and divorce sections together it appears that while her husband's habitual resort to prostitutes does not entitle a wife to get a divorce so long as they are not brought into her house by the husband openly, if he brings the prostitute “openly” to remain in the same abode where she lives, she can claim a separation from him. The tenderness shown by the Parsi Marriage Act to the association of married men with prostitutes, is stigmatised by Dr. Dadachanjee not a whit too strongly as an unique and abominable proviso, not found in the law of Divorce of any other people of the world and possibly repugnant to the spirit of Zoroastrianism.” How the provision crept into the Act, it would be interesting to know. There is no doubt, however, that today it is a stain on the community as well as a blemish on the Indian statute book, and the Committee rightly proposed to delete it in their amending Bill. The other proposals of the Committee in regard to separation and divorce, will be dealt with on another occasion.
MIDDLE CLASSES.

(By Mr. A. S. Venkataraman, B.A., L.T.)

In this short article, an attempt will be made to sketch the present condition of the middle classes in England and to compare incidentally the condition of the corresponding classes in India. Though the parallel may not be exact, there are some common, interesting but by no means negligible features of a comparative study.

Of the classes of people, that have been insistent in their demands on the public attention, two must be named, the rich by means of their power due to riches and the poor by reason of a possession of a formidable weapon. The voice of an increasing volume of protest against increasing taxation, more so after the war, has been effective, while the rebellion of the masses has not been without beneficial results. The middle classes of suburbs, as they have been called, have been neglected so long and have been patient so long that if they complain now at last, it surely means that their hardships have reached a limit, a transgression of which would spell ruin and disaster to ordered society. As it has been described by Mr. Greenwood in his book on "England to-day," "Suffering acutely and stung to activity by the knowledge that the rich and poor have succeeded in gaining the attention of the statesmen to the wrongs, men and women of the profession have leapt into the arenas to proclaim their wrongs and voice their wants."

The motives and grounds of complaint in each case vary. While the rich and the poor struggle to secure things likely to add to the sum-total of their happiness, the middle classes are engaged in a struggle for their very existence. The rich are petulant, the poor almost always discontented but the middle classes never complain except when the suffering is intolerable. Of late, there has been an increase in the level of prices. When it is accentuated by the wage demands of the workers, it is passed on to the consumer in the shape of increased prices. A situation is created in which prices are high and higher but incomes stationary. Unhappily, the remedy is not in the hands of the middle classes themselves. They cannot, like the manual labourers, strike, as they are 'above' such a course. The inevitable recourse for them is to effect 'cuts'. Economies are practised, little pleasures and petty indulgences abandoned and protracted unrest stalks abroad, notably in the professions of teaching and banking. That is this the state of things, both in England and India, few will deny. Very often, the Press is bombarded by means of letters from them. What else can they do? They can neither raise a strong protest nor use an effective weapon like the 'strike'.

Now, who are the middle classes? They are the men in professions, industry and services and directly or indirectly administer the nation's work. Among them there are two scales. To the upper, belong the doctors, lawyers, civil servants, businessmen and commercial men. To the lower scale, belong the clerks, journalists, teacher, trades, tradesmen and civil servants. As, Mr. Greenwood picturesquely describes it, "There is a life of undisturbed routine, fair leisure and demands rarely more than modest". They are employed in specialised tasks and work with the regularity of a clock. "They are rarely outstanding characters; their contribution to the world of genius is unusual; they are just a plodding, conscientious; industrious, an-imaginative body of workers with well-disciplined brains which occasionally break away from routine and develop a really enterprising spirit". They are interested, but not noisy in what they do. Their fear and dislike of the workers is increasingly manifest:—"who has conferred these benefits (good schools, increased wages, and rise in the standard of living) on the lower classes and elevated them to a position above our own, thus reversing the ordinances of Nature and contradicting the meaning of words. Alas! it is, we ourselves, who have done it. Have we not learnt it every time that the demand for rates came in? It is we, who have educated our masters. We who have supplied their houses below cost price. We who have provided them with the public baths wash-houses with playing fields, with innumerable and jolly work-houses, fitted with electric light and porcelain baths to comfort their old age. Remaining respectable, we are no longer respected." Almost every word of it is true of the position and mentality of the middle classes in England and India!

What are the points to their credit? They were and are the back-bone of England as of India. In the memorable words of Mr. G. A. Greenwood, "They are the people who take their religion and their politics seriously who officer the churches, chapels, the Sunday-schools, the Brotherhoods, and those organizations which organize and endeavour to educate the wider segment of the electorate. They are found also on officiating public bodies; they run the voluntary institutions, such as libraries, musical societies and literary clubs. They are the men and women who keep alive in the suburbs that association with the arts which lifts the lower middle class far above the intellectualism of the workers. Yet, they are the people who are least self-conscious of their superiority in knowledge and opportunity. They are the ones who drink fairly deep of learning from the facilities offered by our cheap literature and who in the spirit of free-masonry that knowledge nurtures, would open to the industrialists; gladly and without stint, the great secrets of learning which lie at the foundation of social equality. 'Theris the ability to discharge those executive functions of Government, commerce and industry without which modern life is nothing. "Visualise, if you can, the post office, the bauks, the schools, newspaper offices, the majority of our shops, of our counting houses, our factories, mills, railways and ship-yards, men and women whose administrative skill now keeps them in action."
A general strike would have results as paralysing as those of the manual workers.

That they two are becoming united, is abundantly clear from the several professional unions, leagues and associations formed by them in England as in India. The only difference between the conditions in the two countries is that, in the one country, the workers in commerce and industry are greater in numbers. The problem in either country is, are you going to improve the lot of such a useful, perhaps the most useful community of workers in the land or are they to become extinct in which case the country itself is doomed to ruin. The situation calls for a proper distribution of National Income and a revision of the systems of taxation and rates.

The following books will be found useful on this subject:

1. The New Labour Outlook.
2. The aims of Labour by Mr. Henderson.
3. England to-day by George A. Greenwood, with an introduction by A. G. Gardiner 6s. net. Published by George Allen and Union Ltd. London. This volume is a remarkable study of the social conditions in the Post-war era. The sections on the workers, middle classes, the new plutocracy y/n the old aristocracy, the revolution in the country side, England's place in the world's relations and the tendencies of the Post-war period, all reveal a depth of understanding, a keen insight into and a scholarly analysis of the present conditions.

VEDANTA AND THE WEST.

Sir,

I have read your note on M. Romain Rolland's letter which you have quoted from April "Prabuddha Bharata" in your issue of the 14th inst. It is unfortunate that you did not wait till the publication of further correspondence on the point at issue.

You do not seem to have carefully read the passages which I have reproduced from my letter to M. Rolland, in introducing his reply to the readers of "Prabuddha Bharata". Therein I mentioned four distinct sources from which Vedantic ideas spread in the West, namely, (a) Western Sanskritists, (b) Our Mission (c) Later teachers and literature and (d) Independent growth of Vedantic ideas owing to historical reasons. I also said: How did it (the west) get these ideas? I do not think that Christianity (as regards the first idea—the divinity of man) and the Graeco-Roman culture are specially favourable to them. I think, in the first stage, the industrial, social and cultural changes, especially the progress of science, drove the West to those ideas and was helped therein by Indian culture as disseminated by Western Orientalists. Many Western authors of the 18th and the 19th centuries showed traces of Vedanta influence on their thought. These he attributed partly to the dissemination of Indian culture by Western Orientalists and partly to the teachings and literature of Swami Vivekananda and his monks. You also say in your note: "...the great savant gently rebukes the Swami for claiming the Vedanta as the special and peculiar product of the Indian mind." This is no summary but a caricature of my views.

Any careful reader of my letter and M. Rolland's reply will find that M. Rolland overlooked the fourth source of Vedantic ideas, which I had mentioned in my letter. Had he not done so, he would not have written: "It would be lessening the Divine, the Eternal, to imagine that there is a handful of grains in the hands of certain chosen men of a chosen race." I never claimed that for India. I pointed out to M. Rolland in my next letter, extracts from which and from the reply I received from him, I enclose herewith. I hope you will publish them.

But though I do not claim a monopoly of what I call Vedantic ideas, for India, I do claim that in India these have been cultivated the most and that India has directly or indirectly influenced the West with them. The argument that because the Divine is immanent everywhere, therefore all peoples independently manifest it in their life and culture, is not so sound as it may appear. All men have all things, yet in most cases, the manifestaation of their potentiabilities require outside help. It is a question of history, not of a priori conclusion, how far one race is indebted to another for its spiritual ideas. M. Rolland gives two arguments in support of his view that the Vedantic ideas are of independent growth in the West. The one is that the Eternal is potential everywhere and as such able to express itself independently and that both India and the West, being predominantly Aryan, have inherited the ideas from their common source. The other argument is a historical one in which he points to Christianity Plato, Pythagoras, Socrates, Goethe, etc. as teaching Vedantic ideas. The first argument cannot stand by itself. M. Rolland himself repudiates it partly when he says: "The earth is not everywhere so fertile that the seeds may germinate. In some places it grows and produces fruit, in other places, it sleeps." [M. Rolland further explains this argument of his in his next letter. Please see the accompanying extracts.] His second argument however requires careful examination. What can be said in favour of India on this point will be partly evident from my reply to M. Rolland. My conclusion is that the facts are decidedly in favour of India.

You say: "The East is no more spiritual than the West, neither is the West any more materialistic than the East." No doubt you have reasons for thinking so, though I confess I cannot guess them and regret that I cannot accept you argument. I do think that India is spiritually superior to the West and in this I think I am upheld by many thinking minds both in the East as well as in the West. I am glad that M. Rolland is one of them. He admits in his next letter: "But I do not hesitate to recognize in India the most powerful, perfect, and complete monument of the Divine Thought,—the Cathedral of Unity and of Identity—the Himalayas of Being."

We must remember that when we speak of a certain people being spiritual or material, we do not mean the achievements of a few solitary individuals. We refer to the general mental tendencies of a people. Can we say that the West even now believes in the principles which I have called Vedantic? I fear it does not. The Western culture cannot be said spiritual in the proper sense of the term; the Indian culture can be. M. Rolland himself admits in a recent letter to me that the Western culture lacks a proper intellectual understanding of spirituality. Writing about Beethoven, he says: "The only profound difference with India is that with us there does not exist a secular tradition, well-informed and rational, of this spiritual intercourse with God; so that each of our inspired ones is a solitary person who undergoes anew the Divine experience entirely without a guide, with its risks and perils, often very great."

Again, what do you exactly mean by this statement: "If in Asia the terrific aspect of European civilisation is more in evidence than its benign aspect, it is because fear of Europe has for about two centuries been a dominating sentiment in Asia." Should it not be rather," "Because the terrific aspect......therefore fear of Europe has etc......"

EXTRACTS FROM MY REPLY TO M. ROLLAND.
13th November, 1927.

"I read with great interest your observations on the growth of the Vedantic ideas in the West. I bow to the beauty of your thesis. You will find that I also expressed a similar opinion in that letter. I mentioned therein 'Independent growth of Vedantic ideas owing to historical reasons' as one of the causes of their propagation in the West. I think, in the first stage, the industrial, social and cultural changes, especially the progress of science drove the West to these ideas (that is to say, the West was compelled to evolve them), and was helped therein by Indian culture as disseminated by Western Orientals.' Far be it from me to maintain that the truths of the spirit cannot reveal themselves independently and that they are in the custody of particular men or race of men. But you will, I dare say, agree with me that does not prevent one race from helping another spiritually. If a people has cultivated them specially much more than other peoples, then, opportunity occurring, that people may certainly help the others. The West has specially cultivated the arts of Government, industrial development, etc. India or other Asian countries are behind it in these. And surely to lay we are being greatly influenced by Western ideas in these respects.........Similarly I think Indian spiritual ideas have helped the West. What was indistinct has been made distinct. Indigenous spiritual ideas of the West have been more systematised and clarified by the knowledge of Indian philosophy and religion. And in so far as this has been done, I maintain that our Mission has a share in it. I claim nothing more.

"I should mention, however, that the existence of Vedantic ideas in the West has been variously explained. There is a school of thought, which maintains that these ideas originally must have come out of India. This opinion still lacks complete historical proof. But some proofs there surely are. You say you find the Vedantic ideas existing in Christian mysticism, in Hellenic culture, e.g. in Pythagoras and Plato, in Spinoza, etc. Christianity in its origin owed certainly much to Buddhism; and Buddhism is nothing but the Vedantic thoughts made popular. Pythagoras, it is generally admitted, had been to India and his teachings evidently owed much to Indian thought. Only the other year an English Professor of Sociology, Prof. Urick, wrote a book, 'The Message of Plato', in which he maintained the thesis that Plato borrowed his principal ideas from Vedanta. Dwijendranath Tagore, elder brother of Rabindranath Tagore, contributed some years ago a series of illuminating articles to the Bengali monthly, 'Prabasi,' edited by Ramannanda Chatterjee, pointing out the indebtedness of some of the early European thinkers to Indian philosophy. Spinoza, it is well-known, was well-versed in his ancestral teachings. And who knows how much of the mystical teachings of the Zohar was owing to Indian influence? It is recognised that the Alexandrians used to visit Athens. It is also historical that Alexandria became a centre of the mingling of Indian and Mediterranean cultures and the Gnostic philosophy owed much to the Indian contribution. The fact is that in those ancient days when commerce was carried on mainly along land routes, the countries from China and India to Greece and Egypt were in much closer communication than we imagine now. The change of the commercial routes from land to sea meant not only great industrial, political and cultural revolutions in Asia and Europe, but also a death-blow to the close relationship between Asia and Eastern and Southern Europe.

"My own position is that there must be more or less independent growth of Vedantic ideas among all cultured peoples. But I hold further that some peoples have, for many reasons, given more serious thought to their development and understanding than other peoples; and they have, wherever opportunity has come, inducted those other peoples with their developed spiritual thoughts. India is such a people.

"The above I have written only to clarify my position. As I read your letter between the lines.
I find that you also substantially agree with my conclusion. For you have said: "The Eternal has sown himself with full hands over the whole field of humanity. The earth is not everywhere so fertile that the seeds may germinate. In some places it grows and produces fruits, in other places, it sleeps."

EXTRACTS FROM M. ROLLAND'S NEXT LETTER.

14th December, 1927.

"I have read with great interest your reply to my former letter. We are in agreement about the fundamentals. The only difference between us (if it can be called one), is that you call that form of thought Vedantio which I think to have been in all towns and in all countries, but which has found its most perfect realisation in Vedantio India. The full development is one thing, the origin is another thing. I do not think that in India or in any other country there has ever been the origin of a Divine revelation. I give the honour to God who is in every living being. He alone is the source and that source is in each of those living beings who have been, who are and who will be. All do not hear it sounding. But it is there in each one. And we do not know whether those of them who are silent themselves or make themselves silent, are not filled with his marvellous music. For God is in the silence, just as much as in the most powerful expression. In face of the Eternal there can be no question of priority; there is no commencement and there is no end. But I do not hesitate to recognise in India the most powerful, perfect and complete monument of the Divine Thought—"the Cathedral of Unity and of Identity—'the Himalaya of Being.'"

THE EDUCATION OF CHILDREN ON SEX.

(By Mme.)

In all religions the act of procreation is referred to as a sacred duty and the physical union of a husband and wife is generally considered one of the highest states attainable in this world. From either a religious or sentimental point of view this physical union of loving mates is the nearest approach possible on earth to a spiritual union, and, when looked on in that light, it is a beautiful and sacred act.

In spite of this in nearly all so-called civilised countries the act of copulation is considered as unfit for mention and is surrounded with an atmosphere of mystery and secrecy and it is only hinted at in coarse jokes and suggestive remarks. It is considered a subject of mirth in plays and novels, while the generative organs and their functions are regarded with shame. The act of procreation and the manner in which a child comes into the world are made a mystery to children as long as possible, and it is just this mystery that excites their curiosity and leads to so much harm. It is a very natural thing that a child should wonder how it came into the world and if the replies to its questions are not satisfactory it will not rest until it has solved the mystery. It is knowledge that cannot be hidden for long and when the child discovers that it has been deceived by its parents it will lose that implicit faith and trust in them which every child ought to have and it will also have received its first lesson in lying.

The above facts have been recognised by thinking people in various countries and there is a more general tendency today to face them and deal with them in a common-sense and practical manner. It will be generally agreed that since it is impossible, as a rule, to keep children in ignorance for any length of time concerning the sexual act, it is better that they should be instructed in the subject in the most ideal way and by the people best fitted to impart the instruction.

There is a very common idea that it is no use in teaching the child when it is quite young because it will not understand. As a matter of fact the earlier the education is commenced the better, only it must never cease.

Many think that when the child has once been informed of the use of the generative organs the subject must not be mentioned again, whereas if the child is to regard the creative act as one of sacred duty and love and not an act of shame, it should be encouraged to talk of it as naturally as it would discuss any other subject, so that by its very familiarity the subject will lose the erotic atmosphere usually connected with it.

Instruction should naturally be commenced, when possible, by the parents when the child is still quite young. If the child is familiar with the facts concerning sex and reproduction from its infancy it is obvious that these things will give it less cause for interest and excitement as it grows up. There will no longer be a mystery to be probed. There will not be things to be discussed on the sly with other children, nor will there be the excitement of finding out things which only "grown ups" are supposed to know. At this early age the knowledge can be imparted to children without their taking a personal interest in it. It is difficult at a more advanced age to convey the information without introducing this personal element, which is the very thing one wishes to avoid.

The method of instruction is through the medium of natural history and takes the form of lessons on the laws of reproduction first in plants, then in fishes and birds, after that in animals and finally in human beings. Thus the child learns of natural things in a natural way, and is armed with knowledge that will save him, or her, from shocks and unnatural excitement in later years.

If the full value of this education is to be obtained the attitude with regard to sex which has been adopted in infancy must be maintained as the child grows up. This is a point, and a very big one, that is not generally recognised,
Though known and practised by the ancient Greeks, the subject of sexual education is practically new to modern civilization, and although the need for it is now recognized, and the method more or less agreed on, its practical application in later life has not yet been insisted on. This, however, must come, or a great deal of the good will be undone.

It is impossible, or worse than useless, to explain the functions of the sexual parts unless the children are familiar with the human body of both sexes. So long as an atmosphere of mystery surrounds the human body curiosity will be aroused and sexual excitement induced.

This is where the duty of parents commences, and it is a duty that is being realized by them in ever increasing numbers. These parents realize that it is wrong to hide their bodies from their children or to create an atmosphere of mystery about them. It is their duty to appear naturally before them and to answer natural questions and not with myths and fairy tales.

As a beginning this is all very right and proper, but if when the child begins to grow up he, or she, is told "you are now too old to see your parents, or to let yourself be seen by them, in the nude", most of the early teaching will have been wasted and an atmosphere of mystery created. The child will naturally wonder "why am I no longer to be allowed to see what I have previously seen every day of my life, and why have I now got to hide certain portions?" Sexual curiosity will be aroused and sexual excitement with all its accompanying evils will follow.

The remedy is to be found in parents continuing to live with their children in a natural state of familiarity. This method has been adopted with the most gratifying results by hundreds of English and German families. It creates a state of complete confidence between parents and their children.

In some places they have gone to greater lengths. In Japan, except in the towns, clothes are regarded as a protection against the elements and not for the purpose of hiding the body. In warm weather the Japanese think nothing of working in their fields in a state of absolute nudity. To them it is natural and they see nothing wrong in it. Men and women will bathe in the same pools without shocking the modesty of anyone.

The Greeks of both sexes used to perform gymnastics in public, always in the nude. In Germany some thousands of men and women have formed societies, who have agreed to appear together in the nude with the object of the improvement of morals, and there can be no doubt that those nations who make a point of hiding their bodies are not the most moral.

There is evidence to show that in India in former times it was not the custom to hide the body. One of the great causes of sexual excitement and immorality at the present day is, not the uncovering of certain portions of the body, but the fact of keeping just the sexual parts clothed. This is suggestive, and suggestion is one of the means of causing sexual excitement. How well this fact is understood by those whose business or pleasure it is to do it!

All right-minded persons will agree that modesty in all things is desirable, but false modesty does more harm than good.

If sexual matters were treated as a subject for ordinary conversation, instead of being considered improper, then suggestive remarks would cease to be suggestive and would lose their savour and the world would be a cleaner and healthier place.

There are signs that a new era of candour in sexual matters may be approaching. At present we are only in a transitory stage, and it is only when a complete reform is affected that we can hope for really beneficial results.

There is a growing recognition for the necessity of educating children in the mysteries of sex. Several books have been written on the subject and articles on the same subject appear, from time to time, in various papers. Conferences of school teachers have been held in England to discuss the desirability of imparting instruction in these matters in schools.

The general opinion appears to be in favour of giving children instruction in sex knowledge, and the methods advocated of imparting the instruction are, on the whole, much the same. Most people agree that it is the duty of parents to impart this instruction, but it is realized that as so many parents will shirk the duty it should also be undertaken by responsible teachers in schools in the interest of public morality and for the benefit of the race.

Truly, the boy is father of the man and the children of today will be the parents, perhaps not of tomorrow, but a few years hence.

Whether the world is to be a better place than it is now or not, depends on the ideas that are created in the rising generation. If children are brought up to regard each other's bodies as a part of nature and not as a mystery, there is some hope that in the course of a few generations adults may have less false modesty and cleaner minds.

Mr. SHINDE'S 66th BIRTHDAY.

Karmavir V. R. Shinde's 66th birthday celebrations took place on Monday the 23rd instant at 9 a.m. at the Depressed Classes Mission, Abhay-aham Hall at Irwin Road, Nana Peth, Poona City. Rao Bahadur D. L. Sahasrabhinde of the Agricultural College, Poona, presided. Mr. G. Jagga, P. L. S., Principal of the Shri Shivaji Maratha High School conducted a divine service on the occasion after which a fine song and dialogue by the Poona D. C. M. School children was gone through. Mr. G. H. Tankale, a local poet and worker of the Mission Sangha recited a poem of 68 verses specially composed by him in honour of Mr. Shinde which were highly appreciated by the gathering. Mr. S. R. Thorat, a vice-President of the Poona Mission, Mr. Rajabheja, Secretary of the Samaj Saras Sangha, Subedar B. S. Ghate, Councillor of the Poona City Municipality, Mr. Govindram Gadgil, Bar-at-law, and Mr. K. G. Bajade, a. a. a. a. in their speeches paid glowing tributes to Mr. Shinde and the members of his family for their manifold services particularly towards the Depressed Classes and wished Mr. Shinde many happy returns of the day so that he would see the ultimate success of his work. Sister Janabai, life member of the Mission, (Mr. Shinde’s sister), then made a suitable reply on behalf of Mr. Shinde and herself (as Mr. Shinde could not be present there owing to illness) in the course of which she thanked the organizers of the function and referred to the cooperation they received also from the caste-Hindu ladies such as the late Mrs. Ramabai Rane, Mrs. Luxmibai Gadgil and others. And she earnestly hoped that the D. C. Mission would receive in future the same generous support in an increasing measure. Mr. K. G. Patade, Secretary of the Poona D. C. Mission, then read out the statement of results of the last annual examination of the Mission Schools at Poona which were all found to be in a fair condition, and thanked the Poona City Municipality for recognizing Mr. Shinde’s life work by naming the Bhkarwadi Road as Shinde Road. The President in his concluding remarks declared that the sympathy of all communities including his own will always stand with the noble mission work of Mr. Shinde, and wished the secretary to carry his message to him. Mr. D. V. Guikwad proposed a hearty vote of thanks to the chairman and others and the function terminated with distribution of sweets to the children and pan-saput and flowers to others.

“MAN BIOLOGICALLY MONOGAMOUS”

Nothing is the matter with the marriage institution, and monogamy will endure as long as the race, says Count Keyserling, noted German author and philosopher, who is on a lecture tour in America. By the same token Keyserling disapproves of companionate marriage, which he says has “no idealism, no stability, no looking to the traditions of the past or to the race’s future goal.” It is “just sexual satisfaction and sex experimentation.” In an interview with Vera L. Connolly, published in Good Housekeeping, the noted philosopher, whose “Book of Marriages” has attracted much attention, asserts that “marriage will outlive all theories which are made about it. It will outlast all efforts to abolish it. Behind marriage is a law that can never be overturned... Man is biologically monogamous.” There may be changes, Count Keyserling admits, but they will not be fundamental. “Nothing,” he declares, “can abolish monogamous marriage from the earth.” The Bolshevist system of easy marriage and easy divorce has not been a success, says the visitor, and the Russian women wish to return to the marriage ideals of their forefathers. American youth, we are told, should be warned that casual temporary unions “are not marriage at all in the true sense, and that any system which permits numberless marriages to one person is as destructive to a race’s spiritual sense as the Bolshevist custom of calling ‘legal’ a marriage which lasts only an hour.”

As a solution of the present marriage problem, Count Keyserling suggests, not the making of new marriage laws, but “the deepening of the spiritual consciousness.” “Personal responsibility,” he says, “must increase. This alone distinguishes man from the animals. The only way out is greater responsibility.” As practical steps, Count Keyserling suggests:

“Postponement of marriage. We need later marriages. And we must make marriage more difficult. We must place character developing obstacles and delays in the way of animal fulfillment. Only mature people, capable of judgment, and who know life, should go into marriage. No man and woman ought to marry until each has tested out his or her soul alone. Unless a man can live satisfactorily alone, he can not grow in marriage. And the same is true of a woman.”

“The custom in the United States is to rush into marriage before character is formed, before the sort of growth which can be achieved only if loneliness is attained. The result is the vast amount of unhappiness that we see around us. Companionate marriage encourages a union before the character is formed. That is another of its bad points.

“Consider the facts of marriage! They are bound to work changes in the individual. Unless the individual foresees this, and has some conception as to how they will change him, he can not make an intelligent choice of a partner. Another argument for late marriages!”

“Marriage is not a state of bliss. Some people expect too much of it. The best marriage is that one which takes care of the growth of the two individuals concerned. If both do not grow, the marriage is a failure.”

“Some claim that earlier marriages make for better health. But health is not all. We are not animals. Health, sanitation, happiness—these are not the ends of a man’s existence, or of a woman’s. The aim of existence, the purpose of it, is inner growth. The right kind of marriage promotes this growth of the soul. The wrong kind chokes it at its roots.”

Divorce is not a valuable aid in solving the modern marriage problem, Count Keyserling told his interviewer, though it may serve a good end for those who have entered into wrong marriages through carelessness and irresponsibility. “But it is an ugly way,” he says. “It always degrades. You can not make divorce anything but degrading. I have never seen any one,” he declares, “who has not been made worse by being divorced.” “But doesn’t the suffering caused by going through divorce sometimes aid spiritual growth, Count Keyserling?”
asked his interviewer. Hear his reply as she puts it down:

"'No!" vehemently, his blue eyes flashing. 'A great tragedy develops us. Noble sorrow develops us. But sordidness never develops any one. And a divorce is sordid, a terrible thing. Public. Cheaping! I say again, I have never seen any one go through it without deteriorating. If a man or woman is able to live through a divorce without being deeply wounded, he or she must have an undeveloped soul. And to me the idea of an individual passing through numbers of marriages and divorces is horrible! In the person who can do this, there is little that is spiritual or fine. No one of real value could do it.'

"And what is the solution of the divorce problem?" "Prevention! Not more or easier divorce laws. Postpone marriage and make it far more difficult, so that only two serious adults will enter it perhaps after years of waiting and self-sacrifice. If boys and girls were educated to a right view of marriage and the responsibilities it involves, they would not blunder into foolish early marriages when grown."

Count Keyserling is happily married, the father of two children, and he told his interviewer that he is "learning more and more every day what love is," which led him to reply to his interviewer's next question whether marriage should be a love-mate or based on convenience:

"Love is the only justification of marriage! There are too many people who marry because of momentary passion, desire for a home, or some other equally absurd and frivolous idea. Marriage should be based on unselfish love." - The Literary Digest, New York.

AMERICAN MARRIAGE.

Several important questions concerning American marriage are asked and answered by William F. Ogburn of Columbia University in "Social Forces" for September. Dr. Ogburn's answers are brief and statistical, a mere skeleton of the investigation that could be made. But they constitute at least a suggestive and interesting beginning of the scientific study of one of the three great events in the life of the individual. Is marriage a desirable state? he asks, and points out that the death rate of single men is nearly twice that of the married men; that there is more crime among unmarried men and that more single than married men—and women too—go mad. As to the extent of marriage, Dr. Ogburn shows that civilization seems to discourage marriage. At the maximum marriage age 35 to 45, two persons in ten are not living in marriage and one in ten persons over 45 years of age in United States have never married. As to the third question—"broken marriages"—in 1934, there was one divorce granted to about seven marriages performed. The main cause of divorce is cruelty, a rather broad term. In regard to sex differences in marriage, Dr. Ogburn finds that as marriage still means to many women a "livelihood" and to men an economic drain, women tend to marry earlier than men. The existence of prostitution also tends to encourage men to postpone marriage.

Under 35 years there are more married women than men; but more married men than women in the later years. This is not due to a larger death-rate of women, but to the greater tendency of men to remarry and to choose young women as second wives. The maximum percentage married is not, as one would suppose, where the sexes are about equal in numbers, but where there is an excess of men. As to age, besides the fact already mentioned that the marriage of women is earlier than that of men, Dr. Ogburn's study shows that of both sexes taken together the later twenties have become the commonest years of marriage, and this delay, while economically desirable he holds to be wrong for biological reasons. That the marriage rate has increased in the last thirty years is another fact Dr. Ogburn has gleaned from the Census. Another is that—probably because other occupations than domestic service, paid or unpaid, are open to the city woman—the city shows ten per cent fewer marriages than the country. Other questions bring out geographical and racial marriage rates throughout the United States.

Of Birth Control in this connection Dr. Ogburn says: "One is also curious to know whether Birth Control influences marriage. Some persons argue that it does, because then there is not at once the economic burden of children. Others argue that it encourages sexual intercourses outside of marriage. Cities with lower birth-rates have larger percentages of young people married, while the age of the wives is approximately the same from city to city. There is thus an indication that Birth Control may encourage marriage."—Birth Control Review.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

A Profit-Sharing Scheme:—An Associated Press message says:—The Directors of the Tata Iron and Steel Co., announce the introduction of a profit-sharing scheme at their Works from the beginning of this month. The scheme was introduced at the recent Labour Conference held at Patna recently. Mr. C. F. Andrews, referring to this announcement, stated that the profit-sharing programme was a great step forward. He hoped that the announcement would do much to allay the present labour unrest, which was very acute. Mr. Andrews also made it clear, at a mass meeting held after the announcement, that the Labour Association would be consulted by the General Manager of the Company on the details of the scheme. This also, he regarded as a distinct step forward.

Bihar Women's Conferences:—The Bihar Women's Conference on educational reform was held at Patna recently. The Conference was convened by Mrs. P. K. Sen as a member of the Standing Committee of the All-India Women's Conference on Educational Reform, A message of sympathy from the Educational Minister was read in the Conference, which was presided over by Mrs. Manchur Ltd. Resolutions passed were on Primary education, change of curriculum, and abolition of child marriage. The delegates who had come from different parts of the province took an active part in the deliberations of the Conference. The proposal for holding the next All India Conference at Patna was placed before the meeting by Mrs. P. K. Sen, and is evoked great enthusiasm. About 40 ladies volunteered to work for the annual session. A strong and representative Working Committee was formed to carry on the programme of the constituted Conference, and it is expected that work would be started in right earnest very soon.

The Holy Carpet.—An event of considerable importance to the Moslem world happened last week at Delhi when the Holy Carpet and Curtain were opened to public view. Till two years ago the Holy carpet was manufactured and sent to Mecca by Egypt. The practice was stopped by the intervention of Wahabees. This year Ibn Saud got the articles manufactured at Delhi. The carpet and curtain were manufactured under special supervision by artisans from Iran. The carpet is one yard broad and sixty-four yards long and divided into sixty-four parts on which verses of the Quran are embroidered. Similarly embroidered is the curtain which is seven yards long and three and a half yards broad. The experts hold that all the articles were of exquisite beauty, fifty per cent. superior to that of Egypt. Both the articles, which are called “Mahamal”, would shortly be sent to Mecca under special care.

Buddhism in India: The statement that Buddhism was driven out of India is very misleading. Buddhism was never expelled in the sense that Judaism was expelled from Palestine. Post-Buddhist Hinduism is in large part an adaptation from Buddhism. Animal sacrifices were given up and the monastic principle was introduced in Hindu religious organisation. Ascetic ideals became dominant. Women came to be looked upon as a hindrance to the spiritual life, and Hindu sociologists have attributed the restrictions imposed on them in post-Buddhist Hinduism as due to Buddhist influence. It is the fact that many of these customs were not common in pre-Buddhist times. These, of course, are contrary to Buddhist ideals, but Buddhism had become adapted to them in the middle ages. An influential school of Hindu sociologists also regard the 'untouchables' as Buddhists who refused to accept post-Buddhist Hinduism. However that may be, there is today a growing movement for the revival of Buddhism. The term 'renaisance' is perhaps more appropriate, as what is sought to be promoted is a purified Buddhism in accord with modern ideas. Last Friday, the triple anniversary of the birth, enlightenment, and dissolution of Gautama Sakyamuni was celebrated in many parts of the country. The motives behind the renaisance are somewhat mixed. Mr. Ganga Charan Lal in the Young Celt recommends it as a panacea 'for our so-called ills. Some others are attracted to it as a means of receiving the cultural and promoting the political solidarity of Eastern Asia. There are, of course, others who genuinely feel that the teachings of Buddha contain the essence of religion. Buddha and Jesus Christ, says Professor Hofding in his 'Philosophy of Religion,' divide the allegiance of mankind. The future world religion must be a synthesis of the two, and they, instead of dividing would unite the allegiance of mankind.

Racialism in Indian Services:—Nearly a century ago the British Parliament laid down in statutory form the principle that Indians should not be debarred from public offices on account of caste, colour or creed. Later, when recruitment for the higher Services was by open competition, the examinations were held in London and very few Indians could afford the costs. Apart from caste restrictions on sea voyage, of spending several years in England for passing the tests. As the years passed and the prejudice against sea voyage weakened, more Indians competed and got in through the competitive door which still was in England. As the number of successful Indians increased, complaints began from vested interests of the British element being swamped by Indians. Latterly, when admissions to these services are made in India as well as in England, the principle of racial equality has been openly given up and special pleas are being advanced for maintaining a high proportion of Englishmen in the Services. The most recent and the most far-reaching of this kind, is an order of the Secretary of State published this week, reserving the highest posts in the Indian Medical Service, exclusively for British officers who, however, are equally eligible with Indians for the posts not so reserved. The reason assigned for this invidious distinction is that European civilians require European doctors to treat them and their families. We suppose they would rather die than be cured by a coloured man. The facts that European practitioners have been practically ousted from private practice in important centres by Indian medical men notwithstanding the official prejudice against them, shows that Indians make quite as capable doctors as anybody, and are as unacquainted with the ways of life of the people. It is sheer race prejudice which underlies orders of this kind, and yet it is Indian politicians that are frequently charged with raising racial issues.

Japan and China:—There has been a serious clash between Japan and China. When the Northern and Southern Chinese nationalists were fighting last year, Japan followed a policy of admirable self-restraint, while it was Great Britain which by its policy of interference attracted to itself considerable odium. It is not easy to see why Japan has departed from her former wise attitude this time. Anyhow the fact is clear that she has got herself into a very tight corner and it is the wisdom of the statesmen more than the valour of her army that can extricate her from it. China is fighting for her national independence and the sympathy of the people of India are with her in her great struggle to emancipate herself from alien control. People in the position of the Chinese are entitled to be judged generously in respect of the measures they may feel called upon to take to secure freedom. The strict rules of war do not apply to a people who are engaged in expelling troublesome intruders into their affairs.
THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

May 12

Public feeling is not favourable to Japan whose imperialistic policy is responsible for her interference in the Chinese struggle to establish a strong national government in their country. Japan's position between Russia and China on the one side and the United States on the other, is by no means so assured as to make it safe for her to indulge in costly imperialistic exploits. China has asked the United States to mediate, and the latter has agreed provided Japan also joins in the request. We hope Japan will readily do so. By the way, it is significant that it is America and not Great Britain whose friendly services have been invoked by China.

An Inadequate Remedy.—We publish today an illuminating article by Dr. Clifford Manshardt on the American proposals to conclude a multilateral treaty between the United States, France, Great Britain, Italy, Germany and Japan to abolish war. One consideration, and an important one, which has escaped Dr. Manshardt's attention, is that all the six countries are wedded to imperialism, and that five of them—Germany having been dispossessed of her colonial possessions by the Treaty of Versailles—are actually holding down nations and peoples with whom they have no racial or cultural affinity by sheer military strength. Their imperialism is inextricably rooted in militarism and for them to join together to abolish war is to fix the yoke of subjection firmly on the necks of coloured races. In other words the abolition of war between these nations is merely entering into a compact to exploit the weaker races and is only a new edition of the old concert of Europe. Unless these nations begin by themselves renouncing the use of force in their relations with subject races, the proposal has no basis in reality. What should be outlawed is not only war which is but a symptom but also imperialism and all similar imposition by force of the power or trade of one country over another.

Viresalingam Pantulu's Autobiography.—Rao Bahadur Viresalingam Pantulu, the dauntless pioneer of the widow remarriage reform in the Madras Presidency, was also the creator of Telugu prose literature. His style is terse, vigorous and incisive and has scarcely been equalled by any other writer. Viresalingam published during the last years of his life an autobiography which is an illuminating record of the difficulties and dangers which he had to encounter in consequence of his social reform activities. Mr. Narasimmbacharya, a talented young Telugu lawyer who has settled down in Bombay, has undertaken an English translation of this very interesting work. The first few chapters are already in type, but the work is hampered by lack of funds. We urge our readers to assist in the completion of this project.

A Correction.—We had published a few weeks back a note on the decision of the Pama High Court in the Tikari case in which we had referred to the Raja of Tikari as a Hindu ruling Prince. The United India and Indian States contains a correction in its current number. It writes:—

"The Indian Social Reformer, a few weeks back, thus referred to the same case. "There is a case now pending in India in which a Hindu ruling Prince is reported to have raised the same plea (that a Hindu cannot contract a valid marriage with an English woman)." Our contemporary is mistaken in believing that the Raja of Tikari is a ruling Prince. He is only a Zamindar and any decision affecting him, will not affect the Rulers of Indian States, who are in these matters governed by quite other rules and conventions."

The Sikhs and Women's Education.—The Secretary, Sikh Istri Vidyaik Committee, Jullundur, writes:—"The Doaba Sikhs immigrants in U. S. A. and Canada: understand the importance of female education. It is through their financial support that the Doaba Sikhs have taken great strides in the field of education of boys. Now the U. S. A. Sikhs have provided money for making arrangements for female education in the Doaba. They have up till now collected about a lakh of rupees and it is hoped the Canadian (Doaba) Sikhs would by their efforts double this amount. A representative Doaba Sikh Istri Vidyaik Committee has been constituted, and after the addition of ten representatives of the U. S. A. and Canadian Doaba Sikhs, it will be declared duly and finally constituted. Pending the election of the remaining portion, temporary office bearers have been elected and a temporary Working Committee has been formed. A propaganda Sub-Committee has been formed to carry on a continuous campaign against those who are opposed to female education and to enlist sympathy of the general public with the cause.

South African Indian Education.—The Indian Education Inquiry Commission, formed as a result of the agreement between the Union Government and the Government of India, began its sitting in the Provincial Council Buildings on Monday April 2 and continued up to Thursday the 5th instant. The Commission will sit again on April 17 and 18 when the Natal Indian Congress will present its statement. The members of the Commission are Mr. J. Dysoy (chairman), Mr. C. P. Clarkson, Mr. J. A. Luigi, Mr. F. H. Aclott, Mr. A. L. Pretorius, Mr. E. Pelit and the terms of reference are as follows:—"The existing facilities as a whole in town and country areas; the conditions of service of Indian teachers in Government and Government-aided Schools, including salary, promotion, discipline, and pension; the present system of Provincial grants-in-aid, and many changes which may be considered to be necessary; the financial basis of Indian education, having regard to the resources of the Province, the various demands upon them, and adequacy of the existing Union Government subsidies in so far as they affect Indian education."

The Strike Situation.—The General Strike in the Bombay textile mills and the strike at Jamshedpur while results, have remained unchanged during the week. The Government of India are said to be contemplating the early introduction of a Bill for compulsory arbitration in trade disputes. This legislation has been long over-due.
The Parsi Laws Revision Committee have proposed wide changes in the sections of the Marriage Act relating to nullity, separation and divorce. The nullity section is altogether omitted and the two grounds, insanity and impotence, are made grounds for divorce." The committee explain their reasons for this proposal. The legitimacy of a child born of a marriage of which one of the parties was insane before marriage, is affected if the marriage is declared void for that reason. This is not just. In the case of insanity after marriage, their reasons are less convincing and, indeed, rather far-fetched. They observe:

"A Parsi marriage is not a mere contract. Interests of race and State are also to be considered. Persons who are, therefore, unfit to enter into the state of matrimony and propagate healthy children on account of mental infirmity should not be permitted to do so. For similar reasons measures should be taken to prevent intercourse between persons who become unfit after marriage to have healthy children. The incurably insane have usually to be removed from their own homes and confined and isolated in asylums. Anything approaching family life is therefore impossible. Insanity brings to an end nearly every phase of marriage."

The Committee in these observations make assumptions for which there is no proof. Insanity is an exceedingly general term. There are men and women who are normally sane, but absolutely lose their balance where some pet aversion is concerned. It is very difficult to say that any form of insanity is incurable. Scientific psychology is bringing many obscure regions of the human mind under investigation and control. At a result of this development, the institutions for the treatment of the mentally unsound are no longer called "insane asylums." They are now known as "mental hospitals." Insanity may be a good cause for temporary separation while the malady lasts. The Committee have unnecessarily embarrassed themselves by importing considerations of race and State into their conception of marriages.

The Committee do not favour judicial separation as a permanent remedy for marital incompleteness. "Permanent separations without divorce," they say "lead to immorality." They propose a new section for temporary separation for certain reasons. An order of temporary separation for three years is constituted a special ground for divorce. The idea is that if within that time the parties are not reconciled they should be divorced. The two grounds on which temporary separation may be obtained, under the Committee's draft proposals, are cruel treatment and venereal disease in a communicable form. Cruelty is also by itself proposed as a ground for divorce. It is left to the discretion of the victim whether in case of cruelty the suit shall be for temporary separation or divorce. Venereal disease is no longer regarded as incurable and a wife or husband who gets a separation order on this ground cannot ordinarily expect to resume friendly relations at the end of the term for which the order is granted. It is evident that the Committee have no great faith in the efficacy of separation orders and they would not much mind if this part of their proposals is dropped or divorce.

In the present Act, adultery is the only ground on which divorce may be thought. In the proposed Bill, this is increased to eight, namely: (1) adultery, (2) desertion for four years, (3) cruelty, (4) incurable insanity, (5) imprisonment for other than a political offence, (6) separation for three years, (7) conversion to other religions, and (8) pregnancy at the time of marriage by some person other than the husband. The Committee explain that they have purposely omitted making habitual drunkenness and mutual consent, as grounds of divorce in conformity with the principle that "no law should be so lax as to lessen the regard for the sanctity of marriage." Under the regime of the Panchayat, previous to the enactment of the present Act, drunkenness, forgazi (mutual consent) and other circumstances were recognised grounds of divorce. Of 95 cases of divorce granted by the Panchayat in five years, 61 or two-thirds, says Dr. Dadachanji in his minute of dissent, were granted on the ground of forgazi or mutual consent, which required only formal sanction granted after due investigation of the terms by the Panchayat. The Panchayats recognised 15 specific grounds, including the eight proposed by the Committee, and in addition granted divorce for any cause which they deemed sufficient. Dr. Dadachanji holds that the community under the Panchayat regime were quite content and happy, whereas the Marriage Act as described by the late Mr. Justice Davar is "a curse in disguise and a calamity to the community."

Dr. Dadachanji's passionate plea for social "swaraj" is out of date. Sixty years ago, the Parsis, like other Indian Communities, lived a self-contained life. The fact that even at that date the leaders of the community asked for and obtained special Acts dealing with marriage and succession, shows that the community had emerged out of the regime of custom. Dr. Dadachanji idealises the Panchayat system. As a rough and ready means of deciding village quarrels, it had its use, but it is utterly unsuitable to deal with the affairs of such a highly urbanised community as the Parsis. The Committee's recommendations are more moderate but it is doubtful how far the community will accept them. The recommendations for making divorce easier and cheaper. Mr. M. P. Khareghat whose long judicial experience and high character lend his views considerable weight, we see, reserves his opinion on much of the report, and several other members of the committee do likewise. Perhaps the Committee intended the draft only to be a basis for further discussion. As such, the report is of much interest not only to Parsis but also to other communities.
BUDDHIST RENAISSANCE IN INDIA.

THE BOMBAY CELEBRATIONS.

A marked progress in the annals of the Buddha Society is to be seen this year in the laying down of the Foundation Stone of the Vihara and starting a magazine, the "Buddha Message" with Prof. S. V. Phadnis as Editor. On the 4th of May 1928 a distinguished gathering attended the morning function when Dr. Nair laid the Foundation Stone of the "Sakyamuni Vihara".

The anniversary address was delivered by Rai Bahadur Pandit Shio Narayan (Adviser) of Lahore, at the public meeting in the evening. Panditji is one of the few persons who have devoted themselves to the cause of the revival of Buddha's teachings in this country. After Dr. Hydari of Hyderabad had introduced Pandit Shio Narayan, he delivered his address. To begin with the Panditji analysed the motto of Buddhism which is well-known as the Triple "Sharanas". "I come to the enlightened Buddha," does not mean that one has to surrender oneself to the worship of Buddha. It only shows the faith in true enlightenment, shore of dogmas and superstitions. The second sharanas, viz. "I come to the Dharma," refers to the duties and obligations imposed by the inexorable moral law. The third part of the formula emphasizes the brotherhood of man and asserts that the human race is one family.

Proceeding Panditji said that Buddhism was no label. The name did not matter. Teachings and doctrines were dearer to the Master than any consideration of personality however great. Call of the present age is for science, for liberty, for faith in reason, and that is why the lecturer thought Buddha's teachings were surcharged with a force of universal appeal. Coming to what Buddha thought for the first time in the history of mankind Panditji said that there were absolutely no malevolent and indignant powers in the universe whom you were called upon to appease by any outward ceremony, ritual, or sacrifice. Nothing was designed for evil and that the world was governed by laws and order. Another principle which we owe to Buddha is that life is a grand kinship and life is sacred. This idea not only embraced the human but also extended to the sub-human kingdoms. The lecturer claimed originality for this great teaching of Buddha to hold all living things as holy. The next fundamental teaching and reform of the Lord related to Brotherhood of man. He set no limits of an ethnic, territorial or communal or class character. "We have yet to act upon it," repeated Panditji. This great teaching is only partially carried out so far. No doubt in those days the making of slaves and taking of life was considered to be the privileges of man. Buddha for the first time condemned slavery, hymen and cruelty. Emancipation of slavery and kindness to animals are the corner stones of Buddha's doctrine. The next point that the lecturer developed was the supreme tenet that the law of Causation is operative. This is daily being recognized. Every action brings its own result. Every man, according to Buddha's teaching, is responsible for the manner in which he enters upon each life, for, his Karma determines how and in what state he shall be. It is therefore impossible for him to blame chance or circumstances.

"This was" the great Buddha taught "the land of misery," and therefore it was our duty to extricate ourselves from the tangle of rebirth. Misery existed and because it existed, it brought on a cycle of births. The extrication from sorrow and sufferings lay through what Buddha called a middle path, a life of sobriety, simplicity and morality. This was the Buddhism that the Lord gave to the world and it is an irony of fate that through the chequered history of Buddhism in different lands, its pristine purity came to be lost in some respects. Apart from the fortunes of rise and fall of Buddhist missions in different lands, the lecturer feelingly chronicles the recent achievements of archeology and the Buddhist literature. In the light of these achievements a time was come when a new history of India ought to be written. Paying a glowing tribute to Lord Curzon, the founder of the Archeology Department, he referred to the work of European scholars whose labours have thrown a flood of light on all these things. In his peroration, Panditji said with the warmth of personal tinge when he referred to places like Kapilavastu (the birth-place of Buddha), Buddha Gaya where he meditated, Nalanda and Sravasti where he preached. All these places are excavated or located and it was Mr. Carlyle a European scholar, who at a great sacrifice collected various fragments and putting them together has given us an image of the Lord in the Parinirvana posture at Oasis in Gorakhpur District. Panditji finally exhorted his audience to revive the old and pure Buddhism of the Buddha which he said might be delayed but could not be thwarted and he expressed his hope that the Buddhism will be the world religion in future, not in the shape of mass conversion necessarily but as a triumph of principles which the world eventually would recognize. He congratulated the Bombay citizens for their fellow-feeling and cosmopolitan spirit in which they assembled to participate in the celebrations of the Buddha Day.

Mr. G. K. Nariman moved a vote of thanks to the learned lecturer and incidentally corroborated citing the archeological evidence that was coming forward from countries like Afghanistan, after which the celebrations terminated with loud acclamations.

S. INDIAN BUDDHIST CONFERENCE.

The following is the Presidential Address of Prof. Lakshmi Narasimha at the Third South Indian Buddhist Conference.—

The First South Indian Buddhist Conference was held in the year 1917, the second in the year 1920. This is the Third Conference, which owes its sitting to the strenuous exertions of Mr. V. P. S. Manier. Between this Conference and the first eleven years...
Buddhism is the religion taught by Buddha. A Buddha is one who has attained Bodhi which means intellectual and ethical perfection attained through purely human means, without resort to any thing supernatural. Of the many Buddhist histories, it has preserved for us only the name of Sakyamuni. He is unnecessary here to speak of the life of Sakyamuni. We all know how he was moved by suffering, age and death, the grievance common to all mankind. He left his family and palace with a view to find the means of getting rid of these sufferings and sorrows of mankind. He retired to the forest, put himself under the guidance of various teachers, but found no satisfaction in their teachings. Then he had recourse to self-mortification to find if that would reveal to him the true way. But he found that self-mortification only weakened the flesh. Thus he arrived at the conclusion that all asceticism had no practical use in arriving at the truth. He therefore once again began to eat and drink, and after gaining sufficient bodily strength gave himself up to intelligent reflection. He clearly saw that only intelligence rightly used could reveal the truth.

By this intelligent reflection he arrived at certain definite results. These definite results together constitute what we call S ANY D H A R M A , A N A T H A D H A R M A or RATHVURUDHARMA as distinguished from the S A N T H I D H A R M A of the Brahmins.

The religion that was in vogue in India at the time of Sakyamuni was the Brahmin religion called the Saithi Dharma by the Buddhists. This religion, was wholly ritualistic consisting in the performance of Yagna and Homa to control the gods and remove pollutions. The Brahmins professed to be very gods on earth, because by their mantras and ritual they could control the gods in heaven. Sakyamuni saw through the falsity of these pretensions. He preached that these mantras and rituals were only a means of livelihood for the Brahmins. He pointed out that kindness (Ahimsa) to all creatures was the first step towards ethical improvement. As sacrifices involve the killing of animals they will only brutalise man instead of improving him. The Brahmins taught that they alone were entitled to salvation. But Sakyamuni taught that all could attain salvation without distinction of caste, sex, wealth or rank. The Brahmins made a secret of their religion, but Sakyamuni taught his religion to all desirous of knowing it. The Brahmins resorted to miracles for establishing the truth of their religion. On the other hand, Sakyamuni taught that conversion should be made only by instruction and not by miracles. All forms of Brahminical religion are based on authority, namely, the revelation contained in the Vedas. But Buddhism is based on experience (Pratyaksha) and reasoning (Anumana). Even the words of a Buddha are to be rejected, if they do not accord with reason. For a Buddha is only a human teacher and not a god.

In all other religions there is a belief in permanent entities. Buddhism is the only religion which denies all permanent entities. Every other religion speaks of souls and gods which are everlasting. But Buddhism denies that existence of a soul in man and also of an Isvara (creator of the universe). Buddhism regards the belief in Atman as the greatest stumbling block to progress.

The belief is the source of all superstition. So long as man believes in an immutable soul, there is no possibility of destroying the passions. So long as man is governed by Atmavidya, he will always be thinking of I and Mine. For perfect freedom from suffering and sorrow one has to renounce all idea of I and Mine. That is why Sanyasa is called S A N T H I N A, NIKUNDA PRAKAPA. The end and aim of Buddhism is to destroy the Atmafrakati, and the-ways which it aalopa are directed to this end. Nirvana, which is the goal of Buddhism, is the complete realisation of the nonexistence of soul, and living in accordance with that realisation.

Some say that Buddhism is not a religion, because they think that religion must have some sort of supernatural, such as ghosts, gods, devils, etc. But this is a mistake. If we examine all the religions, the feature common to all of them is this, namely, a feeling of dependence on the unknown in the struggle for self-preservation, and a theory and practice to get over the feeling of dependence. Were man omniscient, he would no have religion. So long as man does not know all about himself and his surroundings, there will be religion of some sort. The only difference between Buddhism and other religions is that all other religions believe in supernatural beings and make men seek their aid for getting salvation, whereas Buddhism discards supernatural beings and makes man depend on himself for his salvation. If man has to depend on himself for his salvation, he can do so only through the co-operation of his fellows. To attain salvation he must get rid of the ideas of I and Mine. He can effect this only by working for the good of others, forgetting of himself. Hence in Buddhism the ethical side is more prominent than the doctrinal side. Still the doctrinal side is no less important than the ethical side. For no one can attain Bodhi without the perception of the voidness (sanyata) of all things and the practice of Karuna.

While in other religions there are dogmas, which are accepted on simple trust, there are none such in Buddhism. Christianity loses all its value, if we deny the supernatural. The same also is the case with Judaism, Islam, and the various Hindu religions. But in Buddhism the supernatural plays no part as a means of salvation. In Buddhism the purification of mind by the avoidance of all that is evil and the doing of all that is good is the only means of attaining the goal. This purification is possible for all who make a strenuous effort. Hence Buddhism makes no difference between man and woman, high and low, rich and poor, Brahmin and Chahala.

Buddhism is the very democracy of religion. For Buddhism the happiness and the good of all is essential. It teaches inordinate compassion for the suffering mankind, and therefore evinces a missionary spirit from its very inception. The greatest gift a Buddhist can give to another is the gift of Sathdharma. It is the duty of every Buddhist to propagate the Anatman teaching of the Buddha for the good and happiness of all.

The Anatman teaching of Buddhism leads to far reaching results. Everything is mutable (anitya); nothing is unconditioned (asa makeup). Everything exists by reason of cause and conditions. Everything is compounded of Dharmas. The production of all by reason of causes is called Pratityasamuthpada. The fundamental philosophical truth of Buddhism is therefore spoken of as Pratityasamuthpada dharma. He who perceives the truth of Pratityasamuthpada perceives the non-existence of Atman (soul). This Pratityasamuthpada as applied to man constitutes what is called Karma. The Buddhist doctrine of Karma is entirely different from the Brahmin doctrine of Karma. In the latter there is a soul transmigrating from life to life. In Buddhism there is no such transmigration. There is nothing permanent in man he is changing from moment to moment. Man consists of five akandas (Rupa, Vedana, Vijnana, Samgna and Samasrana). These vary from moment to moment. There is only continuity (aksanda samatana) but no sameness. This continuity gives rise to the illusion of sameness, just as in the cinema a ‘rapid succession of slightly different pictures gives rise to the illusion of one picture. Karma connects all human beings with one another. Whatever a man may do by way of thought, speech, or deed is never lost. It produces its result sooner or later, either in the man himself or in others who may be connected with the man through the Karmassanatha. The absence of immutable soul in each individual makes it possible to improve the individual by education, that is by training. The training and discipline afforded by the Arya Ashthaanga Margha brings about the necessary changes in the individual to attain complete freedom from sorrow and suffering. All methods such as meditation, dhikra, bhavana, samadhi, lead to the same result, namely, the non-existence of soul, and therefore the necessity of working for the good of others.

Buddhism offers a very simple solution of the problems of the present day. If each has to work for his own salvation, he can train himself and make him fit for the realisation of his own salvation, we have the best basis for a proper social, economic, and political life. There need be no quarrels between individuals, communities and nations. All should cooperate with one another for their mutual good. All commercialism, industrialism, nationalism will soon find their end, when the humanitarian spirit, so characteristic of Buddhism, becomes the patrimony of all. Ahankara is the source of all evil, and Ahankara will not cease its evil work so long as Atmadrhiti prevails. May we hope for the day when the whole world will accept the NAIBATMYA teaching of our compassionate and enlightened Master and obtain the peace which the world now clamours for!

BUDDHISM AND INDIA.

Mr. Gnga Charan Lal writes in the Young East, Japan—I have no patience with men who say that Buddhism had its days in India. For me to accept this assertion laying down will mean that I have no faith in myself, no faith in the message of the Master. If the message that the Master delivered in India two thousand five hundred years ago is as true today as it was then, if it can solve the problems that face us, if it can free us from the entanglements of castes and sub-castes, abolish the dreadful monster which goes under the name of “Untouchability,” if it can do away with Purdh, if it can emancipate the woman of India, if it can abolish child marriages and polygamy, there is no reason why Buddhism, should not come to its own in the land of its birth and the motherland of the Master.

It will be a foolish and vain attempt to transplant the Buddhism of China and Japan or Burma and Ceylon in India. It will not be possible and will not be useful to do so.

What we Indian Buddhist should do is to be the pioneers of a Buddhist Renaissance. We must spread our wings and cover the whole of India. We must not be tied down with the accepted or current interpretations of a particular Buddhist sect or country, but should be free to interpret the message of the Master to the needs of modern India. If we do this and are at the same time prepared for the sacrifices of a missionary life, success is bound to come. More acceptance of Buddhism as a philosophy, mere arm chair propaganda will not do. We must come in the field and work. There are seven cresses of depressed classes who have been kept in bondage by the cruel caste system, who are simply waiting for the life-giving and vitalising message of the Master. Is there one who will carry it to them? There are thousands and thousands of educated young men who are sick of the antiquated, dogmas and the soul killing social customs and who feel the shackles of castes and sub-castes. The spirit of revolt is in them and manifests in diverse ways. What can these young men do? They are embelishments of that power which can sweep off all obstacles. Is there one who will harness this power into action? The whole face of India can be changed by these young men, these very spirits, if only they are made to feel the power that is in the
The outlawry of war.

(By Dr. Clifford Manshardt, Ph.D.)

At the present time there is considerable discussion in the public press regarding the American proposals for the outlawry of war. To the people of America outlawry means one thing; for the people of Europe it appears to mean another. When the American speaks of outlawry he means the absolute abandonment of force as a means of settling international disputes. When the European speaks of outlawry he seems to regard it as only another form of arbitration treaty, marking an advance over the Locarno Treaties or the agreements within the League of Nations.

The outlawry of war was first proposed by a Chicago lawyer within the last six or seven years. As he examined the various proposals for lessening the chances of war he felt an underlying weakness, six, the reliance upon force as a means of preventing the resorting to force. Accordingly he set himself to draft a form of international agreement that would rely for its authority upon the moral conscience of the nations. Men need to kill each other in duels, he argued. Duelling was legal and was regarded as a gentlemanly way of settling disputes. But with the awakening conscience men began to regard duelling as wrong. Laws were passed against it, and today duelling with the intention of killing has become practically an outlawed custom. Time was when men need to take the law into their own hands and revenge themselves upon their adversaries. "An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth," was the motto. But in the course of time men came to see that law was the only sound basis for a civilised state and murder was outlawed. Is not the time at hand, asked Mr. Levinson, for the outlawry of war?

The proposed plan for outlawry was first published in a religious journal with a relatively small circulation. Another journal took up the idea. It attracted the attention of an outstanding philosopher, of ministers and educators, and of a distinguished United States Senator. The movement spread, culminating in the proposal of Secretary Kellogg to the French government that "the government of the United States desires to see the institution of war abolished and stands ready to conclude with the French, British, Italian, German, and Japanese governments a single multilateral treaty open to subsequent adherence by any and all other governments, binding the parties thereof not to resort to war with one another." Today this proposal is being discussed throughout the world and is attracting the most careful consideration.

Writing in a recent issue of the Christian Century, (U.S.A.) Mr. Levinson discusses the confusion arising from the failure to distinguish between an arbitration treaty and a treaty to abolish war. An arbitration treaty "indicates the controversies that will and will not be arbitrated. The treaty to outlaw war says that whether the controversy is within the scope of the arbitration treaty or not, neither nation will go to war with the other about it. The gift of an outlawry treaty is the unconditional agreement of each nation that even if diplomacy, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, judicial procedure all fail, it will not attempt to 'settle' any dispute by force.... The outlawry of war as an institution needs no reservation."

The outlawry of war does not mean that arbitration and like methods of conciliation will be abandoned. The advocates of outlawry are "friendly to the processes of arbitration, conciliation, and conference, but they insist that none of these can operate effectively in time of crisis in competition with the war system....Nothing will so advance the efficacy of arbitration as the absolute renunciation of war. Judicial procedure is merely the extension into greater efficacy of the theory of arbitration. Conferences are vital to every process of making and maintaining peace. But the conferences should be held under the reign of peace and not under the reign of war. The conference table must not be decorated with loaded revolvers."

The advocates of outlawry realise that the various nations are committed by treaties to go to war under certain conditions, but they venture to believe that the general acceptance of the outlawry idea will obviate the necessity for the exercise of these commitments.

Another objection arises from the unwillingness of some of the nations to outlaw "defensive" war. But here again who is able to define the terms defence and aggression. Every war that has ever been fought has been characterized as a defensive war. "You do not outlaw an institution if you leave half of it remaining....The institution of war must be de-legalized, outlawed, abolished......" This is following the trend that civilisation has been compelled to pursue for its own preservation when other institutions have in the course of time become insidious to society and altogether intolerable. This we did with international piracy, with the international slave trade, with duelling, feuds and private wars, with domestic slavery, with wager of battle, and with polygamy. When civilization has determined to get rid of an institution hitherto lawful, but which has become a nuisance, has it ever succeeded by using force, as we sought to do in a war to end war? No institution has ever been gotten rid of by force. And an international institution can be abolished only through the voluntary condemnation and renunciation of it by the sovereign nations in an international treaty culminating in international law. Then we will be rid also of the ghost of defensive war, which is surely a skeleton in the closet of the war system."

The idea of the outlawry of war is undoubtedly destined to become one of the most important issues that will be considered in this generation.

PREVENTION OF UNEMPLOYMENT.

Sir,

If we seek for the true reason for the great dimensions in India, political and religious, it will be found there is unanimity of opinion that the root of communal discord is due to economic causes created through unemployment among the masses in every community.

The numbers of unemployed in India run into millions living in misery and desperation for want of relief. Women and children throughout the towns and villages are crying for food and are dying, and vast areas of unused land are lying waste of a menace to the poor, while workless husbands and fathers have no means to earn a living.

A joint statement issued by Morarji Desai and Mohandas Karamchand, liberal members of Parliament, recently visited India states that "it is a very sad reflection upon civilization that there should be such great masses of people in India dying of lack of food."

A ghastly state of poverty, semi-starvation, sickness and diseases prevail which is almost inconceivable.

"Taking all the factors in India, for every 100 persons employed, there are three employed in the superior posts, 26 skilled and 77 unskilled workers. In other words, for every score of rupias which India could invest in agriculture and industry, there will be employment also found for the educated classes of India, as well as for skilled and unskilled labour.

The question, however, of prevention of unemployment is essentially one of finance to help the workless to undertake work in agriculture, or farming, or college industries to aid rural reconstruction, and it is feasible to raise funds for the purpose by holding annual lotteries, and it will be admitted that it is neither pernicious nor an offence against society to create funds for relief of the workless through the sporting spirit of the public.

India has the assurance of His Excellency the Viceroy in his speech before the Joint Legislatures—"I should welcome it as evidence of a firm resolve to leave no way unsearched that might dissolve the means of meaning India from her present unhappy state."

Help is needed from all in the form of active sympathy and support of the scheme which aims at well-being for every boy and girl that enters upon the battle of life, and for every workless man and woman this must mean a decent living by granting financial assistance to provide work in order to mitigate the starvation of the workless.

The present-day world has innumerable Leagues, but no League for Prevention of Unemployment has yet been created as a permanent institution in India. Would those who are willing to aid in establishing a League for Prevention of Unemployment, kindly send in their names to the Working Committee of the Indian National Congress at Delhi who in their next meeting will be considering the scheme.

Yours etc.,

THE CHILDHOOD OF VENKATASALINGAM PANTALU.*

Being one of the oldest of the towns in the Devaratvarshas, the capital of the Chalukya Kings like Baja Baja Narendra and others, the fountain head of Andhra poets and others, the fountain head of poetry, the native place of Nannayya and other leading poets is now the famous on the river Godavari in several ways, Rajamundry is the town which contains my ancestral home first owned by my paternal great-grand-father, where I was born in the year Kilaka Chitra Sud Trayodasa, on Sunday (Christian Era 1848 April 16th) 3 Ghatas after sun rise. Out is one of the biggest houses in Rajamundry. There were not more than 2 or 3 houses in that town which were equally big in that town which were equally big in that town which were equally big in that town which were equally big in that town. Although my paternal uncle and myself came to a partition and shared the house equally, even the half portion of the house that came to my share is much bigger than many houses in Rajamundry. The room of my birth is situated in the same part of the upstairs building which came to my share and which is in my own possession still. We have removed the partition wall between that room and the hall in our house, and converting the whole into a spacious hall, now use the same as our dining hall. The description of Rajasekhara's house in my Rajasekhara Charitra is more or less that of our house. The very fact of our inhabiting such an ancestral spacious house may itself be an indication of the high status of my ancestors. My grandfather who built that house led a very famous life, and was the Dewan of

under several native missionaries and Deshpandye to whom were dedicated many poetic works, most of which breathed the Satya faith. As I am not one of that numerous classes of people who believe, that without one's own inherent merit one could be respected wholly on account of the greatness of his ancestors, I do not attempt herein to describe the greatness of my ancestors. It would be just sufficient for purposes of this story if I say, that my grandfather Mr. Veerasalingam was very charitably disposed, and earned much fame by giving plots of his landed property in charity. But by an unaccountable fickleness or eccentricity of mind, I feel I cannot resist the temptation of relating here be it conceited, a small fact concerning the fame of my grandfather, which I gathered from my own personal experience. At the age of twenty-five when I was the head-master of an Anglo-vernacular school at Dhavaleswaran, I was returning home on a midsummer day in a boat from Coacanal, where I had gone to see an old friend who was also my class mate. There was not then enough water in the Coocanal Canal. The boat-men, with the greatest difficulty dragging the boat in water which was knee deep. It was midday when the boat slowly touched near a village, and the extreme heat of the sun made it appear as though red hot embers were being winnowed; and as the terrible hot wind blew from sea to sea, its extreme rigours began completely to parch up the throats of those in the boats, and children began to cry, as they could not put up with excessive hunger. There was, however, no chance of the boat reaching Dhavaleswaran before evening. Under these circumstances, the boat-men agreed to tie the boat at that spot and to stop it there on our estuary, until we went into the village, took our meals, and returned thence. I do not even now know how to prepare my own food and hence become utterly incompetent for the purpose by being brought up very indigenously from the very first by my people, who did not allow me to do any usual work. A Brahmin in the boat, however, told me, that he would cook for me if I fed him. Hence, accompanied by that brahmin in that hot weather, when it appeared almost that fire was raining, I repaired to the Karnam's house to that village, which was at a distance of four furbergo from there. I do not now remember the name of that village. It seems that in that village there was no other brahmin house save that of this Karnam. In that hot sun we literally carried each one his own body, rather than walked to that house, and seeing the owner of the house who was engaged in the recitation (Parayam) of the Ramayan, told him that we went there for a meal. Although at that time the inmates of the house had not finished their meal, he said, that they were not of that class who would serve meals for considerations of money payment, that they were not prepared to feed us freely and that there were no people who believed in their village wherein we could get even meal for payment; and in the end, he concluded by giving us the solitary advice to repair quickly to another village. But we beseeched the owner of the house to give us at least some space and the cooking utensils saying that we would fetch rice and other provisions from the local merchant's shop. He said, be reverent, that he would provide us with no more than permission to cook in one corner of his house on our procureing some earthen vessels. Hence while I stood there thinking them without knowing what to do, an old brahmin with big ear-rings who was seated on a plank explaining Valsikhi's Ramayan asked me what is your surname? I replied "Kandukurivam." He again questioned me What is your name? I told him my name. Then uttering the name of my grandfather he asked me Is he related to you? I informed him of our relationship saying He is only my grandfather. As soon as he heard these words, he at once got up from his seat, and giving me a seat, requested me that was standing all the while to be seated; and showing me the utmost honor praised my grandfather in several ways, informing the Karnam at the same time so to how he (my grand-father) gave him a piece of that in charity and honored him. The Karnam at once went in leaving the Ramayan which he was most devotedly reading through, on his seat, made certain arrangements came out within five or six minutes, and showing me excessive attention asked me to perform the aarti which he unknowingly showed me. As a result of this conversation, within less than an hour, a very hearty meal was vouchsafed to us with cow's ghee, hard card, two curries, and sweet-meats. Soon after meal, I saluted the old Brahmin and the owner of the house, and thanking them for their hospitality took leave of them, got into the boat over again, and returned home at Dhavaleswaran by the same evening. Although I do not know my grand-father who left this world within less than a year after my birth, I am usually put up with pride at my being, his great-nephew whenever I remember the above incident.

Although for my marriage as bef 0 every other auspicious occasion, my paternal uncle used to show my horoscope to all the astrologers to determine the exact astrological moments, as my faith in astrological predictions had been shortest a long time ago, after I attained the age of discretion. I did not see much or even to see her horoscope. I was not even aware of the fact that my horoscope was with me. But when I was searching the old papers in my house some years age for some purpose, I accidentally came across my horoscope written by Mr. Buddhviya Kanakrajju the father-in-law of my paternal uncle. Although in its consequences I have not the least faith, since I believe that for the investigation of the seekers after truth it may serve some purpose, I take care to give it elsewhere in this autobiography.

Although at the earlier stages of my life I had the utmost faith in astrology, the more I observed several facts such as, that many persons who were predicted in their horoscopes to be destined to possess long lives have in fact become abortive, that many who were said to become very rich have in fact become poor, that many who were said to be destined to have children have in fact become childless, that many women who were predicted to lead a long period of married life have in fact become widowed at a tender age, that many an occasion celebrated after astrologically determining the right moment had in fact become ultimately frustrated, and similar phenomena, the more my faith in astrology had also become mitigated, until it became completely shattered after my worldly experience had increased. This is not the occasion for me to detail all the causes which contributed to destroy this faith of mine. Considering but one large question, I may ask, who is there in our country that does not scrupulously try to determine the right “Muhurtha” or auspicious moment? Who is there in this country that determines the moment without scrutinizing very carefully the horoscopes of the bride and the bridegroom? How is it that lakhs of brides that are married are widowed at a tender age when their marriages are celebrated on auspicious occasions, and only such bridegrooms are selected who are pronounced to live long on the basis of their horoscopes? Under such circumstances where is the astrological influence? Where is the efficaciousness of the moment or Muhurtha determined? In what way are the marriages that are celebrated with due regard to established rules of astrology amongst us more happy than the marriages celebrated amongst the Westerners who have no faith in astrology? My firm conviction is, that this science is an unreliable one considering how some at least of the results predicted in a horoscope are totally wrong, although some might as a mere chance or coincidence come true.

From the time-honoured name of my grandfather and from my name, one might properly guess that my ancestors were Saivites. Until the time of my great-grandfather, almost all my ancestors were Veerasavittes who wore the Linga. Besides being merely Veerasavittes by faith, the fanatics amongst my ancestors even went to the extent, prompted by the power of their positions, of converting many of the Smarthas to the Saivite cult by forcing them to wear the Linga. My ancestors belonged to the Aravala Neogi Sect of the Saivite Brahmins. Hence they continued to contract relationships and intermarry with the Smarta Neogis. A maiden of the Neogi sect that wears the distinguishing upright caste mark was given in marriage to my great-grandfather. The offering of this match, Mr. Veerasalingam my grandfather, first paved the way to reform, either perhaps inspired by his maternal uncles who professed the Vaishnava faith, or for some other reason, by first giving up the wearing of the Linga. It might be perhaps, because of this rich heritage from my grandfather that, named as I was after him, I early became influenced by the breath of social reform to some extent. The birthplace of my grandfather was Ellor. It was there that he owned whatever of ancestral lands and houses he had. It appears from my surname that my ancestors originally belonged to the village Kandakur in the Nellore District, whence they had emigrated to Nellore during the days of the Mahomedan rule in their official capacity. With the decline of the Mahomedan rule, the official power which my ancestors enjoyed also waned. The British Government which succeeded, assumed the Jagirs which my ancestors earned during the days of the Mahomedan rule, and provided them with pensions for some generations. The last of such pension holders died only after I attained the age of discretion. Although some stray descendants of my family own certain villages even now, yet their present position is far from encouraging, they being involved in debts. A collateral relative of mine appears to be the owner of a smallholding in the Ganjam District but we understood that the estate is more a recent acquisition than an ancestral one.

In those days, as there were no irrigation facilities, the lands yielded a nice crop or not, according as there was, or was not, a favourable monsoon. It was with the greatest difficulty that even the taxes payable to the Government were paid. My grandfather, finding that he had no choice of pulling it in his native place by depending on the uncertain income from his landed property, took service under the Government; and leaving his native village, went to Rajahmundry, where sometimes, but not always, during his early days, he not only became very powerful but made an immense fortune which enabled him to build a magnificent building fit to be called a royal mansion, in which he permanently lived. The magnificence of this mansion may perhaps be understood, if it is mentioned, that as far as it extends there are as many as six houses ranged in a line in its front on the northern side, and five houses similarly ranged on its eastern side. Although it is big enough to provide a comfortable living for fifty men, yet it appears that when my grandfather was at the zenith of his prosperity, he found it so insufficient that he even intended to extend it, getting and storing the necessary timber for the purpose. Just as flies cluster round a piece of sugar candy, so too would many persons hang on one of their relatives who is in an eminent position, taking advantage of distant connections sometimes running through several generations. It appears that with such kind of relatives my grandfather’s house was always full. During the time that my grandfather enjoyed the state of prosperity, he left some ancestral plots of land in favour of his august relatives and donated the rest to scholars. But days do not ever pass uniformly well for a person. Will not dark nights succeed the moonlit ones? In those days, amongst all politically minded Neogis, toleration for other’s prosperity was very rare.

On the 23rd of April and adopted the following programme for their future work. On the 6th of May the Conference requested to arrange for the printing of the proceedings of the Conference in such form as he deemed suitable and that the cost be defrayed from the funds of the Standing Committee. That the speeches of Mahatma Gandhi and Lala Lajpat Rai on Social Reform during their recent tour in Southern India be published in booklets—English, Tamil, Telugu and Malayalam—and broadcast. That the A.I.H. India Child Marriage Abolition League pamphlets be translated into Tamil and Telugu and distributed free among the people, as extensive educative propaganda work on the evils of early marriage, dowry system, unctuousness, temperance and caste distinction is very necessary in the mofussil. It was resolved that a paid lady worker, recommended by a well-known social reform organisation may be employed for that purpose, if funds permit. That an appeal be made for funds. That Mr. C. Seshadri, B. A., B. L., be appointed the local Secretary of the Standing Committee to attend to correspondence and carry out the decisions of the Committee.

Tuberculosis peril in Calcutta: Between the ages of 15 and 20 years, for every boy that dies of tuberculosis, six girls die. In a recent report of the Calcutta Corporation, the Health Officer states: "I am convinced that it is the retention of the 'pardah' system in the densely populated gullies of a congested city that dooms so many young girls to an early death from tuberculosis. In less densely populated areas, where detached houses with compounds are possible, the 'pardah' system could be adhered to without seriously affecting the health of the inmates of the house; in a great city, it is difficult to secure absolute privacy without shutting out light and air, as houses in narrow lanes and gullies are almost certain to be overlooked. Consequently the men in the inner portion of the house, ill-lit, ill-ventilated and effectually screened from observation. Another very important factor in the aetiology of tuberculosis amongst girls and young women is marriage, which subjects immature females to the strain of repeated pregnancies and prolonged periods of lactation. Lastly, I would again draw attention to the many thousands of cases of tuberculosis always present in Calcutta. This is apt to be overlooked as these reports deal almost exclusively with deaths. A very modest estimate, assuming that there are four or five living cases for each death registered, there are probably about 10,000 cases of tuberculosis in the city at any given time. In the great majority of cases no precautions are taken against the spread of infection. To speak plainly, thousands of consumptives are constantly spilling all over the place. Can one wonder at the prevalence of the white plague in Calcutta?"

NOTES.
The All Parties Conference:—The All Parties Conference which was held at Delhi to arrive at a working agreement regarding the national demand for constitutional reform, holds its adjourned meeting today (Saturday) in Bombay. Several leading men who took a prominent part in the proceedings at Delhi, are, either absent from the country or are unable for other reasons to attend the Conference. But it is hoped that Dr. Ansari, the President, will have sufficient support to enable him to announce as the result of to-days' Conference a substantial advance towards the common goal. It is rather unfortunate that the question of the future constitution should have been taken up before settling a programme which it should be the means of carrying out. The people as a whole are not interested in constitutional changes except in so far as they are calculated to improve lot in life. Assuming that India had full self-governing powers, what are the things those powers should be immediately used to promote? This is the most important question, and the answer to it should be the starting-point of constitutional reform. The belief that a Parliamentary form of Government is the most efficacious, is no longer held with the same fervour as before the war even in Great Britain. Several proposals have been put forward to supplement, modify or even to supplant it. In the Continent of Europe where it never had root, two countries, Italy and Russia, have formally discarded it, while in others it is virtually suspended or superseded by a dictatorship or an oligarchy. A mere reproduction of the British system, may not, therefore, give us real self-government. The constitution must be formed with reference to the work it has got to do, and that is why a programme should be first drawn up. Then, again, much time and energy is wasted in the discussion whether Dominion Status or independence should be the objective of Indian aspiration. The question cannot be settled on abstract grounds, and, indeed, there is no urgent need to come to a decision about it. Unless the Conference draws up a programme which will appeal to the people, its efforts at constitution-making, we fear, may not lead to any abiding result.

Social Reform and Politics:—An interesting controversy has arisen over the decision of the Maharashatra Provincial Political Conference to seclude all subjects bearing on social or religious matters from its programme. We have received a copy of a statement issued over the signatures of the President and Secretary of the Conference in which they have sought to explain their position, in reply to criticisms. They observe:—

"Quite a number of resolutions on social and communal questions had come up before the Subjects Committee of the Conference. Some of them were highly controversial in nature. The question of the separation of Sind, the reservation of the seats for Mahomedans even in majority provinces, permission to untouchables to enter into temples and make use of public tanks etc. were among such questions, in view of the radical differences of opinion among Congressmen in the Conference it was thought advisable by the Subjects Committee to drop all such questions which were likely to create social and communal controversies in the deliberations of the Conference. It was, therefore, decided not to take into consideration, for the time being, questions over which there was a sharp disagreement among Congressmen themselves. The principle of divorce of religion and politics recently advocated by Pt. Jawaharil Nehru, the General Secretary of the Congress, and further supported by the Chairman of the Reception Committee, the President of the Conference and other prominent Congressmen of Maharashtra, was found acceptable by the Subjects Committee. In the light of this principle all resolutions on subjects such as Hindu-Muslim relations, separation of Sind and so forth, as referred to above, along with the two items, namely, promotion of inter-communal and inter-caste unity and removal of untouchability, now in the resolution about the work of the Propaganda Committee were agreed to be dropped by the Subjects Committee. In fact, the Chairman of the Subjects Committee actually took the sense of the meeting and it was agreed unanimously, with only one dissenting voice, to delete the clauses and drop all resolutions on the question."

A Confusing Explanation:—There is a lot of confusion in the above. The inclusion of the topics mentioned is sought to be justified, first, on the ground that there was a sharp disagreement among Congressmen themselves over them, and, secondly, on the entirely different ground of the principle of divorce of religion from politics. The first ground is intelligible. Politics is the science of compromise, and when there is a sharp difference of opinion on any question, it is not always easy to bring about a settlement of its composition; until there is the possibility of greater agreement. As regards the second reason, the National Congress from the first adopted the principle of not taking up social and religious questions, and that is why the Social Conference was started because it was felt that the people of India, as a whole, suffer but little from hookworms. We reproduce his statement: "Dr. Chandler, who has studied hookworm at the School of Tropical Medicine for three years, has established that the incidence of infection exceeds 400 per 10,000. In Asiam the conditions are not good and infection is particularly high in tea gardens owing to the filthy habits of coolies. Hill tribes appear to be almost entirely free from it, the incidence of hookworm is extremely low. Domestic animals help to spread infection, especially pigs and dogs. In the coal mines one factor which preserves the health of miners is the presence of cockroaches. Dung beetles, on the contrary, are un-help to spread infection, especially pigs and dogs."

Sir H. S. Gour's Bills—The Bombay Government Gazette of the 17th instant publishes three Bills which Dr. Gour has introduced in the Legislative Assembly. One of these has for its object to remove certain doubts regarding the dissolution of marriages of persons professing the Hindu religion. It provides that "notwithstanding any law or custom to the contrary, a Hindu wife shall be entitled to obtain a declaration of the invalidity of her marriage or its dissolution for any of the following reasons, namely, (1) impotency of the husband, (2) his immorality, (3) the fact that he was suffering from serious or ulcerous leprosy." Dr. Gour relies for support of the provision in this Bill on Nandana and Vasishtha amongst the Shastric authorities. The Bill, we are sure, will have the unanimous support of all Hindus and has not been introduced a day too soon. The second Bill institutes a simple Civil marriage, free from all conditions, and open to all persons irrespective of caste or creed. This also is a very necessary piece of legislation. We are unable to say the same of the Divorce Bill which, like the Parsi Bill dealt with in our leading article, is based on Lord Buckmaster's Bill.

The Hook-Worm Bogey:—One of the many indictments against the Indian manes is that they are afflicted by the hook-worm disease which renders those who suffer from it reluctant to work. Now that this fact is well known we are of the opinion that the/std to work has had a chance of coming out. The Times of India publishes in its Friday's issue a message from its Calcutta correspondent to the effect that an expert who has been working on this question for four years at the School of Tropical Medicine states that the people of India, as a whole, suffer but little from hookworms. We reproduce his statement: "Dr. Chandler, who has studied hookworm at the School of Tropical Medicine for three years, has established that the incidence of infection exceeds 400 per 10,000. In Asiam the conditions are not good and infection is particularly high in tea gardens owing to the filthy habits of coolies. Hill tribes appear to be almost entirely free from it, the incidence of hookworm is extremely low. Domestic animals help to spread infection, especially pigs and dogs."

Released Prisoners—The annual report of the Bombay Released Prisoner's Aid Society (founded in 1914) shows that employment was found for 52 released persons. Some instances are given of the nature of the aid rendered. One of these is worth noting, "R.P. was sentenced to imprisonment for forgery. Being anxious to better himself, he got into touch with the Agent some months before his release in order that he might be given shelter at the Society's Home and assisted in securing some work. On release, arrangements were made for his being employed as a tally clerk at the Docks on Rs. 60 per month. He has been instrumental in getting work at the Docks for other released prisoners also and has paid the Society a donation of Rs. 5 in gratitude." The Society is doing excellent work and is badly in need of funds. Many of us who have not been in jail owe our immunity to the accident of a good heredity or environment, or of not being found out or of greater capacity to elude the grasp of justice. "But for the grace of God, there goes John Bunyan," is a sentiment which should induce the public to contribute liberally to an institution like the Prisoner's Aid Society.

Travancore's Popular Lady Educationist—We understand that Miss D. H. Watts, B.A., Principal of the Maharaja's College for Women, Trivandrum, has gone on leave preparatory to retirement. Her name will always be associated with the progress of female education in Travancore. Her long period of connection with the College forms a remarkable record of efficient and highly appreciated work. Miss Watts, it is said, is an excellent teacher because, more than anything else, she is an excellent friend of young women. Her retirement, which was, as we understood it, unwelcome, is a real loss to Travancore education.
Parsian Social Legislation III

There is one section of the Parsi Marriage Act to which we have not referred in our previous articles. The Act as we have noted, does not fix a minimum marriage age. But it lays down that "no suit shall be brought in any Court to enforce any marriage between Parsees, or any contract connected with or arising out of any such marriage, if, at the date of the institution of the suit, the husband shall not have completed the age of sixteen years, or the wife shall not have completed the age of fourteen years". Marriage may take place at any age but the law can be invoked to enforce them or any contract arising out of or connected with them only after the parties have attained the ages prescribed as above. The Parsi Law Reforms Committee propose to retain this section without change, and do not propose to lay down any minimum age limits for marriage.

It is clear that the leaders of the community at whose instance the present Act was passed, were not prepared at the time when the Act was passed, to prohibit child marriages outright, and contented themselves with placing such marriages outside its scope until the parties reached the minimum ages prescribed in it. The lead thus given to public opinion was sufficient to bring about the virtual extinction of child marriages among Parsees. The considerations which were present to the mind of Parsi leaders sixty years ago have ceased to have force now, and we do not think that there will be any opposition from the community to the fixing of minimum age limits for marriages, as has been done in every other Marriage Act.

We have indicated our view that the Committee's proposals for multiplying the grounds of divorce require very careful consideration. The Committee have based their recommendations on Lord Buckmaster's Bill and the Report of the Royal Commission on Divorce and Matrimonial Causes in Great Britain, without, we suspect, sufficient consideration to the considerable dissimilarity of the social conditions of the British and Parsi communities. In this respect, Dr. Dadachandi's minute follows the right lines. He starts with a statement of the defects which have to be remedied and proceeds to formulate proposals for remedying them. Many of his conclusions as to both defects and remedies do not commend themselves to us, but his method is all the same the only right one. The Committee, on the other hand, give no reasons for their recommendations except that many of them are to be found in Lord Buckmaster's Bill which, by the way, has not yet become law and may not become law for a considerable time even in Great Britain for which it is specially intended, because it is too far in advance of British opinion which, in such matters, is far more conservative than many in India are apt to think. Despite the high authority of the Committee, we venture to think that the widening of the divorce sections according to their proposals is not in the best interests of the community. A large, economically self-contained and politically self-governing community like the population of the United States, may for a time sustain the impact of a system of free divorce without permanent injury, though even there thoughtful people are becoming seriously alarmed about its consequences. The robustly optimistic contributor in Keyserling's "Book of Marriage" on the working of the marriage system of America, is constrained to describe the present condition as one of chaos, though he hopes that it may ultimately lead to the evolution of a new and higher type of marriage. It is very doubtful if a small, almost minute, community whose economical and political fortunes are inextricably intermixed with those of a vast population whose ideals of marriage are as far removed as possible from those embodying Lord Buckmaster's Bill, would be able to emerge from the chaos which a widening of the divorce system may create as it has done in the United States.

Dr. Dadachandi, and the Committee also, seem to think that such marital unhappiness as there is in the Parsi community is due to a considerable extent to lack of sufficient facilities for divorce, and that to increase these would bring in the marriage millennium. The Doctor compares the statistics of divorce among Parsees during five years prior to the passing of the Act and since its passing. The annual average before the Act was 19 while since the Act it has been only 6, "thus," he remarks, "increasing married misery among Parsees, owing to the antiquated and unjust and harsh restrictions of the Act." The Doctor evidently holds that the larger the number of divorces the greater is married happiness in a community! Most people, on the other hand, think that the fewer number of divorces since the Act is evidence of a higher average of matrimonial harmony. And there are good grounds for this belief. Before the Act was passed, child marriages were common among Parsees, women were illiterate and ignorant, and men's moral ideas also were correspondingly ill-developed. With the spread of education and enlightenment among men and women alike, and with the virtual disappearance of child marriages, it was to be expected that there would ensue a higher average of matrimonial harmony, leading necessarily to a reduction in the proportion of divorces. And this is what has happened. So far from showing that married misery has increased among Parsees since the passing of the Act, the small number of divorces show that it has greatly decreased. Dr. Dadachanji says that he instituted: "a sociological enquiry" in the shape of a private and confidential census of the separations and desertions etc. owing to married misery existing among ill-assorted Parsee couples; and that "as a result"—"it is perhaps in the sense of communion, at the sight of a Mahomedan knelling in prayer. The rejoicing of Christmas, conscripted to childhood and its innocence and glory, and summoning men and women to the duties of forgiveness and reconciliation, make an intimate appeal to: one whose every prayer includes a three-repeated invocation for the blessing of peace—that perfect peace of the heart which follows when all passion has been subdued. All desire has been conquered and all regret has been left behind. At the opening of a secret book or the beginning of a devotional exercise a pious Hindu joins his hands in supplication for the good of every fellow-creature: "Māy every one cross the difficult places of life, may everyone behold happiness, may everyone attain true wisdom, may every one rejoice everywhere." To forget wrong and admit the wrong-door to one's love is the sublime teaching of all the great religions of the world.

On one holy day of the year all differences are laid aside, the mind dwells on our common origin and our common destiny, and we all return, if we can, to the ways of simplicity and guileless mirth. But can we? Blessed is he who can cast off the folds of sophistication that overlay his soul. By constant use the words come easily to the lips; but how hard is the reality! The true sages of our race are few. The learning of books, the performance of rituals, the mortifications of the flesh—these lead nowhere. God's grace, according to Hindu teachings, has most often descended on the crude children of toil, on the unlettered denizens of the forest. What a rebuke to pride and pomp and power! By a supreme effort we suspend on a given day the outward manifestations of vanity and animosity, but the real chastening of the heart is not there; and the bawls and contending ambitions break out afresh on the morrow. Let us pray that the spirit of the Christmas season animates us at all times. When a man dies his worst critics remember only his good points and overlook his foibles. How much happier both he and they would have been if they had practised a little of this magnanimity while he was alive! This world would be a different place and Heaven would be all around us if only the lessons of these rare moments could be carried into the rest of our lives. A sudden shock should not be necessary to awaken us to the realities of life... The realities of life! In daily language we apply this expression to the phantoms and shadows which we pursue, and we dismiss as dreams and visions the revealing flashes of wisdom which come to us when striking events happen. Well was it said of old: "The sage is awake when the world sleeps; he sleeps when the world is awake."

Another snare from which the spirit of the Christmas season should save us is to suppose that one rule governs human conduct as between individuals and another rule as between communities, nations or States. Is life one whole or a series of unrelated fragments? Could it be that God meant the law of love and compassion only for individuals and not for organised groups? Many things, forbidden in ordinary social intercourse, are supposed not only to be allowed but to be enjoined.
in war and in diplomacy. International and intercommunal ethic falls far short of ordinary ethic. It is seriously contended by some authorities that the precepts of Christ were intended for the simple relations of private life and must not be extended to the larger sphere of inter-State relations. As if an evil multiplied thousandfold could by some subtle alchemy be transformed into good; as if virtue was but vice on a large scale! Surely this is a disastrous blunder of thought. Christ's commands, like the commands of other great teachers and exemplars, are universal in their range; they know no limit of race or colour, no more geographical or political boundary. They would discipline us into one brotherhood; they would constrain us by the gentle bond of love and mutual helpfulness into one family. We believe in the essential dignity of every soul in God's creation. That is the essence of every religion which is called a world-religion. You cannot please God by benefiting one set of His creatures at the expense of another set of His creatures. The fact that you regard yourself as belonging to the one set and not to the other is of no consequence. Injury to a part of humanity is injury to humanity, and a violation of the purpose of God, who is all goodness and all love.

WOMEN IN HINDU LAW—I.

THE VEDIC AGE.

It is remarked by Sir Henry Maine that the treatment accorded to women, the recognition of their rights and privileges, their status in law and proprietary rights, constitute a test of the level of the culture of the community and the advancement of civilization therein. It has likewise been stated that law is a reflection of life, the result of the social and economic forces of Society, and that the treatment of women in law may be taken to be a fairly accurate index of a corresponding treatment in life. If, therefore, we studied the position accorded to women in Hindu Law from the earliest times to the present day, we shall be able fairly to appraise the value of the advance or otherwise of the culture and civilization of the Hindu race.

In doing so, we find that the growth of Hindu Law in its treatment of women may roughly be divided into the following periods:—The Vedic age extending down to about 1,000 B.C., including the age of Upanishads, Epics and Puranas; the Sutra period extending from 1,000 B.C. to 300 B.C.; the age of the early Smritikaras from 300 B.C. to 300 A.D.; that of the later Smritikaras from 300 A.D. to 500 A.D.; the period of the Commentators from 500 A.D. to 1,700 A.D.; and lastly the British period from 1700 A.D. to the present day.

We find that the treatment of women was nobler during the Vedic age, that it was almost at its lowest ebb in the Sutra period, and slowly in the age of the early Smritikaras it rose up to a high level with the later Smritikaras, until in the period of the Commentators it had almost attained the Vedic level, only to be rudely shattered and pushed down during the last 200 years of the British administration of Hindu Law. Let us take you to the picture at somewhat closer quarters.

A study of the Vedic texts indicates that women had proprietary rights in those days just the same as men. They had the capacity of owning wealth. They were co-owners of property with their husbands; and whatever was acquired by the one belonged equally to the other. The proprietary rights of women extended so far that a husband could not make a valid gift of any portion of the property without the consent of his wife. Their right to acquire and own properties independently of their husbands' volition was so far recognized that it was a condition imposed on the husband at the time of marriage that he should not prevent the exercise of that right by his wife. The Vedic injunction by the father of the bride to the bridegroom:—"You should not prevent my daughter from acting meritoriously, from acquiring wealth and from performing sacrifices"—and the promise by the latter "I shall not prevent"—a ritual observed even to this day—is clearly indicative of the right. Not only could they acquire properties, but they could also claim a share of property in the parental home, as indicated by the text:—"As a maiden grown old in her father's house claims a share, so do I claim your support." This passage indicates again that marriage was not compulsory in those days, and that women could remain unmarried as in all probability they did in devoting their life to learning and knowledge.

The instances of Visvavara and Lopamudra, authors of portions of Vedic teachings, and later of Gargi and Maitreyi in the Upanishad period, the former of whom held an open discussion with sage Yagnavalkya in the Court of King Janaaka on highly philosophical problems show at once that women in the Vedic ages were highly learned and took their place in Society side by side with men. They were naturally held in great respect as is shown by the text beginning with:—"A friend thou shalt be; a friend thou hast become, may our friendship be everlasting." The proud recognition by the husband of the valued companionship of an esteemed partner in life. The high sense of marriage as a sacrament is indicated again by the text the husband addressing the wife as "the gift given by the Gods Bhaga, Aryaman, Savithar and Parasuram, to be the mistress of the house." The Vedic text, "let the wife unite with the husband and commence a brilliant and imperishable life," quoted by Sabara-swami is to like effect. The gods are invited to unite the husband and the wife, Visvavasun is invited to make to her husband the maiden well developed and attained of age," a text which shows that not only was marriage held a sacrament ordained by the gods but also that women in the Vedic times married at an adult age. Various passages in the Vedas and Vedic rituals confirm this view. The text, "Go to the house that thou mayst be the lady of the house, a mistress of the house thou shalt direct the sacrificial rites," he...
Saptpadi text and the Vedic accostation of the wife by the husband recognising in her a present ability to manage and govern his house, as also numerous other texts indicate that the Vedic bride was a grown-up and well developed maiden. The rituals observed even to this day point to the same conclusion though the significance of the same is not noticed. The Sushobha and the Grihapravesa rites and the partaking of the panchapuri by the bridegroom on the fourth day of the marriage indicating the beginning of wedded life and numerous other ceremonial rites may be cited. Not only did women marry at an adult age, but learned and freely moving in Society, they chose their husbands as indicated by the text: "How many a woman is satisfied with the wealth of him who seeks her! Happy the woman who is handsome, for she selects among many as her mate the choice of her heart." The dignity and nobility of married life is portrayed in various passages describing conjugal and domestic felicity. "Ahas the goddess of Dawn, for instance is described now as the "Beautous daughter of the Skies."

Then as "A lovely maidens by her mother decked. Disclosing coyly all her hidden graces."

And again as coming "Like a wife. Unveiling to her lord with conscious pride Beauties which, as he gazes lovingly, are seen Fresher, fairer, each succeeding morn."

The husband and the wife are but one soul, and the former could perform no sacrifices without the help and presence of the latter. The wife's proprietary rights are further recognised in the inability of the husband to make a gift either to the gods or men without the wife's consent—may, it was the wife that had to supply the material to be gifted, a ritual observed to this day, heedless however, of its significance. Women could study the Vedas and perform sacrifices; and if the husband died, the widow could remarry on performing the "ajya-panchoudana" sacrifice. "When a woman has lost her husband, she may marry another, and if they present the "aja-panchoudana" offering, they shall not be separated. A second husband dwells in the same world with his rewedded wife, he offers the "aja panchoudana" to the memory of the deceased husband." This is confirmed by the funeral hymn: "Rise, woman, then art lying by the side of one, whose life is gone; come to the world of the living away from him, thy husband that is dead, and become the wife again of him who is willing to take thee by the hand and marry thee." The texts indicate that "Sati" was not an institution of Vedic times, and that there is nothing in the Vedas to support the immolation of the living widow on the funeral pyre of her deceased husband. Vedic women, who were childless, could take a child in adoption, not necessarily a son, but a daughter. Likewise the instances of Vadhrimati adopting Hiranyakshatha and Lomapada adopting Santha daughter of Dasaratha, shows that women could not only adopt but could also be adopted.

The Vedic texts indicate thus an equality of status and proprietary rights between men and women. Wilson, the eminent oriental scholar in referring to this period says: "In no nation of antiquity were women held in so much esteem as among the Hindus." Such was the condition of women in the Vedic period of Hindu Law over three thousand years ago, when the Hindus were a flourishing Nation, possessed an ordered system of commerce and administration, developed many of the arts and sciences, and traded with countries "beyond the perilous seas". Those were the days as much of the wealthy and gorgeous India as of the birth in India of the highest systems of Philosophy yet known to the world, and those the days when women were learned, highly respected and revered, took their place in Society side by side with men and possessed status in law and rights in property equally with men. It was the period of the zenith of Hindu civilisation.—New India, Madras.

MYSORE HINDU INHERITANCE BILL.

PREAMBLE.

Whereas it is just and expedient that the principles of the Hindu Law of Inheritance, as at present administered in the territories of Mysore, should be modified in certain particulars, it is hereby enacted as follows:—

CHAPTER I.

1. This regulation shall be called "The Hindu Law of Inheritance Regulation" 1928.

2. It shall extend throughout the territories of His Highness the Maharajah of Mysore.

3. It shall come into force on and from the 1st day of January 1929.

4. It shall apply to all persons of either sex, who being subjects of His Highness the Maharajah of Mysore are Hindus by birth, religion or persuasion, and all such persons as are governed by Hindu Law.

CHAPTER II.

5. No person of either sex shall by reason only of his or her being either dumb or deaf, blind, lame or insane, an incurable leper or all or any of these or afflicted with other physical or mental defects, be excluded from inheritance.

Provided that the District Court or such other Court as may be authorised in this behalf may or may be called upon to appoint a guardian of the person or property or both of such persons as may be deemed incapable of managing themselves or their property by reason of such defect or defects.

6. No woman shall be excluded from inheritance by reason only of her sex.

7. The order of succession in the case of separate and self-acquired properties of an intestate Hindu male shall be modified as follows:

After the father's father and before the sister's brother the order shall be: son's daughter, dughter's daughter, sister, sister's son, daughter-in-law, brother's daughter, sister's daughter, stepmother, brother's widow.

8. All properties acquired by a woman by inheritance, gift, purchase, partition, seizure or finding shall be her Brijdhana enjoyable by her as her absolute estate.

9. Widows and daughters of a deceased undivided coparcener shall have the same rights in the family estates as if the coparcener had died divided.

10. Notwithstanding anything contained in Act XXI of 1850, a person who has ceased to be a Hindu shall forfeit all rights of inheritance under the Hindu Law; provided that he shall not be divested of any such properties as he may be already possessed of either separate or self-acquired.

11. Irrespective of caste all illegitimate children shall have the same rights of inheritance subject to the same conditions as are now in force in respect of only a class.

CHAPTER III.

12. Notwithstanding anything contained in this Regulation, no estate interest, property or right already vested before the first day of January 1909 in any person shall be divested except as far as it would otherwise be repugnant to the provisions of this Regulation.

13. Nothing in this Regulation shall affect any right to an office or any religious or charitable institutions.

14. Nothing in the Regulation shall affect any family custom or usage having the force of law or any of the principles of the Hindu Law of Inheritance not traversed herein.

STATEMENT OF OBJECTS AND REASONS.

It is a matter of common knowledge that many of the principles of Hindu Law, particularly in the field of inheritance, are unsatisfactory and opposed to a sense of justice and equity of modern Hindu society. The exclusion of women as a class and of such unfortunate persons as are afflicted by blindness, idiocy, incurable leprosy and the like from all rights of inheritance, the restrictions imposed on women in the matter of the enjoyment of property inherited by them, the postponement of the claims of such near relations as the sister, son's daughter and the like till after all the agnates are exhausted, the disadvantageous position of the widow and the daughters of a coparcener who dies undivided, the rights of an out-caste and the distinction between illegitimate children of different classes, are all matters over which Hindu Society has been agitating for reformation. With a view to modify the law and bring it into harmony with modern ideas and ideals, this Bill has been enacted, the ambit of the modifications being restricted to the law of inheritance.

It is proposed to alter the order of succession so as to give the nearer relations a better chance of inheritance. The sister and the sister's son, son's daughter and so on, shall be entitled to inherit in preference to all agnates beyond the father's father. It proposes to consider all estates acquired by a woman by inheritance or otherwise as her absolute estate in accordance with the dictum of Vigana-swarana. The disadvantage suffered by the widow and daughters of an undivided coparcener tending to disrupt the family are sought to be removed by declaring them entitled to all such rights as if the coparcener had died divided. The exclusion of the blind, the deaf and the dumb, lepers and the like, is removed; and every Hindu male or female is declared entitled to inherit. The anomaly of a person ceasing to be a Hindu and still claiming to inherit in a Hindu family is sought to be removed by declaring that he shall forfeit his rights of inheritance under the Hindu Law. It is, however, made clear that he shall not be deprived of such properties as he may already be possessed of, either separate or self-acquired. Illegitimate children of all classes are held equally entitled to inherit in the manner and subject to the conditions now obtaining in respect only of a few.

THE PRODUCTION OF A HEALTHIER RACE.

(By Mza.)

It will be generally admitted that one of the most pressing problems in India at the present time is the physical and mental improvement of Indians as a whole. No one will deny that among Indians are to be found as fine specimens of manhood physically, and as good brains as are to be found in any other country. But it is unfortunately equally true that there is a greater proportion of men in India who are mentally and physically deficient than in any other country. Throughout the ages all countries have had to tackle this problem and have tried various means, with varying success, for improving the race.

It may be of interest to take a short review of the methods that have been tried and to consider whether any of them can be applied to India with advantage.

In the primitive period, the males contends for possession of the females; polygamy prevailed, and the strongest and most courageous males were the fathers of all the children that were born, the males who were physically weak died unmarried and without reproducing.

From the point of view of eugenics this was most satisfactory, but there were many things against it.

When the period of brute force was succeeded by the period of Law, it was found that the men who were physically weak were often the most intelligent, as is so often the case today, and that they could make themselves useful to the clan by inventing weapons and traps, or at least by manufacturing them.

In return for their sedentary labour, they were given food; and as they were too weak to obtain wives by force, females were given; the system of
The existence of the clan depended on the number of the fighting men, and therefore on the number of children—thut were born. The birth of a male child was a matter of rejoicing; the mother was honored as a public benefactress. Then breeding began to be studied as an art; young persons were methodically paired. It was observed that children inherit the qualities and inclinations of their parents and so the brave and the intelligent were selected to be the fathers.

If food was scarce and children were difficult to rear, the new-born infants were carefully examined, and those that did not promise well were killed. Promiscuous intercourse on the part of females was found to result in sterility, and was forbidden. Cohabitation: during the suckling period, which lasted at least three years, was supposed to injure mother’s milk, on which the savage baby is entirely dependent; and during that period, the woman was kept apart. Premature unions among children were forbidden, and sometimes prevented by infibulation, but savages—seldom seem to be aware that: for the young to marry as soon as the age of puberty has been attained, is injurious to the womb and to the offspring: The ancient Germans, however, had excellent laws upon this subject.

The Chinese believe that a woman has no soul and therefore they have no hesitation about killing an unwanted female infant. In nearly all the Polynesian Islands girls babies were killed as the surest way of keeping down the population and so avoiding the danger of famines. In many of the islands the proportion of girls which might be raised was strictly controlled by tribal laws.

It was considered wicked among savages to kill a member of the clan because his services were lost to the clan. But even murder in the abstract was not regarded by them as a sin. They killed their sickly children and supernumerous parents without remorse; for the community was profited by their removal.

Finally the friars made a discovery from which has resulted one of the most universal of moral laws and one which all laws have been the least frequently inflected. Clans made war on foreign clans for the purpose of making female prisoners, as well as for other reasons. It was observed that the foreign wives produced more children and stronger children, than the home-born wives, and also that the nearer the blood relationship between husband and wife, the more weakly and the less frequent were the offspring. On this account a law was passed forbidding marriage between those who were closely related to one another, sometimes it was even forbidden to marry within the tribe at all.

Then we have the more recent doctrine of ‘niyoga’ or the temporary union of a man and woman for the procreation of children when marriage has failed to produce them, or during the enforced absence of the husband.

The Greek women placed statues of Apollo or Narcissus in their bed rooms, that they might bear children as beautiful as those on whom they gazed. Such children they prayed the gods to give them for the Greeks loved beauty to distraction, and regarded ugliness as sin. When the Lacedemonians were at war (3209 B.C.) the population was decreasing, so they sent a picked number of robust warriors to impregnate all the women at home.

In later days the Greeks frequently invited especially beautiful young men to cohabit with their wives and daughters so as to have the latter bear beautiful children—this was considered eminently proper and did not injure the reputation of the women to any degree whatever.

Plato advocated neither celibacy nor promiscuity; the unions of the sexes were to be regulated by the State, very much as they were in the communistic society organised by Mr. Noyes in America.

All laws, both civil and religious, have to be reformed from time to time in order that they may apply effectively according as civilization progresses. A good many laws, and especially religious laws, that still exist have been framed in a period of ignorance and superstition; moreover, they were framed for a people that no longer exist. The time has ceased when a teacher could tell his people that things were right or wrong without a question. In these days people will think for themselves, and they want to know the reason why, and they demand an authority in support of a statement, they must feel that there is a sound reason for a law, be it civil or religious, before they willingly comply with it.

For some years the French have been greatly concerned because of their declension: birth-rate and they have enacted several laws with the object of increasing the population.

In her wild rush to produce numbers, regardless of quality, it would seem as if France was likely to breed a race of criminals and invalids. If, instead of encouraging indiscriminate procreation she were to prevent certified criminals and imbeciles from reproducing, her future generations would have a far better prospect of surviving.

In all countries the production of children is looked upon as a duty to the State. Many people desire children merely to perpetuate their families, while others think they are necessary in order that they may pass on to them their stock of this world's goods.

Whatever the feelings are that prompt the desire for children they come to much the same thing in the end, that is the desire to keep alive the race to which one belongs oneself, in fact, a kind of selfishness. It would not appear to be a matter of ultimate importance if any family or even nation were to cease to exist entirely, so long as those which survived were the fittest in every way. It surely cannot be the right thing to do as the French are doing, to encourage the production of children as rapidly as possible.

love-duels was abolished; the women belonged to the community; and were divided fairly like the females of the title of community,' and were divided fairly like the children of the fighting men. The birth of a male child was a matter of rejoicing; the mother was honoured as a public benefactress. Then breeding began to be studied as an art; young persons were methodically paired. regardless of the physical and mental qualifications of the parents. If a nation can only be maintained by breeding degenerates, surely it would be better for that nation to cease to exist.

It cannot be fair to posterity to start them in life with mental and physical handicaps. No doubt the intention is good, but it is a mistaken form of patriotism, and it is a form that the Indian Empire, or any other empire, will do well to avoid.

We can all do something for the benefit of posterity, and if we cannot do actual good, we can at least help by refraining from doing harm. In this lies our duty to posterity; if we know we cannot breed healthy children we can refrain from breeding unhealthy ones. We can also, by care before and after birth, give the future generation more reasonable chances of attaining physical perfection, while with a more practical and commonsense education there should be a corresponding improvement in their mental qualifications.

Those nations are more likely to survive who concern themselves with the quality of their posterity, and if only those misguided patriots would remember this they would be doing a greater service to their country than in saddling it with mentally or physically affected children. Not only would they do a greater service to their country, but to the whole universe and to posterity.

We should aim at a brotherhood of nations in order that nations may co-operate and work together for the good of the whole world, and it would seem that the spirit we ought to cultivate is a spirit of universalism. That whatever we do should not be merely for oneself, one's family, or even one's country, but for the whole universe. This surely is our plain duty to posterity.

Lyceums began with the care of children before their birth; he would have none born but strong and able men. In other countries great pains are taken to have the more useful brutes perfect in their kind. In England the science of breeding horses and dogs of the most generous temper and highest bodily ability has been carried to extraordinary perfection. Lacedaemon is the only country known in history where attention was ever paid to the breed of men.

It would certainly appear illogical that we should improve the quality of flowers and fruit and animals, but do nothing to improve the quality of the human race in which we have a more personal and vital interest.

Now how can India help to improve the race? First by abolishing child marriage. There are signs that this may shortly come to pass. Secondly by taking a greater care and consideration for children, before, during and after birth. Thirdly by giving the rising generation a more practical education. That is an education in hygiene, hygiene, and sanitation. Fourthly by adopting a form of constructive birth control, including the sterilization of certain classes of defectives. Fifthly by an organized campaign against venereal disease. Lastly, by making physical culture compulsory in all schools and colleges. There is tremendous scope for the reformer in all these things, and if we can achieve any improvement in the existing state of affairs we shall have the satisfaction of knowing that we shall leave the world a better place than we found it and that the results of the work we have done will be carried on and perfected by succeeding generations and our lives will not have been in vain.

PROSTITUTION IN BOMBAY.

SUGGESTIONS FOR REDUCING THE EVIL.

The following is the text of the letter addressed by the Secretaries of the Bombay Presidency Social Reform Association to the Government of Bombay, on the question of reducing the evil of prostitution in the City of Bombay.

"We are desirous of the Bombay Presidency Social Reform Association to invite the attention of the Government to the growing traffic in women that is being carried on in the City of Bombay. It is true that the Prostitution Act of 1903 was enacted with the object of checking; this traffic. The Act has been in operation for nearly five years, and although it has been successful to a certain extent, in minimizing the traffic in minor girls, it has not, our Council submit, resulted in putting an end to, or even checking the nefarious trade in women. Our Council are of opinion that the only way to deal with the problem is by making brothel-keeping an offence under the Prostitution Act. If there were no brothels, the importation of girls would not be a paying proposition. The girls would not find shelter for the purpose of earning on their trade, and it would then be very difficult to carry on the traffic in girls. The report of the special body of experts connected with the League of Nations for dealing with the problem of traffic in women and girls shows that the world opinion is now definitely in favour of abolition, and that countries which have regulationists are now introducing legislation to abolish the system. It is true that there is no regulation in Bombay, but it cannot be denied that there is in the City a vice district, otherwise known as the tolerated area. The existence of such a vice district supports, encourages and facilitates commercialized traffic in women and girls, and constitutes a great danger to the physical and moral well-being of the people in the City, and as such calls for urgent action on the part of the Government. At present only brothels kept by males are penalised, with the result that the problem is as bad as ever. Most of the brothels, though nominally kept by women, are legally controlled by men. Our Council therefore submit that the Government should take immediate steps to amend Section 5 by omitting the word "male" therein, so that brothel-keeping either by males or females will be an offence under the Act.

FETAL OFFENCE FOR LANDLORDS.

"Our Council are of opinion that in addition to the amendment of the Act as suggested above, a new provision should be included in the Act making it a penal offence for landlords to let out their premises knowingly for the purposes of prostitution. It is a matter of common knowledge that landlords or rent-farmers of premises let out to brothels demand and obtain exorbitant rents, sometimes even 300 per cent to 400 per cent more than the market rent. For this reason the normal rate would be Rs. 6 per month, the rent charged to prostitutes is As. 8 to As. 10 per day, collected in advance, and in most cases daily before the business is closed for the night. No doubt if brothels are made illegal, the landlords who knowingly let out their premises for the purposes of prostitution would clearly be abetting an offence, but our Council agree with the recommendation made in the majority report of the Bombay Prostitution Committee that the offence of letting of houses should be separately constituted.

In conclusion our Council desire us to draw the attention of Government to Section 13 of the British Orphans and Agriculturists Act of 1888 (amended by Acts of 1912 and 1922), which in their opinion would meet the requirements of the situation in Bombay.

O Our Council hope that Government will be pleased to take action as suggested above as soon as possible.

WOMEN IN HONORARY PUBLIC SERVICE.

The Women's Industrial Association was largely instrumental in securing the civic and political enfranchisement of women. Two of its objects are:

BUDDHA ANNIVERSARY AT RAJKOT.

Under the auspices of the Ramakrishna Ashrama, Rajkot, the birth day anniversary of Lord Buddha was celebrated with due pomp and solemnity, on Saturday, the 5th of May 1925.

The proceedings began with Bhajan by Mr. Chandi Lal Munir, a well known musician of the place. Then Mr. Motilal Mehta, Professor, Rajkot College, read out an informing and instructive paper on the life and teaching of Buddha. After dwelling at length upon the life-story of the great Master and his teachings, he arrived at the conclusion that if the Buddhist doctrines of Ahimsa, love, service and tolerance were practiced today by the people in India, much of the communal tension and the consequent troubles so widely rampant would end and, there would be peace in the land. He was followed by Dr. G. S. S. Desai, in charge of the Ashrama, who eulogised the three-pancadas of the day and tried to prove by quotations from the Upanishads and the Gita that teachings of Buddha were not at all different from the fundamental principles of Hinduism. The next speaker, Mr. S. S. Joshi of the local national school dwelt on the influence of Buddhism upon the whole world and especially India, in the domain of architecture, sculpture, painting, education etc., and referred to the great following secured by Buddhism covering about one third of the human race. Mr. Harishanker N. Pandya, Vakil, then invoked the blessings of Lord Buddha upon all on this auspicious day. With the recitation of Ramana-sutra and the devotional singing of songs the fuction of the day came to a close.

Saturday, the 5th of May was also consecrated to the memory of the great Master by Hari-kirtan performed by Shri. Bhaagwan Shankia which was much appreciated by the audience.
NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The Barbour Scholarships—The Levi L. Barbour Scholarships for Oriental Women at the University of Michigan Ann Arbor, Michigan, U.S.A. are open to College Women in India. The Barbour Scholarships, yielding $60,000 each per annum and University fees, are awarded annually upon a basis of merit by a committee consisting of the President Emeritus, the President of the University, the Dean of the College of Literature, Science, and the Arts, one of the Advisers of Women, and the Dean of the Medical School. The character of the candidate, her physical condition, her scholastic attainment, her fitness for university work, including the ability to use the English language for study and classroom purposes, marked ability in some special field, and her desire to return to her native land for service after suitable preparation shall have been made, are the chief factors considered by the committee in making appointments. On account of the rapid progress in the education of women in the Orient preference is given to applicants who are graduates of Oriental colleges. The awards are made annually about the first of February to take effect at the beginning of the following fall semester in September. The scholarships are renewable at the discretion of the committee, whose policy has been to reappoint scholars doing creditable work until their selected courses have been completed. All courses of instruction offered at the University of Michigan are open to women students, and the Barbour scholars are not limited to women pursuing any particular course of study. The scholarships are open to women of any Oriental nationality, no definite, number being allotted to any one country. No race restrictions nor religious requirements are imposed. Those desiring application forms and bulletins with further information should write to the Chairman of the Advisory Committee in India, Miss M. N. Wilson, Ashutosh Mukerji Road, Calcutta.

MERCHANTS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 35 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislation in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

"BOMBAY HOUSE", BOMBAY.

24, BRUCE STREET, FORT.

Printed by Basak Mahadev Sidhaye, at the Bombay Vaibhav Press, Servants of India Society's Home, Sandhurst Road, Girgaum, Bombay, and Published by Kamakshi Natarajan for the Proprietors of "The Indian Social Reformer," Limited, Bombay.
Bardoll Letters:—The Government of Bombay have published the correspondence between His Excellency the Governor and eight members of the Legislative Council on the subject of the enhancement of land revenue in Bardoli and Charati talukas of Surat district. The ministers put themselves out of court by speaking of "the impudence of government" in a letter addressed to the head of the Government, and they should be grateful to Sir Leo Winslow for the generous manner in which he accepted their grudging and half-hearted apology. The Governor in his reply took the ground that the revised assessment was 20 per cent. more than the one fixed thirty years ago during which period the value of land and the level of prices has increased by much more than that percentage. The eight members deny that, and ask for an apology stipulating only that it should be by an officer who has not had a hand in the matter. At one point in the correspondence, it seems that the Governor was disposed to grant this request, but he seems to have changed his mind soon, and refused to have any enquiry instituted regarding the equity of the revised assessment. In reply to the intimation that the members intended to resign and seek re-election in order to demonstrate that they had the support of their electors in their protest against the revision, the Private Secretary dryly observed: "It would prove that you are opposed to any increase in the land revenue in Bardoli Taluka and perhaps any other part of Gujarat and if you were re-elected, it would prove that the electors of Gujarat were equably disposed to any increase, because the desirous of avoiding any further taxation themselves. His Excellency has no doubt that any body of taxpayers in any country would be equally unanimous in their desire that some sections of the community, other than themselves should bear the burden of taxation." This argument would have weight if the land tax was levied in the same way as other taxes. In the latter case, a law has to be passed sanctioning the levy of a new tax or an enhancement of an existing one. In the case of land, however, the Executive Government is the sole judge of what is just and proper.

Indianising Christianity.—We are indebted to the Dayanand for the account which we reprint of the admission by the Bishop of Bombay of the Rev. A. Winslow to the degree of Siddha, third of the four instituted by the Chripta Seva Sangh or the Service of Christ Society, of which Mr. Winslow is the founder. This is the first attempt in our time to invest Christianity with an Indian garb and that the Bishop of Bombay has been free to associate himself with it, is due to the passing of Church measure conferring autonomy on the Indian branch of the Church of England. The assumption of the Indian garb, however, is a small matter unless it is inspired by a desire to establish continuity between Indian religious culture and the religion of Christ. This, we know, is Mr. Winlow's tacit wish. Dean Parle observed some time back that Hindus cannot be converted to Christianity but Hinduism could be Christianised. If at the same time Christianity is also Hinduised, the resultant product will take us a big step towards the universal religion which is the goal of humanity. We, therefore, welcome the movement in the Christian Church of which the Christa Seva Sangh is a very interesting expression. There are one or two suggestions we should like to offer for the consideration of the Sangh. As far as possible, the Indian terminology should be used in its traditional connotation, as violent departures from it are apt to defeat the object in view. For instance, a Siddha in the Hindu spiritual gradation represents a far higher stage than a Sanyasin—the former being one who has attained perfection, while the latter has taken to renunciation as the road to perfection. The former stands for a positive, the latter is merely a negative, state. The Siddha has no need to renounce anything because nothing has any attraction for him. To the Sanyasim, on the other hand, renunciation is necessary, because the objective world has still a hold on him. There is no gleam of the dawn while the Sanyasin is still on the open road. Another point is worth noting. Only a Sanyasin can admit another to Sannyas. A Siddha, of course, attains perfection on his own right.

The Most and the Beams—The Indian Witness rebukes foreigners, especially Missionaries, in India for not exposing and condemning efficiently our social defects. "At the present time," it says, "the forces of conservatism that defend ancient evils are undoubtedly being encouraged by the silence of many Western people in regard to these evils." This is a very extraordinary observation to make so soon after the publication of Miss Katharine Mayo's book. Still, it is worth while analysing it a little. "There are people in India, both nationals and foreigners, who do not like to have social evils in India denounced in a Christian paper edited by a non-Indian. They believe, or pretend to believe, that a Christian from the West should be restrained by the fact that social evils still exist in Western countries. That opinion is utterly repellant to us. We are not in India as Missionaries of Western civilization nor to preach the morals of Western nations. We recognize no obligation to restrict our preaching in India to such parts of the Christian message as have found full acceptance in some Western land. If we did, we would have nothing to preach. If we denounce falsehood, it does not imply that every one in America or in England is truthful. If we commend justice it is not because justice reigns and injustice is unknown in London, New York, Edinburgh, Rome, Copenhagen, Toronto or Chicago." It seems not to have occurred to our contemporaries that if injustice is not unknown in New York and London, the love of justice of our foreign censors might first find expression in denouncing the evils nearer home. A certain saying of a great Teacher about the beam in the eye, was perhaps specifically directed to people of this class. Missionaries in order to be fair must begin their discourses upon India's frailties by acknowledging those of their own people, which they seldom do. The Indian Witness is mistaken about sati. The British Government could not have suppressed the custom but for the fact that it was confined to a small class, and that the community as a whole had never practised it; and that Indian leaders themselves supported Government in making sati a crime. We cannot prevent foreigners from criticising what they do not often understand and understand dimly, but such criticism is not helpful except perhaps to the critics themselves. The lines quoted by our contemporary is thus capable of a different application:

To compound for the sins they are inclined to

By damning those they have no mind to.

The smoker forgets all about his dirty habit when he abuses the "native" for their pan-jaipur.

Widow's Right of Adoption—The Director of Information with the Government of Bombay has issued the following communiqué: "At the last session of the Bombay Legislative Council leave was granted to Mr. B. V. Jadhav, M.L.C., to introduce a Bill to restrict the unlimited right of adoption of Hindu widows in the Bombay Presidency. The Bill provides that adoption by a Hindu widow shall not be valid except when she is authorised in writing duly registered by her husband or his father to adopt one or more sons; or when there is no male agnate (Sagotra Saplinda) descendant of the great-grandfather of her husband. The purpose of this proposed legislation is explained in the Statement of Objects and Reasons which is as follows: Adoption of a son is recognised by Hindu law throughout India. A Hindu widow without male issue may adopt a son at any time and her widow's estate, according to Hindu law, becomes exclusively her son's. But this right of the widow is restricted with various conditions in different provinces. In Bengal she cannot adopt unless she is authorised to adopt by her husband in writing. In Madras and the United Provinces she can adopt if authorised by the husband or by the consent of the nearest agnates. In Bombay she has great latitude. A husband's authority is presumed in the absence of prohibition and she can adopt even a grown up man from any family to the exclusion of the next-of-kin of her husband. This latitude is causing great injustice to the Bhaubana whose rightful property goes to another and a stranger is introduced into the family house and property simply on account of the whims of an inexperienced young man and many a time, misguided widow. This leads to quarrels and litigation. Such an adoption is brought about by interested persons and the widow is utterly ruined, as she is deprived of the enjoyment of her husband's property and becomes estranged to maintenance only. The right of adoption ought therefore to be restricted and the Law of Bombay should be made conformable to that prevalent in other parts of India."
ALL PARTIES CONFERENCE.

The Government of India Act of 1919 provided for the appointment of a Statutory Commission to enquire into the working of the reforms initiated by it, and to make recommendations as to what should be done next. The Commission was appointed about the end of last year and contained not a single Indian name among its members. The only Indian associated with it is Mr. Bhore a member of the Indian Civil Service who at the time occupied the post of Secretary to the Government of India in the Education Department. The selection is unexceptionable as Mr. Bhore stands high in the estimation of his countrymen as an able and independent officer with a sympathetic understanding of the non-official point of view. But Mr. Bhore is not a member of the Commission and his part in it extends at most to advice and suggestion. A capable Secretary can exercise great influence on the deliberations of a body like the Commission consisting of members whose knowledge of Indian conditions is negligible. But the principle that Indians should be associated on equal terms with British members in all enquiries relating to their country, has been set aside in the composition of the Commission, and this has caused a strong feeling of disappointment among educated Indians who believe that British co-operation is necessary for the further progress of the country. These men who constitute what is known as the Liberal party, took the exclusion so much to heart that they felt that they would be sacrificing their self-respect by appearing before the Commission to give evidence or by assisting it in any other way.

The Congress Party, on the other hand, rather welcomed the exclusion of Indians on the ground that any Indians who might have been appointed to the Commission, would necessarily be such as were known for their compliance to officialdom. Nevertheless, they also decided to have nothing to do with the Commission as they hold that the future Indian Constitution should be settled by conference between Indian leaders and representatives of the British Government, and not by a parliamentary commission. The agreement on the boycott of the Commission, though for different reasons, became for the time being common ground between all Indian Parties, and led to the calling of an All Parties Conference at Delhi in February last, to settle all outstanding questions and to frame a draft constitution.

The Conference, after a general discussion which lasted several days, referred the main questions to four Committees with instructions to report at a meeting to be held in Bombay on the 18th May. The Conference accordingly met last Saturday, but the Committees had not submitted their reports and several of those who took a leading part at Delhi were unable to attend. The Conference, therefore, had to adjourn after appointing another Committee to deal with all important questions and report to the meeting of the Conference to be held in August next. This Committee has Pandit Motilal Nehru as Chairman, and Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and Sir All Imam among its members. It has a very onerous task and very little time to do it in. It has to reconcile not only the real claims of the Moslem League and the Hindu Maha Sabha, but also of those whose political goal is Dominion status within the British Commonwealth and those who want India to be entirely independent of the British connection. The Committee's instructions are to frame a draft constitution on the basis of Dominion Status. But Dr. Anari who, as President of the National Congress presided at the Conference last week, explained that Congressmen are not precluded from working for independence according to the terms of the resolutions of the Madras National Congress.

This explanation passed unchallenged at the Conference but it is impossible to interpret it in practice. The advocates of Dominion status aim at cementing the connection with Britain, while those who want independence frankly wish to dissolve it. Last week's Conference made it clear that the fundamental opposition between the two ideas is already beginning to be realised, and that the feeling is increasing among supporters of the British connection that they are being dragged much beyond their depth by the Independence party. It will not be surprising if, as the latter become aggressive in their propaganda, the former are driven to part company with them. Those who work for a close union with the British Commonwealth are not actuated by motives merely of expediency. The late Mr. C. R. Das, the founder of the Swaraj Party, understood that this might be a higher ideal than independence, and said so in his famous Faridpur address. As a part of the British Empire India has a world-wide organisation ready to hand through which as her medium she can have a fuller expression of her genius than as a self-sufficient country standing by herself. It is true that India's position in the British Empire is beset with obstacles to free intercourse with the other Dominions, but these are not insuperable and will disappear as the work and worth of Indians come to be better understood and appreciated by them. Indians who think in this way are misunderstood by British reactionaries and Indian radicals alike, but theirs is the right view and it behoves them to stick to it.
THE MAHARANI REGENT OF TRAVANCORE.

(Contributed).

Lying between hill and sea and rent by many picturesque lagoons, Travancore the most southern of Indian States occupies the south-west portion of the Indian peninsula and has the unique distinction of having for its apex the famous Cape Comorin. It has an area of 7,655 square miles. Although thus in point of size it can claim only the seventeenth place among the Indian States, in point of population, surprising as it may seem, it actually holds the third place. Mysore is four times as large as Travancore but its population is only one and a half times Travancore's.

The forests, in which extensive tea and cardamom plantations are reared, and the backwaters or lagoons, whose shores are literally covered with dense stretches of coconut trees, take up nearly a third of the area of the State so that its populated portion is only 5,070 square miles. Its present population is estimated at about 4,400,000, which gives a density of 880 people to the square mile. Thus Travancore is one of the most thinly populated regions of the world.

The history of Travancore for the most part yet awaits to be reclaimed from tradition. The English first settled at Anjengo on the coast as early as 1634. The real maker of Travancore as we see it today on the map was Marthanda Varma who ruled the country from 1729 to 1758. The formal treaty that bound the destinies of Travancore with the fortunes of the British in the East was concluded in 1795. The State pays an annual subsidy of 8 lakhs of rupees to the British Government in India in return for the protection that government affords it.

Owing to the minority of His Highness the Maharaja of the State who was born in November 1912 Her Highness Maharani Setha Lakshmi Bai, who along with His Highness's mother, Maharani Setha Parvathi Bai, was adopted into the royal family in 1920, was, on the death in 1924 of the great Maharaja Sri Mulam Thirunal, in whose memory in which his forty years' reign must long live, proclaimed by the British Government Regent to rule the Travancore State and control the administration thereof until His Highness the Maharaja shall have completed his eighteenth year and has been formally invested with ruling powers. Her Highness assumed the regency in September 1924. Her Highness was born in November 1896 and is, therefore, only 33 years of age.

Concluding his opening address to the last Sri Mulam Popular Assembly, one of the two chief representative institutions of the State, on February 27, 1928, Mr. M. E. Watts, B.A., Bar-at-law, said, "We have now travelled all round Travancore and its administration. 'Circles though small are complete.' That is what we proudly feel of Travancore. 'Set in the centre is our Maharani, radiating wisdom, courage, goodness and a warm love to all her subjects. The patient light is to me, her minister, a beacon ever showing the way to justice and to righteousness. Her Highness rules and so a blessing lies upon the land."

This might look like laying it on somewhat thick to those who do not know Maharani Setha Lakshmi Bai, her exemplary character or the noble ideals that animate her administration. Those who do, must, however, admit that the Dewan's appreciation is not only not undeserved but is also only modest. Those who know her must admit that in her are seen those great human qualities that have made the womanhood of India not only so famous, its patient, forgiving wisdom, its silent visions, its strenuous tranquillity. Patience, wisdom, tranquillity, these have already stamped their mark on her administration. Through them streams a quiet effort towards a certain vision of things. It may reach that vision or may not, but that it is there making its way towards some vision, however far must give the Regency a distinction. Maharani Setha Lakshmi Bai is a woman with an imagination, an extensive kindness, an born enlightenment which can see things in their true setting. That is why, in spite of certain apocryphal expressions of dissatisfaction, the response to her administration has on the whole been one of an unmistakably loving appreciation. Her Highness is a large-hearted woman with most of the qualities of the true sister and mother in her.

A quiet demureness, bright dreaming eyes, a face touched with a certain natural delicacy, her physiognomy conveys a solid impression of a deep brooding calm. Thus modestly equipped Her Highness seems to shed a composing, quieting influence on the land she rules. This is perhaps the reason that a tranquillity pervades the whole circle in whose centre it has pleased Providence to place her to-day. Not that there are no disturbances within it. There are, there must be. The untouchables are in a sense "up in arms," asking for the admission of an ancient injustice that denies them the most rudimentary social rights. The beggary of unemployment among the educated classes is abroad and brings distress to many homes. The standard of general welfare needs to be raised. There is a crying demand for doing this, that and the other, but still the State is, to some extent, tranquil, and too, in a manner of speaking, "a blessing lies upon the land."

One of the very first acts of Her Highness was to appoint a Christian as her Dewan. It was the custom in Travancore to appoint only high-caste Hindus to the post. This custom was defended on the plea that the care of many Hindu temples was merged in the administration of the State. The idea, however, was gaining ground for some years that no office in the State, a modern state ought to remain the 'appanage' of any one particular class. Moreover in Travancore more than a quarter of the total population are Christians. These considerations must have weighed with her in calling Mr. Watts to the Diwan's office, and she overcame the difficulty. of the temples by placing them under a minister released from the Dewan's control and directly responsible to her. There was some opposition at the time both to the appointment and to the separation from the general administration of the temples which it involved. But it has now been widely recognised that it was a necessary and courageously rendered measure. It was in fact the separation of religion from politics.

Another, and perhaps a more important, measure in the ultimate values of life which she carried out at the beginning of her rule is the prohibition of animal sacrifice in all state-managed temples. It was a highly humanitarian piece of work. The gruesome practice of sacrificing animals on the altars of gods and goddesses was rooted in the traditions and customs of the land, and it was the more difficult, therefore, to pull it up. When a prohibition of this kind is made almost every one admits its necessity but does not always remember that the thing prohibited was allowed without any let or hindrance for centuries. The world is capable of much callousness and kind rulers have not always been too common.

The Regent's large-heartedness came again into striking prominence when about a little more than a year ago she abolished the system of levying tax in kind on the crown-lands of the State. These crown-lands called kandacakki lands in Travancore are the private property of the sovereign and are considerable in extent. Holders of such lands are tenants-at-will and possess no right of occupancy. The tax-in-kind system was abolished in respect of state-lands in the year 1908. The demand for the extension of the change to the crown-lands was appearing from time to time since that year. This act of amelioration shows the Maharani Regent to be not only kind but also keenly alive to justice. There must have been much grinding of the noses of the poor under the tax-in-kind regime because when the paddy for the payment of tax is produced it is always easy to reject it on one ground or another. It is not dry, it is not good, it contains chaff, any such objection comes easy to the guilty tempted collector. This compassionate commutation was a long overdue. The rate of commutation was fixed at 24 chackrams or 33 annas and 6.58 pies per para tentatively for six years. The average price of a para of paddy in Travancore is not less than a rupee.

The Maharani Regent has also prohibited the singing of obscene songs which was a customary nuisance at the annual festivals in some temples in Travancore. Such singing was so popular among certain classes in the State that a strong representation of the police had to be despatched to a certain "holy" locality to take the nonsense out of the errant minstrels. The enlightened way Her Highness's mind works inclines one to hope that she will interfere in some such divisive manner in the various and complications connected with the vexed questions of untouchability and unapproachability of which Travancore, progressive as it undoubtedly is, still so unhappily remains to a large extent one of the strongest citadels. She has the power to interfere thus and, what is more than that, the veneration and the courage too.

Although the ruler of Travancore like the king in England can do no wrong and is generally content with a strictly constitutional position that implies almost complete anonymity, one of her actions nearly brought thither a storm about half a century ago. It was the Press Regulation that Her Highness brought into force in 1925 by proclamation and that put a certain curb on the newspapers of the State. Such direct laws are not usually made in Travancore since there is the Legislative Council to supply the State's needs in this respect. The justification for the proclamation was that the majority of newspapers of the State were getting out of hand and corrupting public morality by an unrestricted use of insanities and obscene language. It was in truth like that and it is easy to gather any number of examples from the papers relating to that time. An immediate check had to be called for, but this aspect of the matter was not fully appreciated outside Travancore and there was some shaking of head at the law. Time has shown that the mere presence of this legislation has in some way exercised a wholesome effect upon the adolescent press in Travancore.

The Maharani Regent has married a nephew of the late Valia Koll Thampuran C. S. K., who is considered to be one of the brightest 'gurus' in the literature of Kerala. Valia Koll Thampuran is the title of the husband of the senior princess of the Travancore royal family. The present Valia Koll Thampuran, the Regent's husband, is also a scholar of no mean abilities and a true "sportsman" in either sense of the word. He has perhaps more sportsmanlike spirit in him than sportsmanship although he is admittedly the prince of big game hunters. There is no forest in Travancore which he has not penetrated and no rogue elephant which has defeated his courage and skill. He is a man with an animated face and decisive character. He is the father of two sweet princesses five and two years old. They all live in a beautiful palace on the eastern outskirts of the town of Trivandrum of which the Maharani Regent is very fond and whose amenities are now being rapidly enlarged. For example, good drinking-water conducted by pipes is coming from a distance of about 10 miles. Electric lighting, too, is coming, and there is going shortly to be built a magnificent railway station in the heart of the city.

Nature has endowed Travancore with various resources and many facilities. The soil is rich, the people are naturally industrious. There is rain enough and to spare. Travancore is a land intended by nature to be prosperous and peaceful. Such is also Maharani Sethu Lakshmi Bai's intention, and to a great extent Travancore is to-day both prosperous and peaceful, but should anyone think otherwise he may be told without hesitation it is due neither to nature's or the queenly Regent's fault.

WOMEN IN HINDU LAW—II.

THE SUTRA PERIOD.

As they grew in numbers, the Aryans of the Vedas times migrated to the plains, leaving their mountainous and snow-clad homes of the north. The changes in the surroundings and climate, and the incessant fight with the original inhabitants led to results not happy to the high level of Aryan culture, and consequently of the noble treatment accorded to women till then. We find, therefore, in the Sutra period following the Vedic times, a falling off of women's rights. It first began with the sacrificial drinks. "Soma," the drink of the gods, which was a mild and useful beverage in the colder regions from whence they migrated, became, in the hot Gangetic Plains, a somewhat powerful intoxicant, particularly since the plant was not readily available and by the time it was brought from the distant hills, the juice fermented in great part. At the Vedic sacrifices and rituals, the drink was the essential partaking as the gift of the gods. Women, who stood the innocuous drink in the colder regions, could not stand the powerful intoxicant that it became. The enervating climate of the plains induced, on the other hand, a thirst for more of the beverage on the part of men, who discovered a stronger drink in 'Sura.' At every sacrifice the drinks went round, and women, delicate by nature, and rendered more so by the tropical heat of the plains, were soon found incapable of partaking them. They were gradually kept away from the drinks and eventually from the sacrifices altogether. The result of it was that they ceased to have any incentive to study the Vedas. Knowledge, the performance of Sacrifices and the only source then of learning and the study of the Vedas, became the monopoly of men, who multiplied the rituals and increased the ceremonial details. Women, on the other hand, with the lack of learning and knowledge, ceased to command that respect and esteem, which they did before, and got gradually immured in domestic affairs. Day after day the gulf increased between the intellectual man and the household woman. Men became learned and women remained ignorant.

As a natural result, women ceased to manage properties as they used to do and began themselves to be treated as properties belonging to men. Alitiasyana doubted first their ability, and later their right to manage properties. His reasoning was that the bridegroom when he gave presents to his father-in-law, did in fact pay the price of the bride and purchase her. The women denial of their rights was contested by Badarayana; and Jaimini followed suit with an array of Vedic authorities in favour of women's rights. "Women" he contended "are not purchased by their husbands. The present to the father of the bride is only a gift. Women could perform sacrifices and study the Vedas. They had proprietary rights equal to those of men." This he maintained, applied as much to women as to men; and there was no justification for the denial of the right. But the times were against them. The struggle with the aboriginal Dasys, the assimilation in some measure of their view of women in consequence of the close contact with them, the actual exclusion of women from the sacrifices and the lack of any incentive to them for the study of the Vedas, all resulted in the lowering of the status of women in law as in life. Harita and Yama, while holding with Jaimini that women could study the Vedas, declared that even as a master of abstract right they could not do so after marriage. Gautama went further and declared that women had no independence in the matter of the sacrifices or the study of the Vedas; and for purposes of proprietary rights classed them among land and other kinds of wealth. "A girl should be given in marriage before she attained puberty." He ordained and suggested that if a woman had no child born to her by her husband, she may beget one by another, though the husband was living. According to him a widow should not inherit her husband's property if he died undivided; and even if he died divided she could inherit only for the moment, but must beget a son by a kinsman of her husband, preferably the brother, and hand over the property to the son. Otherwise she was only entitled to share the property with the ascendants. If she had sons, they took all the property; and even if they divided, the mother was not entitled to any share. Vasishtha was equally hard. "Women are not independent," he declared and continued "Women are their parents' maids." A widow was not entitled to inherit under any circumstance, for he said "Let the ascendants divide the heritage of him who leaves no issue." In the matter of adoption he imposed the restriction "Let a woman neither give nor receive a son except with her husband's permission. Of all the writers of this period however Baudhavans was probably the most outstanding opponent of women's rights, and the most deadly were the blows he dealt. He found that women did not take part in sacrifices and did not study the Vedas. Straightway he declared that "Women have no business with the sacred texts." He found that women did not manage properties, and forthwith he declared that women had no right to share in properties. He went in search of a text in support and found one.

"Therefore are women incompetent to obtain a share" served his purpose. What though the incompetency referred to in the Vedic text concerned the ability to stand the intoxicating sacrificial drink, and what though the inability referred to concerned a share in the drinks? It caught the imagination of the people and women were denied all rights of property except the few baubles by way of presents; and to this day the evil has not been entirely removed. Girls were ordained to be married in their infancy and were given away in marriage for prices. According to him a wife who was barren or quarrelsome may be abandoned without scruple. Some may be abandoned without scruple. This was almost the darkest period of women's rights and status. Niyoga fell into disrepute as it deserved and remarriage was discouraged. Widows were ordained to lead an ascetic life meaning thereby that they must refrain from indulging in luxuries of life. But had not Vasishtha declared that an ascetic must remove the hair on his head? Thus appears to have originated the barbarous custom that disguises many a mother and sister of ours to-day. Coming last among the writers of this period, Apastamba echoed faintly the adverb of a period of struggle for revival. He declared in the chapter on Expiation that a clipping of the hair by about two fingers' width at the end would suffice in the case of women. He agreed with the other writers of the period that women were incompetent to study the Vedas and that the widow was not entitled to inherit, the sapindas being entitled to the property in preference to her. "But," he added "the husband and the wife are one in all matters including the acquisition of properties. The wife has therefore a right of co-ownership with her husband during his lifetime." He included the daughter among the heirs and while ignoring or not recognising the praisaka form of marriage he admitted the validity of marriages by capture and by sale. Apastambha struck a note of revival of women's cause, but in the main he is among those who recognised little or no rights in women.

During the period of the Sutras, women's position in law suffered a great fall. Prevented from learning and acquiring knowledge, incapable of owning or managing properties, except the few nicknacks obtained as presents at marriage or from relatives, treated as mere possessions in law, compulsorily married at a tender age, and no longer commanding that respect and reverence, which they did in the Vedic ages, women were at the lowest ebb of their legal rights and status in the Sutras period. The battle of the cultures of the Aryans and the aborigines was at its height and the assimilation of the latter by the former marks the period of the fall of women's rights and privileges.

RAMKRISHNA MISSION, KHAH.

AN APPEAL.

The Ramkrishna Ashram of Bombay has been preaching the unity of all religions, and undertaking philanthropic works of various kinds for the last five years. The universal religion of Vedanta harmonising all creeds has been the ideal of the Mission. During the devastating floods in Gujarat last year, the Swamis of the Mission rendered help to thousands of people by distributing grains, clothes, medicines and by building more than 1000 houses for homeless people. The new cult of Seva-dharma as preached by Swami Vivekananda, ministering to the physical, intellectual and spiritual needs of the people is the keynote of all the activities of the Mission. Seva-dharms or Houses of Service have been established at Hardwar, Brindavan, Allahabad, Benares and Rangoon on a large scale. The need for a charitable dispensary is not less in a suburb of Bombay. At present medicine is dispensed to patients who crowd in the Ashram buildings. The dispensary has also to be equipped. A separate building for the charitable dispensary and the free school is a desideratum. With the object of materialising this scheme, a plot of land just in front of the Ashram premises has been purchased at a cost of Rs. 7000. The two buildings will cost Rs. 10,000. Of this amount, Rs. 8,000 have been realised. We appeal to the generous public of the Bombay Presidency to contribute Rs. 12,000, which will remove a long-felt want of this philanthropic institution. Contribution, however small, will be thankfully received and acknowledged by the President or Secretary, Shri Ramkrishna Ashram, P.O. Khar, Bombay.

TAGORE AT ADYAR.

Mr. C. F. Andrews writes in the New India, Madras:

Before leaving Adyar, I should like very briefly to say, with all sincerity, how delightful has been the time which has been given to us within the precincts of the Adyar Ashram, and how the peace of it has been realised.

Personally, when I came to Adyar, my mind was filled with very deep anxieties about the future. This will easily be understood by any one who has seen the frailty of the Pole Babindranath Tagore, and who was thus enabled to understand what it meant to the world whether he is able to get his health recuperated, or not. In spite of the heat, which on some days was very great, there can be no question that the Pole's own health has been remarkably restored by his short stay in Adyar. Every possible thing was done to give him entirely the rest he needed. The inmates of the Ashram were full of consideration and kindly tenderness towards him; because they felt that he was not only their guest, but their friend.

On one evening of his visit, under the great Banyan Tree, the Pole met the residents of Adyar personally, so as to be able to receive a kindly greeting from each one of them, and give them his blessing in return. He spoke to them, in most touching words, with a voice that was so frail with physical weakness, that it was difficult for some to hear what he said, telling them how he himself, as soon as he had come to Adyar had felt that it was the true spirit of the ancient Ashrama Life of India that had already begun to be realised here in Adyar itself. It was a life which had its own harmony and beauty; it was self-contained and self-supporting; it had realised within itself an ideal of Brotherhood which made it unmistakably great and true. Thus the truth of life was followed, which was to be, rather than to be incessantly occupied with external affairs. For, while there were clearly numerable activities which went forth from the Power House of Adyar, like an electric current, the Power House itself of Adyar was always well supplied with energy, stored up within, and running over from its inner fulness.

The poet told the residents at Adyar, that he regarded them as an Ashram. He also stated, that he in his own way had tried to build up an Ashram at Shanti Niketan, which should fulfiil his own ideals. He pointed out that, with the scope of those ideals, there was not only a place for culture, but also for the most necessary of all works—the work among the poor in the villages. He had realised from his earliest days, that the village life of India was the central fact of Indian civilization. Therefore, in his own Ashram, the one thing which appealed to his own heart, perhaps most of all, was the silent effort now being made to reconstruct from within the village ideal and make it fruitful for the future.

If this could be done even in one centre, it would spread from place to place in turn. What he himself wished to do, in his own way, was not to set up some artificial activity, which only for a time might be stimulated and kept going; but, rather patiently, quietly and silently to sow the seeds from which slowly but surely the new life would develop and propagate itself from within.

It was a very delightful sight, after the Poet had spoken and Mrs. Besant had replied in gracious and eloquent words—saying to him that Adyar was his General's Council—when the glow lamps, the two white heads, bowed down with his hands spread to greet the Poet who stretched out his hands in return to greet her. In the light of the glow lamps, the two white heads, bowed down with age, came together, in a mutual salutation, and a hush fell on the audience as they realised what such a meeting of two, whose lives had been so devoted to India, meant not only for India, but for the world.

THE SPECIAL MARriage ACT.

Whereas it is expedient further to amend the Special Marriage Act, 1872; It is hereby enacted as follows:—

1. Short title.—This Act may be called the Special Marriage (Amendment) Act, 1922.

2. Amendment of preamble to Act III of 1872.—In this preamble to the Special Marriage Act, 1872 (hereinafter referred to as the said Act)—

(i) after the words "a form of" the word "civil" shall be inserted;

(ii) after the words "for persons" the words "domiciled in British India" shall be inserted; and

(iii) the words "who do not profess the Christian, Jewish, Hindu, Muhammadan, Parsi, Buddhist, Sikh or Jain religion" shall be omitted.

3. Amendment of section 2, Act III of 1872.—In section 2 of the said Act—

(i) the words "neither of whom professes the Christian or the Jewish, or the Hindu, or the Muhammadan or the Parsi or the Buddhist, or the Sikh or the Jain religion" shall be omitted; and

(ii) after the words "between persons" the words "domiciled in British India" shall be inserted.

4. Amendment of clause 2, Second Schedule to Act III of 1872.—In the Second Schedule to the said Act, for clause 2 in the Declarations to be made by the bridegroom and the bride, respectively, the following shall be substituted, namely:—"I am domiciled in British India."

STATEMENT OF OBJECTS AND REASONS.

The laws of all civilised countries provide for the contract of civil marriage by persons who may so desire. The disability to contract such marriages in India is merely territorial and there is no reason why a similar law should not be enacted for this country. The enactment, if passed, would be merely optional and leaves intact the existing personal laws which control the performance of marriages.

The reasons which have induced us to draft this Bill are as follows:—

Sir Henry Mayne as Law Member of the Governor General's Council had introduced a Civil Marriage Bill; but as the Government were then immediately concerned with an enactment to prescribe a civil form of marriage applicable only to Brahmans by whom they were moved for the enactment of a secular law to enable them to contract marriages, its provisions were so limited in the Bill which became Act III of 1872.

In 1909, the late Mr. Bhupendra Nath Dass and later on one of us had also introduced a similar Bill, but its provisions were eventually transformed into those of Act XXX of 1923.

The Baroda State have recently introduced a Civil Marriage Bill; while the Laws of other Indian States are understood to provide for the performance of such marriages. The advantages of the measure, if enacted, are obvious. The Bill would enable persons subject to polygamous marriage laws to contract monogamous marriages and remove the inequality in the matter of divorce. It would elevate the status of women. These benefits have already been assured to the Hindus, Buddhists, Sikhs and Jains by Act XXX of 1923, and there is no reason why the benefit that that Act confers upon the communities named should not be extended to other communities who might as regards succession be equally brought under the law enacted in the Indian Succession Act. A provision to this effect has not been inserted in the Bill, but it can be added at a later stage if public opinion favours it. The absence of a civil marriage law lends itself to perjury and artificial conversions; which is the policy of the State to prevent. It was so observed by Sir Henry Mayne who advocated the establishment of a non-sectarian marriage law in order to prevent the abuse resulting from such conversions (Proceedings Imperial Council, dated 27th November, 1888, pp. 496, 499).

To sum up then the advantages of such marriages are as follows:—

1. Such marriages are recognised and provided for by the laws of all civilised countries, and it is possible to contract such marriages outside the territorial limits of India. The disability is, therefore, purely territorial, and patriotic Indians are naturally anxious to remove all such disabilities from their way.

2. The Bill is monogamous in its policy and would result in introducing monogamy where polygamous marriages alone are at present possible.

3. It would prevent artificial conversions resulting from the exigency of marriages.

4. It would give a wider field for selection and thus ensure a happier domestic life.

5. It would introduce a greater sincerity in marriages by dispensing with the subscription of a declaration which many desiring to marry under the existing Act have to subscribe to not without considerable mental reserve.

6. It would tend to the unification of the Indian races without at the same time interfering with their personal religion.

7. It would give the wife a more assured position and entitle her to exercise her right of divorce which may not be possible if married under her personal law.

8. And being merely optional it frees upon no one's rights, but merely prescribes a form to those who, while desiring to escape from the thraldom of their religious ritual, do not wish to renounce it.

It is believed that, with the growing strength of the rational sentiment, such a Bill has become a public desideratum, and it has therefore been decided to re-introduce it in the Central Legislature.

THE HINDU MARRIAGES DISSOLUTION ACT.

Whereas it is expedient to remove certain doubts regarding the dissolution of marriages of persons professing the Hindu religion in certain cases; It is hereby enacted as follows:

1. Short title, application and extent.—(1) This Act may be called the Hindu Marriages Dissolution Act, 1923.

(2) It applies to all Hindus, and extends to the whole of British India.

2. Grounds for dissolution of marriage.—Notwithstanding any law or custom to the contrary, a Hindu wife shall be entitled to obtain a declaration of the invalidity of her marriage or its dissolution for any of the following reasons, namely:

(a) Impotency of the husband;
(b) His imbecility;
(c) The fact that he was suffering from sanious or ulcerous leprosy.

3. Seeing of other rights.—Nothing herein contained shall be deemed to restrict the rights of dissolution of marriages otherwise existing.

STATEMENT OF OBSEVTS AND REASONS.

Under the Hindu law the main object of marriage is the procreation of a male off-spring. It was so necessary that that result was obtained by the practice of Niyoga, which provided the wife with a companion when the husband himself was imbecile or impotent. As that practice has fallen into desuetude, it is necessary that wives married to such persons should obtain relief; since if they can no longer practice Niyoga they should be free to adopt the only honourable course open to them of securing their release from the bondage of such marriages. This is all the more necessary, since under Hindu law both the husband suffering from any of these disabilities and his wife are excluded from all rights in property. It is, therefore, hoped that this measure will give the Hindu wife some relief to which she is so clearly entitled. The Bill is not intended to introduce an innovation in the Hindu law of marriages. If passed it will have the effect of merely restoring the old law laid down by Narad and Vashisth whose Smritis are of the most revered authorities on Hindu law:

"Narad: XII—8. The man must undergo an examination with regard to his virility; when the fact of his virility has been placed beyond doubt, he shall obtain the maiden (but not otherwise).

Ib. 16. For the wife of one who spils his semen, or whose semen is devoid of strength, though they may have discharged their marital duties, another husband must be procured after she has waited for half a year.

Ib. 19. Women have been created for the sake of propagation, the wife being the field, and the husband the giver of the seed. The field must be given to him who has seed. He who has no seed is unworthy to possess the field.

Ib. 24. When a bridegroom goes abroad after having espoused a maiden, let the maiden wait till her menses have passed three times, and then choose another bridegroom.

Ib. 37. Madness, loss of caste, impotency, insanity to have forsaken his relatives (affliction with a chronic or hateful disease, and deformity); these are the faults of a suitor.

Ib. 97. When her husband is lost or dead, when he has become a religious ascetic, when he is impotent, and when he has been expelled from caste; these are the five cases of legal necessity, in which a woman may be justified in taking another husband."

Vashisth—21. And she is called remarried who leaving an impotent, outcaste or mad husband takes another lord. (Vashisth XVIII—21; 14-S. B. E. 827.)

"CHRISTA SEVA SANGH"

On St. Mark's Day, April 25, in Christ Church, Mahabaleshwar, the Reverend J. C. Winslow was professed as the first Siddha or Superior of the "Christa Seva Sangh," (or Society of the Servants of Christ) whose headquarters are at Poona. In the Communion Service the Profession took place after the Creed. The Bishop of Bombay first gave the address printed below, and then the profession was made according to the form which is given after the Address. The whole service was invested with deep solemnity and the Church was nearly full. As the classes of the Marathi Language School are held in the compound adjoining Christ Church there were suspended for an hour, between 8 and 9 a.m., to enable the missionaries attending the School to be present and help Mr. Winslow by their prayers. Six of Mr. Winslow's English fellow-workers in the 'Sangh' have been students in the Marathi Language School this year and this solemn service in Christ Church helped to cement the bond between them and the remainder of the ninety students in the School. We understand that the vows taken by the Church was nearly full; the Service was invested with deep solemnity and the Church was nearly full. As the classes of the Marathi Language School are, to the Christian churches, going to make his profession as a 'Siddha.'

BISHOP OF BOMBAY ON INDIAN WORSHIP AND ASCETISM.

In his address the Bishop of Bombay said: "I am now going to ask your prayers for the first member of the 'Christa Seva Sangh,' to be professed as a Siddha. He comes here after a long preparation to take this important step. The 'Christa Seva Sangh,' or Society of the Servants of Christ, is a Society of Englishmen and Indians who desire to live together with a common simplicity and an equal fellowship in the service of their Master and of this country. All that they do they wish to do in cooperation the one with the other. It is by a happy coincidence that this profession is to take place on St. Mark's Day. St. Mark we are told became the 'interpreter of St. Peter.' You, my Son, are called with all your Society to be the interpreter of the ancient Christian Church to India, and of India to the Christian churches of the West. By such interpretation the 'Sangh' may do great service to the Indian Church. I pray God that it may help that Church to make great advances in the matter of worship. I do not think that this will be made by Western men giving their own forms of worship to India, nor do I think that it will be made by Indians inventing forms of worship copied from the non-Christian religions of this country, or inspired by a reaction against those religions. I believe it will be made by English and Indian men praying together and worshipping together and finding out together what portions of the inherited devotional life of this country are really compatible with the spirit of Christianity, as that spirit is known to those who have inherited its traditional form of worship. Again, I look to the 'Christa Seva Sangh' to interpret the Christian spirit of asceticism to India. Asceticism has always formed a great part in the religion of India. But there is something in Indian asceticism which is extremely dangerous. It is that it is founded on the belief that the world is bad, and that life in the world is bad, and that the one thing to do for the salvation of the soul is to escape from the world and even from all ordinary life in the world. Now, the tradition of Christian asceticism has been saved from this mistake by the constant remembrance that God made all things good. The man who in our Western Church stands beyond all others for this way of asceticism was St. Francis of Assisi, who loved all the flowers, and the birds, and the sun and the moon, and the beauties of the earth as good things which God had made "very good," and man has something which God had intended to be good and had given His Son to restore to goodness. That joyful asceticism of St. Francis is the hope of these brethren to follow in their lives, and it is that aspect of asceticism which may be able to make the Indian tendency to asceticism Christian in spirit and a benefit to the Indian Church. I commend therefore to your prayers the 'Christa Seva Sangh' and its ideal of fellowship and co-operation, and especially him who is now going to make his profession as a 'Siddha.'

OFFICE FOR PROFESSION OF A 'SIDDHA.'

[The Bishop of Bombay has very kindly supplied us with a copy of the Order of Service used by him on this occasion. The order of service was as follows.]

The Profession of a Siddha shall always take place during the Administration of Holy Communion. After the Great the Bishop's chair shall be placed before the Altar, and the Bishop being seated therein, the achatrya (or someone appointed by him) shall bring up and present to him those novices who are about to make their Profession. [On this occasion an Indian member of the 'Sangh,' Brother Shantuwarao Boole, acted as achatrya.]

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Fellowships in Union Theological Seminary, New York:—B. W. Wendell Thomas, B.D., S.T.M., of Forman Christian College, Lahore, has been assigned a Missionary Fellowship in Union Theological Seminary. Other Fellowships were assigned—one to China, three to Japan, one to Persia, and one to Brazil. Applications for these Fellowships (750 dollars) and Scholarships (450 dollars) should be in by January 1st, preceding the academic year for which application is made. Twenty apartments in a building adjacent to the Seminary, within two blocks of Teachers College and Columbia University, are available for furloughed missionaries. Detailed information about these apartments can be secured by addressing the Chairman of the Committee on Missionary Apartments.
A Konty (Vysia) Widow Remarriage.—It is a significant sign of the times that the cause of Social Reform is making headway even in such a culturally backward and typically conservative community as that of the Konteas. An instance in point in proof of the above fact is the remarriage of a young widow belonging to that community which was celebrated on the 7th instant in the Bhandiyawazar, Hyderabad. The bride, Srimati Ramsyavati Belduri Shilavanshnannines, aged about 16, is a daughter of Mr Lingeyya of Mhasranabad. The bridegroom is Mr. Karjam Vearayya, son of Mr. Rajayya of Massep, aged 22 a motor mechanic by profession. The veteran social reformer Mr. T Rama Rao officiated as priest. There was a good gathering of ladies and gentlemen present on the occasion including several members of the local Konty community. The Dampathy (newly wedded couple) are now residing at the house of Mr. Baji Krishna Rao, B. A., B. L., the well-known Arya Samajist, at Secunderabad.

An Indian Lady Doctor of Literature.—A correspondent writes to the Leader, Dr. Gargi Devi Aastha, daughter of Rai Salib Munsi Jwals Prasad of Lucknow, returned home, early this month after taking the Ph. D. degree in English literature from London University. After graduating from Benares University she left for England in September 1925, attended the University College, London, and secured the Ph. D. degree. She was elected a member of the Royal Asiatic Society in London. She is the first Kayastha lady to achieve this distinction and deserves congratulations.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLIONAIRES & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 50 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 27 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislation in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

The Goal of Indian Politics—The Congress leaders have set themselves the task of preparing a constitution for British India while they are not decided as to whether India should aim at Dominion status or independence. The British Constitution did not suit Pandit Motilal Nehru and Mr. S. C. Bose, the two most prominent among the younger Congress leaders, differ from each other fundamentally as to the contents of Indian nationalism, but they both agreed that independence is the proper goal. The National Congress at Madras and several provincial conferences since then, have adopted resolutions to the same effect. The older Congress leaders like Pandit Motilal Nehru and Dr. Ambedkar do not disown the independence resolution but seek refuge in temporizing phrases which mean nothing. The only precedent for a part of the British Empire framing a constitution on the basis of independence, is that of the United States, but when the founders of the States, sat down to the work, the British Commander, Cornwallis, had surrendered with his army to the “rebels” Commander at York Town. The recent case of Egypt, so far as it applies to India, is rather a warning than an example. Dominion status, somewhat on the Joint Free State pattern, will ensure to India all the advantages of independence together with those and they are of inestimable value—of partnership in the greatest commonwealth of free nations the world has yet known. These nations already include races other than British. The French in Canada, the Boers in South Africa, are non-British elements who show no disposition to merge their identity in British nationality, and the Irish, of course, have always maintained that they are a different race with a different culture from the British. India’s position, for good or evil, is for international purposes fixed permanently in the history of English speaking nations. It is wise to realise these facts instead of dividing time and energy between incompatible ideas.

Unwitting and Premature—Opinion is gaining ground against attempting to frame a paper constitution at the present stage. The Week, which applies the problems of the future to the facts of the present, says: “The move of presenting a ready-made Constitution has seemed to us from the first a wrong one. We do not believe in paper constitutions: for neither do we believe that human legislators are capable of turning out anything perfect or capable of meeting more than immediate needs; nor do we attach any magic virtue to the British model, which adopted a model from the Roman Catholic point of view, and the English language and literature to which it introduced us, belongs the chief credit for inspiring life into the dry bones of the Indian people in the eighteenth century. It is a sure sign of conscious inferiority to be afraid to acknowledge what we owe to others who have befriended and helped us when we were in need of friend and help. If some of our fervid orators understood that violent language always leads to strong reactions, they would, we are sure, be more discriminate in their criticism of British rule as a whole. By all means, let wrong measures be condemned, but let not undue recognition be withheld from achievements which merit it. These observations apply as well to the administration of Indian States which are often painted in the darkest colours by writers in the press and speakers in public meetings.

Overshootings the Mark—The people of Athens got tired of hearing Aristides being called the Just. Some of us are getting tired of hearing the British rule in India being condemned as satanic. British rule, it is quite true, has many sins of omission and commission to account for, and, as we have repeatedly said, it has now arrived at a stage when its usefulness cannot be maintained without vesting a large measure of initiative in Indian hands. British rule, in fact, should become Indo-British, the British element becoming an advisory and supplementary factor in the administration. We often think that the process of reform will be less difficult if we frankly acknowledge the fact that British rule and the English language and literature to which it introduced us, belongs the chief credit of inspiring life into the dry bones of the Indian people in the eighteenth century. It is a sure sign of conscious inferiority to be afraid to acknowledge what we owe to others who have befriended and helped us when we were in need of friend and help. If some of our fervid orators understood that violent language always leads to strong reactions, they would, we are sure, be more discriminate in their criticism of British rule as a whole. By all means, let wrong measures be condemned, but let not undue recognition be withheld from achievements which merit it. These observations apply as well to the administration of Indian States which are often painted in the darkest colours by writers in the press and speakers at public meetings.
not unsuccessfully during the last ten years. In two articles contributed to the Contemporary Review, the Right Hon. A. H. L. Fisher points out that the British model is greatly handicapped in dealing with industrial and economic questions and considers various suggestions for supplementing it by other institutions. To start at this time to frame a constitution for India on a British model is to justify the remark of a keen British observer who observed some years ago in respect of Indian industrial policy that we were trying to furnish our wardrobe with the old clothes of Britain cast off some fifty years back. The People of Lahore and the Servant of India of Poona agree that the time is not ripe for constitution-making.

The Statutory Commission's Committee:—

The names of the persons who are to form the Committee to enquire and report on the growth of education in British India to the Simon Commission, were published last week. They are: Sir Philip Hartog (Member of the Public Service Commission), Chairman; Sir Lewis Amherst Selby-Bigge, Bart., late Permanent Secretary to the Board of Education; Sir Selimul Ahamed, Vice-Chancellor, Patna University; Sir George Anderson, Director of Public Instruction, the Punjab; Dewan Bahadur Raja Narendranath, Member of the Punjab Legislative Council and Mr. Muthulakshmi Reddi, Deputy President, Madras Legislative Council. Mr. R. M. Satham, Indian Educational Service, has been appointed Secretary to the Committee. Most of these names were already known, the only new names being Sir Lewis Bigge and Raja Narendranath. The Raja is also one of the members of the committee elected by the Punjab Legislative Council to co-operate with the Commission when it visits the province. Four out of the seven members are Englishmen, three of them government officials. All the three Indian members represent the several communal points of view. According to provinces, two of the members, Sir George Anderson and Raja Narendranath are from the Punjab, two from Madras and the second, Mr. Satham, are from Madras, and two, the chairman and Sir Sultan Ahamed are ex-Vice-Chancellor and Vice-Chancellor respectively of Dacca University. It has evidently not been possible to make the selection on any principle—the Commission had to accept whoever was willing to serve on the Committee. The task of the Committee, it is said, is to report on the growth of education in British India. All the necessary information is available in the annual and quinquennial report of the Provincial governments and the Government of India, and all that the Committee has got to do is to put them together in the form of a single report, unless, indeed, its work is really more than what is conveyed by the press communiqué.

Indian States and Reform:—What purports to be a scheme prepared by Indian princes for submission to the Butler Committee which has been appointed to enquire and report on the future relations between British India and the states, was published some days ago. On the face of it, it is at best a very rough draft and we have reason to think that it has already undergone revision and is to undergo further revision in important parts. The Butler Committee's terms of reference are restricted and it is possible that much of the contents of the draft may be found to exceed them. However that may be, there is no need whatsoever to assume that the Princes as a class are anxious to antagonise opinion in British India which, by the way, is whole-heartedly in sympathy with them in their demand for more equitable arrangements in regard to customs duties, currency, defence and other matters which concern the whole country. Questions of social legislation too should be included in this category. The present tendency for each state to pass laws on marriage and succession without reference to British India or other states, is bound to break up the social homogeneity of the Indian communities, and to introduce fresh divisions in the country going deeper than political and administrative questions.

Cow Protection:—One of the outstanding differences between Hindus and Mussalmans is that relating to the killing of cows. The sanctity of the cow is much attenuated but every Hindu, however heterodox in other respects, feels a thrill of repugnance when cow-killing is mentioned. The feeling against cow-killing has perhaps in fact one of the deep-seated instincts of the Hindu people. Like many other instincts, this on examination is found to be rooted in a practical necessity. To a predominately agricultural people, a considerable proportion of whom is vegetarian by habit, cows and oxen are essential to their very existence. From the economic point of view, therefore, cow preservation has an appeal extending beyond the pale of Hinduism. Unity conferences have tried hard with but limited success to bring about an understanding between Hindus and Mussalmans on the subject. Far more effective in achieving this object, is the work done by institutions such as Jivadayya Gowshala at Ghatkoper, a copy of whose annual report has been sent to us. It is well-known that many of the cows sent to the slaughter-house will not be sent there if the owners were relieved wholly or partially of the cost of maintaining them when they get dry. The Ghatkoper Gowshala does this and it has thus the means of saving hundreds of animals from the butcher's knife. If there were more of such institutions, this particular matter of controversy between Hindus and Mussalmans would solve itself without the help of any conference.

Women's Economic Independence:—

Writes the New Republic: “So much is said and written nowadays about the new economic status of women that some of us may have an exaggerated idea of the position of the feminist wage-earner. A useful study which will help to correct such notions is that recently made by Mrs. Chase Woodhouse of the United States Bureau of Economics. More than 3,000 unmarried women, with full-time jobs, were included in the investigation, and it was found that those with a salary of sixty dollars a week or more are in a highly exceptional minority. Education engaged the efforts of four-fifths of those studied, and the best paid of these were a group of three presidents of women's colleges, with average salaries of $3,200. Next to them came nine principals of junior high schools, who averaged $3,859. The college teachers earned, on the average, $3,457, and those in the high grade schools, $1,542. Business women, with the exception of two occupations, averaged less than $3,000 a year.”
THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

THE INTERNATIONAL TRAFFIC IN WOMEN.

The League of Nations has been devoting attention to the subject of international traffic in women and we earnestly trust that its efforts to stamp it out will meet with complete success. An inside view of the traffic has been lately published in the form of a book entitled "The Story of a Terrible Life" by Mr. Basil Tozer. The story, it is stated, is the actual narrative of the whole of her amazing career, told to the author by "perhaps the most notorious procurers in Europe." Mr. Tozer tells us in a brief introductory note how he came to know her and to get the story from her. "I met her first," he writes, "many years ago in New Orleans. Afterwards we came across her in many lands, but not until the War, when I had occasion to be in close touch with her at a French base for over a year, did she gradually relate to me, bit by bit, the whole story of her extraordinary career." This Messaline, as the author names her in order to spare the susceptibilities of relatives bearing her name who are still alive, amassed a large fortune during the five years that the War lasted; she died recently. She seems to have been born with a strong bent towards depravity, and was a willing victim to the seducer early in her teens. In a short time she came into touch with "Countess X" who maintained a big fashionable brothel in an aristocratic castle in German forest. The account of how innocent young girls were inveigled into the castle and broken to the trade is fearfully realistic. Drugging is a part of the method and the least sign of rebellion was at once punished by chastisement and there was a room set aside for this purpose from which girls of all nationalities who were not disposed to the place were temporarily excluded. Almost all of the girls were daughters of bourgeosie and had become discontented with their homes and set out in search of adventure and excitement.

Few of the inmates in the castle were British. "Apparently," observes Mr. Tozer, "British girls were the most difficult to decoy, also the precautions taken in England, particularly in London, Liverpool and Manchester, by the police and by private societies to prevent girls being taken out of the country unless certain credentials of the persons in charge of them were forthcoming, interfered considerably with the traffic here." Messaline gradually learned the ways of the trade and became in course of time herself the greatest and most successful trader. "How long do your girls last?" Mr. Tozer asked Messaline one day. "From eight to ten years" was the reply. "After six years they begin to fail even when free from disease. We transfer them then to the low-rate establishments, where they last for another few years—some I have known to be productive for twelve years, but that only seldom happens." "And after that?" "We get rid of them." "What happens to them?" "Where do they go?" "God knows. It doesn't concern me. Into the gutter, I suppose, some into the river, in some countries, judging by the number of bodies that are dragged out of the rivers from time to time." Alcohol is an indispensable concomitant of the brothel. "A fruitful source of revenue in her houses and in the places of entertainment of the tingel-tangel type which she opened at her own expense as her profits rolled up" writes Mr. Tozer, "was the sale of intoxicants. In the houses the cheapest champagne was sold at two and three guineas a bottle—the price depended on the customer and what he looked like and if he seemed willing and in a position to pay the higher prices—and whisky and cognac at two guineas a bottle." Messaline's experiences are of an interesting character. Her best patrons, she said were men of over fifty—It is men above that age who generally had much money to spend and they seemed to want to squeeze every ounce of pleasure out of life before the end came. Russian Grand Dukes, Indian Nabobs and American millionaires, were among the most lucrative of Messaline's customers. Coloured men, we are told, have a special attraction for "a lot of white women (though not many young girls) of all nationalities or not in the least attracted by white men." So much is said nowadays to the detriment of the coloured man, but Messaline's testimonial to him comes as a surprise. "Men of colour are the most discreet people on earth," she told Mr. Tozer. "I have known white men have recourse to blackmail when Society women had been so injudicious as to have secret dealings with them. I have never known a coloured man try to extort blackmail under similar conditions. In illustration of the fascination exercised by coloured men, Mr. Tozer states that "at some of the great exhibitions held in Europe and in America, where native villages were included among the attractions, women of the class referred to crowded into their villages and their compounds and made almost open overtures to the natives." Among such customers, we are told, was a powerful and fabulously rich Oriental potentate whose appetite was never satisfied. He never bought less than ten girls at a time, and generally many more. "It was a red-letter day" Messaline said "when an order came from this native. There was keen competition among her girls when it became known that an order from this man had been received." There are things said in this book beside which Miss Katherine Mayo's stories in "Mother India" pale into insignificance. If half of these are true, Europe is a greater menace to humanity than India as seen through Miss Mayo's highly coloured spectacles.
"CONSTRUCTIVE CITIZENSHIP".

What is the basis of constructive citizenship? This is a question which has interest for the whole world today, both East and West. Principal L. F. Jacks, of Manchester College, Oxford, answers this question by saying that constructive citizenship today consists in good workmanship. He is a great believer in the gospel of work, and at a time when various social panaceas are regarded by many as bringing in the Millennium, his writings are indeed refreshing. There is something rugged and courageous about his outlook. Before publication in book form, "Constructive Citizenship" was given at the University of Glasgow as the "Stevenson Lectures on Citizenship." In the main, the book is an elaboration of Jacks' philosophy of life for an industrial era and carries still further the position which he advocated in his previous book, "The Challenge of Life."

He begins his thesis by defining his use of the term 'constructive' as pertaining to method or spirit rather than as a programme or a system. He makes an interesting distinction between space thinking and time thinking; the former in terms of a stationary goal, the latter in terms of direction. Prof. Jacks is very critical of the pathological attitude toward society in which the community is regarded as sick with multitudinous diseases and for which the social physician, after diagnosing the case, prescribes appropriate remedies. Such an attitude takes little account of the enormous fund of vitality in the social organism. The author says that the three-fold aim of constructive citizenship in an industrial civilization should be skill, trusteeship and scientific method. He is very much opposed to the "Cult of Happiness" so-called and avers that what is needed today is not a search for a soft-job, but a social value which is willing to accept pain along with pleasure, in a co-operative world. In a human society which is always in flux, never static, he suggests the use of the word Challenge in place of problem and experiment in place of solution. Skill is defined as "knowledge completing itself by doing the thing that it knows," and one of the greatest injuries done by our industrial order is the devitalization of labor through the loss of personal skill. If labor is the chief instrument for the education of mankind, there must be a minimum degree of skill sufficient to furnish the worker with a reasonable interest in what he is doing. Prof. Jacks insists that the distinction between work and play has been drawn too finely. Rather than viewing work as a mere money-making process, we must think of society as an organized association for co-operative work, both in times of leisure as well as labor. After taking issue with Bertrand Russell about the "boredom of labor" he discusses the necessity of vitalizing leisure, and of developing industrial morality. Trusteeship he defines as the performance of a trust, not in a manner legally correct, but rather personally honourable, and he says that it involves duties as well as rights. He portrays mutual insurance as an example of fiduciary trusteeship. The last chapters of the book are concerned with a discussion of quality as preferable to quantity, the importance of material things as the means through which spiritual things are attained, the necessity of continuous willing in all co-operative enterprises, and the inevitable permanence of social tension as a factor in all civilization.

Prof. Jacks does well to point out the limitations, not merely of mechanical science and of our industrial order, but of social science as well. His view of society as a continuing process is undoubtedly correct. Although he recognizes the gradual passing of the military era, yet he turns with longing and a growing hope to the League of Nations, and this is not surprising when one remembers the terrific rivalries now being engendered in industrial affairs. The author is right when he asserts that the busiest citizen is often the happiest. There are numerous other statements with which I find myself in substantial agreement. In showing the unhappy effects of coercion, in stressing the wise use of leisure, and in pointing out the worthlessness of matter, he is undoubtedly a modern prophet.

There are other features of his book, however, which give rise to questions. In his seeming idealization of the past, he tends to forget that many great architectural monuments have been built by slavery rather than by skillful co-operation. He says very little about the genuine improvement in industrial morality during the past two decades, at least in the West. He sometimes refers to the "go" of society but seldom speaks of its inertia. It is right when he asserts that the oldest human institutions have been organized on a service basis. I am inclined to think that quite as often they have been the fruit of effective discipline. But my main criticisms are two-fold; first, that in setting forth this high ideal of citizenship, he does not demonstrate how it can be attained, and second, that in pleading for an increased skill he does not specify in detail how it can be assured. In other words, he seems to leave his theories up in the air. We can take it for granted that the enemy of good citizenship is often nothing less than sheer selfishness; a desire to get as much as possible out of life at the expense of others. To eradicate this we need something more than advice or instruction. In failing to stress the religious implications of citizenship, Prof. Jacks has missed an important factor in the situation. Similarly in regard to factory employees, it is assuredly desirable that they be interested in their separate tasks, but the author has not pointed the way for this achievement, again failing to be specific.

In the midst of the increasing industrial unrest now prevalent in India, and in view of the close connection between India's growing industrialism and her political well-being, Principal Jacks' book...

includes among the list of heirs, the widow, widow

Sister, and mother and sister. At one stage he says that a widow must not remarry but must lead an ascetic life: while at another, he says that a virgin widow may remarry, and speaks of "Punarbhau" and her

He declares in imperative that a "Kanya" meaning a girl of eight years of age, should be given away in marriage, but refers also to a girl, marrying of her own choice after attaining womanhood and proceeds to say "Let a girl rather remain unmarried than be mated with an unworthy husband.

The contradictions in Manu are, no doubt, many and glaring; but they are not inexplicable. The Mann

Smithith, as we have it, was composed at different times by different writers. By the time that Bhrigu gave it the modern shape in which it appears, the original Manava Dharma Sutra of the earlier period had been largely improved upon, and women were regaining their lost ground, though but slowly.

Vyasa declared that a widow was entitled to two thousand penas of her husband's properties. Brihaspathi extended it by declaring that she was entitled to all the moveable properties left by the husband.

Katyayana went further and said "Let the childless widow preserving unseilled the bed of her lord, enjoy with moderation the property till her death, and let the heirs of the husband take it after her.

" This she may do although she did not intend to beget a son as ordained by Gantar Vridha. Mann placed no such restrictions and stated "A widow who had male issue, who keeps the bed of her lord unseilled, shall alone offer oblations and succeed to his entire estate." According to Katyayana, a woman may earn independently of her husband's volitions, but all her earnings belonged to him.

He inveighed against polygamy and questioned:

"What home is there for that person, who having a living wife, wishes for other wives?" A wife could contract debt for family necessity either individually or along with son, husband and the like. Slowly thus were women regaining their rights. "There is no deity equal to the mother," said

Usana and ordained "seeing the mother, eldest sister and the like, one should get up and salute with folded palms and by touching their feet."

"A wife" declared Vyasa "is more valuable than the world with all its virtues, wealth and enjoyments." The respect and esteem thus regained by the women, side by side with the recognition of their rights in however small a measure, was further developed in the succeeding period.

THE LATER SMITHITS.

The later Smithiths, chief among which are those of Yagnavalkya and Parasara, show a marked advance of women's position in law. Mann had allowed six kinds of Srtibhadra; Vishnu extended it further, and Yagnavalkya made it cover almost all the acquisitions by women. He said, "What was given to a woman by the father, mother, husband or a brother, or received by her at the nuptial fire or presented to her on her husband's marriage to another wife, as also any other property separately acquired by her is termed "Women's property." The mother, who according to Gautama was not entitled to a share was declared ex ille al partition. Women could contract debts not only for family benefit they could stand surety for others, the only exception being that a wife cannot stand surety for the husband. They could dispose as witnesses, but they could not be compelled to do so, or be cited as such.

Slender of a woman was made severely punishable, even if the imputation were true. Assault on a woman was made punishable the more severely, if she happened to be the wife of another. In the case of improper desertion of wife, "she should be given one-third of her husband's property" says

Yagnavalkya. So too the wife who is ceded.

Narada Parasara allowed widows to remarry. The text, "A second husband is ordained for a woman whose husband is lost or dead or has turned an apostate, become impotent or an outcaste," indicates clearly that not only was widow remarriage allowed, but that even during the life-time of the husband a woman could remarry under certain conditions analogous to the grounds of divorce in other countries. If the husband was not heard of

for a prescribed time, the wife could remarry thereafter. The text further indicates that the later

Smithiths did not countenance "Sati." It appears to be a later institution, though some of the Smithith writers like Parasara himself refer to it approvingly, and that the Rajput women brought up in an atmosphere of heroic courage and self-respect preferring self-immolation to the indignity of falling into the conqueror's hands, began the institution.

The practice was sought to be supported by the Vedic text. "Aum, let those women not to be widowed, good wives adorned with calyrium, holding clarified batter, consign themselves to fire. Immortal, not guiltless, not husbandless, excellent, let them pass into the fire, whose original element is water." This, however, is an interpolated version of the original Vedic text which means: "May these women who are not widows who have good husbands, who are mothers, enter with ungues and clarified butter without tears, without sorrow, let them first go up into the dwelling." The word "Agri" meaning house was altered into "Agni" meaning fire and the practice was given a Vedic sanction.

The word "Agni" would be perfectly inconsistent with the Vedic passages relating to the remarriage of widows. This right of remarriage was again recognised by the later Smithiths during whose period women's rights were once again recognised in a large measure. "Strike not a woman even with a blossom, although she is guilty of a hundred faults," indicates the high sense of respect shown to women.

This was the period when the court of King

Vikramaditya flourished, with its advance in arts and sciences, the period when Kalidas and Bhava-bhatti, Banabhatta and Bhatrithari lived, when

Varahamihira and Bhattacharya contributed to the development of the Sciences of Astronomy and Mathematics, when Charaka and Susruta added considerably to the human knowledge of the physical and chemical sciences, the period when King Harsha and the Gupta kings flourished in the heights of their glory.

THE COMMENTATORS.

During the succeeding period of the commentators, women’s position in law advanced a great deal. Living about the beginning of the present millennium, Vijnaneswara, the author of Mitakshara, led the movement. Vigorously contending against the age-long conception of dependence of women based on the erroneous interpretation of the aphorism he declared that it only meant that women could not be physically independent of all other help, and that therefore the real meaning of the text was only that women, who are physically delicate and incapable of great strain, should not be left to shift for themselves, and that it is the duty of the father, husband and son, to protect her, that is, afford her every help and protection. As Vyasa said, “Under no circumstances should women be left unprotected. It is the duty of the fathers, husbands and sons to attend to them in succession.” It certainly did not mean that women were incapable of either owning or acquiring property.

“Besides,” he argued, “the very fact that they were trusted with Stridhana shows that Hindu Law-givers never doubted their capacity to own property at their absolute disposal.” He thus removed the restrictions regarding women’s ability to inherit, acquire and own properties. He went further, and explaining the word “Adya” in the text of Yagavalkiya declared that “Whatever is given to a woman…… and whatever is inherited or obtained by partition, gift, purchase, seizure or finding are termed women’s wealth.” The term Stridhana, he declared was to be taken in its etymological sense and not in any narrow restricted meaning. According to him, therefore, everything that came to the ownership of a woman became her absolute property as Stridhana. This was a clear and unambiguous restatement of Yagavalkiya’s text. Vijnaneswara’s contribution, however, lay in exploding the theory of the perpetual tutelage of women, and their incapacity to acquire, own and deal with property. His dictum that a widow of an undivided coparcener does not inherit her husband’s share in the joint family properly was controverted by Jimutabhavanah, who in his Dayabhaga declared that the status of the husband in the family, either joint or divided, did not affect the widow who was entitled to inherit her husband’s share in any case. This, no doubt, went further than Mitakshara, but whereas under the latter anything inherited by a widow was her absolute property, it is under the Dayabhaga but a limited estate. This was based on a text of Katyayana, which does not entirely support the view. The text says:—

“Let the widow, keeping the bed of her lord unsoiled, enjoy his share. After her the heirs take it.” Katyayana nowhere suggests that she should leave anything at all, but only lays it down that, if she left anything, it must descend, not to her own heirs, but to those of her husband. Jimutabhavanah not only laid down such a restriction on the widow, but extended it also to all other females he referred to in the texts. Nelaakanta of Bombay went farther than both, and declared that all females were entitled to inherit although not mentioned in the texts, and that Gotraja sapindas, such as sister, daughter, etc., took absolute estate of inheritance, the limited estate theory being restricted only to such females as were married into the family, such as wife, mother and the like. He held also that widows may adopt even though no consent of the husband or consent of the sapinda was taken. This was assented to by Ananthadeva, who pleaded, “A widow needs no consent for performing Nitya and Kanya Vratas. The adoption of a boy is one such. Why then is consent needed?” According to Nandanda not only sons but daughters, also could be adopted. This may be objected to as being opposed to the very object of adoption, that is the offering of spiritual oblations. According to the Vedic texts, however, as interpreted by Parva Mimamsa of Jaimini, women appear to be quite capable of performing religious ceremonies and offering oblations. Any way it shows the recognition once again of the right of women to be adopted after the lapse of several generations. In Mithila, Vachaspati Misra went so far as to state that a mother was entitled to the custody, and guardianship of the child in preference even to the father, and in the order of inheritance, Mitakshara placed the mother, in proximity over the father. Vijnaneswara’s dictum that inheritance was based on propinquity or blood-relationship was accepted all over India except in Bengal, where Jimutabhavanah declared that the right of inheritance depended on the ability to confer spiritual benefit. The importance of the difference lies in the fact that according to the one, women are not allowed to inherit except those mentioned in the texts, whereas according to the other, all female relations became entitled to inherit in law. Viramitrodarya, however, while generally following Mitakshara, holds with Dayabhaga in this matter. It declares also with Dayabhaga that a widow acquired but a limited estate so far as immovable properties are concerned. It may, however, be noted that even according to both, a widow’s alienation is not held altogether invalid or even voidable and that alienations even by way of gift for the spiritual benefit of the husband are valid. Jimutabhavanah declared that a coparcener may not alienate his share; and also admits that such alienation, if effected, is however good.
DIVORCE LAWS IN EGYPT.

A man with sixty wives can "get away with it" in Egypt, it seems, provided he takes them in succession. This is due to loose divorce laws, but now, we are told, reform proposals are under way, and if they are carried out it is predicted they will constitute the first step toward the emancipation of women in Egypt. In the district of Tanah, in the Delta, relates W. E. Drakeford, Cairo correspondent of the London Daily Telegraph, there lives an Egyptian gentleman, named Isawi el Sharif, who was lately condemned by the Assis Court to pay substantial damages to each of two women whom he married and divorced under false pretences. In fact, no fewer than sixty women have been victims of El Sharif's marrying propensities, it appears, but whether any action will be taken by the remainder, according to this correspondent, is not known, and we learn further that:—

"The recent case has been before the courts for considerably more than a year, and if the other ladies come forward two by two, El Sharif will probably be gathered to his fathers before they all receive satisfaction.

"This good gentleman's procedure was perfectly simple, thanks to the ignorance of his victims and the laxity of Egyptian laws and customs concerning marriage and divorces. Koranic law allows a man to have only four legitimate wives, and when El Sharif wanted to get rid of a spouse he would persuade her to sign a paper, deceiving her as to its contents, which would eventually prove to be a bill of divorcement. In this way he was able to repudiate any of his "wives" whenever he felt inclined, simply by producing the bill of divorcement with the lady's signature. Some of the ladies were apparently not legally married at all, for El Sharif recently protested against published statements to the effect that he had had sixty wives, and declared that he had had only thirteen, but it is unlikely that he will take proceedings for libel in this connection.

"That such a case should be possible is explained by the fact that in Egypt a man may divorce his wife by the simple expedient of taking an oath that he will be divorced if he does not get his hair cut within twenty-four hours. The fulfilment of such an oath forthwith dissolves the marriage. Or a man may inform his wife three times that she is divorced, and the matter is thereby settled. In such circumstances it is not surprising that Cairo, Alexandria, and other large cities are teeming with waifs and strays resulting from casual unions which may be dissolved with the utmost ease. It is fortunate that the average Egyptian, notwithstanding the impression created by the unsavoury case of Madame Ali Tahmi, who killed her husband in a London hotel two years ago, is a good husband and an indulgent father."

The waifs who swarm in the streets of the big Egyptian cities, Mr. Drakeford goes on to say, are mostly children of Sudanese from the Northern Sudan or natives of Upper Egypt, who come to Cairo or Alexandria to be employed as domestic servants, and are known generally as Berberines. These individuals, he writes, spend a year or two in such employment, and, having saved a certain amount of money, return, to their villages to idle away the time until their money is spent. In the meanwhile, they contract temporary unions, it is stated, and the offering of these unions becomes homeless little vagabonds, who often give the police a good deal of trouble as accomplices of drug dealers, pickpockets, and other criminals. Having spent his money, the Berberine returns once more to domestic service and contracts a fresh union with the same results, according to this Cairo correspondent, who adds:—

"This state of affairs has long exercised enlightened Egyptian opinion, and about two years ago a special commission was appointed by the Ministry of Justice to draw up proposals for the reform of marriage and divorce laws. The principal objects of this reform are the restriction of polygamy and the limitation of divorce. It is proposed to make polygamous marriage subject to a magistrate's license, which will only be granted upon proof of means to support more than one wife. In regard to divorce, the thrice-repeated verbal repudiation is to be considered only as a preliminary to proper proceedings, such repudiation on the part of a drunken man or one under constraint to be void, and the divorce by oath to be abolished.

"It is also proposed to accord to women the right to divorce in certain circumstances, and also a right to alimony, but not for more than one year. Hitherto no Moslem woman has been able to obtain a divorce without the consent of her husband, which is equivalent to depriving women of a right entirely. Furthermore, if the proposals become law, a woman will be able to insist upon embodying conditions in the marriage contract, the infringement of which will be a legitimate ground for divorce.

"These proposals will have a far-reaching effect if they are carried out, and will constitute the first step toward the emancipation of women in Egypt. The draft law was approved on January 10, by the Consultative Committee of Legislation of the Ministry of Justice, and the Minister of Justice is expected to submit it to the Cabinet in the near future. It will then be submitted to Parliament, when the real battle will begin, for the ulama of Egypt are strongly hostile to the introduction of such reforms, which they condemn as heretical and contrary to the Koran."—The Literary Digest.

"CHRISTA SEVA SANGH"

(Concluded).

Acharya.—Right Reverend Father in God, I present unto you these persons who desire to make their profession on Siddhas of "Christa Seva Sangh".

Bishop.—Have all the members of "Christa Seva Sangh" consented that these novices shall make their profession among you?

Acharya.—They have so consented.

Then shall each novice in turn stand before the Bishop who shall examine them after this sort:—

Bishop.—My son, what is thy desire?

Reply.—I desire to be consecrated to a life of service to our Lord Jesus Christ in this community under the conditions of poverty, chastity and obedience.

Bishop.—Wilt thou endeavour to live in accordance with the rule of this community and to observe its customs?

Reply.—I will so endeavour, the Lord being my helper.

Bishop.—Wilt thou give diligence to live in humility and love with all thy brethren?

Reply.—I will so do by the help of God.

Bishop.—For as much as God hath put into thy heart these good desires. I do now require thee to make open profession of the same with thy mouth.

Novice.—I..................make my profession to Almighty God before the whole company of heaven, and to you Right Reverend Father, in the presence of this congregation, that I desire to be consecrated to a life of service to our Lord in "Christa Seva Sangh" under the conditions of poverty, chastity and obedience; and in accordance with the permission given me I now promise to continue in this community under these conditions for three years from this day, and to endeavour to live faithfully according to its rule and in humility and love with all my brethren.

Then the novice shall kneel, and the Bishop shall say:—

We accept thy profession and admit thee as a "Siddha" of "Christa Seva Sangh" in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

Then shall the Bishop present him with a girdle knotted with three knots, saying:—

Receive this knotted girdle in token that under the conditions of poverty, chastity and obedience thou hast bound thyself to the service of Jesus thy Lord and of His brethren in the world for Jesus' sake.

Then the Bishop standing, and laying his hand on the newly-proposed Siddha, shall say:—

The Lord bless thee and keep thee, the Lord grant unto thee to know His will, strength to accomplish it, and perseverance unto the end, the Lord prosper thy work with fruitfulness, the Lord preserve thy going out and thy coming in from this time forth for evermore.

When all the novices have made their profession, the Bishop shall desire the congregation secretly to make supplication to God for them, for which purpose silence shall be kept for a space.

Then shall the Bishop say:—

LET US PRAY.

O God, who hast prepared for them that love Thee such good things as pass man's understanding pour into our hearts such love towards Thee that we loving Thee above all things, may obtain Thy promise which exceed all that we can desire through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen. After this the rest of the Order for Holy Communion shall follow.

[Visitors to the Ashram at Poona will always be welcomed. The members are willing to enter into friendly discussion or correspondence on religious subjects. Any further information may be obtained from The Acharyas, Christa Seva Sangh, Ashram, Agricultural College P. O., Poona.] In an early issue we hope to set forth some of the aims and ideals of the Christa Seva Sangh, Editor Dnyan.]

THE SOVEREIGN'S FAITH.

Cardinal Bourne preached on the English martyrs at the Church of Our Lady and the English Martyrs, Cambridge, in mid week. The occasion was the Feast of Blessed John Fisher and his companion martyr.

The preacher argued at some length that the case of the Catholics put to death by Henry VIII, Elizabeth, and her successors was vastly different from that of the Protestants executed for heresy under Mary. The latter he said, were innocent... who brought new and subversive doctrines into the country; they might well be described as "the religious Bolshevists of that period," and suffered by the application to them of the old laws against heresy. The Catholic martyrs were law-abiding upholders of the ancient religious traditions of their country, and new laws had to be fabricated to condemn them for a "newly fashioned treason." No Englishman had ever shown loyalty to the Crown more faithfully or in more difficult circumstances than their Catholic forefathers. Queen Elizabeth, by her coronation, contracted with her people to be a faithful Catholic; in ceasing to be such she lost clearly all legal claim on their allegiance. It was the duty and right of the Pope to declare that she had incurred excommunication, and her deposition was the natural consequence; but English Catholics, though freed in conscience from their allegiance, remained loyal in obedience to her on all lawful matters, while refusing absolutely to obey her bestial in matters where their duty to God was concerned.

By the present Constitution of England the Sovereign was obliged to declare himself a faithful Protestant; and, were he to cease to do so, he would thereby forfeit his legal right to the allegiance of his subjects. A day might come when an English Sovereign would feel unable any longer to declare himself a faithful Protestant. What then would happen? He supposed some means would be legally taken to declare that the bond of allegiance had ceased. But many Englishmen would certainly declare that, having a Sovereign whom they respected and revered, they did not wish to be governed by any other. They would concede him liberty of conscience and the right of private judgment, and though legally he might have lost his claim to their allegiance, that allegiance they would voluntarily renew, whatever the religion that he professed. Then they would have some analogy between the attitude of Catholic Englishmen under Elizabeth and of the hypothetical Englishmen of the future with this great difference: that their Catholic forefathers renewed and maintained their allegiance when every kind of injustice was being inflicted upon them.

The contingency to which he referred would undoubtedly arise some day. While Englishmen might then still insist on the Protestant character of their King it was extremely unlikely that Canada and Australia and New Zealand and South Africa, with their wholly independent Governments, would attach the same importance to it. When that day came the subjects of the Empire would do well to take for their example the English Catholics of the days of Queen Elizabeth.

PROTECTION AGAINST CHOLERA.

The Chief Medical Officer the Protective Self-Vaccination Campaign, Calcutta, writes:

You are perhaps already aware of the world's greatest medical discovery to-day which has at last enabled one year's immediate protection against Cholera, Typhoid and Dysentery to all persons alike and at any time by merely swallowing a Bilivaccin Tablet each day on three successive mornings.

The League of Nations after the most serious investigations and experiments has recently issued a comparative scientific report proving that one full dose of Bilivaccin (3 tablets) swallowed by mouth is equal to two injections of Anti-Cholera Vaccine, and as such various Governments, Municipalities and other Health Authorities throughout the world including that of His Majesty's Army Medical Service, War Office, League of Nations Epiemio Commision, Directors of Public Health, Bengal, Madras, Bombay etc., are all using it now in an extensive scale for epidemic control purposes.

The Calcutta Corporation has already issued an Official Notice ordering a free distribution of these Bilivaccin Tablets to the whole population from the various Health Offices here, and as similar notifications are expected early from the Health Authorities throughout the country, this Campaign has for its immediate object Mass Self-Vaccination by Bilivaccin as speedily as possible.

Therefore feeling confident that you will not hesitate to help an early achievement of this goal which saves an average of 5,000,000 human lives annually thereafter, we anticipate your co-operation cheerfully for the preliminary propaganda essential and enclose herewith a copy of an article from a series to follow from time to time, and which we hope will be readily published in your columns for general public information.

We also enclose detailed scientific literatures for your own further information about Bilivaccin obtained from its Agents here, and we shall thank you to record our address for sending a copy of your respective issues whenever such articles are published by you on receipt from this Office directly.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

An Indo-European Wedding in Mombasa.—On the 6th May one Miss Lily Schwartz, an European lady aged about 19 years adopted Hinduism and married Mr. Isher Dass, a Hindu from the United ProvinceS who came to this country last year. The marriage ceremony was performed by Dr. Bhagatram, the Arya Samaj Missionary who is at present here in East Africa. Dr. Bhagatram was assisted by Mr. U. K. Cram the Honorary General Secretary of the Eastern Africa Indian National Congress at Nairobi, Mr. Isher Dass is a sincere worker in the cause of Indians in this country.

Widow Marriage Society in Lucknow.—On the 25th May, 1928, the widowed niece (daughter of late Baba Hargovind Dayal, an eminent social reformer) of Baba Iswari Dayal, Advocate, Lucknow, was married to Baba Kisho Kumar Mathur, D.A., LL. B., Advocate, Bhikhabad, district Mainpuri. It is a case of very valuable social reform in as much as in addition to the being a widow marriage it is also an inter-caste marriage, it is hoped that many other Hindu gentlemen will follow the noble and admirable example set by Babus Jwari Dayal and Kish Narain Mathur.

Ramakrishna Mission Relief Work. Bankura. (Bengal). The people are aware by this time that acute distress due to the failure of crops is prevailing in a considerable portion of the Bankura District. The Government of Bengal through its Gazette has issued a circular about the area affected and the nature of relief required. The District relief Committee under the guidance of the District Magistrate has already started relief measures and asked us to join immediately. We have sent workers to the most affected areas. The Mission has placed the whole balance of its Provident Fund for the relief, but it amounts to about Rupees one thousand and two hundred only which is quite inadequate for the purpose. Our workers will visit the area, locate the distressed families and try to relieve them to the best of their abilities but unless we are immediately provided with adequate funds by our generous countrymen all our efforts will be of no avail. So we earnestly appeal to all, on behalf of the poor and afflicted people of Bankura to send their generous help in money or in kind to any one of the following addresses. Contributions and donations will be thankfully acknowledged, 1. President, B.K Mission, Belurmath P.O. Howrah Dist. Bengal. 2. Manager, The Udhodhan, 1 Mukerjee Lane, Budgezor, Calcutta. 3. Manager, Adwart Ashram, 164 A. Mukteram Babu street, Calcutta.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA:

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

A Timely Warning—We reprint in this issue the thoughtful editorial in the current number of the Prabuddha Bharata headed “The Situation in Bengal.” Swami Asokananda’s observations are as true in the main of the rest of India as of Bengal. The three features which the Swami marks out as characterizing new Bengal, are noticeable elsewhere too though in varying degrees. Underlying these and other movements is an undiscriminating spirit of revolt against everything which exists merely because it exists. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru voiced this in his presidential address at the Punjab Provincial Conference some days ago. The reason for this attitude, he said, was half-hearted, slow and of date. It is the revolutionary attitude that could save the country. This extreme view was not yet permeated the Indian mind much below a few superficial inches, and its immediate effect has been to alarm the traditionalists into opposition to all reforms, with equal lack of discrimination. As the Swami says, there is no need to take a tragic view of the situation as the logic of events will soon bring about an adjustment of theory to fact.

Asiatic Studies—Among the subjects transferred to the Provinces in the scheme of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms, are Universities. A year or two after the introduction of the new arrangement, the need was felt for an agency to help Indian Universities to keep one another. The Inter-University Board was established in 1926. It is still in its infancy, and its further growth will be watched with interest. We have received a copy of useful publication which the Board has just issued containing information about the facilities for Oriental study and research at Indian Universities. The Board is trying to foster a spirit of cooperation among them and to promote a genuine interest in Oriental studies.

Mysore Infant Marriage Bill—A Bill, introduced by Mr. Mahomed Abbas Khan in the Mysore Legislative Assembly to amend the Infant Marriage Prevention Regulation of 1894, was withdrawn by the mover after discussion. Mr. Khan stated that he made note of... existing regulation, the marriageable age of girls was fixed at eight years. He proposed that the minimum marriage age should be fixed at sixteen for girls and twenty-one for boys and that the scope of the existing regulation should be extended so as to apply not only to Hindus but to members of certain other communities also. He also supported Mr. Khan’s amendment. It must have been most discouraging to the mover when even those members on whose support he relied opposed his bill on the most trivial grounds. One of the speakers suggested that the limit was too high and that it should be fixed at fourteen for girls and eighteen for boys, but he did not think it worth his while to put it forward as an amendment to Mr. Khan’s Bill. Some of other objections put forward were that Mr. Khan was not a Hindu; that the best way of achieving the raising of the marriage age was not by legislation but by propaganda; and that a better method of preventing early marriages was by passing legislation to prohibit married girls from entering college. The usual arguments of the non-interference of the State in religious questions were advanced by Mussalmans and Hindus both of whom agreed that such a bill was against their religion. We regret that the Mysore Assembly has not been able to give its support to the popular demand for raising the marriage age. We hope however that reformers in Mysore will make every attempt to see the bill through at the next session of the Assembly.

Maharashtra Co-operative Conference—“ The Conference of the Co-operative Societies in the division of Maharasth,” writes the Maharasth of Poona, “was a signal success from more than one viewpoint. Mr. V. L. Mehta who presided over the Conference is one of those few who stand in the first rank of co-operators in this presidency. His presidential address is full of constructive suggestions which, if they are translated into action both by the Government and the societies, will lend to the solution of many of the problems in the movement. According to him the rural problem in the Deccan is the deep-seated poverty which has to be eradicated. Compared with the efforts of governments in other countries that are mainly industrial, the British Government has done nothing although it is an agricultural government. Mr. Mehta asked the Government to come forward to take its responsibility by contributing freely from its resources to the solution of the problems. In his thought-provoking speech, he threw out many practical hints to the co-operative banks and others concerned.
The Conference freely discussed many problems and the results are embodied in resolutions which will guide the movement in proper channels.”

The Jerusalem Conference—The International Missionary Council at the recent ConfERENCE held at Jerusalem recognised the policy of self-determination in religion. Mr. Stanley High writing in the New Republic says:—“Jerusalem ofcially declared the giving-receiving era of foreign missions at an end. A new period, concerned by South and East is established in which the isolation of power was not Western but Oriental. The old conception of a Christian, meaning Western, versus a heathen, meaning a non-white, world was discarded. At Jerusalem, for the first time, representatives of world Christianity sat down together to consider their common message and the common paganism that, in the West, as in the East, confront it. Specifically, the program of readjustment outlined at Jerusalem proposes to make Christianity abroad an indigenous enterprise, under the leadership and direction of nationals. This was held to require the creation of churches which shall be, not mechanically, duplicates of the churches of the West, but the expression in architecture and organisation, thegogy and worship of the aspirations and experiences of the peoples of Africa and Asia.
It was held, further, to require the elimination of denominational competition in favour of church unity. The reasons for the duality of Protestantism, however binding in the West, were agreed to be of little significance among the Christians of the East. It was declared, therefore, that Western churches should lend their support to the growing movement for unity which, if freed from the psychological authority of the West, would almost certainly advance more rapidly.”

A Welcome Move:—Commenting on the appointment of a Commission to enquire into Indian housing conditions in Durban and its environs the Bombay Chronicle observes:—“It is gratifying to note that in appointing a Commission to enquire into and report upon the health conditions among Natal Indians, the Union Government have approached their task in a spirit of good-will. The provision that two Indian assessors to be nominated by Mr. Sastri should assist the Commission will be welcome in this country though justice and fairplay require that the Indians should not be merely assessors but members of the Commission. The conditions in which Indians are forced to live in Durban and in other Natal towns have needed impartial inquiry for a long time. We hope the inquiries will be thorough and will lead to practical results.”

A Word of Caution:—There was a time and that not long ago when every proposal of social legislation aroused unthinking opposition. We seem to be drifting to a reverse state of things when every such proposal evokes from certain sections an indiscriminate support. Many people hardened to support Mr. Sarda’s draft Bill against infant marriages, before they have seen it. The Bill has had to be recast fundamentally in the Select Committee. Sir Hari Singh Gour’s Divorce
Bill demands close scrutiny. His two other Bills, which we reprinted in a previous issue, are unobjectionable and, indeed, necessary.

Personal:—The death of my brother, Jagadisam, which occurred on Friday morning, is a heavy blow. In all our many trials and tribulations he stood by us like a rock, and his charge, courageous and resourceful personality was a source of constant inspiration. Deeply affectionate by nature, and endowed with a wonderful capacity for friendship, he was the main link which kept our somewhat isolated family in touch with the wider world. His death creates a gap in our lives which is truly grievous.

N.
THE MAHARAJA OF BURDWAN IN ENGLAND.

The Maharaja of Burdwan is one of the biggest zemindars of the Bengal Presidency holding under the Permanent Settlement introduced by Lord Cornwallis. The Maharaja, unlike many of his class, holds broad views on social and religious subjects and has had considerable experience of public life in unofficial and official capacities. He is besides distinguished for the high standard of his personal and private life. The Maharaja is not a ruling prince and the question which has been recently discussed in the British Press whether he could stand as a candidate for election to the House of Commons does not therefore arise. He is a British citizen like Mr. Shapurji Saklatvala and has the same status in regard to eligibility for election to the House of Commons as that gentleman. We need hardly say that otherwise the two are as poles asunder in their political and economic ideas. Just before the appointment of the Simon Commission the Maharaja of Burdwan, who happened to be in England at the time, gave a timely warning to the British Government that there would be a boycott of the Commission in India if Indians were excluded from its personnel. Government, as usual, paid no heed to his warning and thereupon the Maharaja has turned completely round and has been denouncing in scarcely dignified terms those of his countrymen who in accordance with his first anticipatory warning have refused to have anything to do with the Commission. He has thereby become very popular among retired Anglo-Indians in England, who are putting him forward as the one representative Indian who accurately voices the sentiments of the Indian masses. It is curious that when the same Maharaja protested against the exclusion of Indians from the Statutory Commission, his words were totally disregarded by those in authority.

The Maharaja told an interviewer recently that he intended to make a stay of some years in England and that he hoped that one of his sons who is in school there would in course of time permanently settle down in that country. The Maharaja is thus contemplating founding a branch of his family in England. A political connection is very useful for the purpose, and the Maharaja has been appearing on Conservative platforms and has been recommended by the Morning Post for a life peerage. The Maharaja is rich enough to make a handsome trust in favour of his son who is to settle down in England, and the sovereign can make a British peerage descend to any son, daughter or other near relative of the holder. A hereditary peerage, therefore, is perhaps not outside the purview of the Maharaja. The zemindari of Burdwan may also be converted to a State, as that of Benares was during Lord Minto's time. A ruling House in India with a branch affiliated to the British peerage, will command great influence both in India and Great Britain. These ideas may not be consciously present in the Maharaja's mind but if they were he could not shape his political course very differently than he seems to be doing. The Maharaja declared in a recent paper read before the East India Association in London that the salvation of India depended upon the maintenance of the British connection, which as a general proposition will be accepted by a large section of Indian opinion. If the terms "safeguard" and "connection" are understood in a sense not incompatible with an equal and equitable conception of India's position in the British Commonwealth. Even those who stand for "independence" do not intend a clean-cut but only that the relations between Britain and India should be defined, as in the case of Ireland and Egypt, by a treaty between the peoples of the two countries.

Putting an extreme interpretation on the term "independence" the Maharaja prophesied that if the British left India the country would come under the domination of some other foreign power. In that case, self-govern ment would mean the domination of a community other than the Hindu. If we may venture to follow the Maharaja into the region of what is really more or less speculation, we should say that the possibility of another foreign power newly establishing its control over India has to be weighed against the probability of an international convention such as now protects the independence of Belgium, Switzerland and, to some extent, China. If Britain is not ruling India, Britain must in her own interests see to it that no other foreign power takes her place. As for the question which community will come to the top under a system of self-government, we think it quite immaterial. The great thing will be that it will be a Government with its centre of gravity in the country itself and not at a point several thousands miles away from it. The Maharaja's opinion of the political standing of Hindus under self-government will not find endorsement in Western India whose history prior to British rule has not evidently come under the Maharaja's purview. The Maharaja and others of his class seem to be apprehended that a self-governing India will not tolerate the permanent settlement of land revenue. On the contrary, we do not see why that principle should not become the basic principle of land revenue policy throughout the country. The extension of it to the cultivator throughout the country, will be the best means of securing his good-will and co-operation with a self-governing India.
THE NEW ERA IN BENGAL.

Swami Ashokananda writes in the Prabuddha Bharata:

To one visiting after an absence of years, Bengal evinces signs of some remarkable changes in its outlook. These changes in their basic form may not be so apparent to the habitual residents of Bengal. But the visitor has the advantage of a sense of vivid contrast between his last memory and the present actuality. Bengal is seeking to come out of its accustomed grooves, nay, has already partly come out, and is reaching towards new spaces of freedom and realisation. The outline of a new national being is emerging clearer and clearer with here a line, there a dot, all apparently unconnected. The casual observer often finds them crude and ugly and meaningless. To the dreamer of creative dreams, however, they seem full of purpose and significance.

Bengal is just now faced with at least three facts which it is finding hard to cordially accommodate: (1) the so-called youth movement culminating at the present time in the revolt of students, (2) the sex-obsession of a section of Bengali writers, and (3) the freedom of women. (We leave the political and economic stragglings out of our review, because, they do not seem to evince any interesting features.) These three facts face many of our countrymen like ugly spectres. Others are unreasonably enthusiastic over them. Are these to continue and grow? If so, in what form? What about our accustomed thoughts and ideals? What relation have they to these? Whatever may be the right answer to these questions, it surely cannot be a gesture of denial and condemnation of the new features. That way lies sterilisation and conflict. We must be patient with these new growths and have an understanding sympathy for them and carefully guide them towards greater fruition by our loving encouragement.

We may state our attitude at the very outset. For two reasons, we are not at all pessimistic about them. Not that we endorse all their details. But we surely do not entirely condemn them. First of all, it is our firmest conviction that Bengal, and of course, India, is sure to rise to the very summit of spiritual, mental and material prosperity, such as has not been witnessed before, and that this upward climb has already begun. This is a postulate of our thought and activity. It may be hard to prove it, but we are content to accept it as proved. We can therefore look at every new development with composed feelings. Secondly, with such an outlook, it becomes easier for us to discover signs of hope even in the darkest hours of despair. We know, mountain climbing is not a continuous ascent; there are hills and valleys. Through rise and fall, we proceed and progress all the time. Life’s progress, individual or collective, is like mountain-climbing. Over hills and dales we go. And all the time we create and realise broader and nobler visions. What if there are ugly excesses now and then? Do we not know that the power behind is a beneficent one and is sure to eliminate all evil features gradually from its actions and expression? So we can be patient and sympathetic.

But our very sympathy entitles us to be critical. If we know we were destructive, we would leave things to nature and God. But criticism, when it is meant to help, does not hurt. Besides all growth is impersonal; persons are but instrument. Just as the spring season has made all our hills burst into a riot of verdure, even so the new energy evoked from the Heart of Things is making men manifest themselves in variegated forms. Our study should therefore be of active forces, not of persons. It is ideas and ideals that count, not the persons who represent them.

Now, when we study an epoch of history and take a bird’s eye view of its rise and fall, we notice certain fundamental ideas and ideals working themselves out through the centuries of the epoch. They appear to thread all the vicissitudes of the age and lend meaning and fruitfulness to the passing events. These ideas and ideals are sometimes found to be represented and preached, at least in their fundamental forms, by certain individuals, at the beginning of the historical epoch. Or they may be only the unrealised dreams of the whole race or nation. As the realisation progresses, we find individuals or organisations rising up, claiming to be the mouthpiece of the Time spirit, wielding immense influence for a time, but finally yielding place to new claimants. Under these transient leaders the work of new creation goes on. None of them are wholly right. Oftentimes, their emphasis is wrongly placed and their vision is from a wrong angle. But through all these twists and acute angles, we slowly reach the summit of achievement as along a zig-zag mountain pathway.

The three outstanding features of the current life in Bengal, which we have noted before, have to be understood, in our opinion, in the light of the above observations. They should not be considered to be final. They will undergo many changes, even perhaps beyond recognition. The present sponsors of the movements may claim finality. They may think they have found the thing and represent the ideal. But such egotism is a part of the plan of the Great Creaatrix. This egotism makes us try our utmost to make the best contribution to the new creation. Without this, most of us will be despirited, unconvincing and unconvincing. Those of us who are hopeful may patiently wait for the next act to unfold manifesting fuller and greater understanding.

This fact does not, however, necessarily lead us to that audacious philosophy of unlimited and planeless progress, which is so much in vogue among a section of our people who ought to understand better, and which is now almost discredited in the West. There is no such thing as unlimited progress, nor can it be planeless. There are periods of progress and then there is a dark age such as Count Keyserling is talking of as being again imminent in the West. Progress is bound by the limits of each age of prosperity; and each such age is agitated and dominated by certain prominent ideals.

It so happens that almost each such historical epoch in India had not only its representative ideals but also its representative men. This is perhaps a remarkable and unique feature of Indian history. He, the representative man, stands at the head of the evolving epoch and the succeeding centuries with all their various struggles and achievements seem to be the unfolding and amplification of the purpose of his life. Details may vary, but the fundamentals are the same. Expression may be different, but the essence is the same.

Do we have any such representative man at the start of this new epoch of our history? We say emphatically, Yes. And that is Sri Ramakrishna. Perhaps all will not agree with us. We shall only remind them of what Swami Vivekananda said on this point in his reply to the address of welcome that the citizens of Calcutta gave him on his first return from the West. But it does not matter whether the name of Sri Ramakrishna is forgotten. Sri Ramakrishna is great because of the great ideal that was a reality in him. It is this great ideal that matters. It is to this ideal that we would draw the attention of our countrymen at this juncture of our history. Yet, why do we mention his name? Because this name indicates the point at which the ideal, now scarcely realised and very vaguely imagined by many of our people, has been made to condense and take luminous form accessible even to the common understanding.

The ideal that is Sri Ramakrishna is nothing else than the eternal ideal of India made suitable to the needs and tendencies of the present age. This ideal is the harmony and union of the static and dynamic aspects of God, of the Transcendental and the Immanent, of Brahman and Shakti. Sri Ramakrishna and Swami Vivekananda did not emphasise merely the transcendental aspect of spiritual life, but also its dynamic, immanent aspect. The Reality is not merely beyond the world of relative life, but also within it. All life, in whatever form, is Divine. No honest activity of man is to be spurned. No manifestation of Shakti is insignificant. All is suffused with the loving radiance of God. This outlook at once releases us into illimitable freedom and makes all activity a pilgrimage to the Holy of Holies. Under the impetus of this ideal, the nation will burst into tremendous activity and fearlessly court untried experience, but will also soar gradually into the radiant empyrean of Divine Realisation.

The validity of the present state of things may be thus judged by a reference to the ideal we want to reach. We must not be too strict in our judgment. For we do not yet know.—no man can be audacious enough to prescribe to the Creative Energy,—what forms the evolving spirit will take. Many unthought-of expressions there will be, especially when we are convinced that the new ideal ensures almost freedom to people to work out their destiny. But certain basic facts must in all cases be acknowledged. In our opinion, these are: Consciousness of one's spiritual nature, faith in and practice of chastity as a necessary means to the realisation of one's spirituality, and confidence in oneself as being endowed with infinite power, infinite knowledge and infinite joy. These thoughts and actions which fundamentally militate against these basic facts can never be encouraged, and must in all cases be shunned. Here again, we must be very cautious in our judgment. We must not forget that truths often work themselves out through their very contradiction. What sometimes may appear to militate against one fact may be a means to the realisation of another. Thus, to refer to the present conditions of Bengal, we are inclined to think that the excesses in certain spheres are really a crude expression of the sense of freedom gradually being acquired and tasted by the people. From the standpoint of the realisation of a higher freedom and greater responsibility, it is better there are such excesses through freedom than an artificial puritanism through fear and compulsion. Then again, we must remember that the higher ideals are realised through the negation of the lower ideals. That means that the lower ideals—the negation sometimes of the higher ideals—have to be realised first. There cannot be any japa (remediation) without kriya (enjoyment). So we must not condemn those who are busy realising the lower ideals.

From all these considerations it does not follow that we are to sit in idleness looking on the passing events in apathy. Nothing of the kind. For though we have the firmest faith in the approaching glory of our nation, we do not forget the fact that Nature does not grant anything except through the untiring activity of men. We have to be active. Nothing can happen of itself. The best thing that we can do for the good of the nation is to try to live up to the highest ideals, without condemning those who are after lower ideals, showing, on the other hand, every sincere sympathy for their honest efforts. There need not be mutual conflict or condemnation. This striving after the highest ideal has a tremendous significance even for those who are not so striving. We have observed before how through sectional movements the ultimate ideal is gradually realised. Even such gradual realisation depends a great deal on the presence of a body of men within the community, who are the actual and concrete presentation of the ideal. Their presence acts as a stimulant and a beacon; it energises and warns of dangers; it hastens the progress of the nation; it eliminates waste of time and power through haphazard experiments. Nothing so important and valuable to a growing nation than the efforts of men who are seeking the highest. That is to say, we have to assert the positive ideal in every sphere without condemning the lower ideals. Always after the positive, and never the negative. To Bengal at the present time there is no duty more urgent than the silent realisation by a larger and larger number of people of the ideal which is absolute freedom, which knows nothing but as the spirit, which looks upon all men as Divine personifications and which therefore considers their efforts as the very unfolding of the Divine purpose. This worshipful attitude towards others, combined with the resilient consciousness of the inherent Divine in oneself and everything else, has to be cultivated more and more. And this way lies the solution of all our problems, and not through condemnation.

Thus we do not see any use in uttering long and furious diatribes against young Bengali ladies dancing before the public. We do not say we support this practice. On the other hand we confess to a certain doubt about the correctness of it. But we refuse to take it at its face value. We feel at least the partial justification on the urge that a section of Bengali women are feeling to find wider and more joyful scope for their faculties. We also cannot ignore the fact for social life, to be made more cheerful, requires a much greater amount of aesthetic culture than at present. Besides, we must not forget that whether the practice is right or wrong, it will prevail more and more with the passing of days.
So it would be futile to be furious against it. What we should do is to find a form in which the tendencies underlying the practice may have a nobler expression. Art when it is cultivated in the ture spirit touches the footstool of God. Why cannot art in family and social life be so perfected that it will lose its vicious aspects and make life more joyful and shed over it the light of the Divine smile? We want those artists who can achieve this supreme task. And they shall be not only artists, but also saints with hearts filled with conscious presence of the Divine. They alone can give the sure turn and touch to the growing aesthetics of the nation. No crypto-sexualists will do.

Take next the case of sex-obsession in the present
Bengali literature. The fight that is going now over it appears sometimes amusing to us. The two parties seem to be arguing over a distinction without a difference. The fight is unreal. In essence both parties are guilty of the same offence which in one has taken a subtle form and in the other gross.
But the attitude of both parties towards sexual life is well-nigh the same. We do not claim expert knowledge of literary art. But we can surely express our views as readers. The main tendencies of the present Bengali fictional literature have been in our opinion, more or less against the cherished ideals of the people. Obscenity in Indian literature is not a new thing. The one great difference between the past and the present is that whereas the ancient writers, while being frank, did not idealise sexual instincts, our present writers are building up a philosophy of life over them. And of this philosophising even the greatest of our writers are guilty. This philosophising is at the root of all the trouble. Men have sense-cravings.
And it is nothing to be wondered at if these find occasional expression in art and literature. In fact it is often a question of convention. French and Italian literatures are more frank in these things than the English. It will be silly to argue from this that the French or the Italian mind is less refined or noble than the English. The north Indian literatures are similarly frank, not so the Dravidian languages. Yet who can deny that the joys of the senses and a discussion of them are gross and lothsome? So there must be a limit, we must not philo-osphise over and idealise the gross. Here again the need of a positive realisation of the higher ideals becomes urgent. We want a literature which will stimulate our higher faculties and respect the realities of the superior art of life. Mutual bickering will only lengthen the conflict. The growth of a superior literature will put a gradual end to the obnoxious undergrowths, or rather relegate them to their proper, dark, sphere where they will grow and flourish so long as men will have lower instincts.

Then again the question of the students’ revolt.
The immediate cause of the revolt of the students of some Bengal colleges need not be discussed here.
We will content ourselves with indicating that the days are rapidly passing away when simply because there are certain rules, students should be made to obey them. The rules cannot be absolute. If the rules are found contrary to the growing ideal and are against the general well-being of the people, they must be changed. The question as to who will find out the nature of that ideal or that well-being is futile. Time will find out. We do not deny that students sometimes have gone to extremes. But for this others than the students have also been responsible. We have not yet realised the wisdom of the constant emphasis on youth. Day after day the young men of Bengal have been told that they are the only hope of the nation that all greatness and all achievements of the nation depend on them. It short they have been made to feel that others that the young are of no worth and that it is they who have to take up all responsibilities of the nation's work. Politicians also have found it necessary an advantageous to flatter the strength of the young.
The ludicrous part of the procedure has been that often grey-haired gentlemen have come forward as leaders of the youth movement claiming that thoug their exterior may show signs of age, their heart is as green and young as any callow youth’s. No doubt the underlying motive is all right. But the emphasis on youth has been too heavily laid. We con side it injurious to make any such distinction between youth and non-youth. Both are equally useful for the life of the nation. All that is required of the energy and enthusiasm of youth can be had without making this mischievous distinction. The consequence of this overstressed distinction is found in the regrettable happenings of the present day. But here again, we must remind ourselves that we must not judge the students' movement by its superficial success. The motive lies deeper. It is the tragedy of a transition period that succeeding generations find little sympathy from their predecessors. The new ideal takes clearer and clearer form with the passing of generations. The preceding generations are always found poorer than their successors. This gives the youth an advantage. The older persons cannot provide the necessary inspiration to them. Therefore the actions of the young generation often appear as a revolt against the old. In this way, our only salvation lies in aspiring after and living the highest ideals. For by so doing we will become objects of reverence even to the young who will find in us their dreams actualised even though we were advanced in years. This is the only way to check the revolt of youth—the practice of the highest ideals by a larger and larger number of people. We have already indicated the nature of that ideal.

In our opinion the danger to society or national life does not lie so much in the practice of the lower ideals as in the absence of higher ideals. When the lower ideals usurp the place of the higher, then there is real danger. There is no harm if women dance or youths become irreverent, or if some sensualists parade their low tastes in literature. But when people begin to think that they have reached the highest simply because they can dance and sing and write poems or sentimental stories, then the nation must beware. These may be good things; but we must never forget that they are far short of true manhood. The way to the realisation of true manhood lies through manly struggle, through acquisition of mental and moral power, through achievements in all fields of life, and not through dance and song. No mere artists can everlead a nation and stand in the van of the aspiring people, their place is behind the spiritual men and the men of noble action and achievement. Is Bengal straying from the path of renunciation and the struggle for manhood? Let us then beware. But even then, the right procedure is not the condemnation of dance and song, but the making of manliness the leading virtue of the national life. That is to say, let manliness be cultivated more and more; the so-called art will then automatically readjust to its correct position and will be kept from developing ugly features.

As we study the conditions of our country and its many problems, we feel more and more strongly that the only sure and effective way of guiding the nation to its goal, minimising waste of energy and safeguarding the nation from a bankruptcy of ideals, is to assert the highest ideals of the nation in life and practice by a large number of people. They will create the atmosphere in which the ideal can flourish. In art, literature, society or religion, the atmosphere is a very potent thing. It is this that checks excesses and execs the unseemly to proper restraint. Devoid of that, a nation loses the saving sense of reverence. Most of our sufferings are due to the lack of such ideal people. Problems also rise out of this bankruptcy. Partly due to this bankruptcy and partly due to their own aggressiveness, the lower ideals of the West have assumed tempting forms before our young people; and they often rush after them in the levity of their newly realised freedom, bragging all the while of nationalism. From this aggressive "Occidentalism" who, the atmosphere erected by a strong body of ideal people one can save the rising generation.

THE "UNTACKABLES" OF AMERICA.

Zora Neale Hurston writes under the heading 'How it feel to be coloured me' in the World Tomorrow—

I am colored but I offer nothing in the way of exhorting circumstances except the fact that I am the only Negro in the United States whose grandfather on the mother's side was not an Indian chief.

I remember the very day that I became colored. Up to my thirteenth year I lived in the little Negro town of Eatonville, Florida. It is exclusively a colored town. The only white people I knew passed through the town going to or coming from Orlando. The native whites rode dusty horses, the Northern tourists chugged down the sandy village road in automobiles. The town knew the Southerners and never stopped care chewing when they passed. But the Northerners were something else again. They were peered at cautiously from behind curtains by the timid. The more venturesome would come out on the porch to watch them go past and got just as much pleasure out of the tourists as the tourists got out of the village.

The front porch might seem a daring place for the rest of the town, but it was a gallery seat to me. My favorite place was stop the gate-post. Proscenium box for a born first-nighter. Not only did I enjoy the show, but I didn't mind the actors knowing that I liked it. I usually spoke to them in passing. I'd wave at them and when they return my salute, I would say something like this: "Howdy-do-well-I-thank-you-where-you-goin'?", Usually automobile or the horse passed at this, and after a queer exchange of compliments, I would probably "go a piece of the way" with them, as we say in fistest Florida. If one of my family happened to come to the front in time to see me, of course negotiations would be rudely broken off. But even so, it is clear that I was the first "welcome-to-our-state" Floridian, and I hope the Miami Chamber of Commerce will please take notice.

During this period, white people differed from colored to me only in that they rode through town and never lived there. They liked to hear me "speak pieces" and sing and wanted to see me dance the nigger-mass, and gave me generously of their small silver for doing these things, which seemed strange to me for I wanted to do them so much that I needed birthing to stop. Only they didn’t know it. The colored people gave no dimes. They deplored any joyful tendencies in me, but I was their Zora nevertheless. I belonged to them, to the nearby hotels, to the country—everybody’s Zora.

But changes came in the family when I was thirteen, and I was sent to school in Jacksonville. I left Eatonville, the town of the oceloters, as Zora. When I disembarked from the river-boat at Jacksonville, I saw my face, I was no more. It seemed that I had suffered a sea change. I was not Zora of Orange County any more, I was once a little colored girl. I found it out in certain ways. In my heart as well as in the mirror, I became a fast brown—warranted not to rub nor ran.

But I am not tragically colored. There is no great sorrow dammed up in my soul, nor larking behind my eyes. I do not mind at all. I do not belong to the sobbing school of Negrohood who hold that nature somehow has given them a low-down dirty deal and whose feelings are all hurt about it. Even in the helterskelter skirmish that is my life, she was no more. It seemed that I had seen the world is to the strong regardless of a little pigmentation more or less. No, I do not weep at the world—I am too busy sharpening my oyster knife.

Someone is always at my elbow reminding me that I am the grand-daughter of slaves. It fails to register depression with me. Slavery is sixty years in the past. The operation was successful and the patient is doing well, thank you. The terrible struggle that made me an American out of a potential slave said “On the line!” The Reconstruction said “Get set!” and the generation before said “Go!” I am off to a flying start and I must not halt in the stretch to look behind and weep. Slavery is the price I paid for civilization, and the choice was not with me. It is a bully adventure and worth all that I have paid through my ancestors for it. No one on earth ever had a greater chance for glory. The world to be won and nothing to be lost. It is thrilling to think—

· to know that for any act of mine, I shall get twice as much praise or twice as much blame. It is quite exciting to hold the center of the national stage, with the spectators not knowing whether to laugh or to weep.

The position of my white neighbour is much more difficult. No brown spector pulls up a chair beside me when I sit down to eat. No dark ghost thrusts its leg against mine in bed. The game of keeping what one has is never so exciting as the game of getting.

I do not always feel colored. Even now I often achieve the unconscious Zora of Eatonville before the Hegira. I feel most colored when I am thrown against a sharp white background.

For instance at Barnard. “Beside the waters of the Hudson” I feel my race. Among the thousand white persons, I am a dark rock surged upon, overswept, but through it all, I remain myself. When covered by the waters, I am; and the obb but reveals me again.

Sometimes it is the other way around. A white person is set down in our midst, but the contrast is just as sharp for me. For instance, when I sit in the drafty basement that is The New Word Cabaret with a white person, my color comes. We enter chatting about any little nothing that we have in common, and are seated by the jazz waiters. In the abrupt way that jazz orchestras have, this one plunges into a number. It loses no time in circlumlocutions, but gets right down to business. It constricts the thorax and splits the heart with its tempo and narcotic harmonies. This orchestra grows rambunctious, rears on its hind legs and attacks the tonal veil with primitive fury, rending it, clawing it until it breaks through to the jungle beyond. I follow those heathen—follow them exultingly. I dance wildly inside myself; I yell within, I whoop; I shake my assagi above my head, I hurl it true to the mark yeocoustes! I am in the jungle and living in the jungle way. My face is painted red and yellow and my body is painted blue. My pulse is throbbing like a war drum. I want to slaughter something—give pain, give death to what, I do not know. But the piece ends. The men of the orchestra wipe their lips and rest their fingers. I creep back slowly to the vender we call civilization with the last three and find the white friend sitting motionless in his seat smoking calmly.

“Good music they have here,” he remarks, drumming the table with his fingertips.

Music! The great blobs of purple and red emotion have not touched him. He has only heard what I felt. He is far away and I see him but dimly across the ocean and the continent that have fallen between us. He is so pale with his whiteness then and I am so colored.

At certain times I have no race, I am me. When I set my hat at a certain angle and saunter down Seventh Avenue, Harlem City, feeling as snooty as the lions in front of the Forty-Second Street Library, for instance. So far as my feelings are concerned, Peggy Hopkins-Joyce on the Boule Mitch with her gorgeous raiment, stately carriage, knees knocking together in a most aristocratic manner, has nothing on me. The cosmic Zora emerges. I belong to no race nor time. I am the eternal feminine with its string of heads.

I have no separate feeling about being an American citizen and colored. I am merely a fragment of the Great Soul that surges within the boundaries. My country, right or wrong.

Sometimes, I feel discriminated against, but it does not make me angry. It merely astonishes me. How can any dony themselves the pleasure of my company? It’s beyond me.

But in the main, I feel like a brown bag of miscellaneous propped against a wall. Against a wall in company with other bags, white, red and yellow, Four out the contents, and there is discovered a jumble of small things priceless and worthless. A first-water diamond, an empty spool, bits of broken glass, lengths of string, a key to a door long since crumbled away, a rusty knife-blade, old shoes saved for a road that never was and never will be, a nail bent under the weight of things too heavy for any nail, a dried flower or two, still a little fragrant. In your hand is the brown bag. On the ground before you is the jumble it held—so much like the jumble in the bags, could they be emptied, that all might be dumped in a single heap and the bags refilled without altering the content of any greatly. A bit of colored glass more or less would not matter. Perhaps that is how the Great Stuffer of Bags filled them in the first place—who knows?

WOMEN IN HINDU LAW—IV.

With the advent of the British administration, women's position in law suffered a serious fall owing to the ignorance of the early administrators and to the indifference of those that followed later. It was declared by Regulation IV of 1793 that the Hindus were to be governed by their own law as regards succession, inheritance, marriage, religious institutions and caste. European judges relied upon pandits for a time to expound for them the law applicable to each case, but such opinions became slowly discounted as being interested, and translations of Hindu Law books were attempted by European scholars. The Institutes of Manus were at once translated by Colbrooke and enforced as law. This led to a sudden deprivation of all those rights which women had regained since the time of Manus. The Privy Council, which had laid down the law for us to follow, pinned its exposition of Hindu Law on the exploded theory of the perpetual tutelage of women. In this they were supported by such sages as Maine, Cowell, Mo. Naughten and Strange brought to bear on the subject. Mo. Naughten, for instance, declared that under Hindu Law "Concubines incapacitated women from contracts," basing his conclusion on the text of Manus, "an act or transaction entered into by a person, who is not independent, cannot be valid." He failed to recognise that Manus only meant that a person who is under the protection of another cannot be bound with a contract with the person in authority. This is explained by Yagnavalkya in the text "A contract by an insane person, drunkard, deceased person, gambler, a boy a person threatened with fear, etc., cannot be enforced," that, such contracts are improper owing to the dominance of one party over the will of the other. This is further explained by Vignaneswar, who says that the contracts referred to are such as those between Teacher and Pupil, husband and wife master and servant, and the like, which are, therefore, voidable. The theory of perpetual tutelage was thus misconceived and made a basis for denying the contractual capacity of women, even though the right and the capacity were recognised by Narada, Yagnavalkya and other Smritikaran. This theory was, however, very early exploded in Bombay, where the judges recognised the contractual rights of women. But women in other provinces were not so fortunate. In spite of the clear and emphatic statement of Vignaneswar that the property inherited by a widow is her absolute estate, their Lordships of the Privy Council refused to follow it, and on the basis of the tutelage theory and Katyayana's dictum declared that a Hindu widow governed by the Mitakshara Law acquires only a limited estate in the property inherited. In so doing, their Lordships contravened the very principle which they had laid down, namely that "the duty of a European judge, who is under the obligation to administer Hindu Law, is not so much to inquire whether a disputed doctrine is fairly deducible from the earliest authority as to ascertain whether it has been received by the particular school and has there been sanctioned by usage." Even in the matter of disposition, they held that a widow cannot alienate, unless forced to do so by "legal necessity" or some "pressure on the estate," which could not otherwise be avoided. Even Jimutavahana and the authorities he relied upon, namely Narada and Katyayana, never mean this. An alienation for the spiritual benefit of the deceased husband was perfectly valid. But their Lordships of the Privy Council would make no distinction between a Hindu widow and a guardian. Even as the latter was bound to handle the property in the best interests of the minor ward so apparently had the widow to handle the estate in the best interests of the reversioners. This was never meant by any Hindu law-giver. Latterly, however, the Courts relaxed the grib a little and permitted the widows to alienate for the spiritual benefit "only a small fraction" of the inherited property. Wherefrom this theory of "small fraction" is deduced, it is not possible easily to discover. Not only so, in deciding what is "spiritual benefit" very strange dicta have been laid down. Building a Dharmaala is held to be no act of spiritual benefit, and going on a pilgrimage to Kaikō is none either, though a journey to Gaya is. A widow may not borrow on the security of the property even though for investment of the properties. All this in spite of Vignaneswar's emphatic declaration to the contrary. Not only so, the imitation has been imposed on all female relations other than those mentioned in the texts, were refused to be recognised as heirs. In Madras and Bombay, however, more liberally in the latter, than those mentioned in the next have latterly been recognised. Yet, to this day, in our province the daughter-in-law, the step-mother, the brother's widow and the like are denied the right of inheritance, so that according to the law as administered now, the property escheats to the government in preference to any of them. Even among such of the female heirs as are recognised by law, most of them have no decent chance of
The barbarous enforcement of conjugal rights by arrest under degree was in force until lately, when after the soothing indictment of it by Sir Norman McLeod, the rigor of it was removed. The rights of bond fide purchasers in Court sales so far protected that women who have rights of residence or maintenance often lose them by collusive Court sales. By Act XIX of 1850 a mother, whose son becomes a convert, loses the son and yet cannot adopt another. By Act XV of 1856 a widow, who inherits the property of her husband, continues to enjoy the same, however unchaste a life she may lead, but the moment she marries and begins to lead an honourable life, she loses all the property.

Various bills have been sought to be introduced to mitigate the rigor and remove the anomalies of the law, but by the restriction makes act bastardi it is more pre-occupied with revenue and military matters, takes refuge under the neutrality clause. Thus, in spite of the abolition of the “Sati” and of the well-intentioned but ill-framed socio-legislative enactments as referred to above, women’s position in law has been greatly reduced within the last 200 years, female heirs. Jamutsavala’s doctrine is unsupported by any text on this point; and in any case there is no justification to apply it to provinces governed by the Mitakshara. All women were to be perpetual dependants; and it mattered, little whether they were wives, daughters mothers or sisters. It may be remembered that Katyayana’s restriction referred only to the widow. In Bombay however, the restriction is limited to those female heirs, who have entered into the family by marriage such as widow, mother and the like, whereas such female as are born in the family as sister, daughter and the like take absolute estates. Even in the enumeration of female heirs, the theory of perpetual tutelage has played an unfortunate part, in spite of Vignaneswara’s clear statement that there is no disqualification, and that propinquity is the sole test of the right of inheritance. The only redeeming feature is that law is no longer a true reflection of life as it was in the earlier periods. In the guise of proponding the law of the Rishis, great sages laid down the law suitable to and prevailing in their times. Law was then an organic growth, the result of the social and economic forces of society, and reflected truly the life of the nation; but now the laws are not of the existing society but of several centuries ago, applied with little or no regard to the changing conditions. It has become petrified and fashioned more according to the old misconceived interpretations of texts than according to the present conditions of society. The result is that law is unkind towards women, has cut down their rights and privileges, and lowered their status a great deal, but has not touched society wherein women continue to be held in the highest honour and veneration entitled to great respect and esteem.

All the same the economic result of the injustice in laws to women has been unfortunate. Women cannot have free proprietary rights as of old, and... that is a blow to their social independence. They cannot hold their heads high; for the sense of power and responsibility, from which grow all virtues, is denied to them. Slowly, though imperceptibly, they have gone back in social status. They have ceased to be learned as of old and cannot appreciate the currents of thought that mould the nations of to-day. Want of learning keeps them narrow in vision, and problems of life and progress do not find response in them. Our generation for them compels us to yield to them in their conservativeness, and uncomiously they constitute a huge barrier to national progress. In the advance of culture and civilisation of the nations of the world we are nowhere, because half the country is not with us.

There is a great necessity for reform of the laws in consonance with the needs of society to-day. Hindu women are capable of managing not only properties but huge commercial business, have distinguished themselves in arts and sciences, in politics and in administration; and to an Indian audience I need hardly mention distinguished and eminent names. There can no longer be any justification to deny them the rights in law, to which not only are they naturally entitled, but which they were enjoying in the fullest measure during the heyday of our civilisation and in a large measure indeed, immediately before the advent of the British administration of Hindu law. We must give back their rights and privileges in law, of which we have robbed them. The injustice perpetrated on them in the name of the law should be remedied, and even as we honor them in life, so must we make them equal to us in law. Then shall law be really a reflection of life, a handmaid to society, as it ought to be, helpful to the growth and progress of the nation and conducive to the building of that robust and powerful Hindu civilisation.

The good faith of the missionary is not questioned but the inevitable tendency of education under his auspices, it is pointed out, must be to undermine the affinity between students and the nation. It is true, says the Horst, that every Turk has the right to choose his own religion. He may become a Catholic, a Buddhist, remain a Moslem, or be an atheist. "But we must not forget," says Horst, "that every religion is an idea which can be applied to life. A young Turk who has become a Protestant can no longer find satisfaction for the thirst of his soul in the society of Turkey. He looks to the great social order of Protestantism, whereas the eyes of every young Turk should be fastened on his own (Turkish) society. Therefore, foreign schools are not only abnormal institutions but also obviously dangerous agents to our society. Those who prepare the young people of a society must be only the thoughtful and cultured men of that society. It is not possible for the foreigner, with the greatest good-will, to influence the youth of a country according to the ideals of that country. The foreign teachers of the foreign schools in our country, with their great 'good-will,' are trying to separate the Turkish youth from Turkish society. Do they desire to do evil to Turkey? Evidently not. But the net results of their work are undoubtedly evil."

The English Succession Law—While some enthusiastic Indian innovators wish to have social legislation in India framed wholesale on the English model, Englishmen are considering the desirability of altering their law in the direction of Indian ideas. Thus, the Liberal Nation and Athenæum observes:—"An interesting point will be raised by Lord Astor in the House of Lords on May 16th, when he will move a motion asking:—That a Select Committee be appointed to see whether a change is necessary in the laws governing testamentary freedom for wives, husbands, and children, based on the experience of Scotland, Australia, and the other portions of the Empire." The present law, allowing complete testamentary freedom, undoubtedly bears hardly in cases in which a wife is left penniless, after having devoted many years of her life to her husband and children, thereby frequently rendering herself unfit to compete in the labour market. Outside England, few countries in the civilised world allow complete testamentary freedom where there are dependants to be considered, and several different types of legislation have been evolved to deal with the problem."
either his wife or children entirely, out of his will as in modern England. The widow's right of dower was long ago paralysed by the eighteenth century, and her right, together with 'the chief right to an insensible share of personality (preserved to day in Scots law and under the Napoleonic Code in nearly all Continental countries), vanished before the Reformation. Lord Astor is now raising the point in the House of Lords.'

Prohibition and Afghanistan:—Statements have appeared in the Indian press to the effect that His Majesty the King of Afghanistan has prohibited the liquor traffic in his dominions in accordance with the injunctions of the Koran, but these statements have hitherto lacked confirmation. Some friends of temperance in this country have therefore approached the Afghan Minister on the subject, and at his request the following authoritative announcement is now published:—"In accordance with the Afghan Law, based on Mohammedan Law, all intoxicants are strictly forbidden to be imported into Afghan.

But for the more facilities of the Europeans now engaged in work in Afghanistan, in some capacity or other, the importation of alcohol is allowed under very strict supervision of the import and customs authorities in restricted quantities only for the exclusive use of these foreign Indians and Europeans. The sale otherwise is prohibited. "It is a fact, that His Majesty King Amanullah, without any single exception, invariably drank the toasts in this and any other country with water." It is not intelligible why the Afghan Government which has set such an example in the matter of prohibition should go out of its way to make an exception in the case of foreigners sojourning in the country. The laws of a land are as binding on aliens residing in it as on its own people. Hence the solicitude of the Afghan Government for foreigners in the matter of drink strikes us as altogether unwarranted.

"The Country League":—The "Country League", has been almost unanimously condemned by the Indian Press, and public men. The Hindustan Times' comment may be taken as typical. It writes: 'Adversity brings strange bed-fellows. The unrelaxed rigours of the boycott saw the Simonites at their wit's end to rally Indian support for a desperately unpopular cause. The Commissioners' extremity thus became the toadies' opportunity. Under the inspiration of the bureaucracy several mushroom bodies began to spring into existence, all pledged to support the Commission and the existing order of things. The latest and most ambitious of these mushroom bodies is the Country League, whose formation has been heralded by pompous manifestoes in the Anglo-Indian press. The long and meandering statement in which the Country League tries to justify its existence is signed by fifty-five signatories among whom one can easily pick out the most confirmed loyalists and tuff-hunters in India and add the rank of recalcitrants. Our country cousins of the Country League must have extremely rustic brains if they imagine that the rest of India cannot see through their despicable game of self-deception and assign them their due places as enemies to the progress of the country."

- Servants of India Society Anniversary:—At the annual gathering of the Servants of India held on the 12th June, Mr. G. K. Devadhar, the President, delivered as usual an address sum- marising the main features of the year's activities. We take the following from it:—Mr. Devadhar referred to the absence of the Rt. Hon. Sastri and Kodanda Rao in South Africa from where the Society had received a cable this morning conveying their best wishes for the successful and harmonious session, of Mr. Bakshie in Ghent and of Mr. Suryanarayana Rao in Madras. Last year saw the death of Mr. Deole, a prominent member of the Bombay branch, of Mr. Mankar of Sangli a valued associate and Mr. J. B. Sen who, it was hoped, would one day join the Society. As for additions to the Society's membership Mr. Devadhar mentioned the admission on probation of Mr. Parsrekar, M.A. who was giving every assistance to Mr. Joshi, M.L.A., in his labour work and it was hoped a few more would be taken on probation soon. Mr. Devadhar then referred to the principal activities in which the Society had engaged itself last year and made prominent mention of Mr. Sastri's work for South African Indians, Mr. Kodanda Rao's achievements in the Assembly and Mr. Joshi's work for labour inside and outside that body. The Society's humanitarian activities included flood relief work in Gujarat and Sind which occupied the President himself, the late Mr. Deole and Messrs. Thakkar and Chitalia for a long time. So far as political work went Mr. Devadhar remarked that the Society was committed to Simon boycott so long as India's wishes were not met by the addition of an adequate number of Indians. In conclusion the president dwelt upon the need for admitting more members if the work already undertaken was not to suffer. He spoke of the Society's financial needs as its financial condition was anything but satisfactory.

A Tribute to Mr. Sastri:—Professor R. Clarke of the Capetown University, in an article in the Daily News, expresses the opinion that the Right Hon'ble V. S. Srinivasas Sastri has not only, by his valiant stand in South Africa, added to the popular identification of the "Indian" with the "Coolie," but has furthered the salutary process of dissociating the possession of a dark skin from the immediate suggestion of a low level of life which custom imputes to the average African. The Indian problem has in no way been solved yet, but it is in a much better way towards a solution than anyone would have believed two years ago.

A Curious Definition:—According to Indian Opinion, the following definition of "Coloured" person has been given in the Old Pensions Bill which is to be introduced in the Union Parliament:—

"Coloured" person means any person who is neither white nor:—
(a) A Turk or member of a race or tribe whose national or ethical home is Asia, nor
(b) A member of an aboriginal race or tribe of Africa, nor
(c) A Hottentot, Bushman or Kaffara, nor
(d) A person who is residing in a native location under the same conditions as a native, nor
(e) An American negro, and includes a member of the race or class commonly called Cape Malay or Griqua.
"THE SYNTHETIC VISION."

The June number of Prabuddha Bharat, the official organ of the Ramakrishna Mission, has an illuminating editorial headed "The Synthetic Vision." Our contemporary begins by calling attention to the great variety of problems which at present confront India. They include all conceivable forms, it observes, from the purely domestic to the extremely metaphysical. The solutions proposed are equally variegated.

"Some profess frankly materialistic views. Some look at the world (and also perhaps God) from the economic point of view. Some are trying to resolve the difficulties of mankind by an interchange of ideas. Others find the panaceas in art, others again in religion. Just as their problems are various—domestic, social, industrial, political, literary, aesthetic, national, international, philosophical, spiritual etc.—so their solutions are also equally various,—materialistic, intellectual, aesthetic, philosophical, spiritual."

Without "the synthetic vision," this variety must appear bewildering. It is the purpose of the article to supply this. No one is better qualified to undertake this task than one who is well trained in the philosophy and mental discipline of the Vedanta which is the search for the One behind the manifold of phenomena. Swami Ashokananda rightly apprehends that all our various problems today arise out of the contact between the East and the West. It is well to be more precise and say between India and Britain. Because India has as distinctive a character in the East as Britain has in the West. The Indian mind is differentiated from the rest of India by its strong metaphysical bent as the British from the rest of Europe by its political or pragmatic genius. "India is temperamentally metaphysical," writes the Swami. "To us all problems have a metaphysical import. We cannot understand or solve them except through relations with our inner being and philosophy of life."

There are many people who hold that it is the metaphysical bent of the Indian mind which unfit it for the practical tasks of national and individual life. It is so, so long as the metaphysical remains floating, so to speak, in the air and is not brought into active contact with the world of fact. "It must be clearly pointed out here," says the Swami, "that the realisation of this grand harmony is not a question of intellectual assent only. More intellectual apprehension is little better than talk. It is a hollow, unsubstantial attitude towards life. A spiritual ideal—and all ultimate ideas are spiritual—unless it is practised and realised carefully, is nothing. The ideals, therefore, should be practised and realised." It is only when earnest efforts are made to realise them that "ideals do add a cubit to a man's stature." On the other hand, there is a class, and a large class, who regard ideals as not meant for practical life. "It is all well," they say "to talk of ideals but this is a practical world and we have to deal with things as they are." If all men had at all times acted on this principle or rather policy, mankind would have progressed but little from the brute stage. There have always been, thank God, a few men who have contemptuously rejected this comfortable philosophy and gone forth undeterred by hardship and suffering in the great quest after the ideal. These men, in fact, found their highest happiness in thus surrendering themselves to the sway of their ideal. There have been several such at all periods of Indian history, but as the Swami says to most of them, the secular implications of spirituality have seemed distasteful. "Their mind longs to abide in pure spirituality; they naturally ignore the other aspects." Or it may be that they first wanted to test their beliefs on their own lives, just as the scientist wishes to prove his theories in his laboratory, before applying them to national problems. The cultural unity of the whole of India which had been achieved before the Mahomedan conquest, shows that there was a practical genius in the composition of the people and suggests that if they had had sufficient time to develop that culture in the secular sphere undistracted by external influences, they might have reared a civilization which would have been complete and vital in all its parts. But this was not to be and the question for us at the present day is to find the synthetics of all the various factors internal and external, of the problem of fitting India to play her part worthily among the nations of the world.

"India," writes the Swami, "has a peculiar way of solving her problems. It is futile to undo its effect on the Indian mind. For it is not a pose, learnt through long repetition. It is spontaneous in its origin and confirmed by the experiences of millennia. What is the special feature of this way? It is a preference for the slow process of assimilation as distinguished by the comparatively quick process of absorption. Other races and nations have either actively or passively adopted the method of either not admitting alien races, or of admitting them only under conditions which rendered the maintenance of their identity as a distinct community difficult, if not impossible. India, on the contrary, has not only not sought to absorb other races but actually placed barriers in the way of their being so absorbed. Some of the most perplexing problems of the day are due to this policy which nevertheless was the right and just one. It is in the same spirit that India will solve her modern problems, economic, political or social. The article should be carefully studied, as it gives us the key to national progress."
NATIONAL CULTURE.
(Mr. M. B. Dalal-)

As the intellect of the Hindus, which scorcs the help of modern science and pretend to have solved all problems by a logical-antithetical process of reasoning hindered out by spiritual insight, and communion with the Divine, is merged in samadhi and disdain to use up its mighty energy during this terrible and unimportant Kali-Yog, poor India is still waiting to come into her own.

It seems to be our desire to have our national culture, religion and art not in a living form, but mummified in their pristine and now worthless glory. If any one thinks this will pull us through either as a nation at present or as a race of men in the long run, they are mistaken. The preservation of national culture certainly seems a laudable object, it is possibly an ideal that leads many to the salvation that comes of having an object in life. However, like all activities that affect large portions of humanity the successful practice of it requires vital thinking.

The days are gone when nationality and national culture were almost synonymous. International culture is now possible through the help of scientific thought. India can adopt no better culture than that of science. Science can unite us as nothing else can. In the past, having a particular culture meant choosing between the different portions of a knowledge more or less true, the excellence of the culture depended on the edifying qualities of the portions chosen. Owing to the fact that all knowledge in those days lacked width, all the cultures based on it had in them an element of futility. It is to this type of culture that we owe the dreaminess of outlook and the love of emotional attitudes that we so wrongly pride ourselves on.

Science is our only hope. Even science in the early Victorian sense. The idea that India will one day save over-materialised Europe by supplying the necessary Spiritual ballast and that we had a foretaste of it when Gandhi came to the fore is merely the mad fulminations of national vanity.

We have potent reasons to adopt scientific thought on a large scale. One of them is that communal disensions cannot be removed by religious arguments and absurd projects to reconcile the tenets of opposing religions. Also in case of need, a scientist would in my opinion, be more able to judge than one of the faithful the amount of offence given to the Deity by the playing of music at odd hours.

The whole system of Hindu thought is so preoccupied with the spiritual aspect of things that the coming into power of the human mind without any accompanying thunder of soul or spirit is something that it cannot accept. Science has revolutionised every phase of thought. Within the next hundred years the indirect implications of science will so undermine the basis of Hindu cosmology and thought that either by that time we shall have entered into a phase of involution or only a lunatic will be able to defend the Hindu position. One thing is certain that working traditionally the Hindu cannot cover fresh ground. Not only has their thought fixed the limits of human advancement but it has also reached and fixed its own limit. As to soul-values they have clearly failed to achieve the millennium they have promised all through historic times. While mind-values in spite of their comparative youth have already done better.

It is unfortunate that Hinduism, in its widest sense, although it comprises such a vast store of ideas of every shade cannot adapt itself to all the larger tendencies of Modern Humanity. The Hindus have a very large part of the gamut of human speculations to choose from. Unfortunately they have chosen the poorest combinations. Of the idea of spiritualism they have made a cause celebre out of all proportion to its importance. By the rejection of a faith that they have made a cause celebre out of all proportion to its importance, slaughtering men to prevent the slaughter of animals. They have changed healthy rules for peaceful domesticity into pretence for the slavery of women. They have changed the system of caste into an efficient social tyranny.

Our Panditijeas, Shetias and Rai and Raja Bahadurs fulminate against ideas of individual freedom. Do they think they can put a spoke in the wheel of time and change? Those that believe, that individualism and the system of caste are alternative directions along which a race can progress indefinitely, could not have observed that education, the granting of the franchise, love, pity, true religiosity, material success and the ideas and conclusions of modern science are to a greater or less degree the enemies of caste.

The Hindus are undermined by their otherworldliness. They must learn to love this realm of Maya, then alone will they become a nation worthy of their past. If they desire to belong to death even when in life then they must be consistent and forego asking in a loud voice for the earthly, benefits which are certainly their due. But, in spite of obvious insufficiency national vanity takes curious forms amongst us. We believe that we are a nation specially gifted with spirituality, metaphysical capacity, mathematical capacity, occult powers, hospitality, pity for dumb animals, and women and children and peace. We believe that we possess a vision of the universe unique for its completeness and absolute in its truth. We believe that we have fighting capacity, chivalry, honesty, morality, religiosity, artistic capacity, faith, respect for tradition, respect for our forefathers and for women unique in the world.

Both vanity and Nationalism makes the Hindu avoid to swallow piecemeal this stuff of his being different to all other men in intellect, which is disted up to him so often and so shamelessly. Granting that the religious feeling and the religious understanding of life have done yeoman service to India in the past, it is still doubtful if dogmatic religion can even be of secondary importance in the future. That is, if objective knowledge is to play its part, to the full. As it must, if we are to advance.

Religion in its inherited form must begin to lose its place as a motive of action in every day life as scientific knowledge spreads and paths to material success open up before those who have technical knowledge.

We resent all criticism of our religious, customs or arts. We want to revive our national culture of a few centuries back in toto. We have not sufficient virility to harmonise it with the energetic tunes of present day activities. We desire to go backwards, to bring the dead back to life through past phases of development. We want to devote ourselves to being the proud pall-bearers of the revered dead. Better than this is to desecrate and despising it. These deadly desires to resurrect the dead is merely the result of mental inertia. It is the desire of those that find themselves incapable of grappling with the present. The ideals of those that find the pressure of using the will and the discomfort of constant adaption too much for them.

Certainly nothing can be achieved by aping the Europeans in little peculiarities. In these be as national as you like, but where scientific thought and love of this passing existence is concerned ape them for all you are worth. If you hate them hate them intelligently. You merely lay yourself open to just ridicule by sticking to obsolete thought and obsolete customs simply because they are national. Moreover, where is the sense in trying to get the better of your enemy by flaunting before him things natural to you that you should be ashamed of. There is no culture that is unchanging and no philosophical nostrums that are eternal. The spice of life is the attainment of fresh positions which are an advance on those of the past. This is true of both personal and corporate existence. One severe form of suffering is to be overhauled against our will by time and change. The open and courageous mind escapes most often. Our besetting defect is the brittleness of our minds.

The principal weakness of our national mentality is the despising of reality. Of one, who objects to the traditional scorn of worldly things as a tendency likely to weaken the unavoidable tussle with reality, it could be said by the Mayaist that he is mistaking the greatest strength for the most abject weakness.

Before we can take sides on this question, it is necessary to recognise that the strength that the Mayaist is talking about can only be pitted if a sense of proportion is to be preserved against the most dire extremity. On the other hand what we require for a successful struggle against reality is the enthusiasm of a lover rather than the strength of a creature-beyond-reality. The success or failure of a life cannot be judged so well by the success of its fight against disaster but rather by its power of constructions and creation during normal times. If this were not so we would rate the adventurer above the scientist.

Be that as it may, it is quite possible that the Mayaist may disdain to join issue if this question were discussed from the point of view of its reality value. A discussion on the value of Maya being of course absurd. However, by refusing to discuss the question from the point of view of reality he really proves to ordinary mortals his disqualification for the life of human endeavour and human happiness. But, at this juncture he could claim that the word happiness was used in a sense completely superficial and narrow. However, we must make up our mind as to what we call happiness. Is it the tangible happiness of peace, comfort and ample opportunity of physical and mental development that we want, or is it a life of slipshod endeavour during existence, and impersonal glory and complete forgetfulness after death?

We are the most religious, the most mystical, the most hospitable, the deepest visioned and the kindest nation in the world and yet we are certainly at present the most commonplace. Putting it in a nut shell our intellectual difficulties are as follows.

First of all, there are the few that constitute the brutes of the nation. They are far above the masses and yet they are of them. So strong is the belief in a tradition that is supposed to be something unique that in times of crises when these few ought to stand out by their realistic and original attitude, they fail miserably. The point to notice here is that when the time comes for a severe break with tradition they are as little able to break with it as their humbler brethren.

Then there are the masses almost completely ignorant of sound objective knowledge and filled with monstrous superstitions. They are of course completely unreliable where intellectual co-operation or moral support is necessary in any progressive activity. By their numbers their ideas and, one is almost tempted to say, by their barbarity they are a dead load on any attempt at active progress. Thirdly, there are the semi-educated business and professional men. These form the second and least vocal class in the country. Their activities are sometimes beneficial and sometimes harmful to the nation according to the particular matter in hand. Although they are more enlightened than the masses they are so whit less superstitious as a class. And, generally speaking unreliable in matters that affect the nation vitally.

All this clearly points to the fact that we need more and more scientific education. Direct attempts at removing their superstitions or shaking their beliefs in dogmatic religion only result in letting loose their religious fanaticism which is a quality they pride themselves on as showing their wonderfully strong faith. The slow but sure effect of objective knowledge in removing the tendencies to hyperbole and fanciful thinking would do the same work without bitterness.

It is for the few who help in legislation and who by their unique position are more seriously burdened than the trustees of any other nation, to understand and legislate against age long defects of mentality which are daily nourished by the excessive dwelling on religion and superstition. For the next hundred years at least it should be made a penal offence to preach religion in India.

Dogmatic religion, traditional mythology and almost complete ignorance of sound objective knowledge has so blunted our minds that we have no conscience where thinking is concerned. Extreme inconsistancy, random thinking and prejudice of every kind may almost be called our national traits. We do not want education but a special kind of education. We are mentally a lop-sided nation. We are mentally a lop-sided nation. We do not attain a mentality that raise us to the level of civilized people, appreciating scientific knowledge. We are mentally a lop-sided nation. We are mentally a lop-sided nation.

We do not automatically resume our pristine position among the nations. It is plain that a general liberal education does not have a one-sided effect on the mind. It is just here that general education fails in our case. What we require is a scheme of education that will correct our tendency to random thinking and give us that passion and respect for facts that is essential to our success as a nation. I do not think that any one would be mad enough to suggest, specially after the events of the last hundred and fifty years, that a knowledge of the other world is the only true requisite for success in life, although it would be far from impossible in this nation of effete dreamers to unearth such an individual.

We should cram ourselves with objective knowledge and pay no attention to social and political problems. When we have attained a clear view of the material universe as it is so far seen to be then a clean and vital social life and political independence will automatically be added unto us.

THE BHANDARIS.

(By Sitaram).

The Bhandari community is wrongly supposed by the members of the advanced communities in India as the only community among the Hindus that extracts toddy from the palm-trees and deals in toddy and wine. In one sense the interpretation appears to be true to some extent, but considering other virtues and occupations of other people belonging to the Bhandari community, the above notion peremptorily turned out to be absurd and silly. There are some nominal sub-castes in the Bhandari community that exist to-day which are, (1) Kitta,

(2) Hethkari, (3) Sindhe, (4) Gavad and some others of less importance. Some illiterate persons of the sub-castes deal with toddy and wine and the remaining few follow on their part, the profession of agriculture—the very profession followed by advanced communities in India who avowly boast of culture and civilisation. There are some who are sailors in merchantile crafts, contractors and agents of various firms and companies, school.masters in Municipal and Local Board Primary Schools, Medical and legal practitioners though few in numbers, painters, sculptors, musicians, wrestlers, engineers and politicians, thus comprising the full claims of the loyal citizenship of the British Empire.

Prof. Javkar, Prof. Redkar, Mr. Surve and the Legislative Councillor Mr. S. K. Bole are leaders of the Bhandari community, whose fame have reached the ears of all. Prof. Javkar is the famous musician in Bombay whose melodious and scientific music has won great popularity for him, giving him the appellation of a professor from the people, appreciating scientific music. So also there is the renowned athletics and wrestler Mr. Redkar, who has established an athletic institution at Girgaum—the heart of Bombay—which aims at imparting physical and athletic education to the energetic youths who love to develop and strengthen the body. The institution is formed of young persons belonging to communities backward and higher in education. With the growth of the institution there have also sprung up similar kindred institutions, whether small or big in various localities, which owe their existence to the institution in question. Mr. Redkar is thus instrumental in creating a liking for physical education in the minds of persons renowned for culture, who appear to have overlooked the education referred to, for considerably long time. Presently, when there is a general cry from the people for the same education, either for physical growth or self-defence, Mr. Redkar can safely be said to have fulfilled the long-felt want concerning the same.

On account of his being perfect in wrestling and athletic games, the public of Bombay have at present begun to style him as "Prof. Redkar", which act is incentive both to him and the Bhandari community to which he belongs—Mr. Surve, who was a member of the Bombay Legislative Council and has shown himself to be an expert in the study of Indian Politics. The honour of being an Ordinary Fellow of the Bombay University is conferred upon him by the Syndicate of the Bombay University as a sign of scholarship witnessed in him by the experienced educationists. Mr. Sadasivrao Mungekar, the renowned artist of Bombay, who by his skill in clay-modelling, has arrested the attention of the public of Bombay, who eulogise him beyond measure, for his talent in painting and this fact can well be borne out by the exhibition of clay pictures lately witnessed by the public. The late Mr. S. H. Golatkar, the renowned historian and the able editor of the weekly, Pratinidhi, who lately expired, has made a stamp in the Indian History by his conspicuous ability in composing two volumes of history of the Bhandari community, which the members of the enlightened sister-communities would do well to go through, in order to get a thorough idea of the spirit and staff the Bhandaris possess, so that they would no longer form the ill-conceived opinions that the Bhandaris are the toddy extractors and liquor-sellers only but form the correct estimate to the effect that the Bhandaris are the extractors of the best stuff that has produced the two historical naval officers, Sarnya Tandel and Mayank Bhandari, during the glorious reig of Shree Shivraji whose fame and glory are sung to-day by the people to demonstrate the long-felt sympathy they have cherished for them.

Mr. S. K. Bole and Mr. A. K. Surve are doing their level best to raise the status of the Bhandari community to the level the cultured communities in India have reached, and in doing so they are voicing forth the grievances of the community, through press and platform, before the public to give proper heed to them for getting them solved correctly and satisfactorily. To give vent to feelings and expressions, Mr. Bole has started the weekly, Newday, and Mr. Surve the monthly magazine, called Bhandari-Vijaya, to discuss the communal and social problems.

Besides, in short, there are different people of different tastes in the Bhandari community who can vis and ve compe with the best type of people advanced in western education on account of the all-round genius and to understand the truth of this statement the people of other communities should make an attempt to mix and move with us the Bhandaris, by attending the occasional meetings of our Sumaji, which are advertised in local newspapers from time to time. The members of the educated classes in India, in particular, appear to form an erroneous idea of the Bhandari community so as to belittle its significance and, in this connection, explanatory lines referred to above, have been written to eradicate the prevalent wrong beliefs so as to get a clear insight into the activities of the Bhandari community which has been hitherto misjudged and ill-estimated by the responsible sister-communities advanced in education, from the sound experience we possess.

MISSION SCHOOLS AND NATIONALISM.

We find Mahmoud Asim Boy, editor, writing in Vakut that "a foreign institution which has been opened in our country with the promise of helping the education of Turkey has mis-used the confidence which the State and people have placed in it." Through its Constitution the Turkish Republic, we are informed by this writer, respects all religions existing and profess in Turkey, but "Turkish laws do not permit any discrimination in dealings as between Muslims and Christians. Any one may profess any religion he chooses. Such matters of conscience lie outside the duties of government. The fact that the educational system of the Turkish republic is based upon secular principles," add Asim, "is not an excuse for making Christians out of Turkish children."

Turkey is still passing through the crisis of rebirth, writes Yusouf Nadi Boy, editor of Djuvaarit, in a moving appeal, tinged with some bitterness, that Turkey be permitted to work out her destiny in her own way. Freedom of conscience, he says, is proclaimed in all progressive countries where the real spirit of democracy is understood, and he insists:

"The Ministry of Education has done its duty in closing the American School at Brussos, and in handing over the guilty to justice. Religion is a personal matter. Modern society condemns any attempt to impose foreign religion into the consciences of the young. It is a terrible crime and the most shameful thing in the world, so society ought to prevent it."

"Leaving the responsibilities of the foreign schools to themselves, let us for a moment consider our own responsibilities for the creation of a national culture. Great responsibility lies on Turkish society and Turkish educational institutions. We are in a state where we must consider seriously, more than ever before, this problem of national culture. The life of Turkish society can no more stand on the old values. We destroyed the old values and progressed towards better national Life in a new civilisation. But did we replace the old with the new values? Ought we not to do so, and do it firmly? The real problem is this; and the crisis is on us."

It may seem that in a secular republic where freedom of conscience is permitted such an incident should not occasion so much anxiety, writes Khalil Nimattullah, professor of logic in the University of Constantinople, in Vakut. But, acknowledging that religion is one of the recognised institutions of society, and that religious education is a part of the whole system of education, he argues that religious training should be according to the religion of the society to which the individual belongs, and insists:

"To-day our social and national life must be Turkish. An ideal society is one which is composed of the individuals of kindred minds, living the same culture. The vitality and power of a society depend exclusively on the harmony between the life of the individual and that of society, and on the strength of the social consciousness of its individual members."

"In spite of this fact some poisonous microbes have crept into our society with the humanitarian end of helping the education of Turkey and have tried to implant their religion in the simple souls of our youth in order to separate them from our society. They want to strip them of their national character, and thus to strike at their very souls. It seems they do not know that the religion of Turkey is Islam, which has a supreme loftiness in its essence unparalleled in other religions."
"It is the most sacred duty of the generation which brought forth the national revolution to proclaim a general protest against these thieves of conscience, and these houses of infection. We must put an end to the seal of these poisonous institutions which have established themselves in Turkey under the name of foreign schools, trying to deprive the spirt of our youth of its deepest feelings and engrafting on its nature an anti-national spirit."

"To be westernized, to be civilized, to be modernized," exclaims a fervid editor in Karagucu, "does not mean to become Giaour (unbeliever)!

And we read an appeal that has not an unfamiliar ring to our western ears: "Hold firm your nationality and beliefs, and then enter into any form you like. Open your eyes! Don't send your children to Giaour schools before you give them a good national and religious education. Otherwise the fault is not with the children; it is with you!"

"The inner life of the boarding-schools especially is very far from reflecting the life of Turkish society. The National days of the Turks, which are the main sources of national enthusiasm and elation, cannot be observed in these schools; whereas the religious and national days of the country which the mission schools celebrate in a most impressive and inspiring way.

"The aim of the educational activities which are carried on in these foreign schools under the watchword of 'unnamed Christianity,' is to infuse Christian beliefs and doctrines in the minds of children in a subtle and pedagogical way; for example, to inject Christianity gradually, unconsciously, and even without mentioning its name.

"Foreign schools exert political influence also on the youth. They teach history from foreign sources and foreign points of view... The freedom of the persecuted nations from the yoke of Turkish tyranny!... are ideas which are frequently met in these sources.

"In short, these schools with all their aims and methods of education are institutions which sever the soul of the Turkish child from his own society and bind him to another society which is not Turkish... The occasional instances of conversion which break forth now and then are obvious manifestations of the indirect influence which these schools exert on the minds of the pupils who attend them. The most powerful influence of a foreign school is the one which is exerted indirectly..."

"Character is very largely a national matter. It can be formed only in a national environment, through the good and bad influences of that environment. Character cannot be imported from outside, because it cannot have a foreign nature. Foreign schools will build character after the pattern of their foreign homes only; whereas such a character is dangerous for the Turkish national ideals, whether it be a political or a religious thing...

"However, writes The Missionary Review of the World, "the distinction between religion and national loyalty should not be an impossible one for Turkish minds," for, runs the argument:

"A Christian can be a good citizen of any country whose laws are based on righteousness, truth and brotherhood. But Christian mission schools lose sight of their main reason for existence if they fail to put first the training of youth to know and believe in and follow Jesus Christ, and to put into practice His principles and teachings in all relationships of life. This should produce better children and better citizens—unselfish, friendly, faithful and intelligent servants of God and man."

WHAT JUSTICE MEANS.

Mr. R. B. Eliaus of Atlanta writes in the Federal Council Bulletin:—

Concerning certain phases of race relations there is undoubtedly room for difference of opinion. In this class fall such questions as those of inherent-racial inequalities and social intermingling. But for the most part these are academic issues, debatable only on the basis of personal opinion. Consequently their discussion usually develops more heat than light.

If people desire to make real progress in their thinking on this subject they will do much better to seek some ground of agreement from which to start—some simple principle about which there can be no question. Such a principle is found in the demand for common justice. Even the most prejudiced will admit that white people should a least be just to Negroes. This admitted, we shall find the road open far in front of us. For here we are in the realm of facts, not that of speculation, and with a little effort we can go forward confidently on solid ground.

At the first step we confront the fact that in most states which provide separate Negro schools the average expenditures for public education are from four to eight times as great for the white child as for the Negro. I know of one county, for example, which spends on its white schools an average of dollars 87 per child and on its Negro schools an average of dollars 1.82 per child!

"But Negroes do not pay as much taxes as white people." No; and poor white people do not pay as much taxes as the rich. But for whose benefit were public schools established in the first place—for the rich which can afford to pay or for the poor who cannot? Is not the Negro's relative poverty handicap enough? Shall we further penalize him for it by denying education to his children? No academic question here. Just a practical issue of simple justice on the one hand and of human destiny on the other.

Is it just to bomb or burn the house of a Negro who moves into a white community? Or late that has happened repeatedly in cities of the North and Middle West. One may honestly think residential separation of the races desirable, but are the torch and the bomb justifiable means of bringing it about? And in these sections, chiefly in the South, where such separation is taken for granted, is it just to deny to the colored districts the common decency of civilized community life—street paving, lights, sewers, proper housing? In states which provide for the separation in public carriers, is it just to give Negroes for the same money a poorer grade of service than is provided for whites?

Do the courts always do justice when Negroes are involved? Has an accused Negro an equal chance to establish his innocence, or a complainant to win his case? No need to accept anybody's opinion about it. Merely sit through a session of a police court and see for yourself.

Does justice demand that Negroes be protected from economic exploitation—that they be permitted to work for a living, be paid decent wages, and be settled with honestly? What about the "barber bill" enacted by a certain city some months ago forbidding Negroes to cut the hair of white people? What about certain state laws which legalize even yet a form of debt slavery? Get the facts, if you don't know them already, and apply the standards of justice.

What has justice to say about lynching—about mob shootings and hangings at the stake? There have been more than 4,000 such affairs in America in the last forty years. Is there room for difference of opinion about that sort of thing? If not, is it not high time that we should do something about it?

Justice may have something to say about citizenship rights, also. Not all Negroes are competent to exercise the right to vote, to be sure. But is it justice that those who are should be illegally excluded, while incompetent white men are allowed to vote? We must protect the ballot, of course, by suffrage limitations. But should not such limitations apply equally to both races?

What has justice to say about our conventional attitudes toward the people of other races—our assumption of superiority; our consequent arrogance and lack of consideration; the limitations of opportunity which we lay on those we count inferior; the petty humiliations which we visit upon them? Can these be defended on the basis of justice?

Not that the Christian should be willing to stop with justice alone. "Not the letter that killeth, but the spirit that maketh alive", means the spirit of Jesus, who saw infinite value in every human being and enjoined upon all the obligation of mutual love and service. The Christian, therefore, is expected to be generous as well as just. But justice is a good starting point and, if we follow the road honestly, we shall have quite enough to do for a while.

CHILD MARRIAGES.

Child Marriages in the East stir Western pity and indignation, but some Englishmen think a little of this might be spared for the same subject at home. Of course, it is admitted by E. Arnot Robertson, in the London Daily Mail the English do not marry their girls when they are actually children, but according to sociologists, the development of a twelve-year-old Eastern-bred girl living in a tropical climate is equivalent to that of a girl of sixteen or seventeen in the West. At eighteen or nineteen, he goes on to say, numbers of English girls, with the full approval of their parents, make the choice which is supposed to decide the whole course of their lives, and we read:

"Not only are these nice young things not legally of age; they are not even considered of an age when their opinion on any matter of importance would be thought worth listening to for a moment. And yet they are expected to discern among the jolly youths who dance with them and take them about in cars or on the backs of motor-bicycles, the ones who will settle down into the most suitable companions for the very different women they themselves will become in ten or twenty years.

"During the last hundred years or so the average marriage age for girls has advanced a good deal, but not in proportion to the drastic changes in woman's outlook and position. In the days when English girls of sixteen were pledged in marriage by their fathers without being consulted at all, women were entirely household chattels. 'They were brought up to hope for the best in the matter of their husbands' occasional sobriety and fidelity, but not to expect too much; and in any case among the leisure classes they would not have been allowed to get to know the man well before marriage, however old they were, so that it made no difference to the choice how young they were pledged."

"Moreover, once married, there was no escape for them; a fact which made, if not for contentment, at least for endurance. Nowadays, with divorce always a possibility, marriage must be far more satisfying than it used to be, in order to endure at all—which emphasises the importance of the choice.

"Neither in England nor India would legal interference be advisable; there are some girls of eighteen in this country who are admirably fitted to make the most important decision of their lives, though the majority are not; and, on the other hand, there are plenty of young women of twenty-two and twenty-three who are still too immature."—The Literary Digest, New York.

PROSTITUTION IN BOMBAY.

The Law, Procedure and Elections Committee of the Bombay Municipal Corporation have recommended the Corporation to approach Government for the amendment of the Bombay Prostitution Act so as to make brothel-keeping illegal. The Committee is reporting on the subject say that with a view to ascertaining all the points of view, a sub-committee of the committee appointed to consider the question invited representatives of the Bombay Vigilance Association and the Commissioner of Police at their meetings, ascertained their views and discussed with them the various aspects of the question. The representatives of the Bombay Vigilance Association strongly advocated the amendment suggested to be made in the Bombay Prostitution Act in regard to making brothel-keeping illegal. The Commissioner of Police informed the Sub-Committee that owing to the heavy criminal work of any Police Station it is not possible for the staff to give special attention to offences connected with prostitution; they deal only with specific complaints made to them; he therefore had recommended to Government that a special staff should be appointed to deal with offences under the Prostitution Act so that some effort could be made to carry out the main intention of the Prostitution Act, viz., the suppression of the pimp and the procurer; this staff had been sanctioned in May 1927 and was now engaged in this special work; some good work had been done but much remained to be done.

The Commissioner of Police was of opinion that the problem was as much the concern of social organisations as it was of the police and that through the duty of investigation must remain in the hands of the police as trained investigators, much help and information could be given and ought to be given by voluntary workers such as the Vigilance Association, etc. He was not opposed to the proposal to make brothel-keeping illegal, but he was doubtful whether legislation to this effect would prove such a remedy as its advocates claimed. The Sub-Committee have after careful consideration recommended that it was not desirable at this stage to make brothel-keeping illegal in the case of females. The Committee, however, disagree with the Sub-Committee's views in the matter and are of opinion that time has come to request Government to amend the Bombay Prostitution Act for making brothel-keeping by males or females an offence under the said Act on the ground that the existence of brothels encourages and facilitates commercialised traffic in women and girls. Unless brothels are closed it will be impossible to stop this traffic. If there were no brothels the importation of girls would not be a paying proposition and it would be very difficult to carry on the traffic inasmuch as these girls would not find shelter for the purpose of carrying on the trade.

The Committee also desire to draw the attention of the Corporation to the opinion emphatically expressed in favour of the proposed amendment of the Act at a public meeting held on the 18th November 1927 under the auspices of 29 public associations in Bombay and presided over by Sir Purabhotamdas Thakurdas. Moreover it may be mentioned that the majority report of the Bombay Prostitution Committee had strongly recommended that keeping of brothels whether by males or females should be made illegal and an offence under the Prostitution Act. Experience has shown and it has been acknowledged by the Commissioner of Police that under the present law it was impossible to take any action as brothels though really controlled by men were nominally kept by women. The Committee are unable to see how an act can be an offence in the case of males and not so in the case of females. Such distinctions make the provisions of law inefficient and inoperative. The Committee therefore recommend that Government be approached with a request to undertake legislation in this matter.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Naidu Widow Marriage.—A correspondent writes:—The re-marriage of a widow belonging to the Naidu Kshatriya caste, which does not permit re-marriage of women, was celebrated last evening in the Arya Samaj Mandir at Kolatam. The bridegroom was Mr. Narsa Narayana Obbety, son of Babu Obbety, a Kshatriya young man of Mangalore, aged about 26, who is employed as a clerk in the Imperial Tobacco Company of Bombay. The bride, Shriwati Bobbhyawati Venkata Subbamma, aged about 20, is the daughter of Mr. Akula Kotayya Naidu of Manlipatnam. Prior to the commencement of the marriage ritual, the bridegroom was invested with the sacred threads after appropriate ceremonies in the course of which he solemnly undertook to live a life of righteousness and to realise the grand ideals represented by the sacred symbol. About 50 persons, both ladies and gentlemen, partook of the dinner given to celebrate the social side of the function.
Prof. Raman's Notable Discovery — A notable discovery concerning the action of light on matter is the latest contribution by Prof. C. V. Raman, F. R. S. to the advance of science. It is believed that the discovery will profoundly influence the progress of several branches of physics and chemistry, including some direct practical importance. Prof. Raman and his collaborators are hard at work in his Laboratory following up the discovery which is already attracting worldwide attention in scientific circles. Already, several papers have appeared in scientific journals discussing its explanation. A French writer in the Comptes Rendus of the Paris Academy of Sciences refers to the discovery as an "extremely remarkable" one, and its fundamental importance as opening out entirely new regions of research in the relations between matter and radiation has been promptly recognized by the leading physicists abroad.

Campaign against Social Evils — Under the auspices of the Social Purity League, writes the Champion, a public meeting was held at the Malabart Kerra grounds, Calicut. Mr. F. G. Manivallaman Rajah Balfour praised. In his opening remarks, the president urged the removal of caste and religious distinctions. Mr. K. Chalubuty spoke next on the need for inter-marriages, inter-dining etc. Muvvur P. Kunhiraman, F. Keravan Nair and P. H. Das also delivered speeches against the existing social evils like uncleanliness, animal sacrifice and drinking. Several resolutions were passed at the meeting. The Government was requested to punish all those who carry fowls, head downwards, for sacrifices in temples and to grant permission to all castes to enter and worship in temples taken under the management of the Hindu Religious Endowments Board. Another resolution urged the people to try to secure for all castes and communities common rights and privileges in temples and other institutions under the Maharajah Zemorin, as they were established from public funds. All the municipalities in general and Calicut in particular were requested to put a stop to the inhuman practice of clubbing dogs to death in public places. The meeting strongly urged for legislation prohibiting animal sacrifice in municipal area.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of those countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

CONTENTS.

Legal Rights of Hindu Women:—Mr. K. T. Bashyam Aiyangar has done well to publish in book form (S. Ganesan, Madras) his Mysore University Extension lecture on “Women in Hindu Law,” Sir C. P. Ramaswami Aiyar contributes a Foreword, and the book is dedicated to Mr. Mirza Ismail, the progressive and broad-minded Dewan of Mysore. Sir Ramaswami commends the book as valuable to the lawyer, legislator and social reformer. The author, he adds, takes the view in which he has been supported by many thoughtful students of Hindu Law that “a partial study of Hindu law-books and scriptures and the natural reluctance of the European translators, lawyers and judges to trespass on private and sacred territory have contributed to fossilise the law and depress the women’s cause.” He quotes with approval the author’s observation that law in the old days was an organic growth, “but now the laws are not of the existing society but of several centuries ago applied with little or no regard to changing conditions.” The same view was expressed by the late Mr. Justice Telang in his paper “Gleanings from Maratha Chronicles,” in which after giving several instances of social changes, great and small, freely introduced under the pressure of military and political necessity by the then rulers, he observed: “speaking broadly it would appear that the general effect of British administration has been to render feeble the various forces which were, in old days, working from within the community itself as a community. The old rules would, by common, if tacit, consent, have been gradually relaxed, and in process of time custom would have sanctified everything. But such a process hardly takes place at our present stage of progress, or at all events is incomparably more slow and tedious in its operation, wherever British influence is in other respects powerful.” This is the kind of fact which the Simon Commission has to get access to, and which, owing to the abstention of those who can help it, it will not find it easy to do. We may add that the activities of Christian Missions are directed to short-circuiting the social forces which in their natural operation would, to use Telang’s phrase, be “working from within the community itself as a community. Just as the Bolshevists attribute all the ills of society to capitalism, the Christian Missionaries attributes it to Hinduism. Educated men have ceased to be persuaded by the proposition that a man has only to become a convert to win his freedom. Even the illiterate classes are not readily taken in by such specious talk. Hence, the modern movements within the Indian communities to reform their own abuses.

How Christianity is Spread—The Baptist Missionary Review for June gives the first place to an article by Miss Brenner headed “Touring Nollore after the Cyclone,” with the commendation, “it is not merely an exceptionally interesting narrative but a valuable study of the conditions governing rural evangelism.” When Jesus Christ sent out his apostles to preach he warned them not to encumber themselves with much luggage. Miss Brenner does not believe in this injunction. “Some missionaries,” she writes, “very conscientiously feel that the less equipment we use the better, for they are afraid of detracting the attention of the listeners from the Gospel story. This is certainly a worthy reason, but it has been my experience that almost everything can be used for the glory of God. Curiosity is after all a natural operation which the writer is trying to attract their curiosity and thus bring them within reach of the message.” Missionary work of this sort is really advertising Christianity, Miss Brenner records that she was able to make great inroads on the belief of the villagers by means of vinegar bottles filled with water! “Even over little for terrier dog and the new canary bird we bought in China have been the means of drawing people to the tent. No matter for what reason they came to our camp they never go away without having heard the word of salvation.” Miss Brenner nevertheless had small success in converting the people. This she naively attributes to the activities of Satan whose bonds lie heavy on the Indian people. Hinduism, she says, is a religion of fear. It was not a Hindu who said of old that “the fear of God is the beginning of wisdom.” Nor was it a Hindu who called his people to repent. But, says Telugu people, may or may not have the mind of children but Miss Brenner’s methods are certainly very childish.

Vernaculars and English—Professor Karve’s Women’s University at Poona uses Marathi as its medium of instruction; the idea being that whatever may be the exigencies which require English to be used in the statutory Universities, they do not exist in the case of women who may, therefore, be taught throughout in the vernacular. This is something like the practice in certain cases of men eating fresh food while women are strict vegetarians. We are of opinion that, having regard to the inferiority which has come to be attached to women's position in society, it is essential that the equality of the sexes should be asserted in the educational as in other spheres and that notwithstanding its obvious disadvantages, English so long as it is the medium of instruction for men should also be that for women. We do not, however, assume an attitude of antagonism to the Women's University, as every institution, which adds to the number of women under instruction, is helpful in increasing the forces which make for social regeneration. Professor Karve himself has declared that he has not started his institution in a spirit of rivalry to the existing Universities. It is to be expected that any one who undertakes to speak to the graduates of the Women's University on the Convocation day, should support the principles on which it is conducted but we cannot help thinking that Nawab Ross Masood who delivered the last address rather overshoots the mark. This is particularly surprising as he acknowledged that immeasurable benefit has been derived by Indians from the use of the English language as the medium of instruction. He did not specify the advantages though he enlarged at somewhat lugubrious length on the harm which it has, in his opinion, done in various ways. Starting with the proposition in which the abstract is incontrovertible that a child is best taught through its mother-tongue—which, in passing, is actually done throughout the country—the Nawab implied that any one of the Indian vernaculars was as good as a mother-tongue as a medium of instruction to Indians in any part of the country. This, to take one extreme case, would mean that the Telugu or Maithili boy may be taught through Bengali or Gujarathi more beneficially than through English. There is, of course, a good deal of ideas and sentiments common to all the vernaculars and that makes the learning of a vernacular other than his own comparatively easier than learning English. The main purpose of the study of English, however, is to acquire culture of social and political freedom which is peculiar to it and which so far as it has found its way into the vernaculars is still an alien element in them. It is worthy of note, in this connection, that all the present day leaders among Indians are English-educated men, many of them educated in Europe and that even those who decry, English education themselves belong to this class.

A Solution for Communal Troubles:—The best way to overcome communal troubles is to create opportunities for the intellectual and mental appreciation of the ideals of different faiths and culture. It was a happy idea of the citizens of Patna to inaugurate the Prophet Day on last Sunday in which men of culture, education, irrespective of religion, participated. Mr. Abdul Aziz struck the right note when in the course of his presidential address he remarked that if really Hindus, Muslims, Christians, Jains and Buddhists and other people belonging to the various faiths made it a point to know the view points of one another, to understand the life, achievements and creeds of the different Prophets who came to the world from time to time, they would find that the object was to better mankind by setting up ideals and to lead exemplary lives by which the whole of humanity could benefit. In paying a fitting tribute to the Prophet of Islam, Mr. P. K. Sen observed:—It would be lunacy whether in science or in religion to imagine that truth was one for one country and different for another. The sovereignty of science had dispelled such illusions. It would be a sad day for India if they were to shut themselves up from this universal consciousness and were to stick to narrow, territorial and tribal consciousnesses. He made bold to say that the prophet's life was not an ideal only for the Arabs, but for the world, old or new. What did his life teach? Continuing he dwelt on the God-consciousness and God intoxication of Muhammad, the very essence of his being and the message that he gave to this world. He described graphically his frequent resorts to solitude to be in communion with God and how ultimately he emerged from the solitude after hearing the mysterious voice, “There is no God but God.” With this message, he fought the evils of his time and came out triumphant when everything round him was unpropitious; and hostile. He never used sword except in self-defence. He knew no mortal so tender, so full of mercy. The greatest charge of cruelty was unfounded. Great mischief was being done on account of ignorance and on account of wrong standard of judgment. Such ways of approach led them to disaster. A superficial knowledge of religion is the root cause of communal discord.

A Case of Sati :—We reprint in another column the none-too-strict sentence passed by the Allahabad High Court in a horrible case of Sati which came before it. It is a strange reflection on a hundred of years of British rule that such an instance of savage superstition should still linger in a settled province like Bihar. The Brahmin community must feel ashamed that the criminals in the age of consent case as well as the sati case belong to it. We should have much wished that some one of the main abettors in the sati case should have been hanged as an example and a warning. It is high time that persons who inspire such outrageous barbarities were made to realise that they are guilty of murder and nothing less.

A Defect of Law:—We print in another column the judgment of the Allahabad High Court in a peculiarly odious case of rape by an adult husband on his child wife. Such cases are usually hushed up, and when one comes to light it is but proper that stern justice should be meted out for the delinquent. In their judgment the learned Judges call pointed attention to the defect in the law which provides no punishment for the parents who hand over their female children to elderly husbands. This is an omission which should be supplied.
THE MARATHA UPHEAVAL.

There has been no more striking instance of a complete reversal of the estimate of a historical character than that of Shivaji, the founder of the Maratha Empire. Anglo-Indian historians had stigmatized him as a bandit who by treachery and sharp practice managed to hoist himself into the position of the ruler of Maharashtra. To-day the Prince of Wales and following him the whole of official and semi-official Anglo-India pays tribute to him as the greatest soldier-statesman of India. This is partly no doubt the result of the desire, which found expression in the separate Coronation of King George V at Delhi, of British India to regard itself as being in historic continuity with the pre-British governments, as being in some sort a natural evolution from them. The removal of the seat of the Central Government to Delhi was inspired by this sentiment which has much to justify it. The revised attitude of British towards pre-British rulers is a necessary corollary to this doctrine of British rule. The rehabilitation of Shivaji, if we may so call it, has been greatly assisted by historians like Principal Rawlinson, Jadunath Sircar, Kincaid, Farnissi and others, who have shown that the charges brought against him were merely a repetition of those of hostile Mahomedan writers. The unveiling of the equestrian statue of Shivaji at Poona by the Governor of Bombay last Saturday puts the seal upon the restoration of Shivaji to his rightful niche in the Indian Temple of Fame.

Shivaji was not by temper or tradition an anti-Moslem. His father, Shahaji, was named after a Mahomedan saint whose shrine was held in reverence by the Bhonsle family. Shahaji was a grandee of the Muslim Court of Bijapur. Shivaji’s dress was modelled on that of Mussulman courtiers. In the ordinary course, Shivaji would have succeeded to his father’s estates and position in the Bijapur Court. Ranade has told us that the Decan Mahomedan Kingdoms differed from those of North India, in that they were essentially national rather than communal in their organisation and outlook. He mentions under ten heads the influences in consequence of which about the commencement of the seventeenth century, “the nominal Mahomedan rulers of Golconde, Bijapur, Nagar and Bedar were virtually controlled both in the civil and military departments by Maratha statesmen and Maratha warriors, and the hill-forts near the Ghats and the country thereabout were in the hands of Maratha Jahagirdars, who were only nominally dependent upon their Mahomedan sovereigns.” The attempts of the Moghul Emperors to upset what Ranade calls this “balance of power” in the Deccan led to the rise of the Maratha power. This danger (of the Moghul invasion), he says, “was felt to be formidable alike by the Mahomedan rulers of the Deccan and their Maratha nobles.” The Marathas sided with the Deccan Mussulman Kings so long as the latter were able to stand up against the Moghuls. It was only when they failed to do so, that Shivaji rallied the Marathas under the Hindu flag. “He (Shivaji),” writes Ranade, “did not create the Maratha power; that power had been already created, though scattered in small centres all over the country. He sought to unite it for a higher purpose by directing it against the common danger. This was his chief merit and his chief service to the country, and in this consists his chief claim upon the grateful remembrance of his people.”

Though originating in conquest the Moghul Empire was no absentee government. Under the far-sighted statesmanship of Akbar and his immediate successors, it acquired the character of a national government and was accepted as such by a large part of India. Shivaji too did the same as shown by the readiness with which he sought for and accepted high rank in the Imperial army. It has been said that he did so as a ruse, but we see no reason to suspect that he was not quite sincere in the loyalty he professed to the Emperor in his early days. It was Aurangzeb’s gross breach of faith with his Hindu subjects that drove the latter to withdraw their support from the Moghul Empire, and later to rise against it in self-defence when it degenerated into an openly and aggressively communal regime. The Hindu community is not organised for aggressive action. Its general tendency is to live and let live. It is only when a serious danger threatens its very existence that it is roused to resistance, and as soon as the immediate danger is past, it relapses again into its normal passivity. The Sikhs in the Punjab, the Rajputs in Central and the Marathas in Western India stood up to challenge the Imperial power when it departed from the wise liberalism of its founders. Ranade in a famous address to the National Social Conference at Lucknow traced the process of which fusion was going on between Hindus and Mahomedans and which was interrupted by the short-sighted policy of Aurangzeb. The history of India, he said, would have taken a different direction if Dara and not Aurangzeb had succeeded Shah-Jehan on the throne of Delhi. Such accidents, however, do not turn the course of history and when they do, it is because antecedent conditions have prepared the ground for the change. Prince Dara represented advanced Indian nationalism for which neither Mahomedans nor Hindus were ripe at the time. The result was that while the Moghul Empire fell, the Hindus failed to raise a national State on its ruins. The political genius required for the purpose, was lacking and the English who supplied it easily established their rule over India.

MUTUAL SERVICE vs. EXPLOITATION.
(By Dr. Clifford Mannhardt, Ph.D.)

The corner stone upon which a stable and happy society is built up is that of mutual service. A works in the fields; B toils in the mills; C practices as a peader; D heals men's bodies; E is a capitalist; and so it goes. Each makes a contribution and each in turn is dependent upon the other. If several hundred mill hands were suddenly taken out of Bombay and settled upon the land it would be but a question of time until some of them would be raising grain, others would be doing blacksmithing and carpentry work, while still others would be doing hand weaving and following the other occupations that are essential to the well being of the whole. Ideally each individual would make the contribution for which he was best suited in order that the total welfare of the group might be furthered in the most effective manner.

But in practice the ideal differs from the actual.
As the situation works itself out in our cities very few men are allowed full freedom of choice. A young man either follows the occupation of his father, or seizes the opportunity for work of one of our most difficult industrial problerus.

We have industrial unrest because men suspect that whereas there exists a certain and profit-sharing, group management, intelligent co-operation in operation is also true for the lesser forms of exploitation, even to the attempt to get without equivalent giving.
Fortunately, however, there are indications that the cooperative movement is gaining. Works councils, profit-sharing, group management, intelligent cooperation between labour unions and employers-all are signs of the new day. If the signs fail, over the ruins of our wanted machine civilization future historians will write the epitaph: "The Age of the Machine. It had every opportunity to prove itself a social benefactor, but it died by its own hand, a victim of human greed."
The appointment of the Minister Sir Ghulam Hidayatullah, member of the Bombay Executive Council, is open to grave objections. Time and again, the translation of a High Court Judge to the Governor's cabinet has been opposed on the grounds the independence of the judiciary will be impaired when the bright vista of the Executive Councillorship is opened out before him. With greater emphasis, it applies to the Minister's being appointed as member. A minister, as a servant of the Governor, is bad enough but to make him an Executive Councillor is worse still, as it subjects him to demoralising temptations, encourages unscrupulous ambition and as it enables the bureaucracy to keep the ministry servile by helping sycophants to become Ministers with prospects of a more permanent, if less independent office of the Executive Councillorship. Under these circumstances, it is moonshine to talk of clean politics and purity of public life.

The Indian High Courts Bill has not evoked as much criticism and opposition, as it should, from enlightened and responsible bodies like the Bar associations in different parts of the country. Under colour of Indian Vakils being ineligible to be Chief Justices as at present, the bar against civilians also is being removed. It will be evident that the object is to subordinate the judiciary to the executive, by making it civil minister's being appointed as member. An effective protest has been entered by the Bombay Lawyers' Association and the Times of India. Will the Indian Government open its eyes and consider or reconsider the situation? Either the bill was inadvertent or deliberate. If it is the first, the suspicion that the bureaucracy is being patted on the back, is irresistible. If it is the other, louder must be the protest and stern the opposition.

The Consolidation of Holdings Bill in Bombay and a proposal for consideration of the same subject by the Madras Collector's Conference at Coiy, would make it appear that the move is from the Central Government which had so far put a damper on the land-revenue-forming propitiities of the provincial Governments. It is hoped that the two Provinces will become alive to the fact that forced legislation towards consolidation, will be a remedy worse than the disease and that success lies in the way of an extension of educational facilities, spread of co-operation and a permissive legislation. After all, the Bill would only touch the outer fringe of the Land Revenue problem.

The appointment of a Physical Education committee in Madras to investigate into the need for compulsory Physical Training in Schools and to explore the possibility of providing additional facilities for play-space, recreation, gymnastics and the necessary equipment, is again a move after the Bombay Government's example. Many of the reforms and changes proposed, omit the essential pre-requisite viz. finance. Secondary education is in either province is crippled for want of it. If it is supplied, every defect will disapper.

The Madras Local Boards Amending Bill is provoking a bitter opposition from the several Local Boards. The proposal to do away with the existing Taluk Boards, to enlarge the sphere of activity of the District Boards and to appoint an Executive officer for each District Board, must be welcomed by all sane critics and wise administrators. At present, the Taluk Boards have dis-proportionately large expenditure, little income and less work. They are in no way useful. It is time that they went unwept, unhonoured and unsung.

The resignation of two Ministers in the U. P. was rather late in coming. The Simon Commission has created searches in many a heart and cost the Ministers in the U. P. and Madras their offices. As if communal divisions and party squabbles are wanting, there is to be a further division of Simonites and Anti-Simonites. If the said test of loyalty to the Government, is an adoption of the Simon creed, whatever it is to be, the prize of such loyalty is an Executive Councillorship, to quote an example from Bombay. The Provincial Governments are preparing the way for Sir Simon by getting rid of the un-desirables and gathering the desirables. If a Minister is capable of thinking, he must clear out. If he does not, elevate him. An accommodating, compromising, half-hearted and nondescript puttyman is marked out for an imminent ministership.

MEMORIAL TO SHIVAJI MAHARAJ.

The unveiling ceremony of the All-India Shivaji Memorial equestrian statue took place on the 16th instant, and was staged amid scenes of oriental splendour in fine weather. The Governor and Lady Wilson arrived in a magnificent procession from Shaniwara and were accorded a cordial welcome by the Maharaja of Kolhapur and the Deccan Chiefs. Unprecedented crowds lined the routes and cheered their Excellencies.

After the speeches, his Excellency, accompanied by the Maharaja, proceeded to the statue and unveiled it amidst thunderous cheers from the crowd. A salute of 19 guns signalled the auspicious event.

On his Excellency's return to the dais, a vote of thanks by the Chief of Saangli concluded the function. Messages wishing success were received, among others, from the Prince of Wales, Lord Irwin, Sir William Birdwood, Lord Lloyd and Lord Goschen. Representatives of Indore, Gwalior, Baroda, Butlam and Dhar and hundreds of civil and military officers and members of the Bombay Government participated in the function.
The statue, weighing 10 tons, stands 13 feet on a granite pedestal 17 feet high and was designed by Mr. Karmarkar, artist. Shivaji is represented in a martial pose. A marble panel representing Shivaji receiving a sword from godless Bhawani adorns the front of the pedestal. The cost of the statue is Rs. 70,000. The national character of the evening function was stressed in the speeches and applauded. Those present included the Chiefs of Anand, Bhor, Jamkhandi, Mirej and Mudhol, Raja Sahib Bhonsale, Pandit Malaviya, Mr. Kelkar, Mr. Jayakar, Mr. Kamat, Mr. Deshdar, Mr. Jadhav Mr. Jagtap. Over a thousand ladies were conspicuous by their presence.

The following extracts are from the Maharaja of Kolhapur's address delivered at the unveiling of the statue of Shivaji the Great: It is my proud privilege to-day, as President of the All-India, Shri Shivaji Memorial Committee, to welcome you here to take part in the unique function of the unveiling of the statue of Shri Shivaji Maharaj. The movement for raising this great national memorial to that hero was started in 1921 by his Highness the late Maharaja of Gwalior and my late father of revered memory: and about the end of that year, his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales laid the foundation on which the statue will be to-day unveiled. It is certainly many years since the work was begun. But no one who knows the difficulties through which we had to pass will be surprised that so much delay was caused in the fulfilment of the object with which the movement was launched in 1921. To-day's ceremony marks the completion of the first part of the Memorial. Remembering vividly, as I do, the many difficulties which beset our path in the past, I feel very great pleasure to see that we have to-day reached the end of at least one part of the journey. My pleasure is greatly enhanced by the fact that I have been able to request your Excellency to take the leading part in to-day's function.

TRIBUTES TO SHIVAJI.

I have no doubt that every true heart in this Country, Indian or British, will feel a thrill of joy at the sight of the Memorial which we are about to unveil. A time there was when the memory of Shivaji was used as a political party weapon in Maharashtra and many people were afraid of being associated with the movement which bore that great name. As the descendants of Shivaji, myself and my ancestors have always considered it our duty to worship his memory. But it is a matter of pride, such as I never felt before, that I am able to lead a movement to perpetuate the memory of my great ancestor on behalf of India as a whole. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales paid a noble tribute to Shivaji by consenting to lay the foundation of this Memorial. Our gratitude to him for thus associating himself with a movement which arouses the most patriotic feelings throughout the country, no words can adequately express.

I WILL NOT DETAIN YOU BY ATTEMPTING TO TELL YOU WHAT A GREAT PART THIS MEMORIAL WILL PLAY IN THE LIFE OF GENERATIONS OF INDIANS YET UNBORN. THIS STATUE WILL NOT ONLY REMIND INDIA OF THE HEROISM OF SHIVAJI AND OF THE MAGNIFICENT WORK WHICH HE DID IN HIS DAYS BUT IT WILL BE A SOURCE OF NOBLE INSPIRATION FOR AGES TO COME. CIRCUMSTANCES MAY CHANGE AND THE FIELDS ON WHICH OUR LABOURS LIE MAY CHANGE, BUT THE GREATNESS OF A HERO LIKE SHIVAJI REMAINS UNCHANGED. "STATES FALL, EMPIRES BREAK UP, DYNASTIES BECOME EXTINCT," BUT TO USE THE WORDS OF THE GREAT INDIAN HISTORIAN, "THE MEMORY OF A TRUE 'HERO AS KING' LIKE SHIVAJI REMAINS AN IMPERISHABLE HISTORICAL LEGACY FOR THE ENTIRE HUMAN RACE."

The pillar of a people's hope,
The centre of a world's desire, to animate the heart, to kindle the imagination and to inspire the brain of succeeding ages to the highest endeavours."

In laying the foundation of this Memorial to "One of India's great soldiers and statesmen" as he described him, his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales observed six years ago that "from this spot the statue of the Founder of Maratha greatness will look with pride at the pillar across the river which commemorates the latest exploits of the abiding valour of his people." May this Memorial help to keep the spirit which animated the people of Shivaji burning, bright and clear, for all times to come, and may it long serve to keep the memory of Shivaji Maharaj and his work green in the hearts of his grateful countrymen.

I now request your Excellency on behalf of the Shri Shivaji Memorial Committee to unveil the Statue.

GOVERNOR'S SPEECH.

PRINCE OF WALES' MESSAGE.

Unveiling the statue, the Governor read a number of messages. The Prince of Wales' message read:-

"I shall be glad if you will convey to his Highness the Maharaja of Kolhapur my thanks for the invitation to attend the opening ceremony of the Shivaji memorial, the foundation-stone whereof I laid when I visited Poona, and my regret that I am unable to be present on the occasion of the completion of work begun during my visit to India. I feel sure this occasion will be worthy of the memory of the great Indian statesman-soldier and the monument will stand for all time as a testimony to Maratha greatness in the arts of peace as well as those of war."

His Excellency said he proposed to send a reply conveying on behalf of the Maharaja of Kolhapur, president, and members of the All-India Shivaji Memorial Committee, their dutiful respects and grateful thanks for the gracious message and adding that while it was deeply regretted that his Royal Highness was unable to be present the message and its tribute to the Indian statesman-soldier, who had been commemorated in the memorial, had been a source of great satisfaction to the committee and the. president and would be deeply appreciated by the people of Maharashtra.

VICTORY'S MESSAGE.

His Excellency read a message from the Viceroy—

"I send your Highness my congratulations on the occasion of the unveiling of the statue of Shivaji, the renowned Mahratta leader and statesman. I trust this memorial may stand both as a lasting token of the pride of the Mahratta people in their national hero and as a reminder of how in recent years, particularly in the Great War, the Mahrattas have shown by their deeds that the traditions of the past still inspire them."

COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF'S MESSAGE.

The Marquis of Reading, Lord Lloyd, the Governor of Madras and the Commander-in-Chief had also sent messages. The Commander-in-Chief's message concluded:—"That the qualities of courage, hardiness and disregard of danger, which were so conspicuous in Shivaji and his Mahratta warriors of 600 years ago are still alive in the Maratha soldier of today is plainly written in the records of the 'Great War.'"

SATI IN BAHIL.

"We do not pretend to know if there be any survival after this life is finished, but, if so, and if God be just and merciful in the scene that we very imperfectly understand justice and mercy, then such of these men as survive their earthly punishment may well go on humble pilgrimage to Sampati's flower decked shrine and, with ashes on their heads, cast themselves down and invoke her gentle spirit to intercede with the Almighty to save their guilty souls from everlasting damnation."

These remarkable words were contained in a judgment passed by Mr. Courtney Jerreil (Chief Justice) and Mr. Justice Adami in passing sentence on ten persons who had been convicted at the Patna High Court of abstention of suicide. The story told in court was a moving one. It was stated that Sampati Kher, a young Brahmin widow of the Bahar sub-division of the Patna division, accompanied the 'dead body of her husband to the cremation ground on the banks of the Ganges. There she was made to bathe and was supplied with articles of toilet which, according to the old custom, a woman must use before she commits 'suttee.' Her feet were painted and she was obliged to change her dress.

After undergoing this preliminary ceremony Sampati sat on the funeral pyre of her dead husband and soon afterwards her clothing burst into flames. The people around, who thought that a miracle had been performed before their eyes, set up a cry of 'Suttee ki jai!' and threw chips of firewood on to the burning girl.

POLICE TO THE RESCUE.

The humiliation of the girl was interrupted by her springing from the burning pyre and rushing into the river, apparently in utter perplexity and agony. One of the accused pushed the body of the husband after her into the river and she dragged it after her, but could not do so for any considerable distance. Two constables endeavoured to get the girl to return to the bank, but she evaded their attempts to aid her and returned herself. She died two days later from the burns she had received while on the pyre.

Their lordships, in the course of their judgment, said that to satisfy their dues, the crowd, the "pandit" in this affair knew that the fire must appear as if by magic. Also, the poor girl herself expected the fire to be miraculous. The "pandit" were prepared for the emergency.

A SIMPLE TRICK.

Not for a moment continued their lordships, had the girl been left alone: She had been closely surrounded. The trick was more simple than any conspirator's trick at a country fair and it was the "pandits" who propounded it. At the torture of the flames the poor creature leaped from the fire and rushed into the river. The "pandits" were now in a serious difficulty. If the woman was rescued the method in which they had set fire to the pyre would be revealed. They could not start the fire again: they could not repeat the trick. The apparatus was gone and therefore Sampati must drown.

The judgment continues:—They threw her the corpse of her dead husband, which slipped out of her grasp, to the Ganges crocodiles, but no such merciful fate attended Sampati. They shouted to her to drown herself. Some police put out in a boat and tried to rescue her. They were threatened and told that they were not to stop her as she had been told to drown herself. However, with the assistance of the police, she was ultimately helped ashore in a shocking condition. For two days and two nights she lay there in agony. Then the Sub-divisional Officer, who had been away on tour, arrived with armed police, swept the rabble aside and took the poor woman to the jail. Subsequently her sufferings came to an end. It is stated that on the 'bank of the Ganges there was a little shrine to perpetuate her memory.

THE JURY.

As regards the defence taken that they should respect the verdict of "not guilty" of the jury because they were learned men, their lordships observed that "learning connotes neither wisdom nor courage, and, in our opinion, these jurors are deficient in both these qualities, qualities which are necessary to citizenship."

Their lordships found all accused guilty and sentenced—Bamantar (kha driver) and Lakhi (who acted as maid) to one year's rigorous imprisonment, two young boys to five years' rigorous imprisonment each and Jugdeo (an older youth) to seven years and the remaining five accused (pandits) to ten years' rigorous imprisonment each.

A CASE UNDER THE AGE OF CONSENT ACT.

An interesting story of how a husband of 34 years of age committed rape on his child wife of 11 years old was told in an appeal by one Kalra Prasad, Brahman, who was sentenced by the Sessions judge of Farrukhabad to three years' rigorous imprisonment under Section 376, I. P. C. His Lordship upheld the conviction but reduced the sentence to two years.

His Lordship in his judgement said: This appeal exposes in a marked degree the evil effect of the pernicious custom of early marriages, which unfortunately prevails among the lower classes in this country. A man aged 54 years was married to a child of 11 years about a year ago. Her parents, who cannot under the existing law be touched at all, have exhibited in almost incredible callousness in not only getting the marriage performed but in sending the girl to her husband's house to live with him. One cannot use too strong a language to condemn such reprehensible conduct. The result has been what might well have been feared by any man of sense. On a night when the other inmates happened to be away from the house the child wife was raped by her husband. The medical evidence establishes beyond a shadow of doubt that the injury caused to her person were due to sexual intercourse. The evidence to establish the offence is overwhelming, and there can be no manner of doubt about its commission. Partly due to modesty and partly to her being under the control of her husband's relations, the girl does not admit what was done to her and has been tutored to put forward the defence story that she got hurt by falling on a peg to which a goat used to be tied. In face of the evidence of the two lady doctors who examined her internally, this cock and bull story is ridiculously absurd. I am satisfied that the finding of the learned Sessions Judge on this point is correct.

"The learned Judge has imposed a sentence of three years' rigorous imprisonment on the finding that the girl is 10 or 11 years of age. He has remarked: "The matter of her age was especially within the knowledge of her father and her husband and under Section 108 of the Evidence Act the burden of proving this fact was on the defence." They have miserably failed to discharge this burden. The age of the girl may be within her father's knowledge, but the father is not under trial. I agree with the judge in rejecting the evidence of the father who makes out her age to be 14 years. It is obviously to conceal his own disregard for the health of his daughter that he is trying to shield his son-in-law. But her husband's knowledge would be based only on what he might have heard at the time of the marriage since then. I would, therefore, not throw the burden of proof on the defence.

"The learned Judge has also remarked that the prosecution evidence shows that the girl is 10 or 11 years of age. This evidence is that of medical experts. But medical evidence as to the age of a girl under puberty cannot be exact. It is, after all, an estimate, especially when the girl is physically weak and of a delicate constitution. In such a case I think it would be safe to allow at least a margin of one year. It follows that the prosecution evidence is insufficient to establish that the girl was under 12 years of age. In this view the sentence of three years, which exceeds the maximum provided by Section 3 of Act 29 of 1925 (Indian Penal Code Amendment Act) cannot be maintained.

"The limit of the age of consent has been raised to prevent the premature consummation by adult husbands of marriages with children who have not reached the age of puberty, which is undoubtedly productive of grievous suffering and permanent injury to child wives. The act of the accused was brutal and deleterious to the health of the girl and even dangerous to her life. In addition to causing her injuries it brought on fever and unconsciousness. The defence which was put forward was no ignorance of the age of the girl or a misrepresentation by the father as to her age, but a totally dishonest and impossible defence as to the way in which the hurt was caused. There are no extenuating circumstances which would justify me in imposing any sentence smaller than the maximum prescribed.

"I accordingly maintain the conviction but reduce the sentence to one of two years' rigorous imprisonment."

VIEWS ON PURDAH.

In a long letter to Babu Brajeshore Prasad, Babu Ganesh Dutt Singh says that he holds very strong views on Purda and other social matters. "In my opinion", he says "social improvements, specially those directed to improve the physique of a nation are to be attended to first." "In order to stop race deterioration care should be taken of the existing and the future mothers. For this purpose the people may be divided into two sections viz:—

1. Those who have given up all manual labour on account of health and manual position.
2. Those who have to work for the living. The first suffers from excess and second for want. I confine my note to No. 1 because they supply the brain power to the country."

Babu Ganesh Dutt Singh then proceeds to dwell at some length on the causes of this unfortunate result, the most potent of which he thinks is that both men and women have given up physical labour and exercise and the latter are confined within the four walls of the house behind the Purda. The case of womenfolk behind the Purda, he says, is still worse. He draws a picture of their miserable existence behind the Purda and then suggests as to how to ameliorate their existing condition. "In my opinion physical exercise in open air is the only remedy. If this exercise takes the form of work it is still better." Therefore the first thing which you are to do is to tell the people of all ages that they must take care of their health and for it, physical exercise is more essential. Exercise is to be regulated according to age and condition.
Then you are to tell them to be more careful of the health of their womenfolk. In order to improve their health they have to take into consideration these matters:

1. They should be allowed to enjoy pure air and sun light. The first thing which we require in this connection is that the daughter-in-law should have the same position as daughter in the family. Here I again tell you that the condition which I have described is that of the daughters-in-law and not of the daughters. The trouble begins with the marriage. It is a known fact that all females as daughters are almost quite healthy, because they are free to move in their courtyards and have to do some work also. But the moment they become wives the position is changed. Therefore all the daughters-in-law should be given the position of daughters in domestic circles. There is no reason why we should put restrictions upon the daughters-in-law which is not upon the daughters. This is one thing which will improve the health of the females in higher circles 50 per cent.

2. The second thing, which he suggests, is that women should be asked to do some work. Domestic works give them very mild exercises suited to their health. Just see the health of female servants who do all the work of the house. In old times the health was not so bad because the females did something. The females of higher classes not sufficiently rich do these works and their health is quite good. I know that a lady doctor who visited the house of a Raja whose wife was almost invalid and all cases of conception ended in abortion advised him to make his wife work like maid-servants and give some exercises which was essential to improve her health. Her advice was not quite accepted but some arrangement was made for physical exercise and her health improved.

3. The third suggestion is as the time is quite changed, females should be prepared to take part in all matters concerning welfare of the country. The Parda stands in their way. It should be gradually slackened. The first step should be that new and then the female should come out with their husbands or other relatives to walk or drive or go for bath in the Ganges.

4. The fourth is to remove Parda altogether and make them as free as women of the lower classes. I think the province is not prepared for this, though personally I am quite in favour of it. Sometimes the gradual changes take years to produce its result and revolution is much better than evolution.

I have personally advised all the young people who come in touch with me to get rid of it at once. I shall be glad if a Conference is held at Patna and all young men go in a body with their wives to attend it. This Conference should be joined by men of all communities, Hindus, Mahomedans, Bengalees, Bhaarases, Oriyas and so on. In order to achieve it mere notice won’t do. Some of you must go round to convince the young people of its utility and persuade them to be a bit courageous. If they have not sufficient spirit to fight social wrongs in which there is very little risk, you cannot expect better things of them in other directions in which the path is thorny and risky. I see no harm in following the example of Maharatta or Madras.

A Rude Awakening.

My host was a famous English Bishop, well known for his missionary zeal, and a very spiritual personality. My fellow-guest was a full-blood African Bishop, with a deep, impressive, musical voice, a charming man. How could you help liking him? It was a great heartening experience to see the two Bishops, a contrast in the colour of their skins, sitting side by side, and yet so united in their purpose for this world. It was fused an impressive object-lesson of the catholicity of the Christian Church. As this African divine appears in his full episcopal robes in the various cathedrals of this country, the hearers of his spiritual discourses would have no room for doubt in their hearts about the valuable results of Christian missions. "The descendant of Pagan ancestors," as he called himself, now preaching the faith delivered to the saints.

I sat in this interesting company, enjoying the luxury of a heartening Christian experience. How wide and universal was the love of Christ, and how He broke down barriers, how He makes races new, how He makes diamonds from rough stones! But I was soon brought down to this every-day world. I was to realize in a real way that the City of God was not yet built on earth. It came about in this way.

When the African Bishop and I were alone, we talked about various racial problems. For that, to my mind, is the great crucial point that the Church is faced with. The Bishop's words and experience are enlightening. "I may dine to-night with the Lord Mayor of Liverpool, and to-morrow when I go on board the ship I am not fit company for my fellow white passengers. We cannot all of us be like the late Dr. Aggrey and just dismiss the question by humorously pointing out that while the white people had one waiter between two of them, he had one all to himself. This will not solve the problem." From his native land to Plymouth he was alone at a table, and the Britiards would have nothing to do with him. Such isolation is not observed on either the French or German steamers, and this is verified by many other African and Asiatic passengers. Somehow it is left to the Anglo-Saxons to give expression to their racial prestige in this manner! But what "stagerrated and shocked" the Bishop more than anything else was that on the same steamer there were two English missionaries, whom he knew quite well, and in whose houses during his tours in his diocese he had been invited for meals, but these two though they saw him sitting alone at a table, never thought it advisable to sit by his side. It would have been against the conventional attitude of the others and not the thing to do. And yet those men will talk at missionary meetings when on deputation about their great love for the African! The incident makes one think furiously, and one may well be reminded that "all our doings without charity are nothing worth." That African servant of God to-day is a disillusioned man and carries a wounded spirit. It was a rude awakening indeed, and challenging in its call to build Jerusalem here on earth in our generation. But it demands a great cost. The Christian World London.

SOCIAL WORKER'S TRAINING CLASS.
Assistant Secretary writes—The Social Service League, Bombay, has decided to organise a class for the Training of Social workers for a period of about eleven weeks beginning from 7th July 1928. The class will be held at the Head Office of the Social Service League, Girgaum. Assistant Secretary.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Indian Music Conference, Bareilly—InRemingting Jill on the theological Seminary campus a Bangi Sammelan or Indian Music Conference was held at 5.30 p.m. on the 8th May. Mr. Sardar Pad Murerji, B.A., L.L.B., Vakil, High Court, was the President. Mrs. prominent Hindus and Mohammedans were present. The Hall was appropriately decorated. About 250 people attended the descent and were rewarded by hearing an exceptionally interesting and high class programmes. Special features were Ustad Mehdi Hassan's Tabla tarang, Mr. Inayat Malik's Dhrupad and Prof. E. P. Chansky's Harmonium playing. Indian classical music is not frequently heard in public gatherings in these days and the excellent rendition gave music lovers a treat for which they were enthusiastically grateful. A Committee was formed to take charge of the Sammelan and plan occasional gatherings of this sort. Mr. Sardar Pad Murerji was elected President, Prof. Chansky of the Sammellany, Raja Chitrakot patron. The Rev. J. Devaldass, Principal of the Seminary was active in arranging the Conference. It could not have been so successful without his help. The audience felt greatly indebted to him and to Prof. Chansky for their part in starting what we believe will be one of the most delightful features of inter-community social life in Bareilly in the coming years. Such Conferences are not merely entertaining, they raise the standard of music appreciation and exert a finely cultural influence.

Shivaji Memorial—Standing over 16 feet, the Shivaji statue unveiled at Poona on the 16th Instant is regarded as the largest bronze cast erected in India. The working committee decided that such national memorial of a great national hero should be national in every possible way and entrusted the work to the Indian artist, Mr. Karmerkar. The statue is only one part of the memorial, which includes a historical museum and a library for Indians especially Maharashtrian history, with provision for research work and publication of works on Maharashtrian history. By the next year it is expected that the statue will form the centre of sixty lines of buildings to house the historical material. A feature of the list of donors to the funds is the co-operation of Muslim as well and Hindu sections of the public in contributing to it. The generous scales of contributions is also remarkable and it is expected that a sufficient surplus will be left for a large all-India fund to organise a research scheme.

Prevention of Child Marriage Bill—The widespread interest which is being kindled throughout India by Haji Bubhar Fatehali Sada's amended Bill called the Child Marriage Restraint Act 1918, is an indication to the great change in public opinion, which is everywhere evident. Throughout India educated women are organizing meetings in support of this Bill. The Bombay Presidency Women's Council in co-operation with numerous other women's societies is holding a public meeting of women to support this Act, at the Wilson College Hall Chowpatty at 4.30 p.m. on Wednesday June 27th. The amended Bill is general in its scope and applies to all classes and communities in British India. The first provision determines the age of boys as 18, of girls as 14, below which age marriage should be punishable.

The following classes come within the penal provisions of the Bill:—(a) Male adults who marry young girls. (b) Persons who perform any essential ceremony of Child Marriage, and (c) Parents and guardians who promote or permit child marriage.
 provision has been made in the Bill to avoid the risk of frivolous prosecution in such a measure of social reform which is directed against customs which have been so long established and is so widely prevalent in India. We are confident that the great majority of thinking women in Bombay are strongly in favour of this Bill—indeed many women would have preferred the age to stand at 16 and 21 respectively—and that they will do their utmost to make the meeting on the 27th a success. It is not enough to merely wish Godspeed to the Bill, women must attend the meeting in large numbers and thus show Government and the Public that they are really in earnest and wish to see the Act become Law. The Women's Council office, Town Hall, will be held to receive signatures of all who desire to support this Bill.

Anti-Purdah Campaign.—A movement has been set on foot in Bihar for the abolition of the time-honoured custom of ‘pardah’ and discarded the veil by a number of prominent Brahmin men and women. A strong appeal has been signed and addressed to the public on this question by some influential people including Babu Braj Kishore Prasad, Hon. Babu Mahendra Prasad, member of the Council of State, Hon. Babu Angrah Narayan Singh, member of the Council of State, Babu Jagat Narayan Lal, M. L. C., Babu Daulat Sahay M. L. O., and Babu Chandrakumar Prasad Narayan Ghose, M. L. C. The signatures to the course of their appeal state that “we have arrived at the conclusion that the purdan or an undeniable institution, being responsible for inveterate. Our growth and progress in many directions and it should not be allowed to continue a day longer than it can be avoided. Whatever may have been the justification for its introduction into the scheme of our life, it is difficult to defend it now on any grounds, rational or human. We hold that the system is repugnant to the genius of our culture. We want that the women of our province should be as free to move about and take their legitimate part in the life of the community in all particulars as their sisters in Kashmir, Manerashtra and Madras in an essentially Indian way.”

It is proposed to start an ideal institution in the province for training the women in domestic economy, hygiene, midwifery, literature, music, etc., and making them useful citizens and worthy mothers and at a preliminary step meetings will be organised all over the province on 8th July next in order to launch a regular campaign for the abolition of purdah.

NOTES.

Age of Consent Committee—As the result of the debates in the Legislative Assembly, the Governor-General-in-Council has decided to appoint a Committee to inquire into the law relating to the age of consent as contained in Sections 375 and 376 of the Indian Penal Code. The Committee, which will start work at an early date, will be composed as follows:—Chairman: Sir Morepant Vishwanath Joshi, late Home Member of the Executive Council of the Governor of the Central Provinces. Members: Ral Bahadur Pandit Kanhaiya Lal, late Judge of the Allahabad High Court, Mr. A. Ramaswami Mudaliyar, lately Member of the Madras Legislative Council, Khaq Bahadur Mahabub Mian Imam Baksh Kadri, lately District and Sessions Judge in the Bombay Presidency and now Chief Judicial Officer of Junagarh State, Mrs. M. O'Brien Beudon, Superintendent, Victoria Government Hospital, Madras and Mrs. Brij Lal Nehru. The Secretary to the Committee will be appointed hereafter. The legal and Judicial elements necessarily predominate in the composition of the Committee. The principle of communal representation in this Committee or in the Auxiliary Education Committee of the Statutory Commission has been followed, to the neglect of that of territorial representation which is tending to take a back place in Indian politics. There are three Brahmins, including the Chairman one non-Brahmin, one Mahomedan, one European and one lady who is also a Brahmin. The Chairman is from the Central Provinces, and the Mussalman member is a Bombay official. Madras supplies two members, the non-Brahmin, the European lady doctor and the United Provinces the same number. Bengal, Bihar and Oudh, and the Punjab have no representatives. Sir Hari Singh Gour who, it had been announced, will be a member, has evidently not found it convenient to join the Committee. The composition of the Committee cannot be said to be satisfactory. The subject of endogamy is one in which an intimate knowledge of social conditions in the castes, and areas in which child marriages are most prevalent, is necessary to arrive at just conclusions. This consideration has not been kept in view in the composition of this Committee.

Bhavnagar Administration—Among the Kathiawar States Bhavnagar has always been pre-eminent for its interest in educational advancement. It has nearly 500 institutions of all sorts for a population of 45,000, and spends about 4 lakhs out of an average annual revenue of almost one rupee per head of the population. About one crore on education. Its educational equipment includes a first grade Arts College and four High Schools. Girls' education receives a fair share of attention. The Dakshinamurti School receives special mention in the Administration Report. It is a hostel and school combined where experiments in new methods are freely tried. It is one of the few institutions in India where the Montessori method has been introduced. It is conducted by a band of life members. The Report notes as a significant indication of the awakening among the classes that hostels for students are being opened by various communities. Bhavnagar is a Prohibition State, the manufacture, import and sale of country liquor having been prohibited several years ago. The import and sale of foreign liquor is now prohibited except for medical and special purposes for which a store of liquor is maintained by the Medical Department. Purchasers are kept showing names and castes of purchasers together with a record of quantity purchased. The sale is confined to Bhavnagar town only, and the liquor is issued in small quantities and only in cases of real need. There is no complaint of any difficulty in enforcing the prohibition policy. The fact is that the Durbar sincerely believes that it is for the good of the people and the State to prevent drinking and as public opinion tends the same way, the working of the measure encounters little opposition.

Bhavnagar Women Support Sarda Bill—The women of Bhavnagar mustered strong in the Wilson College Hall on Wednesday evening to register their cordial support to the Bill of Mrs. Sahil Harbhuja. Sarda for the prevention of child marriages, now pending before the Legislative Assembly. The speech of the evening was that of Mrs. F. N. Sifar who condemned in strong terms the pernicious custom of child marriages and the mental and physical deterioration resulting from them. She challenged those who opposed legislation on the ground that Hindu marriage was a sacrament to show how it could be under the existing conditions, she observed: "One wife for a man, a woman, that is the highest condition of married life, then alone can it be called sacrament. But what do we see, a man has the liberty to marry..."
as many times and discard as many wives and a woman is supposed to marry once and worship her husband as God. If either of the two parties retain the idea of a sacrament it is woman. Well, I do not want the woman to come to a lower standard, but what I would like to emphasise and where I would like to appeal to the Government is that women by upholding the higher standard have earned the privilege to demand that a change be made in the age of marriage when they are convinced that such a change is absolutely necessary for the well-being of the country.\[81x124\]Child-marriages were in vogue in all communities and in all countries but they had outgrown this custom and adult marriages are the order of the day. Hindu society alone has clung to it with superstitious veneration. Signs are not wanting that there is also an awakening among the Hindus to retard the marriage of girls till they are long past the ridiculous age at which it was claimed that shastras required them to be launched into marriage. It is a matter of common knowledge that shastric injunctions are made a convention of being cited to set up a dead wall against the progress and to the winds where they affect the material progress of the community. The very shastric people who quote chapter and verse against the raising of the marriage age for girls should be reminded to their discomfiture that they have given the go-by to shastras whose own profession is concerned! Then why make a fetish of them and condemn thousands of girls to immature wifehood, and motherhood and to the cruellest of "hoods"—widowhood—even before the meaning of marriage has dawning on them.

Separatist Movements:—The great achievement of British rule in India was the political unification of the whole country for the first time in her history. A common system of laws, administration and education, which knew no caste or creed, did much to consolidate thepolitical unity. Suddenly, however, the process has been reversed, and the separatist tendencies are again in full swing. The first set-back was the differentiation between communities for franchise purposes. This virtually abolished the common citizenship in British India, and introduced a communal one. The older generation of Indian leaders protested against this retrogression, but a later and more expedient generation accepted and endorsed it. Under the influence of the Non-Co-operators, the National Congress adopted the principle of dividing up the country into language areas and now we have a similar claim urged on communal grounds. It would seem as if the work of British rule is gradually falling into pieces and that the post state may not likely be worse than the first.

Mr. Andrews' Reply to Miss Mayo:—Mr. C. F. Andrews has been contributing a series of articles to Young India setting the truth from falsehood in Miss Mayo's book. His opinion should carry weight as his love of India and insight into things Indian is far from the common. Mr. Andrews cites authorities to prove that the significance of marriage is not the same in India as in the West. He takes the opinion of the Census Commissioner of the United Provinces, where he says "Marriage among the Hindus means no more than irrevocable betrothal. The parties do not begin to live together as husband and wife, but after the lapse of an indefinite period, generally not less than one and not more than five years." Mr. Andrews' diagnosis of the evil custom will throw further light as to why it has persisted so long. Unlike Miss Mayo, Mr. Andrews takes due recognition of the fine of reforms along which it is sought to medley this evil. The reason why Hindu parents are often in such a hurry to get their children married is very simple. The caste divisions have become so elaborate that now they number well over a thousand with all the subdivisions reckoned in. This limits the area of choice to a very considerable degree, because inter-caste marriages are very rare, up to the present time. Therefore the father is anxious to obtain a suitable match for his daughter and cannot brook delay. For it is commonly regarded as a social disgrace in India to have a daughter reach womanhood without marriage. Two things would immensely accelerate the movement towards that abolition of child marriage, which every reasonable man in India desires. The former is the encouragement of intermarriages between subdivisions in the same caste. The second is the spread of women's education.

Mahatma's Ashram:—We make no apology for giving much space in this issue to an account of the Satyagraha Ashram at Sabarmati. It is the first full and authoritative account of this world-famous institution that has been published, and will, we are sure, be read with interest and preserved for future reference by many readers. The Ashram has grown from small beginnings to its present proportions comprising numerous constructive activities, besides being one of the foremost institutions in the country for training men and women in social service.

New University for Madras:—A press communiqué says:—The Government have had under consideration for some time the project for a university teaching and residential college at Chidambaram. placed before them by Sir Annamalai Chettiar who has offered to transfer the collegiate institutions founded and managed by him at Chidambaram together with an additional sum of twenty lakhs of rupees towards the endowment fund for the new university. Considering the unique nature of the generous offer and the fact that the best educational opinion in the country has since the publication of the Sadler Commission Report steadily favoured the growth of residential and teaching type of university, Government have come to the conclusion that they should not miss the opportunity of encouraging private effort in the cause of public instruction and establishing new university of the type admittedly the best though yet unknown in the presidency. Government will make an endowment of twenty lakhs towards the scheme, 75 lakhs for building and equipment and a recurring grant of one and a half lakhs per annum. The proposed university will include faculties in science, arts, commerce and oriental learning and provide for residence and instruction for about 1,000 undergraduates at a total cost of five lakhs per annum of which about two lakhs will be met from fees and one and a half lakhs from provincial funds. The Bill, incorporating the scheme, will be published at an early date and Government expect to be in a position to take it up for consideration at the next session of the Legislative Council.
THE ROYAL AGRICULTURAL COMMISSION'S REPORT.

The Report of the Royal Agricultural Commission is a harmless, unnecessary but at the same time bulky document. Its swift passage to the dust and oblivion of the upper shelf is assured. The Commission took two years and six months to produce it. The most energetic reader can scarcely hope to peruse it with understanding under two or three months. It is evident that the Report is meant for the information of the hardy and scarcely hope to read it. They fully realize the importance of the subject in question, the Report is vitiated by the all too common vice of foreign schemes for improving a country, namely, ignorance and neglect of the value of experience even as the basis of research. The Report is compiled a huge mass of information, relevant and irrelevant. There can be no doubt that it was meant honestly to make a solid contribution to the problem of the Indian cultivator. But it was handicapped at the start by some of the most vital issues bearing on the question, such as land tenure and assessment, being expressly excluded from their purview. The Indian complaint is that the land tenure has been progressively trammeled by harassing restrictions, and that the methods of assessment are arbitrary and inequitable. The Commission has nothing to say on these questions which are exercising the minds of the cultivating classes. The Report is too abstract and too detached from the most pressing questions of the day, to be of interest to the workaday world of India. The starving man is told that if he applies himself to scientific research, he will in course of time be able to entertain himself and his friends and relatives to sumptuous feasts whenever he wants. The British press as in duty bound extols the monumental Report of the Commission. Some new appointments will be created at high salaries and some third-class British scientists will be installed in them with a great fanfare of trumpets. The members of the Commission will get titles in the New Year's Honours list, and some of them may get something more substantial in the shape of office. But the cultivators, working as much as he has done all these years. His lot can be improved only by an administration which realises that its first duty is to India and Indians.

The contrast between the point of view of the practical administrator with an intimate knowledge of Indian conditions and that of a Commission consisting mostly of amateurs, is very striking in the matter of improving Indian breeds of cattle. The Royal Commission almost despairs of doing this and, indeed, thinks that the Indian climate is not favourable to cattle-breeding. Hume's view is markedly different: "The Indian climates, varying as these do, appear to be specially favourable to cattle. Every one who has kept cattle here, knows that if moderately fed, and given plenty of work, and kept away from contagion, they never seem to be sick or sorry, but work on hardy and healthy from youth to extreme old age. They are very prolific too. If our poor hearts had only reasonable fair play, the whole Empire would swarm with cattle, cattle able to work the heaviest ploughs, and, in soils and situations where this was necessary or desirable, to plough as deep as you like."
THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER [June 30

CRITICISM
(By Dr. Clifford Manshardt, Ph.D.)

"He took the suffering human race, He read each wound, each weakness clear; And struck his finger on the place, And said, 'Thou art sin and there.'" Matthew Arnold.

One of the most cherished rights of the free citizen is the right of thinking for himself and the right of expressing his thoughts. Throughout the ages of history there has been a long struggle between reason and authority, which in spite of certain modern indications to the contrary, seems to have issued in the general acceptance of the principle of freedom. The nation that lays claim to being civilized must submit its claim to this onetouchstone and must be judged in accordance with its success or failure to meet the test. Outward evidence of material prosperity are not enough, the real test of a nation's greatness is found in the freedom of its peoples. A nation that restricts the press, that restricts public discussion, and tries to prescribe the limits of its citizens' thought, fails to that degree in fulfilling the possibilities of its nationhood. Suppression never has provided and never will provide the basis for a sound and healthy society.

But criticism, although of value, also has its limits. We need desperately men who will point out the weaknesses of modern society. We need social diagnosticians—men who will touch their fingers to the place and tell us where we are. We need "calamity howlers" for though the pictures that such men present may be much overdrawn, they generally contain enough of truth to set us thinking, and to see if we can discover a way out. Visit a book-store and note the large number of titles dealing with an impending crash of civilization. Scan the better grade magazines and note the number of articles devoted to the same subject. There is a general feeling abroad that something is wrong with the world, and that strenuous measures must be taken to ensure civilization's recovery.

A man would be foolish to deny the general truth of this contention. All is not well with us. It takes neither a particularly wise man nor a philosopher to recognize it. But at the same time one cannot but feel that the tendency today is to deal too much with social disease. In the last few years we have changed many of our ideas about the function of medical men. The doctor used to be regarded as a man to heal the sick. If a person fell ill he generally accepted first the advice of his friends and neighbors about his ailment, tried a few home remedies, and then if he appeared to be getting worse, sent for a doctor as a last resort. There the job of the doctor was to cure him. But today we are placing a great emphasis upon preventative medicine. We call our doctors not simply when we are sick, but we consult with them as to how to keep well. We undergo systematic treatment for the purpose of maintaining our health and strengthening our bodies.

The figure seems to carry over to the social field. Our writers have poor old society stretched out on the table and are doing their best to save her. One wants to amputate a limb, another wants to take out her tonsils, and another lays the entire trouble upon the teeth. And in the meantime the patient suffers. We must not disparage the efforts of the diagnosticians. We need more and better ones. But it would seem that we also need preventative doctors.

Instead of always asking the question, what is wrong with society? let us change the question to what is right with society? Instead of seeking to discover the ailments, let us seek means of strengthening the heart, lungs, and other vital organs. What is good in society? Well obviously we have our schools. Alright, let us strengthen our schools and make them better and better. We have the great potential power of religion. Let us use religion as a vital agency in the development of a better world. We have our social and political organizations. Let us develop them and make them of a better and higher character. We have much latent idealism, waiting to be captured and turned into creative channels. Let us make a bid to enlist this idealism in the service of the nation.

Let us not lose the critical faculty, but let us emphasize still more the faculty of construction.

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN IN INDIAN MINES.

The Government of India have followed their draft regulations, published last week, for prohibiting the employment of women underground in mines, by a communiqué, announcing detailed proposals indicating that from 1st April 1929 the number of women employed in the exempted mines (the coal-mines in Bengal, Bihar and Orissa and Central Provinces and the salt mines in the Punjab) should not exceed the average number employed in 1926 and thereafter a ten per cent reduction in numbers would be made annually, so that all women will be excluded from 1st April 1939. In all other mines it is proposed women will be prohibited from working finally from 1st April next.

The regulations relate only to underground workings and do not interfere with employment of women labour in quarries and other open workings.

Objections and suggestions, relating to the regulations, which are received before 1st October, will be considered by the Government.

MINES UNSUITED TO WORK.

The communiqué points out the draft regulations were framed in May 1927 and, as required by the Mines Act, were forwarded to the mining boards for their views. In referring the question the Government of India, after discussing the arguments... against excluding women from the coal-mines in particular, observe: "But these considerations, important as they are, do not, in the opinion of the Government of India, outweigh the serious objection to an indefinite continuance of the employment of women underground. The physical conditions in the majority of Indian coal mines are no longer such as to make it desirable that women should be employed in them. In only a very small percentage of such mines is there any arrangement for artificial ventilation. Workings are growing on an average steadily, deeper and more extensive, temperatures are in consequence increasing gradually, and in many mines the humidity is very high. The use of explosives has greatly increased of recent years and the risks run by women in mines are increasing. In 1925, 28 women were killed in mining accidents and the number of the injured every year must be large. The character of work and conditions under which it is done make it undesirable that women's employment underground should be continued for longer than is necessary to enable the industry to adjust itself to the new conditions."

EXCLUSION UNIVERSAL.

"The public opinion in India, apart from those directly interested, is strongly in favour of the exclusion of women. The principle that women should not be allowed to work underground in mines has long been accepted in nearly all civilized countries, and there are no sufficient reasons for continuing in India a practice, generally abandoned elsewhere. Nor are economic arguments entirely on one side. The exclusion of women has the support of a large number of those persons, closely acquainted with mining conditions, who hope that it will tend to increase the efficiency of labour, and there is reason to believe that the employment of women in large numbers tends to lower, rather than to raise, the standard of living of an average miner. Further, the fact that reform is desirable and inevitable sooner or later is recognized even by those who are opposed to any immediate steps being taken.

"This being the case the question resolves itself into one of time, and the points for consideration are:—(1) is the present time suitable for the initiation of reform? (2) What time should be allowed for the completion of any programme for exclusion if it is adopted?"

TWO POINTS EXAMINED.

"As regards the first question there is no reason to believe that further delay will make the problem appreciably more simple. The demand for labour in the coal industry at any rate is now less keen than it has been for some years, and the present time therefore in some respects is particularly suitable for taking the first step. It is quite possible that a change in these conditions may result in a large increase in the demand for labour, which would reinforce opposition and increase dislocation to the industry involved in the exclusion of women."

"As regards the second question, it is recognized that so far as it concerns the coalfields in Bengal, Bihar and Orissa and Central Provinces any measures for the exclusion of women must be gradual in their operation. A summary exclusion of women would result in a very serious dislocation to the industry and the enforcement for a measure of this kind would arouse the maximum of opposition and might prove completely impracticable."

GOVERNMENT CONCLUSION.

The Government of India accordingly proposes, that except in the main coalfields and in the Punjab salt mines women should be excluded from underground working in the mines from 1st July 1926, and that thereafter there should be put into operation in the main coalfields and in the Punjab salt mines the system of gradual exclusion, which would result in the complete exclusion of women by 30th June 1935.

After considering the replies received, the Government of India observe that they consider that time is now opportune for the initiation of measures designed to lead, within a specified period, to the exclusion of women from underground work in mines. They have modified the original proposals mainly in the direction of extending time for the gradual exclusion of women in coal mines and salt mines. Hence the decision announced—

IMAGES OF BUDDHA NEAR CHITTAGONG.

Great interest has been aroused in historical and archaeological circles in the discovery near Chittagong of a number of bronze images of Buddha dating back a thousand years. The Statesman understands that the Government of Bengal contemplates acquiring the collection, under the provisions of the Treasure Trove Act, for the benefit of the public. It is at present in the keeping of the Archaeological Survey, which department it was handed by the late Mr. G. W. Davies, formerly Collector and District Magistrate, and will probably, be housed in the Indian Museum.

MINIATURE TEMPLE.

The bronze figures which include a miniature temple studded with semi-precious stones and 63 images of Buddha were discovered by a Mahomedan living in the village of Thewri near Chittagong during excavations for the foundations of a new house he was building.

News of the find was immediately sent to Mr. Davies who took steps to ensure that the relics should be guarded carefully while awaiting instructions from the Government which now intends, it is understood, to offer a substantial reward to the finder.

Representing Buddha at the period of his enlightenment and at different stages of contemplation, the images vary in size from 2 to 15 inches in height.
Archeological experts have formed the theory that the images were worshipped in some Buddhist monastery and were buried by the priests when the monastery was invaded, probably about the 19th century.

The dedicatory records inscribed on the images and their style definitely prove them to date as far back as the 7th to the 10th century A. D.

The discovery, it is stated on reliable authority, forms a valuable link in the history of Indian Art particularly in its relation to Burma. Some of the images show exceptional artistic skill and all are in a perfect state of preservation.

SATYAGRAHA ASHRAM.

This Ashram was opened on 25th May, 1915. A constitution was drawn up when it was founded. It underwent a revision during my incarceration. The Ashram had undergone, Its unexpected expansion was ample excuse for the delay, I know that my subconscious self would give me permission the first draft fell from my shoulders. Though the Ashram represents a binding constitution by the Managing Committee. It is published purely as a draft, though pending revision it is to be accepted as a binding constitution by the Managing Committee. It is published in order to secure the opinion of friends and critics known and unknown of the Ashram. Any criticism or suggestions that may be sent will be thankfully received. I may be permitted to mention that the Ashram represents a prayerful and scientific experiment. The observances are many but they have been tested for the past 15 years of the existence of the Ashram. Whilst it is impossible to claim their perfect fulfillment by any one of us, the workers have in all humility tried to enforce them in their lives to the best of their ability and with more or less success. The curious will find that the new draft bears very close resemblance to the original constitution as it was drawn up in 1915. M. K. G.

Founded on Vaishakh Shudi 11th, Samvat 1974, May 25th, 1915, at Kochrab, and since removed to Sabarmati.

OBJECT

The object of this Ashram is that its members should qualify themselves for, and make a constant endeavour towards the service of the country, not inconsistent with the universal welfare.

The following observances are essential for the fulfillment of the above object:

I. TRUTH

Truth is not fulfilled by mere abstinence from telling or practising an untruth in ordinary relations with fellow-men. But Truth in God, the one and only Reality. All other observances take their rise from the quest for, and the worship of, Truth. Worshippers of Truth must not resort to untruth, even for what they may believe to be the good of the country, and they may be required, like Buddha, s imply to disobey even the orders of parents and elders in virtue of their paramount loyalty to Truth.

II. NON-VIOLENCE OR LOVE

Mere non-killing is not enough. The active part of Non-violence is love. The law of love requires equal consideration for all life from the tiniest insect to the highest man. One who follows this law must not be angry even with the perpetrator of the greatest imaginable wrong, but must love him, wish him well and serve him. Although he must thus love the wrong-doer, he must never submit to his wrong or his injustice, but must oppose it with all his might, and must patiently and without resentment suffer all the hardships to which the wrong-doer may subject him in punishment for his opposition.

III. CHASTITY (Brahmacharya)

Observance of the foregoing principles is impossible without the observance of celibacy. It is not enough that one should not look upon any woman or man with a lustful eye; animal passion must be so controlled as to be excluded even from the mind. If married, one must not have a carnal mind regarding one's wife or husband, but must consider her or him as one's life-long friend, and establish relationship of perfect purity. A sinful touch, gesture or word is a direct breach of this principle.

IV. CONTROL OF THE PALATE

The observance of Brahmacharya has been found from experience, to be extremely difficult so long as one has not acquired mastery over taste. Control of the palate has therefore been placed as a principle by itself. Eating is necessary only for maintaining the body and keeping it a fit instrument for service, and must never be practised for self indulgence. Food must therefore be taken, like medicine, under proper restraint. In pursuance of this principle one must eschew exciting foods, such as spices and condiments. Meat, liquor, tobacco, bhang etc. are excluded from the Ashram. This principle requires abstinence from feasts or dinners which have pleasure as their object.

V. NON-STEALING

It is not enough not to take another's property without his permission. One becomes guilty of theft even by using differently anything which one has received in trust for use in a particular way, as well as by using a thing longer than the period for which it has been lent. It is also theft if one receives anything which one does not really need. The true truth at the bottom of this principle is that Nature provides just enough, and no more, for our daily need.

VI. NON-POSSESSION OR POVERTY

This principle is really a part of No. V. Just as one must not receive, so must one not possess anything which one does not really need. It would
VII. PHYSICAL LABOUR

Physical labour is essential for the observance of Non-stealing and Non-possession. Man can be saved from injuring society, as well as himself, only if he sustains his physical existence by physical labour. Able-bodied adults must do all their personal work themselves, and must not be served by others, except for proper reasons. But they must, at the same time, remember, that service of children, as well as of the disabled, the old and the sick, is a duty incumbent on every person who has the required strength.

VIII. SWADESHI

Man is not omnipotent. He therefore serves the world best by first serving his neighbour. This is Swadeshi, a principle which is broken when one professes to serve those who are more remote in reference to those who are near. Observance of Swadeshi makes for order in the world; the breach of it leads to chaos. Following this principle, one must as far as possible purchase one's requirements locally and not buy things imported from foreign lands, which can easily be manufactured in the country. There is no place for self-interest in Swadeshi, which enjoins the sacrifice of oneself for the family, of the family for the village, of the village swadeshi, which enjoins the sacrifice of oneself for the country. There is no place for lands, locally manufactured for order in the world; the breach of it leads to chaos. Following this principle, one must as far as possible purchase one's requirements locally and not buy things imported from foreign lands, which can easily be manufactured in the country.

IX. FEARLESSNESS

One cannot follow Truth or Love so long as one is subject to fear. As there is at present a reign of fear in the country, meditation on and cultivation of fearlessness have a particular importance. Hence its separate mention as an observance. A seeker after Truth must give up the fear of parents, caste, Government, robbers etc., and he must not be frightened by poverty or death.

X. REMOVAL OF UNTouchABILITY

Untouchability, which has taken such deep root in Hinduism, is altogether irreligious. Its removal has therefore been treated as an independent principle. The so-called untouchables have an equal place in the Ashram with other classes. The Ashram does not believe in caste which, it considers, has injured Hinduism, because its implications of superior and inferior status, and of pollution by contact are contrary to the law of Love. The Ashram however believes in varnasamaj dharma. The division of varnas is based upon occupation, and therefore a person should maintain himself by following the hereditary occupation, not inconsistent with fundamental morals, and should devote all his spare time and energy to the acquisition and advancement of true knowledge. The ashramas (the four stages) spoken of in the smritis are conducive to the welfare of mankind. Though, therefore, the Ashram believes in varnasamaj dharma, there is no place in it for distinction of varnas, as the Ashram life is conceived in the light of the comprehensive and non-formal varnasya of the Bhagavad Gita.

XI. TOLERANCE

The Ashram believes that the principal faiths of the world constitute a revelation of Truth, but as they have all been outlined by imperfect man they have been affected by imperfections and alloysed with untruth. One must therefore entertain the same respect for the religious faiths of others as one accords to one's own. Where such tolerance becomes a law of life, conflict between different faiths becomes impossible, and so does all effort to convert other people to one's own faith. One can only pray that the defects in the various faiths may be overcome, and that they may advance, side by side, towards perfection.

ACTIVITIES

As a result of and in order to help fulfilment of these observances, the following activities are carried on in the Ashram:

1. WORSHIP

The social (as distinguished from the individual) activities of the Ashram commence every day with the congregational morning worship at 4-15 to 4-16 and close with the evening prayer at 7 to 7-30. All inmates are expected to attend the worship. This worship has been conceived an aid to self-purification and dedication of one's all to God.

2. SANITARY SERVICES

This is an essential and sacred service and yet it is looked down upon in society, with the result that it is generally neglected and affords considerable scope for improvement. The Ashram therefore lays special stress upon engaging no outside labour for this work. The members themselves attend to the whole of the sanitation in turns. New entrants are generally first of all attached to this department. Trenches are sunk to the depth of nine inches and the nightsoil is buried in them and covered with the excavated earth. It thus becomes converted into valuable manure. Calls of nature are attended to only at places assigned for the purpose. Care is taken that the roads and paths should not be spoilt by spitting or otherwise.

3. SACRIFICIAL SPINNING

Today India's most urgent problem is the growing starvation of her millions, which is chiefly due to the deliberate destruction by alien rule of her principal auxiliaries-industry of hand-spinning. With a view to its rehabilitation in national life, spinning has been made the central activity of the Ashram, and is compulsory for all members, as a national sacrifice. The following are the various branches of work in this department:

I. Cotton cultivation;

II. Workshop for making and repairing spinning wheels, spindles, carding bows etc.

III. Ginning;

IV. Carding;

V. Spinning;
VI. Weaving cloth, carpets, tape, rope, etc.
VII. Dyeing and printing.

4. AGRICULTURE

Cotton for the Khadi work and fodder crops for the cattle are the chief activities of this department. Vegetables and fruit are also grown in order to make the Ashram as far as possible self-contained.

5. DAIRY

An attempt is being made to convert into a model dairy the Ashram dairy which supplies milk to the inmates. Since last year this dairy is being carried on in consonance with the principles of and with pecuniary help of the All-India Cow Protection Association, but as an integral part of the Ashram itself. There are at present 27 cows, 47 calves, 10 bullocks, and 4 bulls. The average daily output of milk is 200 pounds.

6. TANNERY

At the instance of and with the help of the All-India Cow Protection Association, a tannery has been established for the tanning of dead-cattle hides. There is attached to it a sandal and shoe-making department. The dairy and tannery have been established because the Ashram believes, in spite of the claim Hindus make to the protection of the cow, that Indian cattle will further and further deteriorate and ultimately die out, carrying man along with them unless vigorous attention is paid to cattle-breeding, cattle-feeding and the utilisation in the country of dead-cattle hides.

7. NATIONAL EDUCATION

An attempt is made in the Ashram to impart such education as is conducive to national welfare. In order that spiritual, intellectual and physical development may proceed side by side, an atmosphere of industry has been created, and letters are not given more than their due importance. Character building is attended to in the smallest detail. ‘Untouchable’ children are freely admitted. Women are given special attention with a view to improving their status, and they are accorded the same opportunities for self-culture as the men. The Ashram accepts the following principles of the Gujarati Vidyapith:

1. The principal object of the Vidyapith shall be to prepare workers of character, ability, education and conscientiousness, necessary for the conduct of the movements connected with the attainment of Swaraj.

2. All the institutions conducted by and affiliated to the Vidyapith shall be fully non-co-operating and shall therefore have nothing to do with any help from Government.

3. Whereas the Vidyapith has come into being in connection with the Swaraj movement, and Non-violent Non-co-operation as a means thereof, its teachers and trustees shall restrict themselves to those means only which are not inconsistent with truth and non-violence and shall conscientiously strive to carry them out.

4. The teachers and the trustees of the Vidyapith, as also all the institutions affiliated to it, shall regard untouchability as a blot on Hinduism, shall strive to the best of their power for its removal, and shall not exclude a boy or girl for reason of his or her untouchability nor shall give him or her differential treatment having once accorded admission to him or her.

5. The teachers and the trustees of all and the institutions affiliated to the Vidyapith shall regard hand-spinning as an essential part of the Swaraj movement and shall therefore spin regularly, except when disabled, and shall habitually wear Khadi.

6. The language of the province shall have the principal place in the Vidyapith and shall be the medium of instruction.

Explanation—Languages other than Gujarati may be taught by direct method.

7. The teaching of Hindi-Hindustani shall be compulsory in the curricula of the Vidyapith.

8. Manual training shall receive the same importance as intellectual training and only such occupations as are useful for the life of the nation shall be taught.

9. Whereas the growth of the nation depends not on cities but its villages, the bulk of the funds of the Vidyapith and a majority of the teachers of the Vidyapith shall be employed in the propagation of education conducive to the welfare of the villagers.

10. In laying down the curricula, the needs of village dwellers shall have principal consideration.

11. There shall be complete tolerance of all established religions in all institutions conducted by and affiliated to the Vidyapith, and for the spiritual development of the pupils, religious instruction shall be imparted in consonance with truth and non-violence.

12. For the physical development of the nation, physical exercise and physical training shall be compulsory in all the institutions conducted by and affiliated to the Vidyapith.

Note:—Hindi-Hindustani means the language commonly spoken by the masses of the North—both Hindu and Musalmans—and written in the Devanagari or the Arabic script.

The Ashram school has so far sent forth 15 boys and 2 girls.

8. KHADI TECHNICAL SCHOOL

A separate technical school is conducted which prepares candidates for the Khadi Service on behalf of the All-India Spinner's Association. There are at present 33 students from various provinces under training. 205 students have so far availed themselves of this school. The curriculum is as follows:

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 25 years, taken effective steps to establish their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premium in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

Birth Control or Self-Control?: The advocates of Birth Control are not content to support their propaganda on its merits. They have of late begun to decry those who think that self-control is the only legitimate means of birth-control. The Birth Control Review writes that "Now priests and Roman Catholics of high station declare that it is wrong to bring children into the world when the parents are unable to care for them. But the only method to be used is "self-control". By self-control these self-appointed law-givers of the human race mean actually celibacy in marriage, for anything short of celibacy would not prevent the family from increasing by a baby every year. The ideal goal preachcd to the world by these unmarried hierarchs is therefore that, when the limit has been reached and husband and wife realize that they must be no more babies, the marriage shall practically be dissolved. Marriage is utterly incompatible with celibacy. Sexual union has a great spiritual and moral purpose wholly apart from reproduction. It is necessary to hold husband and wife together, to keep harmony in the home, to enable the parents to live in love and companionship and to bring up their children within the bonds of a united family." The whole argument here hinges on the assertion that "anything short of celibacy would not prevent the family from increasing by a baby every year." The absurdity of this assumption is evident from the fact that few couples have a baby every year, though they know nothing of birth-control. The Birth-Control enthusiast overlooks the fact that there are many circumstances connected with occupation, opportunity, and religious and moral methods, to speak of physical well-being, which operate as a practical check on the incessant sexual intercourse which they assume to be normal and necessary incident of married life. Marriage, we are told, is utterly incompatible with celibacy. But it is perfectly compatible with continence, and in fact, without continence marriage is only legalised prostitution. The Birth Control advocates' basic assumption is thus extravagant. "Sexual union has," it is further said "a great spiritual and moral purpose wholly apart from reproduction." It is true that when a man and a woman love each other intensely sexual union is sanctified by their love, but sexual union as such can have no spiritual purpose any more than eating or sleeping which are both physiological necessities.

The Bardoll Dispute:—Two members of the Servants of India Society, Messrs. Kirti Shankar Basu and S. G. Vaze, with the help of Mr. A. V. Khakkar, whose work among the jungle tribes of Chota Nagpur is well-known made an independent enquiry into the re-settlement of Bardoli Taluka, and have made a report which compels assent by its detached and dispassionate statement of facts. The report makes it clear beyond a shadow of doubt that the procedure laid down for ensuring the fairness and accuracy of the data on which recommendations for revision are based, has been perfunctorily gone through, that the Settlement Commissioners acted arbitrarily in deciding to dispense with all other data except rental values which in many cases covers interest on debt and other charges besides being artificially inflated by the absence of other reliable industrial avenues of investment, and that the Government themselves have assigned no reason for pitching the increase at the rate which they have adopted. Messrs. Kunzru and Vaze endorse for these reasons the demand for an independent enquiry prior to finally determining on the revised assessment. There is no sense in maintaining, in the face of the facts clearly set forth in their report, that there is no case for another enquiry. We hope, therefore, the Government of Bombay will lose no time in appointing a committee of officials and non-officials who are likely to command public confidence, to go into the matter. The conclusions of this Committee, unless they are flagrantly defective, should be accepted as final both by Government and the Bardoli ryots. We are not of those who under-rate the importance of prestige to a Government, but in a case like this we think that it will be enhanced by complying with a reasonable demand while it will be lowered by blindly adhering to a mistaken view.

Indian States Committee:—The Indian Office has issued a communiqué to correct misconceptions regarding the Indian States Committee now in England. It states "The Committee at the beginning of March last issued a questionnaire to 255 States in India. Of this number 103 are members of the Chamber of Princes in their own right, while the Rulers of the remaining 127 are entitled to representation on it in the capacity of 12 of their Chamber. Of the 108 States, the Rulers of which are members of the Chamber in their own right, 32 have up to the present intimated that they do not wish to send individual replies to the questionnaire but that their case will be represented by the Indian States Committee through the Standing Committee of the Chamber of Princes and the Right Hon. Sir Leslie Scott, P.C., M.P., who has been engaged by the Standing Committee to place their case before the Committee. Twenty States, on the other hand, have sent in individual replies to the Committee. Of the 127 States, the Rulers of which are entitled only to representation in the Chamber, 21 have intimated that they will be represented by the Standing Committee and Counsel, while 12 have up to the present sent in individual representations. The total number of replies received so far is therefore 85, and the total number of replies outstanding is 150. The statement that Sir Leslie Scott has been engaged by the Standing Committee of the Chamber of Princes is incorrect. One chief took upon himself the responsibility of inviting Sir Leslie Scott, and subsequently tried to persuade his brother princes to constitute him as their legal representative to present their case to the Committee. He has only partially successful in his attempt.

A Lesson from the East:—Notwithstanding the sinister propaganda against India and the East, thoughtful Europeans recognize that there are some things in the East which the West may adopt with advantage. Mr. Douglas Duff Anisile, who is described as a Scotman of wide social and diplomatic experience, writes in an article in the Daily Telegraph about the senseless chatter at dinner in European countries. It may not be generally known that Society men and women maintain regular notebooks in which all the funny things they read or hear of, are duly recorded, and that before starting for a social function they turn over its pages with a view to utilizing some of the stories as impromptu at suitable intervals at the dinner or evening party. It is an unwritten law of social etiquette that, however old and stale the story may be, the latter of it should not be embarrassed by being told that it has been told before. Mr. Anisile suggests that the East may be taken as a good model in this matter. "There," he says "it is quite possible for all to sit silent for some minutes at a dinner party of twenty, if some one speaks it is pretty certainly because he has something to say worth the bearing and all lend an attentive ear." The defect of the Eastern practice is that women are excluded, and this is easily remedied. The fact is that the Indian looks at meals from a different angle from the European Orthodox Hindus, like Buddhist monks, will preserve perfect silence at meals. Even the sound of mastication should be subordinated as possible. To the average Indian nothing is so boring as to endure the insipid jokes which are supposed to constitute conversation at dinners in the European style.

Caste and Religion:—The Prabuddha Bharat in the course of a thought-provoking article headed 'Whither India?' observes: "Long ago speaking of the caste system, Swami Vivekananda stated that it has no relation with religion, that it was a purely socio-economic institution and that confusing it with religion is a mistake of many social reformers from Buddh down to Ram Mohan Roy. Of great interest also is the get rid of this confusion and cease to talk of the Hindu religion only, but of the Indian religion. Leaders also often make the mistake of thinking that because books regulating socio-economic life are written in Sanskrit and are ascribed to rishis, therefore they are religious. The real Hindu religious books are quite clear about the difference between the Shruti and especially, Vedanta, and the Smritis. And successive religious teachers have often pointed out that religion has nothing to do with formal obedience to the rules of the Smritis. No doubt this confusion exists to a certain extent in the popular mind also. But blind and almost religious faith in the established rules is a characteristic not of the Indian masses only, but of the mass mind in every land. Cannot our leaders at least get rid of this confusion and cease to talk of the Smritis as religious books?" In fact, the confusion caused by the failure to distinguish between the Hindu religion and Hindu social customs, is largely responsible for the attacks made by foreign observers on Hinduism. The Varna-shrama-dharma is not a permanent part of Hinduism any more than capitalistic society is a permanent part of Christianity.
A NATIONAL DRESS FOR INDIA.

Mr. G. Venkatachalam contributes to New India of June 28, an article in which he pleads for a common national dress for Indians. Environment, he says, goes a long way to mould the character of an individual, if not actually to make it. Dress is a part rather of a man’s personality than of his environment. Stript of his clothing a man is merely Carlyle’s “forked radish” and perhaps, unless he is a professional athlete or an acādāsta Sannyasin, feels like one. From the time they took to wearing clothes, men have recognised the influence of clothing on their minds. A Judge or a bishop in his robes thinks more judicially and episcopally than in a layman’s clothing. The soldier in uniform, likewise, will do things without a qualm which he would hesitate to do in civilian clothes. A common national dress is certainly a useful means of promoting a common national feeling. “In India,” says Mr. Venkatachalam, “religious sentiment is a strong factor in life, and from time immemorial people in this country have adopted certain types of dress for religious purposes and certain other types for secular ones. The former dress can remain in vogue even in these days as they are highly sanitary and most suitable for the purpose; the much-needed reform lies in the latter direction. The present day dress all over India is anything but desirable; it is a jumble of all sorts, half-oriental and half-occidental, ill-suited to the climate of the country and positively ugly and monstrous.” He specially dislikes “the open-collar coat of the European, with a collar and tie or without them, introduced almost unreasonable. dress,” he writes, “has given place to the open-collar coat of the European, with a collar and tie or without them, introduced almost unreasonable. The latter direction. The present day dress all over India is anything but desirable; it is a jumble of all sorts, half-oriental and half-occidental, ill-suited to the climate of the country and positively ugly and monstrous.” He specially dislikes “the open-collar coat of the European, with a collar and tie or without them, introduced almost unconsciously into our daily dress, which makes such an ugly combination with the turban and ghuti. He refers to “a kind of sensible Indian dress of a kurta, dhoti and upper cloth which, for a long time was contemptuously spoken of as “Adyar Dress” and which is now at last becoming a type of national dress.” He adds that the khadi movement of Gandhi gave it a great push and today it is almost a fashion to go about dressed in that way.

We should not have noticed this similarity had not our attention been called to it, because it has been our general impression that while a theosophist is often sanctified, the Gandhi-ist is apt to go to the other extreme and make his clothes as conspicuously unartistic as possible. Mr. Venkatachalam recommends as the most suitable dress for Indians, both for outdoor and professional work, “a long closed-neck coat, like sher-wani, a loose pyjama like punjaban or a tight pyjama like surmal or fuchkar breeches, and a turban or a cap for the head and some kind of soft slippers, like Delhi chadao. “This kind of dress,” he says, “can be made of silk, wool or cotton, according to the means of the person, and to suit the climate of the place, and also be worn either in white or in colours. It is indeed difficult to imagine a more picturesque and dignified group of people than in the above dress. One of the most arresting sights in the Imperial Capital at Delhi is the gathering together of the Indian Princes who look so dignified, so majestic and so noble, clad in dresses of the above style. This type of dress is not the sole monopoly of the royalties; it can be universalised and made democratic as it is done among the Muslims.” For home-wear and for social functions, he recommends as the most graceful, beautiful and comfortable, the ‘Adyar dress’ consisting of “a white cotton or silk kurta, ghuti, and a chuddar to be worn over the upper body, and leather sandals”. We confess we do cannot think much of the out-door style recommended by Mr. Venkatachallam. It may be suitable for Princes whose principal business is to look “dignified, majestic and noble”; but it is much too grandioso for the work-a-day world.

Imagine an Indian judge doing an operation in a long coat and a voluminous turban! The late Mr. Govinda Das in his book on Indian Ethics has dealt with the question of a national dress for Indians in a more practical spirit. He has, moreover, treated of the dress not only of men but also of women. Unfortunately, he too gives preference “as the most becoming head dress” for a man to “a coloured and artistically rolled up safa as used in the Punjab.” This, however, is meant only for high ceremonial occasions. For outdoor works he advocates the use of sun-hats which, though not pretty, are exceedingly useful. The prejudice against their use, he condemns as most unreasonable. “With regard to the rest of the dress,” he writes, “it is gradually changing and people are taking more and more to the English style. This, in some modified shape, will in time displace all the old styles.” Mr. Govinda Das was evidently not much perturbed by the prospect. And he is right, as the European dress is more compatible with active habits than the Adyar-Gandhi combination. The Japanese, the Turks, the Chinese and the Afghans have all adopted the European style officially, and Indians, too, are doing the same. We would not waste a tear over the change. Mr. Venkatachallam will not say of the Japanese or the Turks that “sping of the West in their dress betrays not so much their slave-mentality as their incapacity to realise the want of self-respect in them as a nation and the seemingly utter bankruptcy of a National culture.” Mr. Govinda Das thinks that the establishment of Museums in the larger cities of every province, containing life-size figures, dressed in all the varieties, is likely to be of great educative value in this matter of evolving a national dress.
CHANGE AND PROGRESS.

(By Dr. Clifford Mansbridge, Ph.D.)

The recent strikes throughout India have again raised the oft-discussed question as to whether change, as typified by our modern inventions and industrialism, is also representative of the progress. The India of to-day is different from the India of a century ago, but is the difference on the side of progress? The India of the industrial centre is different from the India of the villages, but is the difference a loss or gain? Change there has been, but has there also been progress?

Consider the case of the villager as compared with the factory employees at the large industrial centre. Both men have come originally from the same stock. The one has followed in the family tradition, while the other has placed himself on the side of change. Which is the better off? On the face of it, the argument seems to favour the man of the village. His wants being few, they are easily satisfied. Working in the open air, he has every opportunity to develop a healthy body. Living in his own house, he is less likely to fall a prey to the diseases that endanger life in the crowded city chawls. Taking life in a more leisurely way, he is not driven to the moral excesses that so often ruin the lives of his nervous and over-stimulated city brothers. Being near his relatives, and friends of many years standing, he does not face the same economic fears that haunt the city worker. He is buoyed up with a certain sense of security. And even though the lot of the villager may in many ways be drab and hard, he has a feeling of independence and freedom that is not the portion of the man who lives each day after a fixed mechanical routine.

Thus it is clear at the outset that change is not synonymous with progress. On the other hand, change is a condition of progress. The fact that the industrial worker does not appear to be as well off as the agriculturist is not an argument against progress, but an indictment of the way in which men have used the new forces at their disposal. Progress, as we understand it, is dependent upon the direction that men give to the social forces involved in change. To a certain extent man is a victim of his environment, but to a much larger extent he is a shaper of it. And where social mal-adjustment is most acute he has not shaped wisely. Had the social engineers of the last generation used the same intelligence as the industrial engineers, we should not be in the muddle that we are to-day.

But the industrial revolution was a strange phenomenon, and so instead of endeavouring to direct it, our sociologists for the most part watched it, as a small boy gazes at his first meeting with an elephant. The results are apparent—industry, over-developed; humanitarianism, under-developed. Whether we can catch up with the start that mechanisation has got upon us remains to be seen. Certain it is that there are signs of progress—and here we use the word in the best sense of the term.

There are manifold indications that man are endeavoring to shape the forces of change towards human ends. As Professor Hobhouse has so well pointed out, "Men, on the whole, mean right, but let their lives be wrecked by petty things, egoisms, vanities and misunderstandings. Human nature is somehow better than its own performance, a paradox the explanation of which lies in the fact that clear purpose and unified will are the late developments of those primary tendencies which in their dim groupings may merely frustrate one another." To-day we are still in the period of grouping and frustration, but an increasing number of men are beginning to think straight and to regulate their business lives in accordance with an ideal. And because in time that which is ethically valid will conquer that which is invalid and partial, we confidently expect that change which to-day often appears in the light of a menace, will be purged and revitalised into human progress.

THE ASHRAM AND SOCIAL REFORM.

(By Mr. C. Veer Monak.)

Nothing is so striking in the whole realm of Indian Literature as the high honour and regard in which the ashram has been held by all sorts and conditions of men. Even in the sunny heyday of India's prosperity, when Scythians, Chinese, Huns, Persians, Greeks and Romans had pressed round stretching their blood-stained hands in turn to possess her, but had failed, in Vikramaditya's golden age, Kalidasa sings with innate pride of the fascinating simplicity of the ashram. Its influence on thought was recognised by sages. Its effect on society was acknowledged by kings. India had her intrepid patriots and glorious monarchs. There were the Statesmen, the virtuous and the wise. But India selected the Rishi to be the representative of men. She gave her best sons to the ashram, and brought her choicest gifts. The ashram from its unknown seclusion regulated the social and moral life. It inspired the poet to sing, the mystic to see, the artist to carve the visions of a higher plane. But down the centuries that succeeded, getting entangled in internecine conflicts, India seems to have changed. The change was transitory; but it has left effects not too soon to be effected. As a matter of hard fact if these evil effects are to be blotted out it will have to be by a restoration to the time-honoured Ashram Ideal. This ideal it seems has inspired among others a handful of magnanimous Englishmen, led by Sir Devadatta Shastri, himself an Englishman, who, in the true spirit of tyaga, have given up flattering posts, attractive home-life, enviable social positions to come to India, this Land of Sorrows, to serve her through their Ashram which is on the outskirts of Poona. Some of these men are not of the best products of Oxford. Some of them were thriving men of craft. Some of them were respected dons at Oxford. But they live now in a humble ashram dwelling, bathed in the sun, with many windows without shutters; sleeping in their narrow cells, eight feet by six, with just a blanket spread.
on the stone floor and a rug to cover. They wear coarse Kshetra robes. Kshetra bhajans have taken the place of piyas. Sandals and not shoes are on their feet. They sit for meals on the floor. They eat with their fingers. They are strict vegetarians.

Aloha is not to be mentioned within the Asram.
All dharma work is done by themselves. They work on the last. They tell side by side with the coolies in carrying stones or lime or sand. To identify themselves with their poorer brethren they are learning to spin. They are brahmacharins, and when they take vows shall be parabrahmacharins or celibates for life. Hardships and privations of the severest kind are accepted so cheerfully and the most arduous manual labour done so willingly that a patriotic spectator is thrilled that for his country these noble foreigners are doing so much. "What are you doing" his conscience asks. "Are you even helping them?" he questions, and dissatisfied, or "are you hindering such gallant builders in their work of building in a nation's heart the memorial of love?"

The spiritual side of the Ashram is refreshing. They assemble in a make-shift of a mandir to kneel on carpets (dear-skies not having been presented to them yet) and offer their bhakti six times in a day; or sit in dhyanayaga for long hours. From 9 a.m. to 9 p.m. the following day they observe main to allow tho's3 to make offerings, or sit in dhyanayaga for long hours. From 9 a.m. to 9 p.m. the following day they observe main to allow tho's3 to make offerings. Their bhakta are in Marathi, their sankadas in Sanskrit. One can hardly expect them to pick up these languages so soon, but they are wrestling with the onerous task. It is an encouraging fact that three Hindu Sansuas have visited this Ashram for spiritual guidance; one of them has expressed a desire to choose a guru from among them. It simply manifests that their desire to be Indian in every possible way has not failed to win the hearts of true Indians. But it is an open challenge to India, firstly, to match these Englishmen by her own sons, (for although at present there are Indian members in the Ashram they are not yet a match for their colleagues!) and, secondly, to offer her best gifts in that unsulliterated spirit of dharma which moved donors in ancient India like Janaka and Dacaratha. Will Aryavarta, proud of her spiritual and cultural heritage, permit Englishmen singly to suffer and attempt so much for an Indian cause? allow English money to finance such an Indian ashram? I call it an 'Indian' ashram for four reasons: it is in India, its atmosphere is Indian, it is based on Indian principles, and it is run for an Indian purpose. Of course it is Christian, the name is Krishna-Viara-Sangh Ashram. But Christ is no foreigner or alien to India. When Keshub Chander Sen can prophesy "None but Jesus, none but Jesus is worthy to wear this precious diadem, India; and Jesus shall have it." When Narmayan Vaman Tilak can ask "When shall I see my country lay her homage at the feet of Christ?" and when Netasen can bring out a book on "Indian Christians," surely Christianity and India are no aliens! Indeed, it is being recognised more and more, and perhaps for the first time, that Christ is no

Europeanized Jew sent out by the diplomatic west to conquer the heart of a great nation for perpetual political selfishness; but the Universal Prince of Peace, the Anant of Love, and the Hero of freedom. This is what the Saugh proves, and in no storm of platform oratory but in each smile of private intercourses. For, they are not out to angle for converts, but to show the way, the truth, and the life to those who will use their eyes. The highest ideals of Christian teaching, the loftiest principles of Hindu thought are raised as criteria here. Whether in matters of dharma or karma they are resolved to set up as standards for themselves and for India and the world only the best, culled from any age and clime. In rituals they are as much Indian as Christian doctrines will allow. In outlook they are more sympathetic than many England-retumed Indians! In short, in deed, word and thought they wish to be true men, true Indians, true brahmas of God.

What is their programme of work? To stay with them for a week, as I did only a month ago, is the best way of knowing them and their work: and visitors are ever welcome. But let us briefly survey what they are doing; as without this knowledge we shall scarcely understand how this particular ashram is more than the Gurukul Salarwati and Shantiniketan ashrams will influence Society, and in days to come, affect its machinery. The Krishna Seva Sangh seems to combine the bhakti, gyan, and karma marajas into one krisha-Seva-marga. Not each separately, but the three conjointly is going to be their one marja. This is the essential difference. 'Unity in the midst of diversity' is their slogan, as it used to be the slogan of Ancient Aryavarta: and thus by breaking down the superficial hedges that have grown between each marja this Ashram has levelled out for itself a wider scope of activity, which will need a huger output of energy—for what returns? This heroism alone seems to deserve our full following, our free love, and our instituted Co-operation. Will it not be a signal achievement if the Krishna-Seva-Bangh Ashram can prove in practice that bhakti, gyan and Karma, felt so long to be distinct, aloof and individually sufficient, can be so united that the union yield richer fruit of sweter savour? Thus, they, they offer devotion at the Lotus-feet of God amidst all the rapture of bells and incense. When weather permits they sit in the open, and while Nature communes with her Lord's they are own souls in loving worship. They study the Hindu Dharmastras and Yogasutras with keen zest, to try that 'brave emprise' of Yoga whereby the soul may attain Samadhi. But this is not all. They get divine strength to do active work. Their social service comes next. They arrange student-camps to mould the youth of the land, the coming pillars of the state, according to the healthiest and purest and trust principles of religion and ethics. They have bands that visit prisons to console and uplift the fallen and the black sheep of all communities. They venture on famine-relief work to save from utter starvation as many as they can regardless of caste or creed. They visit hospitals to breathe peace and solace into dying ears. They conduct campaigns to find and help the needy and the sufferer. And all this is done by such as live in poverty. Barriers of caste are there none for them; and they will leave no stone unturned to remove from Indian soil these barriers that have grown formidable in these sixteen centuries. A. D.

Not only does this Ashram train Sadhus who will continue a contemplative life; but it trains true citizens eager to serve the beloved motherland. Not only does it afford opportunities of Sadhan to those that need them; but it teaches practical piety to be of use in every walk of life. Not only does it shelter the refugee persecuted by the fanatics of worldliness and sorrow; but it makes him a true servant of God. It sets up a standard of Indian Christianity that must one day influence Indian Christians to come back to the simplicity of ancient India in the mode of life, and her spirituality in the matter of thought and action. It teaches not only patriotism and upajadha, but right and self-sacrifice. Will this not affect Indian Society? It will mean a religious-social reformation in time to come. By coming in contact with the Ashram many of us will give up our mock-grandeur, our westernized habits, many of us will learn the motive power of self-sacrifice, that corner-stone of every noble work. It will mean reformed community of Indian Christians who are proud of being Indians, glad of being of service to India. It will mean a reformed society of Indians working without prejudices of caste or creed for the common weal of the demoralized motherland. It will mean a transformed nation of brothers, purged with hypocrisy, whimper than snow. Looking then, at the vast, unbounded range of possibilities ahead of this small seceded beginning no Indian heart can forbear to throb in union with the piling heart of this Ashram; no Indian soul can restrain its flow of sympathy. For those who would like to know more the address is, the Acharya, Krata Seva Sangh Ashram, Agricultural College, P. O. Poona. I am told the members are ever willing to enter into friendly discussions and start correspondence with new friends. For me it is enough to know and to trust that Aryavarta, who has always respected Martyrs, Saints, and Sages, will not take long to recognize the splendid endeavour of this hermitage, or to contribute her share materially, intellectually and spiritually towards such admirable and laudable work.

AGE OF CONSENT BILL

The Government of India have published a resolution appointing a Committee on the Age of Consent Bill promoted by Sir Hari Singh Gour.

The terms of reference are—(1) To examine the state of the law relating to the age of consent as contained in sections 375 and 376 of the Penal Code, especially in regard to its suitability to conditions in India. (2) To inquire into the effect of the amendments made by the Indian Penal Code (Amendment) Act of 1925 and to report whether any further amendment of the law is necessary, and, if so, what changes are necessary as regards offences (a) without and (b) within the marital state. The committee will visit such places as they may consider necessary and will take evidence on the questions stated in the terms of reference.

The object of Sir Hari Singh Gour's Bill is to raise the age of consent from 14 to 16 outside the marital relationship and to protect married girls between 13 and 14.

A FULL INVESTIGATION.

A resolution published by the Government of India on the subject states that the question of raising the age of consent as prescribed by section 375 of the Indian Penal Code has been agitating the public mind and engaging the attention of the Indian Legislature for some time. In 1922 Bai Bakshi Sohan Lal introduced a Bill in the Legislative Assembly with the object of raising the age from 12 to 14 years, both within and outside the marital relationship. The Bill was not only introduced for the purpose of eliciting opinions, but the Legislative Assembly refused to commit it to a Select Committee. In 1926 Sir Hari Singh Gour introduced in the Legislative Assembly an identical Bill which was referred to a Select Committee. The Bill, as amended by the committee, was circulated for the opinion and it was reconsidered to a Select Committee. It was, however, rejected by the Assembly.

OFFICIAL MEASURES.

Then the Government of India themselves introduced a Bill on lines settled by the Select Committee. It raised the age of consent from 12 to 14 years outside and to 15 within the marital relationship and provided for separate punishment for sexual intercourse by a man with his own wife when she was below 15, but not under twelve years of age. This Bill became law as Act XXIX of 1925.

Sir Hari Singh Gour promoted further legislation in March, 1927, with the object of raising the age of consent from 14 to 16 outside the marital relationship and protecting married girls between 13 and 14 years of age. The Bill has been circulated for opinion.

In the course of the debates on this Bill the promise was made on behalf of the Government of India to appoint a committee to investigate the whole matter as it appeared to them that the appointment of such a committee would stimulate and concentrate public opinion with a view to formulating lines of further possible advance. Accordingly, the Governor-General-in-Council has decided to appoint a committee which will start work at an early date.

Persons who desire to be called as witnesses should apply in writing to Secretary, care of Home Department, Government of India, Simla, giving their full names and addresses together with a brief memorandum of the points in regard to which they desire to give evidence. It will, of course, rest with the committee to decide what evidence they will hear. The chairman of the Committee is Sir Moropant Joshi.
Mrs. P. K. Sen presided over the first session of the Tirhut Divisional Women's Educational Conference held in June 20. About six hundred ladies attended the Conference and delegates from various centres of the Division were present. Among other women present were Miss C. C. Das, Mrs. J. S. Misra, Miss Munshi Lakshmi, Mrs. R. Krishna, Mrs. D. Prasad, Mrs. J. Jain, Miss S. Nandan Sahaya, Sm. Anurupa Devi, Mrs. D. Prasad, Miss B. Day (Assistant Inspector of Schools, Tirhut Division), Mrs. S. B. B. Basu, Mrs. Durga Devi Soteti, Mrs. Deobir Prasad Singh, Sm. Kanta Devi and Sm. Sarda Kumari Devi (Editor, Mahila Darpan). The proceedings which were all carried in Hindi, began at 3 p.m. with the opening song and a concert by girls. Sm. Anurupa Devi the president, Reception Committee, cordially welcomed the delegates and the visitors. Mrs. P. K. Sen was then proposed to chair.

In the course of her address the president said:—

The important aspect of the work of the All-India Conference is to do away with the social evils which exist amongst us to-day such as Child Marriage "Purdah" etc. which are impeding our national progress. The next aspect of it is to build up a scheme of education as will uplift, enoble, and make our younger generations better mothers. If the All-India Conference is held at Patna next January, it will not be for only a temporary excitement, but for solid substantial work in the immediate future. Let us confer with the sisters of Maharashtra, Guzrat, Madras, Punjab, and other parts of the great Continent and take effective steps for initiating wholesome public activities. A simple God-fearing dutiful life in our homes and an equally fruitful life in the service of our community is what we look for and strive for. In this respect we have much to learn from our sisters from the other Provinces. We have no doubt that social service on national lines is possible without neglecting the work of our own homes.

The presidntial address was over, Miss Banilata Dey pointing out the necessity of women's education said "We have assembled here to-day to discuss the problem of women's education. By education, it does mean not only book-learning but real culture of body, mind and soul, the right development of all our faculties by which human life may come nearer and nearer to perfection. This is needed equally for men and women, more for women as they are the mothers and the teachers of the next generation." Condition will not improve, she continued, unless women themselves begin to work for the cause. The speaker then referred to the condition of education in this district which was deplorable and exhorted the women in India to attain the ideals of Indian womanhood in keeping with the past glory of Tirhut and the high ideal of Sita Devi.

Several other speakers supported the views of Miss Banilata Dey. "Resolutions were" then passed.
emphasising the necessity of religious, mental and physical culture of women, condemning early marriage and the very pernicious system of "Pardas."

Kanta Mahā Vidyalaya, Jullundur.

Shrimati Shanno Devi, Headmistress of the Kanya Mahā Vidyalayas, Jullundur, who has recently pledged herself to collect a sum of Rs. 100,000 for her Institution, arrived at Simla with a band of estimable workers including L. Pivara Lal, Vakil, Joint Secretary of the Vidyalaya, Pt. Sri Han, Advocate, President of the Jullundur Arya Samaj, L. Jaganath, Vakil, a member of the Vidyalaya managing committee and Dewan Pindi Das Choudhuri, Personal Assistant to the President. The Vidyalaya is by now well-known has been commended for its work by many leaders and eminent educationists. It has attached to it a Widow's Home where the inmates are trained to a life of usefulness to the society as teachers and preachers. It maintains also an Orphanage the members of which have proved highly useful to the Vidyalaya. The direct need of the institution is a permanent Fund, adequate to yield an interest to meet its current monthly charges. It is hoped the importance of the Institution will be realised by the public and a due measure of help will be forthcoming.

SAINT OR STATESMAN.

Harold Berman writes in the Birth Control Review — There is one characteristic that really, if not invariably, distinguishes the Saint and Preacher, turned leader, from the statesman and the born leader of men. Both of them aim to lead their people into the path of righteousness, political and social well-being and material prosperity. Both of them sincerely desire to see the happiness of their people based on solid and just foundations, to erect a state that is to endure for as long a time as it is possible for a political organism, the creature of man's limited gifts, to endure. But each of them is seeking to accomplish this desired end by means of his own peculiar lights, which are the fruits of his own inner light and psychology, aided and abetted by his training and environment.

REALITY OR IDEALITY.

The born statesman, even the most idealistic among the tribe, is essentially a realist. He must, in his sincere desire to mould or to remodel a nation, take full cognisance of things as they are, both in the psychology of the people that he essays to lead, and in the external and surrounding circumstances. In other words, while the statesman's ultimate view may sometimes be the prismatic and dazzling tints at the end of the rainbow, his point of departure must ever be the corporate reality, as well as the frequently vulgar actuality. The priest and moral preacher, on the other hand, usually ignores vulgar and unpleasant reality altogether, but fixes his gaze steadily upon the distant and ever receding abstract Ideal of Perfection. He is not burdened by any superfluous and hobbling baggage of actuality, but does not invariably bring along an excess baggage of Dreams of Perfection, of a paradisal blissfulness and a well-being that is as complete as it is faultless and impossible. Being hardly, if at all, aware of vulgar actuality, knowing but little of human nature and its weakness, he abhors compromise, decries any and all concession to be made to human frailty, the give-and-take arrangement that forms the basic structure of orderly human life in any and every form of society.

The result is that the saint and preacher in politics invariably ends up in failure. If he is not corporally and literally burned at the stake, in the deplorable manner of Savonarola and his unhappy imitators of all times, he is at least burned vicariously, or in effigy, by the speedy undoing of his life-work. The achievements of Cromwell did not outlast his own span of life; nor did the work of others of his ilk who sought not to effect reforms within the structure of a certain society, but reconstruct it, in toto and after their own, admittedly beautiful design.

TOLSTOY AND GANDHI.

The past-half century has afforded two outstanding and glorious examples of the saint turned statesman and his total failure to achieve anything lasting in the affairs of men—Tolstoy and Mahatma Gandhi. Both these remarkable men had led a conventional life up to a certain, and mature, periods of their career. For a time they both accepted society, with all its faults and virtues, as they found it. They sought neither to change it nor to improve it over much, but merely to live in it. They mingled with their fellow-men, shared their pleasures and indulgencies, developed their weaknesses, their virtues and qualities, esteeming good that which the rest esteemed good, and vice versa. All of a sudden, and by the workings of some mysterious inner soul-chemistry, they experienced a total change of heart. They, like Paul on the road to Damascus, suddenly beheld the light, and they became transformed. The light that they beheld, however, was not of this earth, but of a distant, deity-frequented Elysium. And in Elysium, men have not corporal bodies but only incorporeal, ethereal souls, and these possess no failings, and are hampered by no weaknesses. They have been stripped of all selfishness, jealousies, greed, as well as passions. And the flat goes forth from these vision-seeing preachers that all corporal, earth-bound beings must henceforth be recreated in that perfect image, become as perfect as these spirits are.

POINTS OF RESSEMBLANCE.

There are several striking points of resemblance between these two social and political reformers, Tolstoy and Gandhi. Both of them were determined, outspoken and uncompromising opponents of the government of their respective fatherlands. Both of them preached in all seriousness the paradox of overcoming tyranny by the means of a complete and negative non-resistance. Both of them exalted labor and the handicrafts, and enjoined their practice as a sacred duty under each one of their adherents.
(though there was no identity of motive in the two instances). And both of them eventually came around to the preaching of the suppression of the sexual impulse in the human being excepting its indulgence for the procreative purposes, as a great desideratum, as a means of elevating the human race.

It is quite true that Tolstoy propounded his thesis (in his "Kreutzer Sonata," issued in 1889) out of purely religious or moral motives, while Gandhi's motives in his manifestoes is to be found in the over-population of his native India and the many problems that arises from it. Yet it remains a fact that both of these Saints turned Statesmen have seized upon the most utterly impractical and even impossible remedy for an ailment, be it moral, physical or economic, that smirrily does exist in our society or a great portion of it, and that both of them considered the normal functioning of the human animal, in the only form that Nature has cut out for him, as fraught with sin and born of iniquity.

One may go further and say that, even as it was not the non-resistance preachment of Tolstoy that finally redeemed Russia from the oppressions of the Romanoffs, but rather the very much active resistance of the people, backed by their soldiers' guns when turned against their own commanders, equally so has the non-co-operation movement of Gandhi failed to bring about the liberation of the Hindus from the galling yoke of the British oppressors. The saint in politics, no matter how pure are his intentions and lofty his visions, reasons not at all from the premise of reality, but rather from the premise of the abstract, the premise of desire and hope. He discovers a fountain of perfection in his own soul, and totally overlooks the imperfection that lodges in all other people's souls.

There is yet another point to the argument. If Tolstoy's impossible gospel was preached frankly as a moral panacea Gandhi's gospel is being seriously advanced by him as a cure for the manifold economic evil that so thickly beset his India. And herein the propounder of this strange thesis has erred not only once but twice. For, not only is his saintly advice entirely impossible to follow on purely physical or economic grounds, but exactly also does exist in our society or a great portion of it, and that both of them considered the normal functioning of the human animal, in the only form that Nature has cut out for him, as fraught with sin and born of iniquity.

One may even go further and say that, even so it was not the non-resistance preachment of Tolstoy that finally redeemed Russia from the oppressions of the Romanoffs, but rather the very much active resistance of the people, backed by their soldiers' guns when turned against their own commanders, equally so has the non-co-operation movement of Gandhi failed to bring about the liberation of the Hindus from the galling yoke of the British oppressors. The saint in politics, no matter how pure are his intentions and lofty his visions, reasons not at all from the premise of reality, but rather from the premise of the abstract, the premise of desire and hope. He discovers a fountain of perfection in his own soul, and totally overlooks the imperfection that lodges in all other people's souls.

The question before us is one of overpopulation of a certain country; of the too great reproductive increase in the average Indian family. Viewed from this angle, what appreciable difference does it make in ultimate results whether man indulges his appetite freely, or only once in, say six months, or even once in an entire year? The final result would still be the same, and that particular country still would be suffering from over-population, as well as its consequent economic and social evils. But, such over-population are the fruits of satianness applied to practical, every-day life, and such are the solutions that Saints and Apostles are able to propound to be very real and knotty problems of everyday life, and such is their efficacy!

THE SYNTHETIC GENIUS OF HINDUISM.

Hindu genius is essentially synthetic. Hindu culture has survived by continual adaptation of inner relations to our relations—the Hindu race has managed to live through the ages, by continually adapting itself to its environment. Had it failed to adapt itself to its surroundings it would have been wiped out of existence.

When there was a conflict between the Aryan and the non-Aryan culture in the land—we find Goutama the Buddha attempting to reconcile one to the others on the basis of world-reconciliation and world-compassion. Again in course of evolution when the Hindu thought and culture ranged itself against the Buddhist thought and culture, Sankara, who was looked upon as a crypto-Buddhist, appeared on the scene to effect a reconciliation between the contending streams of spiritual aspirations. His Advaitavatams, his gospel of renunciation, his institution of the orders of sanyasins and the founding of the monasteries was a noble attempt to harmonise the Brahmanic culture with the Buddhist. Again with the advent of Islam, the need of a new synthesis arose.

We have a long line of Bhakats and seers in the Islamic period that have added to the lustre of the lists of the world's great mystics—Ramanuj, Ramananda, Kabir, Tulsiadas, Nanak, Tukaram, Namdev, Chaitanya and others who brought about glorious synthesis between the Hindus and the Islamic ideals and aspirations.

With the advent of Christian culture with its humanitarian and scientific outlook there came the new challenge needing a reconciliation and harmony. Keshub and Pratap, to my mind typify the attempt to bridge the gulf between the Christian thought and the much needed reconciliation between Hindu and Christian life and thought. It has often occurred to myself to think that Higher Hindutva and Higher Christianity are like two crotaluses of one seed—they are like the two sides of the same curve. The higher Hindu thought is concerned with an inassible mystery—one Brahman,—Christianity offers its homage to an ideal man. The Hindu is out in quest of Sat, Chit and Ananda. The Christian lays its heart-offering at the altar of a suffering God. The Hindu's aspiration is directed towards the achievement of Pragya but Christianity stakes its all for the realisation of self-consuming Love.

There is certainly a place for Love in Hindu discipline. But Bogards has well said that the Hindu is concerned with vertical love, i.e., love for the transcendent mystery and the Christian love is horizontal love for humanity. The vertical and horizontal love are required to be synthesised. The Hindu religion is essentially mystical, the Christian religion is primarily ethical.
I believe it is Maxmuller who has somewhere said that the man who knows only one language does not know that language properly. Similarly it might be said that a man who owes allegiance to one religion only has not the allegiance of the right type to that religion. A Hindu who ignores Christianity is false to his own religion, similarly a Christian who fails to see the truth of Hinduism is unable to appreciate his own religion properly. I believe that the names of Keshub and Pratap will go down to posterity as those who made the first serious attempt in modern history to effect a reconciliation between the Higher Hinduisim, Higher Christianity—and their work will endure and bear fruit and bring peace to a world distracted.

Veteran Journalists’ Experiences—Ir Mr. Venkataramiah the Veteran Journalist of Mysore, who is as active in his 84th year as in his youth, “writes in his paper, the Mysore Patriot: Our respect for the advice of Mr. R. Bangshadi, the First Dewan of Mysore, we took to journalism. If we had the least idea of the pains and penalties that attach to honest and fearless journalism, we should have been the last to become a journalist. For over half a century we have suffered the .morning pains of hell and even to day we find it impossible to take off the journalist’s toga; the burdens of those whom we served with earnestness and enthusiasm turned against us. One of the Dawns whom we served with sincerity devotion and who fell out with us for calling a spade a spade in a certain case, bad the heart to say, that we were ungrateful to him, and that we would have been no worse if he had not released us from the mouth of a Howdah-liger. Such is official human nature. Honest journalists are poor people. They are generally paupers. We met sometimes ago a journalist swimming in an ocean of milk and honey. We asked him what his income was. He said that he was getting from Rs. 8,000 to 10,000 a month. We asked him how it was possible and told him that after 60 years of journalistic life, we found it impossible to meet the expenditure of our Press establishment. He said, “I was not paid!” The world is full of wealthy idiots and crowned idiots too. Praise and commendation, deserved or not, are our stock-in-trade. Self-love is inexcusable from human nature. “Tickle them. They will open their purse strings. If this does not pay, throw light on the plague-spots of their life, they will make you roll in wealth.” This philosophy showed the

NOTES.

An Artful Evasion. — The Royal Agricultural Commission, in its report observes:—

"We have naturally been impressed with the thought that mere external improvement alone will not bring lasting benefit to the agricultural population. Increase in yield by better seed and cultivation; security of the harvest gained by the expansion of irrigation; immunity from loss due to pests or diseases; higher prices from improved communication and conditions of marketing; everything, in short, which we have advocated for the main improvement of the people will merely postpone the effects of the growing pressure of the population on the soil. No lasting improvement in the standard of living of the great mass of the population can possibly be attained if every enhancement in the purchasing power of the cultivator is to be followed by a proportionate increase in the population."

"If every enhancement in the purchasing power of the cultivator is to be followed by a proportionate increase in the population. But does not the same consequence result if it is followed, as it often is, by a mere proportional increase in the revenue assessment? This is a good instance of how the Commission has sought to relieve government of its due share of responsibility for the agricultural problem as it has developed.

Humanism and Higher Education. — There is a growing reaction against the excessive stress on "Science" in modern education. Sir Robert Falconer of the University of Toronto, writes in a Chicago Educational Review:—"The neglect of human studies is at present the weakest part of our higher education. They should be a tonic in our intellectual atmosphere to modify the realism of the prevalent scientific climate. Philosophers and poets have as much right to proclaim their truth about the mind of man as scientists theirs about his body. Indeed, our society is based upon this axiom. We must assume that the soul of man within is as intelligible to his spirit as is the universe without. Because the philosopher and the poet use different methods and different material from the scientist, their construction of human life is no less reliable than his. We need pure religion and finer humanism along with the loftiest constructions that science can make of the physical world to bring harmony into man's mind. There is a universe of religious and moral values as compelling as that of the heavens into which the astronomer guides us. The spell cast upon mankind by Isaiah, Jesus, Paul, Augustine, Pascal—to mention only our own faith—is proof of that. Therefore the teacher of religion must allow these values to make their appeal to the nature of those whom he is endeavouring to educate.—He must not attempt to float their spiritual life upon the troubled seas of modern thought by philosophies, dogmas, or worn-out scientific theories which have lost their buoyancy. Otherwise, religion itself may hardly come safe to shore."

India's Individuality. — At the annual meeting of the Mythic Society, Mr. L. M. Crump, the Resident of Mylapore, observed with much truth, in his thoughtful address, that one thing needed to enable India to stand on her own legs is confidence in herself and her individuality. His observations on the manner in which India, inspite of the influence of alien forces and the assimilation of foreign ideas by her, has displayed her individual and unique genius will bear repetition. He said:—"Yet the main point I want to make is not that India has been influenced by the various alien forces but that, though she has been influenced in so many directions by outside forces, she has never lost her own individuality. Perhaps more than any other great poet Shakespeare was the greatest borrower of other poet's thoughts but he took them into his own soul and re-coined them in the mint of his own genius. Similarly India has taken into herself whatever style or shape of art or architecture, or religion or literature she felt was of use to her and has absorbed it for her own purpose and then when the time of production came, her artistic children have been stamped indelibly with the marks of the personality of the great mother, who brought them into the world. From this point of view at any rate, there is no reason why India should not stand on her own legs and even run alone. Nor is there any reason for the sensitiveness to criticism on which I have commented. The right reply of the Indian is not a touchy denial of outside influences. It always was, and, with the world in effect shrinking daily as communications improve, it becomes daily more absurd to reject or deny the power of external and alien influences. India is big enough to stand on her own legs and admit the extent to which she has been influenced and to deny that such influence has resulted merely in slavish imitation. She can assert, and assert with truth, that in all influences that have been brought to bear on her from outside, religious, literary or artistic, she has been strong enough to absorb and transform them without ever giving up her own character, her own individuality, her own personality."
The U. P. Governorship:—The Leader of Allahabad, observes: “Why this enormous and quite unexpected delay in an announcement of the name of the fortunate man selected to govern or misgovern the United Provinces during five eventful years? For there has arisen an acute disagreement between Simla and Whitehall, the Viceroy and the Secretary of State having their respective favourites or being under different influences. There are several runners in the race for the Naini Government House, viz., (as we surmise), Sir Malcolm Hailey, Sir Motagut Butler, Sir Denys Bray, Sir Laurie Hammond, Sir Samuel O'Donnell, Sir Henry Moncrieff-Smith, Sir Geoffrey de Montmorency and the hon., Mr., Lambert. If Sir Malcolm Hailey be selected, he can be in India on fuller pay than at present and for four years longer than if he be not chosen. Sir Montagu Butler will naturally like to be translated on promotion from Pachmati to where his elder, Sir Harcourt of that name, swell his lustre in years still remembered. And on Sir Harcourt is in London and would most naturally be exerting his undoubted influence in favour of the younger brother. Sir William Marris is in the India Council and has his U. P. favourites in the late and present Finance Members. May we suggest a way out of the difficulty? Let them find a Bonar Law and jettison the contending there by the Indian Council of the Empire.”

But this suggests a way out of the difficulty:—The Committee on Education and Relief of Leprosy in India has been in session and held twice a week, the players in Britain are opposed to the removal of the whole year group of some 257,000 children from the labour market. They think there will be a steady diminution up to 1931, that there will be a much more marked diminution in 1932 and after that the incidence of danger of military intervention or war. As a beginning to an understanding of the situation the details of all foreign loans should be publicly recorded with the State Department and the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.”

Education and Industry:—According to a memorandum of the National Conference of Employers’ Organisations, great mass of the average employer. The advantages which would accrue to industry and trade from the increase of school age are of a character resulting from the supply of more adaptable recruits.” The committee maintain that the closer co-operation between the schools and the industrial world is necessary to commercial prosperity.
INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, JULY 14, 1928.

RELIGION AND UNIVERSITY EDUCATION.

The Senate of the Bombay University has appointed a Committee to consider how a theistic bent can be given to the courses of study particularly in the affiliated Colleges. The University has no control over primary schools, and its connection with secondary education is limited to laying down the curriculum for its Matriculation examination. The only way in which it can impart a theistic bias to secondary education, therefore, is to prescribe theism as a subject for its Matriculation. Even as regards the colleges affiliated to it, the University can exercise its influence only through the courses of study for its examinations. Otherwise the colleges are free to impart any kind of bias to their teaching. As a matter of fact, the great Jesuit Colleges, though they do not make Bible teaching compulsory, are careful through their selection of books and in other ways to stress the Roman Catholic as distinguished from the Protestant view of history and philosophy, literature and science. The Islamic colleges try to do the same in a less systematic and purposeful way. The Protestant Christian colleges, generally speaking, confine their religious instruction to Bible classes. The Hindu colleges make a show of religious instruction by having occasional lectures on the Gita, but the majority, and the more important, of them, like the Fergusson, the New Poona's, and the Willingdon college at Sangli, concern themselves solely with secular education. The Arya Samaj college at Lahore, we believe, still keeps up a denominational side, as also the Khalsa College. The Brahmo College in Calcutta recently came into prominence by disallowing Hindu students to perform Sarawati Puja in the Hostel attached to it. The Government Colleges, of course, strictly exclude religious instruction. The Committee appointed by the Senate of the Bombay University will, therefore, have to consider how a theistic bent can be given to the teaching in the Government and non-denominational (mostly Hindu) aided colleges.

In the debate in the Senate, theistic teaching was spoken of as being synonymous with religious instruction. As a matter fact Buddhism and Jainism are not theisms, though no one will think of denying them, on that account, the title to be included in the category of great religions. They are not singular in this respect. Early in its history Hindu thought grew to the conception of religion independently of the Godhead. The Dr. Bhagavat Gita, a great attempt at a synthesis of Hindu religion and philosophy, gives the place of honour among Siddhas, or the perfected Ones, to Kapila, the promulgator of the atheistic Sankhya. The fervent apostles to Nature in the Sankhya Sutras shows that Kapila was a poet and an idealist, though he did not think it necessary to postulate God. The identification of theism with religion is not in consonance with a large body of thought, Indian and European. Theism cannot be easily incorporated in the University courses of study, but if these courses are properly drawn up they must naturally lead to a religious attitude of mind.

"The core of religion," says a distinguished writer on the Philosophy of Religion, "consists in the conviction that no value perishes out of the world" and he also observes "the unceasing striving after truth" forms part of those highest spiritual values, the conservation of which is the business of all true religion." University education fulfils its highest object, only when it inspires men to the "unceasing striving after truth," and if it does this, it is giving a truly religious bent to intellectual culture.

In that thou seek'st thou hast the treasure found.

Close with thy question is the answer bound.

This is the only religious bias which can harmonize with the general body of University education. It is also the only type which can be acceptable to students of different communities and creeds. The question is not what one's personal belief is, whether it is the God of the Christians, Jews, Mussalmans or Hindus one worships but whether one is an earnest seeker after truth and inspired in his studies by the intense love of truth.

The Committee of the Senate by being restricted to considering how a theistic bent can be given to University education, is virtually bound to report that it is not practicable to impart such a bias or indeed any kind of bias to education. Thought must be free. It is the attitude of mind which matters, and great thinkers have almost invariably been distinguished by their humility and their spirit of reverence. It is only shallow minds which dogmatize on questions of which they know next to nothing. Indian education, owing to circumstances, tends to flow in shallow channels, and this has produced a certain shallowness in character. The English-educated Indian, with many and honourable exceptions, appears to be content to drift without helm or rudder in the form of reasoned convictions or ingrained faith. But this is only a passing phase and already there are healthy signs to show that he is finding himself. The spiritual and moral needs of all nations are not identical, nor are they the same at all times. The relativity of character-training is well emphasized in a verse of the Gita: "For the man of meditation wishing to attain purification of heart leading to concentration, work is said to be the way; for him, when he has attained such (concentration) inaction is said to be the way." The forcible imposition of a dogmatic bias on higher education, is bound to fail to effect its purpose: it may even have the opposite effect.
LABOUR SITUATION IN INDIA.
(BY MR. J. E. ROAALI, MADRAS).

At the conclusion of the strike last year in the Khargpur Workshops, Government decided that full wages should be paid to the strikers for the full period of the strike. This was certainly a sensible adjustment, as men do not go on strike unless driven to it by unbearable wrongs inflicted by their employers.

A section of the press called this decision of Government an "amazing blunder", forgetting the fact that the workless millions have the imposing consecration of centuries before them that the discontent of every nation when not rightly settled had ultimately been written in blood.

The writer is no prophet, neither is he a prophet's son, nor does it need a prophet to declare unto those which oppose the poor, which crush the needy and are not grieved for the affliction of the workless, that the Lord God hath sworn that He will take away those oppressors of the poor, and shall leave the oppressors neither root nor branch.

Ye men in power, be not deceived: God is not mocked, for whatsoever a man soweth, shall he also reap. It is written of old: "Render to all their dues; and thus fulfil the law; and further, if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink, for in so doing thou shalt overcome evil with good.

Be not wise in your own conceits, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind; for there is no difference between the white man and the coloured before the Lord God of Nations. What advantage then hath the white man over the coloured? None, for all are HIS creatures.

Before ME continually is grief and wounds of the oppressed poor saith the Lord God: An evil is come. Violence against the poor and needy, the fatherless and the widow, hath filled the land to provoke ME to anger. The day draweth near when shame shall be upon the face of them that have filled the land with workless men and women under the plea of retrenchment schemes.

Hear now this and give ear all ye rulers of India which have eyes and ears not; which have ears and hear not. Behold the prisons in the land full of the needy whose right ye have not judged, and ye overpass the deeds of the wicked. Behold the deeds in Bardoli and Bombay, and from Calcutta to Golden Rock in the South. Violence and spoil is heard in the streets and in the fields. The day draweth near when men from hunger and desperation shall beat their plowshares into swords and their pruning hooks into spears and the weak shall say, I am strong, for their's is the strength which comes of co-operation among the weak.

When that day cometh, the wealthy shall cast their silver and gold in the streets; their silver and gold shall not be able to deliver them in the day of wrath of the Lord God, because their wealth is the stumbling block of their iniquity. They shall seek peace but there shall be no peace to the wicked that gave no heed to the hungry cry of the workless.

Thus saith the Lord God:—"Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom; neither let the mighty man glory in his might, nor let the rich man glory in his riches; but let him that glorieth, glory in this that he knoweth and understandeth the Lord God of Nations which exercise loving kindness, judgment and righteousness in the earth." If ye oppress not the poor and the needy, the fatherless and the widow, and shed not innocent blood in this land, then only will HE cause you to dwell in this place, in the land that HE gave to your fathers.

Ye masters of capital: Abandon lying words and covetousness and deal not falsely by so-called retrenchments and reduction of staff which deprive the workers of their labour, in order to secure at any cost the highest possible dividends to your wealthy shareholders who seldom have any feeling of sympathy for the poor and do not understand, the increasing poverty of the masses.

The management of the Companies are chiefly to blame for the present labour unrest; very few employers even consider their employees as human beings. This is also the case with most of the employers who have numerous educated clerks under them on a very scanty pay not sufficient enough for their personal expenses without any prospect, and if they seek for a better pay, they are threatened with fines or dismissal.

Ye wise and prudent rulers of India who can discern the face of the sky, but can ye not discern the signs of the times? When ye see a cloud rise out of the West, straightway ye say, there cometh a shower, and it cometh to pass. How is it that, ye do not discern the signs of the times? and why judge ye not what is right?

Behold the workless seeking work in every direction, and yet still more are deprived of work under so-called retrenchment schemes in Railway Workshops, Textile Mills and factories, thereby driving the workless to fill your prisons.

Ye wealthy employers: Put away the evil of your doings, and learn to do well; relieve the hunger cry of the workless, the needy and the poor, the fatherless and the widow for they burn with hunger. But if ye refuse to relieve them and persist in your evil ways, ye shall be destroyed with fire and sword as in the days of the Huns.

"All paths which men take to help his fellowmen are Mine," says the Almighty, who reaches earth through innumerable ways not understood by us. Circulation of capital by peaceful means through the sporting spirit of the public is no crank idea but a very carefully considered well balanced Scheme for Prevention of Unemployment. The scheme proposed to create new wealth without resorting to bolshevik redistribution of the wealth already existing as there will be no social gain by the latter course, and was submitted to Government.
as a constructive proposal sincerely to provide work for the unemployed in India. For obvious reasons the scheme was suppressed by Government, and thereby in place of bread the unemployed gets a stone.

Britain looks upon the millions of able-bodied unemployed in India as a cheap reserve army for her use to be drafted overseas in case of emergency. Besides, the root cases of communal discord in India is unemployment among the masses, and by increasing unemployment, it increases communal discord and thereby enables Britain to keep India in bondage.

It rests with the premier Nationalist institution in India to sponsor the Scheme for Prevention of Unemployment, and unless the political leaders in India—establish a league for prevention of unemployment, all other remedies to create unity in India will be merely temporary patch-work.

UNIVERSITIES AND POLITICS.*

The subject which you have allowed me to take for this address is difficult—difficult and many-sided. While preparing what I am about to say for your consideration, I tried to keep in mind the different circumstances of Universities in various countries, both at the present time and in past times. The connexion between Universities and political ideas or controversies is at the moment by no means alike all over the world; nor has it been the same, in the case of the more ancient Universities, at all periods of their history. Therefore, a comparison of the circumstances in which the main groups of Universities are now placed, may throw some light on the question which we are about to consider. And it is also possible to get some guidance from looking at the matter in historical perspective. But our knowledge of the historical side of the question is still incomplete. For example, we know comparatively little about the earlier history of the ancient Universities of India, and what Dr. Coote recently called "the awakening of our historical conscience" leads me to suspect that we may sometimes arrive at a clearer understanding than we now possess of the political atmosphere of the European Universities during the earlier and during the closing parts of the Middle Ages.

The attitude of Universities towards politics is necessarily affected by their administrative relation to Government. Some Universities, like those of Italy, France and Russia, are intimately dependent on the central administration of the State. Others are dependent on a State Government like those of the united German Republic since the way, or like the State Universities in the Federal Republic of the United States. All of these are, by the nature of their being and their financial dependence, necessarily sensitive to the tone of political feeling dominant in the State authority from which they draw an indispensable part of their support. At the other end of the scale are Universities which derive no part of their revenue from State subsidy and are wholly free from State influence in the planning of their courses of study and in the choice of their teachers. Such are Harvard and Yale, Princeton and Columbia in the United States; such was the Free University of Brussels in which the great geographer Elisee Reclus took a leading part, and (if we accord to it the status of a University) such is the Shantiniketan founded by Dr. Rabindranath Tagore at Bolpur in Bengal. Intermediate between these two opposite types are two other, both British: one of these intermediate categories is represented by Oxford and Cambridge, each mainly supported by endowments supplemented by fees but now also subsidized by the Central Government, and each subjected at intervals to investigation and rescheduling by Commissions which Parliament appoints and clothes with statutory powers. The second intermediate type is represented by the modern English Universities which, though deriving about one-third of their income and most of their buildings from gifts, fees and endowments, are dependent for the remaining two-thirds of their income on grants from local authorities within their area and from subsidies voted by Parliament and assigned by a Committee appointed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The more remote a University from control by the State, the less likely are its members to be restricted in the expression of their political views. But it is by no means the case that the State always encourages, still less is it true that it always requires, a University maintained by public money to give active support to the policy of Government by voice or pen. A Government may bear the cost of maintaining the University, not in order to get a political advocate, but because it regards learning and higher education as indispensable to national welfare and because national conditions in that particular case make it (or at some earlier times have made it) convenient or necessary to maintain the University directly from State funds. But no Government would take it kindly if a University, maintained from funds under the direct control of the Government, opposed the policy of the Government on any crucial question. And if the Government were struggling, or conceived itself to be struggling against heavy attacks which threatened its existence, it would be more than human if it did not look to the University whose expenses it defrays to give to it its moral and intellectual support. The classic example is the case of the German Universities during the thirty years before the war. The Prussian Government was justly proud of scientific eminence of the Universities which it maintained. In those parts of the field of learning and investigation which had no direct bearing on the political aims of the State, the Government gave (and felt great satisfaction in giving) complete intellectual freedom to the professors whom it had appointed. But, on matters of moment in political science it welcomed professorial support; it looked coldly on professors whose political opinions it distrusted; and it took steps through the Department of Higher Education to prevent the appointment of candidates who were thought likely to be critics of opponents of its policy.

Universities which receive no money from Government and are free from Government control have in theory the greatest liberty of expression on political questions. But it does not follow that they make use of liberty or that they have any wish to use it, in opposing the Government. Harvard and Yale, Princeton and Columbia have not been political opponents of the Government of the United States. Nor does independence from Government subsidy or from administrative supervision by Government necessarily secure at all times a University from Government interference. In times of acute civil tension, a Government by the law of its being is bound to defend itself against any enemies, intellectual enemies included, who challenge seriously its right to govern. But it has been found by experience, especially in France, that fussy interference with University teaching is not an effective weapon in the armoury of Government. Governments in these days rarely take a University professor by the throat and say "pay me what thou owest." Forbearance has been found the best form of conduct. And this is to our general comfort and, on the whole to the public good.

The present case of the Universities of the intermediate type in regard to controversial politics is especially interesting. The modern English Universities have risen swiftly to a position of intellectual influence. It is true that University College, London, King's College, London, and Owens' College, Manchester, have, for more than three-quarters of a century, been eminent in things of the mind. But I can remember when it seemed profanation to think of University at Birmingham. Mr. Chamberlain's courage showed itself in his determination to make his beloved city the seat of a modern University. When it was proposed that the Yorkshire College should apply to the Victoria University, a federal institution of which the earlier members were Owens' College, Manchester, and University College, Liverpool, there were many people in Leeds who thought that it would be insufferably presumptuous on their part to ask that the august word "University" should be attached to their town. But I find that in Oxford to-day the great modern Universities are profoundly respected and that all traces of their being treated like parvenus have been obliterated by the finger of time. Nevertheless, they are still young. There are people still living who remember Manchester before Owens' College was founded—many more who can remember the contemptuous rejection by the Government of the day of the proposal that Owens' College should receive a University Charter. Liverpool was still not a University when the Prince of Wales was born. Without being in any way precarious, the position of the modern Universities in England does call for tactful avoidance of local unpopularity. A penny rate is not easily got, but indignation might jeopardize it. There are still vestiges in English life of party prejudices. A retired public servant wrote angrily to us the other day because the Committee of the Oxford Luncheon Club, a representative but not a political society, had invited Mr. Petheick-Lawrence to tell it the hard and bitter truth about the Sur-tax. If, in a narrowly-contested Parliamentary election in a local constituency, some of the professors of a modern University developed striking powers of propaganda, a good many ratepayers would say that they were not going to be taxed for that kind of thing. I can remember a sagacious Yorkshireman saying that nobody could prevent a member of the University staff from writing to the newspapers about anything he liked, but that if he wrote about controversial questions in politics or religion, he ought to date his letters from his private house and not from the University. But I have said enough to show that there are reasons for circumspection on the part of those whose work lies in the modern English Universities.

With the two ancient English Universities which form the other group in the intermediate type, the case is different. No one suspects Cambridge of being unanimously Liberal, because Mr. J. M. Keynes is Chairman of the Directors of The Nation. No one imagines that Oxford would pull a unanimous vote in support of the Conservative Government because its two representatives in Parliament are Lord Hugh Cecil and Sir Charles Oman. It is not only that the two ancient Universities are big and therefore, being broad-bottomed, can carry a mixed crew, but that no trace of God has been called in the political conflict which used to rage in both of them. Oxford and Cambridge in their present form and temper are the outcomes of the Liberal movement of the last century (I use the words "liberal movement" in its continental and not in its narrower, English party, sense). Stamped upon them is the impress of John Stuart Mill's belief in the value of discussion and of progress through the candid utterance of varied opinion. For this reason the ancient Universities are, at the present time, the protectors of professorial liberty in all English Universities in regard to controversial matters of politics.

If, therefore, any person were to say that all Universities should keep clear of politics, I would ask them whether they do not think that Oxford is strengthened by the presence of Professor Gilbert Murray, of the Master of Balliol and of Mr. G. D. H. Cole. And whether in an earlier generation it was not good for Oxford to be the scene of the varied political activities of Professor A. V. Dicey, Arnold Toynbee, and Henry Scott Holland. Whether it is not good for Columbia University to have such varied spokesmen on public affairs as Professor John Dewey and President Nicholas Murray Butler. Whether, finally, the brave voice and unflattering
The courage of Sir Amosha Mookerjee were not worth considerably more than a creme of ruppes to the University of Calcutta.

The view which I would submit for your consideration is that all Universities should encourage an open-minded study of the fundamental principles of politics, but should, as institutions, be allowed to keep themselves free from entanglements with momentarily raging political controversies. Further, I would suggest that a University is strong enough to stand the battering waves of stupid misunderstanding; it should be generous in allowing individual members of its society to express, in speech and writing their sincere convictions on controversial subjects, relying on their own sense, and on their sense of obligation to the corporate society of which they are members, to restrain them from unworthy partisanship and from impropriety in self-expression. Thirdly, I would add that, even in great emergencies when strong conviction feels that silence would be cowardly, activity in political affairs should be kept strictly subordinate to the full discharge of the other duties which in a learned society devolve both upon the old and young.

Upon the old and young. These words remind us that every University consists of two parts—the senior and the younger generation.

Having spent the most part of a long life in three Universities, I am drawn by experience to say that in the academic world some of us are old and are apt to forget how old we are, and that some of those who are young do not always realize how young.

Nearly fifty years ago, when I was head of the School House at Rugby, I felt the weight of my responsibility as seriously as if I were vizier of India; when I pored over Mr. Gladstone’s Midlothian speeches, spread out on one of the old brown oak tables in the School House Hall, I had less, misgiving about right and wrong in British Foreign Policy than I have since been troubled with. Once when I was an undergraduate at Trinity, Professor Robinson Ellis, a Latin scholar, whose fame stood high in every University of the world, took me for a walk round the University Parks. Naively, but with conviction, I told him that those of us who went to the Union thought that Caron would some day be foreign Secretary and that E. T. Cook knew more about the tangle of English Local Government than I myself except Mr. Gooch himself. Robinson Ellis sighed, and said: “Sadler, I take little account of undergraduate reputations.”

In words not devoid of irony, John Henry Newman said that “A University is a place to fit men of the world for the world.” But he was not ironical when he wrote that “The practical end of University course is training good members for society.” Many a young man has tried his wings in politics during his undergraduate days; a few while still at college have impressed experienced statesmen by their promise as Parliamentary or platform speakers and by their good judgment in dealing with political topics; far more, though political discussions at the University, have first come to close grips with the reality of public affairs.

“Man,” says Aristotle in a famous passage in the first book of the Politics: “Man is by nature a political animal.” No University is vigorous unless the active minds of its young and old members are thinking about fundamental things—God, Freedom, and duty to one’s neighbour. To muffle conviction about these things stunts the mind. One’s courage shrinks if one shirks fundamental issues.

I have quoted Aristotle in support of my argument, but some of my hearers may feel that I have no right to cite the words of one who, if I understand him aright, was a thorough-going advocate of putting all education, including what we now call University education, under State control.*

But you will remember that Hallas intellectually was a congeries of relatively small States and that Aristotle had in view the circumstances of a City State. He is careful to point out how different in scope, method and tendency were the educational systems of the constituent State members of the mental and, one might almost say, cultural, confederacy of the Greek-speaking world. Viewing Hallas as a whole, therefore, we may justly say that in effect it had (as we moderns have) a variety of University disciplines, compensating one another’s defects by their several merits, just as in pre-war Germany, the University of Marburg had a tone and outlook different from those of the University of Berlin, and just as London, Cambridge and Oxford differ from one another, though all are organs of English higher education. What Aristotle would recommend is that each University should have a specific tone and a thought-out purpose, governing not only its courses of study but the pre-suppositions of its educational life. Yet he takes it for granted that, in its institutions for the training of the young, Hallas as a whole will have diversity of type, and that each great unit in the consortium will, as in the modern world, be adjusted to the needs of the community which it was designed to serve.

Maladjustment to the needs of their time and country is hurtful to the well-being of Universities and, in some cases, has been the cause of fatal decline. One is apt to think of Universities as immune from death. But history shows that among them the rate of mortality is rather high. Of the Universities founded in Europe during the last eight centuries, nearly one-third, I think, have perished. Except in periods of unusual quietude or in the torpor of decay, Universities are not, as we sometimes think them to be, haunts of ancient peace. If we look back upon their history, we see them tossed at their moorings by great waves of controversy in religion or in politics, and the storms have been worst when religion and politics have been in explosive combination. In our time, indeed, most Universities are remote from political or religious controversy. Their chief intellectual activity now lies in the domains of history, of the comparative investigation of custom and belief, and in the physical and biological sciences. But what lies ahead? Before our eyes, applied science is causing economic change. Economic problem loom larger in politics. But they touch at many sensitive points the lives of men. They involve ethical questions, questions of responsibility in employment, new contacts between races, our assessment of the value of what we may enjoy in life. There are signs that these questions may touch the quies of Universities. By the law of their being, Universities have one foot in the past and one foot in the future. Within their walls meet minds which are mature and minds which are promising and eager but still immature. To blend these two is to help in stabilizing society. But at times of rapid change in social or intellectual outlook, courses of academic training are in danger of getting out of date. Old ways of thought may become obsolete, not by reason of inherent defects but through subtle changes in the mental appetite of the young. At these times, conservatism which is rightly cautious may be over­­tacions of tradition. Into this mistake fell the English Universities at the Renaissance, the University of Paris in the time of Descartes, some of the German Universities after the Thirty Years' War. Again, it is a perilous time when a new culture and the power of large-scale industry, impinge upon the venerable studies of an antique civilization. And whenever the spirit of Nationalism has gripped the imagination of the most eager­­minded part of the community, Universities, because one of their functions is to stabilize society, are wise, I think, in not stepping in sympathy with what is fair and feasible in national aspirations.

To sum up: Politics play so great a part in life that places of education which prepare young men and women for life cannot be isolated from politics. Every University has always been the scene of political discussion. The hardest questions of belief and duty, both in religion and in politics, cannot be evaded by old or young in any centre of sound learning. Political philosophy and its applications have been inseparable from University training from the days of Isocrates, Plato and Aristotle to those of Treitschke, Henry Sidgwick and Woodrow Wilson. To think and talk about politics during under-graduate days has for centuries been part of the training of those destined to lead in the public affairs of their country.

But the first duty of a University and of all those who work in it is to get at the truth. To hear both sides, to be candid and fairminded, to shun (except in debate) the spirit of party, are primary obligations on those who teach and learn in it. But if the conditions of life in a country are unhealthy, political talk may become feverish and unbalanced. In such circumstances, University teachers and students are under special obligation to set an example of steadiness in judgment and, if after patient thought conscience constrains them, of courage in standing up for what at the moment may be the unpopular side.—The Calcutta Review, May 1928.

INDUSTRY TO-DAY AND TO-MORROW.
(Brn WALTON BROOKS FOLEY.)

Modern Industry is based on an increased production policy. This is a necessity. It is more, it is in itself a problem—a problem as old as civilization, as old as the first aspirations of primitive man to improve his conditions. It dates from man's first realization that leisure might, and should be, more than a period of inertia superinduced by a gorged appetite. Its working out has been indicated in every human activity since men in striving to preserve the tribe acquired the arts of agriculture, domestication, and navigation; discovered fire and its uses in cooking, war and metallurgy; supplemented the hand with machinery; and, through the process of long life struggle were developed into moral beings. Every advance in human skills, every invention, every discovery of science, every development in the social structure, has been directly or indirectly for the end that man's productivity might be multiplied. Making two blades of grass grow where but one grew before has been the accepted standard of the individual's contribution to society. It has become axiomatic that "poverty larks where production lags."

Man has constantly striven to better himself. He has increased and diversified production that he may be able to consume more, that he may advance his standard of living. The higher the nation's standard—the greater is the need of increased production. For years, living standards have been going higher in all the countries on the globe. To-day they are higher than they have ever been before. And it is this fact which makes constantly increasing production of farm, mines, and mills an absolute necessity.

There are two questions which may be presented:

1. Is it possible to secure increased production?
2. How can increased production be brought about?

The first may be answered with a simple affirmative. The answer to the second requires the postulate: The first requisite to increased production is that there must be reasonably contented and satisfied workers in every field of production, and this is impossible so long as there is constant irritation and friction, with frequent economically disastrous conflicts between capitalists and labourers, between employer and employee. This calls for industrial peace, or approximate peace, with every obtainable guarantee that it will be permanent.
Employers and employees, as a whole, are actually or potentially at war with each other. There is no accepted basis of procedure of general scope and applications. The economic situation is similar to that which existed in history between conflicting tribes and states. The conflict and frictions extend throughout the whole range of industrial relations and conditions.

The basic motives of modern industry originate in and accumulate their momentum from the desire for material profit. Life and human welfare become secondary considerations in any gold-digging enterprise, whether of mine or of factory. Man's responsibility for man ceases when the act interferes with increased profits. The laissez faire policy is for the most part maintained until it is seen to work actual harm to the group of employers who control industry. Force alone employed by the workers seems to have gained for them any increase in standards. This has resulted in a rapidly increasing trend toward an economically disastrous class struggle. This struggle is accentuated by the tremendous profts of individual capitalists. The surplus from labour after the payment of interest, rent, superintendence, and maintenance has always been claimed as a right by the employers. Organized working-men deny this right—hence the conflict.

The emphasis of the capitalist is "each man for himself and may success attend the man who loses himself in his search for material goods." Money is the chief aim. Youthful ideals, social duties and obligations are forgotten. He becomes the victim of remorseless struggle.

The present industrial order has come to us through a gradual process of evolution. Its origin was based on the demand for increased production. This is an age of machinery—East and West. Men have not the equal opportunity which was common in an expanding agricultural community. The rights of the corporation are the criterion by which modern capitalism measures its demands from humanity. The individual cannot bargain on equal or beneficial terms with the corporation. This organization of capital is a soul-less, almost insatiable thing which has been granted the rights which formerly accrued only to men.

The machine with its continually "speeding up," process is driving factory "hands" into the class of morons, unable to use and incapable of exercising individual initiatives. The machine as used under modern methods is destructive of human worth and personality in the race for increased efficiency. It is a monster grown from slave to master.

Capitalism, individualistic, great, if unchecked, will rapidly drive the world into chaos. Exploitation by capitalists is less and less tolerated by organized labour. Without a change of spiritual conceptions the class struggle of capitalist and worker is inevitable. The credit system, which is not so much based on actual fact as on faith and trust, is disorganised by unfairness. Men look asehame at state, nation at nation. The economic rule is one of the minority. Democracy in industry is as yet but an ideal to be strove for. World trade is based on rivalry and competition with no regard for mutual interests. A market for expanding agricultural produce, with little or no efficient consideration of imports or an equitable flow and retention of mutually desired products. Tariffs are placed almost without discrimination upon imports to protect favored industries to the ultimate harm of the citizens of the country.

The citizens are nominal rulers in a political democracy but slaves in a system of oligarchic economic control. The financial authority is vested in the hands of a few cares of finance. Here it is we find the real leadership. The working-man, indeed the middle class man, is but a pawn to a greater or lesser extent upon the chess-board of economic and spiritual exploitation. The corporations are furnished capital by absentee stockholders. Absentee owners promote managers for the production of surplus profits. Human welfare is altogether at a discount in the economic market. Labour is purchased as a raw material.

To protest against long-continued exploitation has grown up what is known as the craft labour union. Everything which labour to-day enjoys is directly or indirectly attributable to the organized labour movement. The craft union includes only those in a specific labour i.e. blacksmiths, carpenters, etc. It has accomplished large results. More recently the "industrial" union has been introduced. This union is so organized as to include all the workers in a given industry. This plan is proving very satisfactory and quickly productive of beneficial results.

The aim of organized labour is ever turned to the search for a share in control through a process brought about by better working conditions and a recognition in education of the responsibilities of true social welfare actions in society at large.

The great difficulty in the labour movement to-day lies in the unorganized labour group. This group may be divided into two sections: 1. The hand worker. 2. The office force. The "handworker" section is the lowest work economic group in industry. Its members are continually open to exploitation due to over-supply of workers and consequent over-turn of labour. Women also make up a portion of this group, since they are for the most part unorganized and will not be recognized by the union as suitable for membership. The office force, almost without exception, are possessed of the owner's capitalist psychology due to direct and continuous contact with only the capitalist personality. Their sympathy lies with a maintenance of the present system—good or evil. Because of their attitude the industrial democracy will come more slowly than if they had a sympathetic understanding of the rights and justice denied to workers.

In the future is to come, how soon we dare not prophesy, the economic readjustments of a better social order. To promote and preserve industrial peace, to insure equal and exact justice for both elements in industry; and the safeguard the public interest as well, there should be established an industrial code wherein there shall be defined and promulgated the fundamental principles which shall govern the relations of capital and labour with respect to:

1. The right of employees and employers to organise.
2. The right of collective bargaining.
3. The right of labour to a living wage and of capital to a fair return.
4. The hours of labour.
5. The rights and relations of women in industry.
6. The right of labour to a voice in the control.
7. The fulfillment of contractual obligations.
8. The protection of the public against economic disturbance caused by employer-employee conflict.

On some such foundation will our economic structure of the future be built. Out of this reconstruction period will come an expansive period of international co-operation. Nation will aid nation in a mutual interlocking of interests. Concessions granted, whether construction programmes or of natural resources, will be based on benefit and service with the outlook of ultimate world advantage.

Scientific research will receive an added impetus to aid in increased production for material wealth and spiritual growth. The two great fields, chemistry and electricity, will be entered upon in a larger way for the advantage of human life. Possibly a new science will be evolved by an amalgamation of the two. But in the experimentation and development of resources hitherto dreamed of there will be a democratic control under competent management for the benefit of advancing human welfare. Workers and owners will have an overwhelming mutuality of interest.

The attainment of this more completely ideal society must advance through an acceptance of the value of friendship and friendly understanding of the relations of men with men. A deep understanding love for human personality will grant a trust, a faith, a belief in the inherent good will of men that will tend to the far-reaching development of a rich cultural life. Out of the morass of individual ownership will ascend the desire and ultimate attainment of group, or community, ownership of the means of production and distribution. Destructive competition will be eliminated. Efficiency based on human welfare and development will be the rallying cry of our children.

An understanding of social conditions will be granted to us through adequate research and actual experience in social service to our environmental society. Psychology in its various phases and planes will become more familiar, lies, implications, innuendos will be more easily analyzed and dissected for motivating influences.

Into this breach which is widening between employer and employee the Church must step. Indeed it is to be regarded as a most strategic opportunity for the influence of evolutionary Christian theories to be realized in the actual life of millions of people. The right for existence of the profit-motive is being quite generally questioned.

The Church is awakening. She is giving up the former custom of placating Dives and is appearing in the company of Lazarus. The tendency of the Church toward active interest in industry is being increased by the attitude of economic experts and statisticians that a spiritual idealism must be considered as the one solution of economic problems.

The increase in social education is being encouraged. This must be the aim of all social reformers. An undertaking of true Christian principles as applied to the modern complex life must be made a matter of common knowledge in the minds of men and women.

The way out of the seeming inevitable chaos is the development of the love-motive as the central feature in any recognition. The task of the individual is to emphasize social needs which will aid in the development of personality. We need very greatly a training of the emotional life, to which we have hitherto devoted little or no time. We must re-evaluate the use-worth of work in the light of spiritual development.

Through the common working together of men will come the knowledge that work is essential for all. Parasites, rich and poor, will decrease. The men of the future will be bigger, broader in understanding and appreciation of the human value of personality. Our lives will be built about a common community interest. The interests of the individual will be the best interests of society. The broadening conceptions of spiritual values as the motivating main spring of life will serve to promote the ultimate international good will as the aim of world perfection.

A PALM-LEAF BIBLE.

A QUARY.

The Editor,—The Indian Social Reformer, Bombay.

Sir,—"In the library of Gottingen is a Bible written on palm leaves. There are 5373 pages, each made of a single leaf", says Tit-Bit for 23rd June, 1928. Writing on palm leaves is a habit peculiar to India and Ceylon. Would you or your numerous readers inform me through the columns of your valuable paper something of the history of this palm-leaf Bible—Whether it is an ancient or modern production, when it was written, where it was produced, etc.

Tiruppathi, M. S. Ramanwami Ayar, 8th July 1928. Deputy Superintendent of Police.
To
THE SHERIFF OF BOMBAY.

Sir,

WE, THE UNDESIGNATED REQUEST YOU to call a Public Meeting of the citizens of Bombay to adopt the following resolution

"That this meeting of the citizens of Bombay begs to draw the attention of the Government of India and the Secretary of State to the fact that the Indian High Courts Bill now before Parliament introduces a far-reaching change in the whole same tradition and law in force for over a century, by making Civilian Judges eligible for the office of the Chief Justice of the High Courts. This meeting is strongly of opinion that a change of this character in the present law should not be carried through without giving ample time to public opinion in India to express itself."

That this meeting further thinks that in view of the impending changes in the Indian Constitution, piecemeal legislation of this character should not be undertaken."

The Bardoli Deadlock:—Bardoli is a taluka or revenue subdivision of the Surat district in Gujarat. It is like the larger part of the Bombay Presidency, under the ryotwari tenure, that is to say, the Government deals directly with each individual cultivator or owner. This system is uniformly settled for thirty years, after which it is revised. In the revision, it has been usual hitherto, to take into consideration the several factors of the economic history of an area during the thirty years, and to vary the assessment in the light of such consideration. On this occasion, the rental value alone was made the criterion and it was proposed to raise the assessment by not less than 20 per cent. The Government of Bombay thought this would be too high—according to the law 53 per cent. is the maximum limit—and reduced the increase to 21 per cent. The increase when in full operation will bring in about Rs. 125,000. The peasants protested that this was arbitrary and that it was a matter of fact there has been no improvement but a deterioration in their economic condition since the previous settlement. They asked for a fresh, independent enquiry to prove their case. Government maintained that the re-settlement was according to their rules. Whereupon the peasants refused to pay the increased assessment. Government applied coercive processes and issued distrain warrants. Purchasers for the distrained land and cattle were found with great difficulty, and the amounts secured were ridiculously low.

Government next employed a number of Pathans—men of the North Western Frontier tribes—to keep order. But the outcry against these men, whose methods and ready methods aroused widespread protest, at last awakened Government to the serious nature of their blunder and they had to be withdrawn. It is not too much to say that the employment of Pathans did more than anything else to convert the Bardoli movement into an All-India affair.

The Governor Intervenes:—Sir Leslie Wilson is a good man and a great gentleman, but he realised too late that the Bardoli affair was a much more serious one than he had been led to believe by his official colleagues and the Times of India whose irritating misrepresentations, next to the employment of Pathans, are responsible for stiffening the attitude of the Bardoli leaders and practically obliging them to take up an uncompromising attitude. What seems to have impressed Sir Leslie Wilson most is the decision of almost all the Gujarati members of his Legislative Council, and some others representing constituencies outside Gujarat, and the unopposed re-election of all of them without exception. It is stated, but this statement lacks confirmation, that the two Hindu Ministers, too, placed their resignations in the Governor's hands, and that this decision His Excellency to seek the advice of the Viceroy by a personal visit to him at Simla. Sir Leslie Wilson is, indeed, with the Revenue Member of Government, accordingly left for Simla on 13th instant, and on his return journey halted at Surat on Wednesday. A deputation headed by Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel waited on his Excellency by invitation but the conference proved abortive and an official statement, issued on Thursday, intimates that the Governor would make a complete statement of what has happened at the opening of the Bombay Legislative Council session on Monday. The position shortly seems to be that while Government are prepared to institute a fresh enquiry, they insist on the amount of the increase in the assessment being deposited with them as a preliminary condition. The amount is only Rs. 25,000 as, under what are called Igatpuri rules, the full increase is not taken at once but is gradually worked up to in the course of a few years after a revised settlement. The Bardoli leaders maintain, and with reason, that the institution of a fresh enquiry necessarily implies that the previous enquiry has not been satisfactory. The re-assessment based on the results of the latter cannot, therefore, be claimed, until the new enquiry has established its correctness. The amount from the Government point of view is very small, and we cannot help thinking that public opinion will not approve of their dropping the enquiry, which they are prepared to grant, because the Bardoli leaders do not agree to deposit it as a condition precedent to it.

An Appeal to Sir Leslie Wilson:—The officials who advise His Excellency have little to lose but the responsibility for the good Government of the Presidency is laid by the King-Emperor upon the shoulders of the Governor, as was stated in the Press Note announcing Sir Leslie Wilson's visit to Simla, and it is earnestly to be hoped that His Excellency will fully rise to the occasion and allow himself to be guided by his British instincts of justice and fair-play. By so doing he will re-lay the foundations of the State securely in the affections of the people, while by allowing himself to be overborne by his bureaucratic colleagues, he will expose those foundations to the disintegrating forces of political wind and weather, not only in this Presidency, but all over the country. For Bardoli is now an All-India question and the whole country, and the cultivating classes in particular, are eagerly watching developments there. The Reformer is not the organ of any political party and it is interested in politics primarily as it affects social and economic life. It is because we feel that far-reaching consequences are involved in a right decision on the Bardoli question, that we have thought it our duty, at this critical moment, to place the issue as clearly as we can before our readers who belong largely to the marginal class which in every country is the deciding element in all grave crises.

The Bombay Seva Sadan.—(The report presented by the Secretary of the work done by the Bombay Seva Sadan is a record of solid work during a period of twenty years.) It now includes a school for training women teachers, Home Education Classes, and a Rescue Home. Sir Cowasji Jehangir who presided made an inspiring speech in the course of which he gave expression to a legitimate sense of pride for the prominent part which Parsis have taken in the development of the institution.) In the course of his remarks he took occasion to lay stress on the futility of relying mainly on legislation for remedying social evils. The warning is timely, as there is a tendency at present to bring in all sorts of Bills without much consideration as to their intrinsic importance. Sir Cowasji said:—"We have of late heard of great social reform having been effected in other parts of the world by a stroke of the pen, but I cannot bring myself to believe that such reforms can be lasting or effective unless a majority of the people are educated, at least to tolerate the new state of affairs. Any opposition by the masses due to prejudice and superstition will set back the hands of the clock, making legislation and edicts of Government mere camouflage. It is because social reform and social work, play so important a part in our political and social material progress that it is a privilege to be associated with the men and women who administer such institutions as the Seva Sadan.

Western Influence in Madras.—In an interesting article in the current number of the Contemporary Review Miss Evelyn Bunting gives her impressions of India formed, evidently during her visit to this country last cold weather. The impressions mainly centre round Calcutta and Madras, and particularly the latter is described with a wealth of detail. What Miss Bunting has to say about the women of Madras and their activities corroborates the general opinion that that Province is fast forging ahead. "The women, too, are freely walking about in that city, but they do so themselves, with no one looking after them. On the contrary, many of them give the impression of being burdened and worn. Students, women students, of course, are different. And the vast concourse of women attending the Women's Day of Medicine was a most inspiring sight. Seated in a wide circle, row behind row, on straw mats on the ground they listened with great attention to the speeches, sometimes in English sometimes in Tamil. They passed all the resolutions put to them, but one felt that some of the no-rooms were straight from England, from the Labour Party or the Women's League, and seemed hardly to have the appeal of others such as child marriage in India, the purdah system and the nurture of children." But we are going on to add, "Indeed, one is tempted to harbour a strong suspicion that there is too much imposition of English ideas in the absence, or at least slow evolving, of nature thought. That is bound to be a province in which missionary influence predominates and the efforts at women's education and advancement were mostly due to their initiative. The women of Madras are increasingly realising it and while seeking the co-operation of the missionaries are endeavouring to divert the efforts at the amelioration of their condition in national channels.

A Model for the West.—A correspondent writing in the Tribune commends the Rit system prevailing among the Himalayan hill tribes to the attention of Western marriage reformers. He describes it thus: Either the husband or the wife, when he or she is dissatisfied with the other and wishes to break the alliance appears before the tribunes or Panches and demands it. He or she has to pay to the other party all the expenses incurred in the performance of the marriage ceremony. An agreement bond is written, which is signed by both the parties and attested by the Panchayats, meaning thereby that each one of them is free. "A concrete example will make it more clear. While repairs of my house were going on, a female labourer and her husband were also working. I was given to understand that she was no more willing to live with him as his wife. Consequently her husband was paid all the expenses by her brother who got the marriage cancelled. Now she has again married a man who has paid to her brother the money he spent. If some previous engagements were made with that man the amount would have been paid by him directly to the previous husband. "Rit" is a system of most easy Divorce. In Europe I have heard of women who led an immoral life while their husbands lived; and none of them feel the necessity of a divorce. The chief cause of this connubial infidelity is the heavy amount, that the parties are afraid to spend for the purpose. In America man and wife enjoy equal rights. They wish that when a couple cannot live together any further time they should be at liberty to separate. To make it more simple and easy they say that trial marriage system should be introduced so that if the couple pulls on satisfactorily the marriage may be confirmed, else they may go their way without appearing in a court. There is another alternative, i.e., when they marry for the first time, it may be recorded that they marry for a year or two, and that they are at liberty to separate within this time by giving notice to each other. On the contrary, many of them give the impression of being burdened and worn. Students, women students, of course, are different. And the vast concourse of women attending the Women's Day of Medicine was a most inspiring sight. Seated in a wide circle, row behind row, on straw mats on the ground they listened with MARRIAGE AND AGE OF CONSENT.

In a circular accompanying its questionnaire, the Age of Consent Committee, presided over by Sir Moropant Joshi, observes that it is to investigate matters only with regard to the law of the age of consent as laid down in sections 375 and 376 of the Indian Penal Code, and not in connection with Mr. Sarda’s Bill which proposes to penalize child marriages. It is further pointed out that even if Mr. Sarda’s Bill is passed (as it has emerged from the Select Committee) and marriages below 14 and 18 respectively for girls and boys are penalized, sexual connection by a husband after 13 and by a stranger after 14, if considered undesirable from the medical point of view or otherwise, is not covered by the two sections as they exist now. This is not very happily put. Sexual connection with a stranger can never be desirable even if the medical point of view is not opposed to it. The medical point of view is not the chief or main argument for raising the age of consent, at any rate against strangers. Even as regards marriage though no physical injury may be caused by co-habitation with girls of over or under 13 years, great harm is done to their moral and intellectual growth. The stress laid upon the medical point of view is misleading.

The questionnaire, in fact, is not drawn in a very helpful manner. A would-be witness is asked if there is any dissatisfaction with the state of the law as to the age of consent. We should be much surprised if ninety-nine witnesses out of one hundred aver that there is no dissatisfaction whatever. No change in the law would be needed if there was general dissatisfaction with its present state. The demand for improvement is due to the absence of any strong public sentiment in the matter. The law in this matter has to give the lead to public opinion. This initial misconception of the nature of the demand permeates many other questions in the list. “What are the circumstances which in your opinion would justify (1) retaining the law of age of consent as it is, or (2) making an advance of the present law.” We confess that we are not able to understand the trend of this question. A law should be changed if it is ineffective in serving its purpose or if it has become harmful to the well-being of the community. So far as it goes, the age of consent law as it is at present cannot be said to have failed of its purpose, nor can it be said that it has proved harmful to the people. The complaint about it is that it does not protect all girls who ought to be protected. The third question is even more perplexing. Very few offenders who commit rape take the trouble to ascertain beforehand what the limit of age prescribed by the Penal Code is and whether their victims have attained it. Some time back a case was reported in the papers where the victim was an infant of about 18 months. So far as strangers are concerned, the age-limit might be raised to 16 or even 18. In fact, it is necessary to do this in view of the fact that the traditional methods of protection such as purdah and seclusion of women are becoming discredited and will soon fall into disuse if adequate protection is otherwise provided by the law. The raising of the marriage age of girls too will be facilitated if the legal protection afforded to unmarried girls, makes that supposed to be afforded by child marriages superfluous.

As regards the married state, it is very difficult to answer the Committee’s question (4). It is impossible to say how many husbands refrained from molesting their child-wives and how many parents postponed the marriage of their daughters owing to the fear of the amendment of 1925 raising the age of consent to 13 years. Most probably the great majority of husbands and parents have not yet heard of this amendment. They are mostly illiterate and unless some one is prosecuted in their neighbourhood for the offence, they have no means of knowing that the Legislature at Delhi had raised the age of consent in the married state. Moreover, the legal maxim that whatever the Sovereign permits he commands correctly reproduces the popular feeling that since marriages are lawful with girls under 13, co-habitation with them must be lawful too since the idea of marriage without co-habitation is a Tolstoyan fancy beyond the understanding of the average man. In fact, to permit marriages to be celebrated with girls under 13, and to punish co-habitation with them, is like laying a trap for the unwary. No wonder, the law in the vast majority of cases is a dead letter. We do not appreciate the relevancy of the curiosity of the Committee regarding the age at which girls of different castes, communities and classes attain puberty. It is inconceivable that the communal principle should be applied to the law of rape! The only important question in the list is the 20th: “Do you consider that penal legislation fixing a higher age of consent for marital cases is likely to be more effective than legislation fixing a minimum age of marriage. Which of the two alternatives would be in consonance with public opinion in your part of the country?” We think that public opinion, if the question be rightly explained will much prefer the section on rape to be confined, only to the offence of strangers. Rape in marriage is a contradiction in terms. Many men who were by no means orthodox or bigoted, like W. C. Bonnerji and Man Mohan Ghose, objected to the raising of the age of consent in marriage in 1890, and proposed instead that child marriages should be prevented. by law. Such also is the opinion of the late Babu Govind Das who in his book on "Hindu Ethics" deals with this question with much force and clarity. He recommends that the abuses of child marriage should be put an end to by the passing of an Act which should make marriage itself, under 14 for a girl and 18 for a boy, a civil offence, and should impose a heavy fine for transgression as also some civil disabilities. "It would be useful," he says, "if the law made it clear that Purushitas and Jyotishis and the relatives of the bride and bridegroom concerned, run the risk of criminal prosecution as abettors by taking part in the marriage of girls under the age of consent." Raising the age of consent is a very clumsy way of reforming child marriages. The public will understand and eventually appreciate a direct measure aimed at preventing child marriages better than the crude attempt to cure them by the law of the age of consent of their most crucial defect and danger.

UNEMPLOYMENT.

(By Dr. Clifford Manshardt, Ph.D.).

One of my duties and one of my privileges is that of raising men to secure employment. Each month I am visited by scores of men, many of whom carry excellent certificates, and many of whom are unemployable. In between are those men not specially trained, but fully capable of doing rough labour if given the opportunity. My own somewhat futile efforts to secure jobs has convinced me that the problem of unemployment can only be dealt with in an official or semi-official way. Before any real advance can be registered we must have a system of public employment bureaus, fully co-ordinated and sharing their experience with one another.

The location of these bureaus must be in strategic centres, in close touch with both the industrial and agricultural situations. Each local office should be under the control of an influential committee made up of men who have a wide reputation for fair-dealing and for their interest in social welfare. The personnel of the committee should be such as to win the confidence of both employers of labour and labourers. This committee should be in close touch with the large employers of labour and should make every effort to become thoroughly intelligent regarding the local industrial situation. The actual administrative work would probably have to be carried out by a secretary or secretaries, chosen for no other reason than because of their fitness for the position.

All applicants for work should be carefully examined and each applicant sent only to that job for which he or she has the proper qualifications or aptitude. Each local bureau should be in touch with a competent doctor who can advise as to the proper disposal of the physically unfit-advising corrective measures for those whose condition is not serious and medical or surgical treatment for those in need of the same. Light work should be offered to the partially disabled. There must be a tremendous loss in industry today through men working at jobs for which they have neither the technical nor the mental requirements.

A particularly important feature of the local offices would be to direct the young into positions that give some promise of leading on, positions in which they may really learn useful occupations instead of to become wily workers for whom there are almost no other positions. The various local offices should be co-ordinated by Government, or at least through a central committee appointed by Government. Each local office should be constantly collecting facts regarding the local situation, which facts, as well as any other important findings, should be forwarded to the central committee. The committee would act as a clearing house and would summarize the information received, forwarding this summary to each local agency. Thus every local office would be able to see the labour situation in its totality. Over a period of years an increasingly useful body of statistics would be collected, and we would know with a fair degree of definiteness in what industries to expect slackness, in what times to expect slackness. Essential public works could then be planned to be carried out only at the seasons when it would be most difficult to place men in private industry. Furthermore, when the employment situation is seen as a whole, it is possible to provide for the moving of labour from slack areas to those in need of men.

The constant aim of the offices should be to make employment as steady as possible, minimizing unnecessary and wasteful turnover. The workers should be educated to feel a sense of responsibility towards, and a pride in the establishment in which they are employed. They should be educated to stay with the job—working conditions being favourable—and the employment offices should only recognize those employers who do provide satisfactory working conditions. In care of strikes and labour troubles, the offices should endeavour to remain in a position of neutrality, leaving the problems to be solved by those delegated to deal with them, but furnishing any authorised body with essential facts that might assist in settlement.

These few suggestions are not a programme, but if incorporated into a labour programme, I believe they would prove themselves to be of real value.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

In the Karnatak there is a widely prevalent notion that amongst a class called Talwars or Bedars a daughter dedicated to prostitution or what is called 'Suli' has the same rights of inheritance in the family as if she is a son. If there are daughters more than one and others get married while one becomes a 'Suli,' this Suli gets the right to inherit father's property while the married daughters forfeit this right. This is so because if there are brothers, get an equal right with them to succeed to her father's property. That a custom of this kind prevails in this class need not cause any surprise.

But what causes real surprise is that governments have been recognising this custom and that in a manner have been encouraging prostitution. Amongst village servants employed by government and remunerated by permanent assignment of lands are what are called Wallawars and these are almost all Talukas. Their watan or land hereditarily assigned to these is called Talwarke watan; the duty of these Wallawars is mainly to carry messages from the village to the Taluka office.
As regards this Watan, government when recording the letters of a deceased Watanlar have recognized this custom and entered the names of "Suli" daughters as sharers in their father's Watan along with their brothers; or where there was no brother the "Suli" daughter has been recognized as the sole heir.

This act on the part of government was really in contravention of Bombay Act V of 1880 by which all female heirs except the widow of the last male were precluded in right of succession to any male member of the Watanlar family. But the village officers who were mainly entrantied with this business, perhaps, thought that this custom in this caste prevailed over a special provision of law and allowed this sort of thing and the superior officers sanctioned this. It was to be expected that at most the superior officers had given some attention to the general result of their action on the moral side. By recognizing such right they have clearly encouraged prostitution in this community. I know as a matter of fact when efforts are made to induce women of this class to marry they refuse because of this risk of losing their right to the Watan.

A "Suli" is made by a special ceremony of dedication. Some twelve years back Government took special measures to put down the custom of dedicating minor girls to prostitution. Section 373 of the Indian Penal Code, while providing for such offences was very much in evidence specially in the Katarkar. But, I am afraid, when the Kalukas were left under the impression that their "Sulis" would get a right to succeed to the Watan not much benefit must have been done by the energy displayed by Government then.

It is to be hoped that some member of our Local Legislative Council would put questions to Government and induce them to hold inquiry in this matter. Your paper can also raise this question and induce the publicity officer to see what he has to say. It is no use passing a prevention of prostitution Act for Bombay or bigger towns, when the villages, the source of recruiting ground for the supply of big towns are left above. The danger of prostitutes resorting to big towns is fast increasing since the advent of the motor lorry or bus. The town with all its glamour has been brought nearer to the village, and the economic condition of the village with the recurring famines is an easy temptation for women of the village to seek their fortune in the town. It is on account of this aspect of our social life that people concerned with the Social Welfare should see that as many ways as possible of inducing women to lead an immoral life are closed.

It is a move in the right direction that legislation is to be brought by which a Hindu daughter is to be given some share in the property of her father along with her brother. The sentiment of the dowry problem would vanish if such legislation is passed. Dowry, as many other problems, is mainly an economic problem. If the only salvation for a girl is marriage; as in case she remains unmarried she has to be a mere dependent on her brother and the brother's wife then the groom or groom's parents would be induced to demand a big amount. The girl's parents also do not like the idea of leaving their daughter to the mercy of the brother's wife. This being the case marriage has become compulsory to the Hindu girl. So giving the daughter a share in the father's property would make the daughter very much self-reliant, the dowry problem would be much eased and the age of marriage would also be raised.

IMPENDING DOOM OF PURDAH.

A unique spectacle was witnessed at the mixed meeting of ladies and gentlemen of the 8th of July held at Patna in the Radhiika Sinha Institute on Sunday last. Inspite of the rains that fortunately stopped just at the time of the meeting, the gathering was unexpectedly large. In fact half of the spacious Hall of the Radhiika Institute was crowded with ladies, three-fourth of whom were such as had been observing PURDAH a day before, ray, an hour before. It really presented an impressive scene. "It is a phenomenal success," "It is wonderful who could have expected such a sight." Remarks like these were heard from people as they were dispersing after the close of this memorable meeting. "Such a sight is impossible in Orissa or Bengal. Behar has beaten Bengal and Orissa and I am proud of it," said Miss Das to the representative of the "Starlight." "I really felt that there was something like soul force which had been kept artificially imprisoned in the ladies of Behar. I realised it more than ever that Behari ladies are equal to ladies of any part of the country. I will never forget the scene"—said Mrs. P. K. Sen as she came out of the hall.

The proceedings commenced with an appropriate song by Miss Das and recitation of a poem on Purdah by Mr. Dost Muhammad Khan, specially composed for the occasion.

The audience were then entertained to a skilful words play of a girl, hardly over six years of age. Quite in fitness of things, the venerable old Sreemati Alak Raj Debi (mother of Rai Bahadur Brijnandan Singh,) was unanimously elected to the chair amidst loud cheers. At this stage the meeting was made open to the people waiting outside the hall and it was in a moment filled to the limit of its holding and many had to go away disappointed for want of accommodation. FRAGMENT OF A SPEECH

During the course of presidential address, Sreemati Alakh Prasad Debi said that it was difficult for her to understand why all persons who had been selected for the honour of presiding over the deliberations of such an epoch-making gathering. Her election to the presidential chair might however, be advantageous in one way. Her ignorance would serve as an example of the evil that the pernicious system of Purdah had done to her sex. She felt she was incapable of discharging the onerous duties of that exalted office. She was bound to make laughable mistakes which, however, would serve the purpose of showing the pathetic condition to which they had been reduced. Her follies would therefo. be of service to her in that way. Continuing she said that the two grounds on which the manifesto, issued on the 17th June by several men and women of Bihar, based its appeal were answerable. The first was that the institution was repugnant to the genius of their culture and the second was that it was inhuman to deny God's light and air to women. The origin of the system, she said, was due to the weakness and ignorance of men. It was a happy sign of the times that they had realised their mistake, but they would stand condemned before the inexorable law of God if, even after having realised the sin of keeping women in seclusion, they did not do all that lay in their power to wash away that stigma. She then proceeded to say that it was false apprehension on the part of men to think that women outside Purdah would become victims to evil designs of unscrupulous men. It was impossible to eliminate from the society a few scoundrels who would always exist—Purdah or no Purdah. But women could be trusted to take care of themselves. They prized their chastity more than their life. Some cases of moral lapses happened not because of want of Purdah, but inspite of it, for some bad men and bad women were bound to exist in the society, whether there was Purdah or no Purdah. If men regarded women as their mothers, according to the injunctions of Manu, all apprehensions of moral irregularities would vanish.

DECLARATION OF EMANCIPATION OF WOMEN

The first resolution was moved by Mrs. Asthana and seconded by Srimati Shaco Dasi Debi. It was unanimously passed. It was in the form of a declaration. It ran thus:

(a) We, the ladies and gentlemen of Patna, assembled hereby declare that we have to-day abolished the pernicious practice of Purdah, which has done and is doing incalculable harm to our country, society and particularly to women;

(b) And we appeal to other women of the Provinces, who are still wavering to banish this system as early as they can and thereby improve their health;

(c) And we further draw the attention of the ladies, coming out of Purdah, to the ways of living of our sisters in Madras. We urge them to live an unostentatious life in the midst of their families and society without observing Purdah, internal or external.

INTENSIVE PROPAGANDA NECESSARY

The second resolution that was moved by Sahityacharya Pandit Ramavatar Sharma, M.A. and seconded by Mrs. Ramavtar Sharma was unanimously passed. It ran as follows:

A provisional provincial committee be formed, consisting of the following ladies and gentlemen to carry on an intensive campaign against Purdah and for the spread of women’s education in the province. The committee will have representatives from different districts and will have power to add to its number.
The fourth resolution referred to the necessity of starting Mahila Asramas so educating women. It was as follows:

(a) "That Mahila Asramas should be started at different places where ladies might stay for certain periods and be trained to make themselves simple, industrious and useful. To make them good wives and worthy mothers and as also useful servants of the country, the Asramas will arrange for a course of preliminary training in domestic economy, midwifery, knitting, sewing, child rearing, music, art literature, history, geography etc. but as it will take unconsciously long time to have Asramas all over the province, it is resolved that a model Asrama should be started at Patna. To give effect to the resolutions passed, a sum of at least one lakh is necessary. The meeting therefore appeals that men and women should contribute as quickly as they can to make up the amount needed. Persons desirous of earmarking their donations either for the purpose of propaganda or for starting the Asrama may do so. For the collection of funds a committee of the following men is appointed with powers to add to their number: the hon. Sir Ganesh Dutt Singh, the Hon'ble Anugrah Narain Singh, Babu Rajendra Prasad, Babu Girish Chandra Prasad, Mr. H. L. Nandkalyan, Mr. Gopal Prasad, Babu Phulan Prasad Verma, Mrs. Rajendra Prasad, Mrs. S. K. P. Sinha, Mrs. Girvanthi, Mr. Kishori.

Baba Brajkishore Prasad moved the next resolution which ran as follows:

"That Mahila Samiti be formed all over the province, in every town, sub division, Thana and village for the purpose of abolishing Purdah, spreading education of women and bringing together ladies where they can exchange thoughts with each other to their mutual advantage."

He said that it would be of no good to the ladies to attend this extraordinary meeting and then relax again into a state of seclusion, after having left the meeting. The spirit engendered by the wonderful demonstration in that hall should be kept up. That was why he was moving the resolution for the formation of Mahila Samitis all over the province where women might exchange thoughts and encourage one another. He said he had been to two important centres of India, Calcutta and Bombay. The difference that he noticed was that at Bombay he was glad to see girls moving about freely, while at Calcutta only the male humanity was to be seen. He said that they should do away with Purdah at a stroke which was harmful to the body politic as a whole.

Sree-mati Mulleejee in seconding the resolution said if they had purity in their heart, they should not fear the gaze of men. Purdah system should be at once abolished. Thby in Maharashtra she said, lived an industrious life outside Purdah. They did not depend upon servants to do their ordinary work. She was about thirty and she had never spent even ten rupees on a doctor's fees because she did her own work and lived outside Purdah.

Mrs. S. K. P. Sinha, in supporting the resolution said that their condition was extremely unfortunate. They had eyes but they saw not, they had ears but they heard not, they had legs but they moved not. She therefore was very glad that this unfortunate state of things was going to be changed. That was why she associated herself with the resolution moved by Baba Brajkishore Prasad.

Mrs. Asthana also spoke on the desirability of starting Mahila Samitis all over the province. They would be of great educative value.

The resolution was unanimously passed.
so long as they denied freedom to others they could not consistently claim it for themselves. Proceeding he said that the responsibility of men was greater than that of women in as much as women had not declared war for equality with men. They had a right to be free and men were committing a grave sin by depriving them of it.

Concluding he said that the real Sangathan of India could be possible only when no part of her population was kept under artificial bondage.

APPEAL FOR FUNDS: A RALLY RESPONSE.

The resolution was put to the vote and passed. Then an appeal was made for funds. The following donations were promised at the meeting.

Sreemati Parvati Debi then exhorted the audience to act up to the spirit of the resolutions passed. They should not be afraid of wicked glances. They should have the courage to knock out the eyes that cast such glances. Hinduism gave equal status to women. As a matter of fact no ceremony could be complete without husband and wife both joining it. The meeting then dispersed after a closing song by Miss Das and Sreemati Soupati Debi.

At, CHAPRA.

About 100 ladies and an equal number of gentlemen assembled in the Town Hall at Chapra. Mrs. Masharal Haq was proposed to the chair by Miss Bodhak, which was seconded by Srimati Shyama Devi (Mrs. Nerbhadeswar Prasad) and supported by Indrasi Devi (Mrs. Phuleo Sahai Varma). A paper by Srimati Shalakumari Devi was read by her son Rabi babu for owing to Asthma she could not read it.

The following resolution was then proposed by Mrs. Kalawati Varma (Mrs. Sharda Prasad Varma):

That this meeting of the ladies and gentlemen resolves that all ladies and gentlemen assembled to-day do hereby abolish the harmful Purdah system from to-day and also determine to work for the cause of the abolition of Purdah where it is still observed.

Seconded by Mrs. Sowal (Daughter of Babu Hazari Lal Shaw, and supported by Srimati Shila Kumari Devi Mrs. Bacha Prasad and Bhagwati Devi (sister of the Hon'ble Babu Mahendra Prasad). The resolution was carried.

The meeting was also addressed by Maulana Masharal Haq, Babu Phuldeo Sabay Varma, Babu Chandra Deo Narayan and Mr. Hazari Lal Sah. With a vote of thanks to the chair moved by Babu Mathures Prasad the meeting came to a successful end.

The whole function was a brilliant success. The meeting was held in the Town Hall, but a very large number of people were present outside the hall and watched the proceedings.

The following among others were present:

- Srimati Rambhudi Devi (Mrs. Chandrakeo Narayan), Srimati Bhagwati Devi (sister of the Hon'ble Babu Mahendra Prasad), Srimati Kalavati Devi (Mrs. Sharda Prasad Varma), Srimati Gulaband Devi (Mrs. Thakur Sharan), Srimati Rajeshwari Devi (Mrs. Banky Behari Lall), Srimati Shyama Devi (Mrs. Narbhadswar Prasad), Srimati Rajulari Devi (Mrs. Gujraj Sinha), Srimati Chandravati Kumari (daughter of Babu Gujraj Sinha), Srimati Shail Kumari Devi (Mrs. Bacha Babu), Srimati Indrasi Devi (Mrs. Phuldeo Sahai Varma), Srimati Ramjigi Devi (Mrs. Phuldeo Sahai Varma), Srimati Durga Devi (Mrs. Jwala Prasad Sinha), Srimati Chandravati Devi (Mrs. Vindeshwari Prasad Sinha), Srimati Ram Priya Devi (Mrs. Bageshwar Prasad Sinha), Srimati Vinayabasini Devi (Mrs. Nageshwar Prasad Sinha), Srimati Nageswari Devi (Mrs. Bagunath Prasad), Srimati Ramnati Devi (Mrs. Ambica Prasad), Srimati Tara Devi, Srimati Radhika Devi, Srimati Radha Devi, Srimati Saraswati Devi, Srimati Oohati Kumari, Srimati Saraswati Devi, Srimati Srikumar (Mrs. Madan Mohan Sahay), Srimati Tapeshwari Devi (Mrs. Satyanarayan Prasad), Mrs. Bachubehari and Mrs. Mehta Sita Ram, Mrs. Baburbehari Prasad, Mrs. Sukdeo Prasad, Mrs. Bijbehari Sahay, Mrs. Ramji

At Arrah. A successful mixed meeting of ladies and gentlemen was held at Arrah on the 8th of July in the C. M. S. Hall. About 500 persons were present of whom about 200 were ladies. Babu Shivannanad Prasad presided on the occasion. The proceedings commenced with an opening song sung in chorus by the girls of Jain Baha Bishram. Among the ladies present were the members of the families of Babu Ram bilas Singh, Babu Jayanti Prasad, Babu Shivannanad Prasad Babu Mahabir Prasad; Babu Sant Prasad, Babu Kasubh Nath Verma, Babu Ayodhya Prasad and many others. A resolution was moved by Babu Rambilas Singh condemning the obnoxious system of Purdah, demanding its abolition and advising the ladies to fashion their lives on the model of Gurjat and Maharasthra ladies. Babu Sant Prasad seconded the resolution. S. Ms. Brabu Deb and Badami Deb also spoke. The resolution was unanimously passed. Two committees one of men and another of women, were appointed to carry on campaign against Purdah. The committee of men consists of the following gentlemen: Babu Rambilas Singh, Babu Jayanti Prasad, Babu Shivannanad Prasad, Babu Mahabir Prasad, Babu Prejnyoni Misir, Babu Bindabali Prasad, Babu Ayodhya Prasad and the committee of women consists of the following: Sreemati Chanda Bai Kasturi Bai, and Kamla Bai.

At Muzaffarpur. In pursuance of the appeal, published in the "Searchlight", a meeting of ladies and gentlemen was held in the evening of Sunday last (July 8) in the local Town Hall. About eighty ladies, representing about thirty-five respectable families attended, prominent among those who attended with the ladies of their family were Babus Jogendra Chandra Mukerjee, Advocate, Indramani Singh, Deputy Magistrate, Gaya Prasad M. L. A., Durgadas, Sungli, Honorary Magistrate, Vindrabhaw Prasad Verma, Satguruan, Manager, Banker, Bank, Janakirhari Prasad, Ramnavami Prasad, Maha Prasad Singh, Sarju Saran Singh, Upendra Nath Sen, Pleader, Dr. Bhaya, Babu Jadunath Singh, Jagdulah Tiwari, Miss Baulata De, Assistant Inspector of Schools, Lachum Narain, Secretary, Khali Board, and others. Mrs. Jogendra Chandra Mukerjee was voted to the chair. Letters were received from various ladies and gentlemen expressing sympathy with the movement.

The following resolutions were passed. "That this meeting considers, the present system of Purdah detrimental to the mental and physical development of women and considers it proper to abolish the same, keeping in view the ideal of Indian civilization and hopes that the people of this province will try their utmost to abolish it."

It was moved by Srimati Vidy Deb and supported by Srimati Kishori Deb, Girja Deb, Sunit Deb and others. The second resolution which was moved by Mrs. Indra Mani Singh ran as follows:—"That in the opinion of this meeting, it is absolutely necessary that religious, mental and physical training should be given to the ladies, and hence proper arrangements should be made for imparting education to them."

It was supported by Srimati Savitri Deb. At the close of the meeting Babu Vindrabhaw Prasad Varma in moving a vote of thanks to the chair expressed upon the male audience their duty towards the ladies. It was seconded by Babu Saru Saran Singh and the meeting came to a successful close.

At Samastipur. A crowded meeting of ladies and gentlemen was held here ye Tuesday afternoon in the local Municipal Hall. It was attended by about 103 ladies. Resolutions congratulating the ladies present who abolished Purdah and their male relations for allowing them to do so and urging others to follow their examples were passed unanimously.

At Lahurinagar. A highly successful meeting of respectable and leading ladies and gentlemen of Darbhang was held on the 8th instant in the local Town Hall under the presidency of Mr. Diwakar. A committee consisting of Mr. Dhavale, Pt. Bhabeshwar Misra, Babu Hari Balan Babu, Babu Lakshman Prasad, Babu Dharbhag and others was formed for advancing the women's cause.

At Bhagalpur. In pursuance to the appeal published in the "Searchlight" of the 17th June, for abolishing Purdah, a mixed meeting of ladies and gentlemen was held here in the C. M. S. Hall on the 8th of July, at 4-30 p.m. About 100 ladies were present at the meeting, and an equal number of gentlemen as well. Babu Bhawani Bhagwati Sahai presided on the occasion, and delivered an instructive speech, showing therein clearly, the need to abolish Purdah, and pointing out the evils of the system. Among prominent speakers were Mr. Y. A. Goelbo I.C.S., Babu Harikrishna Prasad, Mrs. Akhilabhawari Sahai, Mrs. Sen, and Mrs. S. Sahai. Important resolutions for abolishing Purdah were passed.
and carried out unanimously. A resolution was also passed for establishing a Mahila Committee, and the meeting came to successful close.

Among the prominent people, who attended the meeting were, Mrs. Bhagwan Sahai, Mr. and Mrs. Shivandan Prasad, Mrs. and Mrs. Kamleshwari Sahai, Mr. and Mrs. Akheswarn Sahai, Mr. and Mrs. Nakleshwari Sahai, Mr. and Mrs. Kasheeshwar Prasad, Mr. and Mrs. Haripada Banneree, Mr. and Mrs. Suresh Chandra Chakravarty, Mr. and Mrs. C. N. Mathur, Mr. and Mrs. Padmakant Jha, Mr. and Mrs. Satish, Chandra Sen, Mr. and Mrs. Gyan Chandra Banneree, Mr. Kailash Bhari Lal M. L. C., Mr. and Mrs. I. M. Dutta.

AT MOTHANAI.

A public meeting of ladies and gentlemen of the town was held on the 9th July in the Sastin Mandir. There was great enthusiasm among them. Mr. Shukdeo Prasad and Srimati Chhotan Debii addressed the meeting. It was resolved that the evil system of purdah be abolished. They also resolved to meet once monthly in the temple and exchange their ideas.

AT HAJPUR.

On the 8th instant in pursuance of the appeal published in the Searchlight a joint meeting was held in the Sarawati Bhawan, which was attended by about 60 ladies who came out of Purdah. In a small town like Hajipur this number is really encouraging. Babu Bindabanini Prasad Varma was invited to the Chair. He traced the history of the present movement for the abolition of purdah and pointed out some of the benevolent effects of purdah on the health and education of girls and ladies. He also distinctly told the ladies that by the abolition of purdah, they did not want them to behave like "gay butterflies of the West", but they wanted them to behave like their sisters in Maharashtra and Madras. Pandit Sahdeva Sharma next delivered his very instructive lecture on the ideals of ancient India and cited the cases of Durgavati, Sita, Savitri, and others.

He punctuated his lectures with appropriate songs. The President while calling upon Mrs. Calton to speak, pointed out to the ladies that while Mr. Calton was like them an Indian by birth, she had by educating herself stolen a march over them. Mrs. Calton delivered a very nice speech pointing out the evils of pu* dah and exhorted all to do away with it and to enjoy pure air light and cited her own example of non-observance of purdah not proving harmful in any way.

The next speaker was Babu Dips Narain Sinha M. L. C. in a short speech suited to the occasion, he moved a resolution declaring that the present custom of purdah was harmful and unnecessary, and that in order to do away with it and to provide for the education of ladies, a committee be formed consisting of 9 members with powers to add. This was seconded by Babu Satya Narain Sinha and carried unanimously.

With a vote of thanks to the ladies present proposed by Babu Sahdeo Singh and after some music the meeting dispersed.

AGE OF CONSENT COMMITTEE QUESTIONNAIRE.

The Committee on the Age of Consent which has been at work from the 31st June in Simla, had drawn up a list of 21 questions, which will shortly be forwarded to several persons in every province. The Committee will reassemble in Simla about 1st September for the Examination of Local Witnesses, after which it will start on a tour of the Provinces, extending a little over three months. Perhaps, Burma will not come within their tour programme.

The following are the questions:

1. Is there any dissatisfaction with the state of the law as to the Age of Consent, as contained in sections 375 and 376 of the Indian Penal Code?
2. What are the circumstances which, in your opinion, justify—
   (a) Retaining the Law of the Age of Consent as it is; or
   (b) Making an advance on the present law?
3. Are crimes of seduction or rape frequent in your part of the country? Has the amendment of the law made in 1925, raising the age of consent to 14 years, succeeded in preventing or reducing cases of rape outside the marital state, or improper seduction of girls for immoral purposes? If not, what measures would you propose to make the Law effective?
4. Has the amendment of 1925, raising the Age of Consent within the marital state to 13 years, been effective in protecting married girls against co-habitation with their husbands within the prescribed age limits?
   (a) By postponing the consummation of marriage;
   (b) By stimulating public opinion in that direction;
   (c) By putting off marriage beyond the age of 13.
5. If not, what steps would you propose to make it effective?
6. What is the usual age at which girls attain puberty in your part of the country? Does this differ in the different castes, communities or classes of society?
7. In co-habitation common in your part of the country among any class or classes of people—
   (a) Before puberty;
   (b) Soon after puberty; and
   (c) Before the girl completes 13 years?
8. Do any of these cases come to court? Do you attribute the practice of the early consummation of marriage before or at puberty, wherever it exists, to religious injunctions? If so, what is the authority for and the nature of that injunction, and does that authority prescribe any, and if so, what, penalty for its breach?

8. Is "Gaana" or "Garhiyaad" ceremony usually performed in your part of the country? If so, does it coincide with, or is it anterior to the consummation of the marriage? Is it performed generally after the attainment of puberty, and how soon after it?

9. Do you consider that the attainment of puberty is sufficient indication of physical maturity to justify the consummation of marriage? If not, at what age, and how long after puberty, may a girl's physical development be considered enough to justify consummation without injury to her own health and that of her progeny?

10. At what age would a girl in India be competent to give intelligent consent to cohabitation with due realisation of the consequences?

11. During your experience, professional or otherwise, have you come across cases wherein cohabitation before puberty or after puberty but before full physical development of the girl has resulted in injury to her health or body or prejudicially affected her progeny? If any, give details of age and injury sustained.

12. Do you consider early consummation and early maturity responsible for the high maternal and infantile mortality or for any other results subtly affecting the intellectual or physical progress of the people?

13. Has there been any further development of public opinion in your part of the country in favour of the extension of the age of consent in marital and extra-marital cases since the amendment of the law in 1925? If so, is it general, or confined only to certain classes?

14. Do women in your part of the country favour the early consummation of marriages for their children?

15. Have any difficulties been experienced in determining the age of girls in connection with offences under sections 375 and 376, Indian Penal Code, and what measures would you suggest for removing or minimising these difficulties?

16. Would the difficulty or margin of error in determining the age be materially reduced or minimised if the age of consent is raised to 14 years or above?

17. Would you separate extra marital and marital offences into different offences? If so, what is the nature and amount of the maximum punishment you would prescribe for offences in each class?

18. Would you make a difference in the procedure of trials for offences within and without the marital state, and if so, what would you suggest in each case?

19. Would you suggest any safeguards beyond those existing at present against collusion to protect offenders or against improper prosecution or extortion?

20. Do you consider the penal legislation fixing a higher age of consent for marital cases likely to be more effective than legislation fixing a minimum age of marriage? Which of the two alternatives would be in consonance with public opinion in your part of the country?

21. Would you prefer to rely on strengthening the penal law to secure the object in view, or on the progress of social propaganda?

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Hindu Mission's Appeal:—The President of the above Mission has issued the following appeal:—Everybody, all over India, is by this time certainly aware of the heartbreaking tales of the severe famine that has been raging in Balurghat in this district of Dinajpur (North Bengal). To what miserable plight men and women have been reduced by hunger and starvation beyond all description. Fathers are quitting their families, leaving their women and children to their own fate. To help those people in terrible distress relief work has been commenced by the Mission. Last of men in this district alone have been affected. Bankura, Kalna and some other districts in Bengal too are in the grip of devastating famine. Huge sums of money are required to cope with the situation. So, we appeal to you, my generous countrymen, to come forward with your help and succour towards the relief of the suffering humanity.

All contributions are to be remitted to the undersigned.

SWAMI SATYAMANDA, President, Hindu Mission.

A Social Reform Anniversary

The Bardoli Movement:—Last week we described briefly the situation which has arisen at Bardoli and expressed the earnest hope that Sir Leslie Wilson, in his speech at the opening of the Poona Session of the Bombay Legislative Council, would throw oil on the troubled waters. To our great surprise and disappointment, His Excellency delivered an ultimatum to the affected members of the Council representing Satara constituencies to the effect that, if within 14 days they did not accept the Government conditions for instituting a fresh inquiry for the re-assessment of Bardoli taluka, Government would take what action they deem desirable and necessary to recover the revenue, and would utilise all their powers at their command to ensure that the statutory authority of Government is maintained in every way. The people of Bardoli have not impugned the statutory authority of Government, but have only asked them to institute a fresh enquiry in view of the admittedly unsatisfactory character of the previous one, before recovering the increased revenue from them. NOTES

The Bardoli Movement:—Last week we described briefly the situation which has arisen at Bardoli and expressed the earnest hope that Sir Leslie Wilson, in his speech at the opening of the Poona Session of the Bombay Legislative Council, would throw oil on the troubled waters. To our great surprise and disappointment, His Excellency delivered an ultimatum to the affected members of the Council representing Satara constituencies to the effect that, if within 14 days they did not accept the Government conditions for instituting a fresh inquiry for the re-assessment of Bardoli taluka, Government would take what action they deem desirable and necessary to recover the revenue, and would utilise all their powers at their command to ensure that the statutory authority of Government is maintained in every way. The people of Bardoli have not impugned the statutory authority of Government, but have only asked them to institute a fresh enquiry in view of the admittedly unsatisfactory character of the previous one, before recovering the increased revenue from them. The same day answering a question in the House of Commons, Earl Winterton the Under-Secretary of State for India tore down the veil with which Sir Leslie Wilson had clothed his threat, and declared that the Bombay Government had the full support of the Government of India as well as that of Britain

This exactly represents the Indian demand and this is what Sir Leslie Wilson and the Secretary of State regard as an act of lawlessness to be put down forcibly with all the resources at their disposal. No one with a particle of political insight can doubt that the violence of Government will recall upon themselves, but the question for the Bardoli leaders is, whether they should expose their people to the horrors probably of a martial law regime in order to achieve their end. The Governor has promised a full, open and independent enquiry if the revenue is paid up, and we think that they have nothing to lose and much to gain by accepting the offer on that condition. If the inquiry leads to no satisfactory result, it will never be too late to resume the struggle.

A Social Reform Anniversary:—The propagandist side of the social reform movement had been neglected by its leaders for many years. Except when a widow remarriage was celebrated and the neighbourhood was agitated by the affront to orthodox sentiment, there was nothing done to popularise the movement. The late Mr. V. N. Bhajekar when he was Secretary of the Bombay Social Reform Association noticed this defect, and having a genius for propagandistic work, hit upon the annual celebration of July 25, the date on which the Act legalising the remarriage of Hindu widows was passed by the Indian Legislative Council in 1856, a red-letter day in the Indian social reformers' calendar. Public meetings and solemn pledges were held all over the country, and huge, specially designed posters, depicting the hardships and horrors of especially of child-widowhood were freely supplied to the organisers for use to advertise the meetings. For several years Mr. Bhajekar's enthusiastic efforts were successful in creating vivid interest on the subject. Unfortunately he had to leave Bombay on being appointed Chief Judge in a Central India State and owing to that and the country's absorption in politics the celebration of the 25th of July fell into abeyance. It is a sign of the reviving interest in social reform, that the practice was revived this year. The meeting held last Wednesday in the Prarthana Samaj Hall was addressed by several prominent social workers, among whom were Dr. Deshmukh, President of the Bombay Municipal Corporation, Mrs. Avantikabai Gokhale, Mrs. Anagati, Dr. Kalyanadas Desai, President of the Bombay Branch of the Arya Samaj and the local representative of the Widow Marriage endowment of the late Sir Ganga Ram. In 1895 Pandit Narayan Keshav Vaidya published a valuable compilation of the official papers connected with the passing of the Act.
of the Act of 1858, with a learned introduction by Mr. Justice Ranade in which he sets forth a list of reforms which were urgently needed to ameliorate the condition of Hindu women in society. This publication is out of print. We publish today the memorial of Ishwarchandra Vidyasagar, the original draft Bill with the Statement of Objects and Reasons, and the Hon. Mr. Grant's powerful and eloquent speech in introducing it in the Indian Legislative Council.

Europeans and Indian Servants:—Miss Evelyn M. Bunting to whose article in the Contemporary Review we referred last week calls attention to the harsh treatment of servants by Europeans in India. She writes:—"One of the things that strikes visitors with something of a shock is the way servants are spoken to and spoken of. They must, of course, need a lot of telling, their idea of life is so primitive. But are they not expected—without education or training—to enter into the most complicated trains of reasoning of their highly educated foreign masters at the very briefest words of only an injury to the present generation but in India even when be under the unseasoned Indian servant, who is little to the way he speaks both to the teachers and to express to the pupils have to work for good health. We are sure it will not be very long before the monogamous ideal which is the basis of a civilised society is realised in Afghanistan.

Social Reform in Afghanistan:—His Majesty the King of Afghanistan is determined to root out unworthy customs prevailing in his country. According to a recent announcement the King declared that polygamy was one of the chief causes of corruption, and in future any Government servant taking a second wife should tender his resignation. With regard to the people already having more than one wife an announcement should be made after the fryga. His Majesty advised his officers and subjects not to copy bad customs and habits such as drinking, and dwelt on the necessity of sports for good health. We are sure it will not be very long before the monogamous ideal which is the basis of a civilised society is realised in Afghanistan.

Open Air Schools:—We have received an interesting booklet by Mr. S. C. Chatterji on the subject of "open air" education for children ("A Plea for Open Air Schools in India"—published by Messrs. D. B. Taraporevala & Co., Bombay—Price Rs. 1/8). The author's purpose in writing this pamphlet is to interest the public in the subject and to encourage research in this direction. He regards the introduction of "open air schools" in India as of vital importance to the country. Mr. Chatterji states that in our growing towns, under the present system both the teachers and the pupils have to work under unhealthy conditions. The value of open air institutions to the more delicately constituted school children will be considerable. Mr. Chatterji in his book has dealt with the requirements of a model open air school at length but the main defect of the book is the fact that it discusses in a few lines the efforts made in India towards establishing such institutions. It is true that such attempts have been few but a critical study of existing open air institutions in this country would have done much to popularise the book. Mr. Chatterji, moreover, could have better achieved his object which he informs us in his preface is to create public interest in the subject, by issuing his pamphlet of fifty to sixty pages at a lower price.

WIDOWS AND ADOPTION.

Mr. B. V. Jadhav's Bill, which we publish today to restrict the right of adoption enjoyed by Hindu widows in the Bombay Presidency, has evoked a large volume of protest. Numerous women's meetings are being held all over the province to protest against its being passed into law. In the Statement of Objects and Reasons, Mr. Jadhav observes that the latitude allowed in the Bombay Presidency to widows, is causing great injustice to Bhaubands (kinmen) whose rightful property goes to another, and a stranger is introduced into the family house and property simply on account of the whims of an inexperienced young and, many a time, misguided widow. The differences in the law as administered by the different High Courts are described as follows: In Bengal a Hindu widow cannot adopt unless she is authorised to adopt by her husband in writing. In Madras and the United Provinces she can adopt if authorised by the husband or by the consent of the nearest agnate. In Bombay, however, a husband's authority is presumed in the absence of prohibition and she can adopt even a grown-up man from any family to the exclusion of the next of kin of her deceased husband. "Such an adoption," says Mr. Jadhav, "is brought about by interested persons and the widow is utterly ruined, as she is deprived of the enjoyment of her husband's property and becomes entitled to maintenance only." Mr. Jadhav evidently wants to make out that his Bill is intended in the interests of the Hindu widow, and not in those of the Bhaubands. It would seem otherwise to many. The Hindu widow, it is notorious, is victimised by her deceased husband's relatives who regard her as an unwelcome intruder. She becomes the drudge of the household and her very sight is considered inauspicious. In former times, the widow was immolated upon her husband's funeral pyre. This has been put an end to by the criminal law, but short of this, she still suffers many disabilities and indignities which make life intolerable. The Bhaubands are the chief culprits in this matter, and it is to them that Mr. Jadhav wants to transfer the right now enjoyed by Hindu widows in Bombay Presidency.

The comparative liberality of the Hindu law as administered in the Bombay Presidency to women, is due chiefly to the fact that the position of Hindu women, owing to historical causes, has been higher there than in other parts of the country. Women played an important part in Maratha history. Shivaji's mother inspired her famous son in all the important events of his illustrious career. Hindu princesses ruled kingdoms and even commanded armies. The political and military necessities of the time left much initiative to women who, during the frequent absences of their husbands and other male relatives, had to manage their domestic and family concerns themselves. On no section of the community does political subjection tell more detrimentally than upon women. Beside these historical reasons the liberality of Hindu law as administered in the Bombay Presidency is largely due to the influence of a succession of eminent Hindu judges on the Bench of the Bombay High Court who felt it their duty to interpret and apply the law not in a crudely literal sense but in the spirit of the times in which they had to administer it. Mr. Jadhav would reverse this tendency so gratifyingly peculiar to Bombay, and assimilate the law of adoption here to the less generous models of other provinces. And why? Because inexperienced, young widows do not adopt their husband's relatives but prefer perhaps to adopt their own. At the back of Mr. Jadhav's reasoning is the assumption that a man's "next of kin" has a greater right to his property than his widow, and that it is an injustice to the Bhaubands if the widow does not adopt one of them. It is not surprising that women feel that his Bill is aimed at restricting their rights. Mr. Jadhav's statement about the whims of inexperienced, young and misguided widows introducing strangers into the family house and property, may be true, but how is it worse than the self-interest of Bhaubands depriving the unfortunate widow of her rights and compelling her to eke out a miserable livelihood, as a domestic drudge in the house which she ruled in her husband's life-time?

We consider Mr. Jadhav's Bill as an attempt to put back the hands of the clock and we are sure it will be rejected by the common sense of the people of Bombay and their representatives in the Legislative Council. We must say, however, that the system of adoption itself is out of tune with the spirit of the times and does not afford sufficient protection to Hindu widows. In the year 1928-29, the widow's right cannot inherit property and must provide herself by a legal fiction of a son in order to avoid her husband's property from passing to his brothers and other collateral relatives, in which case she would have nothing to look forward to except a life of unmutilated dependence. As the mother of an adopted son she may have some sort of claim, however vague, upon him. As the widow of an agnate she would have only the right to a bare maintenance. It is to escape this hard destiny that widows are led to adopt sons. If they had the right of inheriting property themselves we are sure that they would never think of encumbering themselves with fictitious sons who, in the nature of things, can have no filial feeling for them and who often turn out to be graceless ingrates who exploit the ignorance and fond affection of their adoptive mothers for their own selfish ends. Mr. Jadhav's contention is true so far, but the remedy is not to deprive Hindu widows of the rights they already possess in this Presidency but to endow them with the further right of being eligible to inherit in their own right from their husband's property. We are glad that Mr. Haribals Sarda has drafted a Bill for introduction into the Legislative Assembly to effect this object.
The Humble Petition of the undersigned Hindu Inhabitants of the Province of Bengal, respectfully sheweth,

That by long established custom the marriage of Widows among Hindus is prohibited.

That in the opinion and firm belief of your Petitioners, this custom, cruel and unnatural in itself, is highly prejudicial to the interests of morality, is otherwise fraught with the most mischievous consequences to society.

That the evil of this custom is greatly aggravated by the practice among Hindus of marrying their sons and daughters at a very early age, and in many cases in their very infancy—so that female children not unfrequently become widows before they can speak or walk.

That in the opinion and firm belief of your Petitioners, this custom is not in accordance with the Shastras, or with a true interpretation of Hindu Law.

That your Petitioners and many other Hindus have no objections of conscience to the marriage of widows, and are prepared to disregard all objections to such marriages, founded on social habit or on any sample resulting from an erroneous interpretation of religion.

That your Petitioners are advised that by the Hindu law, as at present administered and interpreted in the Courts of Her Majesty and the East India Company, such marriages are illegal, and the issue thereof would be deemed illegitimate.

That Hindus, who entertain no objections of conscience to such marriages, and who are prepared to contract them notwithstanding social and religious prejudices, are by the aforesaid interpretation of Hindu law prevented therefrom.

That in the humble opinion of your Petitioners, it is the duty of the Legislature to remove all legal obstacles to the escape from a social evil of such magnitude which, though sanctioned by custom, is felt by many Hindus to be a most injurious grievance, and to be contrary to a true interpretation of Hindu law.

That the removal of the legal obstacles to the marriage of widows, would be in accordance with the wishes and feelings of a considerable section of pious and orthodox Hindus, and would in noway affect the interests, though it might shock the prejudices, of those who conscientiously believe that the prohibition of the Marriage of widows is sanctioned by the Shastras, or who uphold it on fancied grounds of social advantage.

That such marriages are neither contrary to nature nor prohibited by law or custom in any other country or by any other people in the world.

That your Petitioners, therefore, humbly pray Honorable Council will take into early consideration the propriety of passing a law to remove all legal obstacles to the marriage of Hindu widows, and to declare the issue of all such marriages to be legitimate.

That your Petitioners, as in duty bound, shall ever pray.

ISHVARCHANDRA VIDYASAGAR, and others.

4th October 1855.

A BILL
To remove all legal obstacles to the marriage of Hindu Widows.

(As originally introduced in Council.)

Preamble.—Whereas it is known that, by the law as administered in the Civil Courts established in the territories in the possession and under the Government of the East India Company, Hindu Widows, with certain exceptions, are held to be, by reason of their having been once married, incapable of contracting a second valid marriage, and the offspring of such Widows by any second marriage are held to be illegitimate, and incapable of inheriting property; and whereas many Hindus believe that this imputed legal incapacity, although it is in accordance with established custom, is not in accordance with a true interpretation of the precepts of their religion, and desire that, the Civil law administered by the Courts of justice shall no longer prevent those Hindus who may be so minded from adopting a different custom, in accordance with the dictates of their own consciences, and whereas it is just to relieve all such Hindus from this legal incapacity of which they complain, and the removal of all legal obstacles to the marriage of Hindu Widows will tend to the promotion of good morals and to the public welfare—it is enacted as follows:

I. Marriage of Hindu Widows legalized.—No marriage contracted between Hindu shaall be invalid and the issue of no such marriage shall be illegitimate, by reason of the woman having been previously married or betrothed to another person since deceased, any custom and any interpretation of Hindu Law to the contrary notwithstanding.

II. Estate of deceased husband to descend to next heirs on remarriage of Widow.—All rights and interests which any Widow may by law have in her deceased husband's estate, either by way of maintenance or by inheritance, shall upon her second marriage, cease and determine as if she had then died; and the next heirs of such deceased husband then living, shall thereupon succeed to such estate. Provided that nothing in this Section shall affect the rights and interests of any Widow in any estate or other property to which she may have succeeded by inheritance otherwise than through her deceased husband, or to which she may have become entitled under the will of her deceased husband, or in any estate or other property which she may possess as Stridhan, or which she may have herself acquired, either during the lifetime of her deceased husband, or after his death.

STATEMENT OF OBJECTS AND REASONS TO THE ABOVE BILL.

A Petition, signed by very nearly one thousand members of the most respectable Hindu families in and near Calcutta, dated 4th October 1855, has been presented to the Legislative Council; the object of which petition is that a law may be passed to remove all legal obstacles to the marriage of Hindu Widows, and to provide that the issue of such marriages, if in other respects the marriages are legal, shall be legitimate—any custom and any interpretation of Hindu Law to the contrary notwithstanding.

The Petitioners allege that, by a long established custom, such marriages are prohibited; that this custom is cruel, unnatural, immoral, and mischievous; that, in their firm belief, it is not in accordance with a true interpretation of the Hindu Shastras; that they are conscientiously impelled to disregard it; and that they are prevented from following Hindu Shastras, to pronounce such marriages to be invalid, and makes the issue of such marriages illegitimate. Wherefore they pray that, without affecting the interests of any other Hindus who entertain a different belief, they may be relieved from the legal restriction now existing, and that the learned and eminent Colleges, who are of a different persuasion, be allowed an alternative of re-marriage.

The object of this Bill is to give the Petitioners, and all who agree with them, such an alternative to either class.

There is no doubt that all the statements made in the petition are true. A large number of Hindu families are prevented by the municipal law of the country, as now existing in practice, from acting as they wish to act, and as they believe it right to act. All Hindus of caste, though they should be anxious to encourage the marriage of Widows, are prevented from taking even a first step towards such encouragement, by this state of the municipal law.

This prohibitory law, viewed generally, so far from being in the interests of good morals, and so far from tending to human happiness, is admitted by all to operate intensely to the injury of good morals, and to create at best frightful amount of human misery. Upon general grounds, therefore, the enforcement of this prohibitory law by the Civil Code of the country is indefeasible. It is true that the custom which prohibits the marriage of widows operates, and ought to operate, as a moral sanction upon all who believe that the prohibition is in accordance with the directions of an authority which they revere, and to which obedience is a primary duty. But this circumstance affords no justification to a Municipal Law which enforces, by worldly penalties, such prohibitions as those who believe them, a dogmatic prohibition, which operates injuriously to morals and cruelly to individuals. Still less does it afford a justification or excuse for a law which enforces such a prohibition by worldly penalties against those who dislike the dogma, and who regard those who believe it as the victims of a false interpretation. If the learning, reason, and conscience of a single Hindu father direct him to save his little child from life-long misery or vice, the law of the country should not stand in his way. It is not less abominable to force a Hindu who believes and abhors this fatal interpretation of the Hindu Shastras, to act in accordance with it, than it would be to force a Christian or a Mahomedan, because he happened to live amongst people of another creed, to sacrifice his daughter in the same manner.

The Bill now presented will wipe out that blot in the Municipal Law of India. At the same time it will leave all those Hindus who do not agree in the opinion of the Petitioners precisely as they are now. It does not pretend to say what is the right interpretation of the directions for conduct in respect of marriage in the text books; or which of the conflicting authorities ought to be followed by a Hindu. It will interfere with the tenets of no human being; but it will prevent the tenets of so many set of men from inflicting misery and vice upon the families of their neighbours, who are of a different and a more humane persuasion.

These are my chief reasons for proposing this enactment.

17th November 1855. J. P. GRANT.

THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL OF INDIA.

Calcutta, 17th November 1855.

On the order of the day for the first reading of the Bill to remove all legal obstacles to the marriage of Hindu Widows being read,—

The Honorable Mr. J. P. Grant said, before he approached the subject of this important Bill, he desired to explain, in a few words, how its introduction had fallen into his hands. After his Honorable and learned friends his right hand (Sir James Colville) had left Calcutta, Pandit Ishwarbandi Vilasini, the learned and eminent Principal of the Sanskrit College, who was the chief mover in the agitation out of which the Bill had arisen, and was one of the subscribers to the Petition which had been presented to the Council a few weeks ago, praying for the measure, called upon him and consulted him on the propriety of asking the Council for such a law as the Bill now brought in. * He (Mr. Grant) was not then aware that the Pandit had previously consulted any other Member of the Council; and, to fortify his own opinion respecting the enactment of such a law, he consulted two or three Honorable Members more competent than himself to give an opinion on the question. Such of the Honorable Members whom he consulted as were present, would have an opportunity of expressing their own sentiments; but he might mention the name of one of them who was not present (Sir Lawrence Peel) who had since retired from the Council, and whose retirement he could not regard otherwise than as a national misfortune. Sir Lawrence Peel agreed entirely in the principle of the measure proposed. Fortified by these opinions, he (Mr. Grant) promised Pandit Iahwar Chander that, if the Petitioners presented their petition, he would bring in a Bill such as they asked for. After he had given his notice for the first reading, his Honorable and learned friend to his right returned from Madras, and he then learned that his Honorable and learned friend had been consulted before his departure on the same subject; and had interested himself greatly "in it. He (Mr. Grant) much regretted that he had not been aware of this fact before, because had he been aware of it, he should certainly have left this Bill to abler hands. He had been ready to make it over to those able hands; but it was thought better that he should make the motion of which he had given notice. To this arrangement, he the more readily acceded from the consideration that, as this was a motion affecting the religious usages of Hindus, it required to be seconded; and was open to discussion on the first reading. His Honorable and learned friend had promised to second him, and therefore all his own deficiencies would be amply compensated by the Speaker who would address the Council after him.
THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER [July 28

He did not move this question without having carefully and earnestly considered it; for it was one of a class of questions which, in his opinion at least, ought never to be approached without great deliberation and caution. The questions which generally came under the attention of the Council were, more or less, of a technical nature; and the official training and experience of Honorable Members enabled them to feel a just confidence that, with ordinary care, their legislation upon such questions would be suitable to the people to whom it was applied. But this was a question of a different kind. It was a question which affected the most important social institution of the people, and went home to the bosom of every man and every woman of the Hindu persuasion in this immense Empire. Not only therefore had he not thought it right to propose the present measure until he had satisfied himself of the abstract propriety of his principle; he had not thought it right to propose the measure until after he had endeavoured to regard it from that point of view which would be taken by those to whom it was intended to apply. Regarding it as best he could from that point of view, he felt convinced that, prepared as the Bill was, no candid Hindu, whatever his own opinion as to the interpretation of the Sbstras upon the question involved might be, would say that it was either offensive or unjust to any class.

The petition on which the Bill was founded, made certain allegations of fact. It said that, by a long established custom, the marriage of Hindu Widows is prohibited; that the Civil Law of this country, as administered both by Her Majesty's and the Company's Courts, incapacitates Hindu widows from contracting second marriages, by pronouncing such marriages to be invalid, and making their issue illegitimate. It proceeded to say that this compels Hindu widows, whatever their own opinions or the opinions of their families in this matter may be, to continue widows all their lives, in some cases from the age of five years. It further said that this state of the law inflicts great cruelty upon the widows, who, being now unable to burn as Sati with their deceased husbands, have no alternative left, and must lead a life of servile mortification, in fact, a life of the most painful asceticism. It said that this custom cruel and unnatural in itself, is highly injurious to the interests of morals, and is otherwise most mischievous to society. From these premises, it argued that a law having such effect ought not to be forced upon any one who disapproves of it and it prayed that, as the petitioners are of opinion that the custom is not in accordance with a true interpretation of the Hindu Shastras, they and those who agree with them might be relieved from the legal restriction of which they complain.

Now, if these premises could be proved, this argument was conclusive. The Legislative Council could not stand in the way of the removal of a law which perpetuated a public wrong. The Law enforcing upon unwilling people a prohibition which, so far from being for the public interests was in the highest degree mischievous. He would speak of these premises in their order. He believed there was no legal decision affording a precedent which positively established the point that the marriage of Hindu widows is invalid under the Law as it is now administered in British India and an intelligent native gentleman who had spoken to him on the subject of this measure, had expressed an opinion that, in the absence of such a precedent, it would be premature to legislate because we do not know whether the court will enforce the interpretation of the Hindu doctrine which the petitioners presume the they will. But even if this question of law were really a doubtful point, he could not think the objection valid. He could not think that it would be right to sacrifice even a single Hindu family to such an objection. But it appeared to him that it was very certain that the Courts would decide in the manner alleged by the petitioners. The custom e the country was universally against the marriage of Hindu widows amongst the higher castes, and all modern English text books affirmed that the law was as the petitioners allege. Indeed, text-writers spoke on this point with less qualification perhaps than they might have done, if they had given more attention to it. But the custom prohibiting re-marriage was followed so universally in practice, that the point did not appear to have been very deeply studied by any of the English writers on Hindu law. However that might be, he could quote enough from received authorities to show that the petitioners were correct in saying that our Courts would disallow the marriag• of a Hindu widow. Sir Thomas Strange, a former Chief Justice of the Supreme Court at Madras, in his work on the "Elements of Hindu Law," in a chapter on "Widowhood," wrote thus:—

"To this tyrannic instance of marital selfishness, must be added the prohibition to women of second marriages, and that this should apply, as it does, even to young widows, is an abomination, surpassed only, if at all, by the custom that has just been denounced.," that is the statement of a learned Judge of a Supreme Court who was most sensible of the evil of the custom, of whose wish therefore, to open the law for the benefit of widows we might be sure; but who entertained no doubt of the existence of the prohibition as a legal impediment. He would now quote a high authority of the Company's Courts, Sir W. Macaughten, from a work written when he was Registrar of the Calcutta Supreme court. Sir W. Macaughten, in his "Principles of Hindu Law," wrote:

"It is well known that women are betrothed at a very early period of life, and it is this betrothment in fact, which constitutes marriage. The contract is then valid and binding to all intents and purposes. It is complete and irreparable immediately on the performance of certain ceremonies, without consummation.

Second marriages after the death of the husband first espoused, are wholly unknown to the Hindu law; though in practice, among the inferior castes, nothing is so common."

The practice amongst the inferior castes had, of course, nothing whatever to do with the practice amongst Brahmins and other higher castes of Hindus. He thought he had said enough to convince the Council that, if they wished to make it possible for a Hindu widow to marry with the reasonable expectation of having her marriage held valid, and her children pronounced legitimate, they must pass some such law as that which he had the honour to propose.

The next point to which the petitioners referred was the extreme cruelty to widows of the prohibition against re-marriage. He would not trouble the Council with quotations of what the Shastras required of widows who may not barn with their deceased husband; because all that they did require was not strictly practised, and his object in introducing this Bill was entirely practical. Of the mutilations which the Shastras enjoined, it was difficult to say whether they were more remarkable for their cruelty or for their fantastic absurdity. But he would refer to the Council a paper which had been partly supplied to him by a Hindu gentleman of great knowledge, and partly taken down from that gentleman's mouth, which described the mode of life which a Hindu widow of respectability is now actually required to adopt, until the latest day of her life.

"A widow is required to live a life of chastity, the only alternative being to ascend the funeral pile of her husband. Her manner of life is minutely prescribed. Not only must she see no man, she must also avoid every approach to ease, luxury, or pleasure: she must wear no ornament; her hair must be shaved, or at least must be worn dishevelled, she must not see her face in a mirror, nor use perfume or flowers, must not freely anoint her body; and her dress must be plain, coarse, and dirty. The use of any kind of conveyance is prohibited, and she must not rest on a bed. Her food is limited as to quantity as well as quality. She must not take more than a single coarse meal a day, and the betel leaf, which terminates every repast in India, and is often substituted for a meal, is denied her. Besides other facts, perhaps a dozen in the year, the Hindu widow is required to abstain absolutely from food and drink twice a month one day and night, during every bright and dark period of the moon, on the 25th and 26th day of her age, from which fast not even severe sickness can give her a dispensation."

Sometimes he believed it one of the moveable facts, of which there were understood about a dozen in the year, happened to fall the day before or the day after the eleventh day of the waxing, or of the waning moon, this state of strict fasting lasted forty-eight hours. During these facts, these unhappy victims, although a fever might be consuming them, and the hot winds might be blowing, were allowed not one drop of water, not one drop of medicine, though it should be necessary to save their lives. The paper from which he was quoting proceeded to say:

"All amusements are strictly prohibited to her. She is not to be present whose there is singing or dancing or at any family rejoicing; she is not even to witness any festive procession."

This was the life to which a little prattling girl of five years old, taken from her dolls and her toys, and pronounced to be a widow, was condemned for the whole remainder of her existence upon earth.

He now came to the immorality which the petition stated the prohibition engendered. He did not wish to dwell on this point longer than was absolutely necessary; for it was one which could be agreeable to no body, and must be peculiarly distasteful to those for whose benefit this Bill was intended. But it was impossible to shirk the point altogether; for, in truth it was the strongest argument in support of the Bill. The Hindu practice of Brahmocharis was an attempt to struggle against Nature, and like all other attempts to struggle Nature, was entirely unsuccessful. Every candid Hindu would admit that, in the majority of cases, young Hindu widows fall into vice; that in comparatively few cases are these severe rules for a life of mortification virtuously observed; that in many cases, a licentious and profligate life is entered upon in secret; and that, in many other cases the wretched widows are impelled to desert their homes and to live a life that brings open disgrace upon their families. He would read to the Council a very short passage on this subject from Ward’s description of the manners and customs of the Hindus:

"Early marriages also give rise to another dreadful evil: almost all these girls, after marriage, remain at home one, two, or three years; and during this time, numbers are left widows, without having enjoyed the company of their husbands a single day. These young widows, being forbidden to marry, almost without exception, become prostitutes."

This was the evidence of an English witness. He would now quote the evidence of a native witness, a learned Maratha Brahmin, who it might be presumed was also a man of the world, as he was the son of the minister of a late Raja of Nagpur. Eighteen or twenty years ago, this Brahmin wrote an essay on the second marriages of widows, in which he argued that the prohibition of such marriages was contrary to the Shastras, and urged the general adoption of a contrary custom. Major Wilkinson, when Resident of Nagpur, published the essay, with an "introduction" by himself, in which he gave this abstract of the Brahmin’s statements upon this point:

"To revert to our author, he maintains that the present prohibition against the second marriages of widows, especially those infant widows, is highly impolitic and unwise, because, in the first place, it disappoints the palpable purpose of the Creator in having sent them into the world; secondly, because it inevitably leads to great moral depravity and vice on the part of those widows; thirdly, because it inevitably causes a frightful amount of infanticide and of abortions; fourthly, because the maintenance of these widows in an honorable and virtuous course of life causes a ceaseless, though fruitless anxiety to their parents, and parents-in-law, &c., fifthly because these widows, inevitably rendered corrupt and vicious by themselves, by the hard and unnatural laws operating on them cannot be prevented from corrupting and destroying honor and virtue of all other females with whom they associate."

It was a Brahmin who was speaking. To show that there was no exaggeration of the forms of evil which resulted from the system, Major Wilkinson specified several cases that had come within his own official knowledge within a very few months between the receipt by him of the Brahmin’s essay, and the publication of his own work. Major Wilkinson specified no less than nine cases, of which three had occurred in ten days. He (Mr. Grant) would not trouble the Council by going through those cases: they were of considerable length: but Major Wilkinson’s work was at the service of any Honorable Member who might desire to refer to it. He would only say that these cases were proved instances of frightful murders, incests, and, in short, of every abomination which it was possible to conceive, caused by the prohibition of the remarriage of widows.

He thought he had proved the premises set out in the petition; and he was sure that, being convinced of their truth, it was the bounden duty of the Legislature to abolish a law which could force this cruel and demoralizing prohibition upon one single human being who disbelieved the doctrine upon which it proceeded. The Legislature had no more right to prevent a single Hindu who believed that the existing prohibition was not in accordance with a true interpretation of the Shastras, and who, from a wish to preserve his widow-daughter from life-long misery or vice, desired that she should marry again, from acting in accordance with his humane motives than it had to force a Mahomedan or a Christian, because he happened to live amongst people of another creed, to sacrifice his daughter in the same manner. But this the Council would do, if it refused to pass some such law as that which he held in his hand. This was a law which, while it set the petitioners and all who concurred with them free to allow the dictates of their own consciences, would leave all other Hindus precisely as they were now. It did not pretend to say what was the right interpretation of the directions for conduct in respect to marriage in the text-books or which of the conflicting authorities ought to be followed by a Hindu. It would interfere with the tenets of no class of people, it would offend the religious feelings of no human being.

The law the petitioners proposed was not now proposed for the first time. The terrible consequences of the prohibition had induced many wise and good Hindus, at many times, and in many places, to attempt to remove it. There was perhaps no part of India where some distinguished member of the Hindu community had not, within the last few hundred years, made this attempt. He had taken a note of a few instances in which such attempts had been made. Between three and four hundred years ago, in Bengal, Raghunantans, a very learned and celebrated Pandit, who had written a Digest of the Hindu Law, which formed he believed in Bengal a text-book to this day, made a resolute attempt of this kind. He had at one time firmly resolved that his own widowed daughter should remarry; but the attempt failed. Raja Rajnijit of Daon, about the middle of the last century, made a similar attempt which seems to have been almost successful. He obtained a Vyarasta or law opinion of a large body of learned Pandits; but finally his attempt also failed.

About the same time, the Chief of Kotah made a similar attempt, with no better success. Sir Thomas Strange, in his work on Hindu Law, alludes to an instance in which a large assembly of Pandits at Poona actually gave permission to the widow daughter of a Hindu of high caste to remarry, and the permission was acted upon;

Several similar attempts by Hindus to alter this inveterate custom had been made of late years. He had observed, amongst the papers of the Law Commission, a paper written by a learned Brahmin of Madras nearly twenty years ago, praying that a law to the effect of the present Bill might be passed. He had already mentioned the essay of a Maratha Brahmin of Nagpur, published about the same time. In Calcutta, there was a great agitation on the subject about ten years ago, which was repeated two years ago. It was in consequence of the failure of this last attempt that Iwarchandra had taken up the subject; and the petition lately presented was the result.

It was true that all these attempts had failed. But why had they failed? We know that a caste or any number of castes can introduce any such change of custom if they please. But to do so, there must be a great majority in favour of the change. Now, we know that it is the nature of all reforms of this sort to be gradual; to begin with a minority, who, by argument and example in the course of time, win the majority over to their views. For this reason, heretofore, therefore, fairly with liberty to act according to their own consciences and feelings of humanity.

The very question now before the Council—the question of a law making Hindu widows legally capable of contracting a second valid marriage—had been discussed officially in the late Indian Law Commission; and he took some shame to himself for not having bad that discussion in mind before he gave notice of his motion, because he found that he was Secretary to the Law Commission when the question first arose, though not at the time when the full discussion of it took place. He would, read one paragraph of a letter issued under his signature, dated the 4th July, 1837, which the Commissioners of the day had caused to be written, on a proposition (to which they objected) that, for the prevention of infanticides, the concealment of pregnancy should be made a specific offence.

"The Law Commissioners observe with deep regret that the Western Sadar Court believes child murder to be a prevalent crime in the provinces under their jurisdiction. The Law Commissioners think that much of this crime may be owing to the cruel law which prevents Hindu Widows from contracting a second legal marriage. The Law Commissioners are sensible that a more alteration in the law will immediately and directly affect little towards remedying the evil. But they are not without expectation that an alteration of the law would induce an alteration of feeling in this matter; and, if that could be effected, more would be done towards repressing child murder than could be done by the most severe laws. They are now collecting information on this point, the result of which will daily be laid before the Government of India."

At the same time, the Commissioners addressed a Circular calling for information on the subject, and for the opinions of the Sadar Courts at all the four Presidencies. The returns to that Circular were entirely unfavourable to the views of the Law Commission. He had appended them to his Statement of Objects and Reasons, and would not trouble the Council with reading them now; but if Honorable Members would refer to them that the objections of the Sadar Courts resolved themselves into these:—First, that an Act removing legal obstacles to the Marriage of Hindu Widows would be an interference with Hindus in the matter of their own law and religion; secondly, that it would entirely dislocate the frame-work of the Hindu Law of Inheritance; and thirdly, (an objection which the Council at Madras) that it would be entirely a dead letter. Now, if the Act would be entirely a dead letter, it was very clear that it could not be any interference with Hindus in the matter of their Law or religion and could not dislocate the framework of the Hindu Law of Inheritance. He might, therefore, fairly claim the authority of the Madras Sadar Court, as being against the authority of the other Courts upon the first and second points of objection.

He would say a very few words with reference to these two points of objection. He had said before that the Act, as framed did not pronounce any opinion whatever as to what should be the proper interpretation of the Sutras on the question of Marriage. Of the governing authorities who had written on the subject, it did not say which authority ought to be followed. At left every Hindu to be guided, in his conduct by the direction of any text-book to which his own judgment and conscience inclined. He denied, therefore, that there could be the slightest color of reason for saying that the Act would be an interference with the religious opinions or feelings of various Hindus. He said that this Bill would interfere with the religious feelings of no Hindu. He was not sure that it might not interfere with the sports of some Hindus. In every country, there were too many who made it their sport to tyrannise over the conduct and the consciences of others. He could not be sure that his Bill might not be displeasing to some among this ground. He did not know whether any remonstrance he actually submitted to the Council against this measure, though he understood that this understood that submitting such a remonstrance had been agitated. But of this he was quite sure, that, whatever remonstrances against this just law might be laid upon the table, this feeling would be at the bottom of them; and remonstrances springing from such a feeling, this Council might well disregard.

If the law which was now proposed were fairly looked at, he believed it would be seen to be the natural and necessary complement of the law for the abolition of the rite of Sati. The object of the law for the abolition of the right of Sati was to save innocent Hindu Widows from a cruel death; the object of the law which he now proposed was to save innocent Hindu widows from a life which in his conscience he believed to be worse than death. He did not mean to say that, taking a general view of the case, the custom of Brahmachariya was so dreadful as the custom of Sati. An innocent young girl taken to a funeral pile, and there, in the broad light of day, burnt to death according to law before the eyes of a multitude—the officers of the law, armed with all the powers of the law, standing by—such witnesses of the spectacle—was such a horrible and demoralising practice as was never exceeded in any country. In a general or national view, he could not of course compare this Bill with the law which abolished that open abomination. But confining the view merely to the unfortunate widow who is the victim in either case; when he considered the personal consequences which the custom of Brahmachariya forced upon the unfortunate females who were made its victims; when he considered the misery, the certain life-long misery—the probable profligacy and sin which it caused, he did believe that it would be better for a woman to ascend the funeral pile of her husband, and burn with him as a Sati, than to be condemned to the slow torment of such a life as he had described.

The law prohibiting Sati was a compulsory law. From the day it was passed, every Hindu, whatever his own feelings on the subject might be, was compelled to obey it. All the glory, therefore, of that law belonged to Lord William Bentinck and his Council who passed it. But the present law would afford Hindu gentlemen of station and influence a rare opportunity of illustrating their own names. The present was not compulsory law, and could not be made a compulsory law. It was merely a permissive law, which could have effect only when those for whose benefit it was intended, should choose to avail themselves of it. Under this law, Hindu gentlemen who, from their rank and their education, may stand forward as the leaders of their nation, have it in their power to register their names in History as the names of those who shall have effected the greatest social reform ever effected in their country. The Legislative Council will have done all it can do when it shall have struck the shackles from their limbs; it will be for them, when they shall gain their freedom, to make use of it like men.

The Honorable Member concluded by moving the first reading of the bill.

ADOPTION BY HINDU WIDOWS.

WHEREAS it is necessary in the public interest to restrict the unlimited right of adoption enjoyed by Hindu widows in the Presidency of Bombay; And Whereas the previous sanction of the Governor General required by section 50-A (2) of the Government of India Act has been obtained for the passing of this Act:—It is hereby enacted as follows:

1. Short title.—This Act may be called the Bombay Restriction of Adoption Act, 192.

2. Extent.—This Act extends to the whole of the Bombay Presidency including Aden.

3. Commencement.—This Act shall come into operation one month after it receives the sanction of the Governor General.

4. Adoption by a Hindu widow when to be valid.—No adoption by a Hindu widow of a son to her husband shall be valid except when—

(a) she is authorised in writing duly registered by her husband or his father to adopt one or more sons; or

(b) there is no male agnate (Sagobra Sapinda) descendant of the great-grandfather of her husband.

STATEMENT OF OBJECTS AND REASONS

Adoption of a son is recognised by Hindu Law throughout India. A Hindu without male issue may adopt a son at any time and his widow can also adopt for him after his death. But this right of the widow is restricted with various conditions in different provinces. In Bengal she cannot adopt unless she is authorised to adopt by her husband in writing. In Madras and the United Provinces she can adopt if authorised by the husband or by the consent of the nearest agnates. In Bombay she has great latitude. A husband’s authority is presumed in the absence of prohibition and she can adopt even a grown-up man from any family to the exclusion of the next of kin of her husband. This latitude is causing great injustice to the Brahmans whose rightful property goes to another and a stranger is introduced into the family house and property simply on account of the whims of an inexperienced young and many a time misguided widow. This leads to quarrels and litigation. Such an adoption is brought about by interested persons and the widow is utterly ruined as she is deprived of the enjoyment of her husband’s property and becomes entitled to maintenance only.

The right of adoption ought therefore to be restricted and the Law of Bombay should be made conformable to that prevalent in other parts of India.

S.R.N. CHANDAVARKAR’S FIFTH ANNIVERSARY.

Under the auspices of the Young Theist’s Union the fifth anniversary of the death of Sir Narayan Chandavarkar was celebrated on Saturday, the 14th instant in the Prarthana Samaj Hall. Sir Ibram Rahimtoola presided on the occasion. A large number of people were present who heard a very interesting lecture given by Mr. K. Narayana.

SIR NARAYAN’S RELIGIOUS VIEWS.

The speaker eloquently depicted the social, religious and political life of the late Sir Narayan Chandavarkar. The speaker was bound to Sir Narayan by many ties of public and private obligations. Sir Narayan was a very religious man, he said, and at the back of every action and thought of his was Theism. He believed in one God. His first and greatest inspiration came from the Bible and he was a great admirer of Jesus Christ. Those who were privileged to come into contact with him knew that every one of his actions and thoughts was guided by his belief in one living God. In the last years of his life he was a most ardent believer in the sufficiency of Hindu culture. Latterly he drew his inspiration largely from the great Maratha Saints like Toorkaram and Rambhau and more than all that was deliberately and systematically guided in his action by his constant remembrance of the God of Love. Whatever task he undertook, whether political or administrative, he brought to bear upon it the high consciousness born of his intense and intimate faith in God.

AS A SOCIAL REFORMER.

Next to religion he was interested in social reform. He was one of those who fought along with Telang and Ranade for the Age of Consent Bill. More than all, he himself was a pattern and a vehement advocate of social purity. He would not tolerate anything in the nature of social impurity. Mr. Natarajan said that his first contact with him was in connection with the Anti-Nautch movement which was started in Madras in the early nineties of the last century. Another thing that he did not like was caste distinctions and he took up a strong attitude in regard to the abolition of castes.

OLD BELIEFS GIVE PLACE TO NEW.

Continuing Mr. Natarajan said that the world had swept away many old beliefs in India as in other parts of the world. Sir Narayan was not pre-eminent a politician, his first interest was in religion, then social reform. Politics played a subordinate part in his life. Sir N. Chandavarker was very loyal, he said, to the British Government. I am sorry he added that even the Liberals have not understood what a constitutional temper meant. It was the constitutional method that had succeeded in the past in the field of social reform and it was going to succeed in politics.

A LOVER OF EDUCATION.

Sir Narayan was a lover of education, the speaker said, and was noted for his punctuality, orderliness and sense of duty. He was one of those men who set a model to the modern generation of Indians by adopting old customs and manners who should be able to do as much work as people brought up in western countries. The best way in which we could remember these men was by striving in our own little sphere to follow the principle of Sir Narayan Chandavarker.

THE CHAIRMAN’S CONCLUDING SPEECH.

The Chairman in winding up the proceedings thanked Mr. Natarajan for his interesting speech recalling the life of Sir Narayan Chandavarker Sir Balimootoo said that he first formed his acquaintance at a meeting in the Town Hall and he at once realised that Sir Chandavarker was destined to be a public leader. Since then he was closely associated with him.

In reaction and the against the danger of forcing social reforms by objective interest, husbands. The abuse without oil, war frequent cases to the evils of the book, because "the perversion of child-bearing, in America's perfectly unshackle of about half a million of persons, but for "Uncle Tom's Cabin." I fully believe that slavery would have been abolished before now, and without civil war.

Some people think that Miss Katherine Mayo's book has roused Indians from their indifference to the evils of child marriages. Its effect has been quite the reverse. People who know the working of the system, are shocked by the gross perceptions of the book. Out of some hundreds of cases within his knowledge, this writer cannot recall a single case of a girl having suffered because "the age of consent" was too low. Many to our knowledge have grievously suffered for other reasons—too frequent child-bearing being the worst. This, however, is not peculiar to early marriages and India. Every issue of the Birth Control Review contains innumerable cases of too frequent child-bearing in American cities.

Sir Sankaran Nair on Social Reform:
We publish today the full text of an address which Sir Sankaran Nair delivered at Guntur on the subject of "religion and social reform." It is a great relief to have a veteran reformer like him emphasizing at this time, when religion is supposed by many to be an encumbrance to national progress, that religion must furnish the basis for our whole conduct of life, and that religion is an instrument of social and moral progress. Much of what passes for religion either in the East or the West is not true religion, judged by this test. It is rather surprising that Sir Sankaran should identify evolution with the theory of survival of the fittest, and then condemn it. If evolution is rightly understood, it includes not only the biological but also the ethical. Huxley, to whom Sir Sankaran refers, has himself in his essay on "Ethics and Evolution" admitted at a certain stage biological evolution is reversed and gives place to ethical evolution of which the inspiring principle is self-sacrifice and not self-preservation. The maternal instinct which is present even in lower animals is the most striking illustration of this truth. The "survival of the fittest" is vague and meaningless as an explanation of evolution, and sociologists have rejected it as an explanation of social evolution. The Hindu ethico-religious system as developed in the Gita, for instance, harmonises the biological with the ethical side of our nature, giving each its due place in social and individual life. Christianity and other great religions, too, while stressing the spiritual goal never forgot the needs of physical life and, in fact, they maintain that by taking care of the spiritual factor the physical also is best promoted. Sir Sankaran's remarks on non-violence will be read with interest. He considers the doctrine as preached at present in India to be mischievous. "Those who cannot defend themselves or their women and children and property if necessary by force do not deserve to be free but must be and shall be slaves of others more masterful and virile."

Social Service and Social Reform:—Mr. K. T. Paul, the well-known General Secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association, delivered a very thoughtful address at the Andhradessa Social Service Conference held at Guntur. Referring to the communal question he pointed out that the true solution was to enlarge the field of social service. "In Punjab," he said, "a provincial camp is organised every year for the explicit purpose of getting white and coloured, Hindu and Muslim and Sikh to play together in the same game, to live together in the same tent, to engage together in common schemes of service. I verily believe that this one activity promises greater blessings to that ill-fated province than almost any other thing that is being done for it at this time. In our own organisation as well-known to every one in our large cities, our staff are deliberately made up of diverse nationalities—British, American, Punjabi, Madrasee and so forth. We have never found any difficulty for that reason. In fact men are never drawn so near to each other as when they work together in unselfish service for a third person. "The deep calleth upon the deep," says the Scripture. No one can understand suffering unless he has suffered himself. No one can really comfort and sustain a sufferer unless he himself is a fellow sufferer sharing in the fullest degree in the poignancy of the sufferer. Every true social servant is the in the depths of human personality. In that stratum there is neither Jew nor Gentile, neither Greek nor Barbarian, neither male nor female but just the imperishable human soul, in the very flesh and blood in which you are yourself clothed. It is in that stratum that social servants, are yoked together. Stavation and nakedness, disease and death, the pains of child-birth and the loneliness of orphanhood, these don't belong to any caste, these know not of communal representation, there are no time to settle the reservation of seats. Their appeal finds immediate response in our hearts whoever we may be. It is our common Father of us all who is calling us. There cannot be a more potent solution for the communal problem than the promotion in every point in our country of social service activities on the common basis of humanity.

Health and Food:—Dr. Bentley, the Director of Public Health in Bengal, has declared that improper and inadequate food is mainly responsible for the deterioration of the health of the Bengalis. The America Bazar Patrika of Calcutta heartily endorses this statement which, it says, has been repeatedly emphasising for the last three decades. But it differs from Dr. Bentley who thinks that the ignorance of the people is the cause of their insufficient nourishment. The Patrika maintains that the real cause is poverty. It observes: "Chronic economic distress prevalent amongst them is the cause of the fast and nothing else. They may be ignorant of the dietetic value of the different kinds of food. But the fact that they use any one of them or exclude it from their meal is not to be ascribed to their particular liking for or against a particular food, but to the fact that they choose it because it is cheap. In these days of high living, nothing can be more common than to find a poor family going without vegetables and fruits, because they are not in season. A miserly diet is sometimes preferred to no diet at all, because it is cheaper.

The Trade in Nepali Girls:—The trade in Nepali girls seems to flourish in Calcutta in spite of the serious exposures in the Rajkumari case last year. The Forward gives the following account of a recent instance: The prosecution case was that the accused Padam Kumari had brought from Nepal a girl named Chitrakumari, aged about 14 years on representation that she would procure for her a wealthy and suitable husband. She introduced the accused Joan to Chitrakumari as a wealthy man who desired to marry her. The parties went to Salkia where a sham marriage was performed at which garlands were exchanged and photographs were taken. After the so-called marriage Joan and Chitra Kumari lived for some time as man and wife till Joan informed the girl that there had been no marriage at all. On these facts Joan and Padam Kumari were placed on their trial before the Sessions Judge of Alipur and both were pronounced guilty. The Sessions Judge convicted them and sentenced them to be detained till the rising of the Court and fined them Rs. 500 and Rs. 50 respectively.

Marriage Regulation in Kashmir:—The Jammu and Kashmir State Gazette published a regulation sanctioned by His Highness the Maharaja prohibiting infant marriage within the state. This regulation is known as "the Infant Marriage Prevention Regulation." It provides that boys and girls who have not completed the ages of 18 and 14 years respectively, shall not be married. Section 3 of the Regulation states: "Any person who, having completed 18 years of age man marries an infant girl shall be punished with simple imprisonment which may extend to one year or with a fine which may extend to Rs. 1,000 or with both. Any person who causes, the marriage of an infant girl or of an infant boy, or who knowingly side and abets such marriage shall be punished with simple imprisonment extending to one year or with a fine up to Rs. 1,000 or with both. The regulation also provides that "any man who, having completed 50 years of age, marries an infant girl shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term of four years or with a fine which may extend to Rs. 2,000 or with both."

The Future of Burma:—Sir Charles Innes who as a member of the Indian Civil Service spent all his time in India and rose to be a member of the Executive Council of the Vicereoy, was appointed last year the Governor of Burma. As Governor he is ex-officio Chancellor of the Rangoon University. He delivered the annual Convocation address this year and took the opportunity of warning the Burmese against Indian and Chinese intruders. The Rangoon Daily News thus comments on his Excellency's remarks: "The menace is triangular and there is one other party which, for reasons best known to His Excellency, was not brought to the notice of the Graduates who are just going to enter the world of grim realities. Indian, Chinese and Burmese cultures are not antagonistic to one another. The danger to Burmese civilisation and culture does not clearly emanate from these quarters. The "peaceful penetration" of Chinese and Indians is insignificant compared to the economic grind of Western capitalists. The picture is not complete without them."
AGE OF CONSENT.

In noticing the questionnaire issued by the Age of Consent Committee a fortnight back we called attention to its unsatisfactory character. The two main issues on which the Committee are required to report are, as we understand the terms of reference, first, whether the "age of consent" should be raised above 14 years, the present limit, and whether a distinction should be made in the law, as made at present, between husbands and strangers. There are, it may be pointed out, three different ages of consent in the Indian Penal Code relating to offences against women. It is an offence to import into India any girl under 21 years of age for immoral purposes. The consent of the girl is no defence. It is an offence to kidnap or seduce, sell or hire, a girl under 18 years of age. Here again, the consent of the girl is no defence. The consent of a girl under 14 years of age is no defence in a case of "rape" which, as regards women above that age, is defined as having sexual connection with a woman against her will and without her consent. There is an exception. In the case of a husband, it is provided that it is not rape for him to have such intercourse with his wife not being under 13 years of age. This proviso was adopted in supposed deference to the sentiments of orthodox Hindus. The "age of consent" was 10 years until 1891 when it was raised to 12 without any distinction between stranger and a husband. In 1925 the age was raised to 14 but a lower limit was considered necessary in the case of husbands.

It is now proposed to do away with the distinction, and to raise the "age of consent" further. The Committee has been appointed to investigate the question prior to the adoption of any new legislation. In our opinion, the question of raising the limit further, will be much simplified if some other way of dealing with the question of marriage is found. Much of the opposition to raising the age of consent, so far as Indians are concerned, is due to the application of the law of rape within the marriage relation. If this is excluded from it, public opinion will favour the adoption of a higher age limit, say, 16 or even 18. In fact, it is most desirable to have one age limit for all offences against minor girls who, in Indian law, are girls under 18 years of age. We do not see why a lower limit of 14 should be considered suitable for "consent" in the case of rape while 18 is necessary in the case of kidnapping and seduction. Consent is a mental and moral act and in judging whether a girl is capable of giving a valid consent, mere physical maturity should not be the main consideration. If girls under 18 are minors incapable of entering into a contract relating to property, it is not reasonable to hold that they are capable of giving a "consent" to a far more serious matter which must adversely affect their whole life.

How, it may be asked, should the case be dealt with of a husband who endangers the health or safety of his child-wife by having sexual intercourse with her? The answer is, by abolishing child marriages and dealing with any cases that may arise under other sections of the Penal Code, as, for instance, grievous hurt or even as a special offence against marriage. The great point to be remembered is that child marriages are declining and that child wives can be best protected by accelerating the process. We must look to the spread of education as our principal means of effecting this object. The Census Commissioner of India notes in his report on the last Census, that "it is not exclusively a Hindu custom, and of the Hindus who are most addicted to the practice it is among the lower rather than the higher castes that the custom is most rigidly observed." He adds in explanation: "With the spread of education and increasing contact with western ideals, there is undoubtedly growing among the higher classes a truer realization of the evils attending the practice of infant marriage." Education of girls is necessarily more important than those of boys to facilitate this reform. We believe also that the age of puberty advances where girls' minds are not affected by the constant thought of marriage as their only destiny, and this, of course, is best secured by giving them education. Marriage legislation prohibiting or penalising child marriages, may be re-inforced by other indirect measures which should not be too drastic but which should serve to popularize the postponement of marriages to allow of sufficient time for education. There are hundreds not to say thousands of parents who would gladly keep their daughters unmarried much beyond the limit of 14 years, if they only had the means and facilities of educating them. Institutions like the Seva Sadan in Poona and Bombay are always having more applicants than they have room for. Similar institutions should be established in many more places in different parts of the country, and must be supported by endowments or contributions which will enable them to admit poor candidates on low fees. A marriage law will do much good, but it cannot do all the good it can unless it is supported by constructive measures to assist education and vocational training of girls. In fact, we should lay more stress on the latter than on the former for raising the marriage age and ameliorating generally the position of Indian girlhood.
REIGION AND SOCIAL REFORM.

The following is the full text of the Presidential Address delivered by Sir Sankaran Nair at the 36th Anniversary of the Sri Vidyabhiman Samaj, Rajahmundry, which was celebrated on the 22nd July 1928:

SOCIAL REFORM AND LITERARY CULTURE.

I understand that this association is intended to advance the literary culture and the social reform of the Non-Brahmin Telugu community. Literary culture and Social Reform are inter-dependent. You have to consider your relations amongst yourselves i. e., the Non-Brahmin Telugus have to consider whether you should defend and perpetrate the various class divisions amongst yourselves. You have also to see how far those relations are consistent with your Political and Social progress. You have divided yourself from Brahmans. You have accordingly to consider your relations towards Brahmans. Besides this you have to consider your relations towards the other Hindus throughout India. In addition to this you have to see what principles should regulate your conduct towards Mahomeedans, Christians and other Non-Hindus. It is impossible for me to take each of these for purposes of discussion. Passion, bias may influence our discussion on each question if taken in detail one by one and each discussion may become irritating and interminable. Our conclusions on some of those questions may turn out perhaps inconsistent with our conclusion on others. We find this to be in case now in India. To avoid all this it is best to have a grip of the principles that should regulate our action. And to get such a grip it is necessary to examine all that is urged by those who take up the role of our teachers. In order not to waste time I take up some of these questions at once.

LIMITS OF NON-RESISTANCE.

It is always urged that your conduct must be dictated by love and non-resistance or non-violence. That not only must you love your friends but you must also love your enemies and conquer them by love. Let us examine this; is this love the same as the love which Rama bore to Sita or which Mene- lans bore to Helen. We know the consequences of such love—the war sung in Ramayana and in the Iliad. Or is it the love of our own country or nation. We have seen the consequences of such love in the great war. Devastation of countries, murder of millions, death by starvation of women and children. Or is it the love of religion which has led to religious wars, more dreadful than the secular wars. Let us take again the love which God bears to man. Krishna says to Arjuna that he is born again and again into this world for the extermination of sin. Is that the kind of love which we are to advocate, the love which led to the Mahabharat war. Or let us take the love which Christianity says we should bear to God or God should bear to us on account of his paternity or all of us being his children. This leads to a brotherhood of Christians, i. e., of those who acknowledge him as father as against those who do not do so, against Non-Christians and to wars among themselves for compelling obedience to God's command. Whereever we turn we seem to be faced with the fact that love is always accompanied with or requires violence. There are others who say who maintain that whether there is love or not we must always practise the principle of non-resistance. Is this to be so when we see for instance our wife or children butchered before us when we might be able to save them by killing the murderer? Does this principle apply when we see our kinsmen or countrymen slaughtered before our eyes? Or in each case we are to consider the question whether such killing was due to justifiable causes. What are the principles that should govern our conduct in all such instances? To all these questions different answers are given by different persons. In our own country these questions have received, you know great prominence recently. The principle that should guide us in the solution of all these questions will in my opinion furnish us with answers to the difficulties which I have suggested before.

RELIGION THE BASIS OF LIFE.

I am one of those who believe that religion must furnish the basis for our conduct in this life, because our life in this world is regulated by or should be regulated by our connection of the world to come. Always remember that religion is an instrument of social and moral progress; otherwise it cannot be a true religion. There are those who think that the doctrine of evolution furnishes us with a clue to the solution of these questions; they imagine that the theory of the survival of the fittest will meet all difficulties. They are of opinion that whoever succeeds in the struggle of life should be supreme. The weak must be killed out, it is only the strong who should survive, or in other words if the Telugu Non-Brahmins are not able to fight with success the Brahmans or the other classes in India their survival is not in public interests; among themselves the strongest class alone should survive and it is best that the other classes among the Telugu Non-Brahmins should disappear. According to this doctrine the physically strongest or the most cunning of the races of the world should dominate the others, if not destroy the weaker and occupy the world. They think that thus in future the world will be peopled by a superior class of men. You know that in a celebrated address Professor Huxley, one of the high priests of evolution, has suggested an ethical modification of this theory. He has argued that for success in this world combination would be necessary and therefore persons would be compelled to come into association together for the purposes of success in the struggle against others or in other words among classes or among communities, theory of the survival of the fittest must be modified to that extent by the infusion of an ethical element which requires the support of the weaker of the community by the stronger instead of their elimination. To me it appears the remedy is worse than the disease, because-ex-hypothesis it is not the fittest individuals then who survive; the weak among the community that succeeds in the struggle against the other communities may not be as fit as the others that may be destroyed by this community. Further more, to us Hindus this is most unsatisfactory; the survival of the fittest does not ensure the survival of the most virtuous and of those who are endowed with moral qualities. It is not honesty or virtue that triumphs in this world. Success is not a guarantee that the person possesses the ethical or moral qualities which we think should dominate the world. Success of a race or community is only proof of the physical prowess, the discipline, organisation or cunning of that community—not of its ethical or moral superiority.

I trust therefore neither this kind of universal love or non-resistance nor the theory of the fittest in competitive struggle will form the basis of your culture or social reform. Physical Evolution may be accepted as a fact without it being a cultural basis. Failing these two we examine our own ancient culture and see whether we cannot find a basis which we can accept. First I shall deal with certain exceptional cases. It is said that our religion teaches us that the world is an illusion or Maya and therefore there is nothing like right or wrong and we must therefore be passive and suffer in all circumstances. This is not what our Sastras say. There are some persons who have no feelings or desires who have no pleasure or pain; to them the world itself is Maya. It is only such persons who are above pleasure and pain to whom there is nothing like right or wrong, justice or injustice. Such persons are perhaps ten in a million; we do not deal with them. We are concerned with persons who enjoy pleasure and pain, who know and feel happiness and misery; men who are of this world and not those great Mahatmas who are really not of this world, who are above all feelings.

Bases of Non-violence.

It is said that our Great Rishis and venerable Brahmins i.e., those who are really Brahmins suffer any injury and do not inflict any pain. The story in the Ramayana is in point. The Rishis told Rama that by their spiritual power they can destroy the Rakshasa but they do not wish their spiritual power to be exhausted as there is Rama, a Kshatriya whose duty it is to protect them. Similarly the Brahmins were non-violent not because violence in itself is sinful but the fighting classes will by using violence multipart them against injustices and of oppression. When they are no longer able to do so or when it is unnecessary to protect the spiritualism of the Brahmin, those reasons do not apply. In fact, violence itself when it is used for the protection of the weak and the non-violent is not condemned.

There is also another class who say we should be nonviolent. They it is said suffer any injury as long as it is tolerable. When the Rajah is unable to protect them they go elsewhere. This is due to the fact they themselves had not been trained to fight and they consider the races that should protect them from oppression by violence have failed to do so. This is an incident of the Caste system.

All this only shows that the caste system according to which the Kshatriya race is bound to protect the others has entirely failed of its purpose, and is no longer useful to maintain the society as it existed under that system. It is not the Kshatriya who fight any longer, who govern and protect us. It is now the obligation and the right of the entire community consisting of all classes to protect themselves and allow every individual full opportunity for self-development. The caste system or the class system has failed all over the world. Those who seek to revive it rely upon a broken reed. Not only is this so in theory but in practice nothing else is possible. No one will now concede any privilege to another merely on account of his birth. Your culture therefore and your social reform must proceed on that basis.

Religion and Humanity.

The Laws of Morality are common generally to all the great religions. So far I know the best statement of it is what is given in the Bible. It is said that God will allow persons' salvation in these words: "For I was hungry, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me in: Naked, and ye clothed me: I was sick, and ye visited me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me."

Naturally these men were surprised because while in this world they did not and will not remember to have seen God personally. Accordingly they asked him when was it that they did these things and the God answered them "Verily I say unto you. In as much as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." Or in other words you have to observe no distinction between man and man; you have to feed the hungry whoever it might be, similarly you have to give drink to the thirsty whoever it might be, to every stranger you must be hospitable, every sick person you must visit, every person in trouble you must visit and comfort and all this without any difference between man and man. Apply this principle, you can solve the problem of the untouchables. You can solve the caste question, you can solve the sex question so far as social life is concerned; you have to accord the same treatment to them all irrespective of class or sex. I trust you will never allow it to be said that we are behind any other in the performance of these duties.

Our life will be a life of Sacrifice if these principles are followed. Our men and women have already taken up this attitude and I trust that this will be the basis of your social reform and culture.

Our own Sasthras say:

"Atithi Deva姆 bhaga anay; Graha pratt nirvitatе Sataami duhkhiram datvа, Punyam adaya gachati f., a person who is refused hospitality takes away all the Punyam of the House, having there his own sin.

MASS EDUCATION AND PROGRESS.

Having thus dealt with the question of material needs the next one that arises is that of education. It is knowledge that distinguishes man from the other animals; without knowledge man is only in the position of animals. The greatest injury that one can do to another is the denial to him of access to knowledge; it appears to me that we have to devote ourselves to the task of exciting a desire for knowledge amongst everyone because once there is that desire a person will take all means to satisfy the same. Without mass education there will be no substantial progress; let us work heart and soul for it; education, knowledge, let us give, to our benefit the education. that in every village there will be no one in the country who cannot read and write that everybody can go out and teach something to those who are willing to be educated; it is a solemn duty laid upon every one of us and let us fulfil it to the best of our ability. Let it then be the foundation of your Social reform and of Telugu culture that there will be no one in the country who cannot read and write that everybody has opportunity of education, that in every village there will be a place where one can read all the news papers, that he can read such books as deal with the questions in which he is interested.

IN DEFENCE OF FOECE.

The third and the last matter to which I propose to refer is the vexed question of defence. I am one of those who believe that it is our duty to defend even by the use of physical force the weak and helpless to fight for justice and right. I have heard it said that we should be non-violent and should not use force because it would be ineffective' as we are powerless. I trust the man-hood of this country will unhesitatingly repudiate this doctrine. Some of the noblest actions in History have been committed by persons who know that they were embarking on a fruitless enterprise. Those who put forward this view, would seem to prefer dishonor to death. The Hindu caste system is based on the theory that there must be a class trained to fight for protection. The Kshatriya race formed our standing army. It was their duty to protect the others or die in the performance of that duty. For that purpose special privileges were conceded to them. Now that the Caste system is broken up and there is no longer any Kshatriya race willing and able to protect the others, self defence becomes every one's duty. It becomes our duty to protect our women and young ones and our property. Those who fall in this, fall in the elementary duty or citizenship. Our Hindu Religion directly advocates this. Our Bhagavat, and Mahabharat are stories of our God's inspirations to save and protect virtue and punish crime by slaughter and bloodshed. Our Puranas team with stories of our Gods and Godesses who have killed wicked men at the intercession of Rishis. Gita directly encourages it, and in fact it is a direct exhortation to Arjuna to fight and kill his own relatives. I cannot imagine a more unfortunate or mischievous teaching than that of nonviolence as it is preached now to a nation given to contemplation and the most submissive in this world. Those who cannot defend themselves or their women and children and property if necessary by force do not deserve to be free but must be and shall be slaves of others more masterful and verile. I agree that our use of force must be hedged with limitation; Our Gita has said that all our actions must be done without any desire, we must not wish for a benefit to ourselves. If we are fighting to benefit the weak and the helpless their protection alone should be the motive. Apart from their protection we must not derive any further benefit but should be placed in the situation in which they were before their safety was menacecd. Otherwise desire will beget further desire, any advantage which is taken of another will give rise to feelings of revenge.

WIDOW MARRIAGE ACT OF 1858.

We published last week the memorial of Jahar-chandra Vidiaagar, the original draft Bill and Mr. Grant's speech introducing the Bill in the Indian Legislative Council. We give below two petitions against the bill.

To

The Honourable the Legislative Council of India.

The Humble Petition of the Undersigned Inhabitants of Calcutta and the Lower Provinces of Bengal.

Most respectfully sheweth,

That your petitioners have read with much concern the Draft of a Bill entitled, 'A Bill to remove all legal obstacles to the marriage of Hindu Widows', which was read by your Honourable Council for the first time on the 17th November last, and for the second time, on the 19th January. Your Petitioners are aware, from the printed papers of your Honourable Council, that the said Bill has been brought in, on the Petition of certain Hindus who desire that Widow Marriage should be legalised. Your Petitioners are also sensible that the principle of the said Bill is consonant with the social system of their English fellow-subjects, and therefore is likely to be acceptable to your Honourable Council; yet your Petitioners cannot but feel it as a duty, as well to themselves as Hindus as to their countrymen in general, to submit their objections to the proposed law.

2. The preamble to the Bill states that, "whereas it is known that by the law as administered in the Civil Courts established in the territories in the possession and under the Government of the East India Company, Hindu Widows with some exceptions are held to be, by reason of their having been once married, incapable of contracting a second valid marriage, and the offering of such widows by any second marriage are held to be illegitimate and incapable of inheriting..."

3. Your Petitioners beg leave to observe that the remarriage of Hindu females is not only not in accordance with the established usages of Hindus, but is looked upon by the precepts of their religion and the customs of Hindu Law, from which all their social institutions have originated. Though there are different tribes of Hindus, who speak different tongues, follow different codes of laws, wear different dresses, and have different customs and usages, yet they are all unanimous in reprobating the marriage of their widows, in consequence of its being against the positive injunctions of their law, and the interpretations of that law by different commentators of ancient and modern times. The Vaisaka Veda in the Taittiriya Skanda declares that, "as round a single Yupa (sacrificial post) two tethers can be tied, so one person can marry two wives. As one tether cannot be tied round two Yupas, so one female cannot marry two husbands." The most ancient and revered of our law-givers, Manu, says in Chapter V, verse 101, that "a widow who, from a wish to bear children, slights her deceased husband by marrying again, brings disgrace on herself here below, and shall be excluded from the seat of her lord." And also at the following verse, "issue begotten on a woman by any other than her husband, is here declared to be no progeny of hers; so more than a child, begotten on the wife of another man belongs to the begetter; nor is a second husband allowed in any part of this code to a virtuous woman." The same authority further directs in Chapter IX, verses 61 and 60, that "by men of twice-born classes no widow or childrenless wife must be authorised to conceive by any other than her lord; for they who authorise her to conceive by any other, violate the primeval law. Such a commission to a brother, or other near kinsman, is nowhere mentioned in the nuptial texts of the Veda; nor is the marriage of a widow even named in the laws concerning marriage." The Mahabharat, too, lays down that "a woman is to have only one husband, upon whom she must depend through her whole life." These ordinances in the highest sacred works of the Hindus, added to the long established custom and usage of the country, against the marriage of widows, will, your Petitioners trust, weigh more in the estimation of your Honorable Council than the forced construction of any solitary text apparently in its favour, but quite unsupported by a single instance of such marriage having ever been legally contraried in any period of the annals of the Hindus. Your Honorable Council will thus perceive that the marriage of Hindu widows is not in accordance with the dictates of Hindu law, as it is stated in the preamble to the Bill for the removal of legal obstacles to such marriages.

4. Your Petitioners further beg leave to submit that the proposed law is also at variance with the several Statutes of the British Parliament and the Regulations of the East India Company, by which the natives of this country have from time to time been assured that their rights of marriage and inheritance shall not be disturbed or violated. Section 23 of Regulation I of 1773, which was re-enacted in Section 23 of Regulation IV of 1793, ordains that, in all suits regarding succession, inheritance, marriage, and costs, and all religious usages and institutions, the Mahometan law shall prevail in respect of Mahometans and the Hindu law in regard to Hindus. This is also laid down in the 21 George III Chap. 70 Section 17, 18, and 19. The 3 and 4 William IV Chap. 55 Section 53 expressly provides that, in making any law for the natives of this country, a due regard should be had to their religion, customs, laws, and usages. The more subsequent Regulation V of 1831 declares that cases relating to the marriage, succession, and inheritance of Mahometans shall be decided according to Mahometan law, and those concerning the Hindus shall be adjudicated according to Hindu law. These repeated declarations of the British Parliament and the local Government have induced a firm belief that the natives of this country would be continued in the enjoyment of their laws relating to marriage, succession, and inheritance. Even in the General Order recently issued by the Governor-General in Council in reference to the late disturbance at Bolaram and the conduct of Brigadier Mackenzie on the occasion, the public officers were enjoined in the strongest manner "never to interfere with the religious observances of the natives of India." When the late Law Commission in 1837, applied to the Sadar Courts at the several Presidencies for their opinions on the subject of Hindu Widow Marriage, the Judges of those Courts unanimously observed that the legalisation of such marriage "would be an interference with the Hindus in the matter of their own law and religion and at once dilate the whole frame-work of Hindu jurisprudence." The Hindu Society has undergone no material change whatever since that year, which would warrant the Legislature to interfere with the Hindu law on the ground of expediency. Its integrity, it is true, has been most seriously affected by the enactment of Act XXI of 1850, but your Petitioners submit that one encroachment does not justify another; and what is of more importance, the said law has not increased the number of native converts to Christianity. The experience of the last six years shows that, practically, it has been of no more use than affording an example of an arbitrary and uncalled-for interference with the Hindu law of inheritance. Legislative intervention has never yet been able to effect a change in public opinion, while the more such interference is exercised, the more it assumes an objectionable character.

5. Your Petitioners have been told that the Bill for the removal of legal obstacles to the marriage of Hindu widows, is merely a permissive law. In reply they beg leave to observe that, so far as it allows a widow to contract a second marriage, at her option, it is undoubtedly of a permissive character, but in its immediate and ultimate consequences, when it interferes with the rights of others, your Petitioners humbly submit, that it is a compulsory measure. As for example, if a Hindu dies leaving two daughters, both of whom are widows, but the one has a son, and the other no children; by the Hindu law of inheritance as it is now administered, that son will be the sole heir of his maternal grandfather. But if the childless widow contracts a second marriage and has issue by her second husband, by the proposed law they would be entitled to equal shares of the property of their mother's father, with the son of the widow who has not re-married. Again, if a married woman dies, leaving two sons, who have acquired property. Their father marries a widow and dies leaving a son by her. One of the brothers has children while the other has not; but both of them subsequently die. By the Hindu law the said children will succeed to the whole of that property, but by the proposed law, the son of the widow will not only share equally with the two brothers at first, but will also succeed to the share of the deceased among them to the exclusion of the said children. Again, a person dies leaving a widow, but no issue and directs her by his will to adopt a son and heir. If, before the adoption takes place, she contracts a second marriage, she cannot carry out the directions of her deceased husband according to Hindu law; and the consequences will be that his line will be extinct; that he and his ancestors will have none to perform the usual funeral ceremonies prescribed by the Hindu religion; and that, whatever property he may have left, will go to his next of kin, who by the proposed law, will find it to their interest to induce the widow to marry, and thus defeat the intentions of her first husband for their own benefit.

6. Your Petitioners can, to an unlimited extent multiply instances in which the proposed law for the marriage of Hindu Widows will operate against the civil rights of others who may prefer to follow the laws and usages of their country—a consequence which had, no doubt, been anticipated by the Judges of the several Sutar Courts, when they gave it as their opinion that the legalization of such marriages would amount to an interference with the customs and laws of the Hindus, and would at once upset their present system of jurisprudence. If the Petitioners in favour of Widow Marriage be disposed to adopt "a different custom in accordance with the dictates of their own consciences," as it is stated in the preamble to the Bill, your Petitioners have no objection whatever to their doing so; but when the law which they have asked for interferes with the rights of others who entertain different opinions and are not inclined to follow their example, their demand is manifestly unjust and unreasonable. The Petitioners at whose instance the proposed law has been brought in, form a very small and insignificant portion of the vast masses of the people whom your Petitioners represent. It would, therefore, be scarcely just and reasonable, or even expedient, to enact a law for the minority which shall interfere with the rights, of the majority. As far as your Petitioners have been able to communicate with the people of the interior, during the short space of two months, which has elapsed between the first and second reading of the Bill, they have found but one opinion exist among all classes of men, and that opinion is, your Petitioners need hardly say, against the proposed law; and if the fact of that law being under the consideration of your Honourable Council be made known still more extensively, your Petitioners are sure the general voice of the entire Hindu population will be raised against its enactment. The great majority of the people of this country have yet had no intimations of the proceedings which have been held in respect of the Bill for the legalization of the marriage of Hindu Widows. They have no knowledge of the English language, and do not read the English newspapers in which the reports of your Honourable Council appear. The Bill made its appearance in the Bengali Government Gazette only on the 12th February; but still those that would not be sufficient, as the Bengali language is only read and understood in only one of the provinces out of the immense extent of territories subject to British rule in India, and that, too, by a comparatively small portion of its inhabitants. Its enactment will, therefore, be without the knowledge of the people whose interests are to be affected by it. If they knew of it, your Petitioners are certain they would object to it, and it would be unwise to pass it into law on the application of a few against the wishes of the hundred thousands of the Hindus who own allegiance to the British Crown in India.

7. Your Petitioners also beg leave to submit that the proposed law for the legalization of Hindu Widow Marriage is vague and insufficient; since it does not declare what shall constitute a valid widow marriage. The rite of matrimony is held sacred in all countries and by all nations. It is one of the ten Sanskara or sacramental rites of the Hindus. Its details are nowhere left to the option of individuals; yet such would be the case if the Bill for the removal of all legal obstacles to the marriage of Hindu Widows be passed into law as it now stands. The ceremony which at present prevails among Hindus, cannot be performed in the case of a widow taking another husband. “The holy nuptial texts,” says Manu in Chap. 8, Verses 226, “are applied solely to virgins, and nowhere on earth to girls who have lost their virginity.” Again in Chapter 9, Verse 47. “Once is the partition of an inheritance made, once is a damael given in marriage, and once does a man say ‘I give.’ These three are by good men done once for all and irrecoverably.” It will, therefore, be necessary to preclude a new ritual in opposition to the dictates of Hindu Law and Religion to prevent its being a source of much litigation, which it otherwise necessarily lead to. Such a result cannot surely be the object of the Bill which is now before your Honorable Council. Your Petitioners also beg leave to submit that many Hindu widows, if re-married at an early age, under the proposed law, might regard their second union as a degradation and wrong, when at a mature age they come to know the religion and laws of their country.

8. Under these circumstances your Petitioners beg leave to submit that the Bill “to remove all legal obstacles to the marriage of Hindu widows” should not be passed into law, and that your Petitioners, and the rest of their countrymen, who prefer to follow the established laws and usage of their country, will be permitted to continue in the enjoyment of their civil rights as they have hitherto done.

And your Petitioners as in duty bound shall ever pray.

To

THE HONORABLE
THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL OF INDIA
The Petition of the undersigned Professors of the Hindu law, Inhabitants of Nadan, Trotam, Shash PARTHARSH, Bandu-ricia, Calcutta, and other places.

HUMBLY SHEWING,
That your Petitioners being apprised that one learned and modern Pandit, has lately, in conjunction with a few young men of the rising class, petitioned your Honorable Council to legislate on the subject of the Marriage of Hindu Widows, and that a bill relating to it has been brought in—think it necessary most respectfully to draw your attention to their prayers on the subject.

That the Marriage of Hindu Widows is prohibited in the Veda, the Smriti, the Puranas, and other Shastras.

That the advocates of widow marriage, who maintain that it is authorized by the Hindu Law, and who have therefore petitioned your Honorable Council to legislate in its behalf, are, in their opinions and constructions, utterly at variance with the whole range of the Hindu legal compilers and commentators. For the texts pointed out by the former as sanctioning widow marriage, have invariably been explained and assented by the latter to refer to betrothed girls, and to widow sin the past yogas (ages). And in truth, all the digesta of the Hindu Law which have regulated Hindu manners, customs, and religious practices, from time immemorial, not only no where authorize widow marriage, but on the contrary expressly disapprove of it. The following extracts from the digesta in question, are quoted for your information.

RATHAKAR.

“Moreover the verses of Dvalas, who sanctions the remarriage of woman, declaring that a married woman whose husband has left her, shall wait for eight years, and after that take another husband; and that she may do the same under the circumstances specified therein, refer to former yogas, as also does the appointment of a widow to a brother or some other near kinsman for the purpose of raising issues.”

“A widow, who from a wish to bear children, slights her deceased husband by marrying again, brings disgrace on herself here below, and shall be excluded from the seat of her lord.”

“Jesus begotten on a woman by any other than her husband, is here declared to be no progeny of hers; no more than a child begotten on the wife of another man, belongs to the begetter, nor is a second husband allowed in any part of this code to a virtuous woman.”

“Such a commission to a brother or other near kinsman is no where mentioned in the nuptial texts of the Veda; nor is a marriage of a widow even named in the laws concerning marriage.”

MANSABEER 1st BOOK.

“From this day I consent that a women have only one husband as long as she lives, and whether he be alive or dead, if she go to another man, she shall doubtless be degraded.”

ADITYA PURANA.

“The marriage of a widow, a large allotment to the eldest brother, the sacrifice of a bull, the appointment of a man to beget a son on the widow of his brother, and the carrying of a water pot as the token of an ascetic, these five are prohibited in the Kali Yoga, or the fourth age.”

The Veda says:—“As round one sacrificial post two cords are fastened, so one man may marry two wives; but as one cord is not fastened round two sacrificial posts, so one woman cannot have two husbands.”

The code of Manu says:—“Him to whom her father has given her or her brother with the paternal asset, let her obsequiously honor, while he lives; and when he dies, let her never neglect him."

"Let her eunuchate her body, by living voluntarily on pure flowers, roots, and fruit; but let her not, when her lord is deceased, even pronounce the name of another man."

"Let her eunuchate till death forgiving all injuries, performing harsh duties, avoiding every sensual pleasure, and cheerfully professing the incomparable virtues, which have been followed by such women as were devoted to one only husband."

"And like those abstemious men, a virtuous wife ascends to heaven, though she have no child, if, after the decease of her lord, she devote herself to pious austerity."

MIRNAYA SINDHU.

"A woman, even if she has been married, may be given away to another with clothes and ornaments. This and similar customs are prohibited in the Kali Yag, because the Kali Puranas says, that 'procreation of a son by a brother, the giving away of a married woman, and the like, are not to take place in the Kali Yag.'"

HEDALI.

"Prohibitions in the Kali Yag.—The marriage of a widow the gift of a large portion to the eldest brother, the sacrifice of a bull, the appointment of a man to beget a son on the widow of his brother, and the carrying of a water-pot as the token of an ascetic, these five are prohibited in the Kali Yag."

MADAN PARIJATA.

"The marriage of a widow, the gift of a large portion to the eldest brother, the sacrifice of a bull, the appointment of a man to beget a son on the widow of his brother, and the carrying of a water-pot as the token of an ascetic, these five are prohibited in the Kali Yag."

"Secondly.—That the marriage of a Hindu widow of respectability is contrary to the customs and usages of the country. Among the Hindus of India there are various customs and usages on various occasions, and the people of the several provinces observe them according to various Shastras; but the marriage of a widow is not in accordance with the customs and usages of any province, and none of the codes of law in force sanction it. The practice of austerity by all Hindu widows has been customary from time immemorial; so that, not to mention the marriage of a widow, even her intercourse with a stranger renders her liable to expulsion from society. Now, if you Honorable Council, with a view of introducing widow marriage, legislate on the subject, the Vedas, Smritis, Puranas and other religious institutes, and the customs and usages of time immemorial, will fall to the ground.

To subvert the religion and usages of the subjects is not the province of the Legislature, Madh says—"A king who knows the revealed law, must inquire into the particular laws of classes, the laws or usages of districts, the customs of traders, and the rules of certain families, and establish their peculiar laws if they be not repugnant to the law of God."

Thirdly.—That, if your Honorable Council legislate on the subject of widow marriage, the rules of inheritance now prevalent among the Hindus will undergo great alterations. Though the offspring of such a marriage cannot, according to the received law and reputable manners of the country, be regarded otherwise than as illegitimate, or children of harlots, yet in case you legislate on the subject, the truly lawful heirs will be compelled to share the inheritance equally with them. The Code of Hindu law on inheritance, which is now of equal weight with the Government and its subjects, must be materially altered or supplanted by an entirely new one to prevent endless disputes arising from the collision of opposing interests, when persons who are not at present of kin to the legal heirs recognized by the Shastras, or by the customs of the country, will be placed on a footing of equality with them. The passing of the proposed Bill into law will not only, without any cases whatever, endanger the property of many an innocent individual, but in several cases altogether deprive him of it. A few cases of very probable occurrence illustrative of the above position, are most respectfully submitted for your consideration.

If one's father, brother, brother's son, grandfather, or father's brother, or the like, in spite of the Shastras and the established customs marry a widow and beget a son on her, and die, that son, armed with the law, will usurp the property of his brother, or brother's son and so forth, and thus divide the property of the deceased with the rightful heirs, if such deceased have left no widow and children who are legal according to the Shastras. And sometimes, by his claim of priority, he will nullify the rights of lawful heirs. Similarly, if a widow take a second husband, though it be in opposition to her father's wishes, she may even then, on her father's dying without male issue or other heirs, be entitled to inherit his estate.

Again, if she marry in opposition to the wishes of her brother, her son, in the event of her brother's dying without male issue, will stand in point of relationship as his nephew or the grandson of his father, and thus be entitled to inherit his property. In like manner, if the widow be a mother, or mother's or father's sister, or paternal or maternal aunt, or grandmother or brother's wife, and marry in opposition to the wishes of her son or other relatives, the male children she may give birth to, will usurp the place of brothers and so forth, and contest for inheritance. Now it is most respectfully submitted to your consideration, whether or not the proposed Act will deprive many rightful heirs of their inheritance, and wholly upset the Hindu law on that subject.

Fourthly.—That there is the greatest probability of extinguishing the name of many a family by the passing of an Act authorizing the marriage of Hindu widows, and thereby conferring civil rights on the issue of such marriages. For in addition to the sanction of the Shastras, almost every childless man in this country enjoins his wife, in his dying moments, to adopt a son for the perpetuation of the family name. But if the Bill be passed, the desire of worldly enjoyment will induce the widow to take a second husband, and thus slighting the injunctions of her former lord about adoption, she will consign her family name to oblivion.

Fifthly.—In the event of the Bill being passed many a widow, otherwise disposed to observe the injunction of her own religion, will, in all probability, by the intrigues of her avaricious kinsmen, sacrifice her honour; for the women of this country being mostly ignorant, and not being accustomed to read, and mix in society, it is difficult for them to detect the insidiousness of the càng and evil disposed. It is therefore that our Shastras have not given them independence in any stage of their lives.

Maun says:—"In childhood must a female be dependent on her father; in youth on her husband; her lord being dead, on her sons; a woman must never seek independence." Moreover, in conformity to our Shastras, a widow can inherit her husband's estate. Hence if any person die without male issue, leaving a widow, his brothers, through avarice, will use force and intrigue to introduce her to take a second husband, that they may come into her rightful possessions. Thus innumerable widows will have cause to bewail the loss of their honour.

Sixthly.—That, though the Bill has been brought in for the benefit of the people, the purport of the foregoing paragraphs will not fail to convince your Honourable Council, that in inducing the good intended, it will injure their temporal and spiritual interests. Besides those who have petitioned your Honourable Council for such an enactment, cannot by any possibility desire any advantage from it. For at present widow marriage does not obtain in this country, nor can persons be found who are the offspring of such marriages.

In conclusion, your Petitioners most humbly but earnestly protest against a Bill which is opposed to the whole of their Shastras; which is contrary to the customs and usages of the most respectable portion of your Hindu subjects throughout the country; which, when passed into law, will create nullities confusion in their order of succession, prevalent from time immemorial, give rise to numberless disputes, and necessitate the framing of a new code on inheritance for deciding those disputes; by which the property of many a Hindu subject will not only be endangered but even destroyed; from which no property can reasonably expect any present advantage; which will consign the names of many families to oblivion; which will tempt not a few wicked people to betray innocent widows into vicious courses, that they may deprive them of their husband's estates; and they pray that the discerning Legislature of the British Government, which is so careful of the interests of its subjects, will not pass such a Bill into law.

Your Petitioners are most loyal subjects of your Government. It is not less that Government to maintain their religion and customs than to protect their lives and property. Your Petitioners do not pretend to direct your Council, nor have they the power to oppose your designs. As children ask indulgence from their parents, so do they supplicate your Honourable Council. Besides, the boon they are now solicitous to obtain from your Honours, is neither exceptional nor unjust; for every nation is naturally as; to preserve its religion uncorrupted. It is only this apprehension of interference on your part with their religion which has induced your Petitioners to approach you, in the hope that their prayers will prevail and prevent you from legislating on the subject of widow marriage.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, shall ever pray.

(Signed) SHRIHAR SHIODHANI AND OTHERS.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Vidya Vivasah Sahalka Sabha.—Under the auspices of Sir Gangadhar Trust of Lahore Bombay Presidency Vidya Vivasah Sahalka Sabha was established last year on the 29th of July, when a meeting at Ayya Samaj Hall, Girgaum, was held to commemorate the anniversary of passing the widow-marriage Act of 1856. The Sabha was established to propagate the noble cause of widow-marriage in the Presidency and yet good success in the motive, Pandit Narmadasa Vidya Sagar the worker of the Sabha has tried his best to propagate the cause in this Presidency and has established 2 branches in various parts of Gojjrat, Maharastra and Khandesh. This Sabha has received the reports of 60 marriages arranged during the course of last year by the various branches of the Sabha. The Bombay City branch office has received more than 30 applications from widowers and more than 100 from widows, and more than 20 widow-marriages were arranged here by the Bombay City Branch. Eight public meetings were arranged last year under the Bombay City Sabha Sabha in the different places of the city in which lectures, debates, Satiravach were arranged which resulted good in favour of widow marriage in the public minds. At present there are 96 members of the Association and both Dhagverdas Madhavdas J. P. and Dr. N. D. Sawarkar worked for last year as president and Secretary. Dr. Sawarkar who has many public activities in his hands has resigned. Prof. B. V. Phadke, the Principal of R. M. High School has accepted to work as a Secretary of the Sabha.

FIRE INSURANCE.
MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.
Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governors have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislation in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The participation of the business community of three countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

The Bardoli Settlement—A satisfactory settlement of the dispute between the Government of Bombay and the Bardoli passive resisters to the enhancement of land revenue, has been reached and the satyagraha has been called off.

The terms are reasonable. The Government have agreed to appoint a Committee of two officials, one a revenue and the other a judicial official, to conduct a full and independent inquiry into the whole question of re-assessment in the Bardoli and Valod talukas. We hope Government may consider the desirability of postponing the revision of assessment in other parts of the Presidency also, pending the further constitutional changes that may be introduced on the report of the Statutory Commission. It should not be necessary to have satyagraha movements in other talukas and other Committees to be appointed to go into their reassessment. A general plan applicable to the whole province will relieve both Government and the people of anxiety. The credit of the present settlement belongs to both sides, but a special word of praise is due to Sir Leslie Wilson but for whose patience and forbearance matters might have taken a different turn. Unlike Mr. Vallabhbhai, His Excellency had to convince his own colleagues of the wisdom of moderation, not an easy task, made more difficult by the replying comments in the Anglo-Indian press. Every Viceroy or Governor who tried to follow a policy of patient justice has had to suffer from this handicap.

Lord Minto when he was laying down his office told the United Service Club for the benefit of those who cry out for "strong measures" and "strong men" to enforce them: "Gentlemen, I have heard a good deal of "strong men" in my time, and I can only say that my experience in all our anxious days in India has taught me that the strongest man is he who is not afraid of being called weak." Sir Leslie Wilson has proved his statesmanship by the way in which he has handled this very difficult controversy and as a result, we firmly believe that the prestige of Government has greatly increased. It is this type of men who are needed to serve India in these times.

A Mysore Sensation:—It is a sign of the disturbed and disturbing conditions of the time that Mysore, which had seemed an oasis in the midst of the prevailing political and communal unrest, should have become suddenly the scene of a sensational incident which, for the time being, almost vied with the Bardoli satyagraha as a news topic. The origin of the trouble is still obscure but it had apparently some connection with the removal of an image of Ganpati kept in front of a school. In itself the incident seems to be of no significance, but apparently even Mysore is not free from the unsettling influences of political and communal strife, and the action of the Police in calling in the Military has perhaps given the outside public a more serious impression of the affair than it is entitled to. Anyhow, the situation seems to be quietening, and a public enquiry is promised by the Dewan in whose judgment and impartiality the public in and out of the State has great confidence.

The Right Hon. Syed Ameer Ali:—Syed Ameer Ali, whose death took place a few days ago, is better known to the world as the author of the "Spirit of Islam" and other works on Islamic culture than in the offices which he filled with distinction in this country many years ago. On retirement, he settled in England and was made a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. His writings have done a great deal to give non-Muslims a right and just view of the prophet of Arabia and his teachings. Mr. Ameer Ali's books have been accepted as authoritative by Muslims, and they are now standard works in Islamic history and religion. Although intensely interested in the progress of India's Mussalmans, Mr. Ameer Ali was not a narrow communalist, and was held in high respect for his learning and character by Indians of all classes and communities. He was much in advance of his community in social ideas and found, no doubt, like Lord Sinha, that India was no place for him. It is otherwise not easy to account for his residence in England without, as far as we know, revisiting his native land even once since his retirement nearly thirty years ago from the Calcutta High Court.

Madras Physical Education Committee:—The reply of the Education Minister of Madras to the representation of Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya to include a lady in the Physical Education Committee, that the enquiry will be restricted to boys' physical education is far from satisfactory. This utter indifference on the part of the Madras Government to girls' physical culture has provoked Srimati Subbalakshmi who has considerable experience in the field of girls' education to describe this far from... ideal condition in which the girls receive education. She writes:-"In this connection women would like to point out to the Minister in charge of the Educational Portfolio and the Department of Education, the miserable state in which the Government primary school for girls in Triplicane is being kept. The building in Tholsinga Perumal Koll Street gives accommodation and instruction for about 300 children ranging from 7 to 12 years in classes 1 to 5. Their classes are daily held in dark and ill-ventilated rooms. Some of the classes are so overcrowded leaving no space for the children to move about. To add to the overcrowding and insanitation there is not sufficient open space. Further this is the institution where the elementary, lower and higher teachers hold their practical classes and take their training. Surely an institution, which serves as a training ground for women teachers should command a better building. Again, little children, more than the grown-up students, need plenty of fresh air, good light and open space all round for their normal growth and healthy development." What is true of this particular school applies to many primary schools in Bombay and other places. It is high time some steps are taken to improve the conditions obtaining in these schools.

"New Turkey."—The Commission appointed by the Faculty of Theology of Saint Paul's University to report on religious reforms in Turkey has concluded its work. The findings of the Commission, published in a recent issue of the Searchlight, Patna, make interesting reading. "The recent dramatic evolution of Turkey," say the Commissioners, "presents two principal aspects in the multiplicity of institutions, moral, judicial, economic, etc. One of these is the scientific direction and character imprinted on all our social institutions. The laws of science and logic direct the different branches of national activity: in language, morals, law and economy the Turkish evokes and draws its inspiration from science, reason and logic." The members of the Commission point out that religion, also a social institution does not conform to the laws of progress. Whilst it is true that the rational limits of Islam cannot be transcended, the Commissioners hold that the religion ought not to be considered inseparably bound to "the primitive forms and superannuated wages" with which it may have been associated even from time immemorial. Hence, "in the Turkish democracy religion, like everything else, must enter into the new era of validity of which it has need."

Turkish Religious Reforms.—The Faculty Commissioners intend to achieve this stupendous task by two means. First, they say that the shrines must be kept clean and in perfect repair, and "comfortable seats and cloak rooms" should be 'installed, in the mosques. Moreover, "One ought to enter, wearing footwear, but clean." Secondly the language of worship should be Turkish. "The admission of modern instrumental music in our sanctuaries is also necessary and is an imperative need in our mosques." The Commission proceeds:—"The printed forms and formulas of prayers existing are inadequate. The sermons differ from the sacred readings and the prayers. They are not inspired by scientific ideas but are purely religious." Till our Faculty of Theology can train men, advantage should be taken of impenetrable knowledge of the Dogmatics of religion. These men will lay the first bases of a Muslim religious philosophy and literature. With its primitive methods and interpretations the existing theology as understood up to now, cannot realise this reform. What is most important is not the translation of the Qur'an into Turkish, nor its classification into verses. The indisputable thing is the reinterpretation of its meaning and precepts and their revaluation. If one does not examine the contents of that book with a scientific mentality there is no means of understanding anything therein. This can only be done by a scientific institution, in this case by the Faculty of Theology. The Revolution created this Faculty, whose need was felt. The Faculty thinks that there is everywhere advantage in putting its views before the competent authorities with all the weight it enjoys. These bases of reform clearly concern the higher politics of Turkey, and will be likely to have a fruitful influence on all Muslim countries."

(Continued from the Leader page). witnesses referred to. In this connection, we hope the Cinema Committee's severe strictures on the wild and unfounded allegations of the deputation of the British Social Council Hygiene which visited India two years ago, will serve as a warning to men and women of the Mayo mentality to see things which they"come determined to see in this country. The deputation consisting of Dr. David Lees and Mrs. C. Neville Rolfe stated that films were being shown in India which had been rejected in Great Britain. The Government of India tried to get from the Delegation particulars of such films "but", to quote the words of the Report "the attempt proved unsuccessful." Another of its statements was as follows: "In every province and state visited by the Delegation the evil influence of the cinema was cited by educationists and representative citizens as one of the major factors in lowering the standard of sex conduct, and thereby tending to increase the dissemination of disease." The Committee patiently sought to find the truth about this statement in every place which they visited. The Director of Public Health in the Punjab said "so far as we are concerned there is absolutely nothing to substantiate that statement." The Director in Bengal said that there was nothing in his experience to support a statement like that. "The Madras Director told the Committee that though the Delegation met him often, they never mentioned this subject. "I do not know where they got their information from. I would not have agreed with their views. As far as my experience goes, things are quite different." It is hoped that the British Council of Social Hygiene will withdraw the statements and apologise to the country whose hospitality its deputation has grossly abused.
THE CINEMA COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

The Report of the Indian Cinema Committee was published on Tuesday. The Committee was appointed last year in pursuance of a resolution passed by the Council of State to enquire into the working of the censorship on films and the desirability of giving special preference in some form to films produced within the British Empire. There was a wide-spread suspicion, owing to the inclusion of the question of preference, that the Committee was merely a ruse to bolster up the British film industry which was unable to compete with the American Industry. There had been a keen agitation in Great Britain over this question, and British statesmen make no secret of the fact that they do not like India to import films from any country but Britain. We still think that there might have been some such object in appointing the Committee, but the strong protests voiced in this country prevented its being given effect to. The Cinema Committee has endorsed the protests, and has unanimously pronounced against the granting of any preference to foreign films, British or other. On the contrary, it has recommended a small increase in the import duty on all films, including British, as a measure of protection to the Incipient Indian industry. The Report has elaborated in considerable detail the scheme proposed by the Committee, and we are of opinion that it is well considered and modest, and deserves sympathetic consideration. The Indian industry is handicapped by want of funds and by want of skilled operators. Indian young men should be sent to America and Germany to learn the technique of the business. Indian capital will flow more freely than it does at present if it is known that the industry has the support of government behind it. Next to capital, the great want of the industry is a sufficient number of capable actors, particularly actresses. Except in Bengal, where there is a small group of educated and cultured actors, the profession has nowhere attracted men and women of the educated community. The paucity of women actresses has to some extent been made good by Anglo-Indian girls who, the Committee remark, have shown a remarkable capacity for representing Indian characters. If men of high social and intellectual status take the initiative, it will not be difficult to attract Indian girls of respectable families to the profession which does not involve appearing before the footlights in a large and crowded theatre. If good Indian films are produced, they will surely be more interesting to all classes of Indians than foreign films. The main reasons why educated Indians show a preference for theatres which show foreign films, have more to do with the situation and the furnishing of these theatres than with the subject-matter of the films. Many of the Indian films, too, deal with themes which have no interest for educated men. The Indian theatrical organization on the business side too is very primitive. With all these disadvantages, theatres which show only Indian films make, as the Committee point out, larger profits than those which exhibit only foreign films. There is a great and useful future for the industry in this country, and the Government and the public should do all in their power to encourage it.

By far the most interesting and important part of the Report, is that in which the Committee examine the allegations regarding the damaging influence of cinema shows on the morals of the youth, and in the increase of crime. Most of these allegations are so sweeping that without any enquiry, one can safely dismiss them as gross exaggerations. The Committee, however, are not content with this summary procedure. They put the statements to careful test, and find that those who make them have, as a rule, taken no pains to verify the truth about them. A certain class of British propagandists have set up the cry that American films are calculated to lower European civilisation in the eyes of Indians, and they, therefore, want to restrict the import of American and to encourage that of British films by legislation. The Committee completely expose the hollowness of this cry. They are able to show that not only has no such result happened to any appreciable extent but that Indian audiences are quite capable, even in the countryside, of sifting the good and the true from the evil and the false in cinema representations of Western civilisation. They further quote with approval the remark of Mr. N. P. A. Smith, the head of the Sind Criminal Investigation Department, that even if any slight misunderstanding exists and lowers the public conception of Western civilisation "it is surely wiser to let time and education provide a truer perspective and a saner demand rather than to attempt to sanctify a civilisation which, like all others, is humanly imperfect." Then, as regards the general effect on morals, the Committee observe that many Indian witnesses have urged that the cinema is wearing young persons and adults from much less wholesome recreations, and in particular instanced the decline of the "nautch" in public favour. This is not altogether correct, as the decline of the "nautch" began many years ago as the result of the anti-nautch movement, but we can well believe that the cinema is assisting this movement in the way suggested by the INDIANS IN CEYLON.

IMPLICATIONS OF REFORMS REPORT.

(By Mr. M. Subram Chettiar.)

The political status of about one million Indian Settlers in the Island is gradually becoming a serious matter for anxiety particularly owing to the retrograde recommendations of the Special Commission on the Reforms abolishing Indian representation in the State Council and stipulating a five years' residential qualification in regard to the eligibility for franchise. It would be relevant, in this connection, to state here, that according to the Special Commission's Report, the existing two Indian seats in the Legislative Council are unnecessary and superfluous, because of the existence of the Agent of the Government of India in Ceylon to look after and safeguard the interests of the Indian community. In addition to this, the Commissioners, as they aver, have it as their guiding principle to abolish all communal representation altogether, so as to prepare the country for a steady normal progress towards full responsible government; and on this score also, the Indian representation should go. All the same, it is significant that this excessive zeal of the Commissioners to abolish the communal element in the future constitution would concretely shape itself only in respect of the claims of the minority communities in the Island and the Indian settlers; and the Report unfortunately does not keep pace with its professed platitude when we find it has been unusually careful to provide six nominated seats for the European community in the Island, based on special considerations, equally strong and valid in respect of the claims of the Indian community also. It is, however, true that the minority communities in the Island as the Ceylon Moors, the Burghers and the Ceylon Tamils consider themselves part and parcel of the permanent population; and in consequence, antagonisms among themselves seldom take the usual shape or intensity as it is against the Indian community in particular. If, the Commissioners really fear that the European interests in the Island would suffer for want of special representation, why on earth should the Indians alone (similarly circumstanced in the Island as the European merchants and planters) be considered as deserving of a different treatment in the matter of special representation?

STERILISATION.

Evidently, the Commissioners, have been thoroughly oblivious to the potent influences at work in the Island, which amply justify the alarm of the Indian settlers in the event of their being denied special representation in the Legislature, even though a minority representation as at present would not, by itself, be effective to neutralise the forces ranged against the community. But it certainly is a measure of appreciation of the Indian case at its proper perspective and will serve the interests of the community to a considerable degree with the facility available to present the Indian case from the unofficial point of view thus supplementing the official view of the Agent to the Government of India in the Island. Moreover, as matters are, the Indian settlers feel that they would not have fair play at the hands of an elected Legislature which would surely be for all reasons, either, Sinhalese members or Ceylon Tamils returned from territorial constituencies with preponderating Sinhalese or Ceylonese voters; just because of the questionable attitude displayed by Ceylonese Members of the Council during the past four years whenever matters Indians came up for consideration. To illustrate my point I would refer to the unsuccessful attempts two months ago of a Ceylonese member in the Legislative Council who is obliged to the Indian voter for the seat, to persuade the Government, to stop the immigration of Indians "other than assisted labourers". Then again the Land Commission appointed by the Legislative Council, in its third interim Report published in the beginning of this year, has been so very subtle in its definition of the term "Ceylonese" as to exclude the Indians in particular in the matter of acquiring Crown land. The Land Commissioners, on the other hand, could include even "Domiciled Europeans" in the category of "Ceylonese"; but certainly, the Indian ought to be shunned. One of the recommendations of this Commission seeks to restrict alienation, mortgage, and sale of lands in favour of "the Ceylonese" only. If an Indian for instance advances a loan on mortgage the mortgaged property could not be purchased in auction by an Indian, but only by "a Ceylonese" in conformity with this definition. Then we have the long list of anti-Indian Ordinances in the statutes such as the Medical Ordinance, the Civil service Ordinance, the Destitute's Ordinance and also the Money Lenders Ordinance, one and all of them smack anti-Indian bias. Not a single professional who has taken the Medical degrees of any Indian University, could register himself in Ceylon as a medical practitioner according to the Medical Ordinance, even though the large Indian population in Colombo and in the Kandy province would highly value the professional help of an Indian doctor in preference to the Ceylonese one. The Ceylon Civil service, both the superior and the clerical section, are shut against the Indian as the result of the Civil service Commissioners' recommendations in 1910. The Destitute's Ordinance supplies another useful weapon to scare away the Indian sojourner to the Island through its vexatious restrictions only too well known. And lastly, attempts are now in progress to bring out a new Money Lenders' Ordinance to cripple the monetary business of the Nagarathe community in the Island. As for safeguarding the interests of the Indian Labourer in the Island, the efficacy of the Indian Agent alone is mentioned in the Report, even though the Commissioners are aware inter alia of the rebellious antics which the planters indulged in before yielding to a bare and legitimate living wage settlement now passed into an ordinance by the Legislative council. Hence, it is clear that the Indian settler is confronted with an acute struggle for existence in the Island and has to range himself against odds. He has to hold his own against the Ceylonese Nationalist who wants him to leave the Island bag and baggage. He has to fight against class legislation and against several other handicaps of similar nature. Such being the case, to suggest the abolition of even this saggarrly representation would only imply the denial of the Indian's right to be in the Colony any longer.

CAPTIOUS FRANCHISE.

If the atmosphere does not point to any tolerable future for the Indian settlers in the Island, the Commissioners Report makes it more complicated and gloomy. Not only are the two Indian seats to be abolished but the chances for any considerable number of Indians of getting registered as voters in the territorial electorates are automatically whittled down to the minimum in as much as it is almost impossible to satisfy the provisions regarding eligibility qualification for a vote by a five years stay in the Island. This extraordinary handicap affects only the potential voters of the Indian community and perhaps specially designed as such to exclude the alien element to have any say in the elections for territorial seats. That this provision is plainly inconsistent with the Commissioners' reforming zeal which conceives even the grant of manhood suffrage, will be apparent, as the restricted latitude for the Indian settler certainly nullifies the benefit of the concession, so far as he is concerned. It is clear therefore that the use of the Indian settler suffers acutely from this unjustifiable restriction in respect of his existence as a political unit, and calls for immediate revision, along with the equally paramount necessity of renovating special representation in the State Council, as an effective set off against the adverse factors operating against the Indian settler in the Island, and likely to operate for a considerable period ahead, so long as the present attitude of the Ceylonese people and their elected representatives in the Council continue to prevail. Therefore, it is up to the Indian people and the Indian Government to take up this vital aspect of the Indian settlers' political existence in Ceylon in all earnestness and address themselves effectively to administer the requisite corrective, before it is too late; so that the Indian settler in Ceylon is assured of a tolerable political existence in future. Else the tragic experience the Indian colonials in the other possessions of the Empire will be repeated here also to the intense chagrin of our countrymen.

WIDOWS RIGHT OF INHERITANCE.

Mr. Har Bilas Sarda has given notice of a bill to make better provision for Hindu widows.

In the statement of objects and reasons he says—The Hindu law of inheritance, so far as women are concerned, is unsatisfactory and unjust, and the position of Hindu widows under it is deplorable. A Hindu woman does not get any share in her father's property—share in the sense of property of which she becomes absolute owner—or does she get any in her husband's. A widow's right of inheritance is very scantily and sparingly recognised by different schools of Hindu Law. Katyan says; Let the widow succeed to her husband's wealth—Mitakshara ii 2 (Mayne's Hindu Law, p. 875) Mayne says: Originally she the (widow) shared in the general incapacity for inheritance which affected all women... neither Manu, Apasthamba Vaidyaththa nor Narada recognises her right as heir, though they do acknowledge that of the daughter and the mother p. 759).

After tracing the growth of widow's rights, Mayne says that Mitakshara arrived at the conclusion that widow is entitled to inherit to her husband, if he died separated and not reunited and leaving no male issue, and this is now adopted universally, except where the authority of Janmata Vahana prevails.

He adds: "It is, therefore, equally settled in Bengal that a widow succeeds to her husband's share when he is undivided, just as she would to the entire property of one who is held as separated. But even in Bengal the widow of a son who predeceases his father undivided inherits nothing."

Then as a rule 'a widow's right as heir does not go beyond the reason for it, viz., her claim to a personal maintenance. And this is the reason why, where woman inherits to a male, his heirs and not hers take at her death". A widow's right is practically a right to maintenance and no more.

AT THE MERCY OF CO-PARCERS.

In practice a widow in Hindu Society is at the mercy of co-parcers, even though her husband may have the entire wealth of the family and she may, during his life time have lived a life of affluence and luxury, as soon as he dies, the entire property goes to the surviving male members of the family and she becomes thereafter only entitled to maintenance which, as popularly understood, denotes bare means of living.

This state of affairs may have operated tolerably well in days when India was practically isolated from the rest of the world, and the principles and ideals underlying the Joint Hindu Family System were properly understood and fully acted upon by members of the family. But with the disappearance of those ideals which the originators of the joint family system had in view, the non-observance of the principles on which this system was originally based, the gradually and slowly continuing disintegration of the joint family system, the progressive loosening of caste bonds resulting in gradual disappearance of the homogeneity and the harmony of Hindu society all due more or less to... the acceptance of new ideas of life and conduct, influence of contact with foreign culture and various other causes, the Hindu Law of inheritance has begun to operate against women with a disheartening effect and their lives are becoming difficult and distressful and often miserable; while the condition of widows has become intolerable and in many cases appalling.

The present bill proposes to give relief to Hindu widows by giving them a share in family property and making them sole heirs to their deceased husband's personal property.

WIDOW REMARRIAGE ACT.

71st ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION.

To commemorate the anniversary of the passing of the Widow Re-marriage Reform Act of 1886, a public meeting of the citizens of Bombay was held on Wednesday the 20th July at the Prarthana Ismaij Hall. Mr. K. Natarajan presided.

In opening the proceedings the President observed that the 25th of July was a very memorable day in the history of Indian social reform as it was that day, about 70 years ago, that the Act for legalising the re-marriage of Hindu widows was passed. The anniversary of that day had been celebrated for some years past, but for the last few years, for some reason or other it was stopped. He was glad now that practice was being revived and that they had met there to celebrate the day.

WORK DONE AT VARIOUS CENTRES.

Pandit Navaratna Vidyasagar, organising Secretary of the Bombay Presidency Vidhva Vivaha Sahayak Sabha, next recounted the work done at the various branches of the Sabha. The head office of the Sabha was established at Lahore 53 years ago and it had now over 600 branches all over India, of which over 30 were in the Bombay Presidency. The total number of widow re-marriages so far performed under the auspices of the different branches of the Sabha, went far beyond 13,000. The number of widow re-marriages arranged last year were 2500 in the whole of India, of which 50 were in the Bombay Presidency. Of the 50, 22 were in Baroda, 20 in Bombay and the rest in other parts of the Presidency. They had also, at present, several applications from widows and men who are willing to marry them in the pending list.

Mrs. Amegiri, Dr. Kaliandas Desai, Mrs. Avantikabai Gokhale and others then addressed the gathering on the importance of further reforms in the direction of alleviating the sufferings of the helpless Hindu widows.

ECONOMIC FREEDOM OF WOMEN.

Dr. C. Y. Chitnis said that, though widow re-marriage had the sanction of Government, that particular piece of legislation was a bit ahead of public opinion on the subject, with the result they had to agitate in order to create public opinion in favour of widow-marriage. "Behind all these problems there was the economic question and it was because of the economic and social slavery of women, that they had to face the question of widow marriage. If they could find a possible way of making women in general and widows in particular, economically free, the problem of widow marriage would never arise.

In conclusion, the speaker appealed to the women as a class to declare class war on men. It was only by a series of such class-wars that they would be able to recover the economic freedom, which they had possessed before.

PRESIDENT'S CONCLUDING REMARKS.

After Dr. Deshmukh and some others had addressed the gathering, the President in his concluding address said that on an occasion like that they should remember with gratitude the great men who in those days worked for widow re-marriage reform, which to-day seemed to be very easy and comparatively small matter. They had to remember with gratitude Ishwar Chandar Vidyasagar, who was chiefly instrumental in moving Government to pass this legislation, and Madhavdas Raghunatadas and others who had also done much in that direction.

Some people thought, because there had not been thousands of re-marriages, the reform was a failure. It was a very wrong view to take. Even in Europe where widows were free to re-marry, an examination of the statistics would show that hardly five per cent of the widows actually marry again. This was because some people felt repugnant to contract alliances with more than one man or woman.

IDELS OF MARRIAGE.

Marriage was a sacred thing in which both the husband and wife would be bound together in inseparable ties not only in this life, but also in the after life. In this respect the Hindu community had set itself a high ideal which could not be followed by everyone: The attempt to do so had caused much misery and hardship especially among young girls. "Therefore, as practical men however high our ideals may be, we have to recognise the actual difficulties that exist to-day. Widow re-marriage reform is thus essential to the happiness of many thousands of our sisters. At the same time let us remember that since the Act was passed, the ideals of marriage have also changed. To-day it is no longer felt as it was 70 years ago, that marriage is an absolute necessity for every man and woman for obtaining salvation either in this world or in the next. There are scores of young men and women who think that they could do greater service to themselves and to others by devoting themselves to social service than by entering into marriages. That is an ideal that we should respect."

PROBLEM OF ABANDONED WIVES.

Proceeding, the speaker said that the greatest problem of the day was not that of widows but that of abandoned wives, who were increasing in number daily. Therefore they had to take the question as a whole and consider how they could promote the intellectual, physical and moral growth of their women, widows as well as others. The ultimate solution for all those problems lay in educating women. If a full-grown woman with proper education decided that her future happiness lay in marrying, she must be absolutely free to contract one, no matter whether widow or virgin.

THE BILL A SUCCESS.

Concluding, the speaker remarked that the Widow Re-marriage Reform Act of 1856, has been a success in more ways than one. It has helped to stimulate public opinion in the direction of other important questions such as the raising of marriageable age of girls and boys and female education.

HINDU WIDOWS' RIGHT OF ADOPTION.

Speaking on Mr. Judas's Bill regarding the right of adoption of Hindu widows, Mr. Natarajan thought that while the Bill was utterly retrograde the time has come to consider whether there was any need at all for continuing the legal fiction of adoption. What they really wanted was that women should have the same rights of inheriting property as men, and the speaker had no doubt that most women would use better discretion in the disposal of her property than many men.

With a vote of thanks to the chair moved by Mr. D. G. Dalvi the meeting terminated.

WIDOW MARRIAGE ACT OF 1856.

SELECT COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

To Honourable the Legislative Council.

We, the Select Committee on the Bill "to remove all legal obstacles to the marriage of Hindu Widows", have the honour to submit the following report.

2. Fifty-one petitions from persons of the Hindu religion have been presented in relation to this Bill; of which twenty-three, signed by 5,101 persons, are in favour of the principle of the proposed measure, and twenty-eight, signed by 53,746 persons, are against the measure. One petition in support of the measure has been presented by the members of the Calcutta Missionary Conference. A communication has been received from Sir Robert Hamilton, the Agent to the Governor General for Central India, who is in favour of the measure. And a communication has been received from the Secretary to the Government of the North-Western Provinces, conveying the Honourable Lieutenant Governor's approval of the Bill, and the opinions upon it of the Judges of the Agra Sudder Court, of whom the majority, Messrs. Harrington and Smith, are in favour of the Bill, and the minority, Mr. Begbie, is opposed to it; also the opinions of the several Commissioners of Divisions and Provinces under His Honour's Government, of which eight (exclusive of Sir R. Hamilton) are decidedly in favour of the measure, and two seem to doubt its expediency at the present time.

3. The objections taken in the twenty-eight petitions against the Bill are the following:

First.—The marriage of Hindu Widows is prohibited by Hindu law; those who interpret the law otherwise being in error.

Second.—That the marriage of Hindu Widows of responsibility is contrary to the customs and usages of the Country.

Third.—That, if the law is passed, the present rules of inheritance will undergo great alteration, endangering the property of some, and depriving others of their property altogether; and that, thus, the law, though professing to be merely permissive, will be in fact "compulsory" in regard to those whose rights of succession will be interfered with when widows re-marry. By this expression we understand the petitioners to mean that the proposed law, in its consequences, will affect, against their will, persons other than those who choose to avail themselves of its provisions.

Fourth.—That Hindu rights of inheritance are closely connected with religious obligations; and, as it is impossible that those inheriting under the proposed law can be recognized by a family holding to the country's, as a part of that family, therefore as capable of performing such religious obligations, it is unjust to allow them to have the rights of inheritance which are connected therewith; wherefore this law would in effect extend the operation of Act XXI of 1850, which it is contended, is an unjust law, to a new class of persons, that is to say, to widows who do not change their religion.

Fifth.—That the proposed law would interfere with the Hindu law of marriage, inheritance, and succession, and so would be contrary to repeated enactments of Parliament and of the Indian Government, providing that the Hindus shall enjoy their own laws on these points; and that it would interfere with the religion and customs of the Hindus, which a proclamation issued so lately as the 9th of August last, by the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, promised should not be disturbed.

Sixth.—That widows, enjoined by their husbands, when dying to adopt a son, in order to perpetuate the family name, will be induced by the desire of worldly enjoyment to take second husbands, and slight the injunctions of their deceased husbands about adoption.

Seventh.—That widows will be induced by the intrigues of their avaricious relations to re-marry, and so, it is contended to disgrace themselves.

Eighth.—That the proposed law will introduce strife into families.

Ninth.—That the proposed law is vague and insufficient, since it does not declare what shall be a valid marriage in the case of a widow; theuptil

4. On the first of these objections, namely, that those who interpret the Hindu law as permitting the marriage of widows are in error, we have to report that, in our opinion, this objection, whether it be well or ill founded, does not apply to this Bill; for this Bill, does not determine this question of interpretation, and is not founded upon the assumption that either the one or the other of the two interpretations represents the orthodox doctrine,
The Bill is founded on the principle of relieving those Hindus who believe that widows may properly marry again, and ought not to be prohibited from so doing, from the legal obstacles which now prevent them from acting according to their convictions. It would be quite out of place, therefore, in reporting upon this Bill, to enter upon any discussion of the question of Hindu law which is raised by this objection.

5. On the second objection, that the re-marriage of Hindu widows of respectability is contrary to the customs and usages of the country, we have to observe that the custom of Hindus of respectability could not be otherwise in the present state of the law as administered by the Courts of justice, by whom any such marriage would be declared invalid, and the progeny of any such marriage would be declared illegitimate. The object of the law is to enable those Hindus who are so minded to break through this custom. But it is obvious that this permission will not interfere with those who desire to continue in the observance of the existing custom.

6. The third objection is grounded on the alleged alteration of the rules of inheritance, which this law would cause. The petitions put several cases as instances in which persons who would succeed to the property of a deceased Hindu, if a certain widow remained unmarried, will either not succeed, or will succeed to a smaller share of the property than they would take otherwise, if that widow marries, and has legitimate issue by her second marriage. But it appears to us to be quite unreasonable to talk of this as an interference with the rules of inheritance, and as introducing a compulsory element into the proposed law, in respect of more remote heirs who fail to succeed to property, in consequence of less remote heirs coming into existence. That such a result would occur was, of course, foreseen by the framers of the law; and the provision for legitimizing the children of re-married widows was made for this very purpose. It is impossible to relieve any marriageable person from an artificial bar to his or her marriage, without introducing, in all probability, heirs into the line of succession in the family to which such person belongs, who could not otherwise come into existence; and it is impossible to introduce any heir into a line of succession, without displacing all who stand lower in the line. But this can be no argument, one way or the other, as to the propriety of removing the artificial bar. No family suffers as a whole, by reason of the removal of any such bar; for, when the bar is removed, the issue of the newly authorized marriage are as much a part of the family as the other descendants of the original stock. All the particular causes, however complicated they seem, put by the several petitioners, resolve themselves into this one case of a female in the line of succession marrying and having issue, and thereby cutting out those below her or her issue in the line of succession, or introducing new shares to divide the estate with heirs standing in the same degree of affinity to the deceased property. And the one answer to all these cases is, that no marriageable person in a line of succession, if he or she wishes to marry, ought to be barred from marrying, merely because other heirs may thereby be disappointed in their expectation of succession.

7. The only particular case which we think it necessary specially to notice, is thus put by the petitioners. "If a Hindu dies leaving two daughters both of whom are widows, but the one has a son, and the other no children; by the Hindu law of inheritance as it is now administered, that son will be the sole heir of his maternal grandfather. But, if the childless widow contracts a second marriage and has issue by her second husband, by the proposed law they should be entitled to equal shares of the property of their mother's father, with the son of the widow who has not re-married."

8. We apprehend that, in the above passage, the law is not fully stated. If a Hindu dies leaving neither male issue nor a widow, but daughters, an unmarried daughter is entitled to take in exclusion of the other daughters who have been married, whether they are childless widows, or have or are capable of having issue. In default of an unmarried daughter, daughters who have or are capable of having issue take. A daughter who is barren, or a childless widow, is altogether excluded. In the case put by the petitioners the property would, according to the existing law, first go to the widowed daughter who has a son. The childless widow would be excluded.

9. The Bill, as it stands, does not propose to alter this; but the case put by the petitioners has suggested to us a difficulty to which they do not directly advert. This law, by permitting a second marriage will certainly in many cases destroy the grounds on which the exclusion of a childless widow-daughter from the inheritance rests; namely, that, being incapable of having lawful issue, she cannot continue her father's line. If the Act were to remain silent on the subject, it might hereafter be contended that cessante ratione cessat lex. We can see no positive injustice in such a conclusion, for the rule is an arbitrary one, and not very agreeable to natural justice or reason. But, advertent to the very complicated rules by which the order of the succession of daughter is regulated, and the probability that a very large class of widows will be disposed to avail themselves of this law, we conceive that, to avoid confusion, it will be desirable to provide that no person who, by reason of her being a childless widow at the time of the death of any other person, would, according to the existing law, be excluded from a share in property inheritable on the death of such other person, shall take any share in that property because she may hereafter avail herself of the provisions of this law, and so become capable of having issue. If she has re-married during her father's life-time, we think that she should be allowed to stand on the same footing.
as any other married daughter. We have inserted sections to give effect to these views.

10. The Bill being so amended, we are not clear that that which is stated by the petitioners as a consequence of the Act will take place. At present, if a man dies leaving a maiden-daughter and a married daughter, the maiden daughter succeeds to the whole inheritance to the exclusion of the other. According to some schools, on the death of the maiden-daughter after she has married and had male issue, her son succeeds to the grand-father to the exclusion of the married daughter or her son. It is not improbable that, by analogy, according to the same schools, the same rule would be applied in favor of the son of a married daughter in whom the whole inheritance has first vested, to the exclusion of the son of the excluded widow, born to her on a second marriage after her exclusion. But, if the law were ruled to be otherwise, the addition to the class of heirs of the son born to the widow after her second marriage, would be but a particular instance of the general objection which has been above disposed of in the sixth paragraph of this Report.

11. As to the fourth objection, it is admitted to be an objection which has been already pronounced by the Legislative to be invalid. We have ourselves no doubt of the justice or policy of the enactment which has established the principle that the law shall not inflict loss upon any person of any religion or class, for acting in his religious concerns according to his conscience. But it is unnecessary to discuss this point; the principle is established. This being the established principle, it appears to us, so long as this principle is in force, to be futile to contend that the greater ought not to involve the lesser privilege. If a Hindu widow turns Mohammedan, and so repudiates the whole Hindu code, it is admitted that, by the law of the land, she may contract a valid marriage, and that her children by such marriage will be legitimate, and will inherit the property of her Hindu ancestor. Nevertheless, if the same widow remains a Hindu, but adopts an interpretation of Hindu law which, though not the interpretation of the majority of Hindus at present, is the interpretation of a very respectable minority, which in point of numbers alone is not inconsiderable, (as the petition on the table of the Council testify)—in this case it is contended that the law of the land ought to make her incapable of contracting a valid marriage, and that, if she marries, following the dictates of her own conscience, she ought to be treated by the law of the land as a prostitute, and her children ought to be disinherited. We do not consider this to be a tenable doctrine.

12. The fifth objection is that the proposed law would be an interference with Hindu law and custom, in the matters of marriage and inheritance contrary to the principle of religious equality, and contrary to repeated acknowledgments of the duty of respecting such laws and customs. It appears to us that the petitioners have entirely failed to substantiate this objection. To interfere practically, neither directly nor indirectly, with the persuasion or religious observances of any single class, family, or individual of the Hindu race, is the principle of the British Government; and this principle is strictly observed by the Bill before us. On the other hand, this principle is contravened by the state of the Municipal law, which it is the object of this Bill to correct. The law, in its present state, does interfere with the freedom of certain Hindus in acting according to their own interpretation of their own religious books; and this interference operates injuriously to the individuals more immediately concerned, and to public morals. All that the Bill under review does is, without interfering with any other Hindus, to give practical freedom to the particular class of Hindus for whose relief it is designed.

13. The sixth objection is that widows will remarry, and thereby will be prevented from adopting sons, though enjoined to do so by their deceased husbands. It is manifest that, if a widow duty authorised, who intends to marry again, is inclined, to adopt, she can do so before her second marriage, exactly as if she had no such intention. And, as the Bill is framed, the power of re-marriage cannot operate in the way of an inducement not to adopt an heir to her deceased husband, because she cuts herself off from all such inheritance by re-marriage.

14. The seventh objection seems to us to involve an in consistency. If the relatives are of the class who believe a second marriage forbidden to a widow, and therefore disgraceful, they cannot be expected to urge what in their eyes would tend to the disgrace of the family. If they are of the class who believe the contrary doctrine, it is especially for the relief of such as they that the proposed law has been brought forward; and their relief injures no one else.

15. The petitioners who advance the eighth objection do not explain the grounds on which their anticipations are founded. If they had done so, we believe it would have been apparent, either that their anticipations have no reasonable foundation, or that what they call the avoidance of stigma in families is nothing less than the restriction of grown men and women from all natural and proper freedom of action, in what chiefly concerns themselves.

16. The ninth objection, which is advanced in two of the petitions against the Bill, is that the Bill is vague and imperfect, in not providing what shall constitute a valid marriage in the case of a Hindu widow. It is alleged that the usual nuptial texts are inapplicable in such a case. The same remark is made in three of the petitions in favour of the principle of the Bill, in the way of recommending an amendment of the Bill in this point, amongst others.

17. The petitioners at whose instance the Bill was introduced do not feel the want of any special provision of this nature. They are of opinion that all the usual texts recited, and ceremonies employed, at the first marriage of a female, are applicable in the case of any subsequent marriage. And, if this is so, as we are inclined to believe it is, whatever would constitute a valid marriage in the one case would equally constitute a valid marriage in the other. But, for greater security, and for the removal of all doubts, we have prepared a clause, expressly providing that, whatever words spoken, ceremonies performed, or engagements made, would constitute a valid marriage in the case of a female who had not been married before, shall constitute a valid marriage in the case of a widow.

18. In connection with the same point, we have thought it necessary to provide specially for the giving away of a minor widow. In the case of a bride who is a minor, the giving away by a male of the same caste, is understood to be a necessary part of the ceremony of marriage. But, as a widow is considered to have left her father's family, and to have become a member of the deceased husband's family, doubt might be felt as to the right of her own relatives to give her away, unless special provision on the subject be made. And, similarly, doubt might be felt as to, the right of her deceased husband's family to give her away. Her own rights too, both whilst a minor, and after coming of age, might be of doubt. We have prepared a clause providing specially for all these points.

19. We propose that, when a widow is a minor, her own male relatives shall be the persons to give her away, exactly as if she were unmarried, and their consent shall be necessary to the validity of her marriage; and that, if she be of age, her own consent shall be sufficient to constitute the marriage, whether she be given away by any male relative, or not. As her husband's family may have an interest in including a widow to remarry, we have thought it right in this manner to render the consent of her own family necessary, in the case of a minor widow. At present, by the Hindu law, an un-married girl of full age may give herself away; and, of course, a widow of full age should have the same power.

20. Sir Robert Hamilton, the Agent of the Governor General for Central India, who supports the principle of the proposed law, has made two suggestions respecting this Bill. First, that there will be risk of disturbance in families if the widow, who is by law guardian of the Infant children of her deceased husband, is allowed to retain such right of guardianship, after she has contracted a second marriage, and has thereby become the member of another family; Secondly, that a widow ought not to be allowed to retain property left to her by her deceased husband for life, by a will made before the passing of this Act, with remainder to the offspring of the testator.

21. Upon the first point, though not insensible to the objections which may be made to depriving the mother of the guardianship of her own children, for doing that which the law will hereafter permit, we agree with Sir Robert Hamilton. The mother will go into the family, and will reside in the family house of her second husband; and, constituted as Hindu Society is, it would be socially inexpedient, and indeed unjust, to give her power of removing the children of her late husband from their own family. We have inserted words in the second section to give effect to Sir Robert Hamilton's suggestion.

22. Upon the second point, which has been raised also by two Commissioners in the North-Western Provinces, we are disposed far to alter the original design of the Bill, as to extend the principle of the second section, which restricts a widow re-marrying from continuing to enjoy the property of her deceased husband which was devolved upon her as his heiress, to those cases in which she takes by his will any interest determinable with a legal interest, and not giving to her the power of alienating the property. The principle of the second section was that a widow on her second marriage should forfeit all that the law gives her of right in her deceased husband's estate; but that she should retain whatever she has acquired by way of gift, whether the gift were testamentary, or by act inter vivos. The reason for this distinction was that the very peculiar interest which the Hindu law of inheritance gives to a widow in her deceased husband's estate is really, if the texts are examined, intended to be no more than an interest durante viduitate; that the conditions on which it is given to her are inconsistent with a second marriage; and, though she is entitled to the unrestricted possession of the estate, she cannot, except in certain exceptional cases, alienate any part of it. Any absolute interest which she takes by gift stands on a different foundation. If the donor has attached no conditions to the gift, we are not to speculate on his motives, or to ask whether he would or would not have made the gift conditional if he had foreseen the alteration of the law. In no case is the forfeiture intended to be a penalty, or to operate as a restriction on a second marriage. It is imposed in the one case, because it is a consequence of a condition which the law annexes to the estate; it is not imposed in the other, because the Legislature is under no obligation to create a condition on a gift which the donor has made unconditionally. But it often happens that by will a testator gives to his wife very much the same kind of interest as that which, if his heiress at law, she would take on an intestacy. He may sometimes vary the legal incidents of her estate, but still leave it so as to be limited in duration and enjoyment, and to give her no power of alienation. It seems to us that all these gifts, which more of less partake of the nature of a Hindu widow's estate of inheritance, should be put on the same footing as the latter. Again, we have thought it right to provide for those cases in which the husband's estate, having first descended to the sons or grandsons, afterwards vests in the widow as heiress of the first taker. In these cases we think the second section ought also to apply; and we have altered it accordingly. We have struck out the proviso to that Section, and have secured the widow's rights in the property which she is not to forfeit on a second marriage, more clearly by a separate Section.

23. The Judges of the Madras Court of Cazar Adawat observe that "the Hindu law does not recognize in Hindus the right to make bequest by will, and that the law of inheritance obtaining amongst Hindus offers impediments to the recognition of titles under wills," wherefore they think it "advisable, whatever the practice of the Courts may have been with regard to wills by Hindus," that the provision of the Bill, preserving to the widow who re-marries the right and interests in any estate or other property to which she may have become entitled under the will of her deceased husband, should be omitted. But we think it quite necessary to retain this provision; for, although Hindu wills are not valid in other parts of India, they are beyond question valid, and of daily occurrence, in Bengal. For Bengal, therefore, the provision is indispensable; and elsewhere it will have no operation, as a widow cannot become entitled to any property under a will, unless that will is recognised by the law as valid.

24. Of the petitions in favor of the Bill, it is only necessary to notice two, in which it is argued that a general marriage Act, according to which valid marriages might be contracted before a registrar, without any religious ceremony would be preferable to the present Bill. But it is obvious that a general marriage Act of the proposed nature, whilst its scope would be quite different from, and generally much larger than, the scope of this Bill, unless it went much beyond its own legitimate province, would not supply the place of this Bill. It would merely supply the place of one of the special provisions which we propose to add to this Bill. It would provide, legitimately, how, in one particular way, a marriage can be performed, which will be valid so far as the ceremony is concerned; but it is no part of the purpose of such a law to provide for any marriage whatever, even under the title or by the name of marriage. One of the fundamental principles of the present Act is to confine the legal effects of marriage to those which are applicable, and perfectly sufficient for the case. There is no ground for presuming otherwise. It would be casting a slur upon the class for whose relief the Bill is intended, and would be in fact to some extent aiding with their adversaries, if the Municipal law pronounced that these rites were not sufficient for the case. That this Bill does not relieve those whom a general Marriage Act might relieve, is no objection to this Bill. Those who, on their own account, really wish such an Act to be passed, should petition for what they want, without complicating either that subject, or the subject of the present Bill, by unnecessarily confounding them together.

27. There are several other points of the same character in the same petitions, to none of which we think it necessary specially to advert, as they are all answered in substance by the above remarks. They are all resolvable into one objection; namely, that this Bill goes no farther than its title indicates, and does not make several regulations concerning marriage, which the petitioners think would improve the general law of marriage as it affects Hindus, but which have no more applicability in the case of the marriage of a Hindu widow, than in the case of the marriage of a Hindu virgin. We are of opinion that any regulations of this nature, whether good or bad in themselves, would be quite out of place in any such Bill as the present.

The Glimpses
"Sadhu Vaswani is carrying on the tradition of our ancient Rishis even in these dog days and this little haphazardly got up book, appropriately dedicated to Kesava Chandra Sen, whose life also was a consistent endeavour to achieve harmony between the outer and the inner life, is in the author's best vein... Coming straight from the midst of his personal experiences, they bear the stamp of his spiritual fervour and convey the authentic note of inspiration... There can be no greater spiritual food to the present generation than this message of Sahaj or the creative force in life." The Hindu

NOTES.

More Social Legislation.—The Bill Mr. M. R. Jayakar proposes to introduce in the Legislative Assembly meets with some difficulty in enabling Hindus to adopt their daughters' children and others who come under the prohibited category under the law as interpreted by the courts at present, is a most necessary and timely measure. As Mr. Jayakar points out this rule of prohibition is based on the principle that the adopted son must be the "reflection" of the natural born son. One of the implications of this rule has come to be that the mother of the adopted son should not stand to the adoptive father in any relation which would have been a bar to their marriage. So the daughter's son cannot be adopted, though as Mr. Jayakar points out he would naturally be a most eligible choice. In the absence of an organ of legislation, Hindu law like the Roman and Breton laws had to develop by means of metaphors and legal fictions based on them, and further the idea of a daughter being transferred body and soul to another family by marriage had a great influence in shaping the course of Hindu law. In both these respects, there has been a great change. We have now a legislature and we no longer regard married daughters as aliens under the parental roof. In fact, a rather noticeable tendency at the present day is for the son-in-law to become an inmate of his wife's family instead of the daughter going over to her husband's place. The daughter's son is often brought up by his maternal grandfather and if the latter were not impeded by the law he would adopt him as a son. Mr. Jayakar's Bill, therefore, merely brings the law in conformity with the social tendencies of the time, and is unlikely to meet with any appreciable opposition. We suggest for his consideration that he may take the opportunity to bring the law of adoption in another respect in line with the spirit of the times. Mr. Jadhav, it will be remembered, recently tried to restrict the right of Hindu widows in the Bombay Presidency to adopt, which is wider than that allowed in other provinces. He could not get a single supporter in the Bombay Legislative Council, and he had to withdraw it. Mr. Jayakar, we think, may embody in his Bill a clause to assimilate the law as administered in other provinces to the practice in this Presidency. A correspondent suggests in another column that certain doubts as to the civil rights of parties to post-puberty marriages and their descendants, should be set at rest by legislation. We doubt if any Court in these days will hold that a man or woman will forfeit their property rights by marrying when they are of proper age, but we agree that if there is the least chance of it, the law should expressly affirm that no such consequence will ensue. Perhaps, Mr. Sarda may add a clause to this effect to his Bill.

The Barh Satî Case.—We made a brief comment in the Reformer of the 23rd June based on the judgment of the Patna High Court in the case in which certain persons had been tried by the District Sessions Judge of abetting the burning of a Hindu widow on the funeral pyre of her deceased husband. We have since received a letter from Advocate, Mr. Murari Prasad, enclosing the District Judge's charge to the jury, the judgment of the High Court, and a petition by the accused persons to the Government of Bihar and Orissa praying that the whole of the sentences passed on them should be remitted and that they should be released from jail. Mr. Murari further states that the convicted persons have appeal to the Privy Council and apprehends that the comments in the Reformer may prejudice them in the conduct of the appeal as well as in the disposal of their petition by the Government of Bihar and Orissa. He, therefore, requests that we should read the documents which he has been "good enough to enclose and publish a comment on the merits of the judgment as a pronouncement of a judicial tribunal". A brief reference to the facts of the case here is necessary to help the reader to understand the case. Incidentally, it throws an interesting side-light on the social customs of the Brahmins of Bihar. The widow, Sampati Kuer, was twenty years of age. Ten or twelve years ago she was married to Siddheswar Pandey of Sartha but she continued to reside at her father's house at Berhaa. It would appear that the marriage was never consummated. In August last Siddheswar fell ill at Sartha and Sampati went to his house to nurse him and nursed him until his death on the 21st November last. The body of the dead man was taken to a place called Barb some two miles from Sartha to be cremated... on the banks of the Ganges. With the funeral party who escorted the body was Sampati who seems to have made no secret of her intention to become a saiti. Police Constable who met the party was told so. The remonstrances of the Police induced Sampati to turn back but she changed her mind again and made her way to the place of cremation where a body of police had preceded her. The heart-rending scenes that followed will be found related in the narrative which we publish elsewhere.

Abetment of Suicide:—Several of the men who were in the funeral party were tried before the Sessions Judge of Faita and a Jury on the charge of abetment of suicide. The Judge's summing-up is a model of judicial presentation. The Jury unanimously found the accused "not guilty" but the Judge disagreeing referred the case to the High Court. The High Court found them guilty and sentenced them to terms of imprisonment varying from five to ten years. The Chief Justice who is fresh from England was evidently deeply moved by the sad and fearful story of the crime and his emotions are plainly visible in his judgment which is much too rhetorical for a judicial decision. It may be that all or some of the accused were merely passive spectators like the posse of 16 policemen who stood helplessly looking on while the poor girl was elaborately preparing to immolate herself on the funeral pyre. The Sessions Judge was of opinion that the police who were present at the scene made a poor show and private citizens cannot be expected to be more active in preventing crime than the Police. We should be sorry to say anything which may come in the way of the convicted man availing of all the avenues open to them under the law to obtain their freedom. Our comments were made on the basis of a telegraphic summary and were of a general character. We still think that the individual is the natural place in the one inevitably lead to self-government may be a reality in this country. It is well known that wine or liquor in any shape whatever is 'haram' to the Moslem and equally an abomination to the Hindu. Is it such a remote possibility that within a generation strict Prohibition Laws may make the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass impossible, unless we now in good time organise and make our position felt in the Councils of the land? It is evident your correspondent and several others of his class will and learn nothing and forget nothing. The mixing up of Politics with Religion which is one of the most ominous signs in the India of to-day conveys no lessons to many of the Catholic intelligentsia of to-day. We cannot think of anything more detrimental to Catholicism than to associate itself with the liquor habit. The correspondent demands in substance that Hindus and Mussalmans who constitute practically the whole population of India, should subordinate their religious obligations against liquor in order to allow the Roman Catholics to celebrate the Mass! If they do not do so, they are guilty of religious persecution! Cannot Mass be celebrated with the unfermented juice of the grape? How do the Catholics of the United States manage to celebrate their Mass?

Religious Persecution:—A correspondent writing in the Examinan, the well-known Roman Catholic review, raises the cry of religious persecution of Catholics in India on the following extraordinary grounds. He writes: "Religious persecution in the shape of Anti-Catholic laws are no longer a remote possibility in this country—they are fast becoming probable realities. Attempts have been made in various Legislative Assemblies to introduce Bills with regard to Education, Marriage, Divorces, Prohibition, etc. which are against the laws of the Church. Attempts have been made to frustrate the efforts of our Missionaries by declaring the religious conversion of minors a criminal offence! We all know that India at present is in a state of flux. Time will soon come when complete self-government may be a reality in this country. It is well known that wine or liquor in any shape whatever is 'haram' to the Moslem and equally an abomination to the Hindu. Is it such a remote possibility that within a generation strict Prohibition Laws may make the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass impossible, unless we now in good time organise and make our position felt in the Councils of the land? It is evident your correspondent and several others of his class will and learn nothing and forget nothing. The mixing up of Politics with Religion which is one of the most ominous signs in the India of to-day conveys no lessons to many of the Catholic intelligentsia of to-day. We cannot think of anything more detrimental to Catholicism than to associate itself with the liquor habit. The correspondent demands in substance that Hindus and Mussalmans who constitute practically the whole population of India, should subordinate their religious obligations against liquor in order to allow the Roman Catholics to celebrate the Mass! If they do not do so, they are guilty of religious persecution! Cannot Mass be celebrated with the unfermented juice of the grape? How do the Catholics of the United States manage to celebrate their Mass?

Religions. And this has been implanted into Indian policy from time immemorial. Asoka proclaimed his equal reverence and solicitude for Brahmanas and Shravanas—Hindus and Buddhists. Akbar's policy was founded on the same principle of equal consideration for all religions. The Indian conception of State under all the great Indian rulers included as an integral part of it the protection and support of religion. We seriously suggest that self-governing India cannot depart from this policy which has its roots in the national instinct. To disown religion, and to make it subservient to State policy, is utterly opposed to the national instinct, and it must inevitably lead to the early collapse of the constitution, and to chaos and anarchy.
REPUBLIC OF INDIA

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, AUGUST 18, 1928.

RELIGION AND THE STATE—I

The Indian National Congress adopted the of non-co-operation in 1920. In 1921, the non-co-operation movement reached its zenith.
The Gaya Congress in which the late Mr. C. R.
Das adumbrated the formation of a Swaraj party next year, was the first sign of the reviving influence of Indian Liberalism. In the next two years the Swaraj party had thrown off the Responsive wing which was practically a return to Liberalism with a faint flavour of non-co-operation. The Responsive were fiercely disowned by the Swarajists, as the Swarajists were disowned by the orthodox No-changers. But politicians are moved by impulses of which they are but feebly conscious. Attempts to bring about the formal entry of the Liberals into the National Congress were unsuccessful. The Congress leaders, however, have paved the way to this desirable consumption by inviting representatives of All Parties to co-operate with them in framing a constitution for India under the terms of the Madras Congress resolution. At several meetings at various places and times the All-Parties Conference found certain broad principles on which a large measure of agreement could be expected amongst politically-minded Indians. These have been embodied in the Report of the Nehru Comnittee which was issued last week. The report is to all intents and purposes unanimous. It is signed by Pandit Motilal Nehru, Syed Sir Ali Imam, Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, M. M. S. Aney, Sardar Mangal Singh, Mr. Shauib Querashi, Mr.
Subhas Chandra Bose and Mr. G. R. Pradhan, Hindu, Mahomedan, and Sikh opinion is thus well represented, as are also Congress, Liberal, Pessoa-alist and what may be called Republican schools of politics. The scheme outlined in the Report has been commended to the Indian public by Mahatma Gandhi, has been appreciately received by Liberal leaders like Sir Sivaswami Aiyar, Sir Sankaran Nair and Sir C. P. Ramaswami, and has been welcomed by the Indian Press of all shades and tendencies. In Great Britain, too, it seems to have produced a strong impression on account chiefly of the representative character of the signatories. In India the feeling about the report is one of satisfaction, to some extent of pride, to a large extent of relief. The impossible has become possible, the unexpected has happened.
The Report is to be submitted to the All-Parties Conference where it will no doubt undergo some changes. The favourable impre-sion produced by it is shown by the fact that the Lucknow session which is to meet shortly promises to be a well-attended one. People who expected the Conference to prove abortive like many previous Conferences, find that it has achieved something which is a great step towards unity of political opinion. Our own opinion of the Report is that it is a very able presentation of the political aspects of the national problem and, as such, it is bound to exercise a great influence in shaping the future course of Indian politics.
But we think that it does not take sufficient account of the deeper currents of Indian thought and tradition which are, of course, the real, effective operating forces of national life. The Committee have put up a great installation, but they have not shown where the power is to be generated for driving the constitutional machinery.
On the contrary, they have expressly denied to the constitution which they have formulated, the main and only source which can furnish sufficient motive power to this country. Amongst the "Fundamental Rights" formulated by the Comnittee is "freedom of conscience and free profession and practice of religion; subject to public order or morality." Another clause somewhat anomalously placed under the same heading, is: "There shall be no State religion for the Commonwealth of India or for any province in the Commonwealth, nor shall the State either directly or indirectly endow any religion or give any preference or impose any disability on account of religious belief or religious status."
The net effect of these two clauses taken together is to establish a secular State with authority to set up a standard of morality to which freedom of conscience and the free profession of religion are to be subject. The idea of a secular State was the motive or outcome of the French Revolution, and has been adopted by most modern States since. But except in Great Britain which has an established Church and in the United States where the Puritan tradition is still a force in politics, no secular State has undertaken to lay down a standard of morality to which religions ought to conform. The fact is that a secular State has no more morality than a Joint Stock Company.

Now, whatever else may or may not be true of India, no one can deny that it is a land of religion.
Religion is the dominant factor in the lives of the Indian people. The only authority which they instinctively and unquestioningly acknowledge is that of religion, the only discipline to which they voluntarily and cheerfully submit is that of religion. When we say, religion, it is not any particular religion we are referring to. The Indian or at least the Hindu attitude, which is the determining factor in this matter, to religion does not make any distinction between different

THE JOSEPHINE BUTLER CENTENARY.

(By Dr. Clifford Marksard, Ph.D.)

Since the Bombay City Corporation has passed the resolution requesting the Bombay Government to so amend the Prostitution Act as to make brothel-keeping illegal, it has been interesting to note the number of voices that have been raised in favour of the stricter regulation of this evil instead of its abolition. The arguments advanced are the arguments that we have heard in every city and nation that has made a direct, frontal attack upon the problem of prostitution. “Prostitution is a necessary evil,” they say, “and it is better that it should be localised and supervised than allowed to spread throughout the city. As for the medical aspect of the problem, that can be handled easily by compelling the women to undergo physical examination, and certifying the fit and the unfit.”

A recent issue of the Social Service Review (U.S.A.), makes a contribution to this problem in two leading articles dealing with the centenary of Josephine Butler. One hundred years ago this year there was born in England a girl by the name of Josephine Grey. Reared in a religious home; brought up with a love for social justice; married at the age of 19 to George Butler, a scholar and clergyman; Mrs. Butler early came to feel an active sympathy towards unfortunate women. At first her attention was directed towards rescue work, but soon she saw that rescue work was not enough, and she began to rouse the public conscience in favour of the complete abolition of commercialised vice.

Needless to say, such a crusade upon the part of a woman attracted widespread opposition. Such things were not talked about openly, particularly among women. But Mrs. Butler persisted, and her movement began to gather strength, resulting in the foundation of the International Vigilance Association.

In the sixties of the last century the system of the state regulation of the vice was practised in England, that is, brothels were licensed and in the military and naval centres their inmates were compelled to undergo medical examination as a means of protecting the health of the soldiers and sailors. Mrs. Butler felt that a system that forced women only to be examined was manifestly unfair and of little protection to the public health, as long as diseased men were allowed to run at large. But it was not until 1883 that Parliament took action leading to the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Act, followed by further action for the protection of women and girls in 1885.

The work that Josephine Butler began in the last century is not yet completed, but by passing from rescue work to a direct attack upon prostitution, Josephine Butler made a real contribution. She felt that regulation was futile and that the only sound forward step was that of abolition. “It is unjust,” she said, “to punish the sex who are the victims of a vice, and leave unpunished the sex who are the main cause both of the vice and its dreadful consequences. By such a system the path of evil is made more easy to our sons, and to the whole of the youth of England, inasmuch as a moral restraint is withdrawn the moment the State recognizes, and provides convenience for the practice of a vice which it thereby declares to be necessary and venial. The diseases which these Acts seek to remove has never been removed by any such legislation. The advocates of the system have utterly failed to show, by statistics or otherwise, that these regulations have in any case, after several years' trial and when applied to one sex only, diminished disease, reclaimed the fallen, or improved the general morality of the country.”

It is interesting to note the support that has come to Mrs. Butler's contention from later investigators, even from the League of Nations Committee on the Traffic in Women and Children. Says the report of this Committee, “We have definite evidence that licensed houses create a steady demand for new women and that this demand is met by traffickers and causes both national and international traffic.” The Committee comes out most strongly against attempts at state regulation, showing that regulation does not regulate. The combined experimentation points in but one direction—abolition. Again quoting Josephine Butler, “We are bound...to try to deal with the causes of the evil, and we dare to believe, that with wiser teaching and more capable legislation, those causes would not be beyond control.”

RESTRICTIONS ON ADOPTION.

Mr. M. R. Jayakar has given notice of his intention to introduce a new Bill in the Legislative Assembly to be called “The Adoption Validating Act, 1928.” The Bill provides “notwithstanding any custom, rule or interpretation of the Hindu Law to the contrary, no adoption by a Hindu shall be invalid by reason only that the adoptive parent could not have legally married in his maiden state the genitive mother of the adopted son.”

In the statement of objects and reasons, Mr. Jayakar says this Bill is intended to legalise the adoption of the daughter's son, sister's son, mother's sister's son and the like, whose adoptions are at present regarded by British Indian Courts as invalid, amongst the three higher classes of Hindus. This rule of prohibition is based on a fantastic conception, itself the result of an implication arising from a pure metaphor, that the adopted son must be the “reflection” of the natural born son. Out of this conception a rule came to be gradually evolved that the adopted son must not be so related to the adoptive father that the latter could not have married his genitive mother in her maiden state. The rule, when so stated, had the effect of excluding from the circle of persons capable of being adopted some of the most eligible relatives like the daughter's son or sister's son. Consequently in course of time, attempts were made to evade the rule and ultimately by a somewhat forced interpretation of the Smriti texts the disqualification came to be restricted, for instance in the Bombay Presidency to the three higher classes of Hindus. Even amongst these classes, exceptions have been recognised to the rule apparently as the result of local customs, e.g., amongst the Brahmins of the Southern Maharanas country the adoption of a daughter's son or sister's son is allowed. Likewise the adoption of a daughter's son has been recognised amongst Brahmins in many parts of the Madras Presidency.

Many eminent commentators of the texts and also British Indian Judges have doubted the propriety of this prohibition and there are strong grounds in support of the view that even in ancient times the texts giving rise to the prohibition were regarded as purely recommendatory. It is, therefore, thought expedient and desirable to remove the restriction altogether, the origin and property of which were always doubtful and to extend the adoptive father's freedom of choice to some of his nearest relatives (such as his daughter's son) who from the viewpoint of natural love and affection may be regarded as most eligible for adoption."

SARDA'S REVISED BILL.

Whereas it is expedient to restrain the solemnisation of child marriages; it is hereby enacted as follows:-

1. (1) This Act may be called "The Child Marriage Restraint Act, 1928." (2) It extends to the whole of British India, including British Baluchistan and the Sonthal Parganas. (3) It shall come into force on the first day of April, 1930.

2. In this Act, unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context,—(a) "child" means a person who, if a male, is under eighteen years of age, and if a female, is under fourteen years of age; (b) "child marriage" means a marriage to which either of the contracting parties is a child; (c) "contracting party" to a marriage means either of the parties whose marriage is thereby solemnised; and (d) "minor" means a person of either sex who is under eighteen years of age.

3. Whoever, being a male above eighteen years of age and below twenty-one, contracts a child marriage shall be punished with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees.

4. Whoever, being a male above twenty-one years of age, contracts a child marriage shall be punished with simple imprisonment which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

5. Whoever, performs, conducts or directs any ceremony or part of ceremony leading to a child marriage which is an irrevocable step in the solemnisation of marriage, shall be punished with simple imprisonment which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

6. Where a minor contracts a child marriage, any person having charge of minor whether as parent or guardian or in any other capacity, lawful or unlawful, who does any act to promote the marriage, or permits it to be solemnised, or negligently fails to prevent it from being solemnised, shall be punished with simple imprisonment which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both. For the purposes of this section, it shall be presumed, unless and until the contrary is proved, that where a minor has contracted a child marriage the person having charge of such minor has negligently failed to prevent the marriage from being solemnised.

7. Notwithstanding anything contained in section 25 of the General Clauses Act, 1897, or section 64 of the Indian Penal Code, a Court sentencing an offender under section 3 shall not be competent to direct that, in default of payment of the fine imposed, he shall undergo any term of imprisonment.

8. Notwithstanding anything contained in section 100 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, no Court other than that of a Presidency Magistrate or a District Magistrate shall take cognizance of, or try, any offence under this Act.

9. No Court shall take cognizance of any offence under this Act save upon complaint made within one year of the solemnisation of the marriage in respect of which the offence is alleged to have been committed.

10. Where the Court has not dismissed a complaint under section 293 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, it shall, without recording reasons, either make an inquiry under section 202 of that Code, or direct any Magistrate of the first class subordinate to it to make such inquiry, but no other person.

11. (1) At any time after examining the complainant and before issuing process for compelling the attendance of the accused, the Court shall except for reasons to be recorded in writing, require the complainant to execute a bond, with or without sureties, for a sum not exceeding one hundred rupees, as security for the payment of any compensation which the complainant may be directed to pay under section 250 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and if such security is not furnished within such reasonable time as the court may fix, the complaint shall be dismissed. (2) A bond taken under this section shall be deemed to be a bond taken under the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and Chapter XLII of that Code shall apply accordingly.

THE BARR. SATI CASE.

Sampat Kher was the daughter of Kashe Panday of Baran who died ten years ago. Just before her father's death she was married to Sidheswar but continued to live in her father's house. When Sidheswar fell ill last August she wished to have his body returned to the town. Early next morning a party of persons were found resting in a shed in the compound of the Sub-divisional Officer's court at Bara. They had arrived the night before and carried with them the corpse on the Khatoli. The Constable went to the police station and informed the Head Constable about it and it was entered in the diary then and there. The Head Constable went to the shed but finding the party were obdurate he threatened to detain the body till it became putrid. On hearing this the girl got off the Khatoli and the corpse proceeded to the river followed by the party. The girl was left behind with her maid, her younger brother and another relative. They haled an ekka.

A youth came back at this moment from the funeral procession and the fire got into the ekka and drove along followed by the police and an increasing crowd which shouted "Sa1i Mata ki jai." At the point where the road leading to Berbna is crossed by the road taken by the ekka, the procession instead of turning to Berbna went straight on and was joined by the widow's relatives who left the funeral procession to join her. Again the police tried to persuade the leaders and the widow to give up the idea of Sati and this time they believed they had succeeded although Sampati kept on saying that she would, like a true Sati, be consumed on the pyre with the body of Siddehswar by a miraculous fire. The procession then retraced its steps until it came up to a road which forked back to the river. The police finding themselves helpless to resist the crowd went to the police station and inspector. With sixteen or seventeen constables they hurried to the ghat and found the corpse had arrived. They tried to persuade the Babhan, Baghu Singh, to turn the corpse before Sampati and her procession arrived but Baghu Singh said he could not do so. An hour later the ekka came up and Sampati alighted from it, bathed in the river ganges and made her toilet according to ancient usage. She was assisted by her maid and the whole procession was supervised by one of the accusers. She then seated herself on the pyre her left hand concealed in her draperies. The body of her husband was placed on the pyre and she took hold of the corpse on her lap. A moment later the flames burst out. Unable to bear the torture she leapt into the river. The corpse was thrown after her and she was told to drown and not to return. In spite of protests the police set out in a boat and rescued her. She went to lie down under a tree and the people gave offerings to her. Neither the Assistant Surgeon nor the Sub-deputy Magistrate were able to help her nor could the police take her to hospital. She lay there for two days and on the third the S. D. O. with his armed police drove away the crowd and took her to the jail. She died the next day. A shrine has been erected to her memory on the banks of the river.

LEGAL DISABILITY TO INHERITANCE.

The Editor, Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Apropos of the Harbilas Sarda's Bill against child marriages and other similar bills now on the table in the several legislatures of the country, I would like to have a small point cleared. I have been told on good authority that there is a legal disability in regard to inheritance of ancestral property in the case of children born of a marriage published to be a post-puberty one, as coparceners may contest it in communities where custom has been to marry girls before puberty. I do not know if this is an absolute fact. If it is, it appears to me that the first and foremost step in this direction of Social Reform is to legalise or validate such marriages to the extent of removing this disability in regard to inheritance. I believe this fact, more than any other fear of social odium, acts as a deterrent on many would-be social reformers from carrying out their principles into practice in this matter. A small permissive measure like this would do far more to bring about the desired end than the mere coercive provisions of the bills under discussion. For, after all we should well bear in mind the moral and the Christian faith of the Sun and the Wind, that persuasion is better than force.

Calcutta, Yours faithfully, 14-8-ZB. A SOUTH INDIAN BRAHMIN.

Mr. C. F. ANDREWS.

The United Church Herald writes:—Mr. C. F. Andrews in the little monthly paper "The Fellowship" is beginning in a series of articles to examine a question of personal interest to himself, which is also of vital consequence to all Christian people. He tells us that he has often been asked whether during his life he has come to see religion and the Christian faith in particular, in any different way from before. We know something of the outward changes in Mr. Andrews' life. We have seen how he felt it necessary to sever his connection with a missionary society.

Later on he gave up his orders in the Church of England. He came to throw in his lot with the great Brahmo Poet of Bengal. Some of the most ardent Hindus do not hesitate to regard Mr. Andrews as almost one of themselves. All these outward things in Mr. Andrews' life we have been able to watch. The question which has again and again been asked by Christian people about this amazing career is this: Has Mr. Andrews abandoned any essential thing in Christianity? Now in these articles he is setting out to reveal to us what he thinks we ought to know of the inner change which has been going on in his attitude towards his religious beliefs.
Whatever one may think about Mr. Andrews, no one can deny that here we have a man who has constantly striven to follow the light he had, at whatever cost, and wherever it might lead, and that he has allowed no conventional ideas to hinder him. Mr. Andrews quotes with deep approval some words spoken by one in the Cambridge Brotherhood at Delhi shortly before his death, "If I had my life in India to live over again and start afresh, I should seek, to bind together those who truly believed in God and wished to live according to the dictates of conscience. For the forces of materialism are so strong today that it is the fundamental belief in God which needs preserving—just as in the Christian church one denomination is fighting against another, so in the larger world of religion one faith is fighting against another. But all the while we are allowing faith itself to be destroyed and a purely secular outlook upon life to prevail. What is needed is for all men of religion to unite in face of the common danger." And the lesson for us all is the same. We must continually seek out "the things which are vital." Religion always tends to be conservative, to cling to the tried past. But it must also always be an adventurous thing, seeking out what is before. It is one of our greatest dangers that in keeping going the machinery of our churches and our missions, we should lose touch with what is vital. To many of us it appears that each day as it comes, brings just enough time and strength to complete the duties of that day. But were we to see if it does not leave us time also to contemplate what we are doing in the light of our ultimate purpose, and to ask ourselves how far we are wasting our strength on things which are merely traditional. A Christian must bring all his life constantly into the presence of God, and if we do, we shall find He is indeed a "Consuming fire," burning up the dross. We may find we are left high and dry, and that the great tide of God's purposes has left us far behind, unless we have something of this courageous spirit of which Mr. Andrews is to our time a great example. May our love be "more and more rich in knowledge and all manner of insight enabling" as "to have a sense of what is vital."

THE PLACE OF HINDI IN INDIAN EDUCATION.

Under the auspices of the Hindi Prachar Sabha, Sir T. Vijayaragavacharla delivered a public lecture last evening at the Hindu High-School, Triliciane on "The place of Hindi in Indian Education." Mr. C. Rajagopalaachari was present at the meeting and there was a large gathering of students and school teachers.

Pandit Hariharan Sarna in a short Hindi speech requested Mr. Vijayaragavacharla to deliver his speech.

The lecturer in the course of his speech said that once or twice when he was at Wembly, Canada or British Guiana he had been put to great inconvenience by not knowing Hindi or Hindustani when he wanted to speak to some Indian residents there. On one occasion he had to communicate to his own fellow-countrmen through Mr. Vincent, his Secretary who knew Hindi.

Very few people truly realised the extent to which Hindi was spoken under various names—Urdu, Hindustani or Hindi. The only real practical difference in these languages was the script. There were at least 120 millions of people in India who spoke Hindi and as many as 90 millions more understood that language. It was the third most widely spoken language in the world, the first being English and the next French. That was by itself one strong reason for everyone learning Hindi.

Its spread in India at present depended on voluntary work, particularly of the Hindi Prachar Sabha. During the period between 1918 to 1928, in Madras 4,570 people had learnt Hindi of whom 470 were women. The figures were encouraging but considering the population of the province, it was a mere drop in the ocean. He was in favour of having compulsion in the teaching of Hindi. Six months would be a sufficient period for learning the language well. The need for learning this language was particularly pressing in the case of the Madrasas, a number of whom had to settle outside their own province for their livelihood. And the last means of cultivating social and friendly relations with the people of other provinces was to speak their language, instead of remaining an exclusive body.

Was making Hindi a second language of the province justified from the University point of view? He had no hesitation, he said, in answering "Decisely yes." There was first the cultural value. After all the main portion of India, the India known to culture and history, however hurtful it might be to their pride, lay beyond the Vindhyas and a knowledge of the language of that part of the country was necessary for the University man of South India. He hoped that the Madras and the Andhra Universities and the proposed University at Chitliamaram, if it materialised, would try not to make a student merely a Tamil or Telugu man but a good Indian having touch with the larger culture and the broader life of the whole country. The fault seemed to be that people did not make sufficient efforts to put themselves in touch with the current life of India and a knowledge of Hindi, besides its unifying values, would enable them to achieve this. Even if the question was to learn only one language, he would unhesitatingly give his vote for Hindi. But he did not anticipate such a drastic change; for every province might have its own vernacular and have Hindi as a second language. The trouble of an Indian learning Hindi was nothing like his trouble in learning English.

"The place of Hindi," he concluded, "in Indian education must be compulsory. It ought to be a compulsory language in school, college and university. But that is no reason why pending its compulsory introduction, we should not take advantage of THE PROBLEM OF CHINA.
A Letter dated March 17, 1928 to a Chinese Student From An American Philosopher.

Your letter moves me greatly, for I feel at once your great need of encouragement and help and my own inability to be of assistance. Your problems are severe beyond the help of words; and it is with greatest hesitancy that I venture to express even an opinion where my own ignorance is so great. Nevertheless, because you know that I am deeply interested in your welfare, I cannot but tell you genuinely how I seem to see what may be before you. Perhaps the fact that I see the problem objectively will in some fashion aid our mutual vision.

First, about China. I think there can be no doubt but that the next century in the world's history will belong to three or four great peoples. Three of these, I believe, are to be China, Russia and the United States. Each of these countries is experimenting with social and cultural problems; each also with a certain similarity of motive to which you should not be blind because of what you see—and I mean by this the moral motive. The old philosophy of China, as you will remember we said in our seminar (it was ours, you know, not just mine) was a moral philosophy; and Russian Literature, Tolstoy and the rest, represent a moral ideal also, a moral conviction even in the midst of its lack of quiet; and finally, if you look at America we, too, are thinking even more in moral than in mechanical terms, even while we are trying (absurdly) to mechanize our moral training. I think that all three civilizations have the same type of problem, and that they will stand out in the world because of this as well as because of their physical and territorial greatness.

But it seems to me also clear that neither of these three countries can become first of all a teacher to the others—for the reason that all are unsettled and are seeking to resolve their own quite different problems. I do not think that China should try to copy either Russia or America—nor to learn too much (or perhaps I should say too externally) from the experiments of these other countries. The Chinese problem is different. Both Russia and America are culturally young, while China is culturally old. China perhaps has more to destroy, and certainly more to save out of the past than have we; for our past is in the hands of the other nations (all of Mediterranean and Western Europe) which have created it. This fact alone makes China's responsibility for herself a very great one; she is the only storehouse of Chinese culture and she alone can save it to the world. I am jealous, therefore, lest the younger Chinese learn to forget their own national inheritance, becoming too much dazzled by the material aspects of ours, or by the great dreaminess of unborn Russia.

You will see immediately what I mean—you who are so quick to understand. China, I think, will surely adopt Western science, almost certainly too rapidly. There will be long years of unrest and hard adjustment, and—who knows? you may have dozens types of government in the next quarter of a century. I know that you think the abolition of unequal treaties is most important. It should be done, for honor's sake, but I do not believe that this alone can do very much for China. The shifting of your cultural order, the adopting of new modes of thought and action, all these surely means a far greater thing than the re-adaptation of foreign relations. And in it the most serious of all perils—as the years will count it—is the threatened loss of your old civilization. It is threatened by a new barbarism, just as Rome was threatened, only now it is the barbarism of the mechanized West, rather than roving hordes of plunder seekers.

In such a case, what does a young Chinese do for his country? My dear—, I am very sad when I must tell you that I see only one path, and that a long and hard and lingering one, which may realize but little of progress to you in your own lifetime. And yet......I see no hope for you in Russia. There you would be only a lost member of a little group of helpless exiles, becoming (as such always do) in time only a group of scheming politicians, even while they call themselves revolutionists. I do not think they can do their country any good. The best of them will die of broken hearts,—and you would be one of these best, were you to go there. It would mean tears to me were you to choose Russia,—not at all because I have any American prejudice against the Russians, but simply that I do not believe that China can be saved by that path.

Nor do I think that there is much more for you yourself to learn in America. You have seen us, and you know America far better than most Americans know us. In a material way we may perhaps aid China, but our ideals cannot be yours—not surely until we understand them better. It is only Chinese thought that can save China. This is the important truth.

And does that, possibly, shed a bit of light upon your own problem? What I am thinking is this: that perhaps in your own province, perhaps even in your father's big house which you have described to me, you—you, yes, could open a school of new-old Chinese thought. It should be new in that it would be looking toward a new China which will master Western science within a generation as surely as the sun rises. No matter what Government you may have, China will never turn from its determination to acquire our mechanical and industrial knowledge that is certain. But if in acquiring this China loses her own past, then she will become a country of barbarians. And it is because of this that I am telling you that this school must be also a school of the old Chinese culture—of all that is precious out of your great past.

You say that your young kinsfolk are grieving that they have no chance for an education. There must be many more like them, there in your own country. Could not you become their teacher? Soon others would gather about, and you would have the nucleus of a school—which might become the center of a new China. You could keep that balance of the new and the old, of what China and what the Occident each must bring to the future of your country. It would be difficult—most of all because it would mean the relinquishment of many ambitions for other things—but, are young, and it might be that this would yet be the path that could lead you where you could guide your country's education, and that is the greatest work of your generation, not of our own—and indeed, it is our task to think in terms of the next generation, not of our own—and indeed, if we are philosophers as well as teachers, in terms of the life that is many generations from ours. It is this that I am hoping will make you forgive to America the many heartaches it has caused you, remembering that we here are indeed ignorant and fumbling and in need of education. You know how helpless I have been in my own state, and you will know that it must always be like this for those who would teach—not that people are so bad, but that they are so helplessly ignorant.

It seems to me that if you can remain in America another year and secure a degree this will be worth while. It is not because you need the degree—you have learned all that you need to learn from me, I am sure. But China has always revered the symbols of learning, and I think that this symbol will be worth having, for the sake of your own future influence. I think, too, that if you do decide that it will be best to start a school, the year should be in part devoted to forming an American organisation that would help you financially. I would do what I could, and so, I am sure, would your other friends. It would be small in amount at first, but such things grow, and you could study the many possibilities. Perhaps in a few years you could get medical assistance through the Rockefeller Foundation, and there might be aid from other sources. We should have to form an organisation, of course, and it might look to the time when there would be interchange of professors, or foreign scholarships for a few students—for I think most of the future education must be within China.

As to next year, I do not know what to say. It is mere selfish affection that makes me wish to have you near me, for I am sure that you have learned from me all that I can teach you. If both wish and dread your going to New York, you will never be quite satisfied about America until you have seen the East, and it might prove most prosperous for you. You are beginning to be known in literary circles. It is most of all for the advantage of your work in China that I wish it for you. But on the other hand, New York is a great and heartless city, and I can see in imagination the lonely and desolate hours that would come to you, and there would also be almost certainly, for you, a sense of its own pompous emptiness. You might not become more bitter about America, but you would not love us more....Yes, I suppose it will be best for you to go to the East if you can do so—and we will hope great things from it.

About the printing trade. It is an excellent trade to know—it was my own craft, as I think I have told you. But would American printing be of much value for Chinese work? Our machines are more expensive than China's will have for years, and the characters so differ from letters that I should think you might be wasting too much time to learn our methods for your uses. It is just one of those things where China must make her own system. Knowledge of ours would be of value, but it might be too dearly bought. I think there will be many others who will learn the mechanise arts. You are one of the few who understand things of the mind, and it is the teaching of these that should make your life mean most.

This is only part of a letter. My mind is full of many things that I would say to you, but these must wait. Only remember, my boy, that when all seems dark to you, there are many who love you and hope great things for you—or at any rate beautiful things. And I am one of these, and am always eager for every word of your welfare. I am very sad for your mother, but I hope you will write to her to be patient yet a little while, for the sake of the life of a son whose work will always do her honor—tell her that I have said this. The Chinese Students' Monthly.

THE QUEEN OF AFGHANISTAN ON PURDAH.

Khan Bahadur Mir Muzharuddin, B.A., writes:—The following is the gist of the letter thrown by her Majesty, on this important question in her interview with a representative of a Turkish News Paper. She said the Non-Muslims are sadly labouring under a mist of misapprehension that women have been deprived of their rights and privileges in the Muslim Law. If one glances through the fundamental principles of the other religions in the world it would become clear to him or her that before the advent of the Prophet women were not enjoying such rights and freedom of thought and action as were bestowed on them by the founder of Islam. In every line of human activity, religious, moral, social and political women had equal rights with men. Even the modernised women of the west who by virtue of education and culture are looked upon as models of refinement and I excellence, cannot excel or claim equality with the women in Arabia in the early days of Islam. The position of women in education and civilization was much superior in the time of our Prophet than their contemporaneous sisters in other regions of the world as they enjoyed absolute freedom of thought and unfettered liberty of speech both in politics and administration of their country without the slightest distinction of sex. Islam granted the right of vote, election and representation to Muslim women about 13 hundred years ago which is still denied even at the present time to their sisters in many countries in Europe and for which a keen struggle is at present going on between men and women in several countries in the west. After establishing the equality of the position of women with men in the domain of politics and Government Her Majesty gave her views on the treatment of women in India owing to the unreasonable dread of the Mulla-made dogmas. It cannot be disputed, Her Majesty said, that the daily practices and customs of the masses as time progressed assumed the authority of religious ordinances. This is not peculiar to Islam alone. But as a matter of fact every other religion is grovelling under this misfortune. A reasonable limit of separation between men and women which was considered in those early days as a social decorum became with the march of time and the progress of ages an irreconcilable religious law in his estimation of ignorant masses. The Holy Koran, Her Majesty said, has not laid down hard and fast rules on the question of purdah, violations of which will render the followers guilty or deserving of punishment. Whatever is mentioned on this subject in the Koran is equally obligatory on both men and women.

Purdah for Both Men and Women.

By the Laws of Islamic religion women are required to cover their body except face, hands and feet. In a similar way men are also required to do the same. This provision is not an invention of Islam but also exists in other books of God. In the days of Islam women took part with men shoulder to shoulder in all the affairs of life. They were present in the fields of war with men, they nursed the soldiers who were wounded and whenever necessary they inspired courage and valour in those who were engaged in fighting on field and sent those back to the field chastising them with cowardice who bolted from it through weakness of mind and want of courage. If in the early days of Islam the present purdah system existed, these marvellous incidents which had been left to the posterity to be remembered as glories of Islam could not have happened. Her Majesty in concluding remarked that Hazarath Ayeha and Hazarath Fatima played an important part in the educational movements of the time by delivering lectures on theological matters, leaving behind them thousands of commentaries and decisions on the burning religious questions. In those days Muslim men and women congregated together daily and also on Ids days in Mosques, they assembled around “Kaaba” during the “Haj” and took part in the “Arafah” and also in the election of the head of the “Kaulla” and the “Kalifa” of the time. These stern facts will show that the present Gohas custom which exists in other parts of the muslim world in general and in India in particular did not exist in the days of our Prophet.

Queen Without Veil at Dinner.

It will be interesting to note that when Her Majesty dined unveiled in the company of persons other than members of the Royal Family His Majesty the King was bombarded by his Mallas who bewailed this innovation which violated the ancient custom.

Charity Begins at Home.

The King asked them unperturbed whether women in their villages wore veils, to which they replied that their women being poor had to go out unveiled and work for their livelihood. “Charity beings at home” remarked His Majesty to the Divines and told them that he will obey them when they come back and tell him that they succeeded in making their women in the villages appreciate the “blessings of purdah.”

Purdah Question Misunderstood.

It is a great misfortune that this unfortunate question has been entirely misunderstood. Nobody wants the Muslim women to leave their houses indecently clad, to run about in public streets, thoroughfares and roads smoking cigarettes or attend restaurants, theatres and cinemas for dancing or drinking. All that is aimed at by reformers in this direction is simply to relax the existing rigidity of the confinement system and to place it on a rational basis in keeping with the laws and regulations of Islam.

A Most Disgraceful Sight of Women Brogues, Without Purdah.

At present Muslim women young and old, healthy and diseased, strong and infirm who have made begging an honourable profession of their life are seen everywhere in the city nooks and corners specially bazaars and markets most indecently clad, sometimes in rags and Chadders unwashed for months harassing people for a few pice and abusing them in most filthy language when they don’t succeed in exactly what they want. For the sake of getting a piece or two these women along with their naked children make long marches on Thursdays in particular which is considered appropriate for giving charity.

Ramzan Tragedy of Unpurdah Women.

In the month of last Ramzan your readers will remember several Muslim women lost their life in their struggle to get a piece of cloth from some merchant who distributed it as an act of great merit. Not one from amongst the great local priests or from amongst those preachers abhor this horrible sight which is the greatest slur on Islam, or has come forward to move his little finger to preach or persuade these women to go into Purdah. On the other hand these poor wrestles are encouraged to persist in pursuing this most dishonourable and degrading trade with impunity to the lasting disgrace of Islam by giving them a few pias, a pinch of sugar or a handful of rice. What is the most dreadful result of this sort of misguided dolling. From the dawn to the sunset these miserable creatures ramble about the city from door to door hunting for charity and return to their squalid, dirty habitations fatigued and almost dead.

As a result of this begging people find it difficult to procure maid servants for domestic work even on payment of high wages. It is easy for a man to collect hundreds of Muslim women if he gives a few pias in the shape of charity but I am afraid one cannot get even two women for cooking even if he offers reasonable monthly wages. This is the better complaint in every Muslim family not only in the cities but also in villages.

ESTABLISHMENT OF POOR AND WORK HOUSES FOR MUSLIM SHORAG WOMEN.

A great service will be rendered to Islam if philanthropic Muslims of India come forward to prevent these Muslim women going about begging without severe, by providing for them some work by which they can earn their livelihood in a respectable way. All those people in Madras who have most vehemently advocated Sharai, Purdah system in public meetings and in the Press, deserve praise, sympathy and encouragement for their well-meant efforts and I sincerely hope that they will now turn their attention and energies after exhausting all their literature and arguments in the defence of Sharai Purdah to relieve their poor sisters of their existing impecunious state by starting a fund and organisation to establish Work Houses on the line of those maintained by the Friend-in-Need Society with Purdah provided it is within the limits prescribed by the Sharait or religious laws.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Bombay Vigilance Association: With reference to the decision of the League of Nations Council to extend through a Special Body of Experts their enquiry in the Far East into the International Traffic in Women and Children, it was resolved at a meeting of the Committee of the Bombay Vigilance Association to request the League of Nations to include India within the scope of their inquiry and to offer them their whole-hearted cooperation and assistance. It was further resolved to request the Government of India to invite the Body of Experts appointed by the League of Nations to undertake the proposed inquiries in India.

Science and Nature: Returning last week from attending an International Moral Education Conference at the Parti Sorbonne, where the ambiguity of philosophical and scientific terms in current use was considered as a serious bar to true international understanding, it was with especial pleasure that I read Dr. J. E. Turner's letter in NATURE of April 21. We did not, on this occasion, at the Sorbonne deal specifically with the word Nature, although we might well have done so in view of its notorious ambiguity. Dogmatism and ambiguity are generally contrasted, but perhaps more often allied. May I direct readers' attention to John Stuart Mill's essay on Nature, which was published after his death, and to the Essay on the Doctrine of M. the Díaz de Sena. It would be difficult to find a word that is responsible for "more bad morality and bad law". He points out that a critical examination of all the confused uses to which this word has been put, reveals two main definitions. That held by the early Greek and Roman philosophers, who enjoined, as a fundamental principle, that we should "fulfil our domestic duties by Nature". The second implying by Nature a fixed, immovable system of things, including not only the blind physical and biological forces acting spontaneously, but also all human intuitions, beliefs, perceptions, understandings and actions. Mill argues that an injunction to follow Nature, that comprehensively expressed, is obviously superfluous, stating that no one could in any circumstances by any possibility do otherwise. He says, however, that to endeavour to understand Nature in that sense is another and indeed quite profitable task. The popular definition, "Nature" is opposed to Art. That is to say, NATURIS signifying the spontaneous course of blind physical and biological forces acting presumably in complete independence of human intelligence. Mill then argues that to follow this kind of Nature is clearly immoral, in that all the noblest human endeavours throughout human history have inevitably been directed towards stemming and countering its ruthless deprivations. Mill makes this proposition clear by means of a large number of cogent and striking illustrations. We must conclude, then, that, before that, Nature is solely employed euphemistically as an evasive term, either to cover our ignorance or to express some pædabulism, or predilections presented as a fundamental explanation of human nature. When, more than fifty years ago, I was one of his most devoted students, the great Thomas Huxley was wont to remind us that words and phrases were instruments of thought, not substitutes for clear thinking.

Y. M. C. A. Social Study: A training course for social workers has been arranged in connection with the Olio's Street Y. M. C. A., Calcutta, and the opening lecture on Social Study was given on Monday 16th July by Dr. D. N. Maitra, secretary of the Bengal Social Service League. Students taking the course in first aid, home nursing and hygiene, sanitation, etc., may qualify for the certificate of the St. John Ambulance Association. Other subjects in the syllabus are civic and the League of Nations, co-operative organisation and practice, and sex psychology, with special lectures on child welfare and maternity, food and famine, rural reconstruction etc. This wide range of subjects is made possible by the co-operation of a staff of voluntary lecturers, including Dr. C. A. Bentley, Capt. H. M. P. Hewitt, Mrs. A. Oottle, Lt. Col. K. K. Chatterjee Dr. A. O. Ulli, Mr. J. R. Sen, Mr. P. H. Rickard, Mr. S. K. Lahlit, Mr. K. T. Paul, and others. In connection with the scheme lantern and cinema shows are provided and outings are arranged to places of social interest, such as any museums, co-operative stores and child welfare centres, and will continue until the beginning of October, when an examination will be held and Association diplomas and medals will be presented to the students. Students are required to pay a nominal fee, and regular attendance for ten weeks is expected. The training course has become very popular, last year's enrolment having reached eighty-two, including students, business men, teachers, police officers and others.

I am lecturing in the course of the Ganapati Festival on women's movement and women's rights, in three different places. You will thus see that I am throwing myself fully into this movement but with a clear appreciation of the difficulties I have to encounter. It is therefore a great pleasure to me to have the sympathy of a personality of the stature of the "Indian Social Reformer" and the personal esteem of a valued co-worker like Mr. Jayakar.

My next Bill, Excellency leaves these shores. His observations and commentaries, exceedingly sympathetic Chancellor and Vice-Chancellor during the whole of Sir Leslie's term, and to whom his Excellency paid a glowing tribute. Speaking to the assembled graduates and undergraduates, the Chancellor emphasized the importance of the University as the main-spring of life and progress in the Presidency. Sir Leslie Wilson's suggestion that a chair of Modern History should be instituted, is an excellent one, and we hope that it will be possible to carry it out before his Excellency leaves these shores. His observations are worth quoting: "May I pity in a plea for the study of Modern History in this University? This branch of study is of the utmost value to you young men, as the future intellectual and political leaders of your country. Yet it is apt to be neglected in favour of economics. You have a flourishing school of Economics and Sociology, but no University has a single course in Modern History. Without in the least minimising the importance of Economics, I think History too, should be a recognised feature of a liberal education. India is bound to take her place, her rightful place, among the great nations of the world. Important and far-reaching political changes in her constitutional position are as certain to come as day follows night. Her century-old "splendid isolation" is rapidly becoming a thing of the past. The aeroplane and the wireless telegraph have seen to this. In a few years, may be even months, we shall see India linked to England by a regular air service, I need hardly point out that all this must materially affect our social and political outlook, and we must take every step in our power to make ourselves and our country adapted to these new conditions. While clinging to all that is best in the past, we must have the courage to jettison, even if it costs us a pang of regret, whatever may hinder our progress as a nation. You know what Tennyson said about the danger: "lest one good custom should corrupt the world." I intentionally emphasize the adjective the danger lies not in bad customs, which everyone has or ought to have the sense to avoid but in good ones—good that is, in their day, which have outgrown their usefulness."

Prohibition in the U.S.A.—From experience we are very apt of accepting at their face value University. The address which his Excellency delivered on Tuesday at the annual Convocation and Sociology, and not only the chair of the Vice-Chancellor during the whole of Sir Leslie's term, and to whom his Excellency paid a glowing tribute. Speaking to the assembled graduates and undergraduates, the Chancellor emphasized the importance of the University as the main-spring of life and progress in the Presidency. 6abled messages relating to Prohibition, but if the following received last week is true, the future of Prohibition seems to be hanging in the balance. About 300,000 listened to Governor Smith broadcast his acceptance of the Democratic nomination for the Presidency. He urged a modification of the Eighteenth Amendment which would give each State, after a referendum of its people, the right wholly within its borders to import, manufacture and sell alcohol, but he would not tolerate the return of saloons. He promised to deal with the problem of controlling crop surpluses. He assailed Mr. Coolidge’s Nicaraguan and Mexican policies and pledged himself to a “real” endeavour to outlaw war. Neither he nor the Democrats contemplated sudden and drastic changes in the tariff. He advocated “progressive legislation for the protection and care of the workmen,” and promised that legislation would be framed to meet the just causes of complaint as well as the unwarranted issue of injunctions in labour disputes. He proposed ruthlessly to stamp out corruption, in the enforcement of prohibition activities and finally advocated the removal of the harsh immigration provisions in the Little-Thomson movement. Governor Smith is a Roman Catholic, and that Church has been consistently opposed to Prohibition. In a recent issue, we quoted an Indian Catholic Weekly denouncing the Prohibition movement as an attack on Indian movement. “The Democratic party stands for the autonomy of the States and Governor Smith’s policy is evidently shaped to fit in with this principle. The Republican candidate, Mr. Hoover, has not yet unfolded his programme. It is probable that he will stand by Prohibition. The result of the forthcoming presidential election will be watched by social reformers all over the world with anxious interest.

The City College Trouble.—We take the following from the Amelia Basu Patrika.—“In connection with the satyagraha which has been continuing in front of the City College for the last few days with a view to establish rights in the hostel attached to the College as a conference was held on Thursday last in the residence of Capt. N. Dutta, Managing Director, Bengal Immunity Co. Ltd., at 153 Dhurrumollah Street. Among those present were Messrs. Subhas Chandra Bose, Satyendra Chandra Mitter, Satin Sen, S. M. Bose, Secretary of the College Council, Capt. Dutta, Narendra Narain Chakraverty, Heramba Chandra Mukherjea, Rai Anath Nath Bose and others. Mr. S. M. Bose, accepted the terms-drafted in the conference and gave assurance that he would place the terms at the meeting of the College Council as soon as possible and have them passed. The following were the terms agreed to—That the right of worship in the Rammohun Roy Hostel be recognised, Special accommodation for Hindu religious festivals be given by the college authorities outside the hostel premises. Hindu boarders be permitted to perform Hindu worship in all other hostels attached to the City College. The terms, it is said, were signed by Mr. S. M. Bose and another gentleman on behalf of the authorities of the City College, Rai Anath Nath Bose and Mr. Heramba Chandra Mukherjea signed the terms on behalf of the students. The satyagraha was thereupon called off and the peace feeling were with-drawn.” We congratulate the authorities and the students of the College on this happy ending to a very distressing misunderstanding. We have from the first been of opinion that the right of the students to worship according to the form of their religion in the Hostel, was indefeasible, and we are glad to see that this is now acknowledged by the College Council.

Hindi in Southern India.—There is a society for promoting the study in non-Hindi speaking provinces. It has a branch in Madras. Speaking at a public meeting convened by the Madras Branch of the Hindi Prachar Sabha, Sir T. V. V. S. Rayachagavacharya, Member of the Public Service Commission, impressed on the people of South India the importance of a knowledge of Hindi or Hindustani. He mentioned that once or twice when he was in Wembley, Canada and British Guiana; he had been put to great inconvenience owing to his ignorance of Hindi when he wanted to speak to some of the Indian residents. On one occasion he had to communicate with his own fellow countrymen through Mr. Vincent, his Secretary, who knew Hindi. He pointed out that there were at least 120 million people in India who spoke Hindi and as many as 80 million more who understood that language. It was the third most widely spoken language in the world the first being English and the next French. He advocated making Hindi a second language for the Madras University examinations, and declared that its place in Indian education should be compulsory. It ought to be a compulsory language in School, College and University. His speech was published in our last issue.

A Home for Women Students.—The problem of providing satisfactory boarding and lodging accommodation for women studying in the various educational institutions in Bombay has been a serious one. Since the Hindu Ladies’ Hostel managed by the Bombay Presidency Social Reform Association closed down a committee of enthusiastic ladies in the city have succeeded in establishing a home for women students which was opened on May 1, 1929 at Bhimabai Rane’s Building, Fournier Road. The committee has at present accommodation for 16 students only. The Committee are anxious to extend it, but funds are wanting. The home has been working at a loss the monthly deficit being about Rs. 200, and it is thought this up it is proposed to hold a variety entertainment at the Balmulla Grand Theatre on Wednesday, September 12 at 5 p.m. Many young ladies have come forward to help the hostel by taking part in the evening’s programme which will be found to be a very interesting one. The following are some of the details:—

Japanese Dance.
Pieces from “Kareem tee Purva” (Young Ladies’ Union).
Pieces from “Tratika” (Young Ladies’ Union).
Garba (Vanita Vishram).
Orchestra (School of Indian Music).
Pearl Queen.
Purification of Sents, (Tableau).
Dhuruva (Vidwmat Mahila Samaj).
Tickets can be had of the following ladies or at the Home for Women Students, Bhimabai Rane’s Building, Churney Road. Mrs. Sundrabai Sirur President, V. E. F. W. S., Miss Narmada Narayat Samarth, Secretary, V. E. F. W. S., Miss Sonabai Jayakar, Dr. (Miss) Kashibai Nowrange.
RELIGION AND THE STATE—II

The most crucial problem of the present time is the reconciliation of secular life with the requirements of spiritual religion. In the reaction against the corruption of pre-Reformation Christianity and under the influence of Physical Science which three centuries ago became the dominating factor in European thought, the State was made independent of religion or rather religion became subservient to the State. The separation seemed to yield fruitful results but it is now apparent that its fruits are rather like the proverbial dead-sea apple—rank at the core though tempting to the eyes. "The Reformation was the greatest misfortune which befell European civilization"—how often and in how many unexpected places does one nowadays come across this acknowledgment! One of the outstanding facts of the post-war conditions in Europe and America is the growing influence of the Catholic Church. While the West is thus beginning slowly to awaken to its mistake in divorcing politics from religion, it is unthinkable that the constitution of self-governing India should be based on the principle of an absolute unconcern on the part of the State for religion. "Drive out nature with a fork, she comes running back," wrote Emerson. "The parted water reunites behind our hand. Pleasure is taken out of pleasant things, profit out of profitable things, power out of strong things, the moment we seek to separate them from the whole."

The State which has no relation to religion will have no saviour for the people of India. They will not move a little finger to save it from assaults from within or without. It will not arouse in them a hundredth fraction of the resentment which the cutting of a branch of the peepul tree, the shooting of a pigeon or a peacock near a shrine, the molestation of a cow, or the desecration of a temple or mosque instinctively does. They may submit to it so long as it leaves them alone, but the moment it comes into contact, not necessarily conflict—as it must in a score of ways—with any cherished sentiment, religion or those who profess to speak in its name will have the upper hand, and the whole elaborate structure will be swept away if it is not saved by outside intervention. The leading members of the Nehru Committee were lawyers, and lawyers are prone to assume that statutes have an inherent power to enforce themselves. They have, of course, no such power. In India, at any rate the only power which can command implicit obedience, without the help of outside force, is religion, and the Indian State if it discards religion, will be a derelict in the stormy sea of international rivalry.

Europe had to separate the State from religion because the European idea of it rested on the conception of a jealous god who tolerated no rival near his throne. This is not the Indian idea. From ancient times, India recognised that all great religions are different aspects of Truth and different ways to the same ultimate Goal. This principle and policy was adopted by all great Indian rulers including the Moslem. "The idea of religious toleration," says Rapson in his Ancient India, "which was of slow growth in Europe was accepted at India generally from the earliest times. All religious communities were alike under the protection of the sovereign; and inscriptions plainly show that when the government changed hands, the privileges granted to religious communities were ratified by the new sovereign as a matter of course. In a special edict devoted to the subject of religious toleration Asoka definitely says that his own practice is to reverence all sects. In this edict he deprecates the habit of exalting one's own views at the expense of others, and admits that different people have different ideas as to what constitutes duty (Dharma)...Such has been the attitude of enlightened rulers in India in all ages." The policy described above, crystallised by Asoka in his edict, is not correctly described as one of toleration in its passive significance. It was one of active reverence founded on the conviction that religion is the supreme good, as rich in nourishment to the State as to the individuals of whom it is composed. Rapson speaks of the remarkable continuity of policy on the part of great Indian rulers irrespective of nationality. The Nehru Committee's recommendation makes a breach in this continuity, and, therefore, is open to the criticism that it does not derive its inspiration from Indian life and history.

It is due to this policy that there exist and flourish in India, alone among countries, ancient communities such as the Jews of Cochin, the Syrian Christians of Travancore, and the Parsis of Bombay as distinct communities. Not even the missionary zeal of Islam could break the protective barrier raised by the basic principle of respect for all religions and communities imbedded in the Indian mind and tradition. If these small minority communities had been left to fend for themselves, they would not have survived to this day in all their integrity. It may seem to some minds that it would have been a good thing if they had been absorbed peacefully or forcibly into the general population, but that was not the Indian view and it is not the modern view of race and nationality. Each of these communities has enriched Indian culture and character by its special talents and by its aptitudes, moral and spiritual, and the history of India has thus become a compendium of that of Asia. For our own part, we hold that the Indian traditional policy was a wise, humane and just policy to depart from which would be disastrous to the country. As England was for long the inviolate asylum of political refugees, India from ancient times has welcomed all races and religions and given them her hospitality and protection. This is the great glory of Indian history, of which India has reason to be proud. We owe it to ourselves and we owe it to those ancient communities which have made their home in India, that the policy of protection should not be departed from in the future constitution of India.

Religion is the life breath of India. Deprived of it, she will be no better than a rotting carcass on the international wayside. If India has a mission in politics, it is to show the way in spiritualising politics, as Gokhale used to say. The Nehru Committee's constitution even if it meets with Lord Birkenhead's approval will not satisfy the people of India, whereas one which is a fusion of secular with the spiritual elements of human nature, while being India's distinctive contribution to world-politics, will incidently and automatically solve all her own special problems, such as those which concern communities and the Indian States. It will reconcile interests, rouse enthusiasms, raise powerful and overpowering armies at small expense and in a short time. In the next article we shall indicate in some detail where the Nehru scheme may be touched up in order to bring it into conformity with these ideas.

THE LATE DR. R. G. BHANDARKAR

(By Mr. S. G. Warty)

It happened in 1906. I was a student at the Fergusson College, Poona, in the Intermediate Class. Having cultivated a liking for the weekly sermons of the Prarthana Samaj while in Bombay during the previous year, I was naturally desirous of attending them at Poona also if possible, and one Sunday afternoon searched out the place where the Samajists used to meet. Happily Dr. Bhandarkar was conducting the worship on that occasion and just when I was taking my seat he was reciting with closed eyes the famous palm (abhang) of Saint Tukaram which may be rendered into English as follows.

"Let us march on to God's abode. He shall give us rest. To him shall we relate our joys and sorrows. He will satisfy our hunger. Him shall we completely trust. He is the ocean of kindness. Close by his side shall we dwell, clinging to his feet forever. Children are we, says Tuka, the darlings of our Lord."

Every time I am reminded of Dr. Bhandarkar, I remember him in this guise, seated in the pulpit, his mind absorbed in the service of God, enjoying inwardly the hymns that he sang while from his mouth fell words which, the audience felt, were an expression of the intense devotional spirit within. Dr. Bhandarkar may be great in many respects, to me he is great pre-eminently as a supreme lover of God.

THE BEGINNINGS.

When a man attains greatness, it is customary to trace the beginnings thereof in the ambitions of his childhood. Shivaji's ambition was fired by the exploits of the heroes of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata described to him by his mother while yet he was a child. The younger Pitt aspired to talk like his Papa in Parliament. Mr. Tilak found his inspiration, in the past history of his ruling caste. One wonders if the boy Bhandarkar entertained any such particular ambitions or worshipped any particular heroes. Nor is it certain that there was anything to inspire him to great action. Mr. S. N. Karnataki, who has taken considerable pains to depict Dr. Bhandarkar's boyhood in his excellent Marathi biography, and whose sources of information have been absolutely reliable, is by no means explicit on this point. To me it appears that Dr. Bhandarkar's achievements have not originated from any inspiration in early life, but are the result of a stern sense of duty, a heart-and-soul method of performance. "Whatever thou settest thy hands to do, do it with all thy might."

That was the underlying principle of his life. No greatness did he seek, by consciously attempting great deeds. It was not the desire for fame (that last infirmity of noble minds) that spurred him "to soar delights and live laborious days." He did mightily well whatever it fell to his lot to do. With him as with the Duke of Wellington "the path of duty was the way to glory."

THE SCHOLAR.

I should even think that Dr. Bhandarkar's outstanding qualities as a scholar, namely his absolute adherence to truth and complete freedom from bias, have flowed from an absence of original inspiration. He wrote, not to establish scholastic assertions, nor to win advantage for the culture of his race, but to record the truth as he found it after laborious search thereafter. Undoubtedly, by long association with the subjects of his studies, and moved by righteous indignation at the obstinate prejudices and misrepresentations of European scholars, he sometimes did show a tendency to defend with more than necessary warmth the oriental culture. Never-the-less he stood head and shoulders above his contemporaries in India in his absolute impartiality as a scholar, and on that foundation originated the Indian school of oriental research whose ideals are embodied in the Bhandarkar Research Institute of Poona. I am afraid, Mr. Karnataki in his very readable account of *Marathi biography of Dr. R. G. Bhandarkar by S. N. Karnataki (438 pages).

Dr. Bhandarkar's achievements in the sphere of research, while giving due prominence to Dr. Bhandarkar's intellectual greatness which made these achievements possible, has not sufficiently emphasized his intellectual honesty, a quite uncommon gift.

THE REFORMER.

I often read with delight Dr. Newman's inspiring sermons entitled "Personal influence as a means of propagating the truth", not only because of the charm of its style but because of the essential truth of Dr. Newman's argument. The cause of social and religious reform in India has been established and propagated, not so much by the preachers of reform of whom there are many, as by those few who lived a life of high purity in strict accordance with the principles they preached. In this respect in Western India, Dr. Bhandarkar stands supreme. While believing like Erasmus that much that was evil in society could be altered by the slow dissolution of its worst vices, he was not the latitudinarian like the latter with whom reform meant a gradual natural change. He was made of the sterner stuff of whom Martin Luthers are made, and he bore ridicule and persecution with patience and dignity. To some extent, his triumph was facilitated by the high position which he held, while in less fortunate circumstances might have encountered. To Dr. Bhandarkar's activities as a social and religious reformer, Mr. Karnatakai has done more than full justice, and has cared to record even the trivial incidents in his controversy with the champions of orthodoxy. His lengthy defence however, of the principles of the Prarthana Samaj is possibly out of place. In fact, there are parts in his book which together amount to about a hundred pages, where Mr. Karnatakai is very prolific, and this is one of them.

ATTITUDE TOWARDS POLITICS.

The late Sir Edmund Gosse the renowned English literary critic, once sagely remarked that most biographers were prone to make two mistakes, first to demand at any cost every action of their heroes, and second to ignore entirely the law of development and change in their character, ideas and habits. It should undoubtedly be the first business of the biographer to bring out the merits prominently. "We do not employ the minors to bury the gold and bring the dross home in malignant triumph." But we should not be remiss in referring to the shortcomings also. It may be admitted that Mr. Karnatakai has erred in this respect much less than any other writer of biographies in the Marathi language. Yet the craving is apparent. Possibly he was influenced to some extent by the bad example of Tilak's biographer. It is true as Mr. Karnatakai points out that Dr. Bhandarkar's grateful attitude to British rule was characterized of the times in which he was born. His contemporaries Dr. Dadabhai Nowroji, Mr. Justice Ranade and even Sir P. M. Mehta also regarded the British connection as providential dispensation for the good of India. But while these latter were never slow to point out the shortcomings of Government, Dr. Bhandarkar's was an attitude of charity and trust in the wisdom of Government, and he further believed that our social evils are the main if not the only causes of our position to-day. In a sense, he was incapable of appreciating the inevitable evils of foreign domination.

LOST AND GAINED.

Not a few, therefore, were the occasions when to his contemporary workers in the political field, Dr. Bhandarkar appeared as a political reactionary. There was no doubt that especially in connection with Lord Curzon's University Bill, Government utilised his name to their immense advantage, and in his great bitterness Sir Dinshaw (then Mr.) Wacha directed his attacks against him in the 'Hindu' of which he happened to be a correspondent then. Poona too, was not a little enraged, but the whirling of time soon brought its revenge. Those of the members of the Deccan Education Society who had accused Dr. Bhandarkar of want of patriotism, found in his unsuspecting loyalty the only shelter in the hour of their need thereafter.

It is interesting that when Government nominated him to the Bombay legislative council in 1905, he significantly remarked in his diary that "the honours of membership of the legislative council have come too late in life". It is also worth noting that the failure of his own advocacy of certain social causes like the Marli question in his after life, revealed to him the essentially unresponsive nature of the foreign bureaucracy, and he spoke very often with a sense of great disappointment. Can it indeed be doubted that a long series of disappointments of this character resulting from the unresponsive nature of Government has been the most prolific cause of the rise of politicians in India, and was not Dr. Bhandarkar himself though late in life a politician in embryo?

HE WAS HUMAN.

To those who never came in close contact with Dr. Bhandarkar, his stern appearance conveyed the impression that he was an unqualified puritan who shunned all entertainment, denied all pleasures, hated all humbugs. Never-the-less he was human, and at times indulged in innocent pastimes. He was often witty and humorous and in his old age he would often tell the story of Shakespears the Miller's Entertainments to the entertainment of his audience. Once he cut a joke at the expense of the late Sir Narayan Chandavarkar. He and Sir Narayan were together enjoying a walk at Lonavia and soon overtook a bullock cart which would not make way for them. "What an impertinent cartman!" said Bhandarkar, "he seems to care little even for a High Court Judge!" Similarly, like that eternal moralist the Victor of Wakefield, Dr. Bhandarkar was "tired of being always wise." Mr. Karkkot, when he was to be installed as Shankarscharya at Kolhapur, approached Dr. Bhandarkar at Lonavla, and requested him to wire congratulations to him on the day of the ceremony. Mr. Kurktoti hoped thereby to enhance his own importance. Dr. Bhandarkar however never liked the idea of such congratulations to order, he even considered it a device to humbug the public, and refused the favour to Mr. Kurktoti. Mr. Kurktoti approached him again, and the Doctor refused him a second time. Mr. Kurktoti was still importunate, the Doctor yielded at the third request much against his will.

WANTED A BIOGRAPHY.

The need of a well-written English biography of Dr. Bhandarkar is now strongly felt. The materials for such biography seem to be already at hand, collected and arranged by Mr. Karnataki. For the present, the Marathi readers are fortunate in that respect, because Mr. Karnataki has given them a true picture of the great doctor. Indeed, one should congratulate Mr. Karnataki on his right perspective, a quality that is rare among Marathi writers. Most of the biographies in Marathi are mere catalogues of events. The writers do not even attempt to follow the high standard. Mr. Karnataki's book is not entirely faultless; some of its shortcomings I have pointed out herein. But it is undoubtedly a biography that is rich in information, true in perspective, eminently readable and thoroughly reliable.

MS. JAYAKAR ON HINDU WOMEN'S RIGHTS.

Under the auspices of the Young Men's Hindu Association, Mr. M. R. Jayakar delivered an interesting lecture on "Women's Rights" at Girgaum back Road, Bombay, on Wednesday evening. The speaker deplored the state of the law, which he described as old-fashioned, and regretted that it had not been modified to meet present conditions. Mr. Jayakar said that the women of India were awakening to their rights. They had taken the work of regeneration into their own hands and were bound to succeed. The speaker next discussed the grievances of the women from the women's point of view, before marriage, after marriage and when a woman is a widow. Their first grievance was that the marriageable age in India was very low that the age ought to be fixed at least at 15. He was surprised to find some protagonists of Hinduism saying that even 12 years was too high and they opposed the bill brought in by Mr. Haribdas Sarda. A committee was appointed in the Assembly and it was some relief to find that a compromise was arrived at fixing the age at 14. Their next complaint was about the choice of husbands. They said that they ought to have a much larger say in the choice of husbands. In some communities, especially the minor ones it was a problem to make suitable matches with the result that marriages were contracted between relations. This sort of marriages resulted in a deterioration of the race and the sooner they took to inter-marriages between castes and sub-castes the better it would be.

The speaker next referred to the dissolution of marriages among Hindus and said that the few concerning them was absurd. To the Hindu marriage was a sacrament rather than a contract but if that was so it ought to be so for both the husband and the wife. According to the law as it at present stood if a Hindu husband changed his religion he could obtain a dissolution of marriage but if the Hindu wife claimed a dissolution on the ground of her husband changing his religion she would be refused. This was not justice, there should be perfect equality on both sides. The wife could claim a dissolution even if her husband had a large number of wives or if he was suffering from an incurable disease. The speaker deplored the state of law as regards the restoration of conjugal rights, and the want of legislation regarding "separate maintenance and divorce. The law, he said, was peculiarly old-fashioned and must be adjusted according to present requirements of Society. The speaker wound up by saying that the movement for the assertion of the women's rights was flowing like a river, and his suggestion to the men was that they should not try to obstruct the flow; if they did, they were running the risk of being swept away. "Look at the movement with goodwill and understanding, as men who are dealing with the cause of their own daughters and wives and mothers. If on the other hand you begin to obstruct this movement you will be swept away" he concluded. Women would in course of time storm the Legislatures and get what was now refused them.

HEALTH AND CHILD WELFARE EXHIBITION.

The Executive Committee of the Bombay Presidency Baby and Health Week Association with the consent of its President, Her Excellency Lady Wilson decided, at its meeting at Mahableshwar in May last, to hold in Poona on a bigger scale than that of last year, a "Health and Child Welfare Exhibition" in conjunction with the Local Self-Government Conference to be held just before the September Session of the Bombay Legislative Council.

The preliminary meeting was attended by a number of influential representatives of various local bodies and institutions in Poona and several leading citizens were also present. The meeting settled the title of the Exhibition, defined its nature and scope, and appointed the office-bearers. It also requested His Excellency to extend his kind patronage to the Exhibition with which request His Excellency generously complied. It further resolved to invite the co-operation of all local bodies and institutions in Poona as well as various Health and Sanitary Associations in the Bombay Presidency as also of the various departments of the Government of Bombay that deal with problems of Public Health and continuously carry on useful health activities. The Committee would also feel grateful if other Health and Sanitary Associations or Government Departments in different parts of India would extend it to their support by lending it their best material for Exhibition. Similarly, if outside Exhibitors or firms dealing in goods dealing with Health problems desire to keep stalls they may be allowed to do so on payment of fees. It was also proposed to enlist the sympathy and support of the Princes, Chiefs, and their Basissahels all over the Presidency to this Exhibition and to request them to join the Joint Exhibition Committee as Vice-Presidents.

Her Excellency Lady Wilson, who is also the President of this Joint Exhibition Committee, has been requested to open the Exhibition and deliver the inaugural address. It has been decided to hold this Exhibition in the Western Block of the New Courts Buildings at Bhamburga, which Government have been pleased to place the disposal of this Committee on certain conditions. The dates of this Exhibition are not yet fixed, but in all probability, it would be held by the middle of September and would be kept going for a week. The Exhibition will principally deal with problems of public health important to the people of this Presidency. Special emphasis, however, will be placed on their education in matters dealing with mothercraft as well as fathercraft and with infant and child welfare as affecting the people in rural as well as urban areas. The Committee proposes to make this Exhibition as instructive as possible specially to the people living in villages by drawing their attention pointedly to the several evils from which they suffer owing to unhygienic and insanitary conditions mostly due to ignorance and poverty and would endeavour to suggest some ways and means with the help of which these evils could be remedied. Ample facilities will be provided to educate the school children in simple health problems. As women come to be closely associated with the requirements of domestic health and hygiene, special endeavour will be made to arrange instruction in these and in mothercraft as well for the benefit of mothers by means of models, charts, coloured pictures, diagrams, and lectures with the help of lantern slides and cinema films. Suitable dates will be arranged for women, school children above the age of 12, and villagers. Two special sub-committees have been formed for these purposes. The work of this Exhibition has been distributed among different sub-committees which were formed at the first General Meeting of the joint Exhibition Committee held on the 30th of July 1928 at the headquarters of the Poona Seva Sadan Society, after a good deal of informal discussion that had taken place in the interval among the office-bearers of the Committee at a regular meeting on the 30th of June. In accordance with the resolution of the preliminary meeting, letters have been addressed to several Government Departments, Health and Sanitary Associations and other bodies, requesting them to keep stalls at their cost in this Exhibition to demonstrate their useful activities. Similarly, other Associations or bodies dealing with these problems are being invited to participate in this Exhibition and lend their whole-hearted support. It has been unanimously agreed that in order to interest school children, college boys and girls, and women all over the Presidency in health problems, an essay competition should be introduced for which prizes would be given, the essays to be submitted being written in English, Kanarese, Marathi, Gujarati, Urdu and Sindhi. It was also resolved to invite competition songs in various languages dealing with the importance of health and a separate Sub-committee with Khan Bahadar E. S. Bharachoa, as Chairman, has been formed to settle the subjects for this essay and song competition and to judge of the result of the same.

It is estimated roughly that a sum of Rs. 10,000 may be required to organize this Exhibition well and in a satisfactory manner on a scale worthy of the cause; and an infinental Sub-Committee consisting of ladies and gentlemen has been formed for the purpose of devising means of collection and actually of endeavouring to collect the amount. In this connection it must be mentioned with great gratitude that Their Excellencies Sir Leslie Wilson and Lady Wilson who have set a remarkable example by their strenuous work of collecting funds for the Hospitals in Bombay, have done somewhat towards securing a good start by contributing Rs. 500 to the Exhibition Fund. The Association has sanctioned a grant of Rs. 1,000. The Poona Branch of the Indian Red Cross Society has sanctioned Rs. 200. The Children's Guild of Service in Poona has put Rs. 100. The Poona Seva Sadan Society and the Village Midwives' Association, Poona, have each contributed a sum of Rs. 100. Mr. K. A. Ghaswala, and Mr. Salvi, a Bombay contractor at present working in Poona, have each contributed Rs. 100. E. Col. K. G. Charparey, I. M. S., Civil Surgeon, Belgaum (on leave) has contributed, Rs. 25 and the office-bearers among themselves have contributed about Rs. 120.

It was also decided by the preliminary meeting that, during this Week, a Provincial Health and Child Welfare Conference be arranged inviting delegates of the various local bodies in the Presidency and the members of the Bombay Legislative Council that may be present in Poona, to discuss proposals for the gradual extension of the infant and maternal welfare movement in the various parts of our Presidency, and His Excellency Sir Leslie Wilson, the Governor of Bombay, has been requested to deliver the opening address to this Conference; and as this is likely to be the last pronouncement of His Excellency Sir Leslie Wilson, the Governor of Bombay on this vital question, a great deal of importance is attached to it.

Self Immolation — It appears that on August 11, while the mourners were returning from the crematorium after having set fire to the funeral pyre for the cremation of the corpse of the pater of Jogi Gaon, a village in Lakhnana Tahsil in the Sool District of the C. P., the youngest son of the dead man threw himself into the flames and was burnt to death before the mourners could extricate him.
THE AGE OF CONSENT.

The Bombay Presidency Social Reform Association has submitted the following answers to the questionnaire issued by the Age of Consent Committee:

Q. I.—Is there any dissatisfaction with the state of the law as to the Age of Consent as contained in Sections 375 and 376 of the Indian Penal Code?

A.—Our Council is of opinion that there is a general feeling that the present law regarding the Age of consent in India is not satisfactory and that the age of consent ought to be raised. When the limit was fixed at the age of twelve in 1861 Government had given an implied promise that it will be raised to 14 at an early suitable opportunity. Since then social customs and opinions have undergone a rapid and radical change rendering a substantial increase of the age of consent imperative.

Q. II.—What are the circumstances which in your opinion justify:

1. retaining the law of the Age of Consent as it is, or
2. making an advance on the present law.

A.—Some of the circumstances which justify an advance in the present law, in addition to the physiological reasons, are the steady though slow increase in the marriage of girls, the growing sentiment in favour of higher education for women on account of which an increasing number of grown up girls remain unmarried up to a late age, the relaxation of purdah and seclusion of women, the growing feeling against the obligatory rule of marriage, the general loosening of old restrictions at a comparatively more rapid pace than the advance of public opinion in matters relating to sexual and social purity, the increasing employment of women in factories and the impact of the post-war laxity in morals, on life and character through such agencies as the cinemas and sensational novels and plays. The net result of these influences is, on the one hand, to decrease the old customary safeguards for the protection of women, and, on the other, to increase the opportunities and the disposition of men with ill-assimilated ideas of social freedom to take advantage of the disappearance of such safeguards.

Q. III.—Are crimes of seduction or rape frequent in your part of the country? Has the amendment of the law made in 1925 raising the age of consent to 14 years succeeded in preventing or reducing cases of rape outside the marital state, or the improper seduction of girls for immoral purposes? If, not, what measures would you propose to make the law effective?

A.—There have been loud complaints in some parts of the country of the abduction of women, but in the absence of statistics it is not possible to give a definite answer to the question.

The amendment of 1925 has been in force for too short a time to enable an estimate of its preventive effect.

Q. IV.—Has the amendment of 1925 raising the age of consent within the marital state to 13 years been effective in protecting married girls against cohabitation with husbands within the prescribed age limit:

1. by postponing the consummation of marriage,
2. by stimulating public opinion in that direction, or
3. by putting off marriage beyond 13.

If not, what steps would you propose to make it effective?

A.—For the reasons given in answer to the previous question, namely, that the amendment of 1925 has been in force only for a short time our Council do not think it would have had any material effect in any of the three directions suggested in the question. But several influences including the discussions in the Press and platform on the question of women’s rights and liberties and the women’s movement which has been rapidly growing in strength and volume have tended to advance both opinion and practice in those directions. The one step which the legislature can take to make these forces more effective is to discontinue child marriage with an ultimate view to their prohibition.

Q. V.—What is the usual age at which girls attain puberty in your part of the country? Does this differ in different castes, communities or classes of society?

A.—Fourteen is perhaps the usual age at which girls attain puberty in most parts of India. It is probably not a question of castes and communities. The most recent opinions as regards age and sex distribution inclines to assign them to territorial rather than caste or communal peculiarities. Our Council however are of opinion that puberty is perhaps as much a psychological as a physiological incident. Puberty is earlier in girls brought up in the old way, namely, without education and with constant thought of marriage as their sole purpose in life than in educated surroundings and with intellectual and social interests and with a broader outlook on life.

Q. VI.—Is cohabitation common in your part of the country among any class or classes of people:

1. Before puberty,
2. Soon after puberty,
3. Before the girl completes 18 years.

Do any of these cases come to court?
A.—According to the Indian Census Report the custom of child marriage, i.e., marriage before the age of ten is most prevalent in Behar and Oriesa, Bombay, Baroda, the Central Indian tract and Hyderabad. Even in these areas co-habitation before puberty is, in the opinion of the Council, not common. Public opinion will not countenance it. It is after puberty and, as 14 is the average age, it is improbable that there are many cases of consummation before the girl completes 14 years. Such cases of pre-puberty consummation that occur are most likely among ill-assorted couples where adult men marry girls of tender age. There is a growing feeling against such marriages.

These cases seldom come before the Courts for the simple reason that the conviction of the husband places the girl in an intolerable position both from the economic and social points of view. She cannot remarry and she is likely to be kicked upon by her husband’s relatives as a sort of social traitor.

Q. VII.—Do you attribute the practice of the early consummation of marriage before or at puberty, wherever it exists, to religious injunctions? If so, what is the authority for and the nature of that injunction, and does that authority prescribe any, and if so, what penalty for its breach?

A.—Religion is only an pretext nowadays for justifying irrational customs. The question of Hindu authority in social reform is no longer a live issue as it was some thirty years ago.

Q. VIII.—Is ‘Gacch’ or ‘Garbadhan’ ceremony usually performed in your part of the country? If so, does it coincide with or is it anterior to the consummation of marriage. If it is performed generally after the attainment of puberty how soon after it?

A.—Our Council believe that the Garbadhan ceremony, is performed in recent times in some communities only but not as conspicuously as it used to be. Where it is still looked upon as essential, being one of the sixteen Sanskaras enjoined upon a higher class Hindu, it is necessarily performed after puberty and the interval varies according to the circumstances in which the married couple stand at the time.

Q. IX.—Do you consider that the attainment of puberty is a sufficient indication of physical maturity to justify consummation of marriage? If not, at what age and how long after puberty may a girl’s physical development be considered to be enough to justify such consummation without injury to her own health and that of her progeny?

A.—Whether puberty is a sufficient indication of maturity or not is a question for physiologists but we are strongly of the view that not only physical but mental maturity also is essential for a girl to give her valid consent to sexual intercourse whether in or out of marriage. A mere physical consent for such a serious matter cannot be regarded as a deliberate and valid consent.

Our Council are therefore of opinion that, having regard to prevailing custom and sentiment, 15 should be deemed to be the minimum age for consummation of marriage for girls, though they are inclined to believe that if the health of the girl and her progeny is the only consideration, the age limit should be still higher.

Q. X.—At what age would a girl in India be competent to give an intelligent consent to cohabitation with a due realization of consequences?

A.—As stated in answer to question IX the question is one of not only physical but mental maturity. Our Council are inclined to think that not many Indian girls are competent to give an intelligent consent under 18 years of age. Up to this age they are regarded as minors for all civil purposes and our Council think they are and should be regarded as incapable of giving valid consent to sexual intercourse.

Q. XI.—During your experience, professional or otherwise, have you come across cases in which cohabitation before puberty, or after puberty but before full physical development of a girl resulted in injury to her health or body or prejudicially affected her progeny? If any, give details of age and injury sustained.

A.—This is a question primarily for medical experts but several cases of child marriages which have occurred in recent times are attended with the unfortunate result of too early and too frequent maternity.

Q. XII.—Do you consider early consummation and early maternity responsible for high maternal and infantile mortality, or for any other results vitally affecting the intellectual or physical progress of the people?

A.—Our Council are of opinion that the evil results suggested in this question are prevalent especially in big cities.

Q. XIII.—Has there been any further development of public opinion in your part of the country in favour of an extension of the age of consent in marital and extra marital cases since the amendment of the law in 1926? If so, is it general or confined only to certain classes?

A.—Our Council think public opinion today will support the increase of the age of consent to 18 if the marriage relation is excluded from the purview of the section dealing with rape. Such support will not be confined only to certain classes but will be general.

Q. XIV.—Do women in your part of the country favour early consummation of marriage for their children?

A.—On the contrary educated opinion among women, even of the conservative type, is now strongly against early consummation of marriages.

Q. XV.—Have any difficulties been experienced in determining the age of girls in connection with offences under sections 375 and 376 of the Indian Penal Code? What measures would you suggest to remove or minimise these difficulties?
A.—Our Council are of opinion that while the age of a girl of 18 can be more or less definitely ascertained it will be more difficult to say whether a girl is 18 or 14. The only certain means of fixing the age correctly is a strict system of birth registration which is admittedly much less efficient than death registration in most parts of the country.

Q. XVI.—Would the difficulty or margin of error in determining the age be materially reduced or minimised if the age of consent is raised to 14 years or above?

A.—Our Council do not think that absolute certainty as to age can be obtained under the limit of 18 for girls. At the same time the difficulty of determining age would be appreciably reduced with every year above 14 to which the age of consent is raised.

Q. XVII.—Would you separate extra marital and marital offences into different offences? If so, what is the nature and amount of maximum punishment you would prescribe for offences of each class?

Q. XVIII.—Would you make a difference in the procedure of trials for offences within and without the marital state and if so, what would you suggest in each case?

A.—Our Council are of opinion that extra marital and marital offences should be distinct and placed in different categories. As regards the former the age of consent may be raised to eighteen and the punishment may remain as at present. As regards the marriage relation our Council are of opinion that it can and should be better dealt with in other ways such as legislation disannulling marriages below the age of consent which within the marriage relation should be raised to fifteen.

Our Council cannot ignore the difficulty of enforcing a provision of law in which the Age of Consent is higher than the age of marriage. Our Council may however point out that according to the report of the Select Committee on Sarda's Marriage Bill, 14 in the limit below which marriage is penalised by law. Our Council is also conscious of the popular view that the Legislature ought not to penalise consummation after the marriage is celebrated. For these reasons the marital offences should be placed in a different category from that of rape and, if practicable, special provision of law may be made for this purpose and, in order to conciliate public opinion, lighter punishment may be provided for this offence. The proposal to punish it with 2 years imprisonment may be favourably considered and alternative punishments may also be devised.

As regards the procedure of trials our Council do not think that any change in the present law is needed for differentiating between these offences.

Q. XIX.—Would you suggest any safeguards beyond those existing at present against collusion to protect the offender or against improper prosecution or extortion?

A.—None.

Q. XX.—Do you consider that penal legislation fixing a higher age of consent for marital cases is likely to be more effective than legislation fixing the minimum age of marriage? Which of the two alternatives would be in consonance with public opinion in your part of the country?

Our Council do not consider that, in respect of marital cases higher age of consent and minimum age of marriage constitute alternative remedies, as they are interrelated and act and react upon each other. As already observed, public opinion would not tolerate a great diversion between the age of marriage and the Age of Consent if both are fixed by law. Further, higher Age of Consent without corresponding increase of the minimum age of marriage would be futile, as offences against the law pertaining to consent would scarcely come before a Court of law. Hence the more effective line of attack would be to raise the minimum age of marriage. But as there are far greater difficulties in the way of raising the minimum age of marriage as contrasted with fixing the higher Age of Consent, our Council think that easier remedy of increasing the Age of Consent, should be availed of, while making every effort to raise the minimum age of marriage so as to approximate it to the Age of Consent. Our Council are of opinion that public opinion would support measures for increasing both the age of marriage and of consent if a short interval only is allowed to intervene between the two.

Q. XXI.—Would you prefer to rely on the strengthening of the penal law to secure the object in view or in the progress of social reform by means of education and social propaganda?

A.—The progress of social reform by means of education and propaganda is of course our main line of attack but well-considered social legislation is essential to consolidate our gains and to prevent relapse. The slowness in passing such legislation has been a serious handicap to social reformers.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Compulsory Education.—Further introduction of free and compulsory primary education will hardly benefit Bengal unless pupils are compelled to continue their studies for a number of years, was the point emphasized by Mr. J. M. Sen, Additional Inspector of Schools, Presidency Division, in the course of a lecture on "Primary Education in Bengal, Punjab and the United Provinces" last night. Strictly speaking, eighty per cent of the boys attending primary schools in Bengal give up their studies after a year or two and return to illiteracy, said Mr. Sen. This was terrible waste in education. The only remedy was to enforce compulsion to retain boys for three or four years in primary schools. No doubt, there had been rapid progress in primary education in Calcutta, but if statistics were taken, it would be found that boys and girls who joined the primary schools, left them after three or four months, returning at a later period, thus beginning their studies afresh. The money that was now spent on primary education in the Province was thus wasted.

Women's Educational Conference.—The half yearly meeting of the Standing Committee of the All India Women's Educational Conference will be held at Bombay.
on the 28th August to consider the report work done by the various sub-committees and to lay down plans for future work.

Unemployment in Bengal.—With a view to stimulate the interest of unemployed youth in industries, arrangements have been made by the Department of Industries, Bengal, to provide free industrial training in their Industrial Research Laboratory. The manufacturers of bar and moulded soap will form the first subject for training, which will commence from October 30, and will continue up to December 15, 1928. Only a limited number of students who are natives or of descent in Bengal will be admitted and preference will be given to those who can produce evidences that they are prepared to make their livelihood in this industry.

Lord Haldane.—A Reuters's telegram dated the 19th August announces the death of Lord Haldane, The Rt. Hon. Richard Burdon Haldane, the 1st Viscount Haldane of Cloan, born in July 1856 and was educated in Edinburgh and Cattling Universities. He entered Parliament in 1885 and was Liberal Member for Edinburghshire till 1911 when he was created a Viscount. He was Secretary of State for War from 1905 to 1912, High Chancellor of Great Britain 1912-15, and 1924 in the Labour Government, and till his death a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Lord Haldane was a reputed student of philosophy and was the author of a number of books on philosophy.

Hindu Dharma Conference.—Under the auspices of the Hindu Dharma Paripalana Sabha, it has been resolve to hold a Conference of religious-minded Hindus towards the close of this month, with a view to concert measures for the prevention of child-marriage, the abolition of the Desvadat institution, the removal of untouchability and the eradication of other social evils vitally affecting the growth of Hinduism. Dwa Harabard T. Rangasharir, c.z.c., has kindly consented to preside over the Conference. Admission to the Conference will be restricted to sympathisers with the objects of the Conference.

Women's Education.—Baba Sahib Chandra Acharay Chaudhury, Zamindar of Rajesthan estate, Mekasgoba district, Mymensing, Bengal, has created a trust of his property worth Rs. 40,000 in Puri for the promotion of the education of women at the Hindu University. Padma Malaviya is the sole trustee. Instruction has been received that the deed was registered today at Puri. Arrangements are being made to take possession of the property. Scholarships will be awarded to women students, from the income of the property in order to give effect to the wishes of the donor.

Hindu Muslim Marriage.—The Swarajy, Madras, writes:—The marriage was recently celebrated of Mr. Abdul Karim Sahib Babador B.A., District Forest Officer Guntur, with Srimathi Jasatk Devi, daughter of Mr. A. Rajagopala Iyanger, Assistant Engineer P.W.D. of the region. The bridegroom is a prominent Theosophist and has taken active part in spreading the ideals of the Theosophical Society among his community. The bride is also an active worker in the cause of social reform now residing at the Madras Medical College in the third year M.B.I.S. Class. The marriage function took place at the the Headquarters Hall of the Theosophical Society in the presence of a large gathering of supporters of the great step taken by the couple in the reform. Pandit K. Narayani Sastri Gurur officiated as the priest on the occasion and performed the marriage according to the rites of the Bhakta Samaj which belong to both the bride and bridegroom.

THE GLIMPSES

"Sadhu Vaswani is carrying on the tradition of our ancient Rishis even in these dog days and this little handsomely got up book, appropriately dedicated to Kesava Chandra Sen, whose life was a constant endeavor to achieve harmay between the outer body and the inner life, is in the author's best vein..... Coming straight from the mint of his personal experience, they bear the stamp of his spiritual fervor and convey the authentic note of inspiration..... There can be no greater spiritual food to the present generation than this message of Shakti or the creative force in life." The Hindu.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies.

The partialism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.
