Mahatma Gandhi’s Autobiography: We have received a copy of the first volume of Mahatma Gandhi’s autobiography. It bears the title under which the several chapters of which it consists, were published in his weekly paper, Young India, namely, ‘The Story of My Experiments with Truth.’ It is an interesting story as those who followed it in the columns of Young India and in other journals where they were freely reproduced, used not be told. We ourselves declaimed the suggestion of some readers to reprint them in the Reformer, for the reason that it was only fair that those who wish to read the chapters should buy the paper which the illustrious author has made his special medium. The book cannot be reviewed like an ordinary biography. It is a human document remarkable for its sincerity. Nevertheless, we have often felt much curiosity in turning the chapters in Young India, particularly those relating to Mahatma’s reflections on his conjugal experiences, to know what Mrs. Gandhi, the subject of the experiments, thought of it all. In the pages of any opinion, any opinion formed on Mahatma’s ex-parte story must be highly qualified and tentative. In fact, we for our part can form none at all. We can, therefore, only pay our sevensent tribute to the ruthless sincerity, with which he has, in his great love for his fellowmen, torn the veil from the sanctum sanctorum of life, so that they may benefit by his experience, and order their lives so as to be a blessing to themselves and their country. Mahatma has taken life as a solemn trust. Life to him has not been

...as idle ore...

But iron dag from central gnom
And heated bot with burning tears,
And dipped in baths of bling tears,
And battered with the shocks of doom
To shape and use.

This is a book which should be read, marked and inwardly digested, rather than one to be written about. Mahatma has made a noble contribution to the world literature. We should, not omit to record our high appreciation of the admirable get-up of the volume. The proofs have been carefully read, and there is a carefully-compiled index—two common desiderata in most Indian publications. The Nava Jivan Press deserves great credit for the general excellence of the printing and binding. The price is Rs. 3.5 and copies can be had from the Nava Jivan Press, Ahmedabad.

Inter-Communal Unity: The movement for inter-communal unity, especially between Hindus and Mahomedans, has received a powerful impulse from the earnest and eloquent speech which Lord Irwin delivered at a joint session of the Legislative Assembly and the Council of State at Simla on Monday. Recalling the deplorable incidents during the year and a half that he has been in the country, His Excellency said that Government had a higher duty than mere repetition of baneful prescriptions when they occur, and that they should embark on constructive work to promote harmonious relations between the communities. The Viceroy expressed his readiness, if the leaders on both sides desired, him, to take the initiative in calling a conference of representative men to consider outstanding differences, and arrive at a settlement. Meanwhile Hindu and Moslem leaders had arranged for a conference among themselves with the same object, and a manifesto has been published signed by leaders of the Hindu Mahasabha and the Muslem League and the Kullatai Conference, calling upon members of the two communities to desist from further quarrels and to seek early means of reconciliation in the highest interests of the country and of their respective communities. At the instance of the leaders, at Simla convened a Unity Conference, we read in the Punjabi papers that a Unity Committee has been formed at Amritsar consisting of about a hundred members. Of whom are prominent Hindu, Mahomedan and Sikh leaders who have been working hitherto on communal lines. The Committee it appears has set about its work in right earnest. Already the situation in Amritsar has much improved; no communal meetings have been held there and members of the committee have addressed the people, exhorting them to reunite. Further they issued a Committee, we are told, has issued a general call to all the leaders in all three communities declaring their earnest desire to attain peace and harmony. We cordially welcome this attempt at creating a better understanding between the various communities and earnestly hope that it will meet with the success it so greatly deserves.

Bengal Detainees: Bengal has been singularly unfortunate in her Governors but His Excellency Sir Stanley Jackson gave early proof that he at least may be expected to do the right by that province. The release of Moors. Subhas Chandra Bose, Satyendra Chandra Mitra and others, and his order for the restoration of the image to its pedestal at Bippillaloo, coupled with the report that an early declaration of general amnesty to all political prisoners was forthcoming, inspired much confidence. in him. Sir Stanley Jackson's pronouncement on the vexed question of the release of the detenus has caused keen disappointment throughout India. The sum and substance of his announcement was that he hoped to release or transfer a large number of detenus before the end of the year if no untoward event occurred, the conditions at present prevailing in Bengal continued and the conduct of those released justified the action in their case. These absurd conditions are imposed to all intents and purposes in the interests of peace and order. It is not intelligible except to the Bengali Government how the further detention of these 4o men is in the interests of public safety. Hope deferred makes the heart sick. What with the fall of the present ministry and the difficulty in forming a new one Bengal seems to be on the verge of reverting to the old Littten regime.

Civil Marriage in India: We are indebted to Mr. Maneklal Vakil for his lucid exposition of the facilities afforded by the Special Marriage Act of 1872 and also with the orthodox rites. We receive frequent enquiries from various parts of the country on this subject, and Mr. Vakil's article contains a complete answer to them. The Act applies to Hindus as the other communities demanded and were excluded from its periphery. In the first place, under this Act intermarriages are contracted between different castes and sects without the obnoxious declaration repudiating their ancestral faith, required by the Act of 1872, which is still in force and under which alone intermarriage between members of different religions is possible. The Act lays down the minimum age limit of 14 for girls with the consent of their parents, and 16 independently of such consent. The marriage is invested with the inviolable incident of monogamy, so that the husband cannot marry again in the life-time of his wife. Mr. Vakil also explains the advantages in the way of property rights accruing under the new Act.

Y. M. C. A. Vindicated: The Y. M. C. A. has emerged unscathed with its reputation enhanced from the enquiry conducted by the committee composed of the Judges of the Calcutta and Madras High Courts, and Mr. B. L. Mitra, Advocate General, Bengal, into the allegations of the European Association at its last meeting. The findings of the Committee conclusively show that all the charges levelled against the Association which is entitled to much praise, if only for the excellent services rendered during the war, were baseless and unsupported by evidence. The Association is none the worse for the enquiry which courteously demanded rather than allow these imputations to cling to it. Trials, in the case of individuals as of bodies, show the stuff of which they are made. The abiding principles, on which the Association is founded and carried on, are such as to enable it to stand four square to all the winds that blow. Incidentally, the enquiry has shown up the misapprehension of the true colours and the public will know henceforward how to assess its opinion at its real value.

Indian National Social Conference: The Madras Social Reform Association convened a meeting for the consideration of arrangements to be made for the forthcoming Social Conference in Madras. As there was an absence of some members who attended it to effect a change in the name of the Conference the meeting was adjourned to secure a better attendance for the consideration of so momentous a question. The adjourned meeting for arranging for a Social Conference during the Congress session in Madras was held recently at the Servants of India Society's premises, with Rao Bahadur T. Varadarajalu Naidu in the chair. All previous amendments regarding the name of the Conference having been withdrawn, one after another, it was unanimously agreed that the Conference should be called by the time-honoured name of "The Indian National Social Conference" and that the persons present at the meeting do constitute themselves into the Reception Committee paying a minimum subscription of Rs. 2 each to bear their subscription on the spot, besides one who gave a donation of Rs. 25. For the Chairmanship of the Reception Committee the name of Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi, Deputy Manager of the Madras Laxmi Vilas Bank, was proposed by Sir T. Sadasiva Aiyar and unanimously accepted. The following persons were also elected as Vice-Chairman: Sir C. Sankaran Nair, Sir T. Sadasiva Aiyar, Mr. E. V. Ramasaami Sivam, Mrs. Cousins, Rao Bahadur T. Varadarajalu Naidu, Mr. Bagavantam Gupta, Srinath Alamelu Mangai Thayarammal, Mrs. Bittman, Mr. Krishna Rama Bhanday, Mr. Abdul Haq Khan, Mr. Heberg and Dr. C. B. Kama Rao. Persons appointed as Secretaries are Mrs. Lakshmi Patipati, Mr. O. Kandaswami Chettu, Mr. R. V. Srerna, Mrs. Chatru Naidu, Mrs. Lakshmapathy, Mr. Heeramanee, Mr. Heeramanee, Mr. S. K. S. Sivan, Mrs. Cousins, V. G. Vakil, and others. The abiding principles, on which the Association is founded and carried on, will not be slow in coming forward with their help. The office of the Reception Committee is at Mrs. Lakshimapathy's residence, No. 19, Harris Road, Madras. The Committee's honorary members are: Mr. Thirumalachari and Dr. Gudoor Lakshmi Reddi as the Chairman and Deputy Manager, Sir T. Sadasiva Aiyar, Mr. E. L. Aiyar, Mr. V. Venkatubayah and Mr. G. Basudev, with Captains V. D. Nimkar as Treasurer. The following persons were also appointed members of the Executive Committee: Mr. T. M. Rajagopala Aiyar, Mr. N. Satyanarayana of Almorou, East Godavary, Dr. R. Padmanabha Aiyar, Mr. G. V. Krupanand, Mr. O. P. Ramasaami, Mr. P. P. Turumalaclari and Dr. Godber Ramchandran Rao. It was agreed that further nominations up to the limit of 36 members of the Committee should be made after the enrolment of more members of the Reception Committee and that six nominations should be reserved for the Representatives of the Depressed Classes. The office of the Reception Committee is at Mrs. Lakshimapathy's residence, No. 19, Harris Road, Egmore, to which address all communications regarding the Conference should be directed. Reception Committee has been formed with Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi as the Chairman and Mrs. Lakshimapathy as the Secretary.

Orissa Flood Relief: We wish to draw attention to the appeal for funds for the victims of the flood in Orissa, issued under the signatures of influential persons like Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya and others. Orissa is known as the land of perpetual floods and famines but it has never before suffered so disastrously. The gravity of the situation needs larger help and wider sympathy. Now that the Viceroy has expressed his sympathy and the Legislative Assembly has also adopted a resolution appealing for public support, we hope to be able to report that the appeal will not be slow in coming forward with their help. It is also to be hoped that the Government of India will not fail to take into consideration the remission of rent, which forms the essential part of relief to the destitute raiyat.

Index to Volume XXXVII: With the present issue the Indian Social Reformer enters its thirty-eighth year, having completed thirty-seven years of its existence. The Index to the Volume just closed is in the course of preparation and will be sent free on application to the Manager.
"MOTHER INDIA."

III

Miss Katherine Mayo’s thesis is that India owes her miseries not to British rule but to her own religious, social, and sexual perversions. "The whole pyramid of the Indian’s woes, material and spiritual, rests upon a rock-bottom physical base. This base is, simply, his manner of getting into the world and his sex-life thenceforward." Let us take up, first, the point about the Indian’s manner of getting into life. We shall let Miss Katherine Mayo explain what she means by it: "Take a girl child twelve years old, a pitiful physical specimen in bone and blood, illiterate, ignorant, without any sort of training in habits of health. Force motherhood upon her at the earliest possible moment etc." (P. 24) Then, again: "The Indian girl, in common practice, looks for motherhood nine months after reaching puberty—or anywhere between the ages of fourteen and eight. The latter age is extreme, although in some cases, not exceptional, the former is well above the average. Because of her years and upbringing and because countless generations behind her have been bred even as she, she is frail of body. She is also completely unlettered, her stock of knowledge comprising only the ritual of worship of the household idols, the rites of plantation of the wrath of deities and evil spirits, and the detailed ceremony of the service of her husband, who is ritualistically her personal god." (P. 30). "The ignorance, illiteracy, almost complete religious devotion to the husband and superstition of the Hindu wife are really irrelevant to Miss Mayo’s indictment of the Indian’s "manner of getting into the world." Many of the world’s greatest mothers have been just as ignorant, illiterate, superstitious and husband-lovers as the bulk of the women of India. It has always seemed to us that the picture of the Hebrew matron can be applied almost word for word to the Indian mother and wife.

"Who can find a virtuous woman? For her price is far above rubies. The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her, so that he shall have no need of spoil. She will do him good and not evil all the days of her life. She seeketh wool, and flax, and worketh willingly with her hands. She is like the merchant’s ship; she bringeth her food from afar. She riseth also while it is yet night; and giveth meat to her household, and a portion to her maidens. She considereth a field, and buyeth it; with the fruit of her hands she planteth a vineyard. She girdeth her loins with strength, and strengtheneth her arms. She perceiveth that her merchandise is good: her candle goeth not out by night. She layeth her hands to the spindle, and her hands hold the distaff. She stretcheth out her hand to the poor; yes, she reacheth forth her hands to the needy. Her husband is known in the gates, where he sitteth among the elders of the land. She maketh fine linen and sell ethit; and delivereth girdles unto the merchant. Strength and honor are her clothing and she shall rejoice in time to come. She openeth her mouth with wisdom; and in her tongue is the law of kindness. She looketh well to the ways of her household, and eateth not the bread of idleness. Her children arise up, and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her."—(Proverbs: Ch. XXXI, 10-28).

The Hebrew woman like the Hindu woman did not know how to read or write. Neither did the woman of ancient Greece and Rome. There is, no doubt, a wide gulf between the Hindu’s woman’s feeling for her husband and the American woman’s. Some one wrote the other day that when it is no uncommon thing for a woman to have five husbands in eight years, the term ‘marriage’ ceases to have any meaning. But are we quite sure that the American marriage is an improvement on the Hindu? Keynesing writes: "The possibility of remarrying every year ruins marriage much more fundamentally than even the most frequent practice of adultery, for the latter does not at all affect marriage as such, but only offends against certain of its components, whereas divorce lays an axe at its roots. If the poles are continually changed, a durable state of tension cannot develop or endure. Consequently, such American women as possess this characteristic are, as types, either Amazons or courtesans, and the men, as husbands, appear subjugated to such an extent as is otherwise found only in polyandrous communities."—(The Book of Marriage, p. 25). We are far from saying that the Hindu marriage as it has come to be in practice is the ideal of marriage. That is yet to be reached in India as in America. It behoves sensible people, meanwhile, not to throw stones at each other.

We come next to the question of child marriage apart from the literary qualifications of mothers and their regard for their husbands. No one in his senses will defend child marriages. The social reformers of India have been working for years to get rid of them, not without success. The Baroda Marriage Law Reform Committee, whose report was issued last month, stated that child marriages had practically ceased among the higher educated classes. This is also true of British India where the social reform movement has been far more vigorous than in Indian States. But here, again, Miss Katherine Mayo’s dictum that a race among which such marriages prevail is doomed to perpetual servility is easily refuted from history. Child marriages were common among ancient Greeks and Romans, and among the Hebrews Jesus Christ was born of an "espoused wife" whose marriage with Joseph had not been consummated. We reproduced in the Reformer of March 37, 1926, a review of a book entitled "Home Life under the Stuarts" by Elisabeth Godfrey, which shows that child marriages were common in England about the time of the Pilgrim Fathers many of whom were, perhaps, born of girl-mothers. The following passage was quoted from the book: "It was exceptional for marriage to take place absolutely in the nursery, as in the case of little Lady Mary Villiers, not only wife, but widow, before she was nine years old, but it was quite a common thing for a child to be married at thirteen. In that case she was usually given a year or two of education before she lived with her husband, and, if only about fifteen or sixteen, often went to Oxford after his marriage, or travelled abroad. The large family of the Earl of Cork afforded many instances of these very early marriages. His eldest daughter, Alice, was married to Lord Barrymore when she was thirteen; the second, Sarah, was only twelve when she was contracted to Sir Thomas Moore—indeed, the negotiations were begun when she was but eight. Being left a widow at fourteen she was quickly remarried to one of the Digby family." The two seeders of Western civilization, as an influence on human character, are the Classics and Christianity. If Miss Katherine Mayo knew, as every educated (and not merely literate) person should, something of the history of her own national civilization and culture, she would have approached her task of interpreting India to America, in a very different spirit.

Let us leave history behind and come to contemporary facts. That early marriages in this country are not necessarily detrimental to physical vigour is the considered opinion of Bisley and Gait, the joint authors of the Indian Census Report, of 1901. They observe: "No one who has seen a Punjabi regiment march past, or has watched the sturdy Jat women lift their heavy water-jars at the village well, is likely to have any misgivings as to the effect of their marriage system on the physique of the race. Among the Rajputs both sexes are of slighter build than the Jats, but here again there are no signs of degeneration. The type is different, but that is all." (Report of the Indian census, of 1901, p. 495) Jats generally marry at from five to seven years of age and Rajputs at fifteen or sixteen or even older; but the Rajput couple begins at once to cohabit, whereas the parents of the Jat girl often find her so useful at home as she grows up that some pressure has to be put upon them to give her up to her husband, and the result is that, for practical purposes, she begins her married life later than the Rajput bride (quoted from Ibbetson on the same page). The Jat system is the normal system, except in certain limited areas and classes owing, as we pointed out last week, to historical causes, and except in the case of absolutely destitute parents who think that their daughters will be more comfortably provided for in their husband's homes than in their own. Bisley and Gait acknowledge that over a great part of India the evils of early consanguine marriage are guarded against, as among the Jats. (P. 434.)

Bengal was the principal area where Bisley and Gait found prevalent as a rule among the upper classes "the monstrous abuse that the girls of the upper classes commence married life at the age of nine years, and becomes mothers at the very earliest time that it is physically possible for them to do so." This is not due to the influence of women's tradition (as they thought) but to the political condition of the province which made a consummated marriage the only safeguard of women's honour. However that may be, much water has flowed under the bridge since 1901, and the fact that she (Miss Mayo) had to go to a hospital which has a monopoly of such cases in the N. E. of India, and could get nothing more up-to-date than forty years ago (she has quoted a dozen cases that were collected in 1891) shows, if it shows anything at all, that such cases are few and far between" (S. S. D. in the Nation and Athenaeum of August, 6). Owing to the horrible case of a child-wife the age of consent was raised from 10 to 12, but it noted, on strong pressure from and with the vigorous support of the Indian reformers, Malabar, Bhandarkar, Banade, Telang and Chandavarkar, Lord Laura- dowee in his speech in the Indian Legislative Council on the Bill generously acknowledged that Government had been greatly encouraged by the vigorous support accorded by these leaders to the new legislation. These men, it may be further noted, gave their support on the express ground that the pre-puberty consummation was against the letter and spirit of the authoritative Hindu code. Telang and Bhandarkar were eminent Sanskritists, and Banade was an acknowledged master of Hindu law. It is also fair to the opposition, which was led by Thak, who was also an eminent Sanskritist, to state that the main ground of it was that an alien Government had no right to interfere with the socioreligious life of the people, and that the Police was so ignorant and corrupt that, especially in the rural areas, there was serious danger of oppression and blackmail if it was given power to interfere with the domestic life of the people. The enlargement of the legislature, with an elected Indian majority, has to a large extent met these objections and one of the most gratifying features of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms is the proportionately larger amount of social legislation introduced or passed during the last six years than during the half century previous to them. The age of consent was raised two years ago to 13 in the case of marriage. There is a strong feeling that this is not enough, and the All-India Women's Conference has taken upon itself the task of organizing public opinion in support of Sir Hari Singh Gour's Bill to raise it to 14, which is the limit to which it has been raised as against strangers. The public conscience has been aroused, notwithstanding the Indian's manner of coming into the world, and the last traces of the evil will soon disappear wherever it exists. There can be no more conclusive proof of the fact, illustrated by the history of other lands, that political progress helps forward social reform. It is our considered opinion that the acceleration of self-government in India will accelerate the pace of social progress, and that without it social stagnation is not a distant possibility.
THE LATE MR. JUSTICE K. T. TELANG.

His Historical Knowledge.

When writing of Mr. Telang's career as a scholar, we are perhaps reminded of his undertaking to write the history of the Marathas which in the words of Mr. Ranade would have formed "the summum bonum of his brilliant career." Creel death snatched him away from us leaving the undertaking unfinished. Mr. Telang possessed all the qualifications necessary for a historian. He had a sound comparative knowledge of the histories of other countries to ensure a wide outlook. He had the careful diligence and discriminating ability to sift facts. The supreme power of judgment was his incomparable natural gift. And lastly he had sympathy without bias, the power of adequate appreciation without exaggeration. To these qualifications has to be added the inestimable gift of analysis which in the supreme test of a historian and which with Mr. Telang formed a speciality. A history of the Marathas coming from so well-equipped a man as Mr. Telang was, would have remained with us the most authoritative piece of historic writing on the subject. Mr. Ranade has indeed given us a good introduction in his excellent little volume and in some of his papers he seems to have been obsessed by his philosophy. Mr. Ranade had incomparable powers of synthesis. His mind ever drew towards the converging point. Thus he came to attach a wholly exaggerated importance to the influence of saints in Maratha history. Mr. Telang, on the other hand, was if anything analytical. Abstract theory had very little influence on his thinking. He never seemed to have considered it his business to justify, to defend or to refute. He would apply his solvent of criticism and state the results of his analysis.

There is one public aspect of Mr. Telang's scholarship which I should particularly like to mention here. The prevailing notion in the West in Mr. Telang's days was that Indian intellect whatever its ancient past, had reached so low a level, that it could never compete with the intellect of the West. Especially in the matter of scholarship and research, the West claimed to possess a monopoly. The studies and researches of men like Mr. Telang and Dr. Bhaudkar and their acknowledged position as scholars by no means inferior to the best scholars in the West dispelled the notion about the incompetence of Indian intellect and to that extent raised India in the estimation of the world. Apart from the direct service Mr. Telang rendered to his country by his public activities which I shall presently recount, if Mr. Telang were a scholar alone and no other, his scholarship in itself, with its high quality admitted throughout the world, must have been instrumental in no small degree in effecting a material change in the mental attitude of the West towards India. No doubt, the influence of such factors works silently, nevertheless positively.

As an Educator.

Let me now turn to the work of Mr. Telang as an educationist and its impress on the educational system of the day. A shrewd critic, the late Rao Bahadur G. V. Joshi in one of his essays spoke of Mr. Telang as the greatest educationist on this side of India. If we care to examine the records of the University of Bombay and the proceedings of the Senate during Mr. Telang's life time, the one thing that impresses us more than any other is the almost complete domination of the Senate by Mr. Telang's personality, intellect and knowledge. His hand is seen unmistakably in every department of University activity. Whether in devising the courses of study or arranging the curricula, the master-mind steered in the best educational thought of the day, held its sway. That these courses continued for a long number of years without any material changes, is in itself their best justification, and I am not sure that the recent changes are at all for the better. The present-day graduates, however, may remember with gratitude that they owe to Mr. Telang the extension of the University course from three to four years with a welcome intermediate relief in the pressure of their studies. One question of a controversial nature, then as it is today, for which Mr. Telang will be remembered, was as regards the compulsory study of Sanskrit (Classical language) by the students in their University course. "If I were to choose between the mother and daughter, I would choose the mother and not the daughter." That was Mr. Telang's attitude towards the vernaculars and this in spite of the fact that he considered it a part of an educated man's duty to develop and promote vernacular (Marathi) literature, and himself set an example. It seemed to him that in a scheme of liberal education, the culture content of Sanskrit far outweighed in value the practical utility of the vernacular.

Mr. Telang's position however as an educationist of all-India repute was due principally to the important ministe of dissent which he wrote as member of the Education Committee of 1892, a ministe which is perhaps more often quoted by persons interested in Indian education than any other educational document excepting of course the despatch of 1854. In this minute of dissent, while unceasingly accepting the need for mass education, Mr. Telang pleaded for full Government support to higher education as well, and deprecated the idea of Government leaving the latter to private efforts entirely. In this respect he supported the filtration theory and quoted Mr. Matthew Arnold with effect. It was quite in the course of things that these unceasing educational labours and the scholarship which brought honour and prominence to his University in the eyes of the world, should have been crowned with the bestowal of the Vice Chancellor's gown, an honour then unique to an Indian, yet also, of too short duration to the first recipient.
HIS PART IN PUBLIC LIFE.

Having now examined his work as a scholar and as an educationalist, I pass on to his activities in the more extended sphere of public life where his studies in economics and politics and the gift of lucid speech could not but be of inestimable value. In the economics, as well as in the political sphere, Mr. Telang gave his attention to the consideration of national problems from his very early days and soon came to be recognized as the intellectual force, the power house behind the national movement. Regarding his paper on 'Free trade and Protection' which he read before the Sassoon Mechanics' Institute when he was 27 years old, and which formed perhaps the earliest piece of sound criticism on an Indian economic question, Sir Dinshaw Wacha well observes: — "On my part, I have not known that any accomplished Indian, in any other part of the country since 1877, has written on such a controversial economic subject with such vigour, such force and such lucidity as Mr. Telang at that age". I have been told and the fact seems to have been admitted by Mr. Ramade, that the arguments and sentiments expressed in this paper of Mr. Telang went a considerable way in framing and shaping the ideas of Mr. Ramade, himself, which later, i.e. in 1893 found their philosophic expression and exposition in his celebrated paper on "Indian Political Economy". Mr. Telang's work in the economic sphere did not, however, end with intellectual performances like this. It is a matter of common knowledge that he took a leading part in the foundation of the V. J. Technical Institute which, to quote again Sir Dinshaw Wacha, was the copingsone of all his public activities.

AS A SOCIAL REFORMER.

In social reform again, Mr. Telang was one of the first to recognize the need of active work and took a leading part in all such social reform organizations. In Female education, he recognized, was the principal means to this end. Education of public opinion was another. To both these means he gave his first-hand attention. The series of lectures he delivered in Marathi on the relation between Shastra and custom can still be read with interest and for instruction. Mr. Telang was not formed in the heroic mould. He was not the stern fibre that braved persecution and sought martyrdom. Nobody recognised more than himself, however, the abiding influence of personal example. He could even admire Mr. Agarkar's hall and storm and Mr. Malabar's vehement denouncements. Yet he must have somehow felt that before giving fight, attempts should be made to create the proper atmosphere and win over Hindu Society by gentle persuasion. He later realised the futility of these means in certain spheres, and came to hold the view which he fully elucidated in his writings on the Age of Consent Bill, that even gentle coercion through legislation may be adopted with advantage within certain limits.

It is customary to point out, whenever we have occasion to speak of social reform in India, that Mr. Telang fell short of his preachings and gave away his daughter in marriage at an early age. Let it be said at once that there is neither justification nor defence for Mr. Telang's action. A weakness is a weakness and none deplored it more than himself. Let us all remember at the same time that this weakness sprang from his virtue of goodness, from an anxious desire to inflict pain on himself rather than to inflict pain on his nearest and dearest relations. And is it not some such weakness necessary to give the lovely shade to an otherwise altogether bright picture? Queen Guinevere loved not King Arthur, because she complained "he is all fault that hath no fault at all."

HINDU WOMEN AND THE SPECIAL MARRIAGE ACT.

[As Amended in 1923.]

(6) By Mr. Manecklal Vakil, M.A., LL.B., F.S.S.)

The laws generally learn rules of law affecting their everyday relations in life from the prevalent conduct as they observe it amongst their neighbours. Hindu women, (6) in India include in this expression the Hindu proper, the Jain, the Sikh and the Buddhist women, as they are all affected by the law under consideration and as the philosophy of these religions have a common historical sub-stratum and a common outlook on life in general, generally have a notion of Hindu Law as practised amongst their neighbours in the different parts of India. But few, even of the educated Hindu women or perhaps men know that they have now a choice to have their marriages performed by registration under the Act or, by the usual Hindu religious rites. Much less do they know the exact change of legal status which the Special Marriage Act of 1923 confers upon Hindu women who marry by registration. They hardly know that they can do so without giving up their religion and with a man of their own caste. Even the English-knowing Hindu fathers may not be yet aware that such an option does exist or that marriage by registration confers a different status on their daughters. Without giving up their religion or their caste the Hindus can have even an ordinary marriage performed by registration. Perhaps the educated undergraduates, young men and women, do not know the implications of such a marriage.

Marriage by registration involves strict legal monogamy. That is to say a husband cannot have more than one wife during the subsisting marriage. He cannot marry another wife even by changing his religion, if he is once married by registration. For instance, a Hindu, once married to a Hindu woman by registration, cannot take another wife during the subsisting marriage, even if he subsequently leaves his caste or renounces his religion. Legal monogamy is further strengthened by the fact that divorce can be obtained either by husband or wife under certain specified conditions including conjugal infidelity or adultery.

Of course, the Indian Divorce Act of 1860 is not sufficiently liberal and is an anachronism in the

The right to claim damages against a corespondent in cases of adultery under the existing Law, is a barbaric vestige of the view that a wife was the property of the husband and that the husband could be compensated by money for the loss of his wife's company. Even the Law of Damages for breach of a betrothal is reminiscent of a similar idea. The educated young couples should keep themselves free by not announcing a formal betrothal and keep quiet the scandalising tongues of all ill-informed neighbours or friends by having free social intercourse with several persons of the other sex during the adolescent period of courtship so as to better enable them to make a proper choice.

The existing Act may, however, be amended later, as required, by making divorce possible by the mere agreement of parties to a marriage, as has been customary among some of the Hindu castes. The amending bill must contain provisions for the minor children of a marriage, if any. Divorces would ordinarily take place between childless young couples only to correct errors of selection.

Divorce implies freedom to marry again and widows may do so in the same manner. This liberty to marry again is merely permissive and the common prejudice against remarriage may be respected by those who wish to stick to their own views. The freedom to remarry does not imply that the women must do so. They may not marry again if they do not want to.

Marriage by registration also provides for a minimum age limit. A male must have completed 18 years and the woman 14 years and no Hindu father could marry his child by registration below these limits. No consent of the guardian is however necessary if the person who wishes to marry has completed the age of 21 years. These provisions as to age render child marriages impossible and make love marriages possible without any restriction from the guardian after the age of 21.

A Hindu woman married according to Hindu rites has very limited interests in the property of her husband's ancestors and in that of her husband. If the husband belongs to a joint family and unfortunately dies, the widow gets maintenance and is dependent upon the husband's relations for the support and protection. Even if the husband is separated and has no other companions with him at the time of his death, the widow gets only a life interest in the property of the husband and can use the income only, unless this last happens to be insufficient for her ordinary maintenance. If the husband has left soon, she gets only maintenance, whether he was joint or separated and all the property at once becomes the property of the sons.

If a Hindu woman marries by registration she at once becomes the mistress of her husband's household and the very fact of her marriage by registration invalidates the partition and separation of the couple from the members of the joint family. In the case of the families having an ancestral coparcenary business, such a marriage by registration may involve commercial inconvenience and such families may not resort to the formal marriage by registration. But in the case of the majority of the educated Hindu families in towns so much consideration exists and the Hindu couple will certainly prefer marriage by registration and a separate household to that of the father's family. The Hindu wife of an educated husband will have better scope to develop her individuality under the sole influence of her husband and will not be cramped by the social prejudices of a preceding generation. An educated wife will certainly desire such a free atmosphere to a greater extent than the average Hindu wife.

If a Hindu woman married by registration becomes a widow, she does not merely get a life interest or maintenance, she is entitled to a share with all her children of both sexes, sons or daughters, and if there is no issue she is entitled to the whole of the husband's estate. This right of succession is, however, limited by the husband's right to make a will and dispose of his property as he likes without leaving anything to the widow or to the children. This anomalous domination of the husband in the existing state of law in almost all countries of the world and can be corrected only when women, as a body, will insist upon sharing the husband's income with the social, if and when may, in a certain agreed proportion before entering into marriage with a corresponding liability to meet the current expenses of the household and the minor children. Women have not yet become conscious enough in a body to realise their economic dependence upon the men of their love and in legislatures controlled by men such a marriage settlement is not likely to be made compulsory by law. But educated women may, if they choose, insist upon such an agreement before marriage so that they may have not merely economic independence but also a guarantee of their not being cut off without any provision by a husband willing away the entire property. Her economic independence will also secure real love and a better attention from her husband than what may be obtainable under the domination of one partner alone.

The existing practice of dower and dowries do not secure sufficient provisions for the wife or the settlements on the couple. These are immediate gifts and cannot involve large amounts of capital ordinarily. But in any case the practice of continuing a Hindu wife dependent on her parents for subsequent periodic allowances is wrong in principle as keeping the women dependent on two rulers—the husband and the father.

Above all, the Act provides also that no right of inheritance to other relations will be forfeited by a person marrying by registration. Thus the parties may remain Hindus by religion, may retain their cases by marrying within it and may also retain their rights of succession to other relations in accordance with the law governing the succession to such relations. The above remarks make it clear to every educated Hindu that all the points that the social reformers were striving at for a reform in the marriage relations in the past 50 years in India, have now been provided for by legislation, and it is now up to the educated Hindu to secure a greater freedom and a higher economic status to women by encouraging marriage by registration as far as possible. To meet the religious susceptibilities of some people they may go even to the length of having the marriage first registered and then the solemnities of a marriage may be impressed on the triple by its being solemnised in accordance with their religious beliefs by religious rites.
Under the auspices of South India Branch of the Arya Samaj and the Indian Ladies’ Samaj, a public meeting of ladies was held on the 20th August, at 57, Anna Pillai Street, to consider some of the grievances of women. Sir C. Sankaran Nair presided.

Welcome to President.

In welcoming the President, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi said—

'It is with great pleasure and pride that I propose to the chair Sir Sankaran Nair, the well-known champion of the women’s causes, when we, the children of his hopes—I mean the modern women of India—have come forward to give expression to our many wants and grievances, and to demand with no uncertain voice our right and proper place in society, nay, have come forward to claim freedom, equality and the enaction of just and equal laws for both sexes—because, as we all know, “freedom, education and responsibility evoke all that is best in the individual, regardless of sex.” We welcome you here as one of those rare great men, who having been touched to the quick by the wrongs and insults inflicted upon the weaker sex, have been willing, not only to accord them equal opportunities of learning and equal political rights, but also have striven with all their might to achieve those privileges for us.

Homage to Ram Mohan.

Standing here in this hall of the Southern India Brahmo Samaj, we, women, cannot but be reminded of its founder, that great patriot and reformer Raja Ram Mohan Roy, the Avatar and the father of modern India, we cannot but be reminded of his many labours for the amelioration of the women’s condition in this land. In this solemn and wonderful moment, the free and emancipated women of India pay our grateful and respectful homage to that great, good and noble Indian, whose just and generous nature naturally rebelled against the many injustices and acts of oppression done to our sex in those dark days and who in spite of strong and violent opposition from his orthodox and superstitious countrymen, single handed, has won many a victory for us. The spirit of the Raja, if there be one, will surely rejoice at our success to-day and advancement. So also your joy must be great indeed at the very rapid progress of the women’s movement in this country and at the sight of many of your daughters assembled here to-day who are taking their rightful place in the various public bodies as members of Councils, of Municipalities, District Boards, as Honorary Magistrates, members of the Syndicate and the Senate, since your appeal on our behalf to our countrymen at the Belgaum Social Reform Conference in the year 1924.

Victory not Complete.

No doubt we are proud of our success. We are grateful for the many concessions that have been granted to us of late, but still the victory is not complete. As you yourself have expressed at the Convocation Address to the women graduates recently held at Bombay, we, women of India, particularly Hindu women, have yet to sweep away all those ancient superstitions, customs and laws that hamper women’s free development. This is an hourly task for all of us. So stubbornly are those superstitions rooted in daily life—until they are gone we do not know to what heights we may not rise. In such an uphill task, we do need the active support, co-operation and sympathy of such great men like yourself and others of your mould.

A Public Danger.

Sir C. Sankaran Nair in his presidential speech said:—

“My remarks as the President of this meeting will be very few, because as to the two subjects which I find in the papers, i.e., dedication of young girls to temples to lead afterwards a life of shame and as to the position of women generally, you know much better than I do myself, and you can speak with effect. You know the evils of the dedication and you know the evils of the social system, because mainly it is you who suffer from it, and therefore I shall take the liberty to make my remarks as few as possible. The movement to get rid of the dedication of young girls to temples has the full sympathy of all who have thought about it and of all those who take any interest in this sort of question. When a child is not conscious or able to choose for herself as to her future, and when she is not armed to think for herself she is dedicated practically to life of infamy. Sometimes the profits that accrue from the trade influences her dedication. And then we know the great evil when she comes of age. She cannot choose to marry because very few will be found willing to marry a girl so dedicated. She cannot follow any honourable occupation, because very few would be found willing to find an honourable occupation to enable her to earn her living. I need not dwell upon the other evil aspects of the case because you all know it. It is seldom that a girl like her in later life escapes some loathsome disease. She more often than not contracts it and she in fact passes it on to others. She thus becomes a public danger as well.

The Revolt of Women.

“Naturally, others outside India often ask questions. "How do you tolerate these things? Why is it that it is not swept away from the face of the earth?" One reason is our people are conservative and when they are accustomed to do a thing, they think it is an ordinary incident of life. Another reason is that men do not like to abolish it, because dedicating a woman to temple life is really dedication or consecration of woman to man’s lust, and there were many men in ancient days and even now who do not like to see abolished a system from which they themselves think they derive some pleasure. Another reason is this: If you interfere with this dedication of women to temples, you will be interfering with the religion of the Hindus.‘ Now it is all gone. From the English educated few, from the band of humanitarians it has gone into the masses. I doubt whether there is any considerable body of men who defend it in the name of religion, they know that religion has very little chance of survival in these days. Again if they defend it, they will be denounced as inhuman beings, as men unfit to be entrusted with any power over others, as men who are only fit to be slaves of others, because they cannot be entrusted with power. It is due to the revolt of women all over the world. All over the world they have become conscious of, what they consider and rightly so, the ill-treatment at the hands of men. They have taken the matter into their own hands and are claiming equal rights for women in order to redress their grievances. You have got women cabinet members in Turkey, women leaders of rebellions in China and Russia. If you want all these grievances to be redressed you will have to fight.

ECONOMIC INDEPENDENCE.

"One thing that you must seek is to attain absolute economic independence, just in the same way as men have. At present you know that our old Hindu Sastras say that woman is not fit for Independence. The laws of inheritance have to be altered. Women must be placed on the same footing as men for purposes of inheritance. There is no reason why a son alone should be the heir and why a daughter should not be. If you want economic independence, you will have to get political independence. You know what is being done in Turkey, in China and Germany. But in Madras you have a Lady Deputy President, and I do not despair of the women of the South. Whenever you have a grievance, put it in all parts of the world and you will achieve success much earlier that you can otherwise do. You must have a special section for propaganda work and without propaganda you can never succeed."

WOMEN’S EDUCATION.

Mrs. Chathopadhyaya then spoke. In the course of her speech she referred to the question of the education of women. The education they have been receiving in the past has been a failure. The Special Officer deputed to examine the question of primary education had devoted much attention to the education of girls which had been neglected. But no Special Officer could adequately tackle the problem. There must be a permanent Board of Women’s Education.

Referring to the question of Devadasis she condemned it very strongly. She could not understand how a religion could set its seal on immorality. Indians, she said, were shocked when a Miss Mayo wrote a book but they do little to get rid of such pernicious customs. The question of dedication of minor girls was closely associated with the Age of Consent Bill to be introduced in the Assembly. Girls of 11 or 12 are married and soon after their husbands demand that the girls should be sent to them, the parents of the girls are not courageous enough to refuse, for if they do the bridegroom threatens to marry another girl and to India’s shame it must be confessed there were people willing to give their daughters in marriage to this same man. All this, she urges, must go and she hoped the Age of Consent Bill, the resolution of Mr. V. Ramaswami in the Council of State against the dedication of girls and the resolution of Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi in the local Legislative Council would all be passed.

FIGHT FOR EQUAL STATUS.

Mrs. Lakshmi Pillai said that in the last few years the cause of women in India had made great progress and if the women’s cause was to be properly vindicated, it could not be done without their achieving economic independence and equal status with men politically and socially. She therefore hoped that with the help of leaders like their Chairman the movement would succeed in the end.

COMMERCIALISED VICE.

Mrs. Cousins who next spoke referred to the pernicious customs of dedicating girls and drew a lurid picture of the after life of the girls so dedicated. She had seen instances when most of these girls were selling themselves to man’s lust in licensed houses. All this was due to wrong ideas. The League of Nations at Geneva had set afoot a scheme to abolish these licensed houses and rectify commercialised vice. She hoped the spirit of Raja Ram Mohan Roy, who championed the widow’s cause by abolishing suttee, and the spirit of the high spirited Khurshid Babadur Singh of Calcutta, who was prepared to lay down his life as a protest against traffic in women of his country, would guide them towards achieving their goal. But in India more dangerous than this commercialised vice was the "sacred" vice in the institution of the Devadasi. Was it therefore, any wonder that foreigners blushed with shame when they looked at the future of India? India, they think, to be the leader of the spiritual world and the house of all religions, but in Hinduism there were great defects which required drastic remedies. There can be only one standard for society, and that is Laws—"the standard of purity, charity and self-control.

Sir C. Sankaran Nair in bringing the meeting to a close urged the ladies to devote themselves to organise propaganda as a means to success.

With a vote of thanks proposed by Mrs. Muthulakshmi Reddi the meeting came to a close. —Swarajya, Madras.

EGYPT’S IRREPARABLE LOSS.

By the death of Zaghlul Pasha Egypt has suffered an irreparable loss. Zaghlul was born in 1850 and educated at the famous University of Cairo—El-Azhar. His association in 1880 with the Arabi rebellion and consequent internment gave a decisive turn to his life. After his release he became a dominating figure in Egyptian politics. He saved ample time from his professional pre-occupations to carry the message of Nationalism to the "Fallah", the backbone of Egypt. After the termination of the War, Zaghlul initiated a hurricane movement of Independence, taking his stand on the principle of self-determination so loudly professed by the victorious Allies. The British Imperialists removed the thorn from his side by deporting him to Malta. His removal was followed by a violent agitation throughout Egypt that the system of British overlordship rocked to its foundations. Egypt at last won back her hero, who utilised the power she had by now evolved, in further urging her to come into her own. So he was again spirited away in 1921. But in thus risking and sacrificing his physical freedom over and over again, Zaghlul was steadily recovering freedom for his country. Almost immediately after his release in 1923, his thumping triumph at the polls and his subsequent election as Premier established his claims beyond doubt, to the title of Egypt’s uncrowned king. He still continued to be the accredited leader of the Nationalists. He held the helm firmly and steered the Nationalist ark, with remarkable vigilance, in the turbulent waters of Egyptian politics. Zaghlul’s extra- ordinarily was tempered by his inherent sobriety; he knew the art of handling the most baffling situation effectively. The way he acted during the crisis created by Sir Lee Stack’s murder, will be remembered as an abiding proof of his supreme statesmanship. He allowed his ministry to dissolve. He undertook the better part of it himself and he essayed on the unruly elements in the party under his control. He had an incessantly tiring life of it, all his life. Like our own Desabandhu he lived for his country and died for his country.—The Tribune, Lahore.
THE BRAHMO SAMAJ, RAJAHMUNDRY.

The anniversary day of the Brahmo Samaj and of the late Ananda Mohan Bose was celebrated by the Brahmo Pradhana Samaj, Rajahmundry, on the 20th August 1927, with great earnestness. The day of the Utsav was opened by Naga-Sankirtan at 4 a.m. Divine service was conducted in the Pradhana Hall by K. Hanumantha Rao Garu, in the morning. A public meeting was held at 5 p.m. in the Veerasingam’s Theistic High School, under the presidency of Mr. V. P. Raju, B.A., of Cocconda, when Mrs. T. Prakasa Raidu, M.A., of Ananda Niketan and C. H. Lakshmi-Narsimhas, the blind poet of Andra-repute delivered interesting speeches. Mr. T. Prakasa Raidu spoke at length about the life-work of A. M. Bose and the impressions left by his life on the minds of time. The death of A. M. Bose not only removed an outstanding personality of Indian life and thought but the Brahmo Community in particular, and the religious world as a whole have suffered a great loss. All public movements, social, moral, educational, philanthropic and political, found in him, an earnest and unwearyed worker. An eminent scholar, a great worker, a man of deep moral earnestness and profound, spiritual, experience and a political of Mahatma Gandhi’s type who sees religion and God in every piece of work he does was Ananda Mohan Bose. He lived and died for humanity and God—the mission of every life on earth.

The blind poet gave a stirring speech in his usual fluency about the work and history of the Brahmo Samaj in brief and how it revived the Brahmopasana (spiritual worship). In the course of his lecture, he said that ninety nine years ago, when in our country, religion diverged from the strait paths of truth and righteousness, when religion merged into all sorts of obnoxious customs leading to crime and at a time, when the scriptures were forgotten and thrown open to the convenience of priest craft, Rajah Ram Mohan Roy appeared on the scene as a saviour of the situation. He brought to the peoples’ vision that religion is not confined by any limitations but is universal. It has not depended for its inspiration on any particular revelation or scriptures or prophets but is broad based on the eternal truths that the human mind has everywhere and at all times realised as its own foundation and essence. The Raja studied all the great scriptures in their originals, grasped the essence therein, took out the fundamentals and placed them for the people of his country. He revived again the deep buried seeds of ancient spiritual worship and planted them a second time. He preached the idea of brother-hood for the whole mankind under the leadership of God and set in the reign of love as the basis of religion. It was on this solid ground, the Rishis of old as well as the greatest teachers have stood and preached. Thus, the Brahmo Samaj is the most rightful heir to the spiritual heritage of ancient India.

The president in his remarks observed as follows: Man lives upon earth in accordance with the will of God. His life is something very real, indeed of high worth and its duties have their own significance. In the pursuit of passions, people forget their mission in life, lose their goal and end their career in strife and war, Thus the world is torn asunder by constant conflicts. Truly speaking there is no material welfare apart from the spiritual good of man. Here is man for active life and effort, for awakening himself to the spiritual reality that underlies all material existences. (Brahmo Samaj has been endeavouring towards this direction with an aim to reconcile the seeming contradictions of matter and spirit.) Love is the law of religion and it supports, sustains and inspires life. Love is the music of life, it sweetens and sanctifies life. The whole universe is upheld by the principle of love. Therefore we are tied with each other as brothers and sisters. This is the essential truth on which a family, community or a country stands. The absence of that love has wrought much havoc resulting in persecution and loss of human life in the Christian world from the first chapter of the human history. Communal strife, class hatred in the name of religion and God are the passing events of the present day Indian life. The president concluded that unity is the only panacea for the national regeneration of India and that it can be attained by love and brotherhood. He, therefore, appealed that all the national forces now at work, should be directed towards the attainment of unity by spiritual affinity, love and brotherhood and appealed to all to join hands under the banner of Brahma Samaj. The meeting then terminated. The next morning (Sunday) Divine Service was conducted by V. P. Raju Garu, who by his erudition and scholarship gave us a very lucid and learned discourse on “spiritual worship” for over two hours. In the afternoon, members and sympathisers of the Pradhana Samaj were gathered in the Veerasingam’s Ananda gardens and spent a few hours in conversational talks. Light refreshments were served and the gathering dispersed by a closing prayer.

Kamala Lecturer For 1927: Mrs. Sarojini Naidu was appointed the Kamala lecturer for 1927, at a meeting of the Calcutta University Senate held on the 27th August. The subject of her lecture will be “Ideals of Indian Womanhood”—In moving the resolution to appoint Mrs. Sarojini Naidu as Kamala Lecturer for 1927 Sir Niral Sirkar said that it would be difficult to find a more competent exponent of the ideals of Indian womanhood than Mrs. Naidu. In fact it was desirable, having regard to the circumstances prevailing outside India, that the ideals of Indian womanhood should be clearly expounded. If not for defence of India, but at least for the elucidation of the world outside and it might be expected of Mrs. Naidu that she would do full justice to the subject. For various other reasons also, it was necessary that this matter should be fully considered from other points of view, especially on account of the changing circumstances to which India was being subjected at the present moment. There was an influx of ideas and ideals from foreign lands and how far these were acceptable to them without impairing the integrity of their nationalistic ideals was a matter which was also to be threshed out. They thought that Mrs. Naidu would be the fit and proper person to deal with this subject from all points of view and Sir Niralatn knew that the Calcutta University would deserve the felicitation of all countries in making this appointment.
NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Lady Nominated a Fellow: Miss Shailabala Das, daughter of Mr. Madasudan Das, C.I.E., ex-Minister of Bihar and Orissa, has been nominated a Fellow of the Patna University. This is the second occasion in the history of the province that a lady has been nominated a Fellow. Miss Das is also the first lady honorary magistrate and municipal commissioner in the province.

Mr. Andrews among Students: Mr. C. P. Andrews paid a special visit to the Ramnahan Roy High School on the 24th August, at the time of prayers and took part with them in their opening religious ceremony. At the end of his visit he expressed himself as delighted with all that he had seen and heard and especially at the encouragement of co-education in the School which had reminded him of their own ideal at Rabindranath Tagore's Asram at Santiniketan.

Sir Gangâ Râm Trust Society: "The Founder Number" of W. W. Mehta's course in memory of its founder, late Sir Gangâ Ram, K.C.I.E., M.Y.O., M.B., is notified to appear on 8ist August. It will contain a portrait of Sir Gangâ Ram (as dead), tributes paid to him by foreign press, tributes from his country men and Government officials, messages of sympathy from Lords, Knights and European and Indian gentry, resolutions passed by several condolence meetings, important correspondence during his life time, the bequest to the Trust from with he was honoured by the Punjab, and much more matter. Those desirous of getting a copy may send postage worth As. 4 to the Manager, Widows' Causes, P. O., Box No. 115, Lahore.

Dramatic Entertainment at Santa Cruz: The dramatic entertainment organised by the Santa-Cruz Stree Samaj in aid of the Gujerat Relief Fund provided some merriment to the large gathering of men and women present on the occasion on the 19th August. The performance opened with a beautiful though pathetic scene depicting the tragic fate of India in her modern civilization. Indra was seen engaged in a discussion with Vandevi about the conditions prevailing in the country. Vandevi told a tale about the fall of Indian civilization. He calls members of various professions to give their record of activities on the Indra. All of them are very disgraceful story to tell Indra who was grieved at the downfall of such a mighty civilization. He asked Vandevi for a request and the latter after promptly taunting Indra for his indecision in the past begs of him to reinstate the former state of things in the country. The request was granted, Miss Kapila Khandwalla and Miss Shanabil Ideal deserve special credit for the success of the whole entertainment. The last piece the "Dumb Wife" set the audience to roar of laughter by the perfect comic effect produced by Mr. Mehta in the role of the Parsi Judge and Mr. Sorejai Sarvabha Batwala as the wife. The entertainment reflected real credit on the part of the organisers who from time to time rendered personal service to the suffering and the distressed. Mrs. Sarojini Naidu and Mr. T. Tagore are in the collection of the day which amount will be handed over to the Flood Relief.

Orissa Flood Relief: Over the signatures of Pandit Mahavir Mohan Malaviya, Mr. B. S. Iyengar, Mr. Rekha, Mr. A. N. Dutt, Mr. Jayakar, Mr. Phadke, Dr. Soonja, Mr. Arthur Moore, Mr. Shervani, Moula Mohand Yakeb, Mr. Gowarri Mr. B. Das and Pandit Nilkanta Das (last two gentlemen's secretaries the following appeal has been issued for Orissa Flood Relief Fund——The harrowing tales of distress that are all coming in from the flood-stricken tracts of Orissa call for prompt and generous action on the part of the public spirited and philanthropic citizens of every community and every province of India. It is understood that nearly 70,000 houses have been twice washed away within the course of three weeks and about three, to four lakhs of people have been rendered homeless and destitute. When it is remembered that Orissa is one of the poorest provinces and the distress that has been caused by these unprecedented floods is wide-spread and acute, the duty of other provinces towards Orissa will we feel sure, be fully realised and amply discharged. The Indian Legislative Assembly have also done an appeal to the Government and to the people in respect of the distress in Orissa and in respect of Gujarat and Sindh. A special appeal has become necessary in respect of Orissa as she cannot help herself and requires outside support and as such must be earmarked for relief in Orissa. The distress in Orissa is so terrible that we feel confident that all those to whom our appeal is addressed will realise that it requires national efforts to alleviate it. All donations should be sent direct to Pandit Gopabandhu Das, President, Uthral Congress Committee, Cuttack (Orissa) or to Lala Lejum, S.I.L. (or 11 Court Street, Lahore) who has kindly consented to be the treasurer of the fund.

Vol. XXXVIII. BOMBAY—SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1927 No 2

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice; I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not blame—my country owes aable nation to the people of India, in whom the experiment of a republic is being made. In every situation, his estimate of the motives, of which interest and of truth, is a prerogative of the American Missionaries. Similarly Union Conference Appeal. The Immolation of Shampاشа Vali. Bandra’s Madonnas. News of the Week.

NOTES

Miss Katherine Mayo and Christian Missionaries: In some criticisms of Miss Katherine Mayo's Mother India we have seen, there is the suggestion that her book owed some part of its inspiration to Christian missionaries in India. Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal in an article contributed to The Forward of the 6th instant writes: "I have not seen Miss Mayo's book." I casually glanced over extracts from it published in the papers. I have no desire to read it even if I should find a copy. It is evidently a missionary publication, ignorant, unimaginative, written with the object of getting subscriptions for missionary enterprise for the salvation of the Heathen." It is a pity that a distinguished publicist, like Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal, should have publicly made an imputation against Christian missionaries without making sure of his ground. He would be surprised to know, we are sure, that Miss Katherine Mayo actually charges Christian missionaries with suppressing the truth from within, of such immorality and unholiness as the principle ingredients. She writes: "Searching Missionaries' reports for light out of their long experience, one finds neat rows of dots, marking the sites of the licentious. The missionaries are thinking, first, of the deceives at home when his money comes, and on whose sitting-room tables his report will be laid; and, second, of the super-sensitive Indians on whose sufferance he depends for whatever measure of success he may attain. Yet, to suppress or to veil the bare truth is, in cases such as this, to belie it." (Mother India, p 64). The plain English of this is that the Christian missionary in suppressing the truth about India has two ends in view, namely, to whedle money out of the pious people in his home country for a work in this country which is largely futile and in which he owes any little success he might have attained to the suffering of the Indian obtained at the expense of truth. A more soothing, and indeed contemptuous, estimate of missionary work in India it is impossible to imagine. Mr. Pal, we are sure, will, when he reads this, make ample atonement to the Christian missionaries for his hasty inference about their complicity with Miss Mayo.

Our Long Citations: Critics of Miss Mayo’s book will do well to read the book. Unfortunately copies of it are not available. This week we did our best to get a copy for Mr. C. F. Andrews but not one could be had in the whole of Bombay city for love or money, our own copy having been sent out from England. Also the various books and reports cited in Miss Mayo’s book, such as Keyserling’s Book of Marriage, Abbe Dubois’ Hindu Manners, Customs, and Ceremonies, the various Census reports of India, and as soon as they are quoting, even at the risk of being tedious in our series of articles on Mother India, the relevant passages from these works at some length in order to minimise unconvincing appeal to our readers due to the difficulty of ready access to these works. We may add that we do not agree with the opinion expressed by the Servant of India, the Hindu and other papers, that a direct reply to Miss Mayo’s statements is unnecessary and undesirable. We do not however estimate in the least the immediate effect of the book on Indian politics or international relations. No thoughtful person who reads the book can fail to see through its propagandistic character. But there must be a detailed answer because otherwise twenty or thirty years hence Mother India will be cited, as Abbe Dubois’ book is now cited, as a work, the statements in which have never been challenged and are therefore irreproachable. We do not of course expect to reach the large circle of readers of Miss Mayo’s book in England and in America, but for the guidance of any future student of this controversy, we may mention here that flies of the Indian Social Reformer are maintained in some of the University and Mission libraries in the United States of America and we think by the British Museum in London. What is more, Indians themselves need to have their ideas clarified about the nature and extent of the social problem, the extent to which it has been solved*, and the facilities necessary for its further solution.*

The Amateur Menace: There is no sphere in which amateurism is more fraught with danger than that of social reform. An illustration of this is furnished by a book entitled Sex Problem in India from Mr. N. S. Phadke, Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy at the New College, Kolhapur. The book has a foreword by Miss Margaret Sanger, the well-known American advocate of Birth control, which it is the main object of Mr. Phadke’s book to explain. The book consists of nearly 350 pages but the author devotes nearly 160 to an exegesis on the Hindu marriage which is quite irrelevant to his main purpose. In the course of these preliminary pages he cites some statistics with a reckless disregard of both accuracy and relevancy. The most serious of these mistakes occurs on page 99 where he quotes a table from the Census Report of 1921 of statistics of married girls at specific ages. The Census table gives the figures for a thousand girls which the professor in his enthusiasm has raised to one hundred thousand! The result is when, according to the Census Table point out, every thousand girls between 5 and 10 remained unmarried. In a report of figures to the Professor's version over 900 girls were married out of every thousand in that year. In the same way, while between 10 and 15 years of age, 601 out of a thousand girls remained unmarried. Out of 1975 according to the professor 993 out of a thousand girls had been married between these ages or only seven girls were left unmarried between these ages. And because of the baby boom, this makes the following profound observation, "This will convince the reader how a deeply intense propaganda of social reform extending over no less than forty years has achieved the pitiable result of increasing the percentage of virgins of ten or more by the negligible figure of two." We quote in our leading article, the opinion of census commissioners regarding the increase of the marriage age during the last twenty years which show that the results of social reform propaganda have not been so pitiable as the professor more unfortunately think is most readers of the professor's book (which we see is well advertised) will not go to the Census Report to verify his figures, and writers like Miss Katherine Mayo will quote on the authority of this Indian Professor his grotesquely misleading figures as representing the true state of things in this country. As regards the Professor's main point about Birth Control, we think all that is necessary in India at present lead to have the age of marriage of girls raised to about 18 or 20, and to give them a sound education in the time thus saved from premature conjugal worries. The adoption of birth control methods recommended by the Professor in his book 2 will be the means and opportunities of the large majority of Indian couples. And even if this was not the case it will not mend matters but on the contrary it may prevent the progress of social reform along normal and healthy channels.

The Congress President Elect: The unanimous election of Dr. Ansari as the president of the Indian Congress Bureau by the Reception Committee in Madras is indicative of the great confidence that the nation has reposed in him as the man most fitted to give the present lead through the days to come. His one great effort not to be misunderstood and the frank expression of his views on the eve of his election have heightened the esteem in which he is held among his countrymen. Dr. Ansari's intense patriotism and his practical idealism coupled with the great influence he wields over his community should enable him to find a speedy and effective solution for the present communal tension. To weld together the various communities into a single solid nation is the supreme need of the moment. To this end Dr. Ansari's efforts will no doubt be directed. But, as Mahatma Gandhi in an address pointed out, our task is not fulfilled by electing Dr. Ansari as the president and expecting him to heal the wound of communal differences. Active co-operation is necessary if tangible good is to result from it.

Progressive Japan: The Asahi is one of the two largest newspapers in Japan with a circulation well over a million and a half. It is published simultaneously in Osaka and in Tokyo. An English supplement is published annually entitled Present-Day Japan. The annual for 1927 is admirably produced with copious illustrations, and contains articles of absorbing interest, dealing with every phase of life in Japan. It is almost an encyclopaedia of the year's work in Japan. The truth greatness of that country, as the representative of the New York Times points out in an article contributed to the Annual, consists in this that "building on a foundation as imperishable as time, Japan keeps step with progress, shaping her new materials and new methods into a magnificent structure but never forgetting that the cornerstone lies buried deep in the glorious past." Manual of Orthopedics: Messrs. Fowell & Co., have sent us a copy of their Manual of Orthopedics. Orthopedics is the science which teaches the different methods of preventing and correcting the deformities of children and adults. In India cases of Orthopedics are becoming more and more noticeable. It is a pity to see hundreds of little children, mostly among poor and middle classes suffering through the ignorance of their parents. We think the public and the medical profession ought to pay particular attention to this class of malady and do their best to relieve the sufferers from it so as to make them useful to themselves and to others in their life. During the Great War a number of British and Indian soldiers were treated in their institutions free. In instituting this branch of medical science and in affording remedy, to deserve cases free for defects which are popularly considered incurable, Dr. A. L. N. Nair has given a new lease of life to many large-hearted and wide-spread sympathy for which he is well-known in this city. The Manual will, we are sure, be found useful both by the general public and the medical profession.
"MOTHER INDIA."

Miss Katherine Mayo wisely, refrains from giving statistics regarding the prevalence of child marriage in India. She had done so, it would not have helped her to make out, as she has done, that child marriage is nearly universal among Hindus, and that later marriages are the exception. Of 10,000 persons of the female sex in the Indian population of all ages 2,575, or say, 25 per cent are between 5 and 15 years of age. (Table I, p. 132, Report of Census, 1921.) (We leave infants under 5 out of account as there are only 15 in a 1,000 returned under married or widowed, and Miss Mayo herself does not suggest that girls under 5 cohabit with their husbands and are forced into maturity.) Among Hindus the female population between 5 and 15 years is 2,534 out of 10,000 of all ages. (Table II, p. 137.) By far the largest proportion, in fact, the great majority of marriages take place when the girls are 15 years of age or above. It will thus be seen that child marriages, taking the country as a whole, or the Hindu community as a whole, form but a fraction of all marriages, and that in the large majority of cases they are mere espousals and not marriages in the sense of being the commencement of conjugal relations between the parties.

It is in this sense that most Hindus understand marriage and it is in this sense that Rabindranath Tagore was thinking of it when he wrote his paper on "The Indian Ideal of Marriage" for Count Hermann Keyserling's Book of Marriages. Tagore, in the passage quoted by Miss Katherine Mayo, was not expressing his own view (which he does at the end of his paper), but explaining his theory of how child marriage originated in India. We quote the passage as it occurs in Keyserling's book. Says Tagore: "The desire, however, against which India's opinion of the marriage problem declared war, was that of Nature's most powerful fighters; consequently, the question of how to overcome it was not an easy one. There is a particular age, said India," at which this attraction between the sexes reaches its height; so if marriage is to be regulated according to the social will, it must be finished with before such age. Hence the Indian custom of early marriage."

Miss Katherine Mayo omits the words italicised, but making out that these were Tagore's own views. "Rabindranath Tagore," she writes, "explains child marriage as a sexuality of the sublimated spirit, a conquest over sexuality and materialism won by realised intellect for the egoistic uplift of the race. His conclusion, however, logically implies the conviction, simply, that Indian women must be securely bound and delivered before their womanhood is open upon them, if they are to be kept in hand. (Here follows the quotation). In other words, a woman must be married before she knows she is one."—(Mother India, pp. 50, 61.) These inferences are Miss Mayo's not Tagore's.

"These must have been the lines of argument, in regard to married love, pursued in our country," Tagore writes. "For the purpose of marriage, spontaneous love is unreliable; its proper cultivation should yield the best results—such was the conclusion—and this cultivation should begin before marriage. Therefore, from their earliest years, the husband as an idea is held up before our girls, in verse and story, through ceremonial and worship. When at length they get this husband, he is to them not a person but a principle, like loyalty, patriotism or such other abstractions which owe their immense strength to the fact that the best part of them is our own creation and therefore part of our inner being."—(Keyserling, pp. 112, 113.)

"Hard-headed Americans"—a description which Miss Mayo approvingly adopts for her own nation—may not be able to follow the poet's abstractions. What he says here in abstract propositions was concretely put by another eminent Hindu—"he is to them not a person but a principle, like loyalty, patriotism or such other abstractions which owe their immense strength to the fact that the best part of them is our own creation and therefore part of our inner being."—(Keyserling, pp. 112, 113.)

Tagore sets forth his own ideal of marriage in five long pages at the end of his paper (Keyserling, pp. 117 at seq.) "Let me," he begins, "as an individual Indian, offer in conclusion my own personal contribution to the discussion of the marriage question generally." He holds that the marriage system all over the world—and not only in India—from the earliest ages till now is a barrier in the way of the true union of man and woman which is possible only when "society shall be able to offer a large field for the creative work of women's special faculty, without deterring the creative work in the home." This is clear enough even for the hardest-headed American to see that the poet has his own ideal of marriage which is neither that of India nor that of America. Not once but again and again Tagore, as we have seen, guards himself against being understood to identify himself with his hypothetical Indian's argument for child marriages. He does not stop there. He expressly criticises the Indian system as the prime cause of our stagnation. Tagore writes:

"In our language we call the power of woman over man by the name of shakti. Deprived of shakti the creative process in society languishes, and man, losing his vitality, becomes mechanical in his habits. In such a case, though he may still retain many a passive quality, all energy of activity forsakes him. The manner in which the relations between the sexes have been regulated in our country has left no room for the action of this Shakti; for, as we have seen, our society, with invariable stability as its objective, has been busy cultivating the passive qualities, ever in dread of individual forcefulness. Now that our country has awakened to outside influences, she finds herself powerless to resist alien aggression. She has even lost the faculty of recognizing that her weakness proceeds from within her own social system and is not the outcome of any outward accident. —(CITED.- p. 116.)

If Miss Katherine Mayo was not a purblind propagandist but an honest enquirer, and if she had had the patience to read Tagore's essay, she would have seen that he is, in fact, pressing home the same conclusion as she does, though with a larger vision and, of course, from a loftier motive. Tagore, in fact, is a thorough-going feminist. He is perhaps intellectually nearer the American view of the relation of the sexes than most Europeans. And it is this illusory Indian that Miss Katherine Mayo represents as an apostle for the most corrupt form of child marriages! If Miss Mayo was so much pressed for time to read the whole of Tagore's essay, she might have asked any one in Calcutta what the age of marriage of girls is in Tagore's own family. The answer would have made her at least hesitate before she wrote of "the robes that these facts (about child-marriage) can wear when arrayed by a poet for foreign consideration." (Mother India, p. 50.)

That she was determined to discredit the Poet is evident from the next page where she says: "Such matter as this, coming as it does from one of the most widely known of modern Indian writers, may serve to suggest that we of the material-minded West shall be misled if we too quickly accept the Oriental's phrases as making literal pictures of the daily human life of which he seems to speak." Miss Mayo makes one or two appreciative references to that "advanced Indian" Iaja Ham Mohan Roy. The poet Tagore's father, was the Raja's immediate successor in the apostolic line of the Brahmo Samaj. The religious and social principles of the Samaj are nowhere more beautifully illustrated than in the illustrious houses of Maharshi Dervendranath Tagore.

Miss Katherine Mayo—quite needlessly—puts Mahatma Gandhi in the witness-box to support her case. "Mr. Gandhi has recorded," she writes, "that he lived with his wife, as such, when he was thirteen years old, and adds that if he had not, unlike his brother in similar cases, left her presence for a certain period each day to go to school, he would either have fallen a prey to disease and premature death, or have led (thenceforth) a burdensome existence." It is forty-five years since Mahatmaji was thirteen years old, and none of his sons was married until they were much more than thirteen years of age. What has happened in Mahatmaji's family has happened in thousands of homes and his own personal experience has only a historical not to say antiquarian interest to educated Indians at the present day. This is not a mere personal opinion but borne out by Census statistics and testified to in Census reports from which we shall quote presently. Moreover in dealing with Mahatmaji's confidences we should never forget that—men who record their 'confessions' after a long interval and for the benefit of humanity, are prone, as a rule, unconsciously to intensify the shades so as to convey their message more impressively to posterity. The classic 'Confessions' of St. Augustine, Rousseau, and even of De Quincey on Opium-eating, abundantly bear out this caution. Every system has its unwritten conventions well-understood by those born and brought up in it. And the Hindu family system in its integrity was full of hedges and fences to keep the child-wife and boy-husband apart till they were of age, according to Indian ideas, to live together as man and wife. There are many men of Mahatmaji's age who can testify from personal experience to the effectiveness of these safeguards.

Miss Mayo is merely impertinent when she says that Indians are afraid to face the ugly facts in their social life. The accusation will be more true of Europeans and Americans who oblivious of the beam in their own eyes consider it their mission to point out the most in the eyes of distant Asiatics. The Hindu reform movement which has existed for nearly a hundred years has devoted its attention to the evils in Hindu Society. Child-marriage in particular has received a great deal of attention. The following passage is taken from the Census Report of 1901:

"Among the better classes a feeling is springing up against it (infant marriage)—partly because the parents dislike exposing their daughters to the risk of a long period of widowhood and partly because of the influence of Western ideas which makes them feel the impropriety of imposing upon immature girls the duties of a wife and mother. The two recent Hindu sects which appeal to the educated classes—the Brahmo Samaj in Bengal and the Arya Samaj in Upper India—lay great stress on the desirability of allowing girls to reach maturity as women. The Social Conference, which holds its meetings annually in connection with the National Congress has made the abolition of child-marriage one of the leading planks in its platform, and it is aided in its propaganda by the difficulties, already referred to, which many of the higher castes at present experience in finding husbands for their girls." (Census of India, 1901, p. 445.)

The subsequent Census Reports show that there has been a steady though gradual rise in the age of marriage. In the Census Report for 1911, Mr. Gait points out that the high castes are usually far less prone to infant marriage than the low. (Page 288). He writes, "The practice has been denounced by many social reformers since Mr. Malabari opened the campaign a quarter of a century ago; and the Social Conference which holds its meetings annually in connection with the National Congress has made the abolition of child marriage one of the leading planks in its platform. It is, as we have seen, strongly discouraged by the Brahmos in Bengal and the Aryas in Northern India. The more enlightened members of the higher castes, who do not allow widows to remarry, are beginning to realize..."

how wrong it is to expose their daughters to the risk of life-long widowhood, and a feeling against infant marriage is thus springing up amongst them." (Census of India, 1911, page 271).

Miss Mayo, we see, refers to the Census Report for 1921. But as usual she leaves out everything that does not suit her purpose. Commenting on the statistics, the Report says, "Whatever be the cause to which the change may be attributed, the figures clearly show an increase in the numbers of those in the early age-categories who are still unmarried. The movement is most marked in the Hindu community, but is shared by the other religions, the change being less noticeable among the Buddhist and Christian communities who are not addicted to early marriage. The change is most conspicuous in the age-categories 10 to 15 for women and 10 to 20 for men. Some analysis of the regional and communal figures will be of interest. In Bengal and Bihar and Orissa the rise in the age of marriage is marked. The number of females left unmarried between the ages of 10 and 15 has risen from 626 in 1921 to 668 in 1924, the increase in the age-period 15 to 20 being from 594 to 655. The case of girls is still more striking, the figures being given in the marginal tables, and for both males and females the rise during the last decade has been exceptionally high." (Census of India, 1921, page 150). It is remarked that the Baidyes and Brahmanas, the two great Hindu literary and professional castes of Bengal, take the lead in postponing the age of marriage of both boys and girls. We shall have to say something on these figures in the next article. But we ask the reader to note two points: the larger prevalence of child marriage among the less advanced than among the educated middle classes; and the striking progress in Bengal, and especially among professional classes, which Miss Mayo has marked out for special censure.

THE CROWD.

(By Dr. Clifford Marshard, Ph. D.)

One of the most interesting of social phenomena is that of the crowd. Men in their daily lives dwell together peaceably. They ride in the tram-cars with men of other races, other castes, and other communities. They jostle one another in the streets and in the cross lanes. They work side by side in the mills and in the workshops. This situation continues for days, weeks, or even years. And then one day all is changed. Men who have hitherto lived in harmony with their fellows separate into antagonistic groups. They form mobs, pour out into the streets, behave like wild beasts, and spread terror before them. We are all familiar with this situation, but few of us have made any real attempt at crowd analysis.

It was Gustave Le Bon who stimulated modern interest in the study of the crowd. Le Bon does not use "crowd" simply in the sense of a mass of people gathered together. He uses it rather in the sense of a group of people, who, under certain circumstances, exhibit unity of mind. Thus a thousand people gathered together do not of necessity constitute a psychological crowd. The psychological crowd is dependent upon the formation of the collective mind. Le Bon believed that in the crowd the individual acts in a much different manner than he would act if he were alone. Just as in chemistry certain elements unite to form a new body, so the crowd presents different characteristics from the individuals that compose it. Le Bon attributes this difference of action to the influence of the unconscious or hidden motives of individual life. Education, religion and the intellectual qualities that give man the power of civilization become weakened in the crowd and the unconscious qualities come to the top. Conscious personality disappears and the individual becomes a creature of impulse.

Prof. McDougall has endeavoured to explain the behaviour of crowds by the "sympathy" theory. According to this view each emotion may be called forth by two classes of stimuli—the object itself, and the witnessing of the emotional behaviour of another in response to this object. Thus I may hear a loud noise and experience a feeling of fear, or I may be led to fear by seeing an expression of terror upon the face of another. If several men in the crowd have upon their faces expressions of rage, according to this theory the feeling of rage will spread rapidly throughout the entire body.

Neither of the above explanations of crowd behaviour is strictly correct. As Allport has well pointed out, the individual in the crowd is not fundamentally different from the isolated individual. The man in the crowd follows a course of action that he might not follow alone. It is a course of action that he has thought about and in his solitude should have liked to have followed. In the crowd the feeling of restraint and convention is removed. The action of others breaks down my own inhibitions, and I become one of an irresponsible group. Because "everybody's doing it," I reason that I too can do it.

Prof. McDougall's theory is of real value. The facial expression of one person does stimulate another. But the point Prof. McDougall seems to miss, or at least does not make clear, is that the individual is already set for action by the very fact of his make-up or by his previous private thoughts upon the question, and hence while the emotional expressions of one individual intensify the responses of another, they do not originate these responses.

The most common stimuli to crowd action arise from the impulses most deeply rooted in the human organism, such as sex, hunger, and struggle.

What is then a rational explanation of crowd behaviour? Let us take a typical crowd situation from our everyday life. A Hindu procession plays its music before a mosque. As the procession passes the mosque, some pious Muslim shows himself to be enraged. His particular feeling may be the result of his own orthodox training, and the music may cause him genuine pain. Other men may be standing near. They note the expression of anger on the face of the pious one, although they themselves may have no religious feeling upon the matter. To them the "situation" music, presents the "response" fight, but the response is intensified by the expression of anger.
THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

[Sept. 10

and one of the questions of public discussion was the relative importance of social reform and political reform. Mr. Telang made a very notable contribution to this discussion in his well-known paper on "Should social reform precede political reform?"

Progress, according to Mr. Telang, generally goes along the line of least resistance, and he contended that as argument goes a longer way in politics than in social reform, greater energy may be expended on the political activity, while by no means neglecting the social work, and he illustrated his point by a detailed reference to the history of English resolution of 1888. For these views he earned indeed the encomiums of the Kashmir of Poona, but by many of his co-workers they were not equally relished, very probably because these views were made to be misunderstood into social inaction which Mr. Telang never meant, and even abhorred. A later critic Mr. (now Sir) V. D. Venkata Charil in his "Indian Unrest," went to the length of fixing on this paper of Mr. Telang a responsibility for the misdirection of Congress activity into political channel, instead of in the direction of social reform, which in his opinion should have been the right sphere for the Congress to begin with. Whatever might have been the state of feeling at the time when Mr. Telang expressed these views, one unconscious justification for them was offered by the Bombay Social Reformer Association itself, in its demand for larger political powers before the Montague-Chelmsford inquiry in 1917-18, on the ground that they were for the promotion of social reform itself.

It was in politics, however, that Mr. Telang's achievements shone brightest. By profession a lawyer, he seemed to be in his element here. There was one peculiarity about Mr. Telang's patriotism, namely that it had never had its root in a past or racial grievance. It was a patriotism that grew out of a healthy soil and was the product of a native large-heartedness nourished by liberal thought. There was no trace in it of heart-burning or hatred against the foreigner as such, no sense of a loss of what was once our own. In this respect his patriotism stood in contrast with that of the late Mr. Tilak or even Mr. Ranade. Mr. Ranade, he it said, was entitled to eternal credit, had the good sense and the admirable courage to rise superior to his inherited predilections and work in the enthusiasm of humanity alone. When Mr. Ranade characterised as the Telang school of thought, the practical conviction that British connection with India was a providential dispensation to weld her into a nation and teach her in due time the art of governing herself, it was not a mere empty compliment to Mr. Telang emanating from a generous heart, but there was a real meaning in it to which Mr. Ranade seems to have been alive by his intimate contact with Mr. Telang's mind.

AS A POLITICAL LEADER.

Mr. Telang's work as a political leader was manifold. In his early days he contributed frequently to the press on the public questions of the day. As a non-official member of the Bombay Council he offered sound criticisms on Government measures and helped as far as he could to shape them to people's good. The greatest constructive result of his council work was the Bombay Municipal Act which remains to this date a unique legislation of its kind in India. He and the late Sir Pherozeshah Mehta toiled day and night on this measure and by the wisdom and earnestness of their pleadings and criticism, were able to bring Government to their views.

He appeared on platforms from time to time to raise protest against iniquitous measures or to give praise where praise was due. As Secretary of the Bombay Branch of the East India Association, and later as an active worker of the Bombay Presidency Association, we have it on the evidence of Sir Du­shaw Wacha that he toiled hard and constantly, and that the papers and memorials submitted to Government by these bodies bore the impress of his Roman hand. Then again in the founding of the Congress and its organisation in Bombay he appeared to have realised his innermost wishes to the furthest of which he gave his enthusiastic energy at considerable self-sacrifice.

It is needless to say that Mr. Telang's political work ceased after his elevation to the Bench though his interest therein remained to the end of his life. Criticisms in this connection are sometimes heard from certain quarters and it is said he should have worked on like Rassae inspite of his Government service. But the difference between the two lies in this that the one set a strictly ethical standard on his conduct, while the other could not discontinue the habit of work from the very exuberance of patriotic enthusiasm.

A BORN ORATOR.

No appreciation of Mr. Telang would be complete without a reference to his qualities as a speaker. It was an apt remark of the Times of India which it made, when reviewing an address of the late Lei Mohan Ghose delivered in Bombay under the presi­dentship of Mr. Telang, that Lei Mohan Ghose was undoubtedly in the words of Mr. Telang the greatest orator in India, but with one exception and that was Mr. Telang himself. Mr. Telang had a charming personality and a sweet voice, and spoke in language of "lupped" purity that would have done credit to an English born orator. His argument was ever adequate and never excessive. It seemed one sweet flow of reason, incoit and cultured. And on great occasions, as Sir Raymond West has said, he could infuse into his addresses, an earnestness and patriotic fervour in unexpressed language not unworthy of Britain. Three of his speeches stand out most promi­nently as perfect models of what a speech should be. The first is the speech on the abolition of Cotton Import duties in which Mr. Telang develops his argument point by point and when he reaches the culmination, humourously and most effectively quotes Lord Lytton's pithy statement and language against Lord Lytton himself. The second speech is his reply to Lord Dufferin from the Congress platform wherein he skilfully utilised to his purposes the famous de­finition of a crab. And the third speech is the one on Tibet hill in which he smashes every argument in Sir FitJames Stephen, and makes a powerful appeal to the generous instincts of the British Demo­cracy. Every word of this speech is full of weighty matter. It reminds me of the pithy but famous address to the Jury by John, afterwards Lord Somers in the celebrated "Trial of the Seven Bishops" in the reign of James II so graphically described by Lord Macaulay in his history of England.

I have now examined Mr. Telang's career as a scholar, as an educaticnist and as a public man. But after all is said and done, the thing that stands out most prominently before our eyes is the man in him, his sweetness of disposition, the undisturbed good­ness of his heart, his high ethical standard of living, made him the most lovable of men. Sir Raymond speaks of him as a "meditative saint," an "evangelist," as an "apostle of progress." Few of us can realise to-day the charm and the fascination of his personal­ity. Even at this distance of time, when all his superlative qualities of head and heart stand out before our eyes, his death at the early age of 43 still seems to urge us to continue to mourn our loss.

"Mourn for the man of simplest influence,
Yet clearest of ambitions prime,
Our greatest yet with least pretence,
Rich in saving common sense,
And as the greatest only are,
In his simplicity sublime."

HINDU-PARSII MARRIAGE.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Mr. Nagin Trivedi, a Brahmin Medical student married a Parse girl at Baroda on the 17th August, according to Vedic rites. Miss Tehmina having embraced Hinduism and assumed the name Sarala.

All sincere reformers would have welcomed this mar­riage if there had not been a hidden tale of wrong behind it. Mr. Nagin has a fifteen year old Brahmin wife already, Nirmala by name. What is to be her lot now? According to Hindu custom she cannot get divorce and marry again. Now, I ask all the Arya Samajists and Hindu Mahasabha Pandits who have helped in and praised this marriage, what should this innocent girl wife do?

Though instances like this are rare, those of orthodox people abandoning their wives and taking second ones are very common among the Brahmins of Gujarat. It is extremely painful to see that the reformers are also doing the same thing. To remove this evil I see only one remedy viz., we should try to amend the Hindu-law so that the high caste Hindu ladies can sue for divorce in these circumstances.

Khadin, Ahmedabad.

Yours etc.,

31st August 1927.

N. J. TRIVEDI MA.

[The case is really a very hard one and we cannot justify it from any point of view. The first wife, we think, is entitled to claim that her husband should not only maintain her for the rest of her life but also bear the cost of her education and training for which she has paid a profession in which she can find an independent and honourable outlet for her energies. This is no doubt a good case for divorce but, as the correspondent says, there is no provision for divorce in Hindu Law.—Ed., J. S. B.]
THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

SIMLA UNITY CONFERENCE APPEAL.

As the result of the Unity Conference, held at Simla on the 29th and 30th August, the following appeal signed by a large number of Hindu and Muslim leaders now in Simla, including members of the Central legislature, was issued: "We the undersigned deplore the communal differences that have most unfortunately grown up among our people, and have created so much mistrust of each other that on the slightest provocation or misunderstanding, some of our countrymen, Hindus and Mussalmans, come to blows, and trivial incidents develop into heart-rending tragedies, involving loss of innocent life and property; and embittering still further the relations between the two communities. It will be impossible of making any political advance in such circumstances, peaceful social existence itself is threatened. Those who are interested in misrepresenting us and lowering our national character in the estimation of the rest of the world have found in the present deplorable situation an excellent opportunity to carry on their campaign of vilification and misrepresentation; and thereby retard our political progress and social existence itself is threatened. Those who are interested in misrepresenting us and lowering our national character in the estimation of the rest of the world have found in the present deplorable situation an excellent opportunity to carry on their campaign of vilification and misrepresentation; and thereby retard our political progress and the country as a whole, leading to further embitterment of their mutual relations, and likely to result in further breaches of the peace.

APPEAL TO JOURNALISTS.

Our appeal is addressed to every son of India and to every daughter of India; in particular, we beseech those of our countrymen who make use of the press or the platform to exercise great self-restraint in all they write or say, and permit nothing to escape them which may offer the least provocation to any of their fellow-countrymen. We know that our previous efforts in this direction have not been crowned with the success we hoped for; but we are determined to make another effort and we are determined, with divine assistance to succeed, and we firmly believe that success is within our reach if we devote ourselves heart and soul to this great purpose, and if our fellow-countrymen also assist us to the best of their power and not distract by a continuance of their mutual relations, and likely to result in further breaches of the peace.

ABHORRENCE OF WICKED ACTS.

But every fellow-countryman of ours can, we believe, understand that it will not be possible for us to concentrate our energies on the important issues that have to be settled, if our attention is distracted by the deplorable incidents that are occurring with such heart-rending frequency. We, therefore, appeal to our fellow-countrymen with all the earnestness and fervour that we can command to support us in our efforts to arrive at a satisfactory settlement by refraining from anything that has the least likelihood of disturbing the public tranquillity. We appeal to them in the name of our motherland to respect each other's life, property, honour, religion and places of worship, to avoid giving offence, and to vie with one another in forbearance and forgiveness. Violence and show of violence have so far benefited neither community, and cowardly cold-blooded murders and murderous attacks have harmed those that have indulged in them not less than their victims. We place on record our deepest abhorrence of such wicked and inhuman act.

INSULTS TO RELIGION.

Indulging in insulting any religion and in scurrilous and inane religious writings wantonly vilifying founders of religions and other great religious personages who are held in reverence by the followers of any religion and thus outraging the religious feelings of our fellow-countrymen is still more wicked, and we equally earnestly place on record our deepest abhorrence of such acts. It is a matter of great relief and consolation to us to think and we are glad to be able to convey this assurance to our countrymen, that no community, as such, has instigated, abetted or approved of such attacks; and that it is wrong to blame any community as a whole for the misdeeds of any individual or individuals belonging to it, however gross their misconduct may be.

INFLAMMATORY SPEECHES.

We deeply deplore and condemn all inflammatory writings and speeches which are calculated to promote hatred or ill-will among communities and the efforts which are being made in certain quarters to bring about the economic boycott, of one community by the other. We honestly feel that such boycott is not only impracticable but that all such efforts are sure to prove highly prejudicial to the best interests of both communities and the country as a whole, leading to further embitterment of their mutual relations, and likely to result in further breaches of the peace.

Jagadguru on Widow Remarriage: The Standard Bearer, a monthly published from Calcutta, writes that in Jagadguru Shankaracharya's opinion, "according to the Sthasras, the avideha jat girls can be remarried. With regard to the rest those who are no more virgins, as a matter of spiritual purity, they should be induced not to remarry. But they must not be ill-treated by the parents-in-law and by society. Society owes it to them as a duty, to provide big organisations, on social lines with ample scope for social work, for want of healthy and purposeful occupation and a spiritual goal for their devotion. Many of these unfortunate widows go morally astray. We need social organisation and the removal of social prejudices against these unfortunate sisters to prevent this mischief. But notwithstanding, a widow may marry again, if she so wishes. It is her option. There must be no social bar, and no social prejudice against her desire to remarry. However, looking to present times and conditions in order to avoid these evils and misfortunes, some higher age limit should be fixed. I repeat, there should be no bar against the right and the desire of an individual to re-marry."

It is a matter of great relief and consolation to us to think and we are glad to be able to convey this assurance to our countrymen, that no community, as such, has instigated, abetted or approved of such attacks; and that it is wrong to blame any community as a whole for the misdeeds of any individual or individuals belonging to it, however gross their misconduct may be.
THE IMMOLATION OF SHAMPACA VALLI.

(By Mrs. P. V. Ashram Iyer, B. A., B. L.)

The public have learned with grief of the pathetic end of this girl from the much-despised community of dancing girls. The circumstances that led to it, the heroism and resourcefulness which she showed in escaping from the moral perils of her unfortunate home and life, and the unfaltering devotion to the ideals of chastity have all become public property, and they constitute a great episode in the history of her social life. We read that though her home environments and our communal traditions hindered her moral growth, she was silently nurturing her spirit on the Ramayana and cherished from very girlhood the desire to free herself from the stain that her birth had given her, and live a clean pure life. The girl lost her mother in girlhood and it fell to the lot of the grandmother to bring her up. It is pitiful to think of the aged woman at home desired to dedicate this girl to a life of shame and humiliation, simply because use and want had made her morally callous and irresponsible to the aspirations of the grand-daughter. But I would forgive her for not entering with sympathy into the growing life of the girls as I do not desire to judge her life by impossible standards. She has not behaved worse than any average woman of her community, and if she has not risen to the occasion and understood the magnitude of the issues involved, it is probably because she could not jump out of her limitations. Whatever it is, it is deeply to be grieved that she could not play a noble part in this affair, and it was her stiffness and her almost irrational persistence that determined the young girl to leave home in quest as it were of the holy grail.

We have no more interest in the man that went out on adventure to her home and besought and obtained the consent of her grandmother for an attack on her. For aught I know, he may have been one of the average slandering, blundering men of whom this world is alasi too full, who apparently do not feel how much they disgrace themselves by such behaviour. But here I pause to make the reflection that the danger to the purity of woman is not so much her filthiness and inconstancy of which most decadent literature accuses her, but man's own will for wrong-doing and the shameful cruelty with which he victimizes woman. I would in all fairness say that the redemption of woman from sin is a great deal the work of man, who ought to burn with the pure passion of love that shall cause him to weep over it. While I pity very much the poor oppressed girl who had to leave her home to escape from the moral pollution and contagion that surrounded her there, I pity more the oppressor; a member of my sex who became the immediate cause of her romantic and heroic departure from home. I respect and offer my tribute of praise for her heroism and her steadfastness in the pursuit of virtue; but I very much love and admire her genius and resourcefulness too. I was between smiles and tears as I read of the baje joke she played on her man-tormentor, when he entered her chamber at dead of night expecting to loss himself in carnal satisfaction, and violently embraced the pillow mistake it for the girl. Also for the boldness that comes on man through the trained sense of the senses. The exhibited great resourcefulness and unusual coolness in disguising herself in boy's attire when she wandered from place to place and performed a few pilgrimages.

I have taken from the Sangam newspaper record what finally determined her mind to end her life. To my mind all taking away of life by one's own hand has this touch of violence in it. I feel as though it were not the right thing to do and may have been wrong. We read that Snehalata Devedied on the eve of her marriage by a similar immolation, to prevent the impending pauperism of her parents. I was dumb-founded with admiration for her heroism and thought what a shame and humiliation it was to us who constitute Hindu Society not to have the will to purge away an evil practice which was pauperising many a Hindu home. I nevertheless, felt that she may not have ended her life so violently. I indulged in the reverie that she may very well have taken her lessons from the woe of her parents by resolving to make as undaunted stand for virginity, and by doing so relieve her parents of their poverty and make her life an exemplar to the world. I do not say this in extenuation of the evil in society which lost for us so pure-hearted a girl as Snehalata. She died about twelve years ago. But the story of her unfortunate end still thrills the Hindu world and stands forth as the most powerful reminder of an evil which seems the viles of the race. When I look to the tender years and remember the circumstance that the impening pauperism of her parents must have been very depressing to her, I get more or less reconciled to the end, and feel that she could not then have better determined to end her life, or not withstanding the violence that is involved in such forcible taking away of life, there is real sacrifice and the motive ennobles the act.

I feel in much the same strain about the end of this noble girl—Shampaca Valli. It may have been better for her to resolve to live, but to live so clean and pure that her very conduct might be the inspiration to her sisters in the community. Some great instinct in her may have guided and emboldened her to feel that so long as she was deeply devoted to a pure good life, none could hurt her and further, that all privations and hardships undergone to keep her life pure were really chastening her. But it was not to be! It is the world's misfortune that she should have felt herself driven to such desperation as to offer her life as a holocaust in the cause of the redemption of the women of her community from the stain of accosted wrong-doing; that she thought not of herself or her woes particularly, but of the sufferings of her sisters and made that earnest appeal to a leading publicist and reformer to land the full weight of his influence for effectively checking the evil shows she is made of the stuff of heroism, and would have been a great force for the good of her community, had she chosen life, not pauperism, as her unhappy end! Her faith in morals and her abhorrence of wrong-doing and sinning are marvellous. Such love of purity and nobility should be regarded as low life must very much disquiet the conventionists who think that good and evil are constant quantities and that good is the monopoly of some communities and that others have been specially made to nourish evil! The devotion of this heroic girl to the great Hindu ideal of chastity is a pure unswerving flame! It is an impertinence for us to enquire how such love of virtue was implanted in apparently low life. That is an eye-opener to us.

The story of her devotion links her with those immortal personages of religious history who have come from her own poor and despised caste and community, with Ambapali the courtesan who wept with devotion to Lord Buddha and bowed low in humility and offered thanks to the Lord for his accommodating hospitality, and with Mary Magdalene who anointed Christ and washed with her tears the Lord's feet, and with Chintamani who became the spiritual path-finder of Lila-Suite. Too long has this earth been digaraged by the vice of sex! How low is the birth of virtue! As I think of the history of man on earth I think too of the future, perhaps uncertain, that lies before him. I feel though the day is very distant indeed when the honour and purity of woman will be safe in the hands of men!
untouchables serve bramhins: a message from delhi states that on the 5th instant, naiks, a sect of untouchables of delhi, gave a grand and sumptuous feast at the jamuna banks. it is said about a thousand bramhins and sadhus joined in the feast.

Miss Mayo's book: a special message to the hindustan, a local gujarat daily says that many of the british members of parliament have been provided with free copies of miss katherine mayo's book "mother india" which, the message adds, is significant as the british cabinet is at present engaged in examining the question of the royal commission.

mahomed's anniversary: the general secretary of the indian section of the theosophical society, benares, has sent round a circular that the lodges of the theosophical society in india should observe the anniversary of the prophet mahommed in the same way as they observe the anniversaries of other great teachers of mankind. the lahore lodge will therefore observe september 10, in a fitting manner. mohammedan, hindu and sikh representative speakers will make short speeches on the occasion. prof. h. c. kumar the well-known student of islam, is expected to represent the theosophical society.

Sir Ganga Ram's Request: it has been circulated in the press that sir ganga ram has bequested Rs. 13,50,000 for charities. the amount has been left by him for his charity trust, known as Sir Ganga Ram Trust Society, for the existing institutions which he started during his life time or for which he left instructions. there has been a misunderstanding in certain quarters over this and hence demands have been received from all over india from various parties and institutions by the society and some of the individual trustees as well. this is expected that this will clear the matter and such demands which the trustees could not meet will cease.

First Industrial Instructress: the punjab government, ministry of education and industries, have cabled the high commissioner for india, london, appointing miss mary jamila sirajuddin (daughter of professor sir sirajuddin of the purman christian college, lahore) to the post of the first industrial instructress for women in the punjab. having taken her m.a. degree in economics, of the punjab university, miss sirajuddin proceeded to england as a state scholar from the punjab in 1924. she passed the teachers' diploma examination of the university of london in 1925. she then joined the university of edinburgh in november 1926 as a research scholar for the degree of ph.d. in economics. Having taken "woollen industry in the punjab" as the subject of her thesis for m.a., she was asked to take the "comparative study of woollen industry in scotland" as the subject of her thesis for the doctorate. in connection with her studies she has visited cottage and factory industry centres in the orkneys, the shetlands, the hebrides, and has travelled in ireland and on the continent. her work has been highly spoken of by the head of the department of economics in edinburgh university and also by the high commissioner and lady chatterji. she hopes to finish her research work early in september, after which at the suggestion of the punjab government she is to visit cottage industry institutions in great britain and on the continent for a couple of months. she is expected to return to india by the 15th of november.
Miss Mayo's Chaperon in India: Sendral Anand Singh writes to the Tribune: "Mother India" by Miss Mayo has created much sensation in India. The motives of the writer can very well be understood, if light be thrown on the womanhood of which she writes. The tour in India, Government officials surrounded her on every side and were always at her beck and call. When she reached Lahore, a special C.I.D. officer was put at her disposal to show her what naturally such an official would like to see. She put up in the Nedum's Hotel and it was the duty of the official to chaperon her in her investigations. During her stay in Lahore, one day I received a message on the phone to give her an interview. The C. I. D. official concerned was known to me and he told me that an American lady had come to India to study the problems of this country and she would be glad if I could see her. I told the gentleman that if the lady was his personal friend, then I would be glad to see her. I do not understand why she visited the India, especially that I understand, I have not been subsidised, but I have not been paid. The entire affair was being patronised and chaperoned in India by the officials and specially of the C. I. D. Department, it is not surprising to find that Miss Mayo has written so damagingly about Indians. I hope other Indians whom Miss Mayo saw in India will also throw light on the medium through which she tried to see them.

Insult to Indian Womanhood: The Town Hall of Calcutta has not witnessed such a big demonstration and enthusiastic gathering for long when this event took place. A large attendance was held under the presidency of Mr. J. M. Sen Gupta. Mayor of Calcutta Corporation to protest against the publication of the book named "Mother India" and the speech of Mr. Pilcher in this connection. Mr. Sen Gupta said that they had assembled there to protest against the uncalled for insult to the womanhood of India by Miss Mayo in her book and the publication of the speech of Mr. Pilcher in a local paper. Mr. Pilcher like many other Englishmen had made money in India and when he retired belittled India. Miss Mayo was an American and the book was published in America but he did not understand why she visited the Indian Office. She said she had not been subsidised but she protested too much, whose object was to show that Indians who are fighting for self-government were morally and socially so low that they did not deserve it. Every thing showed clearly that the book was written with a political motive at the instance of the British Government. Mr. J. N. Roy of the Serampur College made a speech and in the course of which he said that he had come here to offer a penance for the insult that had been done to the womanhood of India and he would show a personal interest in the matter. After pronouncing himself before the ladies he addressed the meeting in English and said: "I feel that I am utterly ashamed when I think of the manner in which an Englishman has spoken of the women of India. I have not read Miss Mayo's book and therefore I cannot say anything about it. But every one can read the speech of Mr. Pilcher, a man who tries to speak epigrammatically and make such generalisation for political purposes, who has committed a despicable thing. I only wish that he could be treated properly and instead of so much money he should be given some other way our sense of the outrage that he has committed. Several other speakers including Messrs. Shyam Sunder Chatterjee, J. P. Khatkar, and D. K. Royincipitated. An overflow meeting was also held which was well attended and a large number of speakers made similar speeches condemning the book. A few ladies were also present.

Madras University Convocation: The annual Convocation of the Madras University was held on August 25th, at the Senate House. His Excellency Lord Goschen, the Chancellor, presided. As usual there was a very large attendance of graduates. Fellows of the University and visitors. One thousand one hundred and sixty-five graduates were duly presented to the Chancellor for confinement of their respective degrees, including 64 lady graduates, two of them taking the M.A. degree. Five hundred and sixty-two graduates took their degrees in absence. 25 students were awarded titles in Oriental Learning and eight diplomas on economics. After the degrees and diplomas were conferred, Dewan Bahadur K. Ramunni Menon, professor, Presidency College addressed the new graduates in the course of which he emphasised the importance of scientific knowledge and research as the basis of agricultural improvement and industrial process, on which, he said, India's material prosperity depended. He added: "It is not by the perpetuation of the old, world outlook of religion and tradition but by the insistence on common sense and by the cultivation of studies which create common interests and have an universal appeal that the university can exert its unifying and liberalising influence on Indian youth. The speaker remarked with gratification that the Madras University had more than 300 women first degree-holders on rolls, about 40 per cent, of whom were further qualified for teaching. He believed Madras was the first province in India in the progress of female education.

NOTES

Legislation against Child Marriage: After a delay of six months, Rai Sahib Haribhau Sarda was able to move on Thursday for the consideration of his Bill prohibiting marriage for girls below the age of twelve and of boys below the age of fifteen. We ought to say at once that these age-limits are too low having regard to the present state of public opinion even among orthodox Hindus. It is by no means rare for Hindu girls now-a-days to remain unmarried until after 16 years of age. We are strongly of opinion that the age-limits should be raised to 14 and 18 for girls and boys respectively before the Bill can be said to be in conformity with intelligent opinion among men and women at the present day. We shall deal with this point more fully in subsequent issues. There was virtually no opposition to the principle of the Bill which was welcomed by Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, and Mr. D. V. Balvi who constituted himself on this occasion the spokesman of rank orthodoxy. But while the reformers were for referring the Bill to a Select Committee, Government and the more conservative members wished to circulate it with a view to invite public opinion upon it. The reformers carried the day, the Government motion for circulating the Bill being defeated by a majority of votes. Some of the expressions of opinion in the Assembly are worth quoting. Sir Purshottamdas Thakurdas who favoured the Government motion nevertheless declared that "a person who mixed up this question with religion was either fit to be locked up in a lunatic asylum or had some vested interest." Kumar Gangadhar Sinha who moved the reformers' amendment observed that child marriage had been introduced into Hindu society only recently and it had no religious sanction behind it. While the Home Member, Mr. Croxar, spoke of the responsibility of Government "as the measure would undoubtedly infringe very deeply upon religious ideas and social customs of a considerable section of the population," Lala Lajpat Rai passionately declared that if he had his way he would at once raise the marriage age of girls to 16 at least. "All evil customs would have been stamped out long ago if we had legislative power in our hands," Mr. M. R. Jayakar, in a powerful and eloquent speech asked Government to act on their notions of right and wrong and if they had the support of the enlightened community to go ahead with the reform. He told them not to be frightened because certain Hindus oppose the measure. "As for coercion," he explained, "is it necessary to find out whether a boy or a girl should be in the hockey field or the nursery, or on the marriage bed?" He added that the question has been under discussion for 30 years and still Government wanted to consult public opinion. The leader of the Opposition, Mr. Sinha, more strongly supported the amendment to refer the Bill fortwith to a committee. He asked the officials to remain neutral if they could not support the amendment. He claimed he knew the country very well and emphasised that public opinion had changed largely in the matter. "To-day the majority of orthodox people, including Brahmins," he said, "married their girls after puberty without any fear of ostracism. The time had come for man-made custom to be altered by the needs of the situation." We would impress on the public the urgent need of convincing the Select Committee that higher age limits than those prescribed in the Bill are necessary to the object of the measure achieve.

Campaign Against Untouchability: The question of the removal of untouchability has once more come to the fore. How poignant are the feelings among the enlightened section of the Hindu community against the perpetuation of this evil was reflected in the speech delivered at the Untouchability Conference convened last week under the auspices of the Simla Arya Samaj and presided over by Dr. Sankaran Nair. We are glad the presence in Simla of the leaders among whom were Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, Lala Lajpat Rai and others was availed of to call such a conference. All the speakers emphasized the urgent necessity of ridding the country of the curse of untouchability. Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya's exhortation to treat the depressed classes as brethren in fact as well as in speeches should open the eyes of the orthodox section of the Hindu community. Those who are under the delusion that there is religious sanction for ill-treatment of the depressed classes will do well to lay to heart Lala Lajpat Rai's vehement words that untouchability was unreligious and that those who followed it had no religion. He further observed that every moment spent without removing this system was inflicting a wound not only on religion but on our country. The advice offered by Mr. Chotiram of Sindh to employ untouchables as domestic servants in order that the Hindu women might get rid of their prejudice against them is of some practical value. The re-moral of untouchability is desirable from the moral, religious, political and humanitarian point of view. If the moral and material progress of India is to be achieved, Sir Sankaran Nair's concluding remarks, "Until the depressed classes join us, all of us will be slaves, whether we go to South Africa or any other country of the world. In our own country, the Englishmen treat us like slaves. They will not give us our rights, they tell us, because the lower classes hate us and therefore we cannot be trusted to look after their interests. Therefore for Heaven's sake, in our own interest and in the interests of our children, let us be one and work together" should give us more rights, they tell us, because the lower classes hate us and therefore we cannot be trusted to look after their interests. Therefore for Heaven's sake, in our own interest and in the interests of our children, let us be one and work together should give an impetus to the campaign against untouchability.

An Exploded Myth: The editor of Capital, the well-known commercial journal, has exploded once for all an old fable which has been repeated times without number as if it was gospel truth by opponents of Indians for self-government of India. We reproduce his remarks in another column. This story with suitable modification is repeated in Miss Katherine Mayo's book at page 254. The Maharaja to whom it was originally attributed, when asked by the editor of Capital whether it was true, firmly answered: "Lie, my friend, a damned lie. We Rajputs never offend the insincere; when we insult our foes, we give them the chance to fight with the sword." In this connection it is interesting to note the practice which prevailed in India when troops were on the march. The following is taken from the remarkable auto-biographical segment of Nana Fadnavis printed as an appendix to an old memoir of his life recently published for the University of Bombay by the Oxford University Press. Nana Fadnavis writes: "After his investiture, Mahavarao Sahib having had his audience of leave, we started on our way home and returned to Poona. On the road, one day, an infantry soldier seized a young woman in a field and threw her down, with the intention of committing a rape; one of the troopers on duty, observing it, galloped up and pierced him to the heart with his spear. Thus I had before me an example of the consequen-tails of indigence in the punishment," is the sentence.

Dedication of Girls to Temples: It is of happy augury that our legislatures are devoting increasing attention to matters relating to social reform. The Hon. Mr. Ramdas Pantulu moved a resolution in the Council of State asking for legislation to degenerate the practice of dedicating girls to temples. While doing so, he pointed out that protective legislation has been demanded by numerous Women's Associations including that of davaradas. The opinions expressed in the Council of State on this important question show that that body is entirely in favour of the suppression of this evil practice. It is encouraging to know that Mr. Pantulu has had to withdraw his resolution, the Council of State has accorded it full support. What is more, the Government them-

A Dastardly Attack: The grossly libellous remarks of Mr. George Fitcher, M. F., on the position of widows in this country have aroused great indignation and the public throughout the country have expressed their resentment in no uncertain terms. Mr. Fitcher is reported to have said before a public gathering in England that "Indian widows are sluts at home and prostitutes abroad." Even the Abbe Dubois, whom nobody can accuse of being partial to the Hindus, admitted that something of the same high standard of morals prevailed among that unfortunate section of Indian womanhood. In his Hindu Manners, Customs and Ceremonies, the Abbe writes that, owing to the general prejudice against widow-remarriage, "the country abounds with widows, especially among the Brahmins. Among this caste shorn-heads are to be seen everywhere. Of course a certain corruption of morals is the inevitable result of such a state of things, but it is not quite as much as might be expected. The natural modesty of Hindu women, the way in which they are brought up, their ordinary chaste and circum-

The quotations which we made from the Census Report in the last issue clearly show that child-marriages are steadily becoming things of the past and that the progress is greatest among the higher and educated classes. The inference is plain. The spread of education and the improvement of economic conditions—both of which will be the first and foremost task of a National Indian Government—will lead to the same result among all sections of the population. The very conservatism of the Hindu community will prove to be of great assistance in accelerating the reform. If its great mass makes it difficult to move once started, it gathers at every step momentum at an enormous rate and all thoughtful Indian reformers have, therefore, preferred the method of small beginnings to what are known as "knock-down" methods. If Miss Katherine Mayo had the least acquaintance with comparative studies in sociology, she would not have made the stupid mistake of representing child-marriage as an ineradicable and ineradicable incident of Hindu society and Hindu religion. Child-marriage, as we have shown in previous articles, prevailed in ancient Greece and Rome, and in Stuart England when the Pilgrim Fathers sailed in search of religions freedom to the New World. "A very important cause of the decline of the marriage rate and the rise of the age for marriage in Europe," says Westernmark in his History of Human Marriage, "is the difficulty of supporting a family in modern society." The same difficulty is also operating in India at the present day with increasing severity. A modern writer, whom Westernmark quotes approvingly, points out that "by the general diffusion of education and culture, by the new inventions and discoveries of the age, by the increase of commerce and intercourse and wealth, the tastes of men and women have become widened, their desires multiplied, new gratifications and pleasures have been supplied to them. By this increase of the gratifications of existence the relative share of them which married life affords has become just so much less. The domestic circle does not fill so large a place in life as formerly. It is really less important to either man or woman. Married life has lost in some measure its advantage over a single life. There are so many pleasures, now, that they can be enjoyed as well or even better in celibacy."—(The History of Human Marriage, Vol. I., p. 309). Serious thinkers in the West are much exercised in mind as to whether this result is altogether good for the community. But it is true that the wide prevalence of child and compulsory marriages is incompatible with a high standard of life and a rise in the standard of life is bound directly to lead to an improvement in the age and voluntary character of marriage. The slow rate at which the standard of life in India moves upward is due to economic causes for which the political system cannot be absolved, inspite of Miss Katherine Mayo's pragmatism, of a large measure of responsibility. We do not, however, wish to go into that large question at this point. What we are immediately concerned with is to repudiate with all the emphasis which we can command Miss Katherine Mayo's attempt to make the prevalence of child marriages in India a justification for the perpetuation of White domination and to pour contempt on the national character and aspirations of the Indian people.

In quoting the passage from the Census Report of India for 1921 relating to the age of marriage, we called special attention to the testimony to its noteworthy rise in Bengal and particularly among the Brahmin and Vaidya castes, which are the two most literary castes in the province. We did this not only because most of Miss Katherine Mayo's hospital cases are derived from Bengal, but because she has chosen to pour a special measure of her venom upon that province and its people. She writes—

"Bengal is the seat of bitterest political unrest—the producer of India's main crop of anarchists, bomb-throwers and assassins. Bengal is also among the most sexually exaggerated regions of India; and medical and police authorities in any country observe the link between that quality and 'queer' criminal minds—the exhaustion of normal avenues of excitement creating a thirst and a search in the abnormal for gratification. But Bengal is also the stronghold of strict purdah, and one cannot but speculate as to how many explosions of eccentric crime in which the young politicalics of Bengal have indulged were given the detonating touch by the unspeakable fumes of their purdah-deadened home lives, made the more irksome by their own half-digested dose of foreign doctrines."—(Mother India, p. 118.)

It is strange—is it not?—that this (according to Miss Mayo) God-forsaken province should have produced during this last century the largest number of great Indians who have attained an international reputation. Raja Ram Mohan Roy, Maharshi Devendranath Tagore, Sir Rama Krishna Paramhamsa, Keosib Chandra Sen, Swami Vivekananda in the sphere of religion; Michael Madhusudan Dutt, Toru Dutt, Rabindranath Tagore, Barojai Naido, in the region of poetry; Sir Jagadis Chander Bose and Sir E. G. Ray in the realm of science; Sir Sorenadranath Banerjee, Lord Sinha, and Chittaranjan Das in politics; Sir Gerard Banerjee and Sir Ashutosh Mukerjee in education.

What a brilliant galaxy to spring out of the muck of Miss Katherine Mayo's "most sexually exaggerated province"! Even New York and Chicago, we fancy, have not produced greater men in so many spheres and in comparatively so short a time!

Miss Katherine Mayo merely repeats, though she may not be conscious of it, the little-battle of Anglo-India when she brackets together the political unrest in Bengal and what she calls the sexual exaggeration of that province. The Anglo-Saxon has man to political and national rivals the most obscene forms of personal immorality. So long as a man or a nation does not cross its path, he will cheerfully condone and even join in their jovial exploits, but the moment that he thinks his interests are menaced, he will at once assume the attitude of a slaver moralist towards the pescadillos of his rawhide comrades and boon companions. In pursuance of this racial weakness the Indian political extremist of the Partition days was described as a sexual pervert. Those who knew him laughed at this description, but very few outside Calcutta, or, at most, Bengal knew anything of him. We ourselves did not realise the full extent of this calumny until we had unimpeachable testimony to its utter falsity. The late Sir Narayan Chandavarkar with Mr. Justice Beachcroft was appointed by the Government of India to examine the cases of some scores of men, mostly students, who were held in confinement for alleged complicity in anarchist doings.
The committee, we think, personally interviewed some of them. Its proceedings were private, but this writer distinctly remembers Sir Narayan, when he returned from Calcutta, telling him that the talk about the degeneracy of these boys was pure bunkum.
On the contrary, they had, he said in effect, made a religion of physical fitness. The Gita was their manual of conduct and devotion, and hard physical exercise was a regular part of their daily discipline.
Miss Katherine Mayo need not have come all the way to India to verify the observation of medical and police authorities about "the exhaustion of normal avenues of excitement creating a thirst and a search in the abnormal for gratification." "Mother India", we fancy, had its origina in such a thirst leading to such a search. The mask is in Miss Katherine Mayo's mind more than in Bengal or any other part of India, though, of course, India like every other part of the world is compounded of mud and sky.
We have thus far dealt with Miss Katherine Mayo's dictum that the woes of India spring from the Indian's manner of getting into the world. We have shown that this manner is not essentially different from that of other races and nations; that child marriage with the safeguards associated with it in all but a very small number of cases, has not been a cause of race degeneration; that all over the country and more particularly in Bengal and among the "Babu" the age of marriage has been rapidly rising; that Miss Katherine Mayo has, by omitting his reservations, misrepresented the Post Tagores as having in order to mislead Western leaders a sort of poetic philosophy in justification of child marriages. This habit of misrepresentation, indeed, seems to be a large part of Miss Katherine Mayo's literary equipment. The Rev. Popley is an article in the Indian Witness, the American Methodist weekly published in London, reports that Miss Bose, the Principal of Victoria College at Lahore, repudiates the statements attributed to her in Miss Katherine Mayo's book as having been made by her in a personal interview. We quote Mr. Popley's remarks in another column. Mahatma Gandhi likewise in the course of an article in Young India offers a similar disavowal. Mahatma writes: "In her hurry to see everything Indian in a bad light, she has not only taken liberty with my writings, but she has not thought it necessary even to verify through me certain things ascribed by her or others to me. In fact she has combined in her person what we understand in India by the judicial and executive officer. She is both the prosecutor and the judge."
Readers of Miss Katherine Mayo's book will have constantly to be on their guard against accepting without verification her statements. She is a witness who takes liberties with truth. In the next and following articles we shall deal with her allegations regarding the Indian's "sex-life," which are far more atrocious and far more flagrantly false than those about the Indian's manner of getting into the world.

REMINISCENCES OF THE LATE DR. SIR R. G. BHANDARKAR.*

(By Mr. V. N. CHANDAVARKAR.)

When I was a young child I was a favourite grandson of my orthodox grand-mother. She used to read out to me stories from the Puranas, dealing with various deities of Hindu mythology. I also remember names of four persons were very often mentioned by my father. These were: Parsanadas, Telang, Phirozebosh Mehta and Bhandarkar. Of course at that time I did not know who these people were, but I thought, just as my grand-mother had belief in Gods referred to in Puranas, these four names were names of Gods in whom my father believed. Of these four persons, I distinctly remember paying a visit to that saintly man, Parmanand, when he was on his bed—a confirmed invalid, in the same house which is now occupied by his sons.
I do not remember having seen Telang, but I have a vivid recollection of the commotion that was caused in our house on the day of his death. Phirozebosh Mehta, I had seen him very often in Bombay from a distance but I had the privilege of coming in contact with him when he paid a visit to England, I believe, in 1910 during my student days. He invited me to spend two afternoons with him. I felt very nervous before going to him on account of the impression I had about him that he was a great man, but I soon discovered that I was wrong. After I spent some time with him I found that he was a man of strong affections; so kindly and affectionately he treated me on account of his personal relations with my father.
About Dr. Bhandarkar, the first time I remember having seen him, was in 1894. My father had gone to Poona to defend one of the accused in a case arising out of the Ganpati festival riots. The case lasted for nearly 2 months, and before we were able to arrange for our separate establishment, we were the guests of Dr. Bhandarkar. Even at that time he was a great man, and had just retired from service. Naturally

* A speech delivered on 3rd September 1927 at the Anniversary meeting held under the auspices of the various Associations of the Saraswat Community.
to me he appeared to be a man of austerity, a man who was always immersed in his studies, and who had no time to take notice of children. But during my stay there an incident took place which revealed to me the real man that was behind the great oriental scholar, Dr. Bhandarkar. There was a swing in the bazaar, and while my brother and myself were playing with it, it knocked me down and cut open one of my lips. Blood was gushing out and my mother got naturally very nervous especially as my father had come down to Bombay on some urgent work. There was no elderly gentleman in the house except Dr. Bhandarkar, but the incident took place at about 1 o'clock and Dr. Bhandarkar was having his usual afternoon rest. You all know that his life was regulated like clock-work and his relations were naturally unwilling to disturb him, but evidently the old man heard the commotion that was going on on the ground floor and came down-stairs to ascertain what the matter was. He immediately ordered his carriage to be got ready and requested my mother to send me with him to the hospital. I was only six years old then and had never been to a hospital before then, and as you know the word “hospital” frightens so many people even in these days, and I was very much frightened when my mother asked me to go to the hospital with Dr. Bhandarkar. But the way Dr. Bhandarkar persuaded me to go to the hospital has left a very vivid impression on my mind. Young as I was I realized that Dr. Bhandarkar was a man full of sympathy and affection and I could safely trust myself to his care. For two hours we were together in the hospital and I felt so safe in his hands all the time, and the impression that was created in my mind in 1894 was confirmed by the subsequent contact with him in later years. After 1901 whenever he used to come to Bombay he used to be my father’s guest, and such occasions were not rare. We used to get more than one or two visits from him during the year. During these visits I found that, while on the one hand he would discuss the most abstruse subjects with my father, on the other hand he enjoyed talking to my mother on matters pertaining to our every day life. He discussed not only social questions but even trivial domestic matters with my mother. What I wished to point out is this: Dr. Bhandarkar was not only a great scholar and thinker but also a man who was in intimate touch with the realities of life. He enjoyed “living” and tried to derive greatest pleasure from every minute of his life. I distinctly remember when we were in Poona in 1921 my friend, Dr. Parmannad and myself called on him on his birthday when he had completed 84 years. As soon as he saw Dr. Parmannad he said, “Well, I am 84 to-day and I want only 16 more years to complete my century.” Even at that time he was more or less in a helpless condition and had to rely entirely upon his servants and relatives for moving about and carrying out the daily routine of life. He was prepared to “live” every second of the life allotted to him by his Maker.

Another incident which hit my mind is what took place early in 1918 at the time of the death of his eldest son, Prof. Sridharpan Bhandarkar. When doctors realised the serious nature of the disease from which Prof. Bhandarkar was suffering and his condition was hopeless, Dr. Bhandarkar came down to Bombay. In the absence of my parents at Calcutta I had the privilege of being his host. He used to spend the whole day at his son’s house and come over to our place in the evening. He spent 3 or 4 days with us. Every evening after dinner we used to sit to, gether in our drawing room. He knew that his son was on death-bed and that it was only a question of time. While we used to sit together after dinner we hardly talked to each other. He sat all the time meditating. Occasionally I could see a tear dropping from his eyes. It was a most impressive experience, I could realize the struggle that was going on in his mind and I felt that he had disciplined his mind and adorned it into a temple so that it was a fit dwelling place for God. The kingdom of God was within him and I felt that I was in Divine Presence. I shall never forget this experience.

A reference was made by one of the lecturers today to Dr. Bhandarkar’s unpopularity on account of his political opinions. In this connection I should like to mention an incident which will show you the genesis of his political opinions and that whatever political opinions he had he held them honestly. I think it was in the Bombay Provincial (Political) Conference held in Poona in 1915 or 16 that he was asked to speak on one of the resolutions. In speaking he referred to the various benefits of British rule illustrating his remarks by reference to the amenities which the people enjoyed in the shape of railways, steamers, telegraphs, etc. Of course such a speech might have been approved of by the people of the seventies and eighties, but was perhaps out of place in 1915 or 16. A few months after the Conference a young friend of his took him to task for this speech and called him a loyalty monger. The reply Dr. Bhandarkar gave to him will give you an idea as to why he was so conservative in his political opinions. He said to his young friend: “It is all very well for you, born 20 years after the Mutiny to find fault with and run down the British Government. But you must remember that I was born in 1837, 20 years before the Mutiny. The state of the country then has left an indelible impression on my mind. I cannot forget the condition of the country in those days, and I am honestly convinced that without the agency of the British Government the country would not be enjoying peace and prosperity which I see round about me now. The feelings of admiration and loyalty for British Government have gone deep into my blood and bones and now at the age of 80 you cannot ask me to look at things from your angle of vision. The organisers of the Conference asked me to speak in the Conference and I spoke what I felt. I was not there to give the public what they wanted but I was there to give the public my own views and I did so.” The above incident will, I am sure, give you an insight into his attitude towards the question of the political reform in the country. We have, however, to look at his career from a true national point of view. There is no doubt that he was one of the greatest Indians of the day. I agree with one of the speakers today that Dr. Bhandarkar will go down to posterity as one of the saviours of modern India. Truly he was a saint and I am glad the various associations of the Saraswat Community have combined to-day to pay a tribute to his memory. The other day I was present when Mr. V. N. Naik delivered at the Prarthana Samaj one of the best addresses I had ever heard dealing with the lives and teachings of our great departed leaders. Mr. Justice Parker, who presided on the occasion, said in the course of his remarks, that a man like Bhandarkar does not belong to any caste, community or country, but belongs to the intellectual commonwealth of nations. Is it not a wonderful thing that a country like India, in spite of the various handicaps, social and political, from which she is suffering, has been able to produce men like Bhandarkar, Rabindranath Tagore, and J. C. Bose who can claim a high place not only for themselves but even for their country, in the intellectual commonwealth of nations? I say a country can do this should never despair of its future. But everything depends on us. If we are true to ourselves and to the traditions and rich legacies left to us by men like Bhandarkar, we can make this ancient country of ours once more a nation among nations.

BEGBUM OF BHOPAL'S MESSAGE.

The following telegrams were exchanged between Her Highness the Begum—mother of Bhopal and His Excellency the Viceroy on the burning topic of Hindu-Muslim tension:

From Her Highness to the Viceroy: «I was deeply moved by Your Excellency's remarkable speech at Simla. It was nobly conceived and effectively expressed. Indians must be grateful to Your Excellency for the sincere and altruistic motives that have prompted Your Excellency to this humane and wise course of action. Even an old woman like me could not remain inactive after that stirring appeal, and I, therefore, unreservedly place my services at Your Excellency's disposal for what they are worth and will be ready to do all in my power to help Your Excellency in achieving the noble cause, for which you are so sincerely trying. I reproduce for Your Excellency's information the telegram that I have sent to the various leaders of public opinion now assembled at Simla and sincerely hope and wish that they will fully realise the seriousness of the situation and will not hesitate to utilise to the fullest extent the noble offer of Your Excellency has made of your support and help in solving this question.»

OFFER TO UNITY CONFERENCE.

The following is the telegram referred to above:

"Old age and the desire it begets of leading a peaceful life of retirement and devotions to the great God, free and untrammeled by any mundane cares, had compelled me about a year and a half ago to make over the reins of Government to my beloved son, the present Ruler of Bhopal, but the peace of mind and freedom from cares and anxieties that I had thus sought was denied to me. I was more worried than ever before in my life to read in the newspapers day in and day out of the surging wave of communal discord that has swept over the country and torn into shreds the whole fabric of Indian brotherhood resulting in bloodshed and its consequent horrors. Heartily grieved as I have always been at these harrowing accounts of fratricidal animosity, I at the same time felt rather diffident as whether an old woman like me at this advanced age was capable of doing anything in the way of bringing about harmony and concord amongst the warring communities of India. But the most stirring appeal made by His Excellency the Viceroy on the 29th August at Simla followed by the sincere and laudable sentiments expressed by my beloved son in his inaugural address to the Legislative Council of Bhopal yesterday, have given me strength and courage to do my little bit in this matter of supreme importance to the well-being and ordered progress of my countrymen.»

REMOV THIS UGLY BLOT.

"I have learnt with unmixed gratification and thankfulness of the conference that the leaders of various communities are now holding at Simla to find a happy solution of this most unhappy problem. May the Almighty God crown your noble efforts with the glorious success they deserve. As an old woman, I devoutly appeal to your highest sense of patriotism to leave no stone unturned and no avenue unexplored to remove this ugly blot from the fair face of our common motherland. I should like my feeble but nonetheless sincere voice to reach the hearts and homes of my unfortunate countrymen. I am old and infirm yet ready and willing to come out of my retirement and cheerfully to place my services at the disposal of the country for what they are worth and in whatever way all those who are working to achieve unity amongst the warring sections of the two great communities may deem fit to utilise them for the achievement of a sacred object as much dear to my heart as it is to you. I am sure to the heart of every well wisher of the country. Sultan Jehan.»

Viceroy's Reply:

"To the above I am very grateful for Your Highness's telegram and for the kind terms in which it is expressed, I need no assurance that Your Highness who has devoted yourself so long to the happiness of your subjects will lend all your great influence on the side of peace and goodwill in India, and I trust that the efforts which Your Highness in company with others is now making will be rewarded.»

IDEALS OF INDIAN WOMANHOOD.

We extract from Forward, Calcutta, the first portion of the full-text of the paper that Dr. Miss Seeta Narayan Agarkar, D. Phil., Bar-at-Law, read in the public meeting held under the auspices of Saroj Lalini Association in the Albert Hall on the 18th August last, Professor RadhaKrishnan of the Calcutta University was in the chair.

Miss Agarkar said:

"Before I begin with the subject of the address of this evening, let me apologise for the choice of a subject which a learned audience, such as the present one, must be so familiar—as you are all aware I am speaking under the auspices of the Saroj Lalini Association and when the request came from such an ardent and sincere supporter of women's cause as Mr. G. S.
Dutt, the husband of Bredmati Saroj Nalini, I could not in the fitness of things suggest any other subject.

Moreover after moving about a little in Calcutta and observing the social conditions, coming as I do from Maharashtra, I felt it my duty to deliver to you the message of that beloved province of Shivijsi.

Commonplace though the subject may appear at first sight it is not so in fact; it is to my mind of the most vital importance, specially so, at the present juncture, when the whole nation is standing at a critical crossing of the ways of Asiatic and European culture. At this important moment of the reconstruction of society when all efforts should be directed towards saving it from further degeneration we have to make an important, indeed, a very important decision—we have then to decide whether in this process of reformation we are going to keep to the right track in the light of our ancient culture and thus retain its characteristic individuality. The subject, therefore, could not be repeated often enough and this in itself should be a sufficient excuse for me to have complied with the request of Mr. G. S. Dutt.

GLORIOUS PAST.

We Indians as a race are often made subject to the charge of having a weakness for priding ourselves on the greatness, real or supposed, of our ancient forefathers. It is often alleged that the modern Indian is too prone to cover his obscurity by trying to shine in the borrowed glory of his ancestors. But there is no harm in looking back into our past; provided we do so in the right spirit, not in that of snug self-complacency but with a view to improve and guide ourselves by their ideals. If this repetition of our glorious past tends only to fire our youth with ambitious desire for self-improvement, I am afraid, we have not yet succeeded in repeating our ancient history often enough. Therefore let us correct our mistake inspite of the fact that the foreigners attribute narrow motives and hold us up to ridicule before the rest of the world.

A comparison of our present social conditions with those prevalent in the early Hindu society will help us to decide where we have swerved from our ancient path and whether we have done so rightly or wrongly. If wrongly we can yet go back and correct ourselves and by so doing we can yet hope to acquit ourselves well as the worthy inheritors of a proud tradition.

It is a well-known fact that the Hindu society was at the pinnacle of its glory in the major part of the epic period, which can be taken to extend from 800 B. C. to 400 A. D. Towards the end of this period which is overlapped by the Dharmastratra period or the period of the Hindu Law Books slow but sure signs of a coming decadence were manifesting themselves. This was a period when Brahmanic supremacy was slowly turning the society into a fossil.

It is also from the two epics of India that the ideals for the daily conduct of human life are put forth before the Hindu wife and the Hindu husband. It is fittingly said of the greater epic whatever is not here is to be found nowhere else. Let us therefore draw on this national bank with inexhaustible funds in the form of traditions and see what aid and guidance it can afford us in our present state of need.

WOMEN IN EPIC PERIOD.

I am not however going to deal with the social customs of the epic period in general—but confine my attention to that part of what has been so often termed as the keystone of a society, viz., the women and their position, within the short time at my disposal and within the limited scope of this lecture. It would not be possible even to mention all the interesting and instructive points of details regarding the position of women in the epics; but I shall mention here just three or four features which in particular we need to be reminded of to-day.

I suppose I must say it at the outset that all that one can gather about the social customs in the epic period is confined to particular class of society, namely, Kayastas and Brahmins, and the very nature of the subject-matter of the epics should make this clear—yet on the strength of the adage that one grain of rice testifies to the quality of the whole pot, we won't be very much in the wrong if we drew conclusions may be with a little discount, as to the state of the society in general in the days of the epics.

The first feature, therefore, that should attract our notice is the general literacy of the women. They are so often described as "accomplished" and a careful examination shows that "accomplishment" was not a vague term but consisted of reading, writing, painting, dancing, music including, vocal as well as instrumental. At least daughters of the rich were given this education. I would like my friends here to note that dancing which has now become incompatible with respectable bility was included in the accomplishments necessary for a girl from highly respectable and noble families. The importance of dancing both from the point of view of exercise and from that of grace of motion as well as of form can never be overstated. It is indeed a hopeful sign of the times that prominent people like Dr. Rabindra Nath Tagore and Sarala Devi have started the movement of introducing dancing among girls from respectable families and they deserve our sincere congratulations.

Instead of taking to foreign methods of drill and physical culture and turning out to be indifferent copies, why should we not revive our ancient forms of exercise in the schools?

It is evident that to give a girl even a fair amount of training in a few of those requisites of what was known as "accomplishment," the girl had to grow up to an age of maturity. It could not be given in marriage while yet a child of nine or ten, not to talk of the monstrously cruel marriages that had been in vogue until the recent date—I mean marriages of girls at four or five or six. Thanks again to the influence of the times that this practice is fast dying out.

In the epics even a few marriages—after eighteen or at twenty were to be met with, the average marriageable age of a girl was between fourteen and sixteen. Uttara, the daughter of King Virata was married to Abhimanyu at about that age. Subhadra, Savitri, Sunanda, Devayani, Saluntas, and few others, are instances in point.

When we take into account these adult marriages, when we realise the effect of the care-free atmosphere of her paternal abode on the physical and mental growth of a girl and when we remember how the mothers of epic days were freed from the cares and agonies of premature maternity, we can easily understand and cease to marvel at the secret of the intellectual and physical superiority of our great ancestors of ancient times and can appreciate the reasons of our degenerate downfall in the modern age. Let us therefore take this lesson to heart and try to instil its significance in the minds of our sisters and brothers in the less advanced parts of India, where they cannot get a chance of benefiting themselves by the wisdom of our forefathers.

TOTAL PROHIBITION.
(BY M. K. GANDHI.)

"I ask you to realise the fact that the alteration of the present Akbari Act with regard to making, manufacture and possession of liquor etc. must necessarily, to a large extent, lead to harassing of the people. You must be prepared for such a harassment which is an inevitable concomitant of the policy of prohibition. I must count them upon your unstinted support. I do not want your support for picketing shops, to preach about the evils of liquor and kindred crimes."

This is an extract from the speech of the Madras Minister for Public Health and Excise reported in the Hindu. There is one more assistance the Minister has asked the people to render i.e. submit to increased taxation. Of this I do not propose at present to say anything except that where the people are able, they should submit to further taxation on proof of necessity. No monetary cost is too great to pay for achieving total prohibition.

But at the present moment I would confine myself to the extract quoted by me. I fear that the Minister has taken a wrong view of prohibition. In my opinion, it has not to be taken piece-meal. To be successful it should be taken as a whole. It is not a one-district question but it is an all-India question. I have not hesitated to give my opinion that it was a wicked thing for the Imperial Government to have transferred this the most immoral source of revenue to the provinces and to have thus made this tainted revenue the one source for defraying the cost of the education of Indian youth.

But what pains me about the Minister's speech is his superficial treatment of a question which affects the well-being of the masses. Surely he is not serious about his scheme if he expects the people to do his police work. And why does he frighten the people by saying that there must be harassment if prohibition is tried? Is there harassment of the people because theft or manufacture of gunpowder are classed as crimes? Is not unlicensed distillation even now a crimes? What the Minister implies therefore is that the men who to-day hold licenses to manufacture or sell liquor will after the prohibition distil surreptitiously and that therefore they will be harassed. There need be in this no harassment of the people.

But it betrays want of imagination and lack of sympathy with the people, if the Minister believes that as a prohibitionist he has nothing more to do but to declare prohibited and prosecute those who will break his laws. I venture to submit that prosecutions are the smallest and the destructive part of prohibition. I suggest that there is a larger and constructive side to prohibition. People drinking because of the conditions to which they are reduced. It is the factory labourers and others that drink. They are forlorn, uncared for, and they take to drink. They are no more vicious by nature than tea-tasters are saints by nature. The majority of people are controlled by their environment, Any minister who is sincerely anxious to make prohibition a success will have to develop the zeal and qualities of a reformer. He will then require precisely the help that the Madr. Minister is reported to have scorned.

In my humble opinion, he does need pickets and men and women who would preach about the evils of drink and do other kindred work. It is just in these very things that he will want an army of volunteers who will be associated with him in reforming the life of the drunkard. He will have to convert every drink shop into a refreshment shop and concert room combined. Poor labourers will want some place where they can congregate and get wholesome, cheap, refreshing, non-intoxicating drinks, and if they can have some good music at the same time, it would prove as a tonic to them and draw them. These can by judicious management and association of the people become paying concerns for the state. He who will handle the problem of temperance will have to give a more serious study to it than the Minister seems to have done. Let him study the methods adopted in America and tried by the great temperance organisations of the world. This study will give but limited help. For the Western conditions are widely different from the Indian. Our methods too will have, therefore, to be largely different. Whereas total prohibition in the West is most difficult of accomplishment, I hold that it is the easiest of accomplishment in this country. When an evil like drink in the West attains the status of respectable, it is the most difficult to deal with. With us drink is still, thank God, sufficiently undesirable and confined not to the general body of the people but to a minority of the poor classes—Young India, Ahmedabad.

THE TEST OF MAN.
(By Edgar A. Guest.)

To have lived for the good of a cause; to have come through the test;
Tempted by promise of power, still true to your best,
To have felt the wind slash at your face and the cold
And the rain,
And still to have cherished the faith above station or gain,
This—whether nation or state, whether city or clan,
This, in the eye of the world, is the stamp of a man.
'Tis easy to fight for a cause with the throng at your side
And the multitude cheering you on with their eyes flashing pride,
But let the smiles turn into scorns and throats hurl derision at you.
Then it calls for a God-fearing man to stand straight and dare to be true,
It calls for a God-fearing soul who chooses to struggle and die,
Rather than lower his, best and live what he knows is a lie.

More clamorous often are friends, and sometimes more cruel than foes,
They will ask what a man should deny, and suggest what so foe would propose.
But he who would venture for truth must hear only duty's clear call,
And strike for the goal that he sees till the light shall be seen by them all.
To be tempted and cling to your best to suffer and dare to be true.
This is the test of a man, this only a great man can do,
MISS MAYO'S ACCURACY.

I

The Rev. H. A. Popple is writing a series of articles in the Indian Witness, Lucknow, on Miss Katherine Mayo's book Mother India. In the first article occurs the following: "On pages 132 and 133 she gives an account of the Victoria School, Lahore, and quotes, in inverted commas, statements of the Principal, Miss Bose. I have consulted this lady and find that a great many of the things printed in inverted commas were never spoken. Further Miss Bose is not of the third generation of an Indian Christian family. The statements in para three of that page (132), in regard to lower caste children is not accurate and was never made. On the top of page 134 she says that male pandits have to teach behind a curtain. Miss Bose informs me that 'Hindu girls are always taught Sanskrit by male pandits without purdah!' and that the statement in regard to the pandit of tottering age is an entire imaginary. I have consulted the pandit of tottering age, Rgo. of the Bengal.' The quotation in inverted commas, on the top of page 134, that 'their cooking, in later life, they would never by nature do with their own hands but would leave entirely to filthy servants,' whence come much sickness and death' is entirely imaginary. Miss Bose says in reply to it, 'cooking is done by ladies of every class, even when they have servants. Servants are not filthy in any good houses, and certainly not in Hindu houses.'

I have felt it necessary to deal with this rather extensively because it is a case which, I have been able to investigate, and here we find an entire lack of appreciation for strict accuracy. It is most likely that in the innumerable quotations given without names the same inaccuracy would be found."

(Mr. Popple's page-references throughout are to the American edition of Miss Mayo's book)

II

"Ditcher" writing in the Calcutta, Calcutta, says:—

"Miss Katherine Mayo is seemingly conscious of her limitations for she shows a fondness for smoking-room stories to elle out her mass of stale kall. Those who told them to her polled her leg egregiously. Take the following for instance:

'Here is a story from the lips of one whose veracity has never I believe, been questioned. The time was the stormy period in 1920 when the new Reforms Act was casting doubt over the land and giving rise to the persistent rumour that Britain was about to quit. My informant, who had had experience in the land, was visiting one of the more important of the princes—a man of great charm, cultivation and force, whose work for his State was of the first order. T.e prince's Dewan was also present and the three gentlemen had been talking at ease, as became the old friends that they were.

'His Highness does not believe,' said the Dewan, 'that Britain is going to leave India. But still, under this new regime in England they may be so ill-advised. So His Highness is getting his troops in shape, accumulating munitions and coining silver. And if the English do go, three months afterwards not a rupee or a virgin will be left in all Bengal.'

To this His Highness sitting in his capital distant from Bengal by half the breadth of India, cordially agreed. His ancestors through the ages had been predatory Mahratta chiefs.'

I heard the original of that story much better and more racy told more than forty years ago. The actors were Lord Dufferin and Sir Pertab Singh, the gallant Rajput who so often acted as Regent of Jodhpur.

"What would happen if the British left India?" asked the Viceroy.

"What would happen," replied the Rajput warrior, "I would call to my Jawans to boot and saddle and in a month there would not be a virgin or a rupee left in Bengal."

I knew Sir Pertab well, and at the Curzonian durbar I asked him if this conversation had ever taken place.

"Lie my friend, a damned lie," be answered sturdily, "We, Rajputs, never offend the inoffensive. When we insult our foes we give them the chance to retaliate with the sword." I am tempted to quote Sydney Smith on American glibbity but why libel a nation for the rantings of an eccentric woman?"

WHAT MARRIAGE MEANS IN RUSSIA

So much has been written on the subject of the Russian marriage laws, and such lacks of knowledge has been shown by many writers, that our readers will doubtless be interested in the following extracts from the U. S. R. "Code of Laws on Marriage, the Family and Guardianship," which became operative from January last.

To fully appreciate the Russian laws it is well to remember that by the Roman Law mere consent constituted a marriage and mutual consent likewise brought about a divorce. Further, it was quite usual under Roman Law for the parties to have a trial of matrimonial relations before taking the definite step of marriage, and the subsequent formal marriage legitimated children already born. This Roman system forms the basis of most Continental marriage laws, as also in Scotland, South America, some States in U. S. A. and South Africa. In England, Australasia and the remaining States of U. S. A. the English Common Law prevails, and by that the services of a clerk in holy orders was required for a valid marriage. Later in all countries some form of State registrar was instituted, the position being met in countries under the English common law by appointing the ministers of religion to be registrars under the secular law. In Continental countries, however, the civil and religious ceremonies are kept separate, and it is the former that alone constitutes a valid marriage. As regards legitimation by subsequent marriage some States governed by English laws have adopted the principle.

By the new Russian code marriage is formalised by registration in a department for the entry of acts of civil condition, and registration is established in the interests of the State and of society, as well as with a view to facilitating the protection of the rights and interests of the married parties and of their children."

Ecclesiastical marriages contracted before December 20, 1927 (sic.) are recognised as registered marriages.
Article 3.—Persons who are in de facto marital relations, but who have not been registered in the prescribed manner, have the right at any time to formalise their relations by registration.

Article 5.—The minimum matrimonial age is 16 years.

Article 6.—Marriages may not be registered—(a) between persons either of whom is already party to another registered or unregistered marriage.

Article 7.—On registering a marriage the parties can declare their desire to bear jointly the surname of the husband or wife, or to retain their pre-marital surnames.

Article 10.—Property belonging to the married parties prior to their contracting marriage shall remain their separated property. Property acquired by the married parties during marriage is considered their common property.

Article 14.—(Mutual rights of maintenance according to necessity of the one party and the capability of the other).

Article 16.—(The same right of maintenance in the case of de facto marital relations).

Article 18.—Marriage may be dissolved during the lifetime of the parties by mutual consent of the parties or by unilateral desire of either of them.

Article 20.—Should a divorce not have been registered the fact of the dissolution of marriage can be certified by the court.

Article 22.—(Deals with fixing liability to educate and maintain children, and to maintain indigent party in case of divorce).

Article 25.—... Children of unmarried parents enjoy the same rights as children born in wedlock.

Article 28.—(The right of a mother or expectant mother to register the name of the putative father).

Article 29.—(Notification to putative father. If no disclaimer within one month he is then registered as the father. Within one year the putative father may bring disclaimer within other...).

ARTICLES 43, 54, 55.—(Mutual rights of children and parents; brothers and sisters, grandchildren and grand-parents to maintenance according to necessity and ability).

Article 57.—Adoption is allowed only in respect of minors, and solely in the interests of the children.

Article 63.—Adoption of children of 10 years and over is not allowed without their consent—(Stead's Review, Australasia).

THE WORLD'S ALLIANCE OF Y. M. C. A.'S PLENARY MEETING IN GENEVA.

A correspondent who has just returned from Geneva writes: Geneva has in recent years come to be a centre for all kinds of International gatherings; and among these a recent one of outstanding interest was the Plenary Meeting of the World's Alliance of Y. M. C. A.'s which met there in August of this year. In size, it was not exceptional; perhaps a hundred all told; but these were representatives of many nations and types and languages. To those whose vision of the distant, this gathering was a wonderful revelation of the range and scope of the great movement as a whole. Here sat side by side a British Army Officer and a negro Principal of a 'coloured' College from South America; a distinguished Judge from Poland and a cherub-faced school boy from Holland. Many of them were men who carried weight in their own lands; several were high officials from the staff of the League of Nations; some had snatched a few spare moments from the Disarmament Conference which was then sitting, in order to bring their contribution to the work of the Y. M. C. A. Leaders of the Churches were there; eminent among them, Bishop Veleminovic of Serbia, whose life of suffering and heroism has made him a national hero among his own people; grave Lutheran pastors from Germany and Scandinavia; and in the chair, Dr. John H. Mott perhaps the greatest figure in the world of Christian statesmanship to-day. Certainly a remarkable and diverse gathering; but linked together in the loose but real bands of brotherhood—not of Church, nor of race, but in a movement which has won for itself a high place among the many agencies which seek to serve the young men and boys of every land, in the name of Christ.

What were the subjects discussed at this world-wide gathering? Some of them were just 'domestic' problems of the Y.M.C.A.'s but interesting because of the variety of 'background' which they presented. Others were subjects of general concern to all Christian people. Among these was the problem of co-operation among the different branches of Christendom, through the agency of the Y.M.C.A. For many years past the Y.M.C.A. has provided a platform open to all Protestant Churches; but of late, this sphere has been widened, first by the eagerness with which the Orthodox Churches of Eastern Europe have welcomed its work, and now by a request which is being made by the young laymen of the Roman Catholic Church (though not, at present, generally endorsed by their Priests) in countries such as Poland, Austria, South America and the Philippines, that the Y. M. C. A. should extend its work in their midst, because they feel that it offers them avenues of service which are essential to a wholesome development of Christian character. Another theme which occupied some time was that of the world-wide study of the Life of Jesus Christ which is being planned for 1928 and 1929; a scheme which originated in Canada; and was there called, 'The celebration of the 19th Century of the Public Ministry of Jesus.' Study outlines, fresh and stimulating, are being issued in three Languages, English, French and German from the World's Y.M.C.A. Office in Geneva, to every National Y.M.C.A. in the world, and it is hoped that next year thousands of young men and boys will be meeting in small groups, all over the world, for a fresh study of the Life of Christ, and the significance of his teaching for young men and boys of to-day. These are, but one or two instances out of many, to illustrate the world-wide scope of the work of the Y.M.C.A. in many lands; a work which is linked together and its varied experience made available for all, through the 'Clearing-House' of the world's Alliance of Y.M.C.A.'s at Geneva.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Rural Service Exhibition, Madras: In connection with the Rural Service Exhibition held in Madras about the end of August, the Trustees administering the Rural Reconstruction Fund instituted by the Hon. Mr. A. Ranganatha Mudaliar have decided to offer... two prizes of Rs. 50 each for the best paper in the English language on the following topics:—(1) How a Teacher can most constructively assist the Rural Reconstruction Movement in South India? (2) How an educated Indian citizen can by voluntary effort most constructively assist the Rural Reconstruction Movement in South India? The merits of the papers will be judged by a Committee consisting of (i) Rao Bahadur N. Gopalaswamy Iyengar, B. A. (Registrar-General of Village Panchayats, Madras), (ii) Mr. K. T. Paul (of the Y. M. C. A.), and (iii) Mr. V. Venkata Subbiah, B. A. (of the Servants of India Society, Royapettah, Madras).

On the recommendation of this Committee the final decision will be made by the Trustees. Competition is open to anyone of either sex in the Madras Presidency. Mysore, Travancore and Cochin. A competitor may attempt both subjects if he chooses to do so. Papers should not exceed 4000 words and should be submitted by the 15th November 1927 to Mr. V. Venkata Subbiah by registered post.

Ushagram—a Model Village: The Forward contains the following interesting information: About two miles from the town of Asansol on the Grand Trunk Road, there is fairly large property belonging to the American Mission. The experiment is being conducted under the direction of an American gentleman who is a University Graduate in Agriculture. At present ten cottages, accommodating about 50 people have been built. Each cottage has its own vegetable and flower garden also a poultry yard. A Co-operative Store, a Savings Bank, and a Hospital are being run by the villagers themselves. There is also a middle English School together with carpentry and blacksmith shops giving vocational training to the villagers. Five or six people living in a cottage form a family unit. Each family has its own paddy field where they cultivate rice according to the principles of drill farming. A Co-operative Society has been formed which includes the Director of Public Instruction, Bengal, the ex-President, the New Day. The experiment is being conducted within a couple of miles from the town of Asansol on the Grand Trunk Road, there is fairly large property belonging to the American Mission.

The allegation that the Y. M. C. A. distributed literature in Mesopotamia which caused unpleasant incidents is not established. With regard to the allegation that anti-British missionaries were allowed to lecture under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. Committee states that about 4000 lectures are delivered every year in the Y. M. C. A. halls and some check is kept over the lecturer and the subject matter by the Royal Y. M. C. A. Boards including the Europeans and Indians of the locality. It is admitted that in certain cases mistakes, though very few in number, have occurred. The Committee opinion that more efficient control might be exercised by the Y. M. C. A. authorities over lecturers and lectures. Referring to the allegations that American money is running the Calcutta branch the committee finds that the American Association made certain building grants to the Calcutta branch, where two Canadians and one American are the secretaries. The policy now adopted is that these grants should be gradually reduced until they are extinguished. No cash grants, however, have been made to any local Y. M. C. A.

The allegations that Y. M. C. A. boys scouts are not allowed to sing "God save the King" the Committee finds is not supported by evidence. The statement that Sir Arthur Yap came out to India to inquire into the Y. M. C. A.'s (red) activities is not supported by facts. The committee states only three out of 117 paid officials of the Y. M. C. A. participated in politics, two of them having been nominated to legislatures by the Governor General and a Ruling Prince respectively and one elected by the European community.

NOTES

Mahatma Gandhi and Shastras:
We are sorry that Mahatma Gandhi by his speeches in South India has revived a useless controversy which had been buried for several years past. The early Indian reformers sought to popularize social reforms by citing texts from the Shastras showing that the changes they advocated were merely a return to the ancient ways followed by the great Indian Kshitas. This line of argument led to an endless wrangling over the meaning of words and their grammatical construction, and converted social reform into a fight over participles and adjectives. The Indian Social Reformer from the first abandoned this logomybia and advocated a rational basis for social reform. In course of time, the Shastras method fell into disuse. The Pandits came to recognize that they had no locus standi in the discussion of social reform and, like the wise men they are, ceased to intrude themselves in it. Mahatmajii by his incautious reference to the Shastras, has given them a pretext to poke their nose into matters about which their knowledge and experience count for very little. A controversy on an old text with a Shastri can never be conclusive, as the Pandit even though vanquished will argue still. Mahatmajii will do well to conserve his energies for more useful purposes than converting Pandits to rational views. The Pandits in the past have accomplished much by self-interest and come into line with the times; whereas, if any one asks them to support reform, they will not consider their duty done, unless they raise all sorts of difficulties against every proposal.

The Flesh and the Spirit:
The Mahatma is also reported to have said at the opening of the session of Dr. Rajan's hospital that a multiplicity of hospitals was no sign of civilization. "We want healers of souls rather than of bodies. Instead of my having allowed myself to be treated by my medical friends, I must repeat what I have said before, that the less we and others pamper our bodies, the better it would be for us and the world." With this astounding time we paused and considered awhile before we persisted in this punishment and starvation of the body. Even the body has rights, and may it not be that neglect of those rights may cause it to垮? Are we not driving the body beyond the limits of endurance? Even Francis of Assisi is said to have confessed on his death-bed "I have been too hard on brother Ass." It should be our endeavour rather to reinforce the spirit than merely content ourselves with chastising the body. Francis Thompson in a little essay sums up the position very succinctly. He writes: "In these days the body is, but a weak beast, and may not stand a tithe of the burdens a Francis of Assisi piled upon him with, scarce more than a responsive groan. Chastising, he needs: he will not sustain overmuch of chastisement. How shall asceticism address itself to this etiolated body of death? The weak, dastardly body of asceticism — never more. The task before religion is to persuade and constrain it to take up its load. It demands great tenderness and great firmness, as with a child. The child is led by love, and swayed by authority. It must feel the love behind the inflexible will; the will always firm behind the love. And today as never before one must love the body, must gently patient with it."

Methods of Prohibition: "The Excise Minister in the Madras Government outlined, sometime ago his scheme of introducing prohibition," writes the Indian Daily Mail, "as an experiment, in two select districts, the idea being to extend it gradually to the other districts of the Presidency, should the experiment prove a success. Opinion was not, however, unanimous as to the soundness of the scheme. One school of dissenters held that the object of enforcing prohibition would not be achieved by the scheme as, in these days of easy and rapid transport, it would not be sufficiently for people to go to these areas of prohibition, drink to their hearts' content and yet be none the worse for it so far as the law was concerned. How far this objection weighed, with the Minister does not know. But we are glad to see that Mr. Gandhi does not give his blessing to this kind of piece-meal prohibition. He is, of the opinion that prohibition must be introduced simultaneously throughout the Presidency and that anything short of it will be useless. There is much force in his remark that the Minister's scheme is objectionable because, if prohibition should be a failure in one place and at one time, people will think that it will be a failure everywhere. It is difficult to prophesy whether Mr. Gandhi's opinion of his scheme will induce the Minister to extend it or to drop, even his original scheme. One fact, which Mr. Gandhi emphasises, should give the greatest encouragement to the Ministers, and that is, if there is one country in the world where it is easiest to introduce prohibition, it is India, where drinking is regarded among all classes as a degradation."

The Child Marriage Bill: We have published elsewhere the full text of Mr. Haribadas Sarda's Bill to prevent child marriages and raise the age of marriage among the Hindus. The Bill has been referred to a Select Committee. The consensus of opinion expressed in the press as comments upon the Bill show that the age limit fixed in the Bill as 12 for girls and 15 for boys is too low and should be raised at least to 14 and 18 respectively. Our legislators should not be more conservative than orthodoxy itself. The marriage age of girls is surprisingly lower than that mentioned in the Bill. It is decidedly higher among the educated classes. With the spread of education among girls, the tendency to raise the marriage age is rapidly gaining ground. If the Bill is to be as a more general application and seriously to effect a reform in marriage the alteration to 14 and 18 as the minimum ages at which marriages can be contracted should prove beneficial. One other point we wish to bring to the notice of the Select Committee with regard to the Bill, it is that the practice of child marriage is not peculiar to the Hindu society only. One has only to refer to the Census reports to prove that it exists to an equal, if not greater extent, in Mahomedan, Sikh and Christian communities. This being the case the object of the Bill will be defeated if it is sought to benefit only one community. We hope the Select Committee will see their way to amend the Bill in such a way as to make it of universal application to all communities in India.

The Right Attitude: In supporting Mr. Hailey's Second Reading of the Bill for the protection of child marriages, Mr. Jayakar spoke with the fervour of one who feels strongly the evil effects of the custom. Impressing on the members of the Legislative Assembly the proper and only attitude, he observed: "I want the Englishmen on the opposite benches to take up a proper attitude on such questions. I can quite understand, Sir, that dealing with questions of this complexity, as they appear to Englishmen, their attitude would be as follows:—"I will not apply my own mind to this question to see whether the remedy wanted is right or wrong; I am told by certain sections of Hindus that it concerns their religion; that gives me a slight; I won't touch the matter; let it go." That attitude, Sir, is the attitude of ignorance and timidity. A more natural attitude, if I may presume to speak for the benefit of my English friends opposite, would be this. Let them judge this question from their inherent notions of right and wrong. Having judged all such questions as enlightened individuals can come to a determination that the matter is inherently right, then as forming the Government they are entitled to look for a certain measure of support from the enlightened sections of the community. We can never get on any question of social reform the whole of the country to agree. The Government is entitled to ask themselves after having decided that a Bill is a right measure, whether the enlightened section of the community give their support to it. In every community there are enlightened and unenlightened sections and the enlightened section of the community give their support to it. In every community there are enlightened and unenlightened sections and the enlightened section of the community give their support to it. In every community there are enlightened and unenlightened sections and the enlightened section of the community give their support to it. In every community there are enlightened and unenlightened sections and the enlightened section of the community give their support to it. In every community there are enlightened and unenlightened sections and the enlightened section of the community give their support to it. In every community there are enlightened and unenlightened sections and the enlightened section of the community give their support to it.

During the glorious renaissance of British legislation which went on for 30 to 40 years, but which unfortunately absolutely ended with the Morley-Minto reforms, did you not take your courage into your hands? Governments were not so timid in those days. Look at the speeches which were made by Government Members on those occasions,—names which have stood as beacon lights in the annals of British social legislation. I have not time to go into those speeches. 'We think that this measure is right and we are supported in that belief by the enlightened opinon in this country. That is enough for our purpose. We proceed on, taking the consequences.' That is the right attitude for my friends opposite."

Civil Aviation: It was announced recently that the Government of India are formulating a scheme to grant scholarships for the training of Indian youths in civil aviation. The possibilities of a civil air service are great in not only speeding up communication but also for the progress of cultivation and commerce. This experience has been borne out by countries which have the good fortune to possess air services. Eager as the Indian youths are to be trained in civil aviation, any scheme outlined for this purpose must be carefully scrutinised before taking shape. We have only too often been inveigled into schemes which have only served to create new posts for and enrich Englishmen at our cost. The lamentable tardiness exhibited in the military training of Indians should prove as a warning to the unwary who would fain embark on this scheme. Such schemes should be held in abeyance until a better day for India and more sense of responsibility dawns on the ruling classes. Meanwhile such of the Indians as are de-irous of attaining proficiency in this field would do well to seek the necessary training abroad.

Efficiency of Indian Mill-Hands: The Tom Shaw Deputation merits the thanks of the textile workers for appraising the work of the Indian mill-hands. Writing on this subject, the Bankopore Express makes the following pertinent remarks: "Once more the fallacy of the argument against the efficiency and competency of Indian mill hands has been exposed to the naked eye. It has become a fashion with the Anglo-Indian journals to belittle the capacity of Indians to organise Indian mills. This is done to thwart Indian demands for the protection of textile or other Industries. It is argued that such protection can only work with improved technical equipment and organisation. But it has been clearly shown that the real cause for recognising the claim of Indian Industries for protection lies somewhere else. The Tom Shaw Deputation made a close investigation into this question in India. The result of its investigation found echo before the Textile Workers Conference at Blackmore. The skill and industry of Indian millhands was rightly praised. It showed that the Indian mills are as good as, if not superior to, in the matter of efficiency and equipment, those of Lancashire. Who after this testimony can doubt that given required encouragement the Indian mills cannot become self-contained and efficient enough to hold their own against non-Indian-managed mill?"

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1927.

"MOTHER INDIA."

VI

Miss Katherine Mayo makes a number of allegations as typical of the Indian's sex-life from the time of his getting into the world. She begins with the Hindu religion. "Shiva, one of the greatest of the Hindu deities," she writes, "is represented, on high road shrines, on the little altar of the home, or in personal amulets, by the image of the male generative organ, in which shape he receives the daily sacrifices of the devout. The followers of Vishnu, multitudinous in the south, from their childhood wear painted upon their foreheads the sign of the function of generation. And although it is accepted that the ancient inventors of these and kindred emblems intended them as aids to the climbing of spiritual heights, practice and extremely detailed narrative of the intimacies of the gods preserved in the hymns of the fireside, give them literal meaning and suggestive power, as well as religious sanction in the common mind." (p. 31.)

Miss Mayo cites Abbe Dubois as her authority for the meaning of the religious symbols and for the view that they operate as a constant reminder of the sexual function to the Hindu mind. The origin of religious symbols may interest antiquarians but its value as an aid to the devout soul, who has sought God sincerely and have in some measure found Him, is a great asset of Hinduism, says the author. From his "Religious Thought and Life in India," Miss Mayo writes, "Throughout its poems there is such an accent of humility and adoration, such a sense of its unworthiness and of the divine grace, as seems to bring him very near indeed to the spirit of the Christian Saint. Again and again we find Manikka-Vasagar giving assistance to such experiences as are common to all devout souls who have sought God sincerely and have in some measure found Him." (Indian Theism, p. 172.)

Miss Mayo's interpretation of the Vaihanna sign is also based upon Abbe Dubois. But the meaning which the Abbe read into the sign is his own invention. Prof. E. H. Wilson, an admitted authority on the subject, in his book, "Religious Sects of the Hindus," says that this mark is "supposed to represent the saukha, shell, the discus, the club and the lotus, which Vishnu bears in his four hands." (The Rev. H. A. Popeley in the Indian Witness of Sept. 7.)

Hindu exponents of Saivism deny the phallic origin of the linga. Swami Vivekananda, whom Miss Katherine Mayo contemptuously dismisses as "a modern teacher of the spiritual sense of the Phallic cult,” attributed the phallic interpretation to the invertebrate's tendency of the Westerner to look at things from the physical and objective side. That great authority on Indian Art, Dr. Ananda Coomaraswami, approaching the question from a different point of view, has also repudiated the phallic theory of the origin of the Linga. Whatever may be the truth regarding its origin, there can be no more conclusive proof of the absence of any phallicism in the conception of the Linga for long centuries than that the Siva cult, of which the linga is still the great symbol, has on the admission of Christian missionary writers, produced a devotional literature unsurpassed for its fervor of faith. "No cult of the world," says Dr. Burnett, "has produced a richer devotional literature or one more intense with brilliancy of imagination, fervor of feeling, and grace of expression." (Heart of India, p. 80, quoted by Dr. Macnicol in his "Indian Theism").
"The Hindu Sacred Books" with the remark that "these various details remind us of the Christian mark, the mark of the Cross made upon the forehead at Baptism, or of that seal mentioned in the book of Revelation where the angel "Sealed the servants of our God in the forehead." (p. 81).

Though Miss Katherine Mayo started by declaring that she would undertake the task of informing the religion of the Hindus and her almost sole authority in this campaign is the Abbe Dubois. Here is another instance:

"In case, however, of the continued failure of the wife—any wife—to give him a child, the Hindu husband has a last resource; he may send his wife on a pilgrimage to a temple, bearing gifts. And, it is affirmed, some cases habitually save time by giving birth to a child as fast as the amorous husband can bear them. At the temple, by day, the woman must beseech the God for a son, and at night she must sleep within the sacred precincts. Morning comes, she has a tale to tell the priest of what befell her under the darkness.

"Give praise, O daughter of honour," he replies.

"It was the God."

And so she returns to her home. If a child comes, and it lives, a year later, she revisits the temple, carrying, with other gifts, the hair from her child's head." (Mother India, p. 37)

The authority for this story is again Abbe Dubois, but it might have been Boccacio who inspired the Abbe with the idea. "Friar Alberto makes a woman believe that the Archangel Gabriel is in love with her and visits her several times at night under that pretence. The aegre immorality of the monastic orders of the Church of which the Abbe Dubois was such a shining light, is a frequent theme not only of the great Italian, but of several subsequent writers. Abbe Dubois did not come to this country because he felt a call to do so. According to his own statement, he fled from the horrors of the French Revolution. "Had I remained," he writes, "I should in all probability have fallen a victim, as did so many of my friends who held the same religious and political opinions as myself." The corruption and licentiousness of the clergy was one of the causes of the French Revolution which made a clean sweep of the Christian Deity and installed the Goddess of Reason instead. Many of Abbe Dubois' observations on Hindu religion are merely his reading into it of the things he had known of the religion in his own country. The story of childless wives going to temples to be visited at night by God in the person of a priest is distinctly a reminiscence from the Abbe's Seminary days. The Abbe's life in India was in keeping with his training. He was an importer from first to last and that of deliberate purpose. "I had no sooner arrived amongst the natives of India," he writes, "than I recognised the absolute necessity of gaining their confidence. Accordingly I made it my constant rule to live as they did. I adopted their style of clothing, and I studied their customs and method of life in order to be exactly like them. I even went so far as to avoid any display of renunciation to the majority of their peculiar prejudices. By such circumstantial conduct I was able to ensure a free and heartily welcome from people of all castes and conditions, and was often favoured of their own accord with the most curious and interesting particulars about themselves." Notwithstanding all this camouflage, the Abbe's work as a Christian Missionary was, on his own admission, a humiliating failure. "The restraints and privations under which I have lived," he wrote, "by conforming myself to the usages of the country; embracing, in many respects, the prejudices of the natives; living like them, and becoming all but a Hindu myself; in short, by being made all things to all men that I might by all means save some—all these have proved of no avail to make me proselytes. During the long period I have lived in India, in the capacity of a missionary, I have made, with the assistance of a native missionary, in all between two and three hundred converts of both sexes. Of this number two-thirds were Pariahs or beggars; and the rest were composed of Sudras, vagrants, outcasts of several tribes, who being without resources, turned Christian in order to form connexions, chiefly for the purpose of marriage, or with some other interested views." (Editor's Introduction to Third Edition, pp. xxvi, xxvii.)

The Abbe, foiled in his missionary work, thought of serving Christianity in another way. He writes:

"There is one motive which above all others has influenced my determination (to write the book). It struck me that a faithful picture of the wickedness and incongruities of polytheism and idolatry would by its very ugliness help greatly to set off the beauties and perfections of Christianity. It was thus that the Lacedaemonians placed drunken slaves in the sight of their children in order to inspire the latter with a horror of intemperance." (Author's Preface, p. 9)

It is astonishing that in spite of this candid avowal of the Abbe that, his main object in writing his book, was to set off the excellences of Christianity against the wickedness of Hinduism, it should be accepted as a reliable account of Hindu manners and customs. The period during which the Abbe lived in India was also the period of greatest rivalry between the British and the French. The fact that the Abbe retired with a pension from the British East India Company "in recognition of many services he had rendered in India," may be regarded either as a testimony to the disinterested generosity of the East India Company or to the judicious patriotism of the Abbe himself.

The Abbe's book is on the same plane of reliability as Miss Katherine Mayo's. Both bring a strong preconceived bias to their task. The Abbe was a fanatic and fanatical propagandist for Christianity; Miss Mayo is the equally fanatic apostle (professed) of White domination. In fact, believers in reincarnation may think that the sanctimonious Abbe of a century ago has been reborn as the American Sanitary missionary of our time.

Some critics of Miss Mayo's book give her credit for being a trained observer. No trained observer will accept without verification from other sources, statements of a gross character contained in a book awkwardly intended to damn one religion for the glorification of another, as Miss Mayo has done not once but repeatedly.
CHRISTIANS AND CHRISTIAN MISSIONARIES.

(By Messrs. V. Venugopala Rao, B.A.)

In these days, when most of the isles of our country can be traced to a missionary of one religion or other, it has to be generally admitted that the Christian missionary alone is the last culpable, in fact, a positively neutral outsider. All the highly patriotic Indians, with a view to shift the blame on to some other quarter of his person, have looked upon him as the forerunner of conquest and exploitation. It does not require a long array of evidence to prove his baselessness of that accusation, for though the means and resolve have on their own initiative followed closely on the heels of the missionary, he and the general had neither anything in common nor even his semblance of a past. He is and has been, according to his own lights, an humble minister of Christ. The Hindu Indians may take strong objection to the psychology of the evangelist which revolts absolutely other than Christian to the limb or his horrors of eternal damnation, and in the bargain it revolts their merits the weigest of the other religious in a distorted scale of his own making and denounces as superficial our spiritual concerns note, his nerves fails him when he is confronted by (ism) in the language of that intellectual bravado and snob, George Bernard Shaw "as the shambles of a barbarous ritual of blood sacrifice and the people as dawaters with repulsive rings through their noses." Is will, even, work himself up into a passion and exclaim on ailiging in India, as the late Mr. Hebbiah died, "Here we see Heathenism. Don't you see it? Can't you smell it? Now it is our work to purify him. Here is the composition of death. We must make known the vivifying, purifying life in Christ. We must purify this with the Gospel." (Vide page 16, Samuel Hebbiah, Master Fishor of Men.) With a perfect sangfroid, and with a desire to popularize the lesson, will also, in the words of a sister of the nosoph of a regiment stationed at Cannore, manufacture "true Christians with a faith of the 'master please kind.'" (Page 206, Samuel Hebbiah.) But, here he stops. It is foreign to the nature of a modern Christian missionary to proclaim an insidious or a jealous to breed fanatical elements. He will, certainly, not object to the most unearthly music playing before his church. In short, he will do nothing to wound the cherished sentiments of his neighbours and another faith.

The Indian Christians, most who are his handword, are the deics andreased of citizens and fit into the body politic of India, with the same ease as the rest of the Indians do. Lawabiding to a fault, the highly educated among them, far from projecting their bigotry to eht point of fanning the inflammable elements in its Unused lengths, exhibit an exemplary tolerance of outlook. Firmly rooted in their own belief, they will, instinctively, shrink from riots. In the voluminous history of our religious wrangles, there is hardly a single instance of Christianity in spite of its professed attitude towards other religions and vice versa, ever embroiling itself in them. Wordy combats, may even slowly pamphleteering and propagation, and glaring instances where the Christian missionaries have freely and with impunity damned the magnificient religion of the Hindus, and the proverbially tolerant Hindus have retorted by reviling the immaculate conception of Christ to the top of their bent, but the Christian, under the gravest of provocations, has neither stabbed his adversary in the back, nor dragged him to a law court, for obtaining a judicial pronouncement on the divinity of Christ, He has not also shown the least desire to raise a legislative fence round the divinity of Christ, though the Government itself, prompted by the spirit of the Dark Ages, is anxious to arrange those whose shining armour of divinity biases all the more for the insolent mud-slinging, as mendicants round an earthly seat of judgment.

In the dawn of Christianity, fanaticism encouraged sovereigns—got the better of the people, and bloodshed and distraction followed in its wake. But they were into insignificance before the sweeping and world-encompassing onslaughts of a Jangikhan or a Tombrlane. Ever since the French Revolution, Europe has turned a new leaf altogether. Today there is not a single Christian in Europe who does not blush to the roots of his being over the frenzied wars that his ancestors fought. By way of explanation, there is at present, a serious effort made by English statesmen to restrain the homeless Jew in Palestine and it would not be a wonder if in consequence of this sympathy, the western races after having lost their way in the divinity of Christ, may well also be the same sclat of Christianity, the luxurious idolatry of Catholicism, embrace once again the parent theism of Israel.

Furthermore, to counter-balance the disproportionate zeal of the missionary who comes out to India innumerable people of Europe and America are, passing through states of agnosticism, atheism, and apathetic Christianity. For every uncompromising catagist, there are millions of Joges, Aandole, Frances, Bolashvists, the liberal Catholics of France and Portugal and a vast majority of nominal Christians, who readily fall a prey to Adventism, Mormonism and such other ideas,—with a sparkling of God's goodmen like Romain Roland, Masterlinck, A. E., Dean Inge and the other intellectuals of the West and our own saintly Andrews, whose greatness lies in the fact that they have outgrown parochialism and raised Christianity to such sublime heights where prevail a confraternity of religions. The orthodox Christianity of the early Papal period is non-existent in Europe to-day, and with the Reformation there has flourished in that country a legion of critical students of the Bible and hostile reviewers of Christian theology and doctrine. Let us, towards the middle of the 19th century due to Bradlaugh and other free thinkers of the Continent, liberty of conscience, may even absolute license, became an accomplished fact.

From the Christian missionaries and those committed to their charge, we will turn our attention to their religion as it prevails in India. The early missionaries came to India with slender philosophical resources but rich in curtilous language and imagery. As time went on, he saw the rich heritage of India and changed his angle of vision. The Victor was vanquished, with the result that Christianity which reached us in an undisguised western garb underwent an orientation. The selfsame missionary, who, but for the welcome change in his judgment, would have a supreme iconoclastic indignation reduee all our sacred idols into a mass of debris, soon unconsciously realised the untold value of Bhakul Marga and the need for incorporating the eternal wisdom of the Hindus into Christianity to save it from the danger of formalism and inanity. The Indian on his side reciprocated this new spirit by trying to prove that Christ was none other than Kshab Krishan and by thus drawing him nearer home wished to press him to his bosom. The fact that in the political world the Indians see in their accredited leader Gandhi an unmistakable likeness to Christ indicates the "almost complete capture by Christ of the citadel of India's thought," though "educated India does not seem to find much that is attractive in the Christian church to-day; on the contrary, it appears to be repelled alike by Christianity as a dogmatism and by the Church as its western organised garb." (Rev. A. M. Chirgwin in the London Quarterly Review.)

The whole trend of influence is for the better; it will ultimately end either by Christianity finding an honoured place in the ample bosom of Hinduism, the Mother of religions, as Buddhism has done, or by Christianity retaining its status quo and becoming what in reality it is a religion of the heart, rather than a proselytising faith which takes for its motto large-scale production, and Hinduism living side by side with it on terms of perfect amity. Already Christianity and Hinduism have approached nearer enough and it rests with the Christian missionaries to make it possible for them, by ceasing on their side to offend the Hindus who have uniformly, either from fear or genuine charity, given Christ his just recognition. If the prevailing signs are potential, we see in the near future the prospect of a Christian missionary casting from him the sgho5h of anachronism and becoming the proud standard-bearer of the universal religion as heralded by the real saviour of mankind, Raja Ram Mohan Roy.

Untouchability Campaign in India: It is very significant, writes the Hindu Organs, Jaffna, that the untouchables have been permitted to immence with their own hands and along with other Hindus, the Ganapati images in the tank adjacent to the temple at Yeotmal. We can assure our readers in the out-stations that the Hindu leaders in Jaffna are not idle in this matter. Sincere and unostentations efforts are being made to improve the lot of the untouchables in Jaffna. The Hindu Board of Education is drawing up a plan of work among the untouchables which will be sent to the Hindu associations in the out-stations for their opinion. We are expecting that an Indian Swami who has had considerable experience in the uplift work among the untouchables in India will take charge of the work in Jaffna.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

[ Sept. 24

AMATEUR MENACE.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I am glad to find that my book "Sex Problem in India" has enjoyed the honour of an Editorial note in your issue of the 10th instant. It is very difficult, however, to comprehend the propriety of the short and sharp title "The Amateur Menace" in which you desire to concentrate all your condemnation of my book. Do you really mean that in the field of Social Reform it is possible to have a classification like professional reformers on the one hand and amateur reformers on the other? Such a classification would be neither logical nor very beneficial to the cause of social reform. You have also set me wondering how you call my chapters on marriage "irrelevant to the main purpose." Allow me to remind you of what I have said under "Author's Note" viz. "My aim at least has been to prove in every thoughtful Indian a sincere desire to adopt the Eugenic attitude in life ..." Such an attitude, every student of Eugenics will tell you cannot be determined apart from a detailed discussion of the marriage problem. And need I tell you that the greatest impediment to any kind of reform in our country is the bogy of Shastric injunctions? How could you accuse me of irrelevancy then if, with a view to make out a case for late marriage and love marriage, I devoted some pages to an exegesis of the Hindu Shastras? I can understand honest differences of opinion regarding the various controversial points that have arisen in my book. But your review seems to have been prompted more by a conscious disregard of the correct perspective. Nothing else could explain your own reckless generalisation that I have cited my statistics "with an utter disregard of both accuracy and relevancy." The one instance of inaccurate statistics, of which you have very amiably made much capital, has been noted by other reviewers too. But they have put it down as a result of some haggling in printing and proof-reading. You chose, however, to put another construction. I admit that the figures given on page 99 of my book should have been for every thousand. I have just referred to a copy of my MSS, and I find that what I really observed at the end of these statistics is "This will convince the reader how a decently intense propaganda of social reform, extending over no less than forty years has achieved the pitiable result of increasing the percentage of virgins of ten or more by the negligible figure of 12." Unfortunately I put this twelve in figures and in the process of composing it was transformed into "two." This is how the incorrect statistics crop in my book. It certainly gives me great pain to find that such important statistics should have appeared in an incorrect form in the book, but what is more painful is to find myself charged with a deliberately attempt to invent the Census Figures. I have a shrewd suspicion that your prejudice against my book has been aggravated by your notion that I am opposed to Social Reform. But a thoughtful and patient reader of my book would hardly countenance such a notion. What I wish to emphasise is that Social Reform in our country has not, up to now been inspired by the Eugenic Ideal and has consequently lacked unity. Instead of belittling the efforts of social reformers I have only pointed to them the supreme importance of the Eugenic question and drawn their attention to certain problems which they have not handled till now. If your only root complaint against my book is that my name has not figured amongst the stalwart social reformers of the older generation, I have nothing else to do but at once to confess to "the atrocious crime of being a young man."

Kothes, 14th Sept, 1927.

Yours etc.,

N. S. PHADKE.

[What we meant by attributing amateurism to Professor Phadke's book is that he has, like most amateurs, not taken pains to study the history of the social reform movement he had set himself up to criticize. As regards the gross statistical perversion which he says was a prank of the printer's devil, it is the duty of the author of a work purporting to be a serious scientific study, to see either personally or with the aid of a competent assistant that the figures are accurately presented, and not corrected by readers of his book, and will mislead students of Indian social conditions in foreign countries. The least he should do is to stop issuing any more copies and have an erasure slip attached to them.—Ed., I. S. R.]

"MOTHER INDIA."

I

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

We have been reading with interest your criticisms of Miss Mayo's book and are the more anxious to read Mother India for ourselves. Not having done so as yet we do not feel capable of pressing much of an opinion upon the controversy. Taking it all in all, however, as we have viewed the situation as it has appeared in the press, I am inclined to say that Mahatmaji's attitude as set forth in recent issue of Young India is the one to take. He is a BRAVE MAN.

By the way, I wonder if Miss Mayo can publish anything much more damaging to the good opinion in which educated India is desirous of being held, than the premier page of India published in English, namely the Amirita Basar Patria, has itself displayed in the five columns broad advertisement it was possible for it to allow to appear on a main page (9) in its issue of the 13th instant.

"Satirity in Lust and Luxury" Badhabah-Nababi Model, Rs. 9 per ern.

It is this sort of thing, the helps to confirm the conviction in many minds that Miss Mayo can't have been so very far wrong. All lovers of India can not but deplore such a playing into the hands of her critics.

II

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

In your comment on "Mother India" by Miss Mayo September 9, 1927 number, concerning Child Marriages you say "Child Marriages were common among ancient Greeks and Romans, and among the Hebrews Jesus Christ was born of an "espoused wife" whose marriage with Joseph had not been consummated." To tell you the truth, I do not like this remark of yours bringing in Jesus Christ and Mary in this connection. Do you mean to say that since Mary's marriage with Joseph had not been consummated, Mary was a child? Please note that amongst the Jews a girl was never espoused unless she was of a marriageable age. Soon after betrothal, never even one year was allowed to pass, marriage was effected and the woman taken to her husband's house. We never think that Jesus Christ was born of a child-mother. He, being a perfect man and a perfect God, would never leave imperfect examples for others to cite and follow, exactly as you are doing now.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

I have been refraining from any comment upon Mother India until I had the opportunity of reading the book. To date, however, I have been unable to secure a copy, and yet as an American citizen I feel that a word regarding the possible influence of the work is due.

Miss Mayo is a writer of some ability, but her reading is public is by no means a "best seller" public. The price of the book and its value will prevent it from being read by the wide audience that grasps up the popular novel. The book will be read by the intelligentia, people for who the most part are capable of forming their own judgment and weighing the opinions of the book against other materials accessible about India. The real formers of American public opinion about India are the missionaries. It is true that some missionaries persist in presenting a distorted picture, because it helps them to raise funds for their work. But it is also true that the growing body of missionary opinion condemns such practice. The Missionary Education Movement which prints the most reliable and widespread missionary materials is thoroughly committed to the policy of fair play. The new missionary emphasis is cooperation between equals, rather than an appeal to the pity motive." Speaking simply for my own missionary acquaintance I can frankly say that Miss Mayo's book is greatly deprecated. Its real value will be in leading intelligent people to really seek out the truth about India.

IDEALS OF INDIAN WOMANHOOD.

(CONCLUDED FROM THE LAST ISSUE)

PRACTICE ABOUT PURDAH.

Not only do we find that girls were not married at premature age but we have evidences to show that rather than giving a girl to an unworthy husband the girl was allowed to remain unmarried. Society did not throw any aspersions on the character of such maidens, nor did, as in modern times, their parents ostracise them as if they had committed a heinous crime. On the contrary, it honoured them with all due respect, and we find particular injunctions for showing respect to an unmarried and hence an unprotected lady. Marriage in the Epic days was not a religion or social compulsion. I know of instances even to day where parents similarly think that the daughter should rather die than remain unmarried, as though the mere fact of remaining unmarried is such as sin in itself.
It is to this freedom of choice and hence to freedom of thought and action—is refusing a particular man or marrying him if she liked—that we owe the type of women like Sulabha, Sukanya, Amba, and some others.
Sulabha, the great philosopher who silenced King Janaka in philosophical arguments tells us—as born in such a (high) family no suitable husband could be found for me. Instructed then in the religion of liberation, I wander over the earth alone.

We find several unmarried women practising penances in Ashrams—widows too were not burnt as we are prone to believe, but had the liberty to retire to forest to perform austerities. The instances of Kunti, Ambalika and Satyavati should be enough to bear me out.

No PURDAH IN EPIC AGE.

The system of purdah was not known during the days of the Epics. To my mind the conditions in this respect were the same as prevalent to-day in Maharashtra's province happily free from the evil system of purdah.

In the Epics we find descriptions of pretty princesses moving about freely in Royal parks where princes who were guests had access. We can see the lovely dauras of sages roaming at ease and in perfect confidence in the forests in which the Ashrams were situated.
Savitri could go about from Asram to Asram in various kingdoms in search of a husband and could interview men and women. Aitile Subhadra, the sister of Krishna, was moving about freely in the company of her friends at a fair on a mountain where she was first seen by Arjuna whom Krishna had deliberately taken there as Krishna wanted Arjuna to fall in love with the maiden, and thus break the match arranged with Sisupala.
Saluntala was delegated by her father to attend to the guests in his absence and it was thus that she met Dushyanta. On the coronation of Rama or on the occasion of his returning from his exile we are told that the streets of Ayodhya were thronged with men and women. In Bengal where I am told women from orthodox Hindu homes, may not even look out of open windows for watching a procession, you would like to know that our Sanskrit literature is full of allusions to
"the garlands on both sides of the roads formed by the lotus-like eyes of the women of the city, thronged in windows, to watch the procession."

We have in the Ramayana a passage which tells us of the custom of men and women going out together for walks in the gardens in the evenings. The wanderings of Damayanti in search of Nala are well-known to all.

The two Epics are full of such illustrations which for want of time I have to refrain from quoting. But what I have said above should be enough to show that not only was there no system of Purdah but there was freedom of movement in public granted to women on the festive occasions.

A word or two with regard to the system of "Antapura." There was, and even now, there is in Mahasatra to-day, a part of the house allotted to women that does not mean that male members of the family could not or cannot go there. In the Epics we find several times even strangers and ministers going to see the queens straight to the "Antapura" if some business so demanded.

In the later portions of the Epics you find attempts made to imply the existence of Purdah system but these are, on the face of them, interpolations, and inspire of the clever use of metaphors like "a woman who is not seen either by the sun or the moon," a critical examination can, in no time, expose this trickery and establish the fact, without a shadow of doubt that the Purdah system, as is prevalent in Bengal to-day, is absolutely foreign to the Hindu Society of the Epic age.
The fact that provinces like Madras in the south and Maharashtra in the west which were comparatively free from Mahomedan influence do not observe this Purdah system, should be enough to help us to trace its origin to foreign influence and for this reason as real Hindus we should throw it away.

I can quote the words of Rama in this connection as authority to back me in my appeal. When Ravana was killed and Sita was safely brought in a palanquin to Rama by Bibhibansu, Rama desired her to be conducted him on foot. Bibhibansu hesitated a little when Rama at once said 'Veils and guarded walls are not the protection of women but it is their character and natural modesty that should protect them."

In this last respect the Hindu Society of Maharashtra has not swerved an inch from this ideal of the epic period and to-day the women of Maharashtra are enjoying the same privileges and freedom as enjoyed by their sisters of those days and they have done so throughout intervening periods, why then should their sisters in Bengal be denied the same privileges?

HIBBOC MOTHERS OF MAHARASHTRA.

This is in my opinion the chief reason why we can boast of such great and heroic women, but at the same time devoted wives and tender mothers like Jijabai, the mother of Shivaji; Tarabai, the daughter-in-law of Shivaji, who reinforced her army and succeeded in establishing his minor and wronged son on his rightful throne; Laxmibai of Jinnas who for a time fought the English effectively in open battle, and Ahilyabai of Holkar, the great philanthropist and benevolent ruler.

I would like to ask if these women could have achieved such feats if they had been kept behind a veil, in the closed precincts of Ashrams? But these were not the only achievements of these marvellous women; they were as great in their roles of wives, and mothers.
Can any one say that they were not as ardent Hindus as our sisters of the Punjab provinces are?

To-day in the Bombay presidency where the torch of this ancient culture is still kept burning you find women moving about freely in streets and on foot or in buse; INDIANS OVERSEAS SUPPLEMENT TO The Indian Social Reformer.

New Series. No. 6. BOMBAY—SATURDAY, 24TH SEPTEMBER 1927. [Price One Anna]

INDIANS IN EAST AFRICA.

The announcement of the Governor of Kenya that the Secretary of State for the Colonies has accepted the recommendations of the Feetham Commission on Self-Government in Kenya and forshadowing an elected White majority in the legislature has been disconcerting news. By this precipitate step even the semblance of the protection afforded to the Indians in Kenya by the White Paper of 1923 is taken away and the supremacy of the Whites established.

At present the Kenya Legislative Council consists of a majority of official members with some Indian and Arab representatives on it. A non-official majority would vest the power of Government in the hands of the White settlers who have shown no inclination to concede any claims to Indians in the past. How prejudicial and detrimental to the interests of Indians and Natives in Kenya such a step would be, was fully realised by the Imperial Government when the Devonshire despatch declared responsible Government for the Crown Colony as out of the question in any measurable time, as the Government were unable to share their trusteeship with others. The object of the trust was defined as the protection and advancement of the native races. There is since then nothing to justify the change of front on the part of His Majesty's Government in their intention to allow East African settlers a progressive share in the responsibilities of the Government. The proposal to make a further reduction of the number of Indian members on the municipalities is meant distinctly to cripple the political power of the Indians.

There are only two big municipalities in Kenya, those at Nairobi and Mombasa. The Indians are mostly concentrated in these towns as they are prevented from acquiring land in the fertile high lands. The Indians are entitled by their number and interests to a majority of seats on the municipalities. But they accepted a compromise not long ago, when a substantial representation was assured to them. These are proofs enough if any such were needed, to show that the Europeans in Kenya are anxious to reduce the position of the Indians to that of hewers of wood and drawers of water and themselves enjoy the fruits of their labours.

The commendable promptness with which the Indian deputation set about the task of making representations to H. E. the Viceroy to press for more than one Indian member on the Commission to be appointed to go into the question, shows the Indian people's solicitude for their brethren overseas. Sir Forbottamdas Thakurdas, the speaker of the deputation after a thorough examination of the position of Indians in Kenya, pointed out the gravity of the problem which faced them on account of the British Government's decision to give effect to the Feetham Committee's recommendations. In view of the secrecy maintained and the deliberate attempts to keep India in the dark about the decisions which bode no good to the Indian population of Kenya, the Viceroy's reply is far from reassuring. The Government of India cannot be absolved of the gross neglect of the interests of their oversea subjects. Indian opinion will endorse Mr. Andrews when he says: "Indian matters with regard to the whole future of Eastern Africa appear to me to be in serious danger of haphazard and casual treatment owing to lack of full information and up-to-date knowledge on the part of leading Indian statesmen. This cannot possibly be avoided as long as the whole range of these vital issues is placed under the supervision of an over-worked Minister, whose Department deals primarily with education and lands. No other Government in the world treats its external affairs, with regard to Colonies and Dominions, in such a cruelly peremptory manner as the Government of India." The Government of India should lose no time in adopting the suggestion of Mr. Andrews to create a new Department for safeguarding the interests of His Majesty's overseas Indian subjects.

The recent developments in South Africa are not in themselves sufficient to determine the decision to be arrived at with regard to the position of Indians in Kenya. The conditions of Indians in those two parts are materially different. It is a well known fact that Kenya owes its present prosperity to Indian settlers. Dr. Norman Ley in his admirable book on "Kenya," referring to the period before and immediately after the Colony passed into the hands of the British Government, writes—For years later (than 1893) practically all the trade of Eastern Africa was in the hands of Indians. Indian troops had saved the situation in Uganda. Most of the early governors and most of their principal subordinates were men with Indian not colonial experience. The country, in fact looked towards India rather than towards Europe. The currency was naturally Indian and the Indian Penal Code was taken over bodily. It is still in force in the Colony. Indians built the railway to Uganda, and Indian armed police were attached to every important Government station. Indian traders and shop-keepers spread over the country, selling calico of Lancashire and buying hides."

The Indians of Kenya have a solid record to their credit and it is unthinkable that they should be reduced to a position of subordination in the country the prosperity of which they were mainly instrumental in building up.
INDIAN WOMEN IN THE COLONIES.

(By Mrs. U. K. Ozza).

We have all been speaking and writing volun-motion about Indians overseas and their grievances, but has any one taken care to study the position of Indian women overseas?

When I left India, I had great dreams of greater India. Away from the cramping influence of local society, living side by side with the best races of the world, I thought our men would be living better, freer lives. The dream has been shattered.

We—men in the colonies have certainly been living freer lives. I cannot say men in general have been leading better lives. But in the case of women, alas, they are not given any more opportunities of living their own lives here than in India. On the contrary the lives that men lead make them more suspicious and more inclined to impose greater restrictions on the movements of women.

There was some show of a women's movement in Kenya last year, but people who know that it was a fake. It arose from a few men's tendency to follow somehow or other Lady Grigg's lead in the direction of organising child welfare and maternity benefit. The movement had no reality behind it. But in the froth subsided, it has gone down to where it came from.

The Indian woman in East Africa is not better off than her sister at home. Even the mildest reformer is marked and hated down. Men are lax regarding the obligations and privileges of their manhood, but show the greatest reluctance to let women have the fullest enjoyment of the god-given womanhood. And this produces a very unfortunate impression on the other races living side by side with us.

We seek social intercourse with people of other races, we mix with their woman-folk and come into intimate touch with them, and seem to accept their outlook regarding women for all practical purposes. But when it comes to other people seeking social intercourse with us, they find that our women have no place in drawing-rooms, our outlook with regard to our own women is entirely different.

This is one-sided. And the difference of outlook regarding women, the difference in the social position which women of various races occupy is the greatest barrier to a mutual understanding of peoples in the colony.

This does not mean that I advocate that our women should be westernised, but I do mean that they should have their own place in the drawing-room and in social functions, not apart and isolated from men, but along with, and side by side with men.

No understanding of a race by another race is possible without the closest social intercourse and exchange of civilities. It is unjust to demand equality of social status and free admission to the society of another race which allows an independent social position to its women without our doing the same.

In the colonies we live—Europeans and Indians in the utmost isolation. There is a great barrier between us. It is generally called the colour bar. But the Greeks do not care for the colour bar, nor some of the Americans here nor some of the best Englishmen here.

Many prominent Indians are invited to dinners and social functions. They go there, but they never take their women there, nor is it possible to invite the same party to their own homes. This is marked. And as this is the rule, there is a general consciousness of opinion in keeping the Indians out.

This barrier is one thing that keeps colonial Europeans and Indians apart—on two different sides of a great, intervening wall.

And our refusal to give colonial freedom to our women has deprived them from exercising all restraining influence on men who have freed themselves from the restraint of public opinion also. Deprived of their legitimate social activities, living amidst uninspiring and leveling environments and closely suppressed from further development by the suspicionlessness of lascivious and licentious habits, our women are greater slaves in the colonies, are to a far greater extent objects of men's lust and tyranny than in India.

In concentrating on our disabilities as Indians as distinguished from non-Indians, we have allowed several very undesirable features to take root in our midst in the colonies. One is the entirely helpless and deteriorated position of our colonial women; the other is the position of our employees class under Indian masters. Of the latter I may write at some future date. But is the problem of our women overseas not urgent? I appeal to the women of India, to Mrs. Naidu, Mrs. Hansa Mehta, Mrs. Menon and Mrs. Panandikar.

INDIAN COMMUNITIES IN EAST AFRICA.

A representative deputation consisting of Sir Parsbotamdas Thakurdas, Mr. Cocke, Lala Lajpatrai, Messrs. Jayakar, Jinnah, K. C. Roy, Kunzru, and C. F. Andrews, Sir Abdul Qayum, Raja Sir Rampal Singh, Mr. Natesan, and Lala Ramnarain Das waited on His Excellency the Viceroy in connection with the East African Com-mision.

The following is the text of the address which was read by Sir Parsbo Tamdas Thakurdas as leader of the Deputation:

We gratefully acknowledge your kindness in granting us so readily and at such short notice this interview. As representatives of the Indian Legislature and of other interests concerned in the Indian position in Eastern Africa, our apprehensions concerning recent developments of policy in those territories have prompted us to approach you. These anxieties came suddenly to a head owing to a speech delivered by Sir Howard Grigg immediately after he had returned to Kenya from London. He is reported to have stated that the re.

commendations of the Feetham Commission on Labour Government had already been accepted by the Secretary of State for the Colonies and also to have foreshadowed an elected majority in Kenya Legislative Council.

Wood-Wilson Agreement.

Your Excellency will personally remember how, in the year 1922, a settlement with India was reached by... yourself on the one hand, representing the Colonial Office, and Earl Winterton on the other, representing India, Office, which has gone down to history as the Wood-Winterton agreement. That settlement, though not in every respect satisfying Indian aspirations, was regarded in this country as an honourable compromise and your own part as one of the two signatories in bringing about such a happy solution was highly appreciated. The publication in Kenya of this settlement of 1922 led to open hostility. In consequence the Kenya Conservations were opened in London in 1923 which resulted in a new settlement embodied in a White Paper of that year.

While this new settlement of the Kenya question by the Colonial Office proved unsatisfactory to Indian national sentiment there were nevertheless certain important sections which allied our immediate fears. Chief of these was section 2 entitled "Future Constitutional Development." This section declared that His Majesty's Government regarded the grant of responsible self-government in Kenya as out of the question within any period of time that needed then to be taken into consideration. How necessary such a constitutional safeguard was at that critical period may be seen from the fact that an attempt was made before the end of the year 1923 to hurry through an Immigration Bill which would have injuriously restricted Indian immigration. This measure was disallowed by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Mr. J. H. Thomas.

Comparative Quiet.

An important conference took place in London in the year 1924 between representatives from India and the Colonial Office which led to fruitful results. A period of comparative quiet in Kenya ensued and an agreement by mutual consent was reached concerning representation on the Municipal Council of Nairobi which appeared to promise well for the future. But when a new White Paper called "Future Policy in regard to Eastern Africa" was published in July 1927 grave questions were raised as to its fitness for the present time. It was felt necessary to contest that part of the earlier White Paper of 1923 which was entitled "Future Constitutional Evolution."

We were also disturbed by the simultaneous publication of the Feetham Report which recommended a drastic curtailment of Indian representation on the municipal councils but since the sole purpose of the new White Paper was to explain the decision of His Majesty's Government to appoint a Royal Commission on the Eastern African Federation without the public in India being aware of it, we felt the necessity of getting adequate representation on the Royal Commission itself with a view to safeguard our national interests.

Serious Cause for Alarm.

We anticipated that an opportunity would be given to the Government of India to make suggestions concerning the Feetham Report before its conclusions were accepted but now the cabled news of Sir Edward Grigg's speech at Mombasa has given us serious cause for alarm. We are unfortunate in not having been able as yet to obtain the full telegraphic report though we have made every effort to do so. Since the present session of the Indian Legislature is rapidly drawing to a close we have ventured to ask you to bear us in mind of the uncertainty of the information available for when once the session ended every one will be scattered.

It is quite needless in approaching Your Excellency with your own full experience of Colonial affairs and your generous consideration of the Kenya Indian question in 1922 when Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies to dilate upon the high importance of Indian interests in Eastern Africa. We would only venture to remind you that the recognition by His Majesty's Government of the fact that these territories should have a special and intimate relation to India dating from the earliest date of British occupation has never been withdrawn in recent years. This relation to India has become even closer and the links of connection with India more binding than ever.

India's Part in Future.

The natural tendency of the future will be for India to play a still more prominent part in the development of Eastern Africa for nature herself has ordered these mutual relations between the two countries and they are strengthened and confirmed by the fact that both India and Eastern Africa are parts of the same commonwealth. We would, therefore, request Your Excellency that a representation may be made to His Majesty's Government on the following points, namely (1) that final action will not be taken on the Feetham Report until the Indian point of view has been examined; (2) that adequate representation of Indian interests may be assured on the Commission itself; (3) that permission may be given to a small deputation appointed by the Government of India to go over to Eastern Africa in order (a) to make a general survey of these territories in relation to Indian interests therein, (b) to help the Resident Indian community in preparing their evidence for the Commission; (4) that before His Majesty's Government come to any decision on the report of the Royal Commission the Government of India shall be allowed to make representations on any points affecting India through a Committee which will confer for that purpose with the Secretary of State for the Colonies in London; and (5) that no decision with regard to any elected representation in Kenya be taken until the conclusion of the work of the Royal Commission and consultation with the Government of India.

We are aware that these requests are numerous but the vital importance of the whole of this subject to the Indian people makes us anxious not to omit anything which may safeguard our recognised national interests.

Viceroy's Reply.

H. E. the Viceroy, replying to the Deputation, said that he was glad to have an opportunity of meeting such a representative and distinguished delegation. He claimed a certain measure of familiarity with these questions as the joint author of the Wood-Winterton agreement and as a member of the British Cabinet when the Kenya White Paper of 1923 was approved.

The object the British Government had consistently sought to pursue had been the promotion of the true interests of Imperial solidarity. The only important respect in which the White Paper of July, 1927, differed from the previous White Paper was in respect of the possibility of bringing about closer association in the discharge of the responsibilities and trusteeship of the Government. The immigrant communities' legitimate inference from this was that the claims of Indians, who constituted an important section of these communities, to such association, would be investigated by the Commission.
INDIANS OVERSEAS: [Sept. 24]

The Colonial Secretary had stated in the House of Commons on July 19 expressly that the question of self-government was not implied in this White Paper any more than it was implied in the White Paper of 1923.

Government's Efforts.

The Government of India, as soon as they learnt of the proposed Commission, made a representation for the inclusion in it of some one conversant with Indian conditions. They had now forwarded the Assembly's proceedings on Mr. K. C. Roy's adjournment motion. The Government fully appreciated the general view of the Indian people that Indian interests should be represented by Indians and were doing their best to give effect to it, but the final decision regarding the personnel rested with the British Government, who were in the best position to consider the various factors determining the choice of the personnel, and were not unmindful of the vital Indian interests involved.

The Viceroy continuing said that the second suggestion that a small deputation should be sent by the Government to East Africa was already engaging the attention of his Government. It was now premature to consider the steps to be taken to safeguard Indian interests after the Commission had reported. As regards Sir Edward Grigg's speech on his return to Kenya, they had cabled for it but had not yet received the official version of either the speech or the Feetham Commission's recommendations.

Impacts by Union Agreement.

The Viceroy assured the deputation that the Government of India were under no misapprehension as to the importance to the Indian community in Kenya of both adequate representation on local bodies and the character and composition of the majority in the Colonial legislature, and if and as circumstances required it, the Government would do everything in their power to secure adequate protection for legitimate, Indian interests. The Viceroy could not, however, help feeling that questions in East Africa would not be unaffected by recent developments in the relations of India with South Africa, for which he paid a tribute to the Habibullah Deputation and to Messrs. Sastri and Andrews. The spirit of South Africa, he trusted, would not be without its influence outside and beyond the territories of the Union. At any rate, the atmosphere to-day was more favourable than that prevailing even a few years ago.

For his part, he saw no reason to doubt that with patience and good will on both sides they would succeed in bringing to a gradual solution these questions on which so much depended, not only for India and Great Britain, or even the British Empire, but for all humanity. The Viceroy finally gave the assurance that the Government of India felt no less deeply on the matter than the Deputation and that they were both anxious and determined to leave nothing undone which it was in their power to do to uphold the status and honour of the Indian communities in East Africa.

Gwalior Colonization Scheme.

The scheme of colonization inaugurated by the Gwalior Durbar comes in the nick of time and if it turns out a success, it will relieve to a considerable extent the distress prevailing among returned immigrants whose number is increasing day by day. Already faced with the unemployment question, the local governments are not able to cope with the situation created by the return of the immigrants who, more often than not, find themselves stranded in their mother country. There are large tracts of barren lands in India which if suitably developed may be used for agricultural purposes. The annual exodus of millions of people to plantations in Ceylon, Malaya and South Africa may cease and their labour may be profitably utilised to improve the economic condition of India and her states. The Government of India should co-operate with the Gwalior Durbar in ensuring the success of the scheme. We give its outline below:

Mr. T. N. K. Roychowdhury, officer on special duty at Calcutta, of the Department of Agriculture and Colonization, Gwalior Durbar, interviewed by the Associated Press, said that he is touring India in connection with a novel scheme of colonization inaugurated by the progressive and enlightened Government of Gwalior in Central India, whereby the first installment of one lakh acres of agricultural lands, very fertile and most favourably situated as regards proximity to railway lines and metallic roads and capable of producing valuable economic crops like wheat, cotton, sugar-cane, pan leaves, etc., will be given nearly free, under certain easy conditions, to men of any class, who are willing to colonize them for agriculture.

Returned Immigrants.

The Gwalior Government have set apart a large area for immigrants from the colonies who are returning to India under the assisted scheme and voluntarily wish to settle down to agricultural life. Zemindary rights together with all possible assistance as regards financial aid from Co-operative Agricultural Banks for houses, bullocks, seeds, modern implements, etc., will be given. The advice and guidance of expert agricultural officers of the State, trained in America and Europe will be at the disposal of these colonists. There will be no caste difficulties for these men, such as they are generally confronted with when they try to settle down in their native villages.

About a thousand returned immigrants from the colonies who are homeless and living a very hard life by working in the docks and other places at Calcutta have indicated their willingness to take advantage of this scheme. As most of these unfortunate men were formerly engaged on plantations in the colonies this timely help of the Gwalior Government comes as a boon and blessing to them. Another batch of about a thousand immigrants are returning to India on the S.S. "Sutlej" this week and several others after short intervals. The Government Protector of Immigrants would pay the railway fare, in deserving cases, if any of these men, who wish to proceed direct to Gwalior for colonization.

Educated Unemployed.

There is another scheme whereby educated unemployed middle-class gentlemen will be given free zemindaries and every facility to take to agriculture as a profession. The Gwalior Government is spending several crores of rupees on irrigation and agricultural co-operation. The whole scheme is being worked by the Department of Agriculture under Rao Bahadur, Captain Bagh Rao Powers, Member of Agriculture.
in big cities like Bombay wherever they cannot afford a car or a carriage. To see women going daily in the evenings with Punjab materials in the basket in their hands to temples, and to listen to discourses of Pauranikas is a most familiar sight. Friendly and social calls are also paid with equal freedom. She leads the provinces in every other movement of social advance ment. It does not become her to give up her leadership in this respect. We want her to lead us in women's movements also.

The world is moving fast in its onward march. Though we do not want to follow the rest of the world blindly on the same lines yet nobody can deny that we are in need of reform—in need of an urgent reform so that too on all sides. To take only one or two examples our illiteracy and that specially amongst the women is colossal, our ignorance of hygienic laws suitable to a changed society under new economic conditions is deplorable. Our understanding of modern conditions of life, social and political, is defective and this sadly is again due to our conservative nature and want of education. It is on account of these facts that writers of books like "Mother India" can invite us and speakers like Mr. Pilcher can slander us before the whole world. We cannot say that their statements are entirely unfounded on facts. They have some basic truths and for this very reason they do more harm than entirely false statements would or could possibly have done.

To remedy these evils adult education is the chief cure and an admirable endeavour has been undertaken by the promoters of Saroj Nalini Association. The association is intended for the amelioration of the condition of the women of Bengal especially in the villages. The credit of first starting this scheme goes to Sreemati Saroj Nalini who unfortunately did not live to see it mature. From what little I know of this Association and its aim it would work marvels if it is sympathetically helped by all people. The institution has already made wonderful progress under the guidance of Mrs. Latika Das, the Joint Secretary of the Association. I have the good fortune of attending some of the annual meetings of the Mufussil sanitis. I was equally pleased and surprised to find the eagerness for the work amongst both women and men. At one place on an appeal by Mr. G. S. Dutt the women came out of the Purdah quite willingly and sat in front of the platform and they did not seem a bit embarrassed, while at another meeting only yesterday, the women about 200 in number, of their own accord came out of the Purdah when this instance of the previous Samiti meeting was put before them and some of them even informed the audience of their willingness to do away with the Purdah. The speeches of men that followed were on the whole unsympathetic. The men deplored the action on the part of the women. So it is evident from such a recent example that it is in all probability the men who are keeping women in the Purdah for what reasons they alone know and not the women ignorant though they be. Will my brothers then who have had the good fortune of being more enlightened than their illiterate sisters perpetuate this system of Purdah and impose this emblem of bondage on their own mothers, wives, and daughters when they themselves are anxious to assert their right of freedom and self-determination?

"What Moslem Women Should Do."

I hope not. To my Mahomedan brothers and sisters I must apologize for not having referred to them so long in the course of this address. The reason being no other than my ignorance of connected and detailed information about the Mahomedan society, either ancient or modern, but I can and want to say a few words to them. Though the Purdah is a system indigenous to the Mahomedan culture they should see that with the changed times they must alter the old customs which were meant for a society of those days. I would appeal to them to follow the lead of Turkey where the torch of Islam is shining brightly and ask their women to come out of the veil as the women of Turkey have done. The youths of Islam have protested against Purdah and gave an expression to their protest in action at Aligarh about a year and a half ago. It is a great elder generation amongst them to ratify this bold and admirable action of their youths with their moral support.

Before closing may I once more remind all my brothers and sisters of Bengal to remember the words of Ram Chandra addressed to Bibhishana "That the veils and closed walls are not the natural protection of women but it is only their character that should protect them."

Y. M. C. A. Lectures: The lecture programme now running at the Madras Y. M. C. A. is an interesting example of the friendly exchange of thought and experience between different national and religious traditions. A course of twenty-five lectures on "The History of Religious Thought in India" is introduced by a professor of the Christian College, with a lecture on the historical method in the study of religion. The subject is then developed by a striking succession of lecturers—the President of the Ramakrishna Mission in Madras, a Judge of the High Court, the Vice-Chancellor of the University, and a Hindu College, an ex-minister of the President of the Hindu Endowment Board, the editor of a leading newspaper. The course traces the earlier phases of Hinduism, the Protestant movements, the age of Hindu revival, the reform period, modern movements, and concludes with a lecture by a Hindu professor on Jesus Christ and Hindu India. At the Sunday meetings the subjects dealt with include courses on the History of the Christian movement in Europe and in India, the development of the Social Hope in Religion; Jesus and some Present Day Problems; and among the speakers are Christians and Hindus, missionaries, a labour leader the managing director of a European firm, the Bishop of Madras, a Swarajist leader. There are also lecture courses and discussion groups on Rural Reconstruction, Internationalism, Indian Art and Music, Education Religion and many other subjects. These are made possible by the co-operation of friends of the Association representing many schools of thought—the Principal of the Law College, the Secretary of the Servants of India Society, a farmer, the Director of Public Instruction, etc. Besides these educational activities, indoor and outdoor exercise is provided by the Physical Department of the Y. M. C. A., and the syllabus ends with an appeal to members to volunteer for various forms of social service—health lectures, night schools, lectures at the Penitentiary, helping at public playgrounds, social survey work, etc.
CHILD MARRIAGE AMONG HINDUS.

TEST OF THE BILL.

The following Bill of Mr. M. Haribas Sarda was introduced in the Legislative Assembly on the 1st February 1927—:

Legislative Assembly Bill No. 21 of 1927.

A Bill to regulate marriages of children amongst the Hindus.

Whereas it is necessary to regulate marriages of children amongst the Hindus and to lay down the age under which such marriages shall be invalid, it is hereby enacted as follows—

SHORT TITLE AND EXTENT.

1. (i) This Act may be called the Hindu Child Marriage Act 1927.

(ii) It extends to the whole of British India, including the Scheduled Districts.

DEFINITIONS.

2. In this Act—

(a) "Hindu" includes Jains, Sikhs, Brahmos, Arya Samajists and Buddhists.

(b) "Guardian" means a guardian as defined in the Guardians and Wards Act 1890.

MARRIAGABLE AGE OF A GIRL.

3. Notwithstanding any provision to the contrary existing anywhere, no marriage of a Hindu girl, except as provided in section 5, shall be valid, unless she has on the day of her marriage, completed her twelfth year.

MARRIAGABLE AGE OF A BOY.

4. No marriage of a Hindu boy shall be valid unless he has on the day of his marriage, completed his fifteenth year.

MARRIAGE OF A GIRL BELOW TWELVE VALID IF GUARDIAN OBTAINS LICENCE:

5. The marriage of a Hindu girl who is under twelve years of age shall be valid if her guardian obtains, before such marriage, a licence for the performance of such marriage from the Magistrate of the district in which the girl ordinarily resides, authorising or permitting such marriage. Provided that no such licence shall be granted, where the girl is under eleven years of age.

GRANT OF LICENCE.

6. The Magistrate of the district shall grant a licence for the marriage of a Hindu girl to her guardian, who files a written application for the grant of such licence with an affidavit swearing to the fact that the girl has completed her eleventh year and that the guardian conscientiously believes that the tenets of the religion which the girl professes enjoin that the girl should not be kept unmarried any longer.

STATEMENT OF OBJECTS AND REASONS.

1. The object of the Bill is twofold. The main object, by declaring invalid the marriages of girls below 12 years of age, is to put a stop to such girls becoming widows. The second object, by laying down the minimum marriageable ages of boys and girls, is to prevent so far as may be, their physical and moral deterioration by removing a principal obstacle to their physical and mental development.

2. According to the Census Report of 1921 A.D., there were in that year 612 Hindu widows who were less than one year old, 2,024 who were under 5 years, 87,857 who were under 10 years, and 332,024 who were under 15 years of age. The deplorable feature of the situation, however, is that the majority of these child widows are prevented by Hindu custom and usage from re-marrying. Such a lamentable state of affairs exists in no country, civilised or uncivilised, in the world. And it is high time that the law came to the assistance of these helpless victims of social customs which, whatever their origin or justification in old days are admittedly out of date and are the source of untold misery and harm at the present time.

3. According to the Brahmanas, the most ancient and the most authoritative book containing the laws of the Hindus, the minimum marriageable age of a man is 24 and a woman 16. And if the welfare of the girl were the only consideration in fixing the age, the law should fix 16 as the minimum age of the valid marriage of a girl. But amongst the Hindus, there are people who hold the belief that a girl should not remain unmarried after she attains puberty. And as in this country, some girls attain puberty at an age as early as 12, the Bill fixes 12 as the minimum age for the valid marriage of a Hindu girl.

4. In order, however, to make the Bill acceptable to the most conservative Hindu opinion, provision is made in the Bill that for conscientious reasons, the marriage of a Hindu girl would be permissible even when she is 11 years old. No Hindu Sastra enjoins marriage of a girl before she attains puberty, and the time has arrived and public opinion sufficiently developed, when the first step towards the accomplishment of the social reform so necessary for the removal of a great injustice to its helpless victims and so essential to the vital interests of a large part of humanity, should be taken, by enacting a law declaring invalid the marriages of girls below 11 years of age.

5. With regard to boys, the Shastras do not enjoin marriage at a particular age. Thoughtful public opinion amongst the Hindus would fix 18 as the minimum marriageable age for a boy. But as some class of the Hindus would regard such legislation as too drastic, the Bill takes the line of least resistance by providing 15 years as the age below which the marriage of a Hindu boy shall be invalid. Even in England, where child marriages are unknown and early marriages are exceptions, it has been found necessary to fix the ages below which boys and girls may not marry.

Abolition of Slavery: Speaking on the Slavery Convention at the sixth committee, the Maharaja of Kapurthala said that he desired to correct a misunderstanding for which the Indian delegation to the last Assembly was inadvertently responsible, namely, that Nepal in liberating 60,000 slaves at a great cost, had been influenced by the League. He emphasized that Nepal’s action was taken quite independently of the League and before the latter had taken up the matter. The Government of Nepal was entitled to take credit for their enlightened policy. This gave evidence of the spontaneous attention given by Eastern rulers in such matters. He then referred to the action of the Khan of Kalat in abolishing private slavery and to the steps taken in Burma to liberate slaves. He concluded by stating that the Government of India had brought the Convention to the notice of Indian rulers. “I say confidently that the ruling Princes will earnestly hasten to remove any vestiges of slavery surviving. In my own state slavery and forced labour have long ago been abolished.”
Campbell Memorial Gold Medal: At the general meeting of the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society held on the 19th August, His Excellency Sir Leslie Wilson presented the Society's Campbell Memorial Gold Medal to Professor Jadunath Sarkar, the Vice-Chancellor of the University of Calcutta. There was a fairly large gathering on the occasion. The Hon. Sir Amberson Marten presided. It is interesting to note the history of the Campbell Memorial Medal, when Sir James Campbell died in 1903, some of his friends resolved to perpetuate his memory in connection with the studies which he loved so well and for which he did so much. They started a fund which was subscribed by Sir James Campbell's personal friends, both Europeans and Indians, and vested in Trustees to meet the cost of awarding a gold medal to be called the Campbell Memorial Medal for the best work published in English regarding the history, ethnology or folklore of India. The Society is the oldest institution in the city and the Campbell Medal is the prize it offers every year to some one distinguished in Oriental studies and research. This year's recipient of the medal is a great Oriental scholar among whose works those on Auranzeb are so well-known as the most authoritative writings on that most interesting period of Indian history. The Society, since its inception, has presented the Campbell Medal to seven distinguished Oriental scholars, Professor Sarkar is the eighth recipient of the medal.

Hindu-Muslim Relations: The conference called at Simla between Hindu and Muslim leaders to discuss and arrive at a settlement of the differences between the two communities, has not been able to come to a conclusion yet. But it is wrong on that account to regard it as having failed. Apart from any result, the mere ventilation of grievances and the free and frank discussion of them by the two communities, is a concession to the supreme authority of reason and the public conscience. Both parties gradually realize the necessity of stating their respective claims in terms which will commend themselves as just and reasonable, not perhaps, to the other side, but to the world at large which looks on without any prejudice against either of the parties. Hindus and Mussalmans, therefore, must realize that the ultimate tribunal by whose decision they must abide is the public conscience. It is well known that the Hindu propaganda on either side that both sides are anxious to secure the good will of disinterested onlookers. Every conference brings the question nearer solution. There is, therefore, no reason to be disheartened if we do not achieve results immediately. Short cuts are often the most roundabout routes to the goal of social and national questions. The qualities of patience and perseverance, which are the most valuable assets of individual or national character, are not developed by short-cuts. Cutting the gordian knot is useful only when the knotted cord is not needed for any future use. So far as we can judge from the published reports, the cow question seems to have come very near solution as a result of the Simla Conference. The music question seems to present some unexpected difficulties. Whether the difficulties are real, they must be met frankly. On the whole, there is no reason to take a pessimistic view of the results of the Conference.

A Bogus Announcement: Passengers by the steamer, if anyone, whom the English mail on Friday last, were surprised by a wireless message posted on the news board to the effect that Her Highness the Begum of Bhopal had decided to divorce her whole fortune, said to be worth $10 million sterling, to the conversion of India to Islam. Her Highness has been prominent recently in her offers of help to bring about Hindu-Muslim Unity, but the passengers in the ship were not aware of this and some of them would seem to have believed sufficiently in the probability of the message to feel alarmed as to its consequences on inter-communal relations. The statement has been repudiated on behalf of Her Highness by the Bhopal Publicity Officer. The Begum, we are sure, knows very well that there is at least one thing more money cannot do, and that is to bring about a change in a people's religious beliefs. Otherwise, America can easily put up 100 million dollars today to convert the whole of India, Hindus and Mahomedans, lock, stock and barrel, to Christianity.

Prohibition in Satara: This is reported that the Excise Minister for Bombay intends to follow the example of the Madras Minister in making a single district dry as an experiment. We welcome this as a sign on the part of Mr. G. B. Pradhan that he is beginning to feel earnestly in the matter. But, as Mahatma Gandhi has well of Satara out the attempt to introduce prohibition by way of an experiment in selected districts is about the worst way of going about the reform. If, however, the Minister wishes to try the experiment, he should choose his own district of Thana or Bombay, as the Excise Committee in making a single district dry as an experiment.

Distances are impracticable in Madras, it is beginning to feel earnestly in the matter. But, as Mahatma Gandhi has well pointed out, as a sign on the part of Mr. G. B. Pradhan that he is beginning to feel earnestly in the matter.

In the case of the workers, impaired their efficiency. In the face of these facts, it is absurd to say that alcohol is good for the workers, since it neither enables them to work better nor helps them to recuperate. Under a prohibition regime, the labouring classes will be the first to benefit and the efficiency of labour is bound to improve. Under the influence of a drug no man can carry on with more work, and alcohol is all the more dangerous because it is regarded generally rather as an everyday drink than as a drug.

Relief Work among Depressed Classes: The relief work undertaken and done by the Bombay Prarthana Samaj in Gujarat is noteworthy in two respects. The Samaj concentrated its attention upon those who availed themselves of it. Most of the people who benefited by the help were the Thakurs, Dhues and the Bhangis. The Samaj true to its mission, has made the cause of the poor and the needy its own. Its zeal for relief work should not be harnessed for want of funds. In the account published of the relief operations it has carried on so far, the Samaj has outlined its future work and an appeal for funds to enable it to put it through: "We would more particularly like to look to the needs of the widows and the orphans and the depressed classes. They will need their whole houses to be rebuilt entirely and we wonder if it would be possible for the Government to think of providing iron sheets and we would like to help them build their houses. We shall need for this work at least Rs. one thousand to start with. We are greatly thankful to the Women's Relief Committee of Bombay for granting us a sum of Rs. one thousand. This will go to form a nucleus for our housing fund. We request the public to come forward and help us carry out this scheme. It is a work of mercy and as such it blesses those that give and those that receive." In addition to its own collection, the Samaj as one of the accredited relief organisations, should apply to the Central Relief Committee for the required for its work. A review of the laudable work done by the Prarthana Samaj cannot but convince the Committee that the sum entrusted to its care will benefit those for whom it is intended.

Indian After-dinner Stories: The fable is the oldest form of fiction that we know of. It is supposed to have flourished in India at a very early date. From thence the Panchatantra the famous collection of Indian tales is said to have travelled to Persia and then to Europe where it was recast in various forms. The fable was in vogue for a fairly long time until in fact it had to enter into unequal competition with the short story, the novel and the more recent drama when it vanished to reappear in modern times as the anecdote. In this new guise it has returned to its home-country. Mr. A. S. F. Ayyar has many interesting anecdotes and a couple of fables to narrate in his latest book (Indian After-dinner Stories II). Published by D. B. Taraporewala Sons & Co., Bombay.—Price Rs. 4.5. The author claims as his object the desire to promote healthy laughter and to present deep-rooted prejudices in a humorous light. In many of these stories, however, we fail to see any humour and in still more we find that the humour is a little laboured; a few are slightly didactic and nearly all of them lack that lightness of touch that is the soul of wit. The dinner which those stories suggest seems to be rather a heavy meal.

We devoted a large part of our article last week, and we have to do so this week also, to show that Abbe Dubois is an inveterately prejudiced and utterly untrustworthy chronicler of Hindu customs and manners. This we are obliged to do, because, for most of the worst libels on Hindu social and religious practices in Miss Katherine Mayo's book, the Abbe is almost the only authority. We quoted last week from the Abbe's own Preface the avowal of his motive for writing the book. The passage will bear repetition. He says: "There is one motive which above all others has influenced my determination. It struck me that a faithful picture of the wickedness and incongruities of polytheism and idolatry would by its very ugliness help greatly to set off the beauties and perfections of Christianity. It was thus that the Laocoonians placed drunken slaves in the sight of their children in order to inspire the latter with a horror of intemperance."

Suppose a Hindu were to spend some years in the United States with a like motive to produce a faithful picture of the wickedness and incongruities of Mammon-worship so that by its very ugliness it may help greatly to set off the beauties and perfections of the Vedanta, no serious student of American culture and civilization would think of relying on him as an authority on the subject. The Abbe's book is the last source to which, any foreigner, after reading this candid avowal, should look for a true and faithful account of Hindu manners and customs. Mahatma Gandhi has likened the author of "Mother India" to a drain inspector; the Abbe Dubois was a veritable scavenger of social filth.

We showed last week, how the Abbe's statements regarding the significance to Hindus of the sacred symbols of Hinduism are contradicted by Hindu authorities and by Europeans like H. H. Wilson, Monier Williams and J. E. Fadlfield, who spent the greater part of their life in India.

We shall now cite the views of an eminent Englishman who was in India about the same period and whose labors covered nearly the same part of the country as the Abbe Dubois. Sir Thomas Munro arrived in India as a boy of 19 years in 1780 and rose to be Governor of Madras and died of cholera, while about to lay down that office, at Gooty in 1837. Though he began life as a military officer, his greatest work was done in the capacity of a civil and revenue administrator. He spoke the vernaculars fluently. His manner of life may be judged from the following passage relating to his early days in India from Arbuthnot's Memoir prefixed to "Selections from his (Munro's) Minutes and other official writings."

"Munro says in one of his letters written after he had been nine years in the country, that he had 'never experienced hunger or thirst, fatigue or poverty' until he came to India; but that since then he had frequently met with the first three, and the last had been his constant companion. He was three years in India before he was 'master of any other pillow than a book or cartridge-pouch; his bed was a piece of canvas stuck on four cross sticks', and the greater part of his journeys he had to make on foot; the only horse he possessed being so old that he was always obliged to walk two-thirds of the way." (p. xxiii, Regan Paul, London).

Official position in India in those days was very different from what it is to-day. Munro lived among the people, but as their friend and protector. The people loved him. A striking proof of their affection is given by Wilks in his "Sketches of the South of India." "I will not deny myself," he writes, "the pleasure of stating an incident related to me by a respectable public servant of the Government of Mysoor, who was sent in 1807 to assist in the adjustment of a disputed boundary between that territory and the district in charge of the Collector. A violent dispute occurred in his presence between some villagers, and the party aggrieved threatened to go to Anantapur and complain to their father. He perceived that Colonel Munro was meant, and found upon inquiry that he was generally distinguished throughout the district by that appellation." (Arbuthnot's Memoir, p. xxix, xxx.)

Sir Thomas Munro was what we should now call an Indian Nationalist. He constantly protested against the suppression of Indians by Europeans in responsible offices, against increasing the number of European officers in the Indian Army, against the unrestrained influx of Europeans into the country, and strongly favoured the retention and development of the ancient village community as the basis and foundation of the British Indian administration. Sir Valentine Chiraz contrasts Munro's Indian policy with that of Lord Curzon. "To him (Curzon) England's mission in India was not as it had been for Sir Thomas Munro, eighty years earlier, to train the Indians to govern and to protect themselves, Lord Curzon preferred to govern himself." (India, p. 115.)

This digression is necessary because it may be generally thought that, as Munro was an official, he would have had less opportunities of coming in close contact with the people than a missionary like Abbe Dubois. That may be so in these days but in the beginning of the last century things were far otherwise. While the Abbe's information was mostly gathered from the two or three hundred of the riff-raff of the population which he had gathered into his fold, Munro's intercourse extended to all classes, the official and literate class, the merchants and traders, and most of all the peasantry. His estimate of the Hindu character and manners is therefore entitled to far greater weight than that of the Abbe. In fact, the Abbe's book seems to have carried very little weight with contemporary British statesmen. The first translation was published by the East India Company in 1817 and in 1853 all offices were thrown open to natives of India without distinction of caste or creed. In the debates in Parliament, which were on a high level, no speaker seems to have referred to the Abbe's book even casually though other writers were profusely cited. The Marquess of Lansdowne, the great Whig... leader and Minister, speaking in the House of Lords, said that he would select only two from among the crowd of witnesses as well calculated to form a correct judgment on Hindu character, Sir Thomas Munro and Bishop Heber.

To the Abbe Daboia, and even more to Miss Katherine Mayo, the Hindus are a nation of imbeciles incapable of and unfit for self-government; who ought to be perpetually kept under European domination. That was not the opinion of Sir Thomas Munro and of Bishop Heber. Sir Thomas Munro, speaking of the Hindus, declared that there was no reason to believe that the Hindus were inferior to the Europeans in natural talent. The Bishop said of them that “they were constitutionally kind-hearted, industrious, sober and peaceable; at the same time that they show themselves, on proper occasions, a manly and courageous people.”

Sir Thomas Munro, before a Select Committee of the Commons, gave his estimate of Hindu civilization in the following terms: “I do not exactly understand what is meant by the civilization of the Hindus. In the higher branches of science, in the knowledge of the theory and practice of good government, and in an education which, by banishing prejudices and superstition, opens the mind to receive instruction of every kind from every quarter, they are much inferior to Europeans. But if a good system of agriculture, unrivalled manufacturing skill, capacity to produce whatever can contribute to either convenience or luxury, schools established in every village for teaching reading, writing and arithmetic, the general practice of hospitality and charity amongst each other, and, above all, a treatment of the female sex, full of confidence, respect and delicacy, are among the signs which denote a civilized people—then the Hindus are not inferior to the nations of Europe and if civilization is to become an article of trade between the two countries, I am convinced that this country (England) will gain by the import cargo.”

Sir Thomas Munro was specially anxious that there should be no misunderstanding about Hindu women. He said:

“In a former part of my evidence, in speaking of Hindu women, I mentioned the custom of their bathing in public at European stations: this statement may perhaps leave an unfavourable impression of their demeanour, but there is no man who has been in India but must maintain that nothing can be more modest than their behaviour, that they confide in it on all occasions for their protection from insult, and are seldom deceived. It would be no slight praise to the women of any nation, not even to the ladies of England, to have it said that the correctness of their conduct was not inferior to that of the Brahmin women and the Hindu women of the higher classes.”

Even such a hostile witness as the Abbe Daboia is obliged to admit that Hindu women were treated with the greatest consideration at least in public. In the first translation of his work published in 1817 by the East India Company occurred the following passage:

“But, degraded as the Hindu women are in private life, it must be admitted that they receive the highest respect in public. They certainly do not pay them those flat and frivolous compliments which are used amongst us, and which are the disgrace of both sexes; but on the other hand, they have no insults to dread. A woman may go wheresoever she pleases; she may walk in the most public places (must I except those where the Europeans abound?) and have nothing to fear from libertines numerous as they are in the country. A man who should stop to gaze on a woman in the street, or elsewhere, would be universally looked on as an insolent and a most low-bred fellow.” (pp. 299, 1817 edition.)

In the revised version from which the late Mr. Beauchamp made the present translation in 1897, and from the third edition of which Miss Mayo makes her citations, the uncomplimentary reflections on contemporary European manners are carefully omitted. The passage is recast as under:

“But if women enjoy very little consideration in private life, they are in some degree compensated by the respect which is paid to them in public. They do not, it is true, receive those insipid compliments which we have agreed to consider polite; but then, on the other hand, they are safe from the risk of insult. A Hindu woman can go anywhere alone, even in the most crowded places, and she need never fear the impertinent looks and jokes of idle loungers. This appears to me to be really remarkable in a country where the moral depravity of inhabitants is carried to such lengths. A house inhabited solely by women is a sanctuary which the most shameless libertine would not dream of violating.” (pp. 339-340.) A Japanese artist who has spent the greater part of his life in England wrote some years ago a book on English manners and customs. Contrasting the English and Japanese treatment of women, he said: “We kiss them in private and kick them in public; you kiss them in public and kick them in private.” The Abbe Daboia seems likewise to suggest, that the deference paid to Hindu women in public was not the result of a real respect for them. This we need hardly say is highly improbable.

The deliberate disingenuousness of Miss Katherine Mayo is clear from the fact that in all her several references to the Abbe Daboia’s book, she not once tells the reader that the manuscript of the book was submitted to the East India Company in 1807, and that the account in it relates to a period separated from our time by a century and a quarter. In one place at least she implies that the account relates to a period not very remote from ours. We refer to her statement that the Abbe found “this ancient law (relating to the behaviour of a wife towards her husband) still the code of nineteenth century Hindustan.” (p. 74), while the greater part of the Abbe’s Indian career belongs to the eighteenth century. It may be nothing to Miss Katherine Mayo to skip over a century in order to achieve her purpose of blackening the Hindus in the eyes of the world, but one might ask what the position of women and social conditions were generally in Europe or even in Miss Mayo’s own country a hundred years ago. But comparisons are odious.
PREVENTION OR CURE.

(By Dr. Clifford Manshardt, Ph. D.)

A recent report of the Director of Public Health presents an interesting survey of the prophylactic measures of the Public Health Department in connection with the religious fair at Pandarpur. By paying attention to the water supply, by giving care to conservancy arrangements, by house to house inspection, and similar measures, the amount of infectious diseases was reduced to a minimum. Although the fair was attended by 1,23,500 people, many coming from, and others coming through, cholera-infected regions, only 266 were attacked and only 43 died.

That which has happened at Pandarpur is but typical of what is happening throughout the civilised world. Campaigns are being waged against mosquitoes, against accumulated filth, against the common fly, against open sewers, against insanitary houses, and the hundred and one other things that are the known causes of contagious diseases. Governments and municipalities are seeing that to prevent disease is a measure of equal importance with curing it.

Or consider for a moment the subject of penology. In every nation enormous sums are spent for police protection, jails and penitentiaries. Still other sums are expended in the provision for and maintenance of criminal courts. The money cost of crime is staggering, to say nothing of the human wastage involved. Theoretically, a jail sentence is supposed to result in the cure of crime, but practically we have discovered that the released prisoner is less able to take a constructive place in society than he was before he entered prison. We have taken a step forward in enlisting the service of the physician and the psychiatrist in an effort to discover what kind of a man the prisoner really is. We are making progress in training and retraining prisoners in accordance with their natural aptitudes. But the big forward step must be a step in the direction of the prevention of crime. The criminal of tomorrow is the child of today. What the child will be depends upon the environment in which he is placed. Bad family conditions, slums, lack of schooling, lack of recreation facilities, lack of moral training must be placed on the debit side. Wholesome family life, proper living conditions, a good system of education, public playgrounds and adequate moral instruction are on the credit side. There is no infallible cure of crime, but every group of people has the opportunity of taking some steps towards its prevention.

The two cases cited above are very closely related to another social problem—the problem of poverty. Poverty has a direct relationship both to public health and to crime. The cure of poverty—and here again I use "cure" in the sense of after-treatment—is popularly considered to be charity. We have trust funds established for the relief of the poor. We have slum houses, orphanages, and old people's homes. We have centres where destitute people may obtain free food and lodging. We have government relief organizations, communal relief organizations, and private relief organizations. Hundreds of thousands of individuals give their alms upon the streets, or endeavour to relieve distress in more considered ways. But despite all this, the disease of poverty is not cured. Even in such a highly favoured nation as the United States, the retiring president of the National Council of Social Work declares that in a single year from four to five million people received charity; that a million and a half are thus kept in institutions for defectives, dependents, and delinquents; that 20 million people came to free dispensaries for medical aid; and five hundred thousand dependent children were being cared for by private or public benevolences. Twelve million people are at any moment near to destitution. In other words, that one in every ten of the population "marches in the valley of the shadow of poverty." If this is the situation in the world's wealthiest nation, how much more acute must be the problem in the needier nations of the world.

The India of to-day is an agricultural nation, and hence the major causes of poverty are those affecting the agriculturist. Among these are inadequate rainfall, resulting in famine and its attendant hardships; lack of proper methods of cultivation; the difficulty of disposing of crops at the right time and at the right place; the burden of inherited debts, coupled with the high rates of interest upon new loans; extravagant expenditures at times of wedding, funerals, etc.; and pointless expenditure in law courts. The rural conditions in turn result in migration to the cities where unskilled labour is too often a drag upon the market, and where wages are paid in accordance with supply rather than with regard to family need. One would not be so bold as to attempt to outline a program for the elimination of poverty, and yet preventative steps are being taken. We have our irrigation projects, reclaiming hundreds of thousands of acres of hitherto arid land. We have our agricultural departments, providing demonstrations and giving instructions in the science of farming. We have our co-operative societies helping in the marketing of crops, and releasing thousands from the hold of the money lender. We have a growing public opinion in favour of simple wedding and funeral ceremonies. An increasing number of educated men and women are settling their differences by "talking it over" instead of resorting to the courts. The problem of poverty is far from being solved, but we are making progress.

Of the India of to-morrow what can we say? The industrialisation of India has begun. The machine is with us, but as yet it does not rule us. Let us hope that it never will. What will happen in the future depends in large measure upon the foresight of the leaders of to-day. In the majority of the elder industrial nations the factory system was left to grow up unchallenged, and then at a later date government made strenuous efforts to catch up with industrial growth and to regulate abuses. As a matter of fact industry got away to such a start that to date social legislation has not succeeded in overtaking it. The nations of the west have been giving charity as a substitute for justice. In India we still have our chance. Poverty may not be abolished but it can be ameliorated. A progressive programme of social legislation, drawn from the experience of all lands and based squarely upon the principle of justice, is our surest preventative.

IN MEMORIAM—Mr. B. N. BHAJEKAR.

(By Mr. V. N. Bathaye, Sangli.)

It has become my painful duty to pay my tribute of love to the memory of my lifelong friend Balkrishna Narayan, alias Bandopant, Bhajekar who ended his earthly existence in Bombay after a lingering illness on Saturday, the 24th September, at the age of 65. He was High Court pleader for several years, but having naturally an altruistic bent of mind, he did not pay sufficient attention to the business side of the profession and inherited grounding in law from his father Rao Saheb Bhajekar, one of the legal luminaries in Poona in 1870. He was however considered an authority on Hindu Law and was consulted by his pious friends in the mohusul such as the late Bhusabazar Sane of Barli. Latterly he was connected with the Native Devas Junior as Chief Judge and Minister and having come in contact with some of the leading officials at Indore, he inaugurated with their help the annual celebration of the anniversary of the death of Ahalyabai Holkar and the Peshwa, Bajirao the First.

As a lifelong friend I was intimately associated with him almost from childhood and knew well the inner springs of his ideas as well as their external manifestations in action. He possessed in a remarkable degree the innocent simplicity of a child, the righteous enthusiasm of disciplined youth, the warmth of an emotional temperament, the sweet reasonableness of disposition and cultured love of a philosophical temperament, with such gifts he led a virtuous life absolutely free even from the present fashionable habits of tea and tobacco and translated into practice the well-known motto of plain living and high thinking.

He was a keen sportsman and was one of the early founders of the Hind Gymkhana in Bombay in the eighties and of the Deccan Gymkhana in Poona and took keen and constant interest in their activities. He took an active part in organising wrestling tournaments in Poona in the Sinimga holidays and latterly in the Olympic games on the grounds of the Deccan Gymkhana.

As a social reformer he did solid work in various movements such as the encouragement of female education, uplift of the backward communities and betterment of the condition of labouring classes in collaboration with the members of the social service league. But his chief and outstanding sphere of activities lay in the widow marriage movement among the Brahmins. He was not a mere preacher and propagandist, but set a brilliant example to the educated youth of Deccan by himself marrying at the age of 38 a poor widow of a respectable Brahmin family, four years after he lost his first wife, who had received fair education in English and for whom he bore more than the ordinary love of a Hindu husband. He was not content with the display of his own moral courage and convictions in this respect, but in furtherance of the cause he set about inducing others to follow his example and was instrumental in bringing about no less than 35 widow marriages among the Deccan Brahmins. His own house in Bombay served as an obiterating asylum for nearly 20 years to young Brahmin widows who wished to marry with the consent or acquiescence of their guardians. Nearly a dozen of the widows who 'got remarried under his auspice are leading a happy life and gratefully appreciate the paternal help they received at the hands of Bandopant. Another field of his activities was the popularising of adult education by means of lecturers and a 'kindergarten' system of instruction. He has even devised a system of his own of imparting instruction by means of playing cards, balls, etc. It was a thorough teetotaler in practice and contribute several articles to the press on the drink question bringing home to the public that ' Govind wills the necessity of prohibition by gradual stages. He had the greatest report for his father-in-law, Rudabodar Safaya, one of the pioneers of high female education.

He was an ardent admirer of Justice Ranade and received his practical lessons in public life from his school of thought and served for some years as Secretary of the Social Reform Association in Bombay and a member of the Bombay Presidency Association. Though not formally enrolled as a member of the Parthana Samaj, he imbibed fully the religious spirit of the movement and followed in practice some of its principal doctrines.

In short his life provides several lessons to the rising generation illustrating the well-known lines of Tennyson:

—Acting the Law, we live by without fear
Wore wisdom in the scorn of consequence.

He has left behind him a loving brother in Dr. Bhajekar of Bombay, a promising young son and a devoted widow, and a large circle of friends and relations to mourn his loss. By his purity of conduct he has earned a place in the immortal kingdom of God and hardly can be for our conventional prayers to that he his soul may rest in peace.

Swami Saradananda: The Modern Review writes: "By the death of Swami Saradananda of the Ramakrishna Mission, India has lost a great and untiring philanthropic worker. He was a distinguished scholar, too. But he was better and more widely known for the help which he was instrumental in rendering to people in distress, irrespective of caste and creed, whenever in any part of India famine, flood, earthquake, cyclones, fires or epidemics rendered such help necessary. That persons who handle money or other help given by the public should keep and publish detailed and accurate accounts of the same is a proposition which requires to be stated only because some people forget to do this obvious duty. Swami Saradananda's reports of relief work have always been a model of what they ought to be. Apart from the high character he bore, what is one of the reasons for his appeals for help were responded to. The external life of the Swami was so beneficial because of his inner life. Of this inner life only his intimate associates can tell, which we hope they will in "Buddhist Bharat."
THE INDIVIDUAL SOCIAL REFORMER.

Sir,

In connection with the article by Mr. Maneklal Vakil under the heading, "Hindu Women and the Special Marriage Act as Amended in 1923," in the issue of your journal dated September 3, will you publish the following few lines?

Mr. Vakil in the last paragraph of his illuminating remarks says: "Above all, the Act provides also that no right of inheritance to other relations will be forfeited by a person marrying by registration. Thus the parties may retain their caste by marrying within it and may also retain their rights of succession to other relations in accordance with the law governing the succession to such relations." The correctness of this statement may well be called in question. First, a person marrying under this Act cannot adopt; second, the father of such a person is entitled to adopt a son provided he has no other son; and last, the Act expressly lays down that such a person cannot become a member of the joint-family to which he belonged before his marriage.

There is one important feature of this Act which needs elaboration. It makes it possible for persons belonging to the same "Gotra" to solemnize a legal marriage. Further, the table of prohibited degrees of consanguinity is definitely much smaller under this Act than under the ordinary Hindu Law. A clause in the original Act reads: "No law or custom as to consanguinity shall prevent them from marrying unless a relationship can be traced between the parties through some common ancestor, who stands to each of them in a nearer relationship than that of a great-grand-father or great-grand-mother."

HINDU-PARSI MARRIAGE.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The above is indeed a very unfortunate affair. Both seem to me quite educated, and yet they never thought for a moment what misfortune they were bringing upon poor Nirmala. Oh! How sad to think that the Arya Samajists and Hindu Mahasabha Pandits have helped in and praised this marriage! Hindu Law is very defective in this matter. It not only permits to keep more than one wife but it can compel a wife to reside with her husband against her will. See, for instance, in this very case, if Mr. Nagin wants to keep Sarala and Nirmala both, he can keep both. Noc can leave him against his wishes and none can seek the protection of Law unless something very serious is proved against him in the Courts. To me, Hindu Law, therefore, should be so amended that a marriage of this kind may not be possible at all. One man could marry one and only one woman.

Parker High School, Moradab, 10th Sept. 1927.

Yours etc.,

ISHWARCHANDRA VIDYASAGAR AS AN EDUCATIONIST.

(By Mr. Brahmacharini Bambali)

If the 18th century saw a revolution in the political history of Bengal, the 19th century saw another and equally far-reaching revolution in our life and thought. This second change has been rightly called the Renaissance of India. At the time of the English conquests not only were our indigenous kingdoms in utter dissolution, but our society also was decayed and our medieval civilization was dead. The old order was dead, but the new order did not come into being till seventy-five years after the battle of Plassey, i.e., in the age of Lord William Bentinck.

This beneficent revolution in intellect and morals received its start from Rajah Rammohun Roy. It went on gathering force and volume till it created a new literature, a new faith, a new social organization and a new political life—in short, a new civilization in India.

In the intellectual sphere it took two forms: first, the acquisition of the new learning and scientific method of the West, and secondly, the discovery of the literature, thought and spirit of our ancient forefathers in their true and pure original form. In both of these fields Ishwarchandra Vidyasagar took a leading part. He was not only the first great critical Sanskrit scholar among the modern Bengalis, he was also the founder of vernacular education on sound modern lines and the creator of the first English college conducted entirely by Indians. Great as Vidyasagar admittedly was as a social reformer and philanthropist, he was not less great as an educational pioneer in two very important and untried fields. A study of this aspect of his career from original records is, therefore, a source of instruction to us, who are usefully reaping where he sowed with so much toil and anxiety.

Ishwarchandra was born on 29th September 1820 at the village of Birsingha, in the district of Midnapur. He gave promise of future greatness at a very early age. Following the tradition of his family, his father Thakurdass Banerji considered it his duty to educate the boy in the Sanskrit lore. Ishwarchandra, when 9 years of age, was admitted (1 June 1829) into the Government Sanskrit College in Calcutta, where he studied 12 years and 5 months and made himself thoroughly proficient in grammar, literature, rhetoric, arithmetic, logic, theology and law. His college career was all along brilliant and, when at the age of 21 he left the Sanskrit College (early in December 1841), his Professors marked his high appreciation of his uncommon merits and attainments by bestowing on him the title of Vidyasagar or 'Ocean of Learning.'

Soon after leaving college, Vidyasagar secured employment in the literary and educational line in which he was afterwards to become so pre-eminent. On the death of Madhusudan Tarkalankar on 9th November 1841 the office of the Sherihaeadar of the Bengal Department in the College of Fort William became vacant, and Ishwarchandra stood as a candidate for the post. Capt. Marshall, the Secretary of this college, who very much identified himself with the activities of the Government Sanskrit College also, was aware of Ishwarchandra's brilliant career as a student and recommended him to the Government.
After referring to the proficiency certificates, he added, "Ishwarchandra possesses also a moderate knowledge of English of which he acquired the rudiments in the English class of the Sanskrit College but he was unable conveniently to improve his knowledge after the abolition of that class. He bears a high character for respectability of conduct and for industrious habits."

Government approved of the selection and Vidyasagar was appointed to the post on 29th December, 1841, on a monthly salary of Rs. 50. This was the starting-point in the active career of the greatest educationist of modern Bengal.

Capt. Marshall was highly pleased with the work of his Sherihataadar; indeed, he found in him a very useful hand. The more he came in contact with the Pandit, the more he was charmed with his keen intellect, profound knowledge, bold and persistent spirit, untiring energy and, above all, his excellent character. While in the College of Fort William Vidyasagar came into close touch not only with the best Englishmen in Calcutta, but also with many respectable Indians. It was through Capt. Marshall that Dr. Mouat, the Secretary to the Council of Education, first came to know Vidyasagar and he afterwards became his benefactor through life.

Vidyasagar's appointment in the Fort William College was really a turning-point in his career, as it induced him to undertake a thorough study of English, in which language he soon became remarkably proficient. In 1846 the Government Sanskrit College lost two of its worthies, Rammaniya Vidyalakanar, Assistant Secretary, and Pandit Jagopal Tarkalankar, Professor of Sahitya (Literature) died in March and April respectively. They were pandits of great eminence, and their loss was severely felt, because orthodox pandits of such high reputed could not be prevailed upon under the then uncertain conditions of service, to offer themselves as candidates for such appointments. Dr. Mouat, Secretary to the Council of Education, consulted Capt. Marshall, Secretary to the College of Fort William, on the subject of appointing an Assistant Secretary to Government Sanskrit College who must combine a knowledge of Sanskrit with that of English and be capable of effecting improvements in the existing condition of the college. Marshall at once recommended Vidyasagar for the post, thereupon the Council of Education appointed him Assistant Secretary of the Sanskrit College in April 1846 on Rs. 50 a month. Vidyasagar was succeeded in the College of Fort William by his second brother, Dinabandhu Niyarma, a distinguished ex-student of the Government Sanskrit College, who took up his duties on 4th April 1846.

After Vidyasagar had joined the Sanskrit College, its Secretary, Rassomoy Dutt, was willing to appoint him to the vacant chair of Sanskrit Literature (Sahitya). Although the acceptance of the post would have meant an addition of Rs. 40 to his monthly income, he declined it in favour of his old class-friend, Madanmohan Tarkalankar (Head Pandit, Krishnagar College) who was accordingly selected.

Vidyasagar began his work in the Sanskrit College with great zeal. He soon drew up an improved plan of studies mostly from data furnished by the Secretary Rassomoy Dutt, and placed it before Major Marshall, who had conducted the Scholarship Examination at the Sanskrit College in September 1846. The Secretary of the Sanskrit College submitted the chief recommendations contained in Vidyasagar's report to the Council of Education, who approved of them. According to these recommendations the period of study in the Sanskrit College was extended from 12 to 15 years and some modifications were made in the routine and subjects of instruction.

Unfortunately Vidyasagar could not continue long in the Sanskrit College. His drastic reforms made the Secretary nervous and when some of his suggestions were disapproved, Vidyasagar resisted it. He had been honestly working for the well-being of the college and the moment he received a check in his reforming career, he lost all interest in his work. This was a trait of his character. A conscientious worker, Vidyasagar thought it his duty to resign the office of Assistant, Secretary, and repeated attempts failed to dissuade him from taking this step. He was a man of independent spirit and strong determination. He seems to have severed his connection with the Sanskrit College in the second week of July 1847, as we find from the records that Taranath Beasapati Professor of Grammar in Class, officiated as Assistant Secretary from 17th July to 9th November 1847 in addition to his usual duties, for which he was allowed to draw half the salary of the Assistant Secretary, viz., Rs. 25, out of the savings effected.

But Vidyasagar had really been an acquisition to the College of Fort William, and Major Marshall soon found an opportunity for reinstating him. The vacancy which Vidyasagar was asked to fill roused our interest even at this distant date. Durgacharan Banerji of Taltola (the father of Sir Surendranath Banerji) was the head writer and cashier in the College of Fort William, but he had in addition to his college duties, attended the Medical College lectures as a casual student for some time, and now resolved to set up as an independent medical practitioner. So, he sent in his letter of resignation to Major Marshall on 10th January 1849. Vidyasagar succeeded Durgacharan on 1st March 1849, after depositing the necessary security of Rs. 5,000, on a monthly salary of Rs. 80.

In November 1850 the Sanskrit College lost another of its luminaries, when Pandit Madanmohan Tarkalankar resigned the chair of Sahitya, on being appointed Provincial Pandit of the Murshidabad Circle. Ishwarchandra Vidyasagar was appointed in his place. Vidyasagar was at first unwilling to accept this post, but Dr. Mouat induced him to consent, on the understanding that the Council of Education would ere long vest him with the executive powers of the Principal. This would find an excellent outlet for the energies of a man of his stamp and it was a happy day for Bengal when he resigned the office of head writer and cashier of the College of Fort William on 4th December 1853, and was appointed the Professor of Literature.

Immediately after assuming the chair of Sahitya, Vidyasagar was directed (9 Dec. 1850) by the Council of Education to draw up a report on the existing state of the Sanskrit College, and to suggest measures for making the institution more efficient and useful. He accordingly framed (he tells us) as the result of a long and anxious consideration of the subject, a detailed report, which advocated many changes in the system of the institution and on 16th...
December 1850 submitted it to the Council with the hope “that the happy and speedy results under an efficient and steady supervision, would be, that the college would become a seat of pure and profound Sanskrit learning, and at the same time a nursery of improved vernacular literature, and of teachers thoroughly qualified to disseminate that literature amongst the masses of their fellow-countrymen.”

Vidyasagar was just the kind of man of whom the Council stood in need at the time. His able report was of great help to them. They were seriously considering the question of re-organizing the Sanskrit College. And now the only obstacle to the accomplishment of this desire was removed by the resignation in December 1850 of Roshomoy Dutta the Secretary of the college.

The Council suggested that the Sanskrit College be placed on exactly the same footing as the Madrasa, by the creation of the office of Principal and the abolition of the offices of Secretary and Assistant Secretary.

Government sanctioned the Council’s proposal (22 January 1851). The offices of the Secretary and Assistant Secretary were abolished, and Ishwarchandra Vidyasagar was made Principal of the College on a monthly salary of Rs. 150, from 22nd January 1851.

The suggestions contained in the report submitted by the Pandit were approved by the Council, and ordered to be adopted in the next session. October 1851—September 1852.

In fact, the Council of Education seem to have given him full powers at this stage to remodel, reform and simplify Sanskrit education.

The history of the Sanskrit College for the years 1851 to 1853 is virtually the history of the re-organization effected in it by Vidyasagar, who had to work hard in order to raise this seat of Hindu learning in the public estimation, and to place it on the more efficient footing required by the general advance of education in the country.

The laxity of discipline in the college attracted his notice first of all. Strict and steady attention was now paid to ensure regularity of attendance; to put a stop to students constantly leaving their classes on trivial pretenses, and to prevent needless noise, talking and general confusion.” He abolished the practice of closing the institution on the lunar days—Ashtami and Pratipad—twice every fortnight and fixed Sunday for closing the college once a week, as in other Government institutions.

The privilege of reading in the Sanskrit College had been confided to Brahman and Vaidya students only, but in July 1851 Vidyasagar, desirous of promoting education among all his country-men, extended it to the Rayatasa castes, and finally, in December 1854, three of its doors open to respectable Hindus of all castes without restriction.

In January 1852 Vidyasagar brought the claims of his institution prominently before the Council of Education in the hope that they would use their influence to induce the Government to afford that encouragement to the qualified passed students of the Sanskrit College, which had already been extended to those of the Hindu College and the Calcutta Madrasa.

Although the subject was necessarily beyond the jurisdiction of the Council, yet in deference to the ability and zeal of the Principal in advancing the interests of the institution over which he presided”, they did not deem it right to withhold his communication from the Government.

The Government gave a favourable reply and the Council was informed that the claims of qualified students from the Sanskrit College would be considered, equally with those of the scholars of other institutions.

The Sanskrit College, from its foundation in 1824, was a free institution and, as such, was subject to many inconveniences and abuses. Vidyasagar now sought to remedy these evils.

“It was the practice with some pupils to procure admission into the Sanskrit College and to run away in the course of a few months. Their guardians, finding the Sanskrit College a free institution, used to get them admitted into it, and to withdraw them as soon as they found opportunities of procuring, for them, an entrance to an English School. There were others again who frequently absented themselves without leave, and thereby had their names struck off the roll. This was no sooner done, than they, or their guardians, importuned so much for re-admission, that in many cases it became impossible to refuse the favour.”

To guard against these practices, to effect a marked improvement in the regularity of attendance, and to exclude the insincere pupils from the benefits of reading free, Vidyasagar introduced a fee of Rs. 2 for admission or re-admission in August 1852. This measure was intended to gradually pave the way for the introduction of the school fee system, which came into force after 16th June 1854, when every pupil admitted was required to pay a fee of Rs. 1 per month, only a limited number of free studentships being reserved for poor boys. The introduction of the fee system had a beneficial effect on students of a vacillating nature, and gave the much-needed impetus to improvement of educational institutions specially by enforcing regular attendance.

An improved system of study was set afoot in the Sanskrit College in November 1851. The Grammar Department was remodelled. Previous to November 1854, Bopadev’s Mughadabodha had been used in the Sanskrit College as a text-book. Young pupils, who had to begin their study of Sanskrit with this very difficult grammar written in Sanskrit, had to spend four or five years over it and, unable to comprehend its contents, they merely learnt by rote what their instructors said. Thus, when they proceeded to study the Sanskrit Classics in the Literature Class they had not been so well-grounded in the Language as expected. Vidyasagar fully realized the difficulty of the students and adopted the student’s mother-tongue as the medium of teaching Sanskrit grammar. He discontinued the study of Mughadabodha and introduced in its place Vyakramama Kramadi or Outlines of Sanskrit Grammar written in Bengali, and three Sanskrit Readers (Rijyajathas), containing graduated selections in prose and verse. The remodelled system proved a great success, and a student of ordinary ability did not require more than three years to complete the course.

Thus Vidyasagar solved the difficulties in the way of studying Sanskrit but he had yet to re-organize the English Department.—Modern Review Calcutta.
Among the agencies for promoting cultural and commercial relations between Japan and India, the Indo-Japanese Association occupies an important place. Its object is to promote intimate relations between Japan, India and South-Eastern Asiatic countries. (British India, Netherland India, Straits Settlements, Siam, French Indo-China, etc.). The Journal of the Japanese Association, published twice or thrice a year, is its English organ. The last general meeting of the Association was held in March at which Viscount Enoki Shibusawa delivered the following interesting speech:

I am sorry I was delayed in coming. While as President of this Association, I am doing hardly anything, the work of the Association is progressing steadily, thanks to the efforts of the members. What then, some of you may ask, made me accept the Presidency of the Indo-Japanese Association? I have a reason of my own for this.

I was very intimately related to Mr. J. N. Tata and his son Mr. R. D. Tata of India in connection with the spinning industry, which was started in Japan quite a long time ago. I think it was in 1889 or 1890 that my attention was first attracted to the considerable amount of yarn imported to Japan. As a banker, I was one at that time, I wondered whether we could not manufacture in Japan all the yarn we needed. It was no time for us to depend upon the immemorial hand-spinning of the oldfolk or children. Hand-spinning was quite out of date. So we started machine spinning in Japan.*

Our first spinning mill was built at Sangenya, Osaka, and soon several new companies were organized at different places in the country, all on a larger scale than the first. The spinning industry of the Orient may be said to have originated at Sangenya, Osaka, and at Miyake in the province of Ise. The operation of these spinning companies naturally made it necessary to import raw cotton. We had some cotton produced in the country, such as was called Made cotton. But it was of such a insignificantly small amount that we purchased Chinese cotton only to find it to be of inferior quality. Our eyes then turned to India, the land of raw cotton and spinning in the Orient. An investigation of India and her spinning was now necessary, and Mr. Rhei Kawamura was sent to India. I think, in 1888 or 1889, Our much-lamented Marquis Okuma then Minister of Foreign Affairs, suggested that we might investigate the conditions of sugar industry abroad. We have at present several large, sugar companies, such as the Dai Nihon Seito, the Daiwani Seito, etc., all operated on the investigations made in those days. Well concerning spinning and the importation of Indian cotton, we approached Mr. J. N. Tata, who died some time ago, and his son Mr. R. D. Tata. Soon Mr. R. D. Tata came over to Japan. I invited him to a reception at my house, and I introduced him to many leading business men of Japan. Subsequently, an arrangement was made for the importation of Indian cotton.

Another difficulty presented itself. Cotton must be brought over by steamer. The Oriental linens were then operated by three shipping companies; namely, the P. & O., an Italian and an Austrian line, the first-mentioned company almost monopolizing the service to Japan. Freight was quoted at Rs. 17, I think, per ton of cotton to Japan. This was unbearably high, but they would not take less. Just at this juncture, Mr. J. N. Tata came over on a visit to Japan, with the object of opening a new shipping service between India and Japan. He offered to share fifty-fifty in the business. The P. & O. was so overbearing that Mr. Tata could not operate a service by himself. At his invitation to us to take share in the new service, I saw Mr. Masazumi Morioka, then President of the N. Y. K., who died some time ago. Mr. Rempel Kondo, Mr. Masayoshi Kato, Mr. Masabumi Asada, and other leading persons. An arrangement was arrived at between Mr. Tata and the N. Y. K. to open a service to Bombay, under joint management. I remember that the Japanese spinners guaranteed an annual shipment of 50,000 bales. Naturally, the P. & O. offered keen competition by absurdly reducing their freight from Rs. 17 to 12, until a subsidy was given by the Japanese Government in aid of the competitive service of the N. Y. K. The P. & O. saw the inadvisability of maintaining such competition; it came to an end and freight was carried at a reasonable rate. The joint operation between the N. Y. K. and Mr. Tata came to an end three years after, and the service fell into the sole hands of the former. No competition is possible in these days in this service, but such was the state of things thirty years ago and my intimate relation with the Tata family. Mr. J. N. Tata died many years ago, and his son, Mr. R. D. Tata, died last year, leaving no intimate friend for me in India.

Such being the part I played in the importation of raw cotton from India, and in consideration of my intimate relation with the late Marquis Okuma, I was elected his successor, after his death, as President of the Indo-Japanese Association, though I have at present no direct connexion with this business, having retired from business several years ago.

As I said at the beginning, the Indo-Japanese Association is making steady progress in its work, thanks to the untiring efforts of the Executive Committee and the other members. As we are told in the report, we have just listened to the Association now operates the Indo-Japanese Commercial Museum at Calcutta, and the trade with India has made such strides that it is at present beyond comparison with that of former days.

I have long been looking for an opportunity to tell you why I hold this important position as head of the Indo-Japanese Association. I take this happy occasion this afternoon when many of our members have assembled here, to give you my explanation for holding the position when I am doing hardly anything for the Association. I am not boasting of what I have done in this connexion, but on the contrary, I am holding a sincere, quite nominal. 'I thank you all.'

Ceylon Reform: A Free Press Message states that among the memoranda submitted in advance to the Special Royal Commission is one from the Indian Community in Ceylon. It is understood that they have urged that according to their numerical strength and trade importance in the Island they are entitled to more than two representatives in the Legislative Council. It is also being urged that voting power should be extended to those who are literate in other languages such as Malayalam or Gujarati.
NEWS OF THE WEEK

Vidhava in E. Africa: A well-attended meeting of the India resident community was held in Salam. Targangiah, was held in New Cinema Hall at 5 a.m., on the 6th instant to discuss the feasibility of the erection of a Buddhist Vidhava in British East Africa by the community. The meeting was attended by all the members of the community and Mr. M. B. Malai de Silva presided, in a beautiful and lengthy speech Mr. Gunapala impressed upon the audience how desirable it was for the community to have a Temple worthy of the community and of the great religion they profess. He moved that a Temple should be erected at a cost of not less than Rs. 60,000 and completed by the end of December 1925. The resolution was carried unanimously and donations to the extent of Rs. 10,000 were promised on the spot.

Australian Anti-colour Law Amended: During his recent visit to Australia the Government of India had instructed Dewan Bhudur Rangacharir to make a representation to the authorities concerned on a few outstanding points still remaining unsettled in connection with the status of Indians settled in Australia. One of the few questions so remaining was the Ineligibility of Indians to obtain leases of land. When Mr. Bhudur Rangachariar returned was in Australia he had made a representation to the Government of South Australia to remedy this grievance. Mr. Rangachariar pursued the matter further and approached the Hon’ble Mr. Butler, Premier of South Australia, in this connection. In reply to his representation, Mr. Rangachariar has been informed by the Premier by last mail that the Ineligibility complained of has been removed as the law has been amended so as to make His Majesty’s subjects irrespective of colour eligible to obtain leases.

Widow-Marriage: Mehta Shanti Swaroop Vidhaya, of Madras writes:—The Vidhava Vivaha Sabha, Madras has deputed me as their representative to popularise and encourage Hindu widow-marriages in this presidency in particular. I have been able to establish a Central Branch of the above Sabha in Madras with the Hon’ble Mr. Justice Venkata Subba Rao as President and Dr. Mukundam Ammal, Mr. T. Bagavanthan Gupta and others as Vice-President. The office of the central branch is at present established at 29, Pidiyar Ra, Madras Town, Madras State. During the last six months, local branches have been established in about 15 places in the Andhra Province, in 15 places in Tamil Nadu, four places in Mysore and South Canara. At all these places, the Sabha has been established by the public and are hereby requested cordially to co-operate with the local branches, as well as the central branch at Madras and help to bring about the consummation of the earnest wishes of late Sir Gangaram, the Founder of the Sabha, and the foremost savour of the helpless Hindu wide-married. For any information and particulars regarding the movement, please write to the Hon’ble Secretary, Vidhava Vivaha Sabha Sabha, 29, Pidiyar Kidi St., C. T., Madras, in response to the message of Mahatam to encourage Hindu widow-marriage, a number of persons of both sexes have sent enquiries to our office. We therefore invite applications for remarriage from both sexes and especially from Telugu widows. Two sincere lady workers, either honorary or paid, to approach widows and popularise the cause are wanted.

Ahalyabai Anniversary, Indore: The 152nd anniversary of the most renowned women rulers of India was recently observed. The day’s entertainments commenced at 7 a.m. when the photo of Ahalyabai Devi was formally set up in the Shree Gopal Mandir. The ceremony was followed by the singing of a Telugu song by the Telugu female workers. The day concluded with a grand performance in the Gopal Mandir. The day was observed with great enthusiasm and the public participated in large numbers. The day concluded with a grand performance in the Gopal Mandir. The day was observed with great enthusiasm and the public participated in large numbers.

Ahalyabai Theatre, which was very largely attended by public. At the Naratal Mandir school girls gathered, along with their teachers and Indian ladies from the city, and gave similar performances. From 11 to 12 the poor about 1500 were fed. From 3.30 to 7 p.m. the King Edward Town Hall was the scene of an unprecedented and enthralling gathering where distinguished visitors from other neighbourhoods, the Chief Ministers and members of the Cabinet, General of the State Army, all heads of various departments, Jhagirdars and Sirdars of the State, and the elite of the public participated. After the performance, a large photo of Ahalyabai was placed on the platform and garlands sent by various institutions from outside were placed on the photo. School boys and girls sang patriotic songs. Rai Babadur Mr. S. M. Babadur, the Chief Minister delivered his presidential address, and said that he looked upon Ahalyabai as a model of Indian womanhood and an exceptionally capable woman administrator who had left her mark on Indian history. He suggested for the consideration of the Shree Ahalyabai Committee the desirability of incorporating the lives of Indian heroes and heroines in text books, and especially the wonderful deeds of this renowned lady, for the education of the rising generation. He was followed by other well-known public speakers who made eloquent references to the life of Ahalyabai. After the singing of the national anthem, the photo was placed in a palki with a golden umbrella, and taken in procession from the Town Hall to the Gopal Mandir. Immediately after the procession, attended by the Cabinet, the entire official staff together with Sirdars and Jhagirdars of the State, and the public participated in the procession with the greatest reverence. The procession reached Gopal Mandir at about 8 p.m., when the photo was restored to its place in the temple.

University Reform Legislation: Prior to the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms, Indian Universities were incorporated by Acts of the Central Legislature. University education has been perhaps the chief means of creating an Indian intelligentsia with considerable similarity in their ideas and aspirations, and this, to a large extent, was due to the general uniformity of the constitution of the several statutory Indian Universities. Under the Reform Act, Universities have been provincialised, and one of the first things which the Provinces have hastened to do is to "reform" their Universities. The "reforming" zeal in many respects has taken rather a "deforming" form. The fundamental idea of a University has been ruthlessly violated by the attempt to "democratise" the constitution of the Universities. "An University," wrote Bryce, "is Organised Thought, organised for practical as well as theoretical views." If many of the members of the Legislative Councils had their way, Universities will be more correctly described as "Organised Ignorance." The debate in the Bombay Legislative Council furnishes a good illustration. Fierce speeches have been made for introducing into the Senate representatives of the backward communities, the depressed classes, factory labourers, religious denominations and castes, without the slightest reference to the main purpose of the University. The Bombay Government have fortunately taken a strong stand against introducing communal distinctions in the University Reform Bill, but they have been obliged to pledge themselves to use their powers of nomination to secure representation of these entirely uncritical—interested and denominations. The effect of thus "democratising" the University must inevitably be to lower the standard. To our mind, the very idea of "democratising" a University, except in the sense of recognising no distinctions of race or creed, rich or poor to its teaching, is absurd. The governing body of a University must always be an intellectual aristocracy unanswerable to the influences of wealth or power. This is, no doubt, a counsel of perfection, but an University whose Senate is a replica of the Legislative Council can only be a University in name. It is a great pity that the Reform Act of 1919 did not provide for a central body representing all Universities, to initiate reforms instead of leaving it to each Province. A Federation has been since inaugurated, but it has no statutory right to functions, and it is powerless to give any useful guidance.

A Shankaracharya's Protest: An Associate Press message of the 1st October says: "Sir Madajagadur Guru Shankarakarya has sent a telegram to H. B. the Governor-General in Council, Simla, expressing surprise at the Indian legislature 'meddling with the religious freedom of the Hindu community' by its attitude towards the Bill to prevent the marriages of girls below the age of twelve, and satisfaction at his Excellency's Government having placed before the Legislature the view-point of the orthodox Hindu community. The telegram urges his Excellency to veto the Bill."

We have great respect for the ancient faiths established by Sri Shankaracharya who was one of the most dynamic personalities that India has ever known. His successors and representatives in modern India can best carry on his tradition by helping and not hindering necessary social reforms: As a matter of fact, the Shankaracharya has no right to dictate even to his followers what social customs they should follow. These are secular matters in which his Holiness who is a Samnyasi has no concern and should not interfere. We might remind the Shankaracharya of Shaadasana's emphatic declaration in the Assembly of such a concession Hindu public mass as Sir Purabottam Chandrasara that no one who mixed up religion with the question of early marriages should be be sent to a lunatic asylum or had vested interests. Surely, it is absurd for the Shankaracharya to suggest as he does that the Honourable Mr. Curzon who spoke for the Government of India was a traitor representative of the orthodox Hindu community than Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya and Sir Purabottam Chandrasara who supported the principle of the Bill while pleading for its circulation in order to elicit public opinion. We would respectfully and fully warn his Holiness and others in his position that obstruction to the march of progress will inevitably provoke a socio-religious revolution which will sweep them out of existence: as the Khilafat was swept out of existence by the Turkish Revolution. Even now few people, except perhaps the very orthodox, set much store by the opinions of the religious gurus. For our own part, we should be glad to have these ancient seats of piety and learning continuing to teach and inspire the people by adapting themselves to modern ideas. But if they fail to do this they will have themselves to thank if Hindu degeneracy becomes to "regard them as living forces in the national life."

Education for the Depressed Classes: We have received a copy of the annual report
the Educational work done by the Shraddhanand Dali Todbar Sabha, Dalhi, among the depressed classes of that province. The Sabha is part and parcel of the Arya Samaj and how it came to interest itself in work of this nature furnishes interesting reading. The apathy shown towards the depressed classes by the education department, the local bodies and the managements of private schools in and around their home towns, led the Sabha to start schools for them. The Sabha took over the Dayanand Pathshala Khurja as early as 1925 and since then it has been the nucleus of its activities, By steady increase the Sabha has risen to 27 with 1038 students attending it. It is gratifying to learn that the education and general upliftment of the depressed classes have had a wonderful effect in removing prejudice and the sense of untouchability which the higher castes entertained against them. We congratulate the Sabha on having set its hands to an important piece of national work. The Arya Samaj, by its principles and teaching is a potent factor in levelling up the masses, and were it only to concentrate its work in this direction all over India to do as much good as much it this country. Worse than that, The Commission of Naturalization has written to me from Washington saying that the cases of Indians whose naturalizations already had been cancelled are in no way affected by the recent favorable action of the government. In other words, only those who kept up their legal fight for the last five years and carried on their cases to higher courts will be permitted to retain their citizenship." If there is any justice in the clause of naturalization of Indians to American citizenship it is not fair to deny it to those who have not cared, or have not had the means to institute, lengthy proceedings against the American Government. In this connection we wish to accord our full support to the appeal of Mr. Sajendra Nath Ghosh to be Indian National Congress to stand by and safeguard the interests of the Indians abroad.

A Correction: In "Mother India."—VII which appeared in the last issue of the Reformer, a misprint occurred at the end of the second column of page 67. The year in which all offices were thrown open to natives of India without distinction of caste or creed was not 1853 but 1835.

MANAGER'S NOTICE.

Reminders have been sent to those subscribers whose subscriptions have fallen in arrears and to those whose subscriptions are due for the current year. Those who are in arrears are specially requested to remit the amounts due without delay.
We may quote one more passage from the Abbe's book to show how women's honour was greatly respected in India even in what in the West would be regarded as trying circumstances. The Abbe writes:

"I have often spent the night in one of the common rest-houses where the men and women lodging there were lying all huddled together anyhow, and almost side by side; but have never known or heard of anyone disturbing the tranquillity of the night by indecent act or word. Should any person be so ill-advised as to attempt anything of the sort, the whole room would be up in arms against him in a moment, and prompt chastisement would follow the offence."

(p. 340). We wonder whether the Abbe could have said such a thing of Chicago or New York.

If the Abbe Dubois was an impartial observer and not an attributions fanatic, he would have realised that the respect paid to women in public by Hindus was inconsistent with the degraded position which, according to him, was normally assigned to them in private. There can be no question that the Hindus of his time were posting before the Abbe. He himself repeatedly says in his book that the Hindus of his time had a great contempt for Europeans and it is, therefore, improbable that they would have gone out of their way to pretend a respect for women which they did not feel in order to win the praise of the Abbe. Not only were Europeans held in contempt but Christianity itself was, on their account, brought into contempt. Writing of the discrepancies into which Christianity had fallen among Hindus in his time, he attributes it to the conquest of the country by Europeans, "a disastrous event as far as the advance of Christianity was concerned."

He writes: "Having witnessed the immoral and disorderly conduct of the Europeans who then overrun the whole country, the Hindus would hear no more of a religion which appeared to have so little influence over the behaviour of those professing it and who had been brought up in its tenets; and their prejudices against Christianity has gone on increasing steadily day by day, as the people became more familiar with Europeans, until it finally received its death-blow. For it is certainly a fact that for the last sixty years very few converts have been made in India." The Abbe adds that "a respectable Hindu who was asked to embrace the Christian religion would look upon the suggestion either as a joke or else as an insult of the deepest dye." (p. 301). The Abbe's estimate of the Europeans of his time is more emphatically expressed in the original (1817) edition than in the revised one.

Miss Katherine Mayo, if she was the trained social observer which some of her admirers say she is, cannot have failed to see that the Abbe Dubois' statements about the public and private position of Indian women are contradictory and conflicting. She has not, as we pointed out in a previous article, made the slightest attempt to check them by reference to other contemporary estimates of Hindu civilization and manners. This is not at all. No "trained social observer" would think of estimating the social progress of India without studying the writings of Ranade, the illustrious social and religious reform leader. As well might a student of Evolution ignore Darwin's "Origin of Species" or of Economics, Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations." Ranade is the great fountain-head of ideas of national progress, as Raja Ram Mohan Roy was before him. Ranade was not only a great thinker but he was also a great reader of contemporary literature having any bearing on Indian national problems. Mr. Beauchamp's translation of Abbe Dubois' book did not escape his eagle eye. He made it the text of his address to the Twelfth National Conference held in Madras in 1898, the very next year of its publication. The way in which he utilised the book was characteristic of the man. He took the Abbe's statements at their face value, notwithstanding his opinion that being a missionary "he unconsciously exaggerated many points and misunderstood many others", and that he was "misinformed in many respects", that his explanations in some cases "were obviously untrue"; and that the Abbe "was unjust to the old civilization."

Ranade passed over in silence the part of the book which the Abbe called the Abbe's "curse" upon the people of India. The passage he referred to occurs on page 60 of Abbe Dubois' book and runs as follows:

"It is a vain hope to suppose that the English people can ever improve the condition of the Hindus. The efforts of a humane and just government may succeed up to a certain point, but as long as the Indians cling to their civil and religious institutions, customs and habits they must remain what they have always been, groveling in poverty and wretchedness. These institutions and customs are insurmountable obstacles in their path of progress. To make a new race of Hindus, you must begin by undermining the foundations of their civilization, religion and polity and turn them into atheists and barbarians, and then give them new laws, new religion and new polity. But even then, the task will be half-accomplished, for, we should still have to give them a new nature and different inclinations. Otherwise, they would soon lapse into their former state and worth."

Ranade compared the Abbe's prophecy of despair to those of the Hindu astrologers who fixed the fatal limit of 5,000 years from the commencement of the Kaliyuga, and "according to whom we are now just on the verge of crossing this Rubicon which separates law from anarchy and virtue from impurity, and nothing that men can do in the work of their own salvation will ever help to avert the crisis." Ranade showed, comparing the state of things as described by the Abbe with what it was in 1898 when he delivered the address, that both the astrologer and the Abbe were at fault and remarked that "if he (the Abbe) had lived

A hundred years later, he would have joined with the contemporary men of his calling in conferring on us his blessings instead of his curses." Ranade went on to say:

"Have the past hundred years worked no permanent changes for the better? I hope to be able to show that, if things are not as bright as we wish them to be, they are not so dreary and cheerless as some would have them to be, and that the British connection and its just and humane administration have brought about a change in our religion, law and polity, of such a character as not to make it necessary that we should be all turned into atheists and barbarians, to be white-washed again into civilization and manners, and that, if we have not acquired a new nature, we have at least acquired inclinations and aspirations which will prevent our lapse into our former condition." (Miscellaneous Writings of the late Mr. Justice M. G. Ranade—p. 200).

The Abbe Dubois declared that Hindus cannot be redeemed without being saved from Hinduism. Miss Katherine Mayo says that their degradation rests upon a physical base—namely, "his (the Hindu's) manner of getting into the world and his sea-life thenceforward." Ranade in his address showed that the corruptions which attracted the attention of the Abbe were due to causes alien to the principles of Hindu civilization. These influences operated chiefly when the country was exposed to foreign invasions and Ranade ascribed "the tone of debasement and panic in the Puranas written about this time" to the alarm felt by the play of these alien influences. These influences, Ranade held, "were not able to extinguish the old fire completely, and the spirit of righteous self-assessment and of faith in God which has distinguished Brahmanism from the first only wanted an opportunity to regain its old liberty." He continued:

"The opportunity so sorely needed has come to this country and slowly but surely priest-ridden and caste-ridden India is loosening its coils of age. Abbe Dubois was unjust to the old civilization when he thought that we should have to unlearn all our past and commence with atheism and barbarism and then take our religion, law and polity from our foreign masters. Even if the task were possible, the remedy would be worse than the disease. We have not to unlearn our entire past—certainly not—the past which is the glory and wonder of the human race. We have to retrace our steps from the period of depression, when in panic and weakness a compromise was made with the brute force of ignorance and superstition. If this unhealthy alliance is set aside we have the Brahmanism of the first three Yugas unfolding itself in all its power and purity as it flourished in the best period of our history. Our nature has not to be changed. If that were necessary, escape would be hopeless indeed. Our inclinations and aspirations have to be shifted from one quarter to its opposite, from the more immediate past of our degradation to the most remote past of our glory.

We need no foreign masters for this purpose. It is enough if they keep the peace and enforce toleration to all who work for righteousness. Super-imposed laws will not do service to us unless as in some extreme cases the Surgeon has to be sent for to stop hemorrhage and allow the Physician time to heal the patient. This work of liberation must be the work of our own hands, each one working for himself for his own release. It is in this spirit that the work has been carried on during the last thirty years and more." (The Miscellaneous Writings of the late Mr. Justice M. G. Ranade.—pp. 207, 208.)

In these weighty words Ranade not only replied to Abbe Dubois' book, but laid down the policy and the principle of Indian reform. Indian reformers are fully alive to the many social evils which retard the growth of Indian men and women to the full height of their stature, but they know that these evils are not inherent either in the physical or spiritual foundations of Hindu life and they have been working not without result to remove them without destroying the foundations of national life. This is necessarily a work of time. In this great work, they welcome the advice and assistance of friendly foreigners and have always done so. But writers like Miss Katherine Mayo and the Abbe Dubois who are inspired by a preconceived hatred of the Hindu religion and race are not of this class. Their writings are really a great hindrance to progress.

Hyderabad Finance: Whatever may be the defects of the Nizam's Government in other respects, it has been fortunate in the stability of its finances secured under zealous Finance Ministers. Nawab Hyder Nawaz Jang, better known as Mr. Hydari, is himself the most successful of these. In his latest Budget Note, he sums up the present position in these words:

"These results show that the evenly prosperous era of Hyderabad finance which began in the time of my revered chief—Sir George Osborn Walker now unhappily no more—with a heavy legacy of unproductive debt, and continued, notwithstanding the stress of a world-wide war and unfavourable seasonal conditions, under the skilful guidance of my friend, the Hon'ble Mr. Glancy—who I trust and pray has still many years of work and distinction before him—still pursues its smooth course and is now, through the system of departmental finance and specific Reserves for specific objects, on foundations which may under Providence be considered as reasonably assured for the future. Thus, as I said in my last budget note, Hyderabad has sufficient money for a progressive and enlightened administration. It now requires efficient men who will use the whole resources of their country with wisdom and integrity, and these we hope to get and have a right to expect from the several measures which have all been sanctioned and executed in His Exalted Highness' reign—the grant of scholarships for the education of young Hyderabadis in Europe and British India, the establishment of a Civil Service Class for their recruitment to the higher services of the State and the inauguration of the Osmania University for diffusing light and culture among the people of the Dominions".
MR. CHETTY ON SOCIAL REFORM.

Mr. Shanmukham Chetty is one of the ablest of our younger publicists. He was a member of the Non-Brahmin party in Madras when it was originally formed, but left it when he found that its social ideals were being shoved into the background in favour of its sectional political aims. Mr. Chetty is a member of the Legislative Assembly and was one of the two members who represented India in the Empire Parliamentary Conference in Australia two years ago. In Australia, Mr. Chetty distinguished himself by his utterances on Indian aspirations. He is a careful student of progressive movements all over the world and his views always command respectful attention. He was called to preside over the eleventh Conference of the Nader Mahajan Sangham held at Kumbakonam on the Ist instant. The Naders, it may be mentioned, correspond to the Bhandaris of the Bombay Presidency, and it may be noted as a curious coincidence that, like the Bhandaris in Bombay, the Shanars (‘Nadar’ being the caste suffix, just as ‘Aliya’ and ‘Aliyanger’ among the Tamil Brahmins of South India), have been among the pioneers of the printing press industry in the South. The Naders like the Bhandaris are noted for their high mental and moral spirit and it is significant of their broad outlook that although the Conference is a caste gathering, leading men of all castes, Brahmins and Non-Brahmins, are invited to preside over its deliberations.

Mr. Shanmukham Chetty’s address, the larger part of which we print elsewhere, will repay perusal. One point in it in particular we should like heartily to endorse, and that is his submission to the Naders that at their attempt to prove that they are Kshatriyas by origin is inconsistent with their claim for social equality. Mr. Chetty rightly said: “You must claim equality with the so-called higher castes, not on the ground that, by reason of your past history, you have yourselves a place in the higher hierarchy, but on the more reasonable and incontrovertible ground that as human beings you are entitled to be treated as equals.” The Non-Brahmin movement in Maharashtra owes its origin to the denial by the Brahmins of Maharashtra of the claim of the Maharashtras as Kshatriyas, which they claim to be, to the use of the Vedic sacraments. This is the fundamental difference between the Non-Brahmin movement in the South and in Maharashtra. In the South the movement is ethnic and communal, while in Maharashtra it has only a social and political significance. There can, therefore, be no lasting alliance between the two and it is not surprising that the Bombay Non-Brahmins at their last Conference refused to follow the lead of the Madras Non-Brahmins and join the Congress. But this is by the way. While there is much in Mr. Chetty’s criticism with which we are in agreement, we must say that his prescription of the remedy is not by any means clear or consistent. His statement that the revolt against the caste system began with the growth of the conscious use of self-respect among the lower strata of society is historically incorrect. The first protest against caste, confining ourselves to the British period, was made by the Brahmin and Kastasha reformers who started the Brahmo Samaj. The next protest was by the Arya Samaj founded by the Brahmin, Dayanand Saraswati. All the subsequent protests have been by high-caste Hindu reformers. “The lower strata of society,” by which Mr. Chetty no doubt meant the depressed classes, did not start the revolt, and we doubt if their attitude alone today can be called one of revolt against the caste system. The Brahmin community of Bombay, the other day was convulsed by the action of the Brahmin Sabha in allowing a choir of Antiya boys to participate in their celebrations of the Ganapati festival.

Caste as such is fast disappearing and we think that its extinction cannot be materially accelerated by what is called a revolt against it. Mr. Chetty is an admirer of Munshi Pashu Pasha’s method and believes that uncompromising and radical remedies alone can effect any measure of success in social reform. It is too early to judge of the permanence of the Pasha’s reforms and in any case you must find a Munshi Pasha before you can introduce his methods in India. It is at any rate too early to talk of those methods as practical methods of social reform in India, and, for our own part, we would rather have India reformed by the slow but certain process of mental and moral illumination than by the drastic and precarious state of a military dictator. What the Pasha has done may be undone by the next dictator, and from our knowledge of history we are almost sure that this will be the case. The Puritanic regime of Cromwell had its inevitable reaction in the latitudinarian excesses which distinguished the reign of Charles II. Mr. Chetty said: “When the work of reformation has to be done on a large scale as it is necessary in our country, it is only use merely to tackle the individual apart from his environment. Though the individual is necessarily the predominant factor you cannot isolate him from his surroundings, the family and the village-community. The tragedy of the average educated man to-day is that he finds himself a stranger in his own family and society. In it a ny wonder, therefore, if in course of time he succumbs to the influences that surround him and the great ideals that he initiated in his college-days become a dream of the past? The family and the village must therefore be taken as the units of social work.” This is true so far as it goes but Mr. Chetty narrowly missed the practical solution for this tragedy. It is all very well to speak of the family and the village being the unit of social work, but you can do nothing for those units except through the individuals of whom they are composed. Now, in dealing with a matter of social reform the best way is to select the “key” individual, so to speak, in the family unit and direct our operations through that individual. The women of a family are the “key” individuals and we note with some regret the absence of all reference to the importance of women’s education in the pro
THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER. [October 8

A WOMEN'S MOVEMENT FOR SOUTH AFRICA.

Sir,

The appeal by Mr. U. K. Oza on behalf of the Indian women in the Colonies is an important one and should engage the attention of all the leading women of India. In fact it will mean the strengthening of our position and our case outside India. The amelioration of the condition of the women and the granting of equal opportunities and equal status to them will raise the prestige of the Indians considerably. Apart from that, it is but common justice and humanity to grant to the women folk what the men are demanding from the rulers in the colonies, and I am sure the success of the latter demand will be measured by the amount of freedom and opportunity that is given to the women there. The learned Hon. Swinhoe Sastri is at present engaged in organising the educational movement and is paying particular attention to the education of girls. This will improve the lot of the Indians of the coming generation for they will not only have better social conditions but more home-like homes and a more congenial atmosphere and a general elevation of the mind and spirit. But there is a vast deal that can be done to improve the lot of the Indian women in the immediate future. This lies mainly in the hands of women. A few days ago a gentleman had an interview with Mr. C. F. Andrews on the very point and Mr. Andrews said that if only a handful of able women from India, armed with zeal and love to help their sisters over the seas, would make up their minds to go over to S. Africa and settle there for a period to start a women's organisation, they would be rendering the cause of both S. Africa as well as India, a great service. He only confirms what some of the South African ladies had said to me when I had the pleasure of meeting them at the Jubilee Convention of the Theosophical Society. One now feels the matter being of the utmost importance, careful and urgent attention should be devoted to it. There are various powerful Women's Associations all over India who could be approached to co-operate in drawing up some useful scheme subject of course to modifications to suit the local needs and conditions. The Sirva Sadan Society of Poona should be in a position to give very valuable guidance since it has already done useful work of this type in India. I am sure Mr. Devadhar, Mrs. Bhat and others like Mrs. Cousins will be willing to give their advice. Even a few women with some experience and knowledge would decide to live in the Colony for a limited period of time till the women's organisation is put on a sound working basis. It would be but fulfilling the deep duty and obligation we owe our sisters over the seas who are in a sense suffering under greater disabilities than we are, and do what little we can for their upliftment. We can well imagine the fine stuff and the rich material that needs handling and moulding from the glorious account we have of them from Mahatma Gandhi and the experience he had of their bravery and steadfastness to purpose during his long struggle over there.

The memory of Sarojini Devi's visit to South Africa is still fresh in our minds. We have seen with pride and joy what a fount of inspiration she was to the Indian community at large and how she raised India in the estimation of the Europeans. Mr. Andrews has been relating some of the deep impressions she has left behind, and he hopes that she will repeat her visit again in 1928. How much would not the visit of more cultured ladies and a personal contact with the door of the Indian cause in Africa? Indeed the benefits of a long stay amidst them of enlightened and able Indian women would be incalculable both for our sisters there as well as for the honour of India. Could not we take advantage of the visit of Sarojini Devi's next year to South Africa and mark the inauguration of a women's movement over there. We shall not find a finer person than her to lead this band of workers over to that Colony. Let us make it a holy pilgrimage and at the altar of humanity let us offer the choicest and sweetest flowers of love and service.

There are two great tasks that should be undertaken immediately and on as wide a scale as possible: first the educational work and the second is social welfare such as Infant and Maternity Welfare. The educational work will have to be both intellectual as well as industrial. The problem of adult education is all important and it practically means the whole regeneration of the community. The European countries are giving intense attention to this problem and are spending large sums of money on it. Russia has worked wonders with the development of adult education after the Revolution. By keeping the women folk in gross ignorance the country is filled with darkness and the one-sided efforts of a one legged man to race with another who is sound on both legs. The opening of centres to impart knowledge, both industrial and intellectual, and the teaching of the care of mothers and babies will bring light and health to the Indian community as also solve the economical problem for many a struggling woman. It will make her economically independent and rid her of her distress.

It will bring a general mental development, broaden the outlook of the women and widen their scope of work. All the suppressed energy and strength will be released and the result will undoubtedly be marvellous. There will be a better cultured and more organised life both in the home as in the society. It will mean cleaner homes better sanitation and thus more conservation of energy. The Indians will thus necessarily command the respect of the other races. No foreigner will then dare to point scornful fingers at the Indian. In the face of these valuable advantages and at the earnest request of men like Mr. Andrews we cannot afford to hesitate. Such a group of earnest workers will do much more than some of our representatives.
tires that are sent out to the Colonies and Dominions on "Ambassadorial missions" and who in return for the large sums of money that are spent on them go about with a lot of bombastic talk of India extending a friendly hand of comradeship and her decision to remain for ever under the protection of the Union Jack and then coming back and telling us of the sympathetic attitude of His Majesty's Dominions although at the end of it all the sufferings of the Indians Overseas get worse and worse. Of course, under the present conditions when we have no popular government of our own we cannot hope to look to the State for any encouragement or help but I am sure the public-spirited women of India will be large-hearted and generous enough to rise to this call that has come from a distant land. Mr. Ona has appealed to the women of India to extend their helping hand. I add my voice to his appeal. I shall personally be very happy to place my services at the disposal of anybody who undertakes this pilgrimage.

FERGUSSON COLLEGE CIRCULAR.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I wish to draw your attention, as one interested in education, to a recent circular issued by the Principal of the Fergusson College. It is proposed in this circular to transfer the conduct of test examinations of the students who are appearing for the University examinations to a paid agency. This appears to be an attempt to bring up students who are deficient in some subjects to the efficiency standard. According to the circular a student will be required to answer a set of questions in subjects in which he is weak at stated intervals and his answers will be assessed by the paid agency. The process of testing will be continued till about a fortnight before the commencement of the University Examination and if he does not satisfy this agency his application form will be withdrawn. The cost of the examining agency is to be met by the students in proportion to the number of their defective subjects. They will be charged at the rate of Rs. 5 per defective subject. The proposed scheme has caused considerable anxiety among students, parents, and guardians as imposing an extra burden on them and it is bound to bring much hardship in its train. Many students in Poona and the neighbourhood have got to it to meet already the high cost of education. If the scheme of the paid agency is persisted in there is every reason to believe that many boys coming from families of ordinary means will have to go without education.

If the College authorities are anxious to secure a better percentage of passes than what they have been able to achieve, why should they not give special coaching to students as a labour of love? This is not difficult for Fergusson College authorities, as they have already made sacrifices at the altar of education. Evidently they are trying to kill two birds with one stone.

1st October 1927.

Yours etc.,

A GUARDIAN.

(We should like to have more particulars of this scheme from, if possible, the College authorities, before commenting on it.—Ed., I. S. R.)

THE NADAR CONFERENCE.

Mr. Shamaikumaran Chetty’s Presidential Address.

It has become almost the fashion at gatherings of this nature to begin by sounding a note of warning against the dangers of “communalism” and exhorting the audience to subordinate communal interests in favour of national interests, I do not know if those who harp on this theme realise the true significance of these expressions and their application to the realities of the situation as it exists in our country. Our whole social system and the fabric of Indian society are based upon artificial and biological distinctions. This social system is such a vital factor in our everyday life that it is “not easy” for those who are the victims of that system to take a wide view of life and think in terms of national as opposed to sectional interests.

COMMUNALISM THE RESULT OF SOCIAL CONDITIONS.

The apostles of Nationalism have either failed to realise the significance of this factor or have lacked the courage to advocate and apply the proper remedy. It is not a wonder, therefore, that our progress towards the “National Ideal” has been painfully slow. It was fondly hoped that with the progress of education the barrier will break down and the way paved for national unity. But if we are not to be entirely blind to the facts that we witness in our everyday life, we must confess the any such hope has been a vain hope. The sectional feeling which is only dormant amongst the masses finds its virulent expression more amongst the educated classes. It is a sad commentary in our progress that the Indian National Congress which is undoubtedly the most “national” of our institutions finds itself after 42 years of existence face to face with the spirit of the most virulent and militant “communalism.” The leaders of the movement are to-day spending the most anxious days and nights in finding a solution for this problem.

CASTE THE OBSTACLE TO THE GROWTH OF NATIONALISM.

What is the poison root that kills the growth of Nationalism? It is Caste. Until the social system that is based upon caste distinction is pulled root and branch the realisation of the national ideal will be but an imperfect realisation at best.

So long as caste distinctions remain, communal, as opposed to National, consciousness is bound to assert itself.

Caste to-day is a disintegrating factor in our national life and inconsistent with all that stands for modern Nationalism. It cannot also be gainsaid that whoever was originally responsible for this evil, everyone of us to-day is not merely the victim but the upholsterer of this system. We must all bear the responsibility for the perpetuation of the evil to-day.

SELF-RESPECT AMONG THE SUPPRESSED CASTES.

The revolt against the caste system began with the awakening of the consciousness of self-respect amongst, the lower strata of society amongst those who have been kept down as inferior castes. This assertion of self-respect is the brightest feature and hope of Indian Nationalism. But the justification for and the success of this social revolt will entirely depend upon an uncondemning repudiation of the entire system on the part of those who have inaugurated the revolt. If such social revolts have not so far met with a measure of success which they deserve, it is...
Due to the fact that communities which claim equality with those above them are not themselves ready to recognize the claims of those below them. So long as a community will treat certain other communities as inferior in social status, it would have no moral justification for its own claim to equality in social status. I would crave your pardon if I take the example of your own community to illustrate my point. Certain communities have denied social equality to the Nadar community. The Nadars have very rightly resented this and have from time to time asserted their claim to equal social status. But unfortunately they have attempted to maintain their claim for equality by seeking to prove that they were Kshatriyas in their origin. Such a method of establishing your status is very unfortunate. For, the moment you claim to be Kshatriyas, you recognize the validity of the caste system and reserve to yourself the right of treating certain other communities as being inferior to your own. The reservation knocks down what I called the moral justification for your own claims. You must claim equality with the so-called higher castes not on the ground that by reason of your past history you have yourselves a place in the higher hierarchy, but on the more reasonable and incontrovertible ground that as human beings you are entitled to be treated as equals.

You must assert your claim by entirely repudiating the social system which has kept you in subjection if not in degradation. If every community which has begun to assert its self-respect will only do this, the progress towards social reform and nation-building will be far more rapid than it is to-day.

Radical Reminders.

In the various movements towards social reform we very often hear the voice of the cautious Reformer sounding a note of warning. We are often warned not to force the pace of reform but to hasten slowly. I am convinced that there is no half-way house in the region of social reform. Uncompromising and radical remedies alone can effect any measure of success in this field. The stern and radical measures of Mustafa Kemal Pasha have reformed Turkish society in a manner which centuries of cautious advance would not have brought about. Caution in such matters is often the cloak of moral cowardice. Nor do I sympathise with those who proceed to quote the authority of the ancient Shastras in support of measures of Reform. For one thing the Shastras in these matters are a very uncertain guide. If Mahatma Gandhi quotes two verses from the Shastras in support of the removal of untouchability, the learned Pandits of Kumbakonam are prepared to quote twenty verses to maintain the contrary proposition. Reformers who fondly cling to the authority of the ancient Text are therefore on an uncertain and slippery ground. The worst form of slave mentality is that which ramroages amongst moth-eaten Texts for supporting plain rules of conduct dictated by reason and commonsense.

Backward Communities are the Weakest Link

In the National Chain.

I have thought it necessary to dwell at some length on the need for a radical change in our society and the destruction of the caste system, because I feel that without bringing about this radical change all talk about suppressing the evils of "Communalism" will be in vain. For lack of a challenge and a declaration in this direction there is a lamentable waste of life and time in our country. Let the better minds of the country give the challenge and declare from the house tops that caste must go; and then Indian Nationalism will become a living and irresistible force.

The assertion of their self-respect by the backward communities is the most encouraging feature in the growth of Indian Nationalism and the spread of the democratic idea. The existence of these backward communities is the greatest obstacle to national progress. They are the weakest link in the national chain. If communal conferences of this kind would enable each community to organise itself for its moral and material uplift, they would serve a very useful purpose in the progress of the Nation. The welfare of any community must be linked with and economic foundations. I am glad to hear that the Nadar Mahajana Sangam has taken various steps to improve the economic condition of the community. A systematic and well organised effort alone will enable you to achieve the maximum possible result in this direction.

Social Work Must Be Along Right Lines.

It is a pity that social and philanthropic works undertaken by individuals or communal organisations have very seldom been conducted along scientific and well considered lines. A few scholarships for the poor students of the community or the starting of a cooperative credit society are often considered to have exhausted the items of social welfare work. If the results achieved by these laudable undertakings fall far short of the expectations raised, it is due to the fact that the remedies have not been applied properly. Where the work of reformation has to be done on a large scale, as it is necessary in our country, it is an ease to merely tackle the individual apart from his environments. Though the individual is necessarily the predominant factor you must not isolate him from his surroundings, the family and the village community. The tragedy of the average educated man to-day is that he finds himself a stranger in his own family and society. Is it any wonder therefore if in course of time he succumbs to the influences that surround him and the great ideal that he imbied in his college days become a dream of the past? The family and the village must therefore be taken as the units of social work.

Rural Reconstruction.

The great field of social reform which any community can undertake is in the direction of Rural reconstruction—improving the lot of the masses that live in the villages. Dealing with the village as the proper unit of social work you must deal with the totality of its activities that go to make up the life of the villagers. Of what use is the mere starting of a cooperative Bank to lend money to the agriculturalist at cheap rates of interest if at the same time you do not inculcate in his lessons as to how he can free himself from a state of chronic indebtedness? Marriage expenses, funeral expenses, love of litigation, thriftlessness and other failures are among the chief factors that keep the Indian villager in this state of chronic indebtedness. A co-operative Bank in the village is to attain its full measure of benefit, you must teach the villagers to avoid extravagant expenditure at marriage and other events.
THE TRUMPET CALL FOR THE NATIONAL UNITY FESTIVAL,

(By A National Trumpeter.)

There are thousands of Indian patriots whose aspirations towards national unity will not be affected by communal quarrels due to the perversity of religious fanatics or the shameful intrigues of traitors to the motherland. Even under the most depressing conditions they will be eager to snatch opportunities for promoting inter-communal amity in the best interests of the country. To such high-souled nationalists the idea of getting up festivals common to all communities must be doubly welcome as they will bring together persons of different religions in friendly intercourse and prove more beneficial than mere conferences marked, or rather marred, by barren sentimentation and amiable dissimulation.

The 8th of October may be considered suitable for a national festival, being the anniversary of the safe termination of Mahatma Gandhi’s memorable fast, in 1948, which was observed for the sake of peace and good will between co-religionists. The citizens of Bangalore organised a “National Unity Festival”, that very year, fixing the 8th October for a national prayer-meeting and the next day for a social gathering or panathuni party; the general public being invited to both functions. This festival has been kept up in Bangalore ever since.

The present appeal is made to lovers of National Unity all over India—to the humblest as well as the greatest among them—to organize local festivals on the 8th and 9th October. In every town and village when there are at least a few earnest patriots it should be deemed a point of honour to get up a celebration for the love of God and the motherland.

It is hoped that the press throughout the country will hasten to give its best support to this patriotic movement. Public leaders too, irrespective of political views, are earnestly requested not to miss this opportunity to promote cordiality between communities, by avoiding even a semblance of political agitation through speeches or otherwise it should be made easy for officiala to participate in what is purely a social function conducive to national solidarity. In fact, formal speeches of any kind may be omitted from the programme.

Let there be no Indian too poor in spirit to respond to this call for prayer and pleasure to link together hands and hearts in right good will.

Reply to Miss Mayo: Messrs. J. Ray and Sons, Bookdealers, have written to Sind Observer the conveying following information: “Your readers must have read with interest the Associated Press telegram dated, the 22nd Sept. to the effect that Lala Lajpat Rai is writing a book which will be a reply to Miss Katherine Mayo’s book. There will be interest will be heightened by learning that an Englishman—a clergyman—of Hawaiian origin has nearly finished a book which is meant to be a counterblast to Mother India. His MS. is almost ready and is going forward by an early mail to a leading English publisher and will most likely be included in the latter’s next Spring list. We have no authority to give out the author’s name yet. But it is certain that this English gentleman knows India at least as well as the American lady who wrote Mother India.”
DR. TAGORE ON MISS MAYO’S BOOK.

Dr. Rabindranath Tagore, who is now travelling in Japan, has sent the following letter to The Manchester Guardian:

May I appeal to your sense of justice and claim a place in your paper for this letter of mine which I am compelled to write in vindication of my position as a representative of India against a most unjustifiable attack?

While travelling in this island of Bali I have just chanced upon a copy of the New Statesman of the 16th of July containing the review of a book on India written by a tourist from America. The reviewer, while supporting with an unctuous virulence all the calumnies heaped upon our people by the authors, and while calling repeated attention to the common Hindu vice of untruthfulness even amongst the greatest of us, has made public a malicious piece of fabrication, not as one of the specimens picked up from a show-case of wholesale abuse displayed in this or some other book, but as a gratuitous information about the truth of which the writer tacitly signifies his own personal testimony. It runs as thus: "The poet Sir Rabindranath Tagore expresses in print his conviction that marriage should be constituted before puberty in order to avert the vagaries of female sexual desire."

HINDOUS LIES.

We have become painfully familiar with deliberate circulation of hideous lies in the West against enemy countries, but a similar propaganda against individuals, whose countrymen have obviously offended the writer by their political aspirations, has come to me as a surprise. If the people of the United States had ever made themselves politically obnoxious to England, it is imaginable how an English writer of this type would take a gloating delight in proving, with profuse help from the news columns in the American journals, their criminal propensity and "quote for his support their constant indulgence in vicarious enjoyment of crimes through cinema pictures." "But would he in the fiercest frenzy of his rhetoric running amuck, dare make the monstrous accusation, let us say, against the late President Wilson for ever having expressed his pious conviction that the lynching of the Negroes was a moral necessity in a superior civilisation for cultivating Christian virtues? Or would he venture to ascribe to Professor Dewey the theory that centuries of witch-burning have developed in the Western peoples the quick moral sensitiveness that helps them in judging and condemning others whom they do not know or understand or like and about whose culpability they are never in lack of conclusive evidence? But has it been made so easy possible in my case, such a deliberately untruthful irresponsibility in this writer, condoned by the editor, by the fact that the victim was no better than a British subject who by accident of his birth has happened to be a Hindu and not belonging to the Muslim community, which according to the writer, is specially favoured by his people and our government?

A POISON-TIPPED ARROW.

May I point out, in this connection that selected documents of facts, generalized into an unqualified statement affecting a whole large population may become in the hands of the tourist from across the sea a poison-tipped arrow of the most heinous form of untruth to which the British nation itself may afford a broad easy target! It is a running lie against a community which the writer has used when he describes the Hindu as cowdung eaters. It is just as outrageous as to introduce Englishmen to those who know them imperfectly as addicted to the cocaine habit because cocaine is commonly used in their dentistry. In Hindu India only in rare cases an exceedingly small quantity of cowdung is used not as an ingredient in their meals but as a part of the performance of expiatory rites for some violation of social convention. One who has no special interest or pleasure in creating ill-feeling towards the European will, if he is honest, hesitate in describing them, though seemingly with a greater justice than in the other case, as eaters of live creatures or of rotten food, mentioning oyster and cheese for illustration. It is the subtlest method of falsehood, this placing exaggerated emphasis upon insignificant details giving to the exception the appearance of the rule.

The instances of moral perversity when observed in alien surroundings naturally loom large to us, because the positive power? The vehemence with which works from within and the countering forces that keep them in balance are not evident to a stranger, especially to one who has the craving for an intemperate luxury of moral indignation which very often is the sign of the same morbid pathology seen from behind. When such a critic comes to the East, not for truth but for the chuckling enjoyment of an exaggerated self-complacency and when he underlines some social aberrations with his sanguine red pencil glaringly emphasizing them out of their context, he goads our young critics to play the identical unwholy game. They also, with the help of the numerous guide books supplied by unimpeachable agency for the good of humanity, explore the dark recesses of Western Society, the breeding grounds of nauseous habits and moral littleness some of which have a dangerous cover of a respectable exterior they also select their choice specimens of rottenness with the same pious zeal and sanctimonious pleasure as their foreign models have in besmearing the name of a whole nation with the mud from ditches that may represent an undoubted fact yet not the complete truth.

And thus is generated the endless vicious circle of mutual recrimination and ever-accumulating misunderstandings that are perilous for the peace of the world. Of course our young critic in the East is under a disadvantage. For the Western peoples have an enormously magnifying organ of a sound that goes deep and reaches far, either when they malign others or defend themselves against accusations which touch them to the quick; whereas our own mortified critic struggles with his untailed lungs that can whisper and sigh but not shout. But is it not known that our inarticulate emotions become highly inflammable when crowded in the underground cellars of our mind, darkly silent? The whole of the Eastern continent is daily being helped in the storage of such explosives by the critics of the West who with a deceptive sense of duty done are ever ready to give vent to their blind prejudices while tenderly nourishing a comfortable consciousness that lulls them into forgetting that they also have their Western analogies in moral license only in different garbs made in their fashionable establishments or in their alms. However, let me strongly assure my English and other Western readers, that neither I nor my indigent Indian friends whom I have with me have ever had the least shadow of or intimation of what has been described in this book and quoted with a grin of conviction by this writer as the usual practice in the training of sexual extravaganza. I hope such Western readers will understand my difficulty in giving an absolute denial to certain facts alleged, when they remember the occasional disclosures in their own society in Europe and America, allowing to the unsuspecting public a sudden glimpse of systematic orgies of sexual abnormality in an environment which is supposed not to represent "subhuman" civilisation.

The writer in the "New Statesman" has suggested for the good of the world that the people in India condemned by the tourist for malpractices should never be assisted by the benevolent British soldiers safely to preserve their existence and continue their race. He evidently chooses to ignore the fact that these people have maintained their life and culture without the help of the British soldiers for a longer series of centuries than their own people has. However, that may be, I shrink from borrowing any wisdom from this source and make a similar statement regarding the conditions of life in India. The writer who spread about the malignant contagion of race-hatred; because inspite of provocations we should have a patient faith in human nature for its unlimited capacity for improvement; and let us hope to be rid of the lurking persistence of barbarism in man, not through elimination of the noxious elements by physical destruction, but through the education of the mind and a discipline of true culture.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Widows' Home for Gunter: Srimat Shanti Swarup Vidyalaakaro, Hon. Secretary of the Vidyabha Vivah Sahak Sahak Madras Branch, had been at Gunter a fortnight back; and as a result of a public meeting held under the auspices of the local Y. M. C. A where he gave a short address on Widow's cause, a small committee was formed to carry on the work of promoting the cause of Widow marriages. Messrs. Kalyanaswamy, B.A., B.L., K. Rajeswarao, B.A, V. Punna Rao, T. Nayana Sastry, S. Ramawany Gupta, T. Sivasanka Sastry, V. Narasimhan, D. Venkayya, and T. Ramamurty, B.A., L.T., at present constitute the committee. In a committee meeting held subsequently it was resolved that propaganda work should be carried on in Gunter town and district; that arrangements should be made for widow marriages by giving applications from candidates of both sexes and that Widows' Home be started at Gunter where widows intending to marry might stay for a considerable time until proper matches should be arranged. I therefore request all such young widowers and widows as intend to remarry to address themselves to me, and I shall see that the local committee of the Sabha gives them all possible help to arrange suitable matches. All correspondence will be kept strictly confidential.

Wife's Stridhanam: When a man has disposed the stridhanam properties of his wife and when can be regarded as having effectively exercised that right? These questions were decided recently in Madras in an O.S. Appeal by the officiating Chief Justice and Justice Reilly. A person against whom a decree had been passed compromised with his creditors that he would give wife's stridhanam jewels towards the satisfaction of the decree. In pursuance of the agreement he handed over the jewels to a mediator to be delivered to the creditors as soon as the court should direct that the creditors may have them in satisfaction of the decree. Meanwhile the husband died and the wife sued for the jewels on the ground that the husband had no right to dispose of them. Madras High Court held that the wife was entitled to the jewels. In appeal it was argued for the creditors that according to the Mitakshara a husband can "take" his wife's properties at times of famine, distress, etc., without the liability of making them good, and that according to Smritichandrika, distress included oppression by creditors. Once the jewels were handed over to the mediator the husband's distress came to an end and so he having validly disposed of the wife could not claim it. Their Lordships, however, rejecting these contentions, held that no doubt the husband had powers of disposition over his wife's stridhanam properties during certain critical times enumerated in the text. But to make such dispositions valid he must have actually derived benefit from such an act. "Take ing" must be deemed to mean "actually using it"; else a man may take his wife's properties during famine but never use it and still be under no liability to restore them back. Though the mediator was bound to hand over the jewels to the creditors after such direction by the court, delivering them into their hands cannot amount to using them. For, what gave the judgment, debtors the second relief was not the delivery of the jewels to the mediator, but the agreement by which the decree was to be satisfied. Hence, the husband not having used them the property in the jewels remained with the wife and as such she was duly entitled to them.

The appeal was dismissed with costs.

A Reply to Miss K. Mayo.

The article "Mother India" was somewhat sooner than originally intended. This is due to the fact that, having been called to preside at the forthcoming National Social Conference to be held in Madras during Christmas week, the writer has been called upon to devote his attention to the address which he has delivered on that occasion. In that address, he hopes to deal with escaped notice of the most grossly scandalous allegations of Miss Mayo. There may be some that have escaped notice, but on that account they are not to be taken as being true. This writer has advanced documentary evidence in all important matters, and he could have given more of it had space and time permitted. Whatever is true in Miss Mayo's book is new or whatever is new in it is true. The book, as a whole, is the most infamous lampoon ever written about India, even worse than the Abbe Dubois' book of a century ago. The Abbe recognized a few redeeming features at least but for Miss Mayo there is none at all. The articles on Mother India as they appeared in these columns, have been gathered and put into the form of a booklet. We had no copies to spare of some of the earlier issues for friends who asked for them, and for that reason, as also because it was thought that a collection of the articles in one cover will be more handy for reference, it was thought advisable to reprint them. Unfortunately however, owing to considerations of economy, which is ever insistent, only 400 reprints have been taken, and of these over 200 have already been beseeped, and that mostly for America by American friends. The rest too is likely to be soon exhausted. The writer has under consideration whether a book, incorporating the material here used and much that has not been used, would be a useful contribution to the literature on India and her problems.

A Misunderstanding: A correspondent writing in the Sind Observer takes us to task for attacking the Roman Catholic Church. We are surprised at the charge because we have great respect for that Church and for its well-organized and self-sacrificing priesthood. But the Catholic Church was not always the church of our times, but have sometimes and many times been backward as well as prejudiced. But Hinduism of his day, was no means at the height of its prestige. The Abbe Dubois belonged to that time, and we said that many of the corruptions which he described as peculiarities of Hinduism of his day, were reminiscences from his own Seminary days. If Hinduism is to be judged by its corruptions, Christianity must be submitted to the same test. The writer in the Sind Observer says that we have not given any contemporary evidence rebutting the Abbe's estimate of Hindu society. If he had waited a little, he would have seen that is precisely what we have done. Sir Thomas Munro was in every way more qualified to form a correct opinion of the Hindus, and we have adduced his emphatic testimony radically differing from that of the prejudiced and embittered Abbe. We have also shown from the grudging admissions of the Abbe himself that Hindu society could not have been the depraved thing that he wished his readers to believe it was. It has been our anxious endeavour throughout these articles not to let ourselves be betrayed into any expression of disrespect against Europeans and Americans, their religion, their customs and manners, and most of all their women. We know too little of their inner life to form any opinion of those things that is worth while and, besides, we have a deep general belief that western society, Western or Eastern, can exist for a day except it be sustained by the faith, endurance and purity of the larger part of the men and women of whom it is composed.

"Mother India": Miss Margaret I. Balfour who has been collecting data for Maternity and Infant Welfare work from the Hospitals in Bombay has contributed the letter which we quote below to the Times of India denying the gross allegations in "Mother India," we refer to this letter in the leader. "I have recently had the opportunity of reading 'Mother India' and have been surprised that some of the statements made, especially with reference to child mothers. I have some facts relating to that subject which I have collected in the course of an investigation into the condition of child-birth, and I am asking you to be kind enough to publish them in the hope that they may be of service to anyone who proposes to write a reply to 'Mother India.' I have notes of 304 Hindu mothers delivered of their first babies in Bombay Hospitals. The average age was 18-7 years. 85% per cent were 17 years or over. 14% were below 17 yrs. 17 yrs were born under 17 and there were 2 of age. I have compared these figures with the reports of the Madras Maternity Hospital for the years 1922-24. 3,162 mothers were delivered of their first babies. The average age was 24 yrs. 86% were over 17 yrs. 14% were below 17 yrs. It is not true. The facts are true and there is no ait.
years or over and 15.8 per cent were below 17, 15 was the youngest age. There were 7 mothers aged 13 and 22 mothers aged 14. The Madras figures included not only Hindus but women of other communities also. I have reports of 3,094 cases of child-birth from other parts of India including the North. Of those only 10 were below 15 years of age, 15 was the youngest age. There is no doubt that child-birth sometimes takes place too early in India and even more so that cohabitation commences too early. Legislation is badly needed. But Miss Mayo’s words at p. 50 of “Mother India” are as follows: “The Indian girl, in common practice, looks for motherhood nine months after reaching puberty or anywhere between the ages of fourteen and eight. The latter age is extreme, although in some sections, not exceptional, the former is well above the average.” I think the figures I have given prove that the cases instances by Miss Mayo do not in the least represent the common customs of the country.”

Another Contradiction: Miss Katherine Mayo in her chapter headed the Princes of India refers to a “little luncheon party given in Delhi by an Indian friend in order that I might privately hear the opinion of certain Home Rule politicians.” She asked them what their plan was. They had spoken at length on the coming expulsion of Britain from India and on the future in which they themselves would rule the land. “And what,” I asked, “is your plan for the princes?” “We shall wipe them out,” exclaimed one with conviction and all the rest nodded assent.” Lila Lajpat Rai has been at pains to investigate the truth of this story. In his last article in the Bombay Chronicle of October 12, he gives the result of his investigations. He writes: “From enquiries from all the possible people I could have arrangements of a party or who could have attended it, I learn that Mr. K. C. Roy of the Associated Press arranged a luncheon to which a number of Indian gentlemen were invited. The young girl, in common practice, looks for motherhood nine months after reaching puberty or anywhere between the ages of fourteen and eight. The latter age is extreme, although in some sections, not exceptional, the former is well above the average.” I think the figures I have given prove that the cases instances by Miss Mayo do not in the least represent the common customs of the country.”

Prohibition in India: Mr. K. C. Roy has assured me that Miss Mayo’s story of what transpired at the meeting (if she really refers to that party) is absolutely untrue. Now it is for Miss Mayo to give us the name of her host if this was not the party to which she refers. “Then I recall a little party given in Delhi by an Indian friend in order that I might privately hear the opinion of certain Home Rule politicians.” She asked them what their plan was for the princes of India when the British had been expelled. “We shall wipe them out,” exclaimed one with conviction and all the rest nodded assent.”

My dear Lalaji,

Many thanks for your enquiry. We gave a luncheon-poty to Miss Mayo at Maidens Hotel, Delhi, during her short stay in the capital. She came to us with excellent introductions. At the lunch there were only two Bengalis, namely my husband and Mr. Sen. All the other were non-Bengalis. Prominent among our guests were Mr. M. A. Jinnah, leader of the Independence Party and Mr. S. Ghatia. As I can recollect the discussion ran on Indian constutional development, her defense, communal harmony, child-welfare and Art and culture in Delhi. I do not recollect whether the position of the Indian princes was discussed. At any rate, I know that there was no discussion as to their being ‘wiped out!’

Yours sincerely,

DOROTHY ROY.
Miss Mayo, we see, professes to have written the book out of the fullness of her love for Hindu women and children. The many protests that have been made against her book by individual Indian women and associations for the protection of them are the best comment upon her profession. As a matter of fact she has attacked Hindu women even more forcibly than Hindu men. We cannot think of a more venomous attack than the following: "This also, is a matter neither of rank nor of special ignorance. In fact, so far are they from being good and evil, as we see good and evil, that the mother, high caste or low caste, will practise upon her children—the girl to make her sleep well, the boy to make him manly; an attitude which the boy at least, is apt to continue daily for the rest of his life. The last point should be noted. Highest medical authority in widely scattered sections attests that practically every child brought under observation, for whatever reason, bears on its body the signs of this habit." (pp. 32, 33).

Miss Katherine Mayo is not able to quote any specific authority for this monstrous and degrading accusation against the mothers of India. Even her favourite Abbe Dubois has not said anything like it, though it is hardly likely that he would have omitted to refer to it if he had any ground for believing in the existence of such a practice in his wholesale indictment of the Hindu race and religion. Miss Mayo speaks of "highest medical authority" attesting to this universal abuse of their infants by their Hindu mothers. She does not cite a single report or other official or non-official publication by a medical authority in support of her claim. One medical authority at least, and that a very high one, has totally repudiated Miss Mayo's allegation. Dr. Mathukahmi Reddi, the well-known social worker and Vice-President of the Madras Legislative Council, speaking from her extensive experience as a medical practitioner, has stated that she has never come across any case which supported Miss Mayo's extraordinary statement.

As for the habit continuing in the case of boys into mature life, it is well-known that this is not one of the vices which at any time was said to be common among the Hindoos. The universality of marriage and early marriages in India remove the main cause which has led to the extensive prevalence of this vice in modern countries. (There are some illuminating pages on this and cognate subjects in Havelock Ellis's "The Task of Social Hygiene" a new edition of which was recently issued by the Oxford University Press.) According to another foul and fantastic statement of Miss Mayo's, which she puts in the mouth of a woman physician of wide present-day Indian experience, Indian girl-wives "experience marital men two and three at a day." The Indian husband must, indeed, be a monster of sexuality to combine the one with the continuance into adult life of the practices in which, according to Miss Mayo, he had been initiated in infancy by his mother! We are ashamed to write all this, but when a shameless woman, herself too obviously suffering from the sex-complex, proclaims to the world that these things are normal to Indian life, we have perforce to do so. An American friend writing last week says that "the book is a revelation more of Miss Mayo than of Mother India! That Miss Katherine Mayo is only too apt gratuitously to invoke unnamed medical authority when she is unable to find any more specific basis for her highly fanciful and preposterous imaginations, is conclusively proved by the striking letter which Dr. (Miss) M. I. Balfour, M.B., wrote to the Times of India on Monday the 10th, printed among our editorial "notes." Dr. Balfour, we may mention, has been making a special investigation of maternity and infanticide in India for the last two years, and her observations, therefore, are of special importance. Medical authority in Miss Mayo's pages is as frequent and as elusive as ancient texts in the mouth of the old-world pedant.

Cognate to this subject is another utterly unfounded statement about the dedication of boys in Hindu temples. We quote: "In many parts of the country, north and south, the little boy, his mind so prepared, is likely, if physically attractive, to be drafted for the satisfaction of grown men, or to be regularly attached to a temple in the capacity of a prostitute. Neither parent as a rule sees any harm in this but is rather flattered that the son has been found pleasing." (p. 32)

Absolutely no authority is given for this, not even the inevitable Abbe Dubois who devotes a special chapter of many pages to temple worship. He refers to the dedication of girls, but there is no mention whatever of the dedication of young boys and their abuse by grown men. This, indeed, is an unheard of enormity which Miss Mayo fastens upon the Hindus. It is very difficult to prove a negative; but, as it happens in this case, we are able to cite a high scientific authority in repudiation of Miss Mayo's monstrous falsehood. The well-known writer on sexual science, Dr. Havelock Ellis, has suggested that there is a certain connection between the prevalence of homo-sexuality and of infanticide. Prof. Westermarck questions this statement specifically on the ground that the connection does not exist among Hindus. He writes: "On the other hand, we are acquainted with various facts that are quite at variance with Dr. Ellis's suggestion. Among many Hindu castes female infanticide has for ages been a genuine custom and yet pedantry is remarkably rare among the Hindus." (Origin and Development of Moral Ideas. Vol. II. p. 485.) In another place he mentions, on the authority of Burton, that among the Hindus the practice is said to be held in abhorrence. Miss Katherine Mayo has here also allowed her imagination to run away with her.
As for the institution of deva-dasis, originally corresponding to veiled virgins, but now mostly given to prostitution, this journal took a prominent share in the starting of the anti-match movement and has always pleaded for its abolition. But against Miss Katherine Mayo's highly coloured picture of it, it is only fair to set the Abbé D'Arbois' comparison of it with prostitution in Europe in his days. After a detailed description of the deva-dasis, the Abbe writes:
"Nevertheless, to the discredit of Europeans it must be confessed that the quiet seductions which Hindu prostitutes know how to exercise with so much skill resemble in so way the disgraceful methods of the wretched beings who give themselves up to a similar profession in Europe, and whose indecent behaviour, cynical impudence, obscene and filthy words of invitation are enough to make any sensible man who is not a hardened atheist shrunk in horror. Of all the women in India it is the courtesans, and especially those attached to the temples, who are most decently clothed. Indeed they are particularly careful not to expose any part of the body." (p. 587.)
What would the Abbe have thought of the dress of fashionable European and American women in those days! Prostitution prevails, perhaps, to a greater extent in Europe and America than in India and the East generally. The peculiarity of deva-dasis, is that they "have a place in the framework of temple-worship.
This should not be, and efforts are being made to abolish the institution. But has the Church no responsibility for evils which it does not officially recognise as part of itself? Christianity, like the ancient Pharisee, may thank God that it has no deva-dasis attached to itself as in Hindu temples, but it is only by voluntarily forfeiting its claim to dominate life in all its aspects can it escape responsibility for the commercialised or clandestine vice which is so notorious a feature of modern society. The Hindu religion interprets all sin in terms of ignorance. Knowledge —not mere intellectual Knowledge—but that which shines out of one's innermost being in the shape of conduct, is the true remedy. Such knowledge comes only through religion by Divine Grace. Hence no one is denied access to religion as it is the sole means of regeneration. "Even the worst sinner," says the Gita, "if he takes refuge in Me becomes quickly purified." Jesus Christ, as we understand Him, held the same view. And so did Gautama Buddha. We are becoming increasingly sceptical of modern institutional methods of dealing with evil, which leave the affections, the central core of our being, almost wholly out of account. It is not the Indian way; it was not Jesus' way. India must now go about her reforms in her own way in keeping with the historic continuity of her culture and civilisation. She will not be bullied into it by the columnists of Miss Katherine Mayo. Setting ourselves right in the good opinion of Europe and America is not a matter of so much moment as the asserting and maintaining our right to deal with our national problems in our own way and in our own time. France does not change her manners to suit American or British opinion, neither does America change here because Europe makes Gargantuan fun of them. We feel it rather a humiliation to be asked to carry out this or that reform because otherwise we may suffer in the estimation of South African Whites or Americans, or Australians. Are there no dark spots in the national life of these people? Is there no injustice, no inequa-M, no vice, no oppression anywhere in the world except in India? Let him who is sinless cast the first stone. As for the British refusing future Constitutional Reform in India because of our social evils, English statesmen are too shrewd to mistake social male adjustment for political incapacity. Even if they do we should not mind it. We cannot sell our birthright of reconstructing our society according to our own ideal for the mess of political pottage which is the utmost that we may expect from a foreign Government. We cannot on any account allow the social initiative to pass out of our hands into those even of the most friendly outsiders.
Miss Katherine Mayo gives the following account of what she heard from a British woman doctor of "a thousand miles east of Bombay." "My patients here," the lady doctor is reported to have said, "are largely the wives of university students. Practically every one is venereally infected." (p. 59.) There are other statements in the book to the effect that venereal disease is nearly universal in India. We must content ourselves here with stating a few facts. The late Sir Narayan Chandavarkar once gave a very effective reply to the charge of venereal infection among Indians. The disease, he pointed out, is known in this country as the Kasa or disease, that is, a disease introduced by Europeans. A Uan bekham of note in Bombay told us the other day that this is the name by which the disease is referred to in Unani medical works. The disease was, and is still, rare in the interior of the country where there is very little intercourse with Europeans. Dr.
Norman Leys in his book, Kasa, says that the disease was unknown in the old world until the discovery of the new. Many of the caste rules and restrictions were sanitary in their origin and Manu like Mores interwove a great deal of sanitation as he knew it into his religions and social precepts. The twin race poisons, namely, alcohol and syphilis, if not actually introduced into India by Europeans, have been greatly extended owing to their influence. It is a diabolical lie that University men in India are syphilitics as a class, and that their wives are infected by them with the disease.
A very kind and sympathetic Christian friend in expressing his appreciation of the Indian Social Reformer gently warns us against committing ourselves in condemning Miss Mayo's misrepresentations to anything that may be subsequently used by opponents of social reform. Of this we have not the least fear. Our right to criticise and condemn the evils of our society and to plead with our people for reform carries with it a corresponding duty to defend them against interested and malicious calumny such as Miss Katherine Mayo's. We have but done our duty.
If any Indian hereafter makes use of anything we have said as an excuse or justification for opposing social reforms, we shall know how to deal with him.
I was extremely sorry to read in your paper the news that Mr. B. N. Bhajekar passed away on August 24th. This event surely deserves more than a passing reference in the "Indian Social Reformer". Mr. Bhajekar was for several years the Secretary of the Social Reform Association in Bombay and as such maintained to keep up the interest of the public in this movement in Bombay, Gujarat and Maharashtra.

His name is best known because of his connection with the Widow Remarriage movement in which he set a personal example to others. But it must be remembered that for him, social reform did not end with the problem of the Hindu widow. He took the keenest interest in ameliorating the lot of backward classes, including the depressed classes; and he was of opinion that the play-ground and the gymnasium were very good agencies to promote this object. It was on account of this belief of his that he organised wrestling matches and helped in opening gymkhana. Very well remember seeing him with a face beaming with delight and his running from the Hindu Gymkhana ground to the Prarthana Samaaj to publish the news of the achievement of the great Hindu bowler Mr. Balk Palwaner in a match, I think, against the Oxford Authentics. He was all delight that a depressed class person should have made such a show and he organised a gathering to congratulate that gentleman.

His ideas concerning the Widow Remarriage movement were not of the kind which unfortunately are now-days found to prevail among certain people who marry widows to obtain land and so in achieving this object discard their first wives. Whenever any candidate for widow-marriage approached him he used to make thorough inquiries concerning his character, ancestors and specially whether he had a wife living. If he came to know that the candidate had a wife living then he used to withdraw all his help from that man.

In furthering Widow Remarriage movement Mr. Bhajekar's object was to ameliorate the general lot of the Indian woman. He was very keen in starting movements for the improvement of their physique. He organised sports for them and he was very keen to see that the women led a healthy life taking part in sports which would preserve their modesty.

Of course latterly Mr. Bhajekar had lost some of his enthusiasm in matters concerning social reform and that was more due to the fact that his early enthusiasm for it was without much of a religious foundation in the reform and as he grew old he was swayed by Varsahram wharco and what he conceived that expression to mean. But this did not mean that he grew cold concerning the widows' cause, not a bit of it. On the other hand, he confined his social reform activities to the Remarriage movement. His spare time he devoted in organizing national movements like the Abhayabati Holkar Day, etc.

I wish to say one word with regard to Mr. Ghurye's letter in your issue of 1st inst. Mr. Ghurye seems to confound right of inheritance with right of survivorship in Hindu law. A person ceasing to be a member of joint family does not in the least lose his right of inheritance to the members of that family, nor does the circumstance that a man's father has got the right to adopt affect this right of inheritance. In the case of the self-acquired property of a Hindu father, the father has the right to bequest it to any person he likes; this does not mean that the son has no right of inheritance in his father's property.

As regards Miss Mayo's book may I refer you to the introduction of Col. Medows Taylor's History of India and also his autobiography 'Story of My Life'. The latter is a very instructive book.

As to how modern Anglo-Indians (old style) write gloss or comment on books written by English men or Europeans in the early centuries, just like Mr. Beauchamp's translation of Abbe Dubois, I would ask you to refer to Slesman's Rambles in India as revised by Vincent Smith recently.

EDUCATION IN INDIA UNDER E. I. COMPANY—A REVIEW.*

(By Mr. A. S. Venkataraman, M.A., L.T.)

While it would be a presumption to introduce a well-known researcher and writer like Major B. D. Baner, the reviewer will feel more than gratified, if by reviewing the book mentioned above, he widens the ever widening circles of readers of the Major's works.

Much of what is called "Indian History" in schools and colleges has been mere story and more fiction than we are apt to imagine. Right perspective has been lost sight of, sense of proportion perverted and balanced judgment conspicuous by its absence. The author has successfully attempted to knock the bottom of some of the more important prevalent misconceptions.

One historical untruth is that India was an illiterate country in the Pre-British period. The testimony of the late Mr. Keir Hardie, however, (his work on 'India' p. 5, quoted by Major Baner on p. 16) is eloquent on the point. "Bengal had as many as 80,000 schools or one for every 400 of the population." The administration of the E. I. Co. led to the destruction of the village communities and with them, the indigenous schools and the indigenous art, trades and industries. The Government was averse to the general diffusion of knowledge or dissemination of education and private enterprise bore fruit in the founding of the Hindu College, afterwards the Presidency College. It after a century (1857 to 1898 Educational Charter) of British rule, the introduction of Western education was decided upon by the Government, it was not due to the operation of any humanitarian motives but considerations of political expediency, adminis trative necessity and commercial expansion. All along, the burning problem was, popular knowledge or popular ignorance, which was beneficial to the security of British rule in India. And the ultimate decision was therefore the result of due and prolonged deliberations. When, owing to Lord William Bentinck's efforts (1835), English was introduced as the Court Language, he was, not prompted by a desire to educate the Indians, as by a desire to anglicize them, in other words, to prevent the formation of a homogeneous nation.

The prolonged controversy between the Orientalists and the Occidentalists was decided by the "know-nothing" Macaulay (ignorant of Indian affairs) in those memorable words, which every one would do well to scan and ponder over. "We must do our best to form a class who may be interpreters between us and the millions whom we may govern, a class of pious Indian In blood and colour but English in taste, in opinions, words and intellect!"

It was clear that English was made the medium of instruction from 'interested motives' "to direct the ideas and sympathies of the natives towards their present rulers" and vernacular education was not cared for. From 1833 to 1853, the authorities were adverse to diffuse education among the masses and such education as was attempted, was meant to produce cheap plebeians and useful subordinates. The wisdom of educating the Indians was under consideration for a long century and Sir Frederick Halliday, first Lieutenant Governor of Bengal observed: "Spread of education must assist the Government. Popular knowledge is a safer thing to deal with than popular ignorance." Sir Marshman, Sir Trenchard, Lord Montagu saw no danger to the British supremacy. The outcome was no doubt the famous Educational despatch of 1854, otherwise known as the Intellectual charter of India for imparting education to the Indian fellow-subjects. The mask of philanthropy and altruism is torn by Mr. Charles Grant (Christian Director of the E. L. Company as he was familiarly known) and he said better than he knew. "Wherever, we may venture to say, our principles and language are introduced, our commerce will follow." "By planning our language, our knowledge, our opinion and our religion in our Asiatic territories, we shall put a great work beyond the reach of contingencies, we shall probably have wedded the inhabitants of those territories to this country."

To one and all, interested in Indian History, not as it is, but as it ought to be, this book can safely be commenced and the sources from which the facts are culled, are as reliable and unimpeachable, as the parliamentary blue-books and the state documents themselves.

Education in Bombay: The Government of Bombay have appointed two committees to inquire into the question of reorganisation of primary and secondary school courses and the introduction of vocational and industrial training in these schools and, secondly, the question of physical training of pupils in the same schools. The first is presided over by the chief director of public instruction and has 16 members; the second will consist of nine members.

EDUCATIONAL IDEALS OF THE EAST AND THE WEST.

(By S. O. Menon.)

India may learn and is learning from the West many useful lessons in all subjects, and in educational thought and practice no less than in others; but if a system is to be evolved for India which shall be truly Indian, it must, while assimilating much that is Western also, gather up what is best and most useful from its own ancient systems and weave them into the complex whole that is being built up.

For this reason the study of at least some of the salient points of ancient Indian education is most important and—in my personal opinion—deserving of far more attention than it has hitherto received. The Satapatha Brahmana contains an account of the Upanayana or initiation of the student. The student reports himself to the teacher who solemnly initiates him thus: "To heaven and Earth I commit thee... to all beings I commit thee... for security from injury. Thou art a Brahmanachari... sip water... do thy work... put on fuel... do not sleep... sip water." The twice repeated 'sip water' is explained as meaning 'sip ambrosia.' The period of studentship was looked upon not only as a time of learning but as a time of rigorous discipline. There was a clear recognition of the fact that behind all the splendor of prosperity and happiness stands the life of earnest aspiration and strenuous work. Although the pupil was under somewhat rigorous discipline there was nothing harsh or brutal about it. The rules for the conduct of the pupil included hygiene, moral, and religious precepts and the regulation of good manners. It was his duty to bathe daily and to avoid honey, meat, perfumes, garlands, sleep in day time, ointments, collyrium, a carriage, shoes, a parasol, love, anger, carelessness, perplexity, garrulity, etc., etc., etc., dancing, singing, calumny, and terror and of course, all pungent, fatty and exciting food-stuffs.

The teacher was also under obligation to fulfill his duty towards the pupil. According to the Apanthama not only was he to love him as his own son but he was to give him full attention in the teaching of the sacred science and withhold no part of it from him. After the rise of initiation his first duty was to instruct the pupil in the rules of personal purification and of conduct. Of the behaviour of the teacher towards his pupil, Manu writes: "created beings must be instructed in what concerns their welfare without giving them pain; and sweet and gentle speech must be used by a teacher who desires to abide by the sacred law. He, forsooth, whose speech and thoughts are pure and ever perfectly guarded gains the whole reward which is conferred by the Vedanta. Let him not, even though in pain, speak words cutting others to the quick, let him not injure others in thought or deed and let him not utter speeches which make others afraid of him."

About the education itself considerable importance seems to have been attached to rhetoric and debate. In a hymn belonging to one of the early books of Rigveda is found this line: "Your every limb seems to be growing larger, as ye converse with eloquence." And other hymns say: "All friends are joyful in the friend who cometh in triumph having conquered in assembly; prepared is he and fit for deed and vigour."
One peculiar aspect of Indian education is that it urges upon the pupil the doctrine of performing all social and religious duties in a spirit of indifference without the least regard for the direct and indirect results which may accrue from them. Here is a beautiful extract from the Bhagavad Gita; "Verily works be thine office; in their fruits must it never be. Be not moved by the fruits of the works; but let not attachment to worklessness dwell in thee."

In fact, the most essential point about Ancient Indian Education is that it described Education as a preparation for life or for complete living. The young Brahman was being prepared by the education he received for his practical duties in life as a priest and teacher. The same may be said of the young Khshatriya and Vaisya who were required not only to fit themselves for their practical work in life but also to study the Vedas and give heed to the teaching of religion. I hope I will not be accused of digression or larceny if I drive this point home. I reproduce the following extract from the Sthi, the tract administered by Emperor Aurangzeb to his old tutor Mulla Shah-and recorded by the French traveller Bernier:-If you had made me acquainted with the nature of men; accustomed me always to refer to first principles and given me a sublime and adequate conception of the universe and of the order and regular motion of its parts; if you had taught me that philosophy which adapts the mind to reason and will not suffer it to rest satisfied with anything short of the most solid arguments; if you had inculcated lessons which elevate the soul and fortify it against assault of fortune, tending to produce that enviable equanimity which is neither incidently elated by prosperity nor basely depressed by adversity, I should have been more indebted to you than Alexander was to Aristotle. The ideas in this extract speak for themselves and for the lofty ideals set before the Ancient student.

The Brahmanic settlements were most frequently situated in forests in ancient times. The contact with nature and absence of the evils and distractions of city life which this involved must have been important factors in creating an atmosphere which was most helpful in the formation of spiritual ideals. Though the Brahmanic education was no doubt also carried on in towns, especially in later times, the forest sanctuary has always been the Indian ideal. This is another of the educational ideals which is most important and one that is worthy of the attention of modern Educationists.

The unique success attained by the Arya Samaj Gurus, at Hardwar and Dr. Tagore's, Shantiniketan at Bhurpur-two interesting educational enterprises which are attempts to combine some of the ancient educational ideals of India with those of the West—is worthy of being recorded in this connection.

The discharge of the student after the conclusion of his studies is as solemn and impressive as its initiation. After having taught the Veda the teacher instructs the student: "Say what is true! Do thy duty! Do not neglect the study of the Veda! After having brought to thy teacher his proper reward, do not cut off the line of children! Do not swerve from truth! Do not swerve from duty! Do not neglect what is useful! Do not neglect greatness! Do not neglect the learning and teaching of the Veda!"

We shall now pass on to consider some western ideals. No doubt, education involves assimilation of some sort. But to make it most useful, we ought to regard it as a dynamic process. A system of high learning must have some points of contact with society. It must be a means whereby the individual can adopt himself to his material, social, religious and political environment. But in this conception of education whereby the pupil is prepared for his station in life does not at all exclude the idea of making him industrially efficient. To me it seems that all studies are equally cultural. With due respect to Newman I should say, that the study of a play of Ben Jonson or Shakespeare and proficiency in Latin or Greek do not make and have never made a man "cultural". Humanism of the ideal type must be replaced by a Humanian and liberal education that will take account of the tremendous changes which society is undergoing and has undergone. Formalisation is the besetting sin of educational theories. However reluctantly it has to be admitted that no progress is possible without change and no sound conception of the ultimate foundations of education can be formed unless there is constant adaptation of our educational theory to the political, economical and social environment.

Progress must for some time depend upon accumulation. We must investigate the elements before we come to a true conception of the whole. But when we have reached a new fact, the next effort should be to relate it to known central events. Because what we think today, in a way, has been created for us by the thought that went before. The present is the wreckage of the past. The future waits for us to create it out of the materials of the past. In a disciplined mind the past thoughts unite together and give a final irresistible impulsion and direction to future thoughts. So that by learning to refer everything to its own time, and the state of mind that gave it birth we build up in ourselves a wonderful readiness for the graver and more serious issues. If we remember this and cultivate the habit of summing up and constantly recollecting old impressions we shall be led to many wonderful and unexpected results.

Although in the ages of growing, a new mode of growing or thinking is born slowly and goes much deeper than we imagine, we have to remember that things which are found together may have taken wide distances of space and time to produce. We may depend upon it that each new phase and form of a central idea has had its own individual history. But nothing that has survived has occurred by accident. Nothing has been created out of wantonness or out of the idle desire to be different from others.

How different are the thought worlds out of which spring inspirations! How long a period must each have had in order to win its present depth and extent of the influence. The very year, as it passes, is a record of the changing ideas that have swept in succession across the mind. It is a characteristic that almost every great outstanding thought has somewhere or other a place devoted to its maintenance and tradition. It is a conception which penetrated everywhere; therefore the shaping pressure of this all pervading influence must have been Long continued. The complexity of the matter ruled upon would point to some central seat of council and decision, with as little that was purely personal in its authority as it is possible to imagine. But whatever was the source of deliberation, it is clear that there must have been a consolidated royal authority to give its support to the decisions, without finching or changing throughout the formation period. Only by a combination of all three conditions can we account for the uniformity and regularity with which a complex year of thought has been worked out.

The aim of knowledge must therefore also be not only information but organisation. A system of education which ignores this factor in the educational process is worse than useless; it is pernicious. Unorganised knowledge is useless because it does not result in modification of behaviour.

And wedded to organisation and marshalling must be unity of thoughts. Thoughts which unite with the energy of a thunderbolt must be thoughts accustomed to combined action and sustained co-operation; thoughts which so to say know the grounds of their faith is one another and thoughts which are familiar to certain outstanding principles of conduct and constantly dominated by them. A strong sense of unity precedes agreement and the sense of unity is made effective through internal definition and self-organisation. In this world, there is no such thing—I am tempted to say—as real originality. Some mind more powerful than others breaks symbols into their elements and recombines these in an unexpected fashion. This is the whole of what we call originality. The ability of a mind's thought depends upon its ability to work upon the materials it meets with. That is why we say that the actual glory of Hellenic culture lay in the distinctiveness of its touch and the energy of manipulation of the materials that came in its way; perhaps even above these qualities were a certain faculty of discrimination and organisation in which it excelled.

MR. ANDREWS ON RAJA RAM MOHAN ROY.

I have eagerly looked forward to this anniversary of Raja Ram Mohan Roy. First I was asked to be present as a speaker at Simla, but my work has carried me away elsewhere. Here, at Jamshedpur I wish to state with the utmost possible earnestness what I feel on such a great occasion. Very nearly 100 years ago, Raja Ram Mohan Roy passed away into the unseen world of spirit, but his personality has remained with us, guiding and directing almost every reform movement which has been initiated since he left us.

Raja Ram Mohan Roy represents the dawn of the modern Indian Nation. No other name in Indian history stands out with such prominence as his as the founder of modern India. Not only did his personality awaken new life in his own country, but it also awakened new life throughout Asia. From Bengal went forth the great religious and cultural movement which has spread the 19th century to almost every part of Asia. This Bengal Renaissance anticipated by more than 50 years the Meiji period in Japan, which represents the high water-mark of modern progress in the far east of Asia. It can be proved historically, that this renaissance in the Far East which has since spread to China, Indo-China and Siam, owed its origin to Raja Ram Mohan Roy in Bengal.

Just as in the Far East, this awakening of Asia has spread far and wide from Bengal as its centre, so also in Western Asia the repercussion of the same movement has been marked and profound. Raja Ram Mohan Roy's Islamic ideals and culture linked him closely with Persia. Thus the movement which he founded in Bengal was able to penetrate westward as well. Indeed it went much further than Western Asia. Its influence spread widely throughout Europe and America.

When it is asked how this majestic personality, rising like the sun above the horizon at the end of the 18th century has had such an effect upon the main currents of human history the answer is simple. By his genius he anticipated the different problems which were the future to deal. He gave the solution to them in such a way, that those who came later could receive direction from him and carry into effect his own far-sighted wisdom. Let me take three aspects of his influence in our own times. The first that I would dwell on is this. He saw with extraordinary clearness that the new western knowledge must be assimilated by the East, so as to produce fresh life-giving currents in the soul for the new humanity of Asia. He did not reject Western Science. At the same time, he did not merely copy it, or take it in a unassimilated way. He became master of it; he never became its slave. Whilst he absorbed into his own magnificent intellect this new 'learning' of the West, he was able at the same time to correlate it perfectly with the wisdom of the East. He stands out therefore, as the one personal meeting-place in history between the East and the West at the time of their first modern contact.

Secondly, Raja Ram Mohan Roy is the founder of the Science of Comparative Religion. It is true, that Lessing and others, in Europe, had already outlined such a Science. But Ram Mohan Roy practised it in every action of his own personal life. Lately, I have been reading carefully some of his writings in English, which form part of his literary legacy as a scholar. I have found how deep his knowledge was of the Christian scriptures in their original Hebrew and Greek languages. I have been told by scholars of Islam, that his knowledge of Persian and Arabic culture was equally deep and profound. Thus his life was given to the solution of the problem of religious unity. The result is that 100 years after his death, he can be claimed by Hindus, Moslems and Christians alike, as the true sympathiser with their own religions. He can point the way in his own personal life and teaching to the solution of our present religious communal difficulties.

Thirdly, Raja Ram Mohan Roy was the true pioneer of social reform. He was essentially a man of faith, a man of religion, a man whose life was established in God. From this basis, his social reform proceeded. Social Reform was not in any way divorced from true religion. These three qualities in him, which I have mentioned, are still of vital importance. After 100 years, the bridge is not yet fully built between the Science of the West and the Wisdom of the East. Again, the problem of Hindu-Muslim Unity has become quite recently perhaps the most, serious and alarming factor in Indian political history. Here, we may study Raja Ram Mohan Roy and find help and strength in our difficulties.
Lastly, social reform has become urgently pressing in India, but we sadly lack direction. We can learn from Ram Mohan Roy that a reverent conservative spirit is not incompatible with radical social change.

In the end, I would dwell upon the inner character and personality of Raja Ram Mohan Roy himself. His moral sincerity, his intellectual freedom, his honesty, his forgiveness of injuries done to himself by his opponents, his generous and liberal spirit—all these are part of his personal charm. Cardinal Newman has described in a well-known passage in modern English literature, the character of the ‘perfect gentleman’. In my own mind, as I go through the characters in history who come nearest to this ideal, I put first and foremost as my own vision the ‘perfect gentleman’ of this modern age, Raja Ram Mohan Roy.

LESSONS FROM RAM MOHAN ROY’S LIFE.

The South Indian Brahmo Samsaj, Madras celebrated the 74th anniversary of Raja Ram Mohan Roy at which Sir Janakaran Nair presided. Impressing upon the audience some of the important lessons from the Raja’s life, Sir Sankaran said: 'Raja Ram Mohan Roy was the first student of comparative religions. He was not therefore antagonistic to any religion. His belief was that there was something good in every religion and the antagonism arose purely out of ignorance of the other religious. If one had studied the tenets of other religions, it would be possible for him to discuss with his opponents the various stand-points and the speaker said that this must be the first great lesson that they should learn from the life of Ram Mohan Roy. The next thing in which he interested himself was social reform. If one would read his papers on Saty and about the agitation carried on by him to effect other social reforms, he would be astonished at the great opposition which he had to face. He did not lose heart, and he fought with his own countrymen with energy and determination for reform of the social abuses. All his arguments cut against the root of the system of caste. He explained the Hindu religion in its higher aspects as excluding altogether the superstitious forms and ceremonies such as idolatry.

The speaker had taken some trouble to read carefully the arguments used by Ram Mohan Roy, the arguments which cut the very roots of the then social system and found that they were based on Hindu scriptures as Upanishads and Gita and that it was impossible to defend the many social evils. If one had respect for the memory of Ram Mohan Roy, if one wanted to perpetuate his memory, he could not do better than by reading the writings of Ram Mohan and imbibe from them something of that tremendous energy and determination to fight the social evils now prevalent in India. Ram Mohan Roy showed that they could get political freedom only after they attained that mental and moral freedom. The speaker was sorry that the fight against the social injustices had ceased after him. It was the duty of modern Indians to take up that work in right earnest now. Until they get rid of the grievances, until the woman of India had equal rights and privileges as men, until the evils of the caste system were removed, they could take it that India was unfit for Swaraj. They might not be able to get rid of these immediately because they had a foreign government, which was naturally reluctant to interfere in such matters. Now that they had their own council, it was the duty of representatives of the people to press the Government to pass such laws which would remove all distinctions of caste and creed, recognition of civil rights of women and the so-called depressed classes. This must be the great lesson that must be drawn from the life of Raja Ram Mohan Roy.

PROF. C. V. RAMAN’S LECTURE.

Lecturing on “Coronas, Glories, and Halos” at the Asiatic Society, Calcutta, Prof. C. V. Raman said—

It would be a profound mistake to imagine that the physicist finds his inspiration chiefly within the four walls of his laboratory. Nothing can be further from the truth. The greatest, the most dramatic, and the beautiful experiments are those which Nature makes every day in her great laboratories. Her demonstrations are so often repeated that familiarity sometimes breeds indifference, and many pass by without even stopping to take notice. But even the least imaginative of us would not fail to be thrilled by the glories of an auroral display or the wonderful vision of the sun’s corona during a total solar eclipse. I can mention a score of other phenomena of everyday occurrence which would be considered spectacular if they were not so common, and the significance of which we are yet far from fully understanding.

I propose to speak to you this evening on a class of natural optical phenomena which give the physicist much food for thought. They arise from the precipitation of the water vapour contained in our atmosphere and hence are of special interest to the student of open-air physics or meteorology as it is officially called. Their investigation has notably advanced the science of theoretical optics, and their fruitfulness in this respect is yet not exhausted.

The most familiar of all the optical phenomena associated with precipitation is the rainbow. Here we are concerned with the effects arising from the refraction and internal reflection of water by relatively large spheres of water. Essentially similar, except in geometrical detail is the explanation of the coloured horizontal bows of hyperbolic form which are some time seen on the greasy surface of the water in tanks which are covered by dew drops on a cold morning. The tank in front of the Bengal Club shows in the winter morning sun a complete set of primary and secondary bows, with their superannuaries as perfect as any that may be seen in the sky.

I have only mentioned the rainbow as passing; my chief concern in this evening is with the optical effects produced by clouds which represents incipient precipitation, the particles of solid or liquid formed not being so large as to fall rapidly. The meteorologist recognises a great many varieties of cloud-forms. From the optical point of view, they may be broadly classified into two classes: the first in which the condensed particles consist of solid, the second of liquid droplets. We have the solid form only when the temperature is below the freezing point of water. The liquid form occurs both when the temperature is above and below the freezing point. The second possibility arises from the fact that water may occasionally be cooled below zero without solidification occurring.

Coronas and Haloes are entirely different in their physical nature. The former arise when a luminous object such as the sun or the moon is seen through a thin cloud of water droplets. Haloes on the other hand are observed under favourable conditions as the result of the presence in the atmosphere of a veil of suspended ice-particles. The physical explanation of the formation of the two classes of optical effect is therefore on rather different lines.
The formation of Coronas by condensed water-droplets is rapidly reproduced in the laboratory and it is found that the effects depend entirely on the size of the droplets. Seen through a cloud of water-droplets a luminous source appears surrounded by coloured rings; the size of the rings and the distribution of colour in them depends very much on the size of the droplets. With fairly large droplets the source is surrounded by a circular diffuse area of white light, the colours appearing around the margin of this area in the form of rings in which the sequence of colours is several times repeated.

Seen through a coloured glass, the rings appear alternately bright and dark, the entire ring-system expanding when we use a red glass instead of a blue one. The larger the drops, the smaller the size of the ring system. The light that is thrown into those rings represents what would otherwise have reached the observer's eye in the ordinary way. Hence the formation of coronas by a cloud passing over it is accompanied by a diminution of the brightness of the sun or moon. By observing the size of the rings of the coronas and the resulting diminution of brightness, the physicist can estimate the quantity of water in a cloud. Coronas may be shown by a cloud so thin that an acre of it contains only a tumblerful of water.

Clouds consisting of exceedingly small droplets (less than a ten-thousandth of an inch in radius) are capable of giving coronas of exceedingly large size. Hence such clouds even when situated far away from the sun exhibit beautiful iridescence. Large patches of such cloud, exhibiting a fine rippled structure with gorgeous colours may be sometimes seen in the afternoons in the western sky during the monsoon season in Bengal, and form a remarkable spectacle.

The theory of the iridescence of such clouds differs in some respects from the comparatively elementary explanation of the coronas produced by relatively large droplets. The principal point of difference is that when dealing with relatively small drops it is not permissible to disregard the light passing through the liquid sphere. This makes the problem somewhat more complicated. Much light has been thrown on the subject by theoretical investigations carried out at Calcutta during the past few years. The corresponding experimental studies enable the phenomena of iridescent clouds to be successfully reproduced in the laboratory.

Glories are the peculiar coloured rings seen by an observer round the shadow of his own head when he stands with his back to the sun and faces a fog-bank or a cloud. In cold climates such as Canada, they can be seen when the cloud produced by the observer's breath is observed in an aeroplane round its shadow when flying over a cloud bank.

The explanation of glories as reversed coronas usually given in text-books has been shown by the investigations made at Calcutta to be entirely erroneous. The phenomenon has an entirely different origin, and has no connection whatever with the shadow of the observer's head, except that the latter prevents the complete system of coloured rings being seen in its full beauty. The glories arise from the light that enters the drop directly and return along its original path after reflection at its inner surface. The complete systems of ring formed in this way may be observed with any simple optical device or periscope by which the interposition of the shadow of the observer is avoided.

Halo as formed by Cirrus clouds are of two types: those formed by refractions of light in the crystalline needles or plates of ice and those formed by refractions on their surfaces.

Prof. Raman explained how these were formed and illustrated the two types by means of a special optical devise constructed by him by which their formation may be successfully reproduced. One arrangement showed the 22 degrees halo, formed by refraction, and another the periodic circle passing through the sun. Prof. Raman said that he had designed an instrument that would demonstrate both simultaneously but its construction had not been finished in sufficient time for use at the lecture.

The lecture was illustrated by lantern slides and experimental demonstrations of iridescent clouds and halos.

SIR J. C. BOSE'S LECTURE AT NAGPUR.

Before a large audience Sir J. C. Bose delivered an address to the Nagpur University in the course of which he said that the highest function of an university was the advancement of the frontiers of knowledge for the common benefit of humanity. Although science was neither of the East nor of the West but international in its universality, yet India by her habit of mind and inherited gifts handed down from generation to generation was specially fitted to make important contributions in the furtherance of knowledge. There were two elements essential to the discovery of truth; the faculty of imagination and the subsequent verification by objective methods. For discovering the hidden mechanism in the life of the tree one had to become the tree and feel the pulsebeat of its throbbing life. This method of introspection had to be afterwards followed by rigid scientific demonstration for untrained imagination led to the wildest speculation subversive of all intellectual sanity. For detecting the hidden activity within the dark profundities of the tree we had to get access to the smallest life atom and record its throbbing pulsations. It was, therefore, necessary to invent and construct instruments of surpassing sensitiveness which produced the stupendous magnification of fifty million times. The invention of the microscope magnifying only a few thousand times initiated a new era in the advance of biological science. The super magnifying instruments devised at the Bose Institute were now revealing the wonders of a new world. It was by the combination of the introspective and experimental methods that it was possible to establish on a firm basis the important generalisation of the unity of all life. The barriers that divided kindred phenomena thus vanished, the plant and animal appeared as a multiple unity in a single ocean of being.

The establishment of this generalisation was not only of great theoretical but also only the highest practical importance. It opened out the possibility of great advance in physiology in agriculture, in medicine and even in psychology. The present unrest in India as in Europe was ultimately due to severe economic distress. It was tragic that our country with its great potential wealth should be in such a terrible plight. There were a large number of young men who could be specially trained in the advanced methods of science in efficiently conducted institutes for the industrial development of the country. The speaker could speak with some authority on the latent power of their countrymen for discovery and invention. The extraordinarily sensitive instruments employed in his research had all of them been constructed by Indian mechanics trained in his institute. It should be our aim not to be entirely dependent on foreign sources for our higher education and for our needs for carrying out such a programme. A far-sighted state policy would be required in matters of such vital importance as education. Persistence in this attitude of apathy would lead to disaster the extent of which it was impossible to realise now. It is the ideality the character and nobility of aspirations of our youth that would with processes and made the younger generation the past would not remain at a memory, but a latent power to be wakened once more for the revival of India's ancient greatness.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.
The Right Spirit: The Berhampore correspondent of the Mussulman, Calcutta, writes: a serious apprehension of breach of peace between Hindus and Mohammedans of Birkalasgore, Thana Beldanga, regarding passing Durga Puja processions before mosque was reported on the 8th morning to the Subdivisional Magistrate, Berhampore, who requested Khan Babadur Mouvi Birlam Huq, Member, Bengal Council, to proceed to the spot, Reaching Birkalasgore, Khan Babadur Mouvi Birlam Huq met Hindus and Mussalmans who expressed the fullest confidence in his decision and promised to abide by his orders. After enquiring details he decided that the processions should pass with music between 7 to 11 in the morning and 4-30 and 5-30 in the afternoon. The decision was hailed with delight. Later, Hindus out of regard for Mussulman feelings, agreed to stop music before mosque while passing with processions and took mother Durga with great pomp but stopped music at some distance from the mosque either way. The Mussalmans greeted the Hindu gentlemen shouting Hindu-Mussalman-ai-jai. Khan Babadur Mouvi Birlam Huq expressed deep gratitude to the Hindu gentlemen for their large-heartedness and thanked the police for their earnest endeavours to keep the peace. The procession passed smoothly. Mr. Thacker also learned from the newspapers that the Durga puja was not disturbed anywhere. They are next tried in the courts itself by a special Court, which has the atmosphere of a school. After trial they are either warned or discharged or bound over or sent to certified schools, where they learn some simple industry in addition to the three Rs. The chief improvement that Mr. Thacker suggests is that there should be more certified industrial schools at least one being specially for girls. He points out that in England and Wales there are less than 123 such schools, financed almost entirely by Government and local bodies. The Bombay Government and the Corporation should not fail to take the hint.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislation in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand behind these Indian Insurance Companies.

Good Intentions: After an interval of several months during which the newspaper which first published in India his libel on Hindu widows, was the object of several abusive prosecutions, Mr. Pilcher has come forward, on his return from Brazil, to explain his statement. Mr. George Pilcher like Miss Mayo claims to have been moved by a "genuine affection for Indians and the desire to assist the more rapid progress of their country." He says that his speech about Hindu widows has been misreported: "I never used the word "slut," but merely asserted that the inevitable result of the Hindu prohibition of remarriage, especially to child widows, created a tendency for those widows, either to degenerate into unhappy domestic drudges or to reinforce the ranks of prostitutes. In no spirit of scorn, still less hatred, I exercised my elementary right to discuss these matters and attempted to direct the English and Indian public opinion to the true kernel of India's difficulties." For our part we fail to see that his speech differed from that of Miss Mayo or the "elementary right to discuss these matters" of the Times. We reproduce from the Morning Post in another column, writes that "in the East he saw many pictures of London's famous buildings but, needless to say, none of the rookeries which make up the major part of her East End," the Simla correspondent of the London Times suggests that the Indian Cinematograph Enquiry Committee is appointed to keep up the white man's prestige in the eyes of Indians. Although a few in Europe hold that there is no necessity for any censorship to be exercised in the public exhibition of films, still it is generally recognised that there should be some control in order to prevent the exhibition of undesirable pictures. Dewan Babadur Rangacharya did well to point out that the censorship would not be based on the principle of impartial preference but on a more rational basis. The cinematograph can be used as a very valuable instrument for educating the people and we are sure that the Rangacharya Committee will give due emphasis to this aspect of the problem.

U. P. Social Conference: For the first time, the United Provinces had the proud privilege of having a lady to preside over its Social Conference held recently. Mrs. Padmabai Rao, who occupied the position of the Principal of the Theosophical Girls' School, Benares, and whose excellent services in the cause of her sisters in Northern India were recounted by speaker after speaker in the Conference, acquitted herself creditably, as a perusal of her presidential address published elsewhere will show. No utterance on the question of social regeneration of India can fail to take cognisance of Miss Mayo's book and Mrs. Rao's address is no exception. As one who taught and moved closely with Indian and European girls her opinion ought to carry great weight. Referring to the charge of sexual perversity, Mrs. Rao said that she had watched the growth of a whole generation of Indian girls from childhood into girlhood and womanhood under her care and guardianship and judging from her experience and knowledge of European girls, she could unhesitatingly say that sex loomed less largely in the consciousness of an Indian girl than in the case of an European girl. Mrs. Rao treated in an exhaustive manner the evils in Indian society that now remain, insisting most forcibly that if the suggestion of Prof. K. C. Pandya, Chairman of the reception committee of the conference, to widen the scope of the Social Conference so as to include... all communities are well worth considering. The problems with which Social Conferences are called upon to deal are problems which vitally affect Hindus, Muslims, Christians, and alike. Greek Influences in India: A Router message recently received hints as a new discovery by Von Lecocq, the German ethnologist "the claim that Indian and Chinese images of Buddha are evolved from the pictures of the Greek gods Apollo and Bacchus. It was propounded by a great German ethnologist, Von Lecocq, Director of the Indian Section of the Berlin Museum of Ethnology, at a meeting of the School of Oriental Studies, London. Herr Von Lecocq, who has headed three expeditions to the deserts of Central Asia, claims that it has been indubitably proved that India and China borrowed images of all the classical Greek gods which they adapted to their own religions and needs."

The theory as far as we are aware is a very old one. In Buddhist Art in India Prof. Albert Grunwedel has taken great pains to prove that the images of Buddha are really variations of Apollo. In writing of the finished images of the Buddha, he says: "He is given again in the form of a young man, in a long robe thrown over both shoulders. The face, in the older and more ideal conceptions, shows features resembling those of Apollo, while in the more modern and more stereotyped pieces the features are distinctly Hindu. The hair is arranged in a krobyles; sometimes the figure is represented sitting, Indian fashion, with legs drawn up; at others standing with the right hand uplifted, or striding towards the right, and so on. The draping and treatment of the garments is thoroughly Hellenic; on the more ancient slabs it is often very delicate, and here and there it has quite a distinctive character; but on the later representations the different garments, which have become conventional and stereotyped, are arranged in a fashion that is decidedly not Indian." In another passage he writes: "In true Greek style, the disfigurement of the bump of intelligence (enlightenlusth) upon the skull, is concealed by a cluster of locks of hair; in many cases the closely-cut hair, which the figure should have, is replaced, incorrectly, and in contradiction to the tradition, by an abundance of locks. The Apollo-type of the Alexandrine type of which was used as a basis for the Buddha head, gives an idealization, which is in entire opposition to the possibility of the portrait of Gautama." The book was published in 1897.

Backwardness of Women's Education: A valued lady correspondent writes: "It is an irony of fate that while women in other countries and even in other communities in India are striving to come abreast of men in liberal and professional education, we in India have not yet ceased to discuss whether a study of the three R's is advisable for our girls. The suggestion made at the Foona Muslim Ladies Conference that the curtailing of the marriage and funeral expenses should be effected in order to benefit education should be welcomed and acted upon. To quote Mrs. Naidu, the education of Muslims—we may say, Indian—women is a factor conducive to the growth of Indian nationalism and the task of education is facilitated by the ideals of Islam which stand for "Liberty, Equality and Paternity.""

Mr. Chintamani on Untouchability: In moving the resolution on the removal of untouchability Mr. Chintamani made a vigorous speech which we reproduce from the Leader. Mr. Chintamani said that if there was to be any salvation for the Hindu community and for India, it would not be attained for as long as the Hindu community tolerated and sanctioned customs and usages which resulted in a problem such as the problem of the depressed and so-called untouchable class. It was fortunate that during the last forty years perhaps in the greatest of all living Indians, Mahatma Gandhi, had given attention to this subject. Mr. Chintamani observed that there were bound to be radical differences of opinion regarding many of the concrete points of the political programs of Mr. Gandhi but when he had directed the attention of the people of India to the serious moral question of this so-called untouchability and had urged them to use the public roads round a temple in the town, the conduct of the caste Hindus of Travancore to leave the Hindu fold. The conduct of Mr. Mahadev Govind Ranade, used to say that if India had become a land of suffering it was because of God's curse for the manner in which Hindus treated Hindus and the depressed classes.

Disabilities of the Ezhavas: The struggle that the Ezhavas of Travancore have been carrying on for sometime for the free use of certain roads in the State has not yet resulted in improved position. It is a pity that the State does not recognise its duty towards a section. Travancore seems to be again inviting trouble in connection with the right of the so-called untouchables to use the public roads round the temples of the 'high caste Hindus.' For some time past there has been considerable resentment among the Ezhavas of Thiruvarpur in the State, because they have been forbidden even by force to use the public roads round a temple in the town, while all non-Hindus are allowed to pass along the roads freely. The conduct of the caste Hindus of the town is most deplorable and is a disservice to Hinduism as they practically encourage the poor Ezhavas to leave the Hindu fold. The conduct of the authorities in backing up the caste Hindus, because they have been forbidden even by force to use the public roads round a temple in the town, while all non-Hindus are allowed to pass along the roads freely, is the duty of the educated Hindu throughout the State to support the Ezhavas in every possible peaceful agitation they think necessary to assert their right.
INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, OCTOBER 22, 1927.

Mr. Har Bilas Sarda’s Bill—1.

We are indebted to Mr. Har Bilas Sarda for a copy of his Bill to regulate marriages of children amongst the Hindus, which has been referred to a Select Committee at the last Session of the Legislative Assembly. The Select Committee, Mr. Sarda informs us, is likely to meet next January, and it is hoped that the Bill with the Select Committee’s report will be taken up for discussion and decision before the Legislature in February next. If it is passed by the Assembly, it will be sent up to the Council of State and the attitude of that body will be largely influenced by the attitude of Government towards the measure. It will be remembered that the Government wanted the Bill to be circulated for opinion and opposed the reference of it to the Select Committee when it was introduced last session. The Government cannot be expected to give their whole-hearted support to the Bill unless the public opinion in its favour is so overwhelming as to make it impossible for them to do otherwise. British rule in India has largely outlawed the ideals of its early years when a British member of the Government of India could say, as did Mr. Grant who was in charge of the Bill to validate the remarriage of Hindu widows: “If he knew certainly that bar one little girl would be saved from the horrors of Eakamachariya by the passing of this Act, he would pass it for her sake: if he believed, as firmly he believed the contrary, that the Act would be wholly a dead letter, he would pass it for the sake of the English name.” British Indian statesmen in those days were genuinely anxious to raise the people of India from the inhibitions into which they had been plunged by centuries of despotism, and to train them to govern and protect themselves. The great emancipating principles which inspired political policies in the later 18th and early 19th centuries gave place to a commercial and military imperialism in the latter half of the 19th century, and social legislation was practically a dead letter. The Montagu-Chelmsford reforms were an honest attempt to get away from imperialistic influences in the governance of India, but these have been too long and too strongly entrenched in policy to be easily overthrown. We are now in the trough of a wave of reaction against the reforms, of which the opposition of Government to the reference of the Bill to a Select Committee was but one of the many symptoms that are visible to the discerning eye.

It is, therefore, of the first importance that public opinion should be strongly mobilized in favour of legislation to prevent child marriages. Already a Shaukacharya has sounded a note of protest, and a Barwari gathering is said to have passed resolutions opposing Mr. Sarda’s Bill. These are of slight importance in themselves but they have an importance as emphasizing the necessity of prompt, organized action on the part of the friends of reform in support of legislation to deal with child marriages. The line of argument adopted by Mr. Sarda in his speech commending his Bill to the favourable consideration of the Assembly, was intended toconciliate orthodoxy and to impress on it the grave evils incidental to the prevalence of child marriages. His anxiety to remove all causes of possible orthodox opposition, has, indeed, led him to include in his Bill a provison which practically nullifies its main object. After laying down that no marriage of a Hindu girl or boy shall be valid unless she or he had completed her twelfth or his fifteenth year, the Bill provides that it will be valid if a license is obtained from the magistrate beforehand for its performance and it makes it obligatory on him to give such a license on an affidavit from the guardian to the effect that the girl has completed her eleventh year and that the conscientiously believes that the tenets of the religion which the girl professes enjoin that the girl should not be kept unmarried any longer.” In his speech, Mr. Sarda said that “the provison with regard to the Magistrate is not an essential or organic part of the measure and there will be no objection on my part to a suitable modification of the provison, if it can be devised.” The only modification which would be consistent with the main object of the Bill, is the omission of this provision. Mr. Sarda said that he had inserted it in order to disarm all opposition on the part of the orthodox people. So far from doing this, the clause is sure to stimulate opposition. There are few orthodox Hindus nowadays, and fewer still who believe that child marriages are an essential part of the Hindu religion. In many families which pass for orthodox, girls remain unmarried till 14 or even 16, but they are supposed never to exceed their 13th year until a suitable bridegroom has been found and the marriage ceremony has been performed. Surely, these orthodox people do not believe that God does not see through their subterfuge! It is really social opinion, the custom of their relations and caste people that they fear. To remove this fear, the legislator must not shrink from declaring the faith that is in him. “If the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who will prepare himself to battle?”

The application of this clause will give rise to serious difficulties. There is no license provided for in the Bill for marriages of boys under 16. The Bill expressly prohibits the grant of licenses for marriages of girls under 11. We do not see why it should be made so easy to get a license for the marriage of a girl who has completed her eleventh but not completed her twelfth year. We really think that far less hardship would be caused to the girl and her parents by omitting the licensing clause than by placing in their way the temptation to swear a false affidavit regarding the girl’s age and religion. Mr. Sarda knows that among Hindus and even among Europeans, it is not considered wrong to understate the age of women. The latter have adopted a convention deprecating any enquiry about a woman’s age as bad manners, while among Hindus questions about age and income are not considered improper. The ages of unmarried girls are, as remarked above, habitually under stated, and an orthodox Hindu guardian will be placed in a fearful dilemma if he has to swear that his ward has completed her eleventh year in order to be allowed to get her married before she completes her twelfth year. In the absence of any provision of amnesty in the Bill, the guardian will, we think, be liable to be prosecuted for perjury if some kind collateral produces a counter-affidavit to the effect that the girl to be married has yet a month to complete her eleventh year. We do not like the licensing clause at all. If there is no other alternative we would frankly reduce the minimum marriage age under the Bill to 11, and omit the licensing part of it altogether. The better way, however, is to leave the validity of marriages alone, as has been done in Indian States’ legislation, and impose penalties on the performance of marriages before the prescribed age. This course would enable the fixing of higher minimums which, we think, can and should be done.

MUSLIM EDUCATIONAL CONFERENCE.

The Bombay Presidency Muslim Educational Conference held at the end of last week in Poona, was, as last year, happy in its choice of the president, Amir Sheikh Mahomedibai Abdullahbai, the Dewan of Junagadh State. The importance of each conferences cannot be over-emphasised. As the President himself pointed out they assist in creating and focusing public opinion on certain important issues and prick the conscience of the community as a whole and thus exert a salutary and corrective influence. That the Muslim annual conferences have done so is amply borne out by the message that was sent by Sir Leslie Wilson to the last session of the Conference, to the effect that the efforts of the Conference had given a fillip to Muslim education in that there was a satisfactory increase in the number of Mahomedan pupils receiving instruction throughout the Presidency.

Himself a staunch believer in education, the Dewan Sahib at the very outset of his presidential address remarked that ignorance was the root cause of all our communal trouble, and he refused to believe that a nation composed of members who had received liberal and sound culture and had imbued with the high ideals of citizenship, would fail to observe the elementary principle of live and let live. The survey of the progress of Muslim education in the Presidency, as sketched out in the address, shows that Muslims are not as educationally backward as they are popularly thought to be. They are distinctively ahead of the backward and intermediate and bid fair to keep pace with the advanced communities. So far as primary education is concerned, the percentage of literacy among the Muslims is 9% as against 41% of the backward and intermediate communities and 10-1% of the advanced communities. Thus it will be seen that Muslim education in Bombay has made greater advance than in any other province in India.

But as regards secondary and higher education the Muslims are not so favourably situated as the advanced section of the Hindu community. The percentage of Muslim pupils in secondary schools to Muslim population is only 38 as against 2-31 of the advanced community. The disparity is still greater in figures for higher education. It would be difficult to believe, were it not recorded in the Director’s report, that the number of Muslim students who passed the School Leaving Certificate examination is about 170, and the number of students who go up for higher and professional education is negligible. It is inexplicable with the advantages that START education undoubtedly has it should show such poor results in the higher stages. It cannot be said that the facilities are not provided as an encouragement for their education. In arts and professional colleges, special scholarships are provided for them. It is interesting to note in this connection that in the arts colleges Mahomedans in the presidency have 30 scholarships of Rs. 20 each and the Sind Mahomedans 48 of Rs. 50 each reserved for them. In fact there are more scholarships than Mahomedan pupils who avail themselves of it. What is the sparsity of the community to education due to is one of the questions which the Dewan Sahib has tried to answer. Among the reasons he assigns is that the Mahomedans labour under a disadvantage as the local vernacular instead of Urdu is employed as the medium of instruction in secondary schools. While making the suggestion that denominational schools will solve the problem of illiteracy among the Muslims, the learned President forgets that for the Mahomedans in whatever province they live, the local language forms their mother-tongue. It is not uncommon for a Muslim of Madras or Bombay to be proficient in Tamil or Marathi and not know a word of Urdu. With a true insight born of his experience as an administrator, the Dewan exhorted the men of his community not to rely on state aid alone. He pointed out to them the institutions in Poona ran by other communities purely on philanthropic and on selfless lines and asked them to emulate their example.

The question of Muslim girls’ education was touched upon in the address and the President expressed his satisfaction that the prejudice against imparting secular education to women was dying out. This subject was adequately dealt with in the Muslim Women’s Educational Conference. Though it has been repeatedly recognised that the purdah is the main obstacle in the way of Muslim girls’ education we do not find a single line in condemnation of it in the presidential address of Nawab Begun Mumtaz Yaruddowlia. Lady Wilson who graced the Conference with her presence in her speech went so far as to declare that the observation of the purdah need not prevent women from leading equally healthy lives with those who are free from it. The theory that religious education must precede secular education has been rejected in all advanced countries as unwise. All who object to direct religious teaching in schools are not themselves irreligious. Some of them, indeed, are sincerely men deeply imbued with the spirit of religion. The reason is that the young mind is not ripe for religious teaching and that forcing it on it often provokes it to protest or ridicule.
MAHATMA GANDHI AND THE SHASTRAS.

To The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In your issue of 24th ultimo you criticise Mahatma Gandhi for making Shastras the basis of social reform and for allowing the Shastras to poke their nose into social reform. But according to the report published in his Young India of 23rd Sept. he says on the other hand that truth is the foot-rule provided by Hinduism for testing the shastras and the rules of conduct. Anything which falls short of truth is to be rejected, no matter how great its authority. This is no other than "rational basis" of social Reform which you advocate. The same report in Young India also describes how outwitted the Shariats was by the inerrability of Mahatma. Presumably you were writing without the full report before you.

Yours etc.

B. K.

[It is obvious that to Mahatma and the Pandits "truth" means different things. The former understands by truth something which to him is self-evident, whereas to the Pandit truth is to be found only through the Shastras. Hinduism, like every other world religion except Buddhism, makes revelation as well as reason factors in the apprehension of truth.—Ed., I.S.R.]

MOTHER INDIA CONDEMNED.

MISSIONARIES' PROTEST.

A statement with regard to Miss Mayo's book "Mother India" signed by Rev. Dr. Macnicol and Mr. P. C. Phillips, Secretaries, and Miss A. B. Van Doren Hon. Officer, has been issued to the press in the name of the Executive of the National Christian Council of India, Burma and Ceylon, the only dissentient member being Bishop J. W. Robinson who does not find that he can assent to its terms. The Lord Bishop of Calcutta and the Metropolitan of India is the Chairman and Dr. S. K. Datta the Vice-Chairman of the Council, and the Executive Committee includes the Rev. Chittamber, Bishop of Dornakal; the Rev. J. P. Edwards, Dr. C. R. Greenfield, Bishop of Madras, Rev. J. Mackenzie, Rai Bahadur A. C. Mukerji Munsar, K. T. Paul, and B. L. Kalia Ram and Rev. H. C. Verte.

The statement reads as follows:—"The prominence that has been given to Miss Mayo's book "Mother India" in Great Britain and America and the deductions which are being drawn from it render it in our opinion and in the opinion of many of our friends necessary for the National Christian Council to issue some statement about it. Miss Mayo denied that the book was inspired by any third party whether political or missionary. Nevertheless, it has been stated that the book was promoted in the interests of missionary propaganda. If this suggestion were true, we desire to repudiate emphatically any such missionary propaganda but we wish to say publicly that so far as we have been able to discover it is absolutely unfounded.

GRAVE SOCIAL EVILS.

It has never been denied either by Indians or by foreign missionaries that social evils exist in India, and it is a matter of common knowledge that strenuous and organised efforts are being made by groups of Indian reformers to get rid of them. Yet, we, representing a body of men and women who are in close touch with the people and are conversant with their everyday life, unhesitatingly assert that the picture of India which emerges from Miss Mayo's book is untrue to the facts and unjust to the people of India. The sweeping generalisations that are deduced from the incidents that came to the notice of the author, or that are suggested by the manner in which these incidents are presented are entirely untrue as a description of India as a whole.

CHRISTIAN PICTURES.

"At the end of the book Miss Mayo admits that she has left untouched other sides of Indian life and for that very reason we can affirm that Indian life does not present the dark and evil aspect which her book suggests and that the ugly and repulsive and disgusting aspects of it that are emphasised in the book are not the predominant things in Indian society. Beauty and culture, kindness and charm, religion and piety are to be found alike among the highest and the humblest.

Miss Mayo leaves no room for these in her picture. Further we see signs that the book is being used to support the contention that there is no hope of friendly cooperation and effort with a view to the amelioration of admitted evils.

FAITH IN INDIA'S FUTURE.

"The missions in India stood, as they have ever stood, for the principle that improvement must be sought by friendship, by increasing association of all who love India, whether Indian or foreign, in all efforts for the betterment of the country by continual fixing of the mind on the progress achieved rather than on the evils of society and above all by humble reliance on the power of the spirit of the one God who has made of one blood all the nations of the earth. If this unsympathetic recital of evils which are deep-seated enough but not universal, as the book seems to imply, leads to despair of any progress or to embitterment of the relations between Indians and Europeans, or to any weakening of the joint efforts being made for the betterment of the people of India, the result will be disastrous to both India and the West. We have faith in India and India's future. We have faith that she will be able, strengthened by the spirit of God, to obtain deliverance from the evil. We earnestly desire that East and West should cooperate to this end in a spirit of love and understanding. Our fear is that this book may, by its lack of understanding its exaggeration and its unfairness, make such cooperation more difficult for both sides. For this reason, we have felt impelled to issue this statement to the peoples of India and to the missionary leaders in the West."

Dr. Paramjeys' Advice: In a speech at the opening of the new session of the Indian Students' Hostel in Gover Street, Dr. K. P. Paranjpey asked whether India was getting adequate return for the half million sterling spent every year by the 1,500 Indian students in Britain. He thought that Indians should not come here until the possibilities of study in their own country had been exhausted. The main purpose of sojourning here should be for advanced studies. He said that one of the advantages of study here was a better understanding of India. The students should make friends with all their fellow Indians, of whatever creed or province, and get a wider outlook which would enable them to combat the poison of communal strife. They should learn all that they could of the British ways and institutions and make sure that their course clear of the Style of denationalization and the Charybdis of orientalism. He urged the students to see that no action or speech or thought of theirs was such that India should wish it otherwise.
THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

THE COMMUNAL PROBLEM.

Sir C. Sankaran Nair delivered on the 15th Sept. an interesting address on "Reforms and Young Mussalmans" in the premises of the Government Mahomedan Training School, Mount Road, when the Hon'ble Dr, P. Subbaroyan, the Chief Minister, presided. The meeting, which was held under the auspices of the Crescent Society, was very largely attended.

The Chief Minister, in requesting Sir Sankaran Nair to deliver his address, said that the progress towards national regeneration and self-realisation should go hand in hand with the raising of all communities. He was also of the view that equal opportunities should be given to all communities to raise themselves to their former status. In these matters a 'give and take' policy should always be pursued. Unless the two great communities of India, the Hindus and Mahomedans, progressed in harmony, the regeneration of the country could not be achieved. He would also assure the Mussalmans that as long as he remained the Minister, he would see to the proper advancement of Muslim education in the province; because they could not hope to attain Swaraj, if one community was lagging behind in educational progress.

Sir Sankaran Nair next addressed the meeting. He began by saying that as his interest in Muslim progress was enough to tell them that years ago when the boys of the Aligarh University came over to Madras to collect subscriptions he not only contributed his quota, but also wrote to the University offering a scholarship to any Hindu boy who would come and associate himself with the Muslim students at Aligarh. The result was he received a number of letters abusing him and the scholarship was never awarded because no Hindu came forward. "Now things are," the speaker continuing observed, "getting an ominous look. There is no use pretending that the outcome of the Unity Conference will be satisfactory. I myself do not believe that this is going to be satisfactory. When I say this people may not like to hear it. My reasons for saying it I shall give you later on. My main concern now is to tell you something of the problems that you as well as the Hindus have to face in the future if we are to come to an amicable settlement so far as the Reforms are concerned.

"Unless the Mussalmans are satisfied, there is no use in having any further reforms because it cannot be worked satisfactorily; so also with the case of the Hindus; both must be satisfied if we are to work the reforms we have now got and the reforms we hope to get in a satisfactory manner. Moreover, all of us will agree that even if the Hindus and the Muslims agreed upon certain proposals and if those proposals appear re-actionary—that is, not in the interest of our future evolution, not in the interest of the country as a whole—I am sure that all reasonable men will agree—that we had better do without any reforms at all. We do not want any reforms that will not lead India on the path of progress. I do not want to give my opinion on the present problems. That is no good. You must have read again and again in the newspapers what those questions are on which both the communities are agreed. You must also have read the opinions of the real leaders of the Muslim and Hindu communities on those problems and also of those who profess to lead. It is no use adding one more opinion to the host of other views you have got. I shall try to put before you the mentality with which you have to approach the solution of these questions; because the whole thing depends upon the mentality and character that will deal with these problems in a statesmanlike and generous way, as the youths of all countries will approach such questions. It is the youths of the countries that will have to deal with these questions, for the men who have grown old, grey and prudent might deal with them in a selfish spirit. It is you youths, who will deal with them with the generosity that generally actuates you and would approach the questions in a spirit of enthusiasm and love for all. Take for instance, the question of music and procession before mosques and cow-slaughter. You may solve the question in three ways. The first method is 'let us get on as we have been doing in the past; let us abide with the custom and by the ancient practice in the country. If processions were not allowed near the mosque in the past, let us get on like that,' That is one intelligent view. Another view is 'let us abide by what the law says. If the laws allow a thing to be done, let us do it in a manner as not to be offensive to the other people. Whenever there is a dispute between the Hindu and the Mussalmans as there have been, let us see what the law is on that point and abide by the decision of the Court.' The third point is this and it is the most important one. It also seems to be the most prevalent view. The Hindu says, 'it does not matter what the custom is. We do not care a bit for what the law says. What we want is our religion; when it says that such and such a thing should be done in such a way it must be done. If it offends the Muslims we cannot help it. Let us stand by what the religion says.' Equally strong is the retort of the Muslims. They say 'our religion is the first thing with us. We are Muslims first and we are everything else next. If you do not like what we do so much the worse for you. We shall not allow processions to pass by our mosques.'

Music Before Mosques.

"These are three points of view. These questions, procession, music and cow-slaughter, are not burning questions in the Madras Presidency. But curiously enough the trouble over these things arose in the provin­ce at Salem years ago and let us see how they were solved. A new mosque was built in Salem and the Hindus wanted to take a procession by the side of that place of worship on the ground that they were entitled to do it irrespective of all things. The Hindus said that the custom of not allowing the procession was with regard to the old mosques. But this is a new mosque and through this place we used to take our procession always. The other side also had their own case. All places of worship belonging to them, whether built new or not, must be respected. The decision arrived by the courts was that they cannot respect customs always. Custom is a thing enforced by the stronger party. It cannot be allowed to have any legal force. It cannot be said that at no time shall a procession be allowed to be taken through the place. At the time of the time for the congregational prayer after a good deal of discussion was also fixed. The procession was allowed. Thus the dispute was settled. What is it that now happens? There was a unity conference in Delhi in 1924. At that conference the Hindu and Mahomedan leaders agreed upon certain proposals among which was the one that they should abide by the custom. But in 1927 I am sorry to state that both the parties receded from that and an extreme position was taken by both the parties. That is the reason why I say there is no chance of an amicable settlement between the Hindu and the Muslims. The position as compared with 1924 is worse today. But I do not blame anybody. There was one party leader who suggested that we should not take these extreme positions. Let us see whether the law sanctions such a custom. The Congress President Mr. S. Sri, nivasa Iyengar, put forward this view. But the leaders of the two communities would not even discuss it. It seems that they place no reliance on the Congress to solve this question. They feel that the law is on their side. The legal right is to be taken as the basis and there should be no modification or departure from the rights as they have been declared by the courts. The executive must put their feet down upon those who try to get out of these rights. But in Northern India nobody seems to take that view. The Congress President would not even be listened to. I am decided against the third view. If stable peace is to be established the right is to be declared by law."

Social Reforms and Swaraj.

Continuing, Sir Sankaran Nair referred to the question of joint electorate and attainment of Home Rule for India. On the latter point, he would ask them to consider the reform question from the point of view of whether they wanted first political freedom, and that it did not matter whether they were to have a Hindu or Mahomedan Government afterwards—they would take their chance and what they desired first was freedom—or whether it was their view 'that they only desired full opportunities for individual and personal development and self-realisation in every direction and in every way. It did not matter a bit for them whether Albh, Asoka or England ruled over them. They only desired to lead a good and honest and religious life without interference from anybody. Then the reforms had to be looked at from that angle of vision. The difference between the standpoints was material. Now among the Mahomedans there were the hateful practising of the purdah system, the system of polygamy and unequal rights between man and woman. The Hindus were guilty of these evils. As long as these evils existed, he would say they could not progress and these evils would only tend to deteriorate their position. He agreed with Kemal Paasha that their must be absolute equality of rights for man and woman. Now the Hindus had got in addition to those the caste and its distinction. The position which he and those who were associating with him took up was that they did not want a Government that would stand in the way of carrying out reforms to put an end to these evils. They would say that a Government which did not help to get rid of polygamy did not deserve to administer the country, They had got power to introduce such reforms in the legislatures. If they tried to get rid of these things through the Councils, when the present reforms were conceded, they were opposed on social grounds. If they got rid of those cankers in their social system they could be sure, as day followed night, they would get their political freedom and nobody in the world would dare to oppose them. (Mr. Hammed Thane: That day will not come.)

Sir Sankaran Nair: If you get good common sense and if you place yourself under my leadership then you will realise it. There are others also who are of my persuasion.

A voice: You are the only person who takes that view.

Sir Sankaran Nair: I do not think that I deserve such compliment. I am quite sure you are pessimistic but you are young and you ought to be optimistic.

Separate Electorate.

Proceeding, the speaker asked the audience to view the question of joint electorate from that stand point. He is of opinion that separate electorate was calculated to perpetuate the preponderance of that class which would come into power by reason of the separate electorate. If they were going to get further reform only if they had separate electorate, let them drop the whole question. That system would only lead to differentiation and not harmony. He concluded his speech by referring to the Unity Conference and pointed out that he did not expect much from out of the conference. "My reason," the speaker said are these—(1) the Congress leaders are distrusted on these questions. The President of the Congress is not given a place in the sub-committee appointed by the conference. (2) We are drifting farther away from the position taken in 1924. The third reason is that the Hindu and the Muslim leaders are quite unreasonable in their demands and the position they take. Religious prejudice clouds the outlook of the representatives of the two communities. As long as these feelings exist, you cannot expect any solution to the problem in the near future. For example, the Hindus accuse the Mahomedans of kidnapping and abducting the Hindu girls. The Mahomedans point to the Suddhi and Sangathan movement. Until this mentality is removed, until the mentality as revealed in the speech of the President at the Meerut Conference and to be found in the columns of the "Muslim Outlook" changes it is idle to hope that the leaders of both the communities will come together."

Dr. Subbaroyan, in bringing the proceedings to a close thanked the speaker for his instructive address and emphasised the need to effect social reforms in all the ways pointed out by the lecturer. He also laid stress on the question of temple entry and pointed out folly of not allowing full freedom to all castes to enter the House of God and worship the Almighty in one's own way. He then exhorted the young men of both the communities not to think on communal lines but to take a broad and materialistic view on public questions. With a vote of thanks proposed by Mr. S. M. Fossat to the Chairman and the lecturer, the meeting came to a close.
BUDDHIST RELICS IN MEXICO.

Recent discoveries by scientists in Mexico, Central America and Yucatan indicate that America was discovered at least a thousand years before Columbus sighted land on this continent. The first account of the new land was written by a Buddhist priest named Hui Shen in the belief of John Fryer, a recognized authority and writer of Mexican history here, writes Mr. Jack Star Hun in Chicago Tribune.

Hui Shen was a native of Cabul and a globe-trotting missionary. It was to spread the Buddhist beliefs that he first undertook the trip to America. This is said to be supported by records, preserved in the archives of the Liang Dynasty, and handed down to the Chinese people with no less an authority than the famous historian, Ma Yuan-Ling, to support Hui Shen's assertions.

A trip from Asia to America by the Kurile and Aleutian Islands would have been relatively simple for the ancient Chinese, claims Mr. Fryer, even in simple boats like canoes. The islands were well known to the Oriental races in the fifth century and the voyage for the Buddhist missionaries would have been easier than the long overland travel route they were accustomed to traverse between India and China. Information of the North American Continent was probably obtained by the wanderers from natives of the two sets of islands.

Antiquities found along the Pacific coast of Mexico and in some instances far inland, in addition to Chinese historical documents and traditions allude to a continent east of China, which apparently is America. The great sea referred to beyond the eastern boundary of this country is undoubtedly the Atlantic Ocean, Mr. Fryer says. The Chinese called this continent Fuang.

According to the narrative of Hui Shen, he made the trip in 499 A.D., during the reign of the Emperor Yung Yuan. A revolution occurred, while the priest was away and it was not until 503 that he returned bearing gifts for the ruler. He brought fabrics resembling silk, which were undoubtedly the Mexican agave fibres and mirrors resembling those in use in Mexico at the time.

Hui Shen, in his official report, declared that the people of the new land were formerly ignorant of the Buddhist faith, though he reports that five Buddhist monks from Cabul, made the discovery in A.D. 458 and spread the doctrine, books and images of the religion. These earliest explorers converted natives into monks and the customs and manners of the residents were reformed.

He mentioned the weaving process of the Mexican agave and described the pears on the agave tree. "There is plenty of copper but no iron," said Hui Shen, in his report, "and no money value is placed upon gold or silver. Their markets are free and there is no fixed price scale."

Reports of all ceremonies and social functions, the absence of cities and fortresses apparently agree with the research findings of scientific groups in Mexico.

As for proof in Mexico of Hui Shen's actual visit there is a tradition of the coming of an extraordinary person, with a white complexion, who was clothed in a long robe and mantle, who taught the people to abstain from evil and live a righteous and sober life. After a few years, he was subjected to strenuous persecution. The imprint of his foot was later found upon a high rock near the village of Mandalesa, now in Lower California, where the legend says a statue was erected to him. Another teacher named Quetzalcoatl with some followers came to Mexico from the north by way of Panuco. These men were probably the earlier group of Buddhist priests.

A search for old names of persons and things gives traces of the Buddhists in Mexico. Buddha, it is said, is not in general use in Asia as a word but the patronymic "Gustam" is substituted or the name of his race, "Sakhyu," is also heard. Such places as Guatemala, Motazin words like Oaxaca, Zacatecas, Sácapulas, Mixteca, Tayacaca and others give strong hints of their derivation.

On an image representing Buddha found near Palenque there is inscribed on it the words, "Chaaemol," probably derived from Sakhyu-muni, the full name of one of Buddha's callings. Northern China priests are to-day known as lamas, while the ancient Mexican religious powers were called tlamas.

Sculptures, tablets, images and ornaments, temples and pyramids, thinks Mr. Fryer, prove the early establishment of the Buddhist faith. A large idol was found in Campeche, which accurately represents a Buddhist in full ceremonial attire. Another image that of a priest sitting cross-legged on the backs of two lions was found at Palenque.

Figures, carved grotesquely, showing Buddha are found in niches in the old temples of Uxmal Palenque and other places. There is a Mexican image of Buddha contained in the Ethnographical Societies Museum in Paris.

AN AFGHAN ON ENGLAND.

Sirdar Ihab Ali Shah writes in the Morning Post—Prior to leaving Asia I had formed a mental picture of England and English institutions which was almost Utopian. I still have a very high opinion of your country and its great people, but in strict veracity I am bound to say that I feel somewhat disappointed in many of your customs and institutions which I was taught to reverence. The fault lies in the wave of ultra-modernity that is passing over this country.

In the first place I was given to understand, both through a careful consideration of your history and your fiction, and by conversation with Englishmen, that the spirit of Christianity as manifested in England was much more just and righteous than anywhere in Europe, or indeed in the world, that the sentiment of mercy was highly developed, and that charity took the first place among British virtues.

I certainly feel that you are magnificent in your charities and this implies a sound conscience, but I am surprised, that almost a century after Dickens penned his wonderful diatribes against social wretchedness, such alms as I have seen in London and other English towns continue to exist. In the East I saw many pictures of London's famous buildings, but needless to say none of the terrible rookeries which make up the major part of her East End.

A PAGAN PEOPLE.

It seems to me hypocritical, too, to say the least of it, that while the great bulk of your population is still in a condition of almost entire paganism, you should continue to send so many missionaries to the Eastern countries and spend so much money annually in doing so. I have seen sights and heard sounds in London such as I have never heard in the East, and comparing your submerged tenth with the population of the various countries of the East, I consider that our life is yet better than yours, material comforts notwithstanding.

Obviously your first duty is to your people. You cannot describe yourselves as a Christian country when at least 60 percent of your people never enter a Church door. One half of the money spent on the foreign missions "for the uplift of the poor heathens" would enable you to make this country an infinitely greater country.

Dancing on Savages

Whilst on the subject of morality, I am a little amazed at your attitude towards the dance. Although the mere suggestion that you should adopt the American negro's mode of life would shock you profoundly, you still do not hesitate to accept and indeed to glorify, the most grotesque of his salutary antics with their unspeakable names, and these you allow and even encourage your young sons and daughters to perform.

Probably most of you are unaware that these dances are the relics of a very ancient negro fetishism, which had its genesis in African worship of the uncleft. With us the dance is a very ancient art. But if you accept the fantastic gyrations of savagery you can scarcely expect the more cultivated portion of Eastern society to retain its respect for England of to-day.

Again, I cannot understand your legal system. From my perusal of your constitutional histories and works of the kind I was under the impression that English law was founded on the most rigid principles of justice and equity, and that your trials were carried out with the greatest respect for probity.

On the whole, I believe your legal system to be sounder and more humane than that which exists in most Eastern countries, but I certainly do not feel that it altogether deserves the exalted praise accorded to it by your contemporary historians. There might be something in your saying that history repeats itself, to which I might add that the historians also repeat themselves; for as regards the practice of law here to-day your murder trials seem to me needlessly prolonged, and I do not think you should permit such crowds of women to frequent your law courts.

GHOULISH GLOATING

These are the mothers of your race, and their ghoulish gloating over horrible details cannot be good for them or the country generally. As an Eastern, too, your divorce courts simply appal me. Why oh, why wash the dirty linen in public? Our divorce laws are precise and the marriage contract with us—at least those of us who are Moslems—is nearly such a one-sided affair as is frequently imagined.

These are but a few of the reasons why I am a little disappointed with the present-day England, and had often wished to have visited this country during the days of the Great Queen. But I am happy to admit that you have a strong sense of decency in your relations with each other, and a deep-rooted love of liberty, that you are on the whole cheerful and good-tempered, and that you are noticeably kind to animals, except, perhaps, to the deer and the pretty little foxes which you hunt to death. In many ways you are truly great, but strangely none the less, with customs which seem to me, a son of old Asia, like the oils and paradoxol.

U. P. SOCIAL CONFERENCE.

The United Provinces Social Conference met on the 11th instant in the hall of the Balwant Rajput High School at 1:30 p.m. The hall was packed to overflowing. A large number of distinguished ladies were present.

Mrs. Padmabai Rao, Principal of the Theosophical Girls' High School, Benares, presided.

PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS.

Mrs. Rao, in her presidential address, welcomed the opportunity of placing before the conference, "the woman's point of view on social problems." She entered an emphatic protest against the malicious and unscrupulous attacks made against the honour of the whole nation by Miss Mayo in her book "Mother India" by one who had anything but a daughter's attitude towards this country. She considered the writer singularly unfortunate in that she missed all the finer and more beautiful side of their national life. It was amazing that Miss Mayo saw nothing but sexual perversion in India. Mrs. Rao had watched the growth of a whole generation of girls who had grown from childhood into girlhood and womanhood under their care and guardianship. Judging from the knowledge gained from the books and statements of European friends she could say unhesitatingly that sex seemed less largely in the consciousness of an Indian girl than in the case of an European girl. Conditions of marriage, social conditions and etiquettes, and above all their attitude towards marriage relationship, were such as to discourage all unhealthy emotional excitement.

MARRIAGE IMPERSONAL

Marriage was far more impersonal here than it was with the people in the West. It is a religious duty entered into, not primarily for gain or personal happiness but for the performance of a great social duty—the paying of debt to the ancestors who have given bodies in which we live and through which we gain knowledge and our experience. This idea is so deeply impressed upon Indian consciousness that even ignorant men and women mould their lives in accordance with it. It was inconceivable that some of the things mentioned in the book could have taken place without an Indian, who knew the life of the people, knowing them.

NEED OF EXTENSIVE EDUCATIVE PROPAGANDA.

Mrs. Rao emphasised the need of an extensive educative propaganda to win the intelligent co-operation of the real executive of human society, the women of the race. The exceedingly swift manner in which franchise had been granted to women in many provinces of India without that struggle which was a special feature in other countries, was a proof of the respect in which women were held in India, where they were regarded as representative of the feminine aspect of national life.

Mrs. Rao stressed the necessity of women's education;

Wastage of infant life in India and notably in the United Provinces was appalling; so also the death-rate in general. The high birth-rate in India was not due to prosperity but to quite opposite causes. She referred to the good work of the All-India Maternity and Infant Welfare League, the Seva Sadan, the Servants of India Society and the Women of India Association; but the public mind must be awakened to the awful destruction which is going on among us. Not only parents but landlords who rack rents, the municipality which was indifferent to drainage and sanitation and society in general which imposed unreasonable restrictions, were also responsible. Educational work could be done through the cinema, and municipalities and public bodies should combine in the effort to finance the production of educational films for educational work amongst the masses throughout the year.

She referred to the necessity of a large number of trained nurses, doctors and midwives, the death of whom she ascribed to the unwillingness of parents to allow their daughters to take up these professions. To instruct them in these professions was regarded as degrading women to work only for pecuniary gain. A different attitude towards all social work was needed to be created.

She referred to the education of children and said poor children wanted to learn but found the door closed against them. It was the duty of the nation to listen to the cry of these children.

Early Marriages.

Proceeding, she pointed out that early marriages were to a certain extent responsible for the enormous wastage of infant life in India, though it was her deliberate conviction that poverty and general economic conditions were even more responsible for it. She urged that while public opinion should be rallied against this pernicious custom, nothing short of legislation could put an end to the evil.

Ages Limit.

After welcoming the Bill before the Legislative Assembly prohibiting marriage of girls below the age of 12 and of boys below that of 16, the president opined that we should with no uncertain voice demand that the ages-limits be raised to 14 and 18, respectively. Closely bound up with this question was the extension of educational facilities among girls. She did not think it necessary to deal with the question of widow marriage because she believed that, the raising of the age of marriage for girls, would solve the problem for itself.

Female Education.

Turning to the female education, the president held that if the woman was to play her part as the organizer and creator of a refined and happy home it was necessary that she should be trained through art, literature and music to appreciate and understand beauty and fulness of life. There was sometimes a tendency to look upon art and culture as luxuries, as mere thrills of education, but she was fully convinced that it was a profound error based on a narrow interpretation of art and also a wrong conception of education. It was woman's great office to be the high priest of beauty in home, always weaving order and beauty out of chaos. Domestic life, in its perfection, was a work of art and was the creation of woman who was not only the transmitter but the organizer of life. The president firmly believed that the power to restore peace and friendship between different people could only come from womanhood. The woman had only one religion—that of love and humanity. Was it not possible then the president asked, that where men had failed women might succeed? Dr. Anne Besant was perhaps the finest illustration of one to whom work was the highest joy, and the country at present needed the fiery, creative energy of women of this type—workers who had eliminated every form of personal selfishness.

Concluding Mrs. Rao said: It is because in the womanhood of India there is locked up a wonderful creative power, born out thousands of years of sacrifice, that I would point out to you this unexplored source of real wealth. At present it is lavished on a few individuals in the home but when the woman's intelligence is awakened to the needs of a greater life around her, when she realizes that the city is a larger home and her social sympathies are aroused for the victims of wrong social conditions, then will she come forth with her powers of self-sacrifice to take her proper share in the service of her country. Educate women not for bread-winning purposes but for human service and I have every confidence that our social difficulties will vanish. Our homes will be happier, our cities cleaner and our country more prosperous.—The Leader, Allahabad.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Shradhanand Dalit Udhar Sabha: The All-India Shradhanand Dalit Udhar Sabha has called an All India Depressed Classes' Conference to meet in Delhi on November 6th, 1927. Mr. Vinayak Damodar Savarkar, Barrister, Ratnagiri, has been elected president. All the depressed classes organizations throughout India are requested to send delegates for consideration of the various problems confronting the movement and coordination and better organisation of work. Free arrangements have been made for boarding and lodging of delegates. Intimation regarding date of arrival should be early communicated here to avoid personal inconvenience.

5,000 Years Old Textiles: A discovery of some interest that has just been made by the Archaeological Department is that cotton was used in India for textiles as far back as 8,000 B.C. The evidence for this comes from the prehistoric city of Mohenjodaro where recent excavations brought to light a silver vase filled with jewellery, and round about the vase had been wrapped a woven cloth, of which some fragments still adhered to the metal. Needles to say these fragments were in a very fragile condition after their 5,000 years in the soil. But the examination of them, which has been made by Mr. Turner, Director of the Technological Research Laboratory Indian Central Cotton Committee at Bombay, leaves no room for doubt that they are true cotton with the typical convoluted structure which is the peculiar characteristic of that fibre. The ancient Babylonian and Greek names for cotton material (Sindu and Sind) have naturally pointed to the Indus region as the home of cotton growing, but there has always been a doubt as to whether the cotton known to the Babylonians and Greeks was not obtained from cotton tree (e.g. the silk cotton tree, aristolocactus rather than from the cotton plants of the genus gossypium). This doubt is now dispelled by the discovery that true cotton of the latter kind was used for weaving in Sind at the age referred to long before even farmer had been discovred.

The Bombay Y.M.C.A.: The Bombay Y.M.C.A. on behalf of the Corporation is completing a scheme whereby a programme of welfare work will be conducted among Municipal servants employed at the Love Grove Pumping Station. The programme will include features that have already proved successful in
THERE will be outdoor games like volley ball and cage ball, swing and see-saw for the children, and lantern lectures on health and sanitation given in the open air. Indoor games will be provided during the monsoon, and a night school mainly for adults. The educational programme includes dramatic performances, bhajanas and musical entertainments. It is hoped to enlist the services of volunteer helpers and except for the half-time salary paid by the Corporation for the trained supervisor, who will be in attendance six nights a week, all other expenses of equipment and running are to be met from the "Funds Fund" of the men themselves. Cooks and fitters are the class of employees catered for by the present scheme, but if the plan succeeds it is proposed to extend the service so as to fill profitably the leisure hours of other classes of lower-paid municipal servants.

A New Career for Young Men: The National School of Physical Training conducted by the Y. M. C. A. at Royapetthah, Madras, has begun its eighth year with a record enrolment of 65 students drawn from many parts of India. There are 48 from Madras Presidency, 4 from Bengal, 1 from Bombay Presidency, 2 from Central India (Indore State), 1 from Bihar and Orama, 6 from Cochin, 5 from Ceylon. Every year provincial governments are sending more students, and sending them from greater distances. Next year, for instance, the government of Assam has asked that six places be reserved for students from that province. Municipal schemes also, such as the public playgrounds of Bombay and those proposed for Calcutta, and University schemes such as that just sanctioned for Poona, are creating a demand for physical directors of a new type, which is the business of the Madras Training School to produce. A feature of the enrolment this term has been the growing proportion of men of college education. Value of the training given has been proved in those schools in India where the old type of drill master has been replaced by properly trained physical directors. "It has meant," says the report, "a complete and almost unbelievable change for the better in the health, moral tone and spirit of these institutions." Three courses of instruction, practical and theoretical, are offered by the School of Physical Education. There is a one year diploma course, eventually to become a two years' course, open to men with a college degree or its equivalent, and qualifying for the title of physical director. There is a certificate course of six to nine months, recognized by government, preparing students for the government examination for teachers' certificates in physical training. And there is finally a refresher course of eight weeks for those already employed as instructors or sports secretaries who wish to improve themselves.

Mahatma Gandhi on Hinduism: In reply to an American correspondent, Mahatma Gandhi explains why he is a Hindu. He writes in "Young India": "Believing as I do in the influence of heredity, being born in a Hindu family, I have remained a Hindu. I should reject it, if I found it inconsistent with my moral sense or my spiritual growth. On examination I have found it to be the most tolerant of all religions known to me. Its freedom from dogma makes a forcible appeal to me in as much as it gives the votary the largest scope for self-expression. Not being an exclusive religion, it enables the followers of that faith not merely to respect all other religions, but it also enables them to admire and assimilate whatever may be good in the other faiths. Non-violence is common to all religions, but it has found the highest expression and application in Hinduism (I do not regard Jainism or Buddhism as separate from Hinduism). Hinduism believes in the oneness not merely of all human life but in the oneness of all that lives. Its worship is in my opinion its unique contribution to the evolution of humanitarianism. It is a practical application of the belief in the oneness and, therefore, sacredness, of all life. The great belief in transmigration is a direct corollary of the consequence of that belief. Finally the discovery of the law of Varnaashrama is a magnificent result of the ceaseless search for truth. I must not burden this article with definitions of the essentials sketched here except to say that the present ideas of cow worship and Varnaashrama are caricatures of what in my opinion the originals are." Mahatma Gandhi has here stated some of the incidents or features of Hinduism which appeal to him as specially valuable in it. Its greatest merit, as he points out, is its broad toleration—if that is the correct word for its attitude which is really one of reverence—for all forms of faith and worship, so that a Hindu by instinct is incapable of insulting, wound ing, or even making light of other religious beliefs. Whenever Hindus not otherwise trained, they are acting contrariwise to their Hindu faith and culture, under the impulse of passion. The average European finds it difficult to understand this frame of mind. The Catholic Examiner cited with evident approval in a recent issue the opinion of Dr. David Hume that "there is no possibility of one religion being as good another, unless we are prepared to lay aside a fundamental principle of reason—that two contradictory propositions cannot both be true." This is not the Hindu view, which, by the way, is the only view which can ensure peace and harmony between the different elements of Indian population. Hindu thinkers were not speculative dreamers but philosopher-statesmen, and their philosophy was never out of touch with the realities of life. Their heads were high above the clouds but their feet were firmly planted on the earth. The prohibition of cow-killing not by law but by instilling a feeling of reverence for the cow among the people, is a stroke of economic and social reform which has saved Indian agriculture from extinction. Non-violence, in our view, is not a part of Hinduism. Disinterestedness in the performance of duty even when it involves violence, is plainly taught in the Gita. The crowning glory of Hinduism is, to our mind, its doctrine of agnosticism. Even the worst sinner sins through ignorance, and there is hope for him, not because of some vicarious sacrifice, but because the light of knowledge will some day shine on him, if not in this life, in a life to come. Hinduism thinks in terms of eternity and therefore Hindus are apt to lose themselves in speculation when they ought to be up and doing.

Organised Religious Proselytism: For some years past we have been urging that organised proselytism should be voluntary or given up and that religious missions would find greater scope for their humanitarian activities if they ceased to associate attempts to get people to forsake their ancestral faiths in order to accept a new religion. We have urged that organised proselytism is a matter of morality and agriculture as well. The ancient Hindu-Muslim conflicts were the direct consequence of the mutual organised attempts at proselytism from one sect to the other. The Bikanar State has gone a step forward and passed a law prohibiting wholesale conversions undertaken as an organised endeavour by any association or individual. Conversions are to be registered and the Registrar is authorised to see that there has been no undue influence, fraud, intimidation or coercion, and that the desired change of faith is due to honest religious conviction only. The example of Bikanar is bound to be followed by other States and by British India at not distant dates. The law passed last session making it an offence to wound the religious feelings of any sect or community by holding up to contempt or ridicule its prophets and beliefs, has severely curtailed the scope of religious propaganda which has always been three-fourths abuse of the other fellow's faith and only a fourth or even less the exposition of the beauties of one's own. If every missionary made it a point dis-passionately to place before his intended converts the practical working of his religion in his own country side by side with his criticisms and comment on the working of other religions in other countries, the chances are that most men would prefer rather to hear the lies they have than fly to others which they know not of.

Maharaja Sir Kishen Parshad on Hindu-Muslim Tension: Contributing an article "A message to the Nation" to the "Illustrated Annual Number of "Rahbari Deccan", Maharaja Sir Kishen Parshad, President, Nizam's Executive Council, deplores the present Hindu-Muslim tension and the poisonous atmosphere in the country, and expresses wonder as to why both communities are destined to live and prosper in the same land. Every progressive nation, he opines, need of changing one's mind as to forgive the sins of the followers of a particular religion. There is no need of changing one's credit of being a true son of the soil. The unity established during non-co-operation days resembled a gigantic mansion on frail pillars which collapsed with the failure of the movement, and now insults and murders form the order of the day. Recalling the time when peace and harmony prevailed in the days of yore in India, Sir Kishen regrets that the unsuccessful attempt of Government and unity conferences on the maintenance of international co-operation for political advancement, and that unity has been replaced by discord and rancour. The nature of unity which is the law governing the moral life of peoples, and that since the country felt the need of international co-operation for political advancement, this unity has been replaced by discord and rancour. Madras Physical Education Conference: A correspondent writes: Though it was a related matter the Madras conference was not so far on the success which attended the conference, judging from the numbers present and the resolutions passed. Managers and Headmasters and teachers united, the number present amounted to 200. The deliberations were all guided by the Hon'ble Dr. Subbarayan, the Chief Minister to the Government of Madras. The nature and scope of physical education was discussed and resolutions were also passed. The following points were agreed upon:

1. The necessity for physical education. 2. The need for recruiting physical instructors from a better class of people. 3. The imperative need to provide playgrounds and games equipment. 4. The advisability of reviving indigenous games and exercises. 5. The advisability of altering the present sessions of work so as to arrange for morning time table from 7 O'clock and another evening session. 6. That the Government should sanction liberal grants for items mentioned in points 2 and 3 above. The 'Royapetah House' held afforded a fine specimen of the work done in an unmistakable manner, indicated what games could be arranged in a limited accommodation. The Senate House the theoretical side was discussed and to the practical side of the conference demonstration, play, and exercises, justice was done in the Royapetah Y.M.C.A. field and George Town Model Playgrounds. It could be seen, therefore, that the teachers and managers not only learnt the modern theory of the play-for-all movement but also witnessed the forms of its practical expression. It is hoped that the delegates would carry with them interesting impressions of the conference, clarified views and principles of mind to carry out in actual practice—it may be in a limited manner—the ideas they imbued. Winding the conference proceedings, the Chief Minister promised support, as the demands were only moderate and as the Government purse would not be much affected.

Prohibition in Madras: When a member of the Legislative Council in Madras was asked what proportion within five years would be the goal of Government, and that the sale, manufacture and importation of all intoxicating liquors be stopped immediately in five districts, five or six districts, five to ten years be needed to twenty years; by the second amendment all the words relating to the steps to be taken by Government in this behalf were to be deleted. Both those amendments were passed. An amendment that a beginning should be made in at least two districts this year was thrown out. So far as we can see therefore nothing has been retained of the original resolution, and the outcome of the debate in the Council has been the very reverse of what was expected by the mover of that resolution. Even the twenty years limit, given themselves by Government, within which total prohibition is to be achieved, will be all too small, if as the successful and unsuccessful amendments seem to imply, they intend neither to commence operations at once nor even determine what programme they intend to follow. Though the Minister assured the House that the policy of Government was total prohibition, it is clear that the resolution as it was passed nullifies his declaration in the Council last March.

Baroda and Marriage Legislation: The credit of being the first to restrict child marriages by law belongs to the Mysore and Baroda states. Not satisfied with the old Act which fixed the ages of marriage as 12 and 14 for girls and boys respectively, the Legislative Assembly of Baroda has given effect to the recommendations of the committee that was appointed last year by the then Dewan Sir Manubhai Mehta to go into the question whether it was desirable and practicable to raise the marriage age of girls and boys. The committee proposed a revision of the Act so as to raise the age to 14 in the case of girls and 18 in the case of boys. There was very little opposition to the Bill that was introduced in the Baroda Assembly, which emerged as an Act with the slight amendment that the age-limit fixed for marriages of boys and girls should be 15 and 18 years. As regards punishment for the violation of the Act, the Assembly rejected the Committee's recommendation of larger fines and made the offence punishable with imprisonment, as fines had not proved sufficiently deterrent in the past. The state has once more demonstrated that social legislation has greater chance under self-government than under foreign rule.

Managers' Notice: Reminders that the Legislative Council in Madras was asked what proportion within five years be the goal of Government, and that the sale, manufacture and importation of all intoxicating liquors be stopped immediately in five districts, five to ten years be needed to twenty years; by the second amendment all the words relating to the steps to be taken by Government in this behalf were to be deleted. REMINDERS TO THOSE SUBSCRIBERS WHOSE SUBSCRIPTIONS HAVE FALLEN IN ARREARS AND TO THOSE WHOSE SUBSCRIPTIONS ARE DUE FOR THE CURRENT YEAR. THOSE WHO ARE IN ARREARS ARE SPECIALLY REQUESTED TO REMIT THE AMOUNTS DUE WITHOUT DELAY.
Mr. Harbilas Sarda's Bill.—II.

In the first article on Mr. Sarda's Bill we called attention to the licensing clause which virtually nullifies the purpose of the measure. The necessity of this clause, as we pointed out, arises from the drastic provision making marriages below the prescribed age-limit invalid. The legislator, in fact, is appalled by the contemplation of the irreparable consequences of his law and hastens to facilitate the avoidance of them by a formal declaration before a Magistrate. Now, if the consequences were less serious, the need for providing a backdoor by which to get out of the law, will be less urgent. We suggested, therefore, that the validity of marriages should not be touched, and that penalties should be imposed on parents or guardians who bring about the marriages of their wards under the prescribed age-limits. This is the plan followed in the Indian States which have laws dealing with child marriages. The persons responsible for child marriages who really should be penalized are the parents or guardians, and it is they that have to be restrained from following the pernicious custom. The invalidating of the marriages, however, would affect the civil status of the bride and bridegroom and their children and children's children. As the law does not prevent child marriages, they will continue to take place, and will continue to be recognised as valid by the community and by most of the married couples, until and unless some one impeaches their validity in a court of law on the ground that it violates the provisions of the Sarda Act. No one may be found to do this in the generality of cases, in which case the marriage will be as valid as they were before the Act was passed, and it will remain a dead letter. It will be far more serious if, as has sometimes happened, some near relative with a reverendatory claim to property, takes it into his head to have the marriage declared void after the parties had lived together and had children or even after they were dead, to deprive their children of their rights. Mr. Sarda's Bill does not prescribe any limit of time before which the invalidity of the marriage can be challenged, nor does it limit the right of challenge in respect of persons. Any man may at any time apply to a court to declare the marriage void, according to the wording of the Act. The possibilities of blackmail which this opens up is only too obvious.

The Bill which Mr. Jairamdas Daulatrajan intends to introduce in the Bombay Legislative Council avoids this danger. We publish it in another place. It does not invalidate child marriages. It provides for the prosecution of the parents and guardians on a complaint made. We do not like the clause which makes any five Hindus competent to file a complaint in such cases. The complainants must be registered social reform organisations specially authorised to institute proceedings or near relatives benevolently interested in the bride or bridegroom.

As regards the procedure, we think that cases of this kind should be tried by special tribunals and not by the ordinary criminal courts. We have now juvenile courts which may be expanded into tribunals to deal with violations of the law against child marriages. Parents and guardians who get their children married under the specified age-limits, do so because they sincerely though misguided believe that they are acting for the good of their children, and they should not be treated as ordinary criminals. The punishment should be limited to fines only. Imprisonment is too drastic a punishment for blind adherence to custom, and punishments which offend the public conscience are calculated to undermine the educative and moral value of the law. We would suggest that the amounts collected in fines should form the nucleus of a fund from which scholarships may be given to unmarried girls to pursue their studies in schools and colleges. Such a law will not merely prevent child marriages but will encourage the education of women which is the best remedy for child marriages. It will enlist on its side a considerable public opinion which, while favouring marriage reforms, hesitates to rely mainly on punitive methods for enforcing them. The present position as regards the question is, that a very large and increasing number of parents are willing and anxious not to marry off their children at too early ages but they want to be protected from social opprobrium either by a powerful organisation or the State declaring itself in favour of their doing so. Any encouragement given in the shape of scholarships such as we have suggested to unmarried girls, will be a powerful incentive to them to persevere in their good intentions.

The main objection to Mr. Jairamdas's Bill is that it will, if passed, be limited to the Hindus of the Bombay Presidency. Provincial legislation affecting the law of marriage is fraught with difficulties. In the case of the Bombay Presidency it is peculiarly so. The province is a union of four different linguistic groups intermarriages among whom is very rare. All these groups, moreover, are socially homogeneous with groups outside the Presidency. The Mahasaharitians are divided between Bombay, the Nizam's Dominions, and the Southern Maratha States, the Gujarathis have their kinsmen in Baroda and Kathiawar States, the Kansaree overflow into Mysore and Madras. It is easy to see that complications must arise by making a law which applies only to the inhabitants of Bombay Presidency. For other reasons, too, the Central Legislature is the proper authority to deal with marriage legislation. We suggest, therefore, that Mr. Sarda's Bill should be modified in the Select Committee on the lines briefly indicated in this article. If it be thought desirable to do something more to enforce the condemnation of the law, it may be provided that minors hastened into matrimony by their parents or guardians may on their coming of age repudiate the marriage by making a declaration of their desire before a competent authority. Her Highness the Begum of Bhopal in her interesting book entitled "Muslim Home" states that this is the method adopted among Mussalmans. She observes:

"Under certain contingencies people stand in need of marrying the minor couples. Though a rare occurrence, but to perfect the law Islam has also made provisions for the same... The minor boy or girl, on attaining his or her age is however free to continue or dissolve the marriage... If the minor had knowledge of the marriage before attaining puberty, the marriage can be dissolved as soon as she attains her age; and if she has no knowledge of it, before arriving at the age, she can dissolve the marriage the moment she comes to know of it but any delay in dissolving the contract after the knowledge nullifies the effect of this privilege."

This privilege, says Her Highness, exists only when the guardians who bring about a marriage are other than their fathers or grandfathers. Where a father or grandfather is the lawful guardian who arranges the marriage, the minors are not free to repudiate it. We should like to know to what extent this privilege is exercised. Child marriages are not so rare among Indian Mussalmans as the Begum seems to think. Sixty-five girls in 1000 under the age of 10 were returned as married at the last census among Mussalmans, the proportion for Hindus being nearly twice as many. As in the majority of cases, marriages are arranged by the father or grandfather, and as very few girls will repudiate their marriages within the extremely limited time prescribed, the privilege is not likely, and is perhaps not meant, to be largely availed of. Still, it is a provision which may be of great value in some extreme cases, especially of marriages of young girls to old men.

DARWIN AND THE BISHOPS.

There has been a highly unifying and, in our opinion, unnecessary controversy among Anglican prelates in England on the ancient question of Creation versus Evolution. In one of the United States, Tennessee, teachers are forbidden to teach Darwinism in the schools and one of them was prosecuted two years ago for violating the law. The case created a world-wide sensation. At the last annual meeting of the British Association an eminent scientist thought it necessary to vindicate Darwinism which, he said, had not been shaken by anything which has come to light since the publication of the "Origin of Species." The Bishop of Birmingham wrote some articles in the papers criticising the Old Testament narrative of creation and maintaining that the Evolution theory was perfectly consistent with Christianity. This seems to have given offence to other Church dignitaries, and when the Bishop appeared on the pulpit of St. Paul's Cathedral, the Rector openly protested that his views were un-Christian, and withdrew from the service followed by some four hundred of the congregation. The Bishop of Birmingham, Dr. Barne, was strongly supported by the Bishop of London who severely condemned the conduct of the Rector in creating a scene in the Cathedral. The Archbishop of Canterbury to whom Dr. Barne addressed an open letter explaining his position, has published a statement alike reply suggesting that Dr. Barne's exposition of his views was superficial as the Old Testament narration was for all practical purposes laid on the shelf, and that, if he nevertheless felt it his duty to open out his mind on the matter, he ought to have done it with more circumspection and consideration for the feelings of those who still literally believed in it.

The Hindu way of dealing with such matters has at least the merit of avoiding unnecessarily controversy about sacred things. We think also that it is scientifically and logically correct. Applying this to the Old Testament story of creation, the first thing to do is to ask ourselves whether we are sure we understand accurately what it was intended to mean. The ancients, whose vocabulary was more limited than ours, were obliged largely to use figurative language, the key to which we have lost. It is, by the way, a remarkable fact that, as in India so in Asia Minor and Egypt, traditions have almost invariably been confirmed by the results of explorations wherever these have been carried out. There is not among modern archaeologists nowadays the old assumption that because a thing was traditional therefore it must be false. In the case of the Old Testament story of creation, no inscriptions or excavations that may be hereafter found, can confirm or contradict its statements if regarded as literal facts. But it is possible that we may discover ancient documents which show how the story was understood by men who lived closer in point of time and ideas to the compiler of this ancient document, and that may put us in the way of recovering the lost key to the meaning not only of this narrative but of other parts of the Scripture as well. Even without waiting for new discoveries we have some evidence that the story was not understood literally at least by one learned Hebrew who lived two thousand years ago. St. John opens his great Gospel, in the manner of ancient Indian sages, with a cosmology. St. John does not refer to the Old Testament narrative, but it is clear that he accepted it because he affirms that all things were made by (whom was the Word and who was the Word) and without Him was not anything that was made. The universe, according to Hindu philosophy is name and form, and St. John's words are capable of being interpreted as meaning that creation was just the process of apprehending things by their names. However that may be, the point which we wish to emphasize is that St. John did not take a literal view of the Old Testament story nor, did he think that he was departing from it by his own highly metaphysical version of the origin of things.

Even Darwinism has suffered by the enthusiasm of its votaries who have not only imparted to it a dogmatism which was utterly alien to Darwin's mode of thought, but have extended it, thus exaggerated, to spheres to which he had never dreamt of applying it. Whatever might be its truth in biology, in sociology and politics it has wrought the greatest mischief. Huxley—"Darwin's bulldog"—himself has pointed out in a memorable essay that the ethical process which is the controlling factor of human society is dis-metrical opposition to the cosmic or biological process. Self-sacrifice is the law of the first, as self-preservation is the law of the second. A State or a Society "run on the principle of the "survival of the fittest" will be an intolerable tyranny or an unredeemed anarchy. Science may be content with finding two different and opposing sets of laws governing the material and the moral world, but Philosophy will not stop there. It must and will find the law behind these laws which operates throughout the universe—the one Law, the one Element, the one Divine Event, towards which the whole creation moves.

A SCENE FROM MAHABHARATA.
(By Mr. Shyamlal Mheta)

Two thousand years have passed since the war was fought between the Kurus and the Panduvas, the rulers of India. It was the time when Lord Krishna appeared on earth. The Kurus and the Panduvas were blood relations. Duryodhana, the representative of the Kurus, sent the Panduvas to exile for 14 years. After the expiry of such a long period the Panduvas demanded back their Kingdom, but they were refused. The Panduvas prepared for war and sought the help of Lord Krishna. On one occasion Arjuna, the best archer among the Panduvas, fell on Karna, a famous archer in the world, and began to boast of his heroic deeds. Lord Krishna did not utter a single word in his praise but on the other hand spoke highly of Karna who was well known for his generosity and charity. It is said of him that he never took his dinner unless he gave one and a half mounds of gold to priests and beggars.

Arjuna:—"Karna, why do you not utter a word of encouragement for my bravery which is quite apparent to you in the defeat of Karna. On the other hand you don't get tired of singling the praise of Karna."

Krishna:—"Oh Arjuna, Karna richly deserves commendation. He is a wonderful man. To appreciate Karna is to respect truth and love the creatures of God."

Arjuna:—"I can't find any greatness in him. To give charity is the ordinary routine of everybody. I also do this."

Krishna:—"Come in a beggar's dress, I will lead you to the battle-field where Karna is lying on his death-bed."

Both of them changed their clothes and proceeded towards the theatre of war. They saw Karna from a pretty long distance and shouted for help in their pitiable state of starvation and blamed Karna for his unsympathetic treatment towards the poor.

Karna:—"Don't speak rashly. Karna has some spark of life within. Tell me your needs."

Krishna:—"Our need is bread and water."

Karna:—"Oh God I wish I were at home to meet your demands. Instead of satisfying your hunger I would have given you enough to pass your life in comfort."

Krishna:—"What is your reply? We don't understand your roundabout ways. Shall we go?"

Karna:—"Don't go. Wait. Wait. Question not my charity. In one of my teeth gold is attached, break it and take it to the basses."

Krishna:—"We are not brutes to act so inhumanly as to break people's teeth."

Karna:—"Bring me the stone lying just near you."

Karna:—"You seem devoid of manners; why do you trouble strangers?"

Lord Krishna and Arjuna moved from their seats and walked out, but Karna beseeched them in very passionate words to stay awhile. He in his agony gave a jerk with his hands and took off his golden tooth. Arjuna was satisfied with this simple act but wanted to try him still further.

Karna:—"Karna, we won't touch your ugly rotten tooth."

Karna:—"I will just purify it. Kindly help me to carry my bow and arrow. I wish it will separate the gold from the tooth."

Karna:—"Again you insult us by giving out your orders."

Karna:—"Pardon me. I myself will do every thing."

He stopped forward slowly with the help of his bleeding knees and reached the place where bows and arrows were kept. He held the bow under his feet and tightened the string with his teeth. With the arrow he succeeded in separating the gold from the rotten tooth and washed it with water from the river Ganges.

Karna:—"Here is gold for you, friends."

Karna:—"Karna, really you deserve immortal fame. Coming generations will never forget your spirit of self-sacrifice and generosity."

Karna and Arjuna were astonished at the brave feats of Karna. The latter was ashamed to have spoken so low of Karna and asked forgiveness.

The Opening of The Happy Home for The Blind. Bombay will be glad to flash forth the news that The Happy Home at last opens its doors to the Blind of India. It is a red letter day in the history of the blind. In Bombay, once again enjoys the unique honour of solving the problem of our Homeless, Helpless, Hopeless Blind. As a first step I request every brother and sister interested in this cause, to begin with sending me blind boys under 16. Applications for others including the female blind, will be welcome to help the Home arrange for them as early as possible. By now the Home has received Rs. twelve thousand, number of blind boys have come from all parts of India, as also from Africa and America. We are again all children of the great father. The Home is thus open to all. I hope therefore that all interested in our Blind will kindly remember this Home on every significant occasion and enable it to achieve the great goal it aims to achieve. While I take this opportunity of thanking all who have co-operated with me in bringing this Home into being, I pray that the Lord may be so pleased as to induce them to again join me in my efforts. (1) To Prevent all Preventable Blindness. (2) To Care all Curable Blindness. (3) To give Sight to all such whom science fails to restore Physical Eyes. All cheques may be crossed and communications addressed to the Secretary, Happy Home for the Blind, Tardoo, Bombay Y.
MISCHIEVOUS PROPAGANDA,

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

If American advertising is to be believed this book Mother India by Katherine Mayo is having a record breaking sale here. Whether it is the drudgery of American life that finds a soothing diversion in something sensational and spectacular or the suppression of some other instinct need not concern us here. What affects us most are the contents of the book. I believe that you have read some reviews of that book and possibly the book itself. After a careful and most dispassionate and even detached perusal of the book I have reached the conclusion that the motives of the writer, however disinterested she might claim to be, are both sinister, inexcusably violent and her presentation exceedingly misleading.

Deviatisation of our nation through child marriage, denial of widow marriage, evil consequences of our caste system and untouchability and our insanitary habits are subjects on which, discounting her exaggerations, we have to accept her observations with perfect humility. Until we give some genuine demonstrations commensurate with the gravity of the task to remove such adjuncts of our social fabric we will have to submit to these shafts, whether they come from a friend or a foe.

As to politics. No British reactionary could outdo her in the justification of the status quo. She is very apprehensive of the basty Indianisation of Civil Service and extension of political power prematurely to the people. These, however, are the usual apologies too often repeated by ours opposed masters. But of extraordinary interest in this connection is her "revolution" that the Indian political agitation is not based upon deeply felt grievances but is the result of a sexually exhausted people who resort to this pleasant diversion for an excitement. She emphasises Moplah uprising, Chauri Chaura and Bombay riot without a word about the Rowlatt acts and the Amritsar massacre which were the major cause of many subsequent events. Instead she mentions the framed-up notices and handbills exhorting the people to attack the white women in those troubled districts. Furthermore, she warns her own people to beware of being carried off their feet by the beautiful picture that the poet Tagore conjures up about the origin of some of the Indian institutions which she hints is not an expression of the real soul—perhaps a decaying soul of India—but is written for the consumption of Western readers.

To be brief India's weaknesses of old age, the sickening lack of initiative of her people and her other sins of commission and omission are many. Nor do we take shelter in the taunt that most of the evils and abnormalarities emphasised in her book are easily duplicated in other nations in slightly modified forms and perhaps more so in America. But in no way do they justify the burning indictment, the wilful vilification, the gross exaggeration and misrepresentation for which the author has made herself responsible.

We therefore feel that her insinuations and implications and generalisations should not be allowed to be confirmed by default.

I have written this to you so that the matter might receive the needed attention from competent hands.

Detroiti Michigan, U.S.A.,

Yours etc.,

September 14th, 1927.

BOMBAY CHILD MARRIAGE PREVENTION BILL.

In the next Budget Session of the Bombay Council Mr. Jairamdas Doulatram will ask leave to introduce the following Bill:

Whereas it is expedient to restrict the age of marriage among the Hindus in the Bombay Presidency. It is hereby enacted as follows:

1. This Act may be called the Hindu Marriage Age Act of 1929.

2. It extends to the whole of the Bombay Presidency excluding Aden.

3. It shall come into operation on the expiry of 30 days after the date on which the assent of the Governor-General is notified in the Bombay Government Gazette.

4. Any person who knowingly or wilfully performs the ceremony of or takes active part in or gives his consent to the marriage of a Hindu who has not on the date of such marriage completed a male, the age of 16 years old, if a female the age of 12 years, shall be sentenced to imprisonment for a term which may extend to one thousand rupees or to both.

5. No prosecution for an offence punishable under Section 4 of this Act shall be entertained by any court except on a complaint made within a period of two years after the offence is committed by any five adult male Hindus or by the executive committee of any registered society for the prevention of early marriages among the Hindus or of any of its local branches.

6. All offences specified in Section 4 shall be cognizable.

STATEMENT OF OBJECTS.

The custom of early marriage among the Hindus is not only responsible for the creation of the problem of child widows in India but its effect on the physical and mental development of the youths of a community which comprises nearly three-fourths of the Indian Nation is even more prejudicial to the interests of the country. Enlightened public opinion among the Hindus has therefore been increasingly insistent that this injurious custom should be put an end to as quickly as possible. It is recognised that latterly there has been some progress in the eradication of this social evil but it is also felt that unless public opinion receives the aid of law progress will continue to be extremely slow and many a generation must pass before marriages of immature Hindu boys and girls become a thing unknown.

A COMPROMISE.

A modest attempt has been made in this Bill to come to the assistance of public opinion. My personal view is that the proper minimum age-limits for the marriage of Hindu boys and girls in modern times are those which have been laid down in the ancient scriptures of the Hindus, namely, 24 years in the case of males and 18 years in the case of females. But the general public opinion in the Hindu community has not advanced sufficiently to justify the fixing of these age-limits. The ages of 18 and 14 in the case of boys and girls respectively would probably be regarded as reasonable by most enlightened Hindus to-day. But in attempting to reform longstanding social practices one does not wish to be charged with proceeding too fast. The minimum ages which I have therefore, fixed for Hindu boys and girls are 16 and 19 respectively. In view of the recent amendment of Section 575 of the Indian Penal Code raising the age of consent to 15, it would not be proper to keep a lower minimum age for the marriage of Hindu girls.

It will be noted that the Bill does not invalidate marriages performed between parties below the ages specified in the Bill. Hindu law regards the marriage tie as unbreakable and therefore public opinion may not support a measure which attempts such a step. The Bill only provides for a sentence of imprisonment or fine for persons who are actively associated with the performance of marriages of underage boys and girls.

LEGISLATION AGAINST DEVDASIS.

Dr. S. Muthalahalami Reddi writes to the Hindu :-
Since I gave notice of my resolution and my bill I have been receiving many letters of sympathy and support from several good people of this Presidency, men and women, in addition to the reports of innumerable meetings held in support of my bill and resolution of which many have appeared in the papers and are still appearing which represent the attitude of the public towards this most urgent reform.

So I take this opportunity of expressing my deepest gratitude and thanks for all those patriotic sons and daughters of India who are interested in eradicating this centuries old custom which has disfigured our society and which has cast a slur on the fair name of Hindu.

This institution we find on close study of the social conditions existing in European countries, is peculiar to India alone in that a demoralising practice is rightly or wrongly associated with our religion which preaches the highest ideals of life and more than that under that pretence, what is much worse it makes victims of innocent children who at an age when they cannot very well see the future before them, are trained for an immoral life. In this connection an extract of Dr. Bessant's speech will enlighten us as to the origin of this practice.

"Originally there existed in connection with the temples a band of pure maidens, vestal virgins, through whose usual lips, from time to time, a God or great Rishi would speak, warning and teaching the worshippers. Only a pure virgin could serve as such a vehicle, for the temporary embodiment of a great one whose physical body was far away. These virgins were guarded with the greatest care and were looked on with the greatest reverence. Thers it was to serve the priests, minister at the shrine and to weave the mystic-dance with sacred garlands, moving to the measure of the music that they chanted, amid the fragrant smoke of incense, as the stately procession moved from face to face.

"As the priest degenerated they dragged down the temple maidens with them, until now their name carries with it but suggestions of shameful vice. Little wonder that all good influence have fled where womanhood is thus degraded, and the highest spiritual uses have been changed into lowest sin."

So a practice which stood for purity and devotion at one time has degenerated itself into corruption and vice, for which not only the temple priests, the temple trustees, but the wide Hindu public also is responsible.

In 1912 when this question was raised, in the Imperial Council Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya representing the conservative side, usually styled as the "Pillar of Hindu orthodoxy" has supported this reform in the following speech :-

"I hope that not a man in the country will be able to put forward one single text which will justify a thing which is so irreligious and sinful as the dedication of minor girls in a position where they must be compelled to lead a life of sin and shame. My lord, I hope that all sound men will unite in the desire to support the Government in any legislation which shall secure that no girls shall be led, induced or compelled to take to a life of shame, or placed in a position where she may be helplessly led to adopt it until she has attained to discretion; and so far as that is concerned, I hope and trust that the measure will receive the support of all right-thinking men throughout the country."

I think it must be a great satisfaction and consolation to the general public to learn that agitation for the suppression of this vice has been going on ever since 1868, which reveals the facts that every high-minded Hindu has been feeling for this travesty on religion and has wailed in vain over the fate of the thousands of innocent children who are sacrificed on the altar of immorality and vice and that too in the name of the Holy.

THE EXAMPLE OF ENGLAND.

In this connection, it is very significant to note that simultaneously an agitation was started in England to suppress tolerated vice by an able Englishwoman named Mrs. Josephine Butler and as a result of her valiant fight even in 1886-18 years after its commencement— the State regulation has been abolished in Britain and her colonies, while our Devadasi Institution, even though it is more heinous in its nature in having a sacntity attached to it and thereby protecting an impression in the minds of the illiterate that promiscuity is a certain caste is no sin or crime but is a caste dharma or duty, is still going on in all its vigour in spite of the earnest and repeated attempts made by our patriots like Dr. Gour and others to bring about a reform. So what was easy there in England has been rendered very difficult here because of the sloveness and exclusiveness of castes in India.
In England this question, as every one then felt, touched the honour and morality of the whole English nation, while here, as every profession goes under the name of a caste and as our outlook is more communal than national the other forward communities did not bother to improve the lot of the backward communities.

In 1922 Dr. Hari Singh Gour, the brave champion of the women’s cause in this country, moved a resolution very similar to mine and pleaded on behalf of the children of this land in the following words which will do him credit for ever:—

“Now, Sir, there can be no doubt that it is revolting to all human feeling that a girl as soon as she is 6 or 8 or 10 years of age, and in a majority of cases before she attains her puberty, should be exposed to this life-long vice and that at a time when she is unable to decide for herself, when she is under the influence of her parents and guardians, those very guardians and parents should dedicate her to the life of immorality. Honourable members will find that the recruitment of this unfortunate class is made in the following manner. The retired Devadasi cast about for fresh recruit. If they have no daughters of their own they adopt them and after adoption they dedicate them to the temple. In many cases girls are purchased for a price, and in the reports which were sent to the Government of India in 1912 and 1913, we find that as much as Rs. 2,000 was paid as the price of an infant girl.

“What we suggest, Sir, is that some measure should be taken by the Government of India to stop this evil and that girls during their minority during their tender years before they attain puberty, when they have neither the intelligence to perceive the nature and effect of the action of their parents and guardians, nor the capacity to visualise the life of shamelessness to which they are consigned by those whose duty it is to protect their honour, should not be sent to these temples and thereafter made Devadasi and exposed to promiscuous intercourse by visitors to the temples, for which speech, our Madras representative assuming an offensive attitude, not only failed to give his whole-hearted support, but also ventured to minimize the evil and gave a wrong impression of the conditions obtaining in the south and even went so far as to assert that the existing Penal Code was sufficient to tackle the problem of dedication of minor girls to temples, which assertion has been disapproved, as we all know, by our subsequent experience, but the Assembly was wise enough to pass Dr. Gour’s resolution unanimously. We find later on that the failure to give effect to the resolutions of Dr. Gour was due to the unwillingness of our Local Government to co-operate and it is our sad experience too that the Penal Code provisions 372 and 373 has failed to arrest this practice, because the custom is safely entrenched in the holy temples, guarded jealously by the temple trustees and the ignorant and superstitious public. So the reform must begin in the temples, it is to be given effect to, as was so wisely done by Mysore and so I have suggested an amendment to the Hindu Religious Endowments Act.

CENTRAL GOVERNMENT’S ATTITUDE.

Out friends the Hon’ble Mr. Ramadas Pantulu, by moving a resolution has sounded the attitude of the Central Government towards this legislation. The reply of the Hon’ble the Law Member Mr. S. R. Das that the Government still wants proof that the dedication is meant for prostitution, is not very satisfactory.

In spite of all the evidence and information give to the Government, if the Hon’ble the Law Member, Mr. S. R. Das should still entertain doubts on that score, I can only suggest that he might undertake a trip to the south in the cause of humanity and to safeguard the rights of children, as Mahatma is doing now, to verify what we have been pressing upon the attention of the Government from 1888. We may point out once more to the Hon’ble the Law Member that the very fact that the struggle has been kept up since 1888 to this day by the representatives of the people by the associations of the Devadasi communities themselves in this Presidency, to achieve this desired reform in the temples, added to the decision of the Mysore Government—all must give the right answer to the Central Government.

Again the Hon’ble Law Member Mr. S. R. Das has advised the Hon’ble Mr. V. Ramadas Pantulu that he may start Vigilance associations of the people here to report on the dedication of minor girls and prosecute, for which as we all know, we want a strong enlightened public opinion, the co-operation of the temple authorities and ardent and devoted social workers. Is it at all possible in a country where literacy is low and where ignorance and superstition are entrenched strongly in the people’s minds, and the police is not above corruption? If we do launch out on such a scheme, I may predict even now, that useless litigation, waste of energy, annoyance to the people concerned and oppression of the weak will be the result.

So we hope and trust that both the local and the central Government will respond to the people’s demand and will not any longer hold out from us such a good reform, which if made effective will save at least the present generation of our children from a life of shame and vice and disease and death and will earn thus the eternal gratitude of the generations that follow.

MYSORE GOVERNMENT’S ORDER.

The following is an extract from the Mysore Government’s order:—

“The Government now observe that whatever may have been the original object of the Institution of Devadasis in temples, the state of immorality in which these temple servants are now found, fully justifies the action taken by them in excluding the Devadasis from every kind of service in sacred institutions like temples,... Where land or other inams, if any, have been specially granted to any individuals for the service in temples and title-deeds have been issued in the names of such individuals, the Government next direct that such inams be condemned under rule VIII, Clause P of the Inam rules to the holders thereof as permanent and alienable property, subject to the payment of the quit-rent as laid down therein. The quit-rent thus imposed...will be credited to the Government and an equivalent amount will be granted as cash inam to the temple concerned.”

The New Turkey: Is the Assembly, Mustapha Kemal Pasha, in the course of a speech declared that new Turkey had no connection with religion. Mention in the organic Charter of the Mussulman religion as the religion of Turkey was the result of a compromise with the old and outworn ideas and was destined soon to disappear.
IMPLEMENTING THE AGREEMENT.

While the situation in East Africa is causing grave anxiety, it is gratifying to learn that owing to the indefatigable efforts of the Agent-General in South Africa, the terms of the Agreement are being given effect to. The important step in this direction is the announcement of the Natal Government to appoint a Commission to enquire into the conditions of Indian education in that Province. No birthday gift could be better appreciated by Mr. Sastri than this graceful tribute to his personality and to the success of his work in that country. The significance of this announcement is still greater as the attitude of the Administration was none too friendly to the Indian settlers there. It is an indubitable proof that the Natal Administration has decided to implement the Agreement.

The most valuable and constructive part of the Capetown Agreement consists in the clauses dealing with education, sanitation, and other subjects calculated to raise the status of the Indians. There is no doubt that the progress of the Indian community will be rapid if they are given facilities for self-improvement and it is good that the Natal Administration has realised its duty towards its Indian subjects betimes.

Though great dissatisfaction prevails as regards the personnel of the Commission which is to be composed of the four members of the Natal Executive and two members of the Provincial Council, the redeeming features are that it will be assisted by an expert from India and that its sittings will be open to the public. It has quite recently been announced that the Government of India have deputed Dr. K. N. Kitobin of the Indian Educational Service, now on special duty in connection with the Agrarian University Scheme, to go to South Africa to investigate the problem of Indian education in Natal. The appointment of Miss Constance Gordon, the Kindergarten lecturer in the Teachers' College at Balsagod, to assist Mr. Kitobin is also welcomed as Miss Gordon is well-known in the Madras Presidency for her experience and intimate knowledge of children's education on which subject her books are full of useful information.

Nor have the Indians been idle. Mr. Sastri from the moment he set foot in South African soil has been toasting into the ears of his compatriots the lessons of truth and self-help. We learn that after a study of the conditions obtaining in South Africa Mr. Sastri has decided to start a college for the education of Indians in various capacities. Encouraging response to his proposal has come not only from Indians but also from the South African Government officials. Plans collected for this purpose amount to £15,000 and there is every reason to believe that the small balance of £8,000 required to start the scheme will soon be forthcoming. The College itself will be located in Natal where Indians are in larger numbers than in any other province. Yet another sign that Mr. Sastri's influence is being increasingly felt in the decision, cabled to the Imperial Indian Citizenship Association, of the Transvaal British Indian Association which, owing to differences on the Capetown Agreement, seceded from the Congress about a year ago, to sink their differences and rejoin the Congress.

The wisdom of their action in placing themselves under the leadership of Mr. Sastri in whose hands their interests are safe cannot but win the approbation of their community both in South Africa and in India.

While no pains are spared to make the Capetown Agreement a success, adverse influences are hard at work in bringing forth measures to ostracise the Indians from their legitimate sphere of work. An insidious Bill consolidating liquor laws, the underlying principle of which is protection to white labour, has been introduced in the Durban Parliament. The sum and substance of the Bill is that no Asiatic should be employed in any capacity in licensed premises which sell or deal in liquor and to expedite this nefarious object the employers have been asked to dispense with Asiatic and native labour within twelve months. This is a distinct move to exclude the Asiaties from a sphere in which a considerable number of Indians find employment as waiters, barmen, distillery employees, and general assistants. Once they are thrown out of employment, their occupation being a blind alley, the Indians will not be able to make up any other, and the only course left open to them will be repatriation. But this door is not open in this case as most of these Indians are Colonial-born. Sir Pherece Sethna in his interview on the Liquor Legislation published elsewhere expressed the same fear. The attempt at the reduction of Indians in the Union by "economic strangulation" as a Durban paper puts it, should at all costs be prevented. We are glad that Mr. Srinivasam Sastri has contradicted the mischievous rumour that found publicity in some papers here that he declined to interest himself in this question.

The Late Sir George Paddison: We deeply regret to record the death of Sir George Paddison, a sincere and true friend of India, whose services as the leader of the Deputation to South Africa were of inestimable value. In an interview, Mr. Andrews pays a warm tribute to Sir George Paddison's memory and adds that the psychological change in General Hartebeug and Dr. Malan in their attitude towards the Indians of South Africa was due to his genius as Ambassador.
I feel that while it is our duty to improve our status with respect to other communities domiciled along with us in British Colonies, we cannot afford to neglect the more serious task of keeping our own house in order. We are not immune in the Colonies, and though we clamour for our rights, we neglect some very fundamental duties.

I am sorry I have to say this, but it remains but too true. I do not say that our rights should depend on our duties. I merely want to point out that while we have some fundamental rights, we have also some fundamental duties. In East Africa the lot of the Indian Mehats-traders' clerk is a hard one. We bring our own labour to be employed in our printing presses and workshops. The workers are not protected by any labour laws worth mention.

Nairobi has just accepted a Shop Hour's Act. It remains to be seen whether that will afford any protection to the Indian Mehats. The Mehats are poor middle class men coming out to East Africa on contracts which are worse than indentures. They are promised housing, boarding and wages; but when they come here, they find that they have mere shadows of these. They are practically slaves. They start work at 8 a.m. in the morning and they are on duty till 9 p.m. in the evening. Lodging with their employers and dining from a common kitchen there is not a minute they are free from the supervision of their employers. Or if one is a bit senior Mehats have off hours for meals. But the Mehats in general has—is expected to have—no other interests in life. The East African Indian employer except a few honourable exceptions is a small capitalist with hardly any idea regarding modern labour, and generally engaged in intensive overtrading.

The Mammon hath him in the grip. He fights the European when he comes in the way of his making money. But he persecutes his own Mehats when they want but one hour off.

Is this not unjust and inhuman?

I have interviewed a lot of Mehats and other people of the employed class. Fear of the law-court and being sent out of work is the dominant feature of their life. I have asked some of them to form a 'sort of a union,' "No," they say "there would be blacklegs."

They are afraid of the senior Mehats turning out to be blacklegs. And so the grinding mill whirled on—the Mehats bending down at his desk over books of account from morn till night, their bodies and their minds cramped and distorted for ever.

If you abuse the white man in East Africa, you become at once popular; but if you point such things out—if you talk of your own equal and ways of living, your treatment of women, your exploiting your own workers, you are anathema to your own men. They simply do not want you.

To my mind, however, this is a greater duty than our fight with other races. Our women, our workers and our children, the prestige of our culture and our civilisation are matters of far greater importance everywhere. Our fight is weakened because our centre is weak. Can we ever fight with a hollow phalanx?

I have come across cases of actual terrorism. The Indian property-owners terrorise their tenants into not asking for any inquiry into the rise of rents. The Indian employer terrorises his employees into neither writing to the press nor making a move in the direction of getting easier conditions of life.

When I come to think of it, what a big problem this is—that of our Mehats, both in India and overseas!

Yes, we must occupy the same status in the colonies as other races. But we are in honour bound to give our employees the same privileges as those other races enjoy. To our sorrow and our shame, we are not prepared to do it.

We are eager to taste of the luxurious fruits of civilised life, but we are not prepared to bear the burdens of an enlightened age.

I put this to the leaders of the Indian labour movement.

PLIGHT OF INDIANS IN KENYA:

Mr. Shamshuddin lately a member of the Kenya Legislative Council, who recently visited Simia, in the course of an interview to an Associated Press representative expressed his disappointment with the result of his Simia visit where, he stated, there was no proper appreciation of the true position of East and Central Africa. He was surprised to find that Government did not keep themselves posted with the affairs of the Colonies in which a large number of Indians were settled. They had no agency by which they could keep themselves in touch with the overseas affairs. He admitted that the Government of India were sympathetic; but, with all their goodwill, they could do very little on account of ignorance and lack of courage.

Mr. SASTRI'S PREDICTION.

Asked as to what he thought of India's case and whether there was any hope for the demands of Indians being accepted, Mr. Shamshuddin struck a disappointing note saying that he was sure that India's was a lost cause. Mr. Sastri's warning given three years ago was coming true and he (Mr. Shamshuddin) urged on the Government of India, at least, to put the case of Tanganyika before the League of Nations.

LABOUR PROBLEMS.

Mr. Shamshuddin was then questioned about the latest developments with regard to Indian labour in the colony. He emphasised that the very existence of the European settlers in Kenya depended upon native labour. They had been clamouring for forced labour in different forms for the last two years but they had been unable to get the same owing to disinterested Government officials. In 1938, Lord Delamere, in his persistent demand for forced labour, took a party of Europeans to Government House who threw stones at the Governor's residence and challenged Sir Hayes Sadler to come out of the house. The party was dispersed and Lord Delamere was suspended from the membership of the Legislative Council. He had, however, triumphed after 50 years in practically getting all that he wanted. One of his demands was the exclusion of Indians from the colony with his practical dictatorship of the country. He would, in all probability, achieve this object in course of time when it would not be a difficult matter to obtain the appointment of a commission for the exclusion of Indians.

Sir Edward Griggs' Speech.
The interview then called Mr. Shamshuddin's attention to the recent speech of Sir Edward Griggs. He said that he could easily visualise Sir Edward being appointed Governor-General of the East African Federation with Lord Delamere as Premier or dictator, of the Colony. Sir Edward's speech, declared Mr. Shamshuddin, was a virtual advance announcement as to what the findings of the newly appointed Royal Commission were going to be. Sir Edward, who belonged to Liberia, before his appointment as the Governor of Kenya, had apparently discovered that the policy declared by his party in 1928 was fallacious, that they were wrong in regarding the trusteeship of the natives of Africa being the exclusive trust of the agents of His Majesty's Government. The new step was a complete reversal of the policy adopted in 1928. It meant the handing over of the native population and the Indian settlers of Kenya to what Sir Edward styled as the extraordinarily intelligent and virtuous class of a handful of European settlers. He appealed to the Indian Government and the leaders to take up the question of Indians overseas in East and Central Africa and Zanzibar.

INDIA EXCLUDED,

By Mr. C. F. Andrews.

The one ultimate aim of Lord Delamere and the European settlers of East Africa is to exclude Indians from all East African territories. For many years past, the Kenya settlers have had always before their eyes the aim of an East African Federation with Nairobi as its capital. With remarkable persistence they have gone forward step by step and now appear to be obtaining their goal. The Governors' Conference at Nairobi last year made an extremely important statement. The Governors concluded their issues with the following decision:

- "It was the general view that the Conference had been of great benefit to the territories participating in it and appreciation was expressed of the presence of the East African Commission (under Mr. Ormsby Gore) in proposing such a conference and of the Secretary of State's wishes in so promptly convening it."

- "The following conclusions were adopted:
  - That Conferences of Governors of all the Dependencies should be held at Nairobi.
  - That the Conference should meet annually in future or as circumstances permit and that the continuity of the work of consultation should be maintained by the establishment of a permanent secretariat.
  - That another meeting of the main conference would not be held during the present year unless some unforeseen question arises.
  - That smaller meetings of Governors should be arranged whenever occasion arises. Arrangements should be made and records should be kept by the conference secretariat.
  - That the conference should discuss the various territories so that he might discuss any outstanding questions and make arrangements for future conferences.
  - That the secretary to the conference should also act as secretary to the High Commissioner for the Kenya-Uganda Railway."

This appointment of a permanent office at Nairobi with a permanent secretary always touring among the different territories and acting as secretary to the High Commissioner makes a very large step towards ultimate federation.

It is clear that with Tanganyika as a mandate under the League of Nations, and Germany working on very jealously to see that nothing further is done to alienate Tanganyika to the Dominions of Great Britain, it is now possible to advance any step further towards federation in that direction. But what has been done, has been done with remarkable adroitness and in a way that means practical business. Though the name 'federation' may not yet be formally accepted, the actual thing is already there in outline, waiting to be filled in whenever an opportunity may arise.

In all these matters, from the East African Commission under Mr. Amery, to the establishment of the Conference of Governors at Nairobi and the organization of a permanent secretariat at Nairobi, the most striking thing as far as India is concerned is that it is excluded. The European non-officials are distinctly mentioned. Indeed they fill the whole picture except where the native problem is discussed without reference to them. Why in the world? The whole policy of European and native is considered at great length both in the Ormsby-Gore report and in the Governor's report at Nairobi. But not once is there any discussion of the position of the Indians either with reference to the Europeans or with regard to the natives.

When we examine Mr. Amery's speeches it is quite easy to see that this omission of India is deliberate. It is true that in the White Paper of 1927 the words 'immigrant communities' appear. These seem to imply that India also is included. But in Mr. Amery's own mind, as revealed in his speeches, this inclusion of India among the immigrant races is seen to be otiose. Mr. Amery's aim is entirely absorbed in the future of the white settlers.

I do not think it is too much even to say that the whole future of East Africa is being settled, determined and decided, as if there were only two factors, the Europeans and the Natives. Both reports assume that the Indian is as it were too far out of the picture, even if he has not fallen out already. Indeed, I would go so far as to suppose that it was already in these Governors' minds, if not also in the mind of Major Ormsby Gore, that the Indian was in time (and the sooner the better) to be removed from East Africa altogether, if not by compulsory legislation, yet by what in South Africa is called 'pressure.'

I cannot think that Sir Donald Cameron either agreed, or would agree, to any such future policy; but I am not certain about any of the other Governors present, especially after the recent action of the Governor in Council of Southern Rhodesia taken at the first moment that power was put into their hands to act. The entire prohibition of Indians in future from Southern Rhodesia is very ominous indeed. It would seem to me almost certain that Northern Rhodesia and Nyassa would be ready to pursure the same policy. And if once the movement of Indian exclusion gathers strength it will be difficult indeed to stop it. In fact, it will be impossible to do so, wherever a little body of white settlers is given responsible government. And yet it seems as though this has now become the established policy, in Africa, of the British Parliament.

FIGHTING NEW LIQUOR LEGISLATION.

A free press message from Durban states that consequent on the introduction of the new Liquor Bill in Parliament, the dissatisfied Indian community in the Union has asked the Transvaal British Indian Association to initiate a National Convention by forming a central body to carry on a campaign against the proposed measure which would throw a considerable number of Indians in this country out of employment. In this suggestion they are supported by influential leaders and associations and public bodies, who say it is essential to form an authoritative organisation to fight the new Liquor Bill. It is maintained that the grievances could never be redressed unless the present economic conditions improve which they say cannot happen under the Indo-Union Agreement. The position of Indians in the Union, they add, is growing worse every day. The British India Association, it is reported, made an overture to the Congress, but the latter, it is understood, did not favour the suggestion for forming a national convention. Should the efforts to form a national convention bear fruit, it is understood, plans are being laid to send a deputation to the Congress session to be held at Madras during December, and to His Excellency the Viceroy to explain the Indian situation in the Union. Mr. Jeewan-see has been working strenuously to educate the Indian public opinion on the subject of a national convention.

Sir P. C. Sethna Interviewed.

Interviewed by a representative of the Press of India in regard to the new Liquor Licensing Bills the Hon. Sir P. C. Sethna, who was a member of the Indian Delegation to the South African Round Table Conference, said:

"I recall that a Bill to prevent the employment of Asiatic waiters in hotels was considered while we were in South Africa in December last. According to the Press Cable, the Asiatics are not to be employed for manufacturing, bottling or selling liquor, or in any capacity connected with the manufacture or deal in liquor. It is an acknowledged fact that in the best of hotels in South Africa, they have Indian waiters, and that these men do their work remarkably well. In fact, we were told at one place by the proprietor of a hotel that it would be an evil day when hotels in South Africa are deprived of the services of Indian waiters. I will not be surprised if there be an opposition to the Bill from the hotel proprietors also, "I can quite understand the Hon. V, S. Srinivasasastri saying that he has no status to interfere in regard to the new Bill. At the same time, I would not be surprised to learn later that Mr. Sastrl had not been wanting in exerting his influence unofficially, with a view that the Bill might be withdrawn or considerably amended. The number of Indians who are serving as waiters in all parts of South Africa must be very large. They earn from 25 to 50 per month, and it will be a great hardship if they are deprived of the means of livelihood in a line in which they have, admittedly, given satisfaction to all concerned. It must be remembered that it will be very difficult for the men that may be displaced to earn their bread by the Bills to take to anything else profitably."

INDIANS IN AUSTRALIA.

A strong plea for the appointment of an Indian Agent or the Agent-General in Australia to protect the interests of Indians and to promote friendly intercourse between the two countries was made in an interview to the Associated Press by Dewas Babadur, T. Rangachar, on his return to Madras from his recent visit to Australia as India's representative at Canberra ceremonies. "In the first place, said Mr. Rangachar, I would like to convey to the people of my country that the messages of good will, I have been asked to convey both from the Government and the people of Australia at a dinner given by the Commonwealth Government to the Premiers of several States. At the time of recent financial adjustment, the prime minister for Commonwealth speaking on the toast in my honour with full concurrence of his colleagues and premiers of the States invited me to convey to the Government and the people of India their warm appreciation of the courtesy extended by India in sending a representative to the Round Table Conference and to assure the people of India of the good will of Australia and of her sympathy with India in her aspirations.

APPRECIATION OF INDIANS.

Lord Mayor and mayors of several States and town which I visited, expressed their high appreciation of the good character of Indians resident in their midst. Indians also whom I met in several State were generally contented and happy and expressed their appreciation of neighbourly treatment they were receiving at the hands of the people.

"I am bound to give prominence to two or three instances, where people went out of their way to express their good will to India, knowing I was passing through their stations."

The Mayor of Tawoomba in Queensland, of Yallari from Victoria and Quorn in South Australia gathered together with prominent citizens and dignitaries of those places at the railway stations not only to give me their good wishes but also to request me to convey their good will and sympathy to the people of this country. Continuing, Mr. T. Rangachar said "India was very little known in Australia, just as Australia was in this country. The essential that each country should send an Agent or the Agent-General to promote friendly intercourse for India. To send the Agent-General to Australia was of paramount importance in order to protect the interests of Indians in Australia, who though very small in number were very much scattered about and were comparatively ignorant. Indians number about two thousand in all these states. It is difficult for the Government to act together and consequently the presence of a well-informed agent will be of great help to these people. Almost every country has got a consul or a representative in Australia and I must say I am rather surprised that India has not got a representative there."

Proportion of Women for Malay: It is understood that the object of the visit of Mr. E. W. F. Gillman, Controller of Labour in Malaya to India at present was to confer with the Government of India on the sex-ratio clause of the Indian Emigration Acts as its period of exemption from operation in Malaya expires by the end of this month. According to this clause at least three out of every eight labour emigrants embarking for Malaya through the agency of the Malay Government's emigration depots in India must be females. It is understood that the Government of India have sanctioned exemption for a further period of six months from the operation of the clause in Malaya.

Status of Indians: An interesting side-light on the personal history of the recent Agreement regarding the status of Indians in South Africa is revealed in a letter received by the Bishop of Johannesburg from one of his clergy. Some time before the drafting of the Agreement, the South African Minister of the Interior, Dr. D. F. Malan, received from a lady a copy of 'The Chat of the Indian Road', by Dr. Stanley Jones, a book which describes the ready response of India to the appeal of Christianity when presented without Western preconceptions. The Minister said that the reading of this book had considerably influenced his outlook upon Indian affairs and the relations that should be in all justice and fairness between the two countries.

Repatriated Indians arrive in Madras: According to an Association Press message three hundred and forty repatriated Indians from South Africa landed in Madras on October 8th, from S. S. 'Umbria'. Mr. S. Naidu, leader of the repatriates, paid a generous and warm tribute to the invaluable services of the Rt. Hon'ble Sastrl who, Mr Naidu said, was doing his utmost for the betterment of his compatriots in South Africa. "There is one thing, however, the Government of India had better be reminded of," he said, "that is that the standard of living as much more was increased and consequently the remittances that Indian residents in the Union of South Africa."
THE PINJRPOLIE IN MADRAS.

Rao Bahadur R. Krishna, Rao Bhonsle, M. R. A. S., Hon. Secretary, the Pinjrapole, Madras, writes to the Hindu Miss Katherine Mayo in her book India has recorded the testimony of an Indian whose name is not given, in respect of the Pinjrapoles in India. Her Indian informant is alleged to have described the pinjrapole as "a lane or square full of animals' pens" and adds "religious sentiment puts the creatures there, but there it stops. They are much neglected and suffer torments through neglect. Rich merchants and bankers subscribe annually tons of money for their care, but the money all goes to graft and waste. The creatures in most of the asylums are far worse off than they were when they scavenged in the gutters for a living, with a happy chance of getting killed by passing cars. They are miserable, dying skeletons . . . ."

Miss Mayo also states that in Ahmedabad she visited a pinjrapole whose description after what had already been said about a similar institution, need not be insisted upon the reader's sensibilities. She hopes that every animal she saw in the Ahmedabad pinjrapole would be safely dealt with now.

There is a pinjrapole in Madras attached to the local Society for Prevention of Cruelty to animals and managed by a Committee with the Hon. Mr. Justice D. G. Weller, L.C.S., as Chairman, and gentlemen such as Dwan Bahadur Govindadas Chathurbhoojadas, Diwan Bahadur P. Paranjwaner Naidu, members. This pinjrapole is an asylum or hospital for the reception and treatment of all kinds of animals incapacitated for work on account of old age, infirmity or disease or accident. The animals are here taken care of until they die a natural death. Of course no pinjrapole is a place for young, strong and healthy animals and as such it is only old animals and animals as are no longer serviceable that are housed in a pinjrapole; but reports such as that of Miss Mayo may lead an unwary reader to conclude that all pinjrapoles in India are kept in the horrible and heart-rending condition that she describes. Had she however paid a visit to the Madras Pinjrapole, she would have found things quite the opposite of what she describes and might perhaps have been compelled to considerably modify her views.

Having much to do as Secretary with the management of the Madras Pinjrapole, I feel called upon with reference to this institution to contradict the statements made by Miss Mayo including the one to the effect that munificent gifts made by wealthy and philanthropic ladies and gentlemen were being wasted, if not misused. I want to warn the public not to be carried away by the dark picture which she has chosen to draw.

Ahimsa Paramodharmo (non-violence is the highest charity) is the principle which regulates the administration of the Madras Pinjrapole, the object of each and every one connected with it being to see that all dumb animals afforded shelter within its precincts are taken particular care of. It will interest the reader to know that in the local pinjrapole associated cows which were sent by their owners as barren, have with good care and proper treatment become healthy and even calved more than once. There are numerous instances to prove the great attention paid in our pinjrapole which is well worth a visit by every person who has love for animals in general and for cows in particular.

BROTHELS FOR BRITISH AND AMERICAN TROOPS.

Christina Woman's Petition.

The following has been received from the British Labour Council for Chinese Freedom, London:--

BROTHELS FOR TROOPS.

Shanghai, June 4.

Despite the fact that prostitution is an illegality in the settlement, three houses filled with Chinese girls, many not over fifteen years, have been opened near the race-course for British and American soldiers and sailors. These houses are guarded by British military police, and civilians are not admitted except by courtesy of the soldiers.

Shanghai, June 12.

The Kumintang women's department protest to Nanking against brothels established in the settlement by British military for British and American troops. The women point out that the brothels are filled with fifteen-year old Chinese slave girls. One of the women said it is humiliating and gruesome that Chinese womanhood should be trampled under the iron heel of foreign imperialism.

In the House of Commons on June 20, the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs said that the Majesty's Consul-General at Shanghai telegraphs that so far as he and the Shanghai municipal police have been able to ascertain, there is no foundation whatever for this report. (namely, that the Chinese are complaining).

Shanghai, June 21.

Regarding the denial by Mr. Locker Lampson in the House of Commons that fifteen-year old Chinese girls are employed by brothels for British soldiers in the settlement, it is pointed out here that houses operating openly are guarded by British military police and frequented by British soldiers. There is every evidence that the brothels are carried on officially despite the fact that prostitution is an illegality in the settlement.

The Sino-American newspaper China Courier has carried on exposure of the brothels and there have been many protests from Chinese against brothels without our denial from any quarter in the China Courier or the British official organ the North China Daily News.

Wear are the Fruits?

What truth there is in these statements may readily be guessed from the Lancer, the prominent medical journal, which in its issue of June 18 is an article on China from its own correspondent in Shanghai, says:

"Since the arrival of the British troops there have been many cases of influenza and pneumonia, but the question of venereal disease has been the most clamant one, and in spite of every possible precaution the number of those affected has steadily increased. . . . Numbers of prostitutes from north and south have flocked to Shanghai most of them being Chinese (60 per cent), Russians (30 per cent), and Japanese (5 per cent). The majority of the brothels are in the French concession and in Chinese districts bordering on municipal roads. The high venereal rate has given the Command much concer, and no stone is left unturmed in the efforts to lower it."

Raising Marriagable Age: A Free Press message says: LearnedSanjaya of Benares at a meeting supported Mr. Haribhush Sarada's Bill prohibiting marriage of girls below twelve and of boys below fifteen referred to a select committee by the Legislative Assembly. Speakers giving quotations from Sankar Digbijaya, "Parasar Srimati" and "Mirraa Sundari" explained that the Bill was in no way against the Hindu dharma shatra.
NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Temperance in Ceylon: Ceylon temperance workers are denouncing the protection afforded by the Government of Ceylon to the foreign liquor trade. The Government conceives the right of the people to say that country liquor shall not be sold in their areas but denies the right of the people to say the same thing about foreign liquor trade that it be under the local option law. If necessary to choose between foreign liquor and country liquor the choice of country liquor should ordinarily be made for it has much less alcoholic content than is found in foreign liquors, writes the "Temperance Clip-sheet" of Lucknow. But public opinion in Ceylon has done well to close the country liquor shops and should now be aroused and organised to demand and the closing of the more dangerous trade in foreign liquors.

The Late Dr. Bhandarkar: Respectful tributes were paid to the memory of the late (Dr.) Sir Ramkrishna Bhandarkar on the 17th instant when his ashes were enshrined in a "stupa" built in the compound of the Devadasee Sangh; Sambhaji, Poona, before a large gathering. In conducting the service Mr. D.G. Vaidya drew attention to the three noteworthy features of the late Dr. Bhandarkar's character—namely, steadfast adherence to truth, utmost faith in the great destiny of man and prayerful life. The speaker hoped that the great example set by the venerable sage would be followed in an increasing measure by his countrymen. The casket containing the ashes was then placed inside the stupa by Sir Ramakrishna's son, Dr. D.R. Bhandarkar, and the dome was fixed. Mr. B.S. Kamat made a speech paying his tribute to the memory of the great departed soul.

Middle Class Unemployment: Reviewing the report of the committee on middle class unemployment the Madras Government recognise that the problem of middle class unemployment cannot be solved at once but there is in fact no single panacea for the evil. The Governor in Council agrees with the committee that the two main causes at the root of the problem prevailing was a misconception of the object of education and the habit of regarding agricultural occupation as beneath the dignity of an educated man. These can best be eradicated by the propagation of sounder ideas as to the economic structure of all civilised societies. The Government express the hope that the leading part be taken by non-official enterprise in such a propaganda. The chief measures advocated by the committee in the direction of educational reform are already under examination and the Government will take into immediate consideration each of the specific suggestions put forward by the committee.

Bikaner Prohibit Origanised Proselytism: We take the following particulars from the Guardian of Calcutta: Bikaner State has recently passed an Act entitled Bikaner Freedom of Religion Act. The purpose of the Act is said to be "that the religious freedom and toleration hitherto enjoyed by the subjects of the Bikaner State should be properly safeguarded from undue outside interference" and "that certain rights to property of persons who are lawfully converted should be protected." Every person desiring to become a convert has to present himself before the Registrar and sign an affidavit and the Registrar may order an investigation into the matter. If the Registrar is satisfied that there has been no undue influence, fraud, intimidation or coercion; he may register such conversion on payment of a fee which shall not exceed one rupee. Wholesale conversions undertaken as an organised endeavour by any association or by an individual are declared void. Anyone adopting another religion without filing affidavit or before the expiry of fifteen days from the filing of an affidavit or who fails to furnish information of his conversion within three months from the date thereof is liable to a fine of Rs. 500, and anyone attempting to convert another or abetting the conversion by undue influence is liable to a fine of Rs. 1,000 and rigorous imprisonment up to three years. The Act provides that in the event of a person's property after his conversion and to that extent, as also in its recognition of the possibility of conversion, it is a step in the right direction.

Liquor Shop at Juhu: A meeting of the Juhu Excise Advisory Committee was held on recently at the bungalow of Mr. A. Barney, Santa Cruz. Mr. Gandhi, Deputy Collector in the Development Department, presiding. The following proposition was discussed and passed: That the foreign liquor shop at Juhu be abolished altogether as in the opinion of the Committee it retards the healthy development of Juhu and also because the residents and landowners of the place have strongly protested against it and have decided to send a deputation to the government to lodge its protest in this respect." The resolution was proposed by Mr. Barney, seconded by Dr. D.A. De Monte and supported by Mr. Creado and Mr. Vinayak. The two officials, the chairman and the Mamlatdar, voted against it. The Committee of the landlords of Juhu have convened an urgent meeting to consider what steps should be taken to mark their disapproval of the conduct of the Chairman, the Mamlatdar and other officials who have recommended the continuance of the shop in defiance of the wishes of the people of Juhu, the major portion of which is still undeveloped and inaccessible except by trespass through the land of private owners. The Hon. Mr. Pradhan and several members of the Bombay Legislative Council whom the Committee have invited to see the undeveloped condition of Juhu for themselves and to ascertain for themselves the fact that the shop does not fulfil any demands of the residents and owners, are to visit Juhu next month.

The Reform of Devadasees: A correspondent writes to the Swarajya, Madras: A public meeting was held yesterday in the Government Girls' School, Kala- hashti, to consider the pressing question of the reform of Devadasees and the bill of Dr. Mathulakshmi Ammal to amend the Hindu Religious Endowments Act. Rajah P. Venkataranga Rayaingar Varu President, Taluk Board, Chandragiri, presiding. The meeting was largely attended. Mr. Naghabushanam of Guntur addressed the meeting and the president explained at length the miserable position of the Devadases and said that it was the bounden duty of the country to improve their lot. The following resolutions were unanimously passed, 1. This meeting of the public of Kala hashti heartily congratulates Dr. Mathulakshmi Ammal for the interest she is evincing in the Devadases and wish her bill all success. 2. This meeting offers its congratulations an affidavit, and the Registrar may order an investigation into the matter. If the Registrar is satisfied that there has been no undue influence, fraud, intimidation or coercion; he may register such conversion on payment of a fee which shall not exceed one rupee. Wholesale conversions undertaken as an organised endeavour by any association or by an individual are declared void. Anyone adopting another religion without filing affidavit or before the expiry of fifteen days from the filing of an affidavit or who fails to furnish information of his conversion within three months from the date thereof is liable to a fine of Rs. 500, and anyone attempting to convert another or abetting the conversion by undue influence is liable to a fine of Rs. 1,000 and rigorous imprisonment up to three years. This meeting offers its congratulations to Mr. P. Anjaneyulu, M. L. C., for the notice of motion he has given to the Legislative Council to prohibit the institution of Devadasis in the temples. This meeting prays the Government to accept the amendment of Dr. Muthuswamy Anmal and relieve the country of its long-standing social evil. This meeting requests all the members of the Legislative Council to pass Dr. Muthuswamy Anmal's amendment unamendably and remove thereby the obstacles against the Devadasis getting themselves married. This meeting requests all the Local Boards to accept the above amendment and also to recommend to the Government the same as to relieve the country from this social evil. This meeting resolves to avoid nauch parties on marriage and other occasions.

Hindu Women Gain Right to Property:

At the Dacca Young Men's Conference Miss Sakuntala Chowdhury moved a resolution urging necessary alteration in the Hindu Law of “Dayabhag” which denies the Hindu women a legal right in their paternal property. The resolution evoked a heated debate in which Messrs. Jogesh Gupta and Narendra Narayan Chakravarty, for the motion and Mr. Jogendra Guba, Thakurta and three other speakers, against the motion, made impressive speeches. The President, Mrs. Sarasvati Devi Choudhuri, herself made a fervent appeal before voting to the delegates present on behalf of the Hindu women but votes being taken the resolution was declared lost by a small majority. Miss Sakuntala Chowdhury in moving the resolution said among other things that it was difficult to say when this law of “Dayabhag” was enacted but it was sure that the appearance of certain new conditions in society necessitated the enactment of this law which had in the course of time undergone some changes as it was not now exactly what it had been before. So it was necessary that it should be altered now to suit the new social conditions of the day, like all other social laws and customs. In tracing the history of the law Miss Choudhury said that it was perhaps codified during the time when the charge of maintenance of the Hindu women had been transferred like moveable property from the father to the husband and from the husband later on to the sons in the three successive stages of their life. Such a dependent life was, in her opinion, possible to some extent on the old joint family system; but those days were no more. This helplessness and life-long dependency of the Hindu women was one of the principal causes of the regrettable dowry system which had been eating into the vitals of the Hindu Society and that this “Dayabhag” law was mainly responsible for the inhuman oppression to which girls-wives were sometimes subjected. In conclusion Miss Choudhury made a fervent appeal on behalf of the Dacca Chhatri-Sangha to all the women of Bengal that they might make a united stand to have this unjust law changed according to the present circumstances recognising the legal right of the females in the property of the father as well as of the husband.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for considering the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

The Statutory Reforms Commission: The most exciting topic of the week is the sporadic, more or less well-informed, regarding the composition of the Statutory Commission to take stock of the working of the Montague-Chelmsford reforms and to make recommendations as to the stage of advancing India towards self-government. The British Government, it would appear, has decided to appoint only members of the British Parliament as members of the Commission. There is only one Indian in the House of Commons but he is a communist of a rather aggressive type, and his passport to India moreover was cancelled some time back by the British Foreign Office. He is, therefore, the last man to be thought of for the Commission. There is one Indian member in the House of Lords, Lord Sinha, and his politics is as the poles asunder from Mr. Sankaradas's. But Lord Sinha is Under Secretary of State for India, piloted the Government of India Act in the House of Lords, and was subsequently appointed as the first Indian Governor of a Province. But he resigned the Governorship of Bihar and Orissa on the score of health, and is now a Member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in London. He thus comes under the ban against persons with previous connection with the reforms being nominated on the Commission. Indians, therefore, will find no place on the Commission. But there is a strong feeling—stronger among Indian Liberals than among Congressmen—that a Commission which thus deliberately boycotts Indians should itself be boycotted by Indians, and the Viceroy has been interviewing a number of representative persons to find out how their collaboration can be secured for the Commission without their actually sitting on it. The interviews are not yet over, but it is fairly certain that the Congress leaders—Mahatma Gandhi, Mr. Subramania Iyengar, Dr. Ambedkar who have met the Viceroy have not let his Excellency in doubt about their attitude towards this curious Commission. That, we believe, is the attitude of the majority of Liberals also. To send out a Commission of Enquiry to India without Indians, at this stage of political development, is nothing less than an affront to Indian nationality.

Inter-Communal Harmony: The All India Congress Committee met nearly a whole week's sitting has passed certain resolutions on the differences between Hindus and Mussalmans. The most important and practical of these is one appointing a touring Committee to go round the country and persuade the two communities to settle their differences without coming to blows. The other resolutions are, in our opinion, more or less platitudinous, but not on that account useless. After all, much of work has passed into platitudes, but people still fail to act up to them. The Viceroy and re-iteration of platitudes, therefore, is a very useful line of public activity, and moreover it is within the capacity of the average man. In respect of some of the outstanding differences such as proselytism, music before mosques, and cow-killing, the All-India Congress Committee accorded the widest liberty for every one, with a few qualifications the non-observance of which should be referred to arbitration. The principle underlying this policy is said to be that people will not do what they are unquestionably free to do. It is quite true that "Dont's" often stimulate the desire to do what is forbidden, but it does not follow that men will cease to do "do" wrong things if they are not put on the prohibited list. For example, we doubt if there will be appreciably fewer murders or thefts if people were told they were free to kill or steal, or fewer crimes if the Penal Code was totally repudiated. It is a wise warning of the ancient prophet that we should not dwell on watch-words (or catch phrases) overmuch. What we should much wish is the institution of a careful inquiry by a few competent enquirers as to the real causes which lead to Hindu-Muslim antagonism. One other remark which we may permit ourselves on this subject is that the Hindu-Muslim question is not a problem by itself but is part of the much larger problem of the relation of the several communities of India to each other. There was a stage in the Non-Co-operation movement, when Hindu-Muslim animosity became a menace to smaller minorities. The risk of a repetition of this can be avoided only by laying down the broad lines on which inter-communal harmony can be secured for all communities, and for the smallest most of all.

The Suppression of Devadasis: Dr. Motilal Kasturba Reddi, Vice-President of the Madras Legislative Council, has given notice of her intention to bring in a Bill to abolish the institution of devadasis. This reform is being inaugurated at a great public meeting in Madras in the early nineties, and a result of agitation on the part of the society of associating nautch parties with domestic and social functions has been condemned. The reformers in those days were greeted with epithets such as vandals, kill-joys, philistines.
and even eunuchs, but their propaganda has been attended with a considerable measure of success. Only in the case of temples have they not been able to make much headway. Even here however, Mysore has given an excellent lead to which a Muthulakshmi refers in her paper published last week. The method adopted by the Mysore Government is the best way of dealing with the evil custom. The wages and perquisites enjoyed by the present devadasis should be left to them, but their services in the temples should no longer be requisitioned. When these die, no successors should be appointed to take their places. The endowments which provide for their allowances, should be utilized, with the sanction of the proper authorities, for helping primarily girls of these castes to be educated and settle down in life, and generally for advancing women's education and social reforms relating to women. The problem is not so formidable as it appears on the surface. Investigation has shown that, owing to the fact that promiscuity is often associated with sterility, the recruitment to the devadasi class is largely by purchase. This "can be made illegal, if it is not already so. Lord Sydenham, when he was Governor of Bombay, took an active interest in this reform, and a considerable amount of information was collected at his instance about the practice. Our recollection is that Government was advised that the dedication of minor girls can be dealt with, without any special legislation, and we think that such dedications have in this reform, and a considerable amount of in this reform, and a considerable amount of interest is that Government can be dealt with the atrocities on white women and the plea of the protection of the Goan women. The signs for the reform are auspicious, and Dr. Muthulakshmi's Bill is not a day too early.

A Girls' High School for Kolhapur: We are glad that the Maharaja of Kolhapur is interesting himself in women's education. Apparently there are no institutions in the State, where girls could prosecute their studies after the completion of the primary course. This has been a great drawback in the progress of female education in the State. The late Maharaja's idea of converting the present Ahilyabai Girls' School into a High School did not materialize during his life-time. It is understood that the present Maharaja has sanctioned a proposal to open a High School for girls with arrangements for a hostel. It is only the settled conviction on the part of the Maharaja of the benefits of women's education that has induced his Highness to sanction the scheme. In time, we hope, there will be a number of Girls' High Schools adorning the State. Under the regime of the present Maharaja and his able Dewan, Rao Bahadur Lathe, the State has set itself seriously to bring about the amelioration of the lot of its people, socially, economically and politically. It is only a question of time for Kolhapur to rank among the progressive states of India.

Abduction of Women in Bengal: For some time the cases of abduction of Hindu women in Bengal have been seriously on the increase. Shrimati Sunati Devi writing in the "Women's Cause" gives us an idea of the enormity of the evil when she says "cases are almost daily reported of abduction, assaults and forced conversions, to which a number of the people of the Government has been indifferent. Recently Mysore has given an excellent lead to which a Muthulakshmi refers in her paper published last week. The method adopted by the Mysore Government is the best way of dealing with the evil custom. The wages and perquisites enjoyed by the present devadasis should be left to them, but their services in the temples should no longer be requisitioned. When these die, no successors should be appointed to take their places. The endowments which provide for their allowances, should be utilized, with the sanction of the proper authorities, for helping primarily girls of these castes to be educated and settle down in life, and generally for advancing women's education and social reforms relating to women. The problem is not so formidable as it appears on the surface. Investigation has shown that, owing to the fact that promiscuity is often associated with sterility, the recruitment to the devadasi class is largely by purchase. This "can be made illegal, if it is not already so. Lord Sydenham, when he was Governor of Bombay, took an active interest in this reform, and a considerable amount of information was collected at his instance about the practice. The signs for the reform are auspicious, and Dr. Muthulakshmi's Bill is not a day too early.

Muslim Education in U. P.: While criticising the remarks of the president of the U. P. Muslim Educational Conference held at Farrukhabad the Leader shows in effect that he had indulged in the fallacy of figures in making out that Hindu education was very much backward when the census figures reveal the level of literacy among them to be higher than the general level for the province. Our constant knocking on these lines has paid off. We have fought for preferential treatment in education set up by Hafr Hidayat Husain and particularly remarks: "And yet he based his claim for special consideration for Muslims on a comparison of their educational condition with that of Kayasthas, Agarwalas and Brahmanas, individually. The high caste Hindus as well as Mahomedans already enjoy more than a fair share of everything. If any discrimination by the State for the advancement of any particular community can be justified and is called for, it can only be for the depressed classes and the so-called untouchables. Hafr Hidayat Husain concluded his address by telling the Hindus that 'your profession to advance the country's cause will be measured by your attitude to Muslim education.' It can be said with greater truth that the profession of Muslim gentlemen, who wish 'the voice of patriotism to eventually prevail,' to advance the country's cause will be measured by their attitude towards the education of the depressed classes. Will they allow these really backward classes to take full advantage of the special facilities that the State can afford to provide for the education of backward classes or will they continue their agitation for special facilities for themselves at the expense of these deserving but voiceless millions?"

146 THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER. [November
Mr. HAR BILAS SARDAS BILL—III.

We discussed in the two previous articles the provisions of Mr. Har Bilas Sardas's Child Marriage Prevention Bill and incidently those of Mr. Jairamdas Doul诗词的To be introduced in the Bombay Legislative Council. We pointed out that the proposal to make invalid marriages contracted below the prescribed age limit in Mr. Sardas's Bill was to a very large extent nullified by the subsequent provision for licensing such marriages on the mere affidavit of the parents or guardians. At the same time we recognised that this incongruity was inevitable so long as the penalty prescribed for child marriages was invalidity. We suggested therefore that child marriages should not be declared invalid but should, as in Mr. Doul诗词的's Bill, be visited with penalties on the parents or guardians who bring about such marriages. We deprecated the inclusion of imprisonment as a punishment for the violation of this particular law and strongly suggested that time, according to the means of the parties, was a proper penalty for the offence. At the same time we thought that a law for the prevention of child-marriages should be an All-India legislation and not merely a provincial one. We also suggested on the analogy of the Muslim law that the bride and the bridegroom in a child marriage should be given the right of terminating it when they come of age. This would be a very effective though indirect way of preventing marriages of girls of tender age to elderly persons, one of the causing abuses which are of frequent occurrence and which leads to many domestic tragedies.

So far our comments have not touched the question of making the law applicable exclusively to Hindus. In general principle we have strong objections to introduce, except when absolutely unavoidable, communal distinctions into legislation. It is an essential of nationalism that there should be common laws before which all citizens are equal. If child marriage is an evil among Hindus it is no less an evil among other communities who are addicted to them. The Census of India Report for 1921 says—"It child marriage) is not exclusively a Hindu custom and of the Hindus who are most addicted to the practice it is among the lower rather than among the higher castes that the custom is most rigidly observed." The following figures are of interest in this connection. According to the last census, the proportions of girls married were as follows among one thousand women under the age of ten in each of the communities: Hindus, 125; Mussalmans, 58; Christians, 18; Tribal religions, 31. It will thus be seen that the evil of child marriage affects Mussalmans, Christians and tribal religionists also, though less than the Hindus. The differences however in this respect are much less than the differences between the various provinces. Thus out of every one thousand women the number of married under ten years of age, is 40 in Bengal, 90 in Bombay, 9 in Madras, 22 in Punjab, in the United Provinces 56, in Baroda state, notwithstanding the marriage legislation, it was 64, in Mysore 8 where, also there has been a marriage act in force. Two surprising facts emerge out of these figures. The first is that the Bombay Presidency has the largest proportion of child wives in British India, and the other is that such marriages seem to have a territorial rather than a communal incidence. So far as the first inference is concerned a close analysis of the Bombay figures is necessary in order to localise where the heaviest incidence lies. As regards the second inference it follows that the proportion of child wives in a population is much more dependent on the province than on the community to which it belongs. Thus in Bombay which has the highest proportion of child marriages the Mohammedan proportion is as much higher as the Hindu proportion than the All-India proportions. Among Bombay Mussalmans there are 43 girls under 10 married in every thousand, 6 of them being widows under 10; as regards Christians the Superintendent remarks—"The number of juvenile marriages among Christians would surprise Foreign readers but it has always to be remembered that the low-caste converts to Christianity in India do not change their customs when they change their religions. The number of child-widows among Christians is higher than among Mussalmans and the number under 10 years of age is almost the same as among the Hindus." We have said enough to show that child marriage is not primarily a communal evil as is generally supposed but is largely affected by territorial conditions.

The need for all India legislation, therefore, embracing all territories and all communities becomes clear. We are not sure if it would be possible to enlarge the scope of Mr. Sardas's Bill in the Assembly so as to make it applicable to all communities. The Bill has been introduced as a Hindu Bill and leave was obtained for its introduction as a Hindu Bill. If it cannot be so expanded, it would be desirable for another member to bring in a new Bill altogether on different lines. We would suggest the following as matters that should be incorporated in the Bill. The minimum age for marriage for girls should be 14. There is no need to fix a minimum for boys, as the natural tendency is to postpone their marriages, but if necessary it may be put at 18 or even 20. The marriage should be a monogamous one, that is to say the husband will be committing bigamy if he marries a second wife while his first one is alive. Every marriage under the law should be registered in the same way as births and deaths are registered. It will be much easier to register marriages than births or deaths because marriages in the vast majority of cases are accompanied by demonstrations which originally, perhaps, were intended as a sort of public occasion of the banes. The registration should be a simple civil affair and the usual social or religious ceremonies will in no way be interfered with. The Act should apply to the whole of India and to all communities, but it may be left to the local governments to introduce it and extend it in their provinces whenever they think the time is ripe for it, but in any case within the next five years. These suggestions are thrown out as a mere outline of what the Bill should be. The drafting of the Bill should be undertaken by a representative committee of Indian lawyers and reformers, and should not be left to a single individual. The next Indian National Social Conference may appoint the Committee.

LEST WE FORGET.

(By Dr. Clifford Mansbridge, Ph. D.)

"If we do not destroy War, War will destroy us."

—Lord Bryce.

Nine years ago this week, the war that was to end war was halted. For four long years slaughter, destruction and violence had had their day, but with the signing of the armistice the reign of terror was ended. The clouds of depression that had settled so heavily upon mankind were lifted, and once again men breathed the pure, free air of hope. The war was over. The word spread quickly, the word of peace and of the good future that was to come. Great numbers of people, as if moved by some powerful impulse, rushed to the assistance of those who were in need. The world was ripe for it, as the average man can see, the world is ready for reformers, men, who will give themselves freely to the ideal for which men died.

But denunciation is not enough. Positive steps must be taken toward war's prevention. Many men recognizing the solidarity of the human race, are placing their faith in the League of Nations. Mr. Page (op. cit.) lists five ways in which the League seeks to avoid war: (1) By referring disputes to conciliation or arbitration by a third party; (2) by providing for a delay in beginning hostilities, pending a recommendation or decision; (3) by second and third attempts at arbitration when necessary; (4) by providing for an economic boycott against any nation which refuses to yield to the judgment of the arbitrator; (5) by resorting to common military action, as a last resort, against a recalcitrant nation. A growing number of people, however, are opposed to the recognition of the principle of force as a means of settling disputes, and have committed themselves to a programme looking toward the outlawry of war.

The adoption of outlawry call upon the several nations to abolish war as an institution for the settlement of international disputes, and to declare war between nations to be a public crime under the law of nations. The right of defense against actual invasion is recognized. A judicial substitute for war is to be created, and all nations shall agree to abide by and be bound by and in good faith to carry out the order, judgments, decrees, and decisions, of such court. The fundamental proposition of the outlawry scheme is its insistence that war must be outlawed before the court is given affirmative jurisdiction over the disputes between the nations.

The world court, provided for in the Covenant of the League of Nation, is a forward step in the direction of peace. But the Court has no obligatory jurisdiction. It can only deal with those cases in which all parties concerned are willing to abide by its decisions. Its functions therefore are very limited, and must be extended if the Court is really to assume the position of importance that it deserves.

The Washington Conference and the Locarno Treaties were hopeful signs, but the recent breakdown of the Naval Limitations Parley at Genoa has resulted in discouragement, though not in a feeling of hopelessness. A beginning has been made. It now remains for us to conserve the accomplished results and to press on to new ones. Political solutions have their place, but law can never serve as a substitute for good-will. The real forces that determine the destiny of mankind are moral and spiritual. It is only as men purge their own hearts of greed and self-seeking that we can venture to hope for a peaceful world. Armistice Day, sacred to the memory of our soldier dead, calls us to thought and to consecration. The call of the hour is for men who will live, who will give themselves freely to the ideal for which men died.
POSITION OF WOMEN IN AFRICA.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Reference the letter of Mr. Ozr in your last Overseas Supplement. I hope you will publish the following:

The letter in question is full of unfounded statements and gross exaggeration of the social conditions obtaining out here. I am as keen a social reformer, both by tradition and inclination, as any one else, and while I agree that there is room for improvement, it is nevertheless true, that Indian ladies residing in Kenya and other parts of East Africa, enjoy a measure of freedom which is not even thought of by her sisters in India.

I believe these unfounded statements as are published in the letter in question do more harm than good to the cause of social reform and hence the denial.

Nairobi, Kenya Colony,

IMPOSSIBLE INDIA.

The following review of 'Mother India' from the pen of Mr. S. K. Ratcliffe appeared in the September number of the New Republic of New York.

Two years ago, when I read Katherine Mayo's propagandist volume on the Philippines, it seemed to me certain that she would go next to India and produce a book enforcing a conclusion precisely similar to the one reiterated in 'The Isles of Pear.' The thesis of that vigorous manifesto, it will be remembered, is that the United States must keep its governing hand upon the archipelago, for if it did not, the Filipinos would be skinned alive by their own landlords, lawyers, usurers. Miss Mayo, I felt sure, would see in British India a land upon which the same moral was stamped in enormous characters. And if she has not done this, or has done it only incidentally, the reason is plain. She was so completely overwhelmed by what she saw and was told about the Hindu social system and about one special part of that system, that she has set it all down in hot anger, and, accordingly, has been able to give relatively little attention to all the rest of the immense Indian problem, 'Mother India' is charged with high explosive. It has caused a greater stir than any book on India that has appeared in the present generation, and it has been received in certain quarters with a welcome that is likely to have far-reaching consequences. The essential thing, therefore, since the book is doing its doubtful work, is that it should be examined objectively and estimated in relation to the immediate practical problem confronting the British authorities and the leaders of Indian public life.

By this time the substance and character of 'Mother India' have become so widely known that there is no necessity for an English reviewer to attempt a summary of its arguments and conclusions. Of its thirty short chapters (which, by the way, are thrown together with more complete disregard of continuity than I have remarked in almost any contemporary book), about two-thirds are devoted to an indictment of the social and domestic structure of Hindustan, an indictment falling mainly under the four heads, Miss Mayo, while drawing a political inference that is unmistakable...

affirms that the woes of India have nothing to do with government or, as Mahatma Gandhi insists, with the dominance of an alien power. They are inherent, she says, in the Hindu system. Horrible as it is, it creates the slave mentality that is the West sees to be the ineluctable heritage of the Indian peoples. Miss Mayo states: "The whole pyramid of the Indian's woes, material and spiritual . . . rests upon a rock-bottom physical base, this base is simply, his manner of getting into the world and his sex-life thenceforward." And again: "The British administration of India, be it good, bad, indifferent, has nothing whatever to do with the conditions"—inertia, helplessness, lack of staying powers, of sustaining loyalties, and the rest. "All are traits that truly characterize the Indian, not only of today but of long-past history. All, furthermore, will continue to characterize him in increasing degree until he admits his causes and with his own two hands uproots them."

There is the central point of "Mother India" and the reader has to determine, if he can, how far it is, or can be, proved. Hindustan is in a degree unmentionable to the modern American, a system based upon the dominance of the male. That dominance is embodied in the remarkable structure of caste, which, in its rigidity and elaboration, has no parallel in any other social order known among men. It is associated with the system of child marriage which, although not found everywhere in India, must be counted a general and terrible fact of the country. It has further, through its age-long religious absorption in the idea of procreation, brought about an exaggeration of the sexual life, thus producing evils that are recognized and attacked by the modernist organizations of India and by all the most important public men, Gandhi, of course, being in the lead. In the world of Hindu orthodoxy, girls are married at puberty; motherhood follows with tragic sweetness, and the custom involves a high percentage of physical and mental suffering, and not seldom, torture. Miss Mayo puts fury into her descriptions and she reinforces them with medical testimony of a kind that is usually omitted, for prudish reasons, from books intended for the general reader. Even so, however, I do not understand why, for the worst of them, she should go back to 1891. To her chapters dealing with child marriage, motherhood and widowhood, she adds others, of a hair-raising ferocity, on the treatment of the untouchable classes by the privileged castes, and the shocking barbarities often denounced by Mr. Gandhi in prophetic wrath, that are inflicted in India upon the cow, which, according to Hindu tradition, is the most sacred of beasts. A great part of Miss Mayo's facts cannot be challenged; and yet the picture she has drawn is profoundly untrue. It is a libel upon a unique civilization and a people of extraordinary virtue, patience and spiritual quality. I cannot here attempt to track her through the vivid maze of her assertions. It must suffice for me to deal with a few characteristic illustrations.

Miss Mayo writes as though the horrors of filth and superstition surrounding childbirth were peculiar to Hindu society. Suppose that one were to make a realistic picture of maternity in any other Asiatic country, on that matter, as has often been done, in the slum cities of Europe and the United States. Would any of Miss Mayo's inferences apply? She cites examples in detail of Indian male sexuality. It would be impossible, I think to produce anything of the kind more lasting. But Miss Mayo cannot be unaware that the records of all protective societies in Europe and America contain incidents which, fact for fact, are as horrible as these. She asserts that the majority of Hindu men are, through indulgence and perversion, impotent at twenty-five. The sufficient reply to that astonishing accusation would seem to be that, if it were anything like half true, the figures of population under the Pax Britannica would not cause any alarm to the government of India. In treating of the Untouchables and the so-called criminal tribes she implies that such agencies as the Salvation Army stand virtually alone in their remedial efforts.

The truth is that, long before the rise of their great champion, Gandhi, a powerful section of Indian reformers laboured as earnestly for women as for men. Miss Mayo has provided withstood the test of time. She implies that such agencies as the Salvation Army stand virtually alone in their remedial efforts. ...
HINDUISM AND SOUTH-EAST ASIA.

In a special interview given to the Associated Press by the poet Rabindranath Tagore, who is now in Calcutta, expressed his deep satisfaction that one of the journeys he had long intended to take in order to explore the cultural developments of India in the further East had now been accomplished. He said that what he had anticipated had even been surpassed. A cultural work had been begun which needed closely following up, for it disclosed an unexplored world of intimate inner relationships between India and the South East of Asia. These new experiences might be distinguished between Java on the one hand and Siam on the other.

Java and Bali were full of interest to him because they still represented not only in their architectural ruins but also in the common life of the people, the artistic genius of India transplanted to another soil. It was true that to-day this cultural foundation in Java was overlaid and in ruins, parallel to the monumental ruins of Borobudur and Prambanan which had also been covered over with weeds during the lapse of centuries and needed the patient exploration of the Dutch archaeologists before their true value could be known.

RENAISCEI\N HINDUISM.

About the Buddhist influence which was so all-powerful at Borobudur, the poet said that in Java Buddhism had been quickly overcome by renaissance Hinduism; Buddhism was, as it were, a sudden eruption into the two islands, having a great beginning but no completion. Its temperament was possibly too coldly philosophical. But the islanders were essentially artistic. Art was their great gift to mankind. They found in the Hindu revival a warmth of aesthetic emotion that did not reach them through Buddhism. Borobudur was the work of a monarch. But the Hindu ruins of Prambanan, close at hand, represented the religion of the people and as such had more profound artistic appeal.

Borobudur, said the Poet, is isolated, solitary, massive. It is a kind of "tour-de-force" in idealism, having a beauty of its own, especially in the sculptured galleries, wonderfully preserved. But as an external object Borobudur is disappointing. Even when viewed more closely, the multiplication of one single form of the Buddha, without any variation, shows exclusively the over-whelming power of a single idea which fails to attain variety. On the other hand, the Hindu temple of Prambanan has all the beauty of unity in multiplicity. It is an artistic creation composed of converging ideas and forms.

LIVING BUDDHISM IN SIAM.

The poet went on to add with enthusiasm that in Siam he met with those who truly represented Buddhist culture in living manner. He saw the bishops, monks, novices, monasteries. The Buddhist learning in Siam was not an isolated fragment, but built up into the very life of the people.

The Siamese people, said Tagore, are a people fortunate enough to be homogeneous in race, language, and religion. There is therefore a simplicity about them, which has given them both flexibility and strength. What attracted them in the Buddhist faith was its high moral character. Buddhism, as seen in Siam, has not that indulgence in emotionalism run riot which has too often left its mark upon Puranic Hinduism. I hope that this noble form of Buddhism still preserved in its scriptures, will not be lost. The Siamese nation is even now engaged in publishing the Tripitaka in nearly 50 volumes in Pali written in Siamese characters, as a national memorial. This great work is being helped forward by the gifts of the poor people as well as by the royal house. Some of those whom I met belonging to the royal house had been educated in Oxford but had kept their independence of thought and self-expression and were the real leaders of the Siamese nation.

THE LURE OF RAMAYANA.

"Nowhere," the poet said, "have I seen the artistic expression of Indian thought and idea so much in evidence as in the two islands, especially in Bali. One discovery was this that the Mahabharata and Ramayana are the universal background against which the whole drama of life is carried on. Even the words in everyday use are taken from these two great epics. They are the dominating and determining factors, more powerful than the current phases of religion. Even in India itself these epics have not so exclusively left their impression upon the life of the people as in Java and Bali. A stream of influence continually flows from them. They are illustrated before the people daily by shadow pictures, music, dances, art. Thus India is still in the ascendant, not so much through her philosophy, as through her poetry. This vital growth, which has been buffeted by a thousand years of storm and change, reveals the eternal freshness of these epics and makes them a living heritage of mankind."

One of the most interesting facts which the poet disclosed was the use of the Mahabharata and Ramayana (especially the Ramayana) in Siam as well as Java, as a living part of the people's art and literature. The Ramayana had gained an immense popularity because of its characters and incidents of an enabling moral character. The poet had found very important differences in the story of the epics. These were not corruptions, but rather different versions. Merchants had come from different ports of India with manuscripts of the epics representing a variety of texts.

Bishop Westcott's Condemnation: A special cable from Cape Town to the Imperial Indian Citizenship Association states: At the Maritzburg Rotary Club, Bishop Foss Westcott strongly criticised Miss Mayo's "Mother India." He said, "It would grieve me more than I can say if that book were read and believed. Miss Mayo was motivated by opposition to the buttowal of further political power on Indians."
NATURALIZED HINDU PRIESTS AND JAPANESE CULTURE.

Mr. M. Taba writes in the Young East, Japan:—

The sight-seeing trip of foreigners to Japan will never be complete, if they fail to see Nara, a small town in the Province of Yamato, which is famous for its great and ancient Buddhist temple Todaji containing a great statue of Buddha. Almost untouched by the influence of Western civilization, the town is an art gallery in itself, overburdened as it is, with celebrated Buddhist temples and ancient objects of art of Tang in the so-called Nara period, which, naturally, brought forth foreign pilgrims to the town for a couple of days, you will never fail to visualize the glory that was Nara, the birth-place of the Buddhist civilization of ancient Japan.

The flower of the Buddhist civilization which bloomed in full in the so-called Nara Period, is the outgrowth of happy admixture of the Chinese Tang civilization and Hindu culture, both of which were introduced to Japan before that era. Strictly speaking, the Chinese civilization which attained its highest point in the Tang period can hardly be said to be the creation of the Chinese alone. With the agrarianism of the Tang dynasty, webs of communication were extended in all directions, which, naturally, brought forth foreign culture and prosperity to the Chinese Capital. To make matters going more smooth for foreigners, the Tang Emperors, who resorted to the Tang door policy, were liberal and tolerant towards foreign devils and exotic culture and allowed them to enter the civil service of the Chinese court, according to their merits and abilities. Under such circumstances, it was neither a strange case nor special favour to the Japanese that such men as Abeno-Nakamoro and Fuwbara-no-Selika Japanese official students sent to China, were appointed Chinese civil officials by the Tang Emperors. Besides, there were pretty many foreign devils i.e., Hindoos, Turcomen, Persians and even Arabians who became office-bearers of the Chinese court. And, on the part of the Chinese, many a Chinese priest was ordered to Turkestan and India to pursue their religious researches, while in exchange many priests of Turkestan and India were sent to the court of the Tang for the purpose of carrying out religious propaganda and translating the works on Buddhism.

Such being the case, it is not an idle speculation to observe that the Chinese civilization is the outgrowth of the happy admixture of the Chinese civilization and other foreign culture such as originated in India and other countries of Islam.

In consequence, we can well imagine that the Japanese priests or students sent to China in those early days came directly or indirectly under the influence of the exotic culture of India and other Mohammedan countries; and in this connection, it is especially noteworthy that the foreign culture of India, Persia and Turkestan was introduced into Japan directly by those foreign devils who arrived in Japan across the China Sea. A certain An Ju-Pao, a native of Boothara, who is credited to be one of the disciples of the Chinese high priest Chien Chen came to Japan in the reign of Kakan Tenno, 754 A. D. Establishing himself at Nara, An Ju-Pao was by Imperial order, engaged in the work of constructing the Tohodaji temple in which task he completely succeeded, and in recognition of his meritorious service, he was appointed a vice-bishop in later-years and finally, a 'baptist' of Kwanmu Tenno, Emperor Kwanmu Crown Prince and other members of the Imperial Family. There were two more non-Chinese priests who came from Turkestan. One of them, who was named Chum Pu-li was a native of Kun-Lun, being known as a skillful sculptor, and he made a wooden statue of "Miroku" or "Maitreya" at the auditorium and that of "Yakushi," or medical god, at the Golden Hall of the Tohodaji temple. The other was Shan Tsang who was a native priest of Indo-China, though of his life and career in this country very little is known.

Of all these non-Chinese priests, the most noted one was Bodhi-sena, a Brahmin priest who arrived in Japan and was naturalized in the reign of Shomu Tenno, 736 A. D., when the Japanese vice-envoy to China, Nakatomo-Nashiro, returned to the court of the Mikado, accompanied by Tao Hsuam, a Chinese priest. Beside him, also came to this country a Persian named Li-Mi-i who was probably a medical practitioner.

Bodhi-sena first came to China via the southern sea with the object of associating with the then living Buddha, Wei Chu Pu-sa (Manjushri) of Wu-tai-shan, the Mecca of Chinese priests, and then he crossed the high waters of China to Japan, perhaps at the request of the Japanese envoys or priests to the court of the Tang Emperors. It is believed that he was inclined himself to see the flower of Buddha's gospel flourishing in the strange land of the gods—Japan.

The Indian priest was allowed to live at the Daianji temple by Imperial order. Due to his great knowledge and high character, he was soon appointed an abbot and became the chief priest on the occasion of the dedication ceremony of the great statue of Buddha which was dedicated to the Todaji temple. He died at the age of 57 in the reign of Jinnia Tenno, 769 A. D.

There was another non-Chinese priest named Fuh Che, a native of Indo-China, then called Champas, who came to Japan accompanied by Bodhi-sena and was naturalized.

As to the religious and other cultural influence of the Brahmin priest Bodhi-sena and Fuh Che of Indo-China on the Japanese in those days, it cannot be too much emphasized from the standpoint of the national culture of this country.

In the first place, it should be pointed out that the development of the Kegon sect in the Nara period owed Bodhi-sena a great deal and the development of the Kegon sect had much to do with the construction of the great statue of Buddha at the Todaji temple, which was and still is a great wonder and inspiration to the Japanese at large. Secondly, we should remember that Bodhi-sena and Fuh Che were the first foreigners who introduced Sanskrit into Japan.

As Bodhi-sena was a master incantator, he is believed to have propagated the sacred message of Buddha. He also brought with him to this country a Buddhist book of about one hundred pages in Sanskrit.

Fuh Che too brought over many books in Sanskrit and is said to have been a man deeply conversant with Siddham. It was, however, only after the Heian Period, about the year 806 A. D. that the learning of...
Siddham developed in this country among Buddhist priests and scholars when such noted Japanese priests as Kukai, Yenmin and Yenchin brought over many Sanskrit books to this country from China. Nevertheless, we can safely say that the first seed of the learning of Siddham which proved a great help to the development of the phonetic science and pronunciations of Buddhist words in this country had been already sown by Bodhi-sena and Fuh Che in the Nara Period.

It is indeed a matter of great interest to Japanese scholars to see today a Sanskrit book written by no other personage than Shoumu Tengo, dedicated to the Todaiji Temple.

Last, but not least, it is much noticeable that the music of Indo-China was introduced into Japan by Fuh Che himself. According to the biographical story of Bodhi-China, which was handed down to the Daianji temple, Fuh Che mastered the three kinds of music, namely, Bossatsu Baio and Batto of the music of Indo-China, while he was still in his native country, and he taught the music to his Japanese disciples at the Daianji temple. On the grand occasion of the unveiling ceremony of the great statue of Buddha, the music was dedicated to the statue of Buddha and was greatly appreciated by the Mikado.

Since that time, the music has become the favourite piece of the Daianji temple and was often performed on the occasion of extending the national ovation to the Chinese and Korean envoys who were accredited to the Mikado’s court.

The Place of Rammohun Roy in the History of Modern India. II.

Mr. Ramananda Chatterji, writes in the Indian Messenger, Calcutta:

That Rammohun Roy had not failed to observe the evil effects of caste will appear from the following extract from one of his letters—

"I agree with you that in point of view the Hindus are not worse than the generality of Christians in Europe and America; but I regret to say that the present system of religion adhered to by the Hindus is not well calculated to promote their political interest. The distinction of castes, introducing innumerable divisions and sub-divisions among them, has entirely deprived them of patriotic feeling, and the multitude of religious rites and ceremonies and the laws of purification have totally disqualified them from undertaking any difficult enterprises. . . . . I think, necessary, that some change should take place in their religion at least for the sake of their political advantage and social comfort."

No. VIII of his Sambad Kaumudi, too, prints the plea of a philanthropist (probably himself) who observing the misery caused by prejudices of caste, urges the Hindus not to debar themselves thereby from mechanical pursuits, but to cultivate "such arts as would tend to their comfort, happiness and independence." By crossing the ocean, dining with Europeans, and in other ways, the Raja to a great extent broke through the unreasonable and injurious restrictions imposed by caste. Why he did not or could not do so entirely, is not known to a certainty. But from his conduct in other matters we should hesitate to ascribe to him any motives of cowardice or self-interest. He published with a Bengali translation the first chapter of a Sanskrit work against caste, named Vajraswasthi, by Mitryunjayacharya.

Among the causes of the political subjection of India, he mentions caste in the following passage taken from The Brahmanical Magazine—

"We have been subject to such insults for about nine centuries, and the cause of such degradation has been our excess in civilization and abstinence from the slaughter even of animals; as well as our division into castes, which has been the source of want of unity among us."

While civilization produces culture, refinement and sociability, its excess enervates and makes men too mild.

In recent years serious means have been suggested for bringing about the fusion of castes and sub-castes and sects by facilitating inter-marriage among them. The means proposed by Rammohun Roy was the adoption of the Saiva form of marriage described in the following Sloka of the Mahanirvana Tantra:

"There is no discrimination of age and caste or race in the Saiva marriage. As enjoined by Siva, one should marry a woman who has no husband and who is not sajinda, that is, who is not within the prohibited degrees of marriage."

Rammohun contended that orthodox Hindus ought to consider Saiva marriages as valid as Vaidik marriages. Had his views prevailed, widow-marriage, inter-caste and inter-religious marriage, and post-puberty marriage after the attainment of maturity would all have been considered valid according to Hindu usage.

In most things Raja Rammohun Roy was in advance of his age, and rose above the influence of his surroundings. He was the pioneer in many reform movements.

It is well known that Rammohun Roy himself founded and helped others in founding schools. He took a prominent part in the great educational controversy between the "Orientalists" and the "Anglicists" and sided with the latter. But for his opposition the clamour of the former for the exclusive pursuit of Oriental studies would most probably have prevailed. His Letter on English Education to Lord Amherst is a remarkable convincing production. For the direct and indirect beneficial results of Western education we are indebted to Raja Rammohun Roy as much as to Lord Macaulay, Lord William Bentinck, David Hare, &c.

Lawyers of eminence, such as the late Sir Gurudas Banerji have declared that the legal writings of the Raja, such as his "Brief Remarks on Ancient Female Rights," "The Rights of Hindus over Ancestral Property according to the Law of Bengal," would be credit to jurists of the highest standing.

To the public Rammohun Roy is best known as a religious and social reformer. To many he is also known as a litterateur and educationist. But he is not so well known as a political reformer and agitator. A brief account of his politics may not, therefore, be out of place in this address.
POONA DEPRESSED CLASSES MISSION ANNIVERSARY.

In its Abhyashram Hall the 25th anniversary of the Depressed Classes Mission Society of India was recently celebrated by the Poona Branch [Dr. V. M. Nimbalkar, editor Din Bandhu, presiding, Mr K. G. Patade, Secretary of the Poona Branch, while briefly narrating a report of the Society's work during the last 21 years, said that the Depressed Classes Mission was founded on 23-10-1906 by Mr. V. R. Shinde, with the first school opened at Purat, Bombay, on the same day at the hands of the late Justice Sir N. G. Chandavarkar, the Poona Branch was formed on 23-6-1908 and Mission works at Hubli, Nagpur, Madras, Bangalore and other places were soon started with the main object of removing the stain of untouchability imposed upon the one sixth of the Hindu population by age-long custom. The Mission committee was able to organise 10 All-India sessions of the Anti-Uncleashability Conference, in which leaders of all thoughts and positions took part. The Mission was mainly instrumental for the present, awakening among the Depressed Classes themselves. It is conducting at present 3 hostel industrial classes and a large number of Primary schools for educational advancement of the untouchables. With a view to elevate them socially several inter-caste dinners and social meetings were arranged. As represented by the Mission the several Provincial Governments, have been nominating people from Depressed classes to the local Legislative Councillors and other Local Bodies.

FUTURE OF THE MISSION.

He further said that the awakened Depressed classes realise the great pioneering work done for their uplift by the D. C. Mission and they will still need the helping hand of the Mission for a decade more. The future policy was wisely laid down by Mr. Shinde for the mission at Poona viz. to train workers from the untouchables and give them responsible posts in the working of the Mission should be immediately followed by the Mission Committees in Bombay, Nagpur and other places, and in the long run the Mission work be completely entrusted to competent trained workers from the Depressed classes under a committee in which the members from Depressed classes should always form a majority.

Dr. Nimbalkar's concluding remarks:

The chairman on the occasion thanked the Committee for selecting him to preside at this important function and paid a glowing tribute to the selfless work by the D. C. M. missionaries under the very able lead of its founder Mr. Shinde. He also complimented Mr. Patade and Mr. Galakwadi on their achievement and hoped that under their supervision the Poona Branch of the Mission would flourish abundantly.

With the usual vote of thanks to the chair and distribution of flowers a group-photograph was taken of the meeting and sweets were served to the school children.

Hindus in Paris: A Reuters telegram from Paris says: Two hundred Indians, without distinction of caste or creed, attended the Hindu New Year dinner organised by the Indian Commercial Association of Paris.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Indian Cinematograph Committee: It is announced that the Indian Cinematograph Committee at present in Bombay, will meet in the Town Hall, Bombay, from the 7th to the 16th November, and in the Committee Room in the Secretariat on the 17th and 18th.

A. Mysore Lady's Success: Among the 14 women students who received medical degrees at Glasgow, it was stated that an Indian lady cut a picturesque figure with diamonds on her ears and nose and was dressed in flowing robes and that she was given an ovation by the students. The Mysore Patriot gives us the information that Miss Malini Lake hails from Mysore. She is the daughter of Kandasam Ramaswamy Iyengar, a Zamindar of Mysore, and is the sister of Mr. K. R. Srivivas Iyengar, Bar-at-law. She went to England in 1921 and studied in the Glasgow University and secured the M. B. and C.H.B. degree. She had a distinguished career in the University. She is shortly expected to return and place her services at the disposal of the Madras public.

Children's Home: Dr. Besant writes to the Associated Press a touching account of the visit she with some of her co-workers paid yesterday to the Children's Home conducted by the Bombay Children's Aid Society, where in her words, little waifs and strays found in Bombay streets or picked up for some childish naughtiness are carried off to the first home that they have ever known. Little girls rescued from brothels, often infected with disease, little boys without a home, just beginning a life that would lead them into petty misdeeds stealing food since they were hungry like older people, and must eat to live. Dr. Besant concludes with an appeal: 'Will not Bombay be father to these rescued lives, make it possible for them to learn a trade and earn an honest living?'

Japanese Translation of Mahabharata: We take the following from the Young East, Japan: A great literary work has been undertaken by a well-known Buddhist scholar of Japan. The work mentioned is a translation into Japanese of Mahabharata, which is the most lengthy epic in the world and is indispensable key to true understanding of the civilization and culture of ancient India. It will be undertaken by the Rev. Sogen Yamakami, Dean of Rokazawa University established by the Sodo Sect. Professor Yamakami went to India some twenty years ago and stayed there for some years, during which he studied Sanskrit and gave lectures on Buddhism at the University of Calcutta. To assist him in his work, the Keimei Kai, a foundation established for the encouragement and promotion of art and literature, has decided to present him S500 yen.

Opening of Gang Canal: An Associated Press message says: The various religious services which marked the opening of the Gang Canal made the occasion a happy blend of the East and the West. Before his Excellency the Viceroy set the water of the canal flowing by lowering the sluice, the Brahmins chanted Vedic hymns. After the Viceroy had performed the opening ceremony, his Highness the Maharaja offered worship with devotion and in right orthodox style to Varuna, the great God who dwelt in the rain, the river and the seas, praying that he might bless the canal and

Sir Sivakami Aiyar on the Statutory Commission.

NOTES

NAIK GIRLS' PROTECTION BILL: It is a hopeful sign of the times that the evil of prostitution is receiving the condemnation that it deserves and the provinces are endeavouring to put down this practice by means of legislation. In Madras it was left to Dr. Muthalakshmi Reddi to take the initiative. Her resolution for abolition of Devadasis was adopted without a dissentient voice by the local Legislative Council. The Home Member's motion to refer the Naik Girls' Protection Bill to a select committee was carried unanimously in the current session of the United Provinces Legislative Council. The demand for this much needed social reform originally came from the non-official members. It was Lal Bahadur Thakur Mashal Singh's resolution at a previous session, recommending that the Government should take steps to put an end to the selling, buying and bringing up of minor girls for immoral purposes with special reference to the districts of Nainital, Almora and Garhwal, that has started the ball rolling. The Governor-General appointed a committee to go into the question, which favoured legislation in this matter. The speeches made on this occasion reveal that the volume of opinion is in favour of moral and social uplift of the community given up to this vice. It would appear that a memorial signed by 77 Naini girls of Nainital has been sent to all the members. The memorialists' statement that their "profession" had the sanction of religion and was buttressed by custom and tradition was hotly repudiated by the speakers. Mr. A. F. Dube urged that the select committee should not be carried away by pseudo-ideas of religion and of custom which were advanced by interested parties to cover up their own trade of prostitution, while Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant considered it sacrilege to blaspheous to associate the name of religion with such practices. Legislation alone will not be sufficient to eradicate this social evil; once the woman and child are rescued they must be absorbed into the society. The memorialists have no doubt this in mind when they suggest that Hindu young men should come forward and be prepared to marry them. As traditional conditions of art and music their anxiety to foster them is natural and their demand that music and other institutions should be opened for their benefit is legitimate. We much regret that the suggestion of Mr. Dosanjh that some of these ladies should be co-opted on the select committee was laughed out in the Council. At least, we hope, their practical suggestions will not be lost sight of and effect will be given to them when the Bill becomes law.

SIR SIVAKAMI AIYAR ON THE STATUTORY COMMISSION: Too late for reproduction in other parts of this week's issue, Sir Sivakami Aiyar's opinion on the Statutory Commission is by far the most important expressed by an Indian Liberal statesman of the very first rank, and we give it herewith in full and find room for it in our editorial Column: "I admire the ability, the skill and the rhetoric of the Viceroy's appeal and the apparent desire to placate and persuade the Indian public. His attempt to justify the exclusion of Indians is utterly unconvincing. The argument that a Commission, composed of members of Parliament alone with a majority of Tories would be an unbiased body free from pre-conceived notions, that it would be the only body whose report Parliament would be prepared to accept without mental reservation and that the conclusions of a mixed Commission with an Indian element, even after passing through the filter of Joint Select Committee of Parliament, could not be appraised by Parliament owing to its unfamiliarity with Indian psychology are complimentary alike to Indians nor to Parliament. For Indians would be prepared to believe that the members of Parliament are all absolutely uninterested in the maintenance of statius quo in India.

THE EXCLUSION OF INDIANS: The exclusion of Indians by the Statutory Commission, from the Committees, is a studied insult to the Indian public and very ill-advised. From the point of view of the Tory Government, they could have appointed a mixed Commission and still secured the desired majority of opinion without this affront to India. The only reason I can imagine for this procedure is that they wish to emphasise as a matter of principle, lest Indians should forget it for the moment, that India has no right to share in the determination of her own destiny and to impress upon the Indian public that notwithstanding the camouflage of her admission to the League of Nations and the Imperial Conference she must not dilute herself into the belief that she is anything but a supplicant at the door of Britain. My inference is supported by the statement of the Premier in the House of Commons that the question of the inclusion of Indians was a broad question of principle. Opportunities for hearing to be accorded, as in the case of Litigants before Courts, cannot possibly be regarded as a compensation for the denial of membership in the Commission. As a matter of principle and in assertion of our self-respect I am in favour of complete boycott of the Statutory Commission. Boycott would lose its efficacy if it were sectional. Nothing would be lost by such a complete boycott even if the result were to put off the Commission or the next step in the Reforms by a few years. Attempts will be made to play off one community against another. There is no use in Associations and Leagues passing resolutions for boycott by these bodies as such but permitting individual members to appear before the Commission. Some influential and even large minorities of opinion may be unable to resist the temptation of scoring an advantage over the rival committees by trial ex parte; but if a great majority of people at least stand aloof we shall have done something to vindicate our self-respect. The terms of reference are as non-committal as I expected. There is nothing to show that any questions about the organisation of the army or the Central Government will be allowed to be raised or considered. The Vicereoy’s appeal to Indians that ‘it is through disagreement and clash of judgment that it is given to us ultimately to know of truth’ might have been more appropriately addressed to the Imperial Government.

Spiritual Values of Family Life: The disintegrating forces at work undermining the influences of the family in America are a matter of grave concern to social workers. A recent number of the Social Welfare of Toronto contains some excellent addresses on this subject delivered at a conference of social workers held at Buffalo in October. In a remarkably thoughtful address on the ‘Spiritual Values of Family Life,’ the Rev. E. H. Toye has spoken of the most important social and religious institution in the world. To us in India for whom the sanctity of the family and the dependence of the community on family life are fundamental there is nothing new in this idea. While enumerating the spiritual values, Mr. Toye shrewdly remarks that no substitute has yet been found for the right kind of a home for the development of the moral virtues. The part played by the family in the formation of character is beautifully set out in the following words:

“We need constantly to remind ourselves that character never simply happens. It depends upon conditions, just as truly as does the harvest. You do not inherit it. You cannot buy it nor steal it. It does not come by some miracle of grace in the sense of some strange intervention of the Divine. Character is grown it is built up. The best soil that we have yet discovered for the growing of character is the right kind of a home. Here is a little group of old and young, mature and immature, strong and weak, living together in mutual love. Every day affords opportunities for the exercise of patience, helpfulness, unselfishness, courtesy and sacrifice. All these moral qualities which form the basis of all growth in moral character. Not that we undertake to follow in any mechanical fashion a programme which has been devised, but spontaneously in the ordinary contacts and ordinary relations in a society in which love holds sway we learn those virtues which are the priceless treasures of life. Some one has said ‘character is not taught so much as it is caught.’ It is not regulated without but it grows from within.

We hope to reprint the whole address in an early issue.

The Abolition of Caste Restrictions: At the Jat Pat Tokar Conference held under the presidency of Kumar Rananjaya Singh, M.L.A., many spiritual attacks on caste were made by the president that nowhere and in no other region the position of newly converted families was discussed and it was pointed out that they formed, as it were, one more caste as the other Aryans did not inter marry them and unable to resist resolutions were adopted urging the delegates to encourage inter-caste marriages and to establish an Arya Hindu Marriage Bureau which would arrange marriages between converts and Hindu families. At this stage some over-seas reformers moved that only those who translated the inter-marriage resolutions into action in their own families should be admitted to the membership of the Sansaj. The President and some of the office-bearers were surprised at the sudden turn that matters had taken and were not prepared to accept so revolutionary a step at such short notice. They regarded the amendment as a sentimental outburst. Disorder however, was averred by Bhai Parmanand who moved another amendment that the question be referred to the main Congress for decision. We are not surprised that a large number of the delegates drew back from so drastic a measure. The movers of the resolution seem either to hold that inter-racial is the only indication of one’s goodwill or to believe that converts to Hinduism should be equally held to the fold by matrimonial ties. We quite agree that there should be no caste restrictions but we certainly do not advocate that men and women should be compelled to marry outside their caste any more than inside or at all. After all it is only the substitution of one restriction for another.

Evil effects of the Purdah: It is not far wrong to ascribe the general backwardness of the women to purdah. In the course of an editorial note drawing particular attention to the slow rate of progress in women’s affairs, Mr. L. K. M. M. observes: ‘Among the obstacles in the way of more satisfactory progress in this direction, by no means the least serious is the prevalence of the purdah system. Its rigour varies from province to province and consequently the percentage of literacy among women also diverges widely, e.g., between Bengal, Bombay and Madras on the one hand and the United Provinces, the Punjab and the Central Provinces, on the other. In India, any custom which becomes old and deep-rooted begins to be looked upon as part of religion. It is, therefore, hardly surprising to see large classes of people regard purdah as something which their religion enjoins upon them. There is, however, a general belief among Hindu reformers that the purdah is foreign to Hindu civilization and culture and has acquired its stronghold on Hindu society due to its contact with the Muslim culture. The belief is based on a study of our past history, and the fact that even now purdah is more universal and is observed with great rigour in parts of the country where purdah is more under Muslim influence, while those parts where Muslim domination could not penetrate to the same extent are comparatively free from it, lends further support to it.” Nawab Zulquarad Jung Bahadur in his address to the Hyderabad Educational Conference observed that the purdah has nothing to do with the doctrines of Islam. It is certainly an anomaly in those who profess that religion which lays stress on the protection of the rights and honour of women and accords them an equal position with the other sex. The only explanation that can be given to is that the true spirit of Islam has been obliterated by the strait adherence by its followers to its letter. Our contemporary rightly says that it is high time that Hindus as well as Muslims realised the true nature of a custom which in the name of religion keeps two thirds of our population steeped in ignorance. It points to the examples of Egypt and Turkey, and concludes that the enlightened Muslims in this country should undertake educative propaganda against a pernicious custom which has been injuring the cause of both physical and mental health.
THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM.

It was part of the scheme of the Reforms introduced in 1919 that their working should be examined at the end of ten years by a Royal Commission and that the next stage of constitutional advance should be determined on the results of such examination. Indians have been urging for the last three or four years that this investigation should be accelerated, as some of the Reforms, notably Diarchy in the provinces, have been found to be unworkable. Government have put off the request from time to time on the plea that sufficient experience has not been gained of the working of the Reforms. The ten year period is very short ending, only one year more remaining to complete it. The British Government have decided to appoint the Commission at once and the names of the members were announced on Tuesday. They are Sir John Simon, Chairman, Viscount Burnham, Lord Strathcona, the Hon. Edward Cadogan, the Right Hon. Stephen Walsh, the Right Hon. George Lane-Fox and Major R. C. Attlee. Sir John Simon is an eminent lawyer and has held office as Solicitor-General and Attorney-General in the Liberal Government under Mr. Asquith. Mr. A. G. Gardiner includes him in his little book of sketches entitled "Pillars of Society". He says: "Sir John Simon is a philosophic Radical. His thought proceeds on strictly academic lines. In the clear realm of his mind cause and effect follow as the night the day, and political doctrine is an exact science which admits of no question." This formal, unadventurous thinking, he adds, gives stability to politics. But as the object of the Royal Commission is to relate movement with stability, it is not easy to say how Sir John will shape his course as Chairman of the Royal Commission. The other members do not come up to his level. Lord Burnham is the proprietor of the Daily Telegraph but otherwise an undistinguished figure in British politics. There is no particular reason for his being put upon the Commission. Lord Strathcona is of Scotch Canadian origin. His father who died not long ago at a ripe old age has been described as "Canada in swallow tails." Mr Gardiner credits the late Lord Strathcona with the saying that he would be rather a very good man than a very rich man. The late Lord Strathcona was a rich man and seems to have been a good man. That, we suppose, may be counted as a qualification for his son to sit on the Indian Commission. Lords Burnham and Strathcona are, of course, members of the House of Lords, while Sir John Simon and the other four gentlemen are members of the House of Commons. Mr. Cadogan is the younger son of the Earl of that name, and is the author of two books, "Matters of Modern History" and "Life of Cavour," the great Italian statesman. The history of Italian Unification is full of lessons for India, and Mr. Cadogan's study of Count Cavour's principles and methods may be of much assistance to him in the discharge of his duties on the Royal Commission. Mr. Lane-Fox is a brother-in-law of Lord Irwin, and is said to be very fond of hunting, cricket, shooting and fishing. We suppose he is expected to bring a healthy, open-air outlook to the business of the Commission. These four gentlemen belong to the Conservative Party. Mr. Walsh and Major Attlee are Labourites and both held office in Mr. Ramsay Macdonald's short-lived Ministry as Secretary and Under Secretary of State for War respectively. The Major is the author of two books, "The Social Worker," and "The Town Councillor." On the whole the British personnel of the Commission is representative of a fairly high average, having regard to the fact that all the members had to be also members of Parliament, and that front-bench men of the first rank cannot be permitted to confine their attention to Indian affairs for the best part of two years, especially when a General Election is not far off.

The exclusion of Indian representatives from the membership of the Commission is the outstanding feature of its composition. It has created deep disappointment in India and has been strongly criticized in a large and influential section of the British Press. With the object of reconciling Indian opinion to the exclusion, the Viceroy of India invited about a score of leading men of all parties to personal interviews at Delhi just previous to the announcement of the appointment of the Commission. His Excellency has also issued a personal statement alongside of the announcement explaining to the Indian public the reasons for not including men of their nationality in the Commission, stating the arrangements whereby Indian opinion is proposed to be allowed to operate on the Commission, appealing to the public to appreciate the reasons and the arrangements, and to co-operate with the Commission in the enquiry, trusting in the good intentions of the British Parliament and people. His Excellency's statement has on the whole failed to carry conviction, and the strongest and the most effective criticisms of it have emanated from Indian Liberals who, faced opposition and unpopularity, in agreeing to work the reforms inspite of the Non-co-operative movement. Sir Tej Bahadur Sapra who was the Law Member of the Viceroy's Executive Council during Lord Reading's time, has taken the lead in condemning the exclusion of Indians from the Commission. Sir Chimanlal Sethawad, who was a member of the Bombay Government at about the same time, has subjected the Viceroy's statements to a cold analysis and has shown that the assumptions made therein are belied by the facts of experience during recent years. Dewan Bahadur Bangacharya, who represented the Government of India at the inauguration last year of Canberra, the new Australian capital, and who is now in Bombay presiding over a Government Committee to enquire into the cinematograph industry, thinks that there can be no heart in any Nationalist in trying to co-operate with the Commission. Sir Abdur Rahim, who was for a term a member of the Government of Bengal, and is now the leader of the Mofussil Opposition in the Legislative Council, describes the omission to include Indians as a violation of law, and says that the most conservative of the British officials has been appointed. Sir Mahomed Shafi, who succeeded Sir Tej Bahadur as Law Member of the Viceroy's Executive Council, is equally emphatic in his criticism. Sir Phiroze Jeeja, a member of the Council of State and a distinguished Parsee businessman, and Sir Persaught Damodas Thakurdas, condemn the boycott of Indians in severe terms. The weightiest criticism of all is that of Sir Sivaswami Aiyar who has served in the highest provincial offices open to Indians, has represented Madras in the Legislative Assembly and India at League of Nations, with distinction and who is known for his cautious and conservative temperament as much as for his careful study of the subjects on which he cares to express an opinion. Sir Sivaswami's opinion comes last, but its effect on the public mind will be to kill any little hope that might have lingered in it of making the present scheme of the Royal Commission acceptable to it.

The Indian gentlemen to whose opinions we have referred so far, are men who have held high office in the administration or have served in important public bodies with such distinction as to merit recognition from Government. Curiously enough, these are the men from whom the strongest protests have come so far, while the Congress party which is composed of Non-Co-operationists, Swarajists and Revolutionists, have, if anything, been less emphatic in their protests. This is to be explained by the fact that the Non-Co-operationists and Swarajists consider the exclusion of Indians to be a slap in the face of the Liberals who by consenting to work the Reforms which they tried to boycott, were responsible for breaking down the Non-Co-operation movement. The position of the Revolutionists is somewhat difficult because they have broken away from Non-Co-operation and persistent obstruction, they have, unlike the Liberals, no definite policy of their own, and have to adjust their responses from time to time to the particular moves or methods of government. We are now witnessing the curious spectacle of the President-elect of the National Congress appealing to the Viceroy to request the British Government to hold their hands, while the most conservative among Indian Liberal Statesmen is boldly proclaiming that only a complete boycott of the commission can vindicate the self-respect of the Indian people.

There are vague talk of modifying the procedure of the Commission so as to make it more acceptable to Indians, but we doubt if that will be enough to restore confidence in the Commission. There is no doubt that a great blunder has been committed, there is reason to believe, against the advice of the Viceroy on the spot, and it will tax the best of British Statesmanship to retrieve it without the demand to have adequate and direct Indian representation on the Commission.

SOCIAL REFORM MOVEMENT IN KERALA.

(BY MR. C. N. RAMAKRISHNAN.)

The Congress Province of Kerala comprises British Malabar and the Native States of Cochin and Travancore. The inhabitants of these three administrative units speak the same language, Malayalam and their habits and customs are similar. Though different from one another in political administration, these three units are governed by one code of social laws. Therefore the social reform movement affects Kerala as a whole. In this article I shall make an attempt to trace the progress of the movement and indicate its present position. Kerala is notorious for its rigidities, cruelties and absurdities of some of its peculiar social customs. When summoned before the bar of Divine Justice the high castes Hindus (Savaranas) of Kerala will have to answer for their cruel treatment of the suppressed classes (Avaranas). In no other part of India is Hinduism so degraded as in Kerala. The social evils which exist in other parts of the country are to be found in Kerala in a most intensified form. The most rigid observance of caste is seen in that province and it is very often carried to such extreme lengths that it would appear ridiculous if it were not tragic. Untouchability, unapproachability and unseasibility prevail in its cruellest and most absurd form in this province. They are so deeply rooted here that the social reformer finds it extremely difficult to shake the people off their absurd superstitions. The campaign for the removal of untouchability has not had its desired effect in Kerala owing to various causes. One of the most important of them is the belief among the untouchable classes themselves that the removal of this blot on Hinduism would bring down divine punishment on their heads. They know very little of true Hinduism. Therefore they believe in whatever the orthodox and high caste Hindus say and take their words for gospel truth.

The lot of the social reformer in Kerala is very hard. Indeed, if a high caste Hindu works for the removal of the social disabilities of the low caste Harijans he has to meet the opposition of and suffer social ostracism at the hands of the high caste Hindus, while, at the same time, those for whom he works and suffers all these hardships look down upon him. Thus the social reformer finds his position extremely uncomfortable and if he is one who is not strong-willed and gifted with a large measure of patience he would give up his attempt and let things take their natural course. This was the reason why the crusade against untouchability etc. did not make much headway until it was led by leaders from among the suppressed classes themselves. Mahatma Gandhi's support for the movement gave a fresh impetus to it and the successful culmination of the Valkom Satyagraha inspired hope and enthusiasm among the untouchables. The minds of the people have undoubtedly been stirred, but the movement at present is strong only in Travancore where it is ably led by Mr. T. K. Madhavan. In Cochin the Maharaja’s Government is doing something for the amelioration of the condition of the suppressed classes by giving them admission in public schools and some other concessions. In British Malabar precisely little is done either by the Government or the public. The Arya Samaj is doing some social work but its activities are now confined to Palghat and its vicinity. In the same town (Palghat) Mr. Ch. Kesbha, Secretary of the Depressed Classes Mission, an earnest and sincere social reformer, maintains an orphanage and does a lot of ameliorative work. The Sahari Ashram, founded and managed by Mr. T. R. Krishnaswami Iyer, an ardent disciple of Mahatma Gandhi is the third institution near Palghat, where as Mahatma recently said on the occasion of his visit to the Ashram the removal of untouchability is going on. But the public support for these institutions is not satisfactory.

For the complete eradication of this evil of untouchability a network of such institutions should spring up throughout Kerala. For this purpose the richer classes should contribute liberally.

As the social welfare of the vast majority of the inhabitants of Kerala depends upon the removal of untouchability, unapproachability and unseasibility it is but proper that this question should be tackled by social reformers before anything less important. But there are many other equally important problems that should merit the attention of social reformers. Early marriages, child-widowhood, the cursed dowry system, trials in women all these evils are rampant. If not more, in Kerala as in other parts of India. No serious and well-organised attempts have been made in Kerala for the eradication of these evils. Statistics show that Kerala is one of the foremost provinces of India in the matter of literacy and female education. But as Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya recently said the educated women of Kerala are not doing their duty to the suffering masses. In the social reform movement women can do much. In fact they can do more than even men can. The educated women of Kerala should shake off their lethargy and do social work among the less fortunate classes. The little work that they now do is confined to towns. They should extend the scope of their activities to villages.

It is now clear that, except in the matter of the removal of untouchability, the people of Kerala have done no social reform work. Faculty of earnest and sincere workers, lack of organised effort, blind orthodoxy, economic dependence of the suppressed classes, and lack of funds are the chief causes for the backwardness of Kerala in the movement for social reform.

It is hoped that the leaders as well as the people of Kerala would sit up and take advantage of this year’s session of the Indian National Social Reform Conference to be held in Madras during the Congress week. The leaders should prepare and submit a scheme of social reform work for the consideration and adoption of the Conference, under whose auspices a vigorous campaign against social disabilities can be successfully conducted.

Mr. K. M. Panikkar writes in the October issue of the Review of Nations, Geneva —

One phase of the colonial problem that has attracted little attention from thinkers in Europe is the effect of the political domination of the East on the European peoples. It was an ancient Hindu philosopher who declared that you cannot own a slave for a long time without being his servant in turn. Politically the domination of Europe over Asia has had the same result. The East is held in fear over its vast plains the flag of Europe fly, and yet there is growing up a subtle independence of economic life which in the long run would place Europe at the mercy of her clients and consumers in the East. It needs no special effort to see that the capitalist state in Europe is built up as a superstructure, the two pillars of which are the production of cheap raw material in the tropics and the consumption in the same area of the goods produced in Europe. India, China and Africa form in fact the biggest markets for the trade of Europe. Besides this, there is also the problem of the exportation of capital which is invested in the tropical colonies and in areas of political influence. Thus there develop in the European States vast vested interests whose political object is to ensure adequate returns for their investments by the use of political power. The drabness in England for intervention in China is an instance. The Empire in this way becomes the last defence of capitalist society and of an autocratic conception of the State.

More than even this, the political ideas of the imperialist classes undergo fundamental changes due to the contact with differently constituted social systems in the East, India has been for generations now the great recruiting ground of the conservative party. The "historical school" of thought on which the modern conception of the authoritarian State is based was the direct result of the experience of Maine and his followers in the East. Maine’s criticism of Representative Government and Democracy was mainly the outcome of what he had observed in India. Nor can it be forgotten that a good many of the great names in the Conservative Party, like the late Marquis Curzon, Viscount Milner, brought into English life an outlook which was considerably modified if not altogether, changed by their life and experience in the East.

Another important and more fundamental fact is the subtle change in national psychology which the increasing association with India and the East is bringing over the English people. The Anglo-Indian was in the early days considered as belonging to a class by himself. The dramatist Foote has pictured for us what the 19th century thought of the "Nabobs." It is now recognised that the political corruption of the 18th century was to a large extent due to the enormous amount of wealth that passed into the country through East India trade. It is true that with the growth of more responsible government the rich East Indian who dazzled the countryside with the display of his domestic splendour has disappeared. The Anglo-Indian is now (generally speaking) an imperturbable individual who is longing for the more congenial surroundings of India where his authority would be recognised and he would be somebody in his district.
Trained from boyhood among unfamiliar surroundings, and helping to work institutions like caste which are different from his own, and developing views about social organisations, government and political authority which are opposed to the traditions of England, the Anglo-Indian when he returns to his mother country, does not fit in with the old surroundings. Nor do his ideas approximate to the inherited social opinion of the people. This was his position in the early 19th century. But circumstances have slowly changed. The Anglo-Indian has permeated England now—in spirit. When the number of Englishmen with experience and interest in India is increasing every year, it is impossible to distinguish the Anglo-Indians as a separate body. The Suez Canal has brought the countries so near that the mystery and awe attached to men returned from India have completely vanished. There has thus been an unconscious “easternisation” in England and to a lesser extent in the other European States.

Perhaps it is in the colonies of European nations in the tropics that the change of European character under the influence of the East is most obvious. Social life in the settlements in Africa and Asia is governed by other principles than those that find acceptance in the West. It is a common saying that there are no Ten Commandments east of Suez. This saying expresses the belief of the European nations that in their relations with non-European races the codes of conduct applicable in Europe have no bearing and validity. The worst crimes can be condoned, and even homicide against a non-European has not the same terror that it entails west of Suez. What is of interest here is that east of Suez the European loses his national characteristics and adopts in relation to members of other races a code of morality utterly different from what he accepts if he does not practise at home.

In settled areas the tendency of the European is to depend entirely on service labour, and in consequence he becomes a parasite. There is, for example, in Africa and to a less extent in India, special kinds of menial work which no European can do without losing caste. The “white” labouring classes in Africa are frankly aristocratic and are determined to remain so. The policy of the Labour Party in South Africa has for a long time been to reserve the highly paid trades for themselves and get unskilled work to be done by the Africans. This has led to the curious phenomenon of the white labourers themselves employing African natives to do work for which they (the whites) get paid. As a competent observer of the race problem in South Africa observes, “I find the mineowners in Johannesburg were obliged to employ white men to do certain skilled work and at the same time connived at the work being done by African labour. That is to say the white man who got the post at £50 a month would employ a Kaffir at 3 or 4s a month and keep the remainder of the salary for himself”. It is against the principle of white dominance to do manual labour, and thus the whole European community is practically parastitical. Living and trading upon what is practically slave labour.

Thus in Africa there has come into existence a small aristocratic European community which lives on the produce of other people’s labour and which secures its enjoyment of these privileges by the use of political power. But the growth of what is essentially a servile state has had the effect of organising the population into two different and hostile camps and it is only by the use of organised political power that the white communities are able, for the time, to keep the Africans under control.

The looseness of European morality in the tropics has become proverbial. In South Africa where there is only a white population of 5 millions, there has grown up a mixed population of nearly a million. It is a fact that tells its own tale. In Java also there is a growing community of half bloods. In India, as a result of the caste system, this problem has not been so serious, though the existence of an important community of Eurasians in the bigger towns shows that even there the mixture of races has been taking place in a limited way.

The brutalisation of European character when faced with the race issue in Africa has been another deplorable result of this state of perpetual hostility. The Criminal Code of Barbados contained the provision that if any labourer under pain of punishment by his master for running away or any other misconduct towards his master shall suffer in life or in member, no person shall be liable to a fine. In the middle of a hostile population, the Europeans settled in Africa and Asia are losing their own characteristics of justice, fair play and human sentiment.

The case in China, Malay States and India is similar. European plantation trade and industry are dependent on coloured labour. In fact, the attraction of tropical areas as a field of investment is that humane conditions of labour which the Western countries have adopted are not in force there. It is still possible to employ women in coal mines at extremely low rates of pay in China and India. Even the employment of children under age is but imperfectly controlled. It is possible in short to exploit the human material of Asia and the tropical countries in general on small pay and without much of the worry of Factory Acts, Trade Unions and labour strikes. India and China were thus the paradise of the capitalist and the European traders and manufacturers have become a pretentious aristocracy which treats with contempt the claim of non-European races for fair treatment.

The extraordinary dependence of the European community in the East on servile labour has had two curious results. In China it has put the Westerner entirely at the mercy of the labouring Chinese. An organised boycott by the Chinese labourers on European ships brought the mercantile activity of Europe in the Far East to absolute standstill. In Hongkong the proud European even had to get his food from communal kitchens as a result of the Chinese strike in 1925. Secondly in India and other places where political power is also in the hands of the white people, there has been on the part of the ruling classes a determined hostility towards educated men for fear that the safety of the community is endangered if the society over which they rule become progressive. That is at the basis of the distrust of popular and liberal movements among coloured people which is the universal characteristic of Europeans in the East. To them every progressive movement is conspiracy against their supremacy which should be closely watched and firmly put down.
This barbarisation of European peoples living in the East and the coarse arrogance of their behaviour cannot fail to have a reflex action in Europe. The sinister influence of vested interests in Asia and Africa on modern politics is not a page of past history, nor is it a pure act of imagination to find in the decay of European liberty an ultimate connection with the growth of imperialism.

Thus by a strange irony Imperialis domination which is injurious to the subject people is in its turn having reactions on the psychological life and historical traditions of European nations themselves, which are slowly underlining the basis of their greatness. It is, making them more callous, and the noble elements of the life of the people on which alone can the greatness of nations depend are being slowly borne down by the weight of a new set of traditions developed in regions where for the ruling classes ordinary codes of conduct and chivalry have no value and the spirit of the swashbuckler is in the ascendant.

WOMEN IN HINDU LAW.

A correspondent writes to The Hindu——

Mr. K. T. Bhashyam Iyengar, M. R. A., delivered a learned address on "The Position of Women in Hindu Law" in the Maharaja’s College, Mysore, on Wednesday last with Prof. A. R. Wadia in the chair.

The lecturer, in the course of his address, said that in the earliest or Rig Vedic period of Hindu Law women had proprietary rights just the same as their husbands, that a gift by the husband could not be valid unless assented to by the wife, that they could choose their husbands, marry at an adult age or remain unmarried dedicating their lives to learning and knowledge. He instanced Visavatara and Lopamudra, authors of portions of Vedic teaching. He pointed out that a widow could remarry on offering Aja Pancidoss to the memory of the deceased husband. He quoted H. H. Wilson as saying in a letter of antiquity women were held in so much esteem as among the Hindus, "

"Drink and ignorance have been the bane of Hindu civilization as of all others of the world," said the lecturer, and stated that with the introduction of "Soma" and "Sura" drinks at sacrifices the fall of women began. They could not stand the drinks and were naturally kept out of the sacrifices which slowly became the monopoly of the men. Women ceased to take part in sacrifices and ceased to study the Vedas. With the lack of learning and knowledge, women ceased to command respect and were treated as mere possession. Though this was but a temporary social condition, Bandhagana gave it a permanent legal character and, misconceiving a text in the Aitareya Brhadaranyaka, which prohibited women from having a share in the sacrificial offering of drink, dictated as Vedic law that women were incompetent to possess shares in property. In spite of the noble and liberal-minded verses, in the Brahma Sutra and Jaimini, who protested against such a fleecing away of the rights of women, the retrograde doctrine of Bandhagana and Aitareya held sway and reduced women to the level of mere household wealth. The high significance of marriage was lost and marriages by capture, by sale and by deception began to be accepted by society. Gautama insisted on women being married before puberty, thus introducing infant marriages and compulsory marriages of women.

This continued during the period of early Smiththikars of whom Manu and Katyayana are the chief exponents. Manu’s writings indicate a growing consciousness of the injustice done to women. Manu’s rules of conduct are most baffling. At some stage he revives women as unworthy of independence. But it is Manu himself who says that where women are not honoured, there the houses perish; women should be employed in the management of property and collections, virgin widows should be permitted to marry and that the wife is the goddess of fortune. The significance is that by Manu’s time women were regaining their position slowly.

During the period of the later Smiththikars of whom Yagnavalkya and Parashara were the chief exponents, the position of women became once again distinctly better. Women became once again learned in Vedas and freely discussed topics of law, life and philosophy by open debates with sages. They could carry on trade acquire wealth by art, skill and -base contractual capacity. They could incur debts for family benefit and stand security for parties. Widow remarriage was once again recognized, the famous gists of Narada and Parashara pointing out that circumstances under which it could be permitted. Slander of women was made severely punishable.

The period of the commentators shows a further advance of woman’s status in law. Vidyaranya, the great scholar of the flourishing period of Vijayanagar exposed Bandhagana and pointed out that women were entitled to be initiated into the study of the Vedas just as men and to possess proprietary rights just the same as men. This view of Vedic texts has been accepted by such eminent oriental scholars as Dr. Jolly and Prof. Maxmuller. Thus during the period 1000-1700 the position of women in law may be considered to have been brought up to a very high level.

In the next and present period of the administration of Hindu Law by the Courts, women have suffered greatly and have fallen far behind their status. It was declared that Hindus should be governed by their Hindu Law. At once, Manu of 2000 B.C., was translated and forced upon a society in 1700 A.D., which had outgrown his age. For instance, Manu’s dictum of women’s perpetual tutelage was held the basis of Hindu Law and in spite of Vidyaranya’s clear and emphatic declaration to the contrary the Privy Council held that property inherited by women should only be enjoyed for life. They curtailed the list of female heirs to those mentioned in the texts of Manu and other early Smiththikars. Sibhindana was curtailed and properties gifted and otherwise acquired were held, to be only estates for life unless expressly stated to be absolute. Women were not entitled to alienate such property except for legal necessity and this was defined to be "a pressure on the estate." The sister, though an heir, was held to inherit only after a long list of agnates was exhausted. Son’s daughter and daughter’s daughter came at the tail end of those entitled to inherit and such new relations as the daughter-in-law, stepmother, brother’s widow and the sister’s daughter were excluded altogether from inheritance.
Restitution of conjugal rights, a relic of a barbarous age, as Justice McLeod calls it, was enforced so as to compel women to the embraces of husbands whom they might loathe, or for reasons sound or otherwise it did not matter. Act XXI of 1850 and Act XV of 1856 have created anomalies extremely prejudicial in the progress of society in general and of the woman's cause in particular. The latter act encouraged immorality and defeated its own object. Thus, women's rights have greatly suffered during the last two hundred years in spite of the abolition of Sati and the efforts of Raja Ram Mohan Roy.

But a great and redeeming feature of this period is that Law has been no longer a reduction of life as in the former periods of Hindu Law. Women have continued to be the queens of the household.

All the same, the economic result of the injustice to women in Law has begun to tell. They have ceased to be learned as of old and cannot appreciate the currents of thought that mould the nations of to-day. Unconsciously they constitute a huge obstruction to national progress.

We must give back their rights and privileges in Law which we have taken away from them.

Prof. Wadia in concluding the meeting congratulated the lecturers on his learning and patriotism and exhorted the audience to give him full support in his movement.

One of the features of the meeting was a large attendance of ladies.

THE IMPORTANCE OF SOCIAL REFORM.

(By Mr H. S. Pattnaik, B. A. BAREILLY.)

There is a good deal of talk in the modern world about Social Reform, many a good heart has proceeded to the goal of seeing the society quite free from the clutches of its baseless customs and manners and have taken up the responsibility for the uplifting of the masses from down the abyss of ignorance, superstition and irreligion, but one wonders what means have been adopted to achieve success in their enterprise.

There has been enough of the diagnosing of social unrest. Many a sober economist has pointed out to the world that the ill-distribution of wealth has been the chief source of all our woes. Then the term exploitation is on the lips of every one who has not even the least idea of philanthropy. India herself is fast learning that the inclusion of the untouchables will remove a very big wrong from the surface of the annals of this big country and that the caste system is a menace to the architecture of society.

Some think that if purdah be ostracised from India our civilization will take a leap in the arena of progress and we shall then walk side by side with the most advanced nations of the world, but reference has already proved that the removal of the purdah will not do any real good unless and until there is a strong moral background to welcome it.

Others vainly think that the western civilization is the breaker of many barriers in the path of our goal, but it is as clear as noonday that India cannot improve an inch by putting "Saul's armour on David" because she is not at all used to it.

Now this sort of diagnosing will help us only so far as the watering of the leaves will help a tree. No individual, no family, no tribe or nation, will ever be happy unless it has really seen for himself where the actual fault in all system lies, which, in my opinion, is rightly found in the badness of the human heart and that is why we have been advised in Proverbs 4:23 to keep our hearts with all diligence for out of it arise the issues of life. Then as a necessary corollary it will follow that if we are true to ourselves we shall be true to others. Then the Hindus will forget to hate the Moslems and the Moslems shall not beat his Hindu brother, aye, "Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war anymore."

People are defining religion in very high terms and attach much importance to rites and ceremonies but this emphasis will avail them nothing unless they understood fully the practical side of religion, which is expressed in these words by the Prophet Nizam of yore, "He hath showed thee, O man, what is good, and what dost Jehovah require of thee but to do justly, and to love kindness and to walk humbly with thy God." This very thought has been seconded by one of the disciples of the Lord Jesus in no less emphatic words, "Pure Religion and undefiled before our God and Father is this: to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction and to keep oneself unspotted from the world." Jesus Christ the greatest sage and moral teacher taught to humanity the consummation of all such teachings by summarizing the Ten Commandments in the beautiful words that have ever been uttered from the human lips, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy strength and with all thy mind; and thy neighbour as thyself."

If people only faithfully act upon these homely truths they will revolutionize the whole social, religious and economic system of the present world. On the other hand, if these truths are not heeded to and kept continually ignored by mankind, let me tell you frankly and in plain terms, although neither a prophet nor a prophet's son, in most vital prophetic strain that the world will not reach its own civilization or be through with its miseries and human woes.

MISS MAYO'S COLOSSAL IGNORANCE.

Miss Mayo's book has hitherto been condemned by politicians and social reformers. It is time that expert medical opinion was forthcoming. Dr. Muthu, the tuberculosis expert, who has lived and practised in London for 42 years, has given very interesting views on this book, which he says, discloses colossal ignorance of the medical aspect. He holds that the use of the cow's urine by Hindus has a medical background and that already a society has developed in England, even advocating the use of human urine, as it contains valuable salts.

"Both in England and on the Continent," said Dr. Muthu, "Miss Mayo's book has done immense harm to the cause of India. Had there been an organisation in London (which I advocated three years ago in an interview to the press), such as the late British Committee of the Indian National Congress, it would have exposed her mis-statements and helped to counteract the mischief she has done. Her ignorance of Indian affairs, her sweeping generalizations, her one-sided versions her untruthful statements, her collection of ugly and disgusting incidents, make her book unreliable and unworthy of very serious notice. One can find fault and raise up filth from any civilised country and town as London, Paris, Berlin and New York. I have shown in my recent book on tuberculosis that not far from the Buckingham Palace, the royal residence, there are dreadful slums, and it is common knowledge that vice flaunts itself in the parks in London and New York and therefore to place London or New York as insanitary or immoral is as false and untrue as to say that India is immoral. The Western countries have their hands full with the white slave traffic, venereal clinics, their night clubs, and dark evil spots.

A PREP INTO UGLY WEST.

Only last month the "Harper's Magazine" gave a harrowing account of lawlessness in the U.S.A. where 'greatest brutalities and tortures are deliberately and systematically applied in police stations to obtain confessions;' where men are tortured for days and days and denied sleep and food for many hours and during all the time beaten with the rubber hose, where bribery and corruption abound, and 'the city, the police, the courts,' and the Government are said to be crooked and rotten. I think this lady should be better employed in turning her attention to her own country and try to reform its many abuses and evil.

"True we have our share of social and moral evils to contend with, but looking back at the state of the country 20 years ago and taking into account the changes that have taken place since I am thankful and take courage. Progress has been slow and I foresee that the moral, social and spiritual progress will add momentum in the next 20 years and would astonish the world. Meanwhile we must do two things. Firstly, we must revive an organization in London and chief centres in England, which would protect and safeguard the interests of India. Secondly, this infliction of suffering, insult and pain by the enemies of India should awaken a determination in us to do all we can to put an end to all those social evils and customs which keep us backward among the nations of the world. After all India's suffering is but birth-pangs, which every nation must pass through before it can deliver the child of freedom."

URINE AND CONSUMPTIVES.

Dr. Mutha next showed how ignorant Miss Mayo is of medical science and yet she has dogmatically made assertions in condemning India. He said: "I will give only two instances. There is the question of cow's urine used by Hindus for malaria and other diseases. Now this urine contains ammonia in a concentrated form and which not long ago was utilized for the treatment of consumption. Its use was advocated thousands of years ago by Susruta. Indeed in England itself such establishments have opened. The first sanatorium establishments for consumption opened in 1911 in Bradford for the inhalation of amonious and were based on the same idea as that of ancient Indian physicians, who advocated that consumptive patients should sleep with goats and inhale the ammonia given off from their urinary excretions. Miss Mayo has, therefore, shown absolute ignorance of the medical aspect of the problem by her prejudiced writings.

"There is next the question of social custom. Every custom took its birth to suit a particular age, and as times change customs change and are re-adjusted, Hinduism would have been nowhere but for the catholicity it has shown in this respect throughout all ages, and I have no doubt that Hindus will adjust their customs to suit the modern needs. Indeed reform movements are already doing a great deal of work. And in this respect India owes an everlasting debt of gratitude to Mahatma Gandhi, who has roused her consciousness and self-reliance wonderfully. I have no doubt that the generation now growing up will shake off the social shackles that are a hindrance to the present-day progress and I do not despair of the task 'before the reformer. And certainly we have not an extra doze of sin rather is it the reverse."
customs, all of which form part of a deliberate, insidi­ous and nefarious propaganda of the hind now exempli­fied by Miss Mayra’s “Higher India.”

Major Basu’s book can be safely recommended as an authoritative and effective attempt to bring out the real facts of history so long, purposely hidden in a tissue of half-truths, untruths and falsehoods and to destroy the mischievous results of a suppressio verborum and a suggestion falsi.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Rajkot and Social Reform: The People’s Representative Assembly has passed the Bill penalising marriages below nineteen and fifteen for boys and girls respectively. The age of consent has been fixed at sixteen.

Sir Michael Saddler’s Suggestion: A Reuter’s cable under date November 10, states that Sir Michael Saddler in “Times” suggests that rapporteurs should be attached to the Statutory Commission to interpret opinions on social and educational aspects of problem and suggests among Indians Memor. K. Natarajan, A. Hidayat K., T. Paul and Miss Cornelia Sarabjil.

Fatigue in Industry: “The Social Welfare, Toronto” writes: The result of a week of meetings for the study of the subject, “The Elimination of Unecessary Fatigue in Industry” can roughly be said to show that while fatigue can not as yet be measured adequately, it is being better defined, and much is being done to prevent unnecessary fatigue and to stimulate recovery from such fatigue as is necessary.

Break Down Caste System: Speaking at the recep­tion given to Sir. Mardy Jones by the depressed classes last night, the Labour member of Parliament declared that the problem of untouchability in India had gone home to him acutely. He was staggered to know that fifty millions of Indian people were regarded as untouchables and were denied the elementary rights. He knew the difficulties in their way which though immense could be overcome. He advised them thus: “Equip yourselves with knowledge which is power and bring home to India to the countries abroad the fact that there are fifty millions of you untouchables, that you are necessary for the life of India and that you are not going to allow yourselves to be treated as bottom dogs.” Mr. Jones advised them to organise for removing the ban on their social relations and breaking down the caste system and the ego of Brahmins and assured them he would spare no pains to help them to eradicate untouchability.

Sir J. C. Bose at Mysore: An Associated Press message says: Sir J. C. Bose acknowledging the public welcome, stressed the need for fuller development of the spirit of enterprise and urged every one to undertake some constructive programme of work so as to bring relief to suffering humanity. He urged the student population to practice what the westerners called chivalry” which was “nothing more than Khatrya Dharm of ancient India. Later to-day Sir J. C. Bose addressing the corporation of the University, developed the concept of the “University of the World.” A national university must stand primarily for self-expression and winning for India her true place among the federation of nations, Greater India could be built only by the joint efforts of all those races who regarded India as their home.

The spirit of narrowness and intolerance was more in the West than in the East, for witness the bitter controversy regarding the Darwinian theory and the penalising of teaching of evolution in a certain State of progressive America. The greatest impediment to ordered progress was economic distress which drove people to desperation. Indian civilisation might be destroyed through weak passivity. He therefore urged the doctrine of strength and action.

Censorship of Films: The Indian Daily Mail writes: —As the British cinema film, “The Triumph of the Rat” was banned by the Calcutta Board of Film Censors in May last year, this year also, according to an announcement in The Calcutta Gazette has the Metro Goldwyn production, “The Road to Mandalay”, been ruled unsuitable for exhibition throughout the whole of Bengal because of its low moral tone, says the “Statesman.” “The Statesman” was informed that “The Road to Mandalay” was rejected because scenes were depicted in which the white and other races met and indulged in extrava­gances in a low Chinese establishment that was but a thinly disguised house of ill-repute in which a European woman is finally stabbed. A principal cinema proprietor who had booked the film told the “Statesman” that it might be possible to make “The Road to Man­daly” acceptable to the public and the censors by tactful “cutting” and alteration of subtitles, “Much has been said against American film influence in India” he said “but few seem to know that not a few English films though not in this country, have been banned. For example last year the Australian Censors rejected 12.5 per cent of the American pictures and 16.16 per cent of British pictures, in the first three months of 1927 the Australian Censors rejected 9.2 per cent of American pictures and 42.8 per cent of British pictures entering the country.

Prohibition in Burma: At the American Baptist Mission Conference at Moulmein the following resolu­tion was passed: “We, the missionaries of the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society in Conference at Moulmein on October 14, 1927, do hereby place ourselves on record as being in full and hearty accord with the people of Burma and India in their agitation for national prohibition. We believe that the liquor traffic in alco­holic beverages has proved in every land to be an unmitigated evil, constituting one of the chief social vices of modern life; and are convinced that the time is at hand when all who have the social, economic, moral and industrial welfare of the country at heart must unite in the effort to suppress this evil, striving in every way to hasten the attainment of the ultimate goal of National Prohibition. Having lived under local option in America and seen the gradual growth of prohibition sentiment in the last two generations we heartily recommend local option as tried and proven legal method of obtaining ultimate prohibition. We recommend local option because we believe it is the inherent right of every locality, to decide for itself whether intoxicating liquors, either home or foreign, shall be sold for sale and shall be an open and constant temptation to its people. We are therefore urged the Commission to carry out the way the wishes of this constituency to do all they can by agitation and organi­zation in their communities and by appealing to their representatives in the Legislative Council to bring prohibition to Burma.”
Mr. Wells' Tribute To His Wife: A moving tribute by Mr. H. G. Wells to his dead wife was read when her remains were cremated at Golders Green on October 10. Mr. George Bernard Shaw and Mr. Arnold Bennett, two literary friends of many years' standing, attended the funeral. Mr. Wells and his two sons were chief mourners, and the chapel was crowded with friends and sympathizers. The Times and the Daily Chronicle. The service, secular in character, was very simple. It consisted of a few minutes' organ music preceding a memorial address written by Mr. Wells, and read on his behalf by Dr. T. H. Page, the well known scholar, and an old friend of Mr. Wells, "It would be dishonest to conceal the depth of our present sorrow," Mr. Wells wrote. "It would be foolish to pretend that this event does not bring home to us very vividly a sense of the extreme brevity of life. Sorrowful though we must feel, we may yet learn from such lives as this what precious use can be made of brief days. The city of the living world is an all perennial city, bound to the immemorial past and towering up in the future to heights beyond our vision. Its walls are fashioned like mosaic out of lives such as this one. Of natural things, she most loved the cherished roses in her garden, and sunlight on mountain snows. The spirit of her life lives on in us still. She returns to the furnace of material things from which her life was born. But within our hearts she rests enshrined. She was a noble wife, a happy mother and the maker of a free and hospitable home. She thought that a good deed talked about or even held in memory lost half its worth. The best and sweetest of her is known only to one or two of us. Some lives stand out on headlands and are beacons for all mankind, but some more lovely and more precious, come only by chance gleams of light to the knowledge of the outer world."

The Statutory Commission: We pointed out last week that the exclusion of Indians from the membership of the Statutory Commission on Indian constitutional reform has created a feeling of profound disappointment throughout the country, and that the Liberals who had co-operated with Government in working the Reforms, have been the most vehement in their protests against the exclusion. The only two men of note who have actually approved of the exclusion are Sir H. N. Mukherji, head of an engineering firm in Calcutta, and Colonel Gidney, a leader of the Anglo-Indian Community. Every other public man who has spoken or written on the subject has strongly condemned the constitution of the Commission as an insult and an affront to the people of India. The strength and unanimity of the condemnation is appreciated in India, and Labour and Liberal have expressed themselves sympathetically towards Indian aspirations, and urged Government to meet Indian opinion by modifications of the scheme of the Commission. Some recommend the appointment of one or two Indians to the present Commission, while others suggest that the proposed Joint Select Committee of the Indian Legislature should sit on equal terms along with that body and participate in all the stages of the enquiry. Meanwhile, the British Government have introduced a Bill in Parliament to empower the appointment of the Commission before the full ten-year period has elapsed, and as soon as it is passed, a resolution will be moved asking approval of the names of the members and the terms of the Statutory Commission. This, it is expected, will be done next week, and Government will then indicate how far they are prepared to go to meet Indian opinion.

Boycotting the Commission: The most generally favoured means of expressing Indian dissatisfaction at the composition of the Commission is to boycott it completely as the Egyptians boycotted the Milner Commission some years ago. This, some leaders think, will not be enough, and that an unofficial Indian Commission should be formed to draw up a scheme of constitutional reform for India. Apart from the suggested boycott, the idea of framing a scheme of constitutional reform which will be acceptable to Indians generally, is an admirable one, and it will be the best proof of the constructive capacity of Indian leaders. The only attempts made so far in this line were those by Dr. Besant’s Commonwealth of India Bill, and an adaption of it prepared by the Independent Labour Party in England. These two drafts may be taken as the basis, and a small committee of Indian exports appointed by the National Congress, the Liberal Federation and the Muslim League jointly to frame a final scheme for consideration by these bodies. A merely negative attitude may suffice to express resentment, but it is not enough to prove the capacity for the practical work of organization and administration. There are a sufficient number of eminent Indian jurists to undertake the work of drafting an Indian Constitution. The principal difficulty in the way of carrying out a complete boycott is the ‘communal rivalry between Hindus and Muslims, which is particularly keen in Northern India. The Muslim leaders of Punjab, in fact, have already met and expressed publicly their disinclination to join a boycott movement. The Hindus and Sikhs who are the two other important communities in the Province, find themselves, in the face of the Muslim attitude, precluded from boycotting the Commission, much as they would like to do it. It is yet possible for the Muslims to be moved by timely concession to make it possible for Indians to co-operate in the work of the Commission and we hope—though much against hope—that they will do so.

A Disclaimer: We had occasion to comment on a recent Associated Press message to the effect that Suri Jagatguru Shankaracharya of Sharadapith had sent a telegram to the Governor-General in Council to veto the Child Marriage Prevention Bill referred to the Select Committee. His Holiness of Sharadapith has taken the earliest opportunity to repudiate the views attributed to him. In his statement which we publish in full he emphatically declares that he is in favour of the Bill. "Occupying as I do, the gadi of Jagatguru Shankaracharya of Sharadapith, Kashmir," observed his Holiness, "several people complained to me against this action, thinking that I had addressed the above mentioned telegram to His Excellency. In order to remove this misconception, I do announce that I have never sent such a telegram. It may have been sent by his Holiness the Shankaracharya of some other place. He might have certain reasons, best known to himself, for doing so. But so far as I am concerned, I can emphatically say that there can be no more humane measure than passing a law to prohibit the marriages of girls below 12 and of boys..."
below 15, as proposed by Mr. Har Bilas Sarda in his bill and supported by learned sages of Benares.

The abolition of child marriage, which is absolutely a barbarity and a physical and moral scourge, is based on justice and sympathy with the weak and the humble: For the Hindu its abolition is most necessary, as the direct result of child marriage is the very huge number of widows, many of whom are young innocent virgins—flowers withering wearing the widow's, their drooping heads and many are cast on this inhos pitable world quite unprotected and unprovided for. This is an evil that is eating into the vitals of the Hindu community. No obstacles should be used in this reform into law, calculated as it is to prevent the sufferings of young girls consigned to perpetual widowhood, which means a cheerless, melancholy life at the best and, at the worst, a life of shame and degradation to them. As regards the religious phase of the question, I find that child marriage is not sanctioned by the ordinances of our Scriptures (cf. Manu Smriti Chapters II. Verse 4). So it is neither forbidden by religion, nor enforced by religion. Its prohibition will surely stop human sacrifices of a worse type than sati.

Coastal Steamer: Public attention has been drawn rather forcibly to the coastal service by the two tragedies that occurred near Bombay last week. The Indian Co-Operative Steam Navigation Company sent a ship to find their steamer, the s.s. "Tu karam," which had left Bombay on Saturday last. The rescue ship found only the wreckage of the sunken vessel and a few floating cases. Only sixteen out of one hundred and thirty-six survived. The disaster is all the more tragic as it happened only sixty miles from Bombay. The second steamer, the s.s. "Jayanti" belonging to the E.S.N. Company, has not been found. Three or four steamers have been sent in search of it and a recent official announcement presumes that the steamer must have foundered near Janjira. The Port authorities informed all steamer owners that coasting steamers are excepted from fitting wireless under the rules, and that only steamers going direct from one port to another are obliged to keep wireless. A correspondent writing in the Bombay paper states that permission for the use of wireless transmitting apparatus on coasting steamers was recently withdrawn. It would be well, however, in view of the needless misery caused by relatives of the unfortunate passengers and crew of the sunken vessels, to play for safety and to take the necessary measures to prevent similar accidents in future. If, for instance, the s.s. "Jayanti" had been equipped with wireless, something could have been done at least to locate the missing vessel. There has been sufficient progress in science to guard against the terrible uncertainties of nature.

Child Marriage in England: child marriages are not only peculiar to India. That such marriages take place even in highly advanced countries like Great Britain was recently brought to light. A deputation of the Women's Social Council waited on the Home Secretary with a view to urge him to strengthen the law against boy and girl marriages in that country. One of the members of the deputation, Miss F. Barry, Secretary of the St. Joan's Social and Political Alliance has published a few facts to show that reform is necessary in England as well as in India.

"We hear a good deal about the child marriages in India," she said, "but while the home country allows its children to marry at 12 years of age (for girls) and 14 years (for boys) there is little hope of such legislation being introduced in India and other countries. It is well known that it is true that child marriages do not prevail to the same extent as they do in India and from enquiries made by the Women's Council it appears that no girl of the age of twelve has been married in Great Britain during the last twelve years. In 1924, however, two girls were married at the age of 14, and 19 at the age of 15. In 1925 two more were married at the earlier age and 24 at 15. Last year four girls were married at 14 and as many as 34 at 15. There is nothing at present in English law to prevent such unions as these. A missionary in the East End of London has strengthened the case for reform by dwelling at length on the unpleasant consequences of marriages of this sort. It is safe to say," he remarked, "that they result in nothing but an unbroken train of tragedy. The child is not loved by either of their parents. They have children long before they are in a position to keep themselves, let alone anyone else, and they have absolutely no conception of the meaning of home life. Girls of sixteen or seventeen come to me with babies in their arms to complain that their husbands are out with boy friends. Boys come to me because they are unable to make their wives realise that they have more duty upon their time than girl friends. Frequently the marriage has to be dissolved because one or other of the parents contract other alliances, and the children are left to fend for themselves. No wonder then the Women's deputation emphatically condemned as an abominable thing that in a highly civilized country like theirs such marriages were allowed to take place and put in a plea for an immediate reform by raising the age of marriage by legislation.

Relief for Orissa: Mr. C. F. Andrews writes to us:—I know well that I may reckon on your kind support to my appeal that, where possible, with the full consent of the donors a small proportion of the funds collected for flood-relief in the Western Province may be directed to Orissa where the need is incomparably greater. Orissa suffered badly in two ways. (1) The terribly severe floods came at a time when the whole public attention of India was occupied with Gujarat. (2) This is the third time in succession that the Balasore District has been damaged by floods of this kind. The consequence has also been two-fold. (1) The public appeal on behalf of Orissa, just after the Gujerat appeal, fell on deaf ears. (2) The people on the coast side of India being asked for the third time in succession to subscribe for Orissa failed adequately to respond. Yet the figures are serious indeed. Nearly 86,000 houses have been ruined; a large area of the country has been buried in sand and crops were destroyed and stores of grain were washed away. A comparison of figures is significant. Gujarat has received from public and private resources over 2 crores of rupees. Orissa has only received 8 lakhs. If anyone would wish to send half direct to Orissa (where it is sorely needed) he should send to Pandit Sapabandhu Das, Cuttack, Orissa, who will duly acknowledge and publish in our audited accounts.
THE CINEMATOGRAPHE IN INDIA.

The Committee appointed by the Government of India to enquire into the conditions of the Cinematographe exhibitions and industry in this country, has been sitting in Bombay for about a fortnight. The Chairman of the Committee, Dewan Bahadur T. Rangacharya, wisely decided at the outset to give the widest latitude to witnesses within the terms of reference, and this has certainly gone a great way towards dispersing the suspicion originally felt that the Committee had been set up merely to devise a scheme of preference for British-made films. The tenor of the evidence recorded in Bombay is, on the whole, to overthrow some of the pre-conceptions regarding the effect of cinema exhibitions in this country. One of these is that crime has increased and become more organized as a result of the exhibition of some pictures of crime in foreign countries. The Commissioner of Police, Bombay, who appeared to give evidence as the chairman of the local Board of Censors, stated that there was absolutely nothing to show that this has happened. Another loose generalisation about the effect of cinema shows is that it has promoted sexual licence — of this too, there is no proof. The ground has thus been cut from under the moral and civil reasons given for instituting this inquiry. If Government are really anxious to adopt a measure which will effectively reduce crime and vice, they should institute an enquiry into the effects of the liquor traffic on the moral and civil instincts of the people. Cinema shows may stimulate sexual and criminal impulses, but so long as the brakes are in working order no great danger need be apprehended regarding the conduct of the average man. Liquor, on the other hand, breaks down the brakes, and lets the animal impulses have free play.

It is not our contention that there is no room for improvement in cinema shows. In this country, where a very large proportion of the population is illiterate, the cinema and the wireless can be powerful agencies for spreading useful knowledge in combination with healthy entertainment. So long as the country has to depend largely on imported films, no systematic cultural propaganda is possible. It is, therefore, essential to institute a special section of the Educational Department to look after this business. This section should have nothing to do with the political or commercial aspect of the cinematograph industry. It should be solely occupied in devising and producing films calculated to enlarge the bounds of knowledge and to inspire a healthy national sentiment among the masses. The films issued by this agency should be made available either free or at a nominal price to the public, and there should be provided, as part of this scheme, a suitable and convenient place in every village where they may be exhibited. If, along with this useful and interesting information be regularly broadcast, much good may be done in a short time to raise the level of intelligence and enlightenment of the rural population. The Committee, we trust, will be able to place before Government some constructive scheme on the lines broadly outlined above as the result of their investigation. Import duties and censorship are not the best means of developing a vigorous and wholesome industry. Any kind of preference based not on the character of the imported films but upon their country of origin, is bound to create hardship and create resentment. Censorship, at best, is a precarious way of regulating theatres and shows. These, no doubt, have their own place but it is a minor one in the educational sphere. To make the films too didactic, will equally detract from their educative value. It is a first principle of pedagogy that you should interest the learner in the things he has to learn. This can only be done by associating with instruction an appeal to his emotions.

"THAILLIA."

We have received from Messrs. Revell and Co. a copy of the English translation of Thamilla, a French novel by Ferdinand Duchene, which is one of a series of five books that won the author a couple of literary prizes. The foreword by the translators, who are two American women, Miss Isabelle May and Miss Emily M. Newton, is frankly a piece of missionary propaganda, and in its unwarranted generalisations are very frequent. For, whereas Monsieur Duchene states that he "does not imply that all Kabyle women have as crude a fate as that of Thamilla," that "his one thought has been to underscore the truth in order to compel reflection," and again that he "has chosen extreme situations and cruel customs," the translators say that they "bear in the book the poignant and inarticulate cry not only of the Kabyle women, but of all the women of the East," and that they "have come to understand the meaning, for women at any rate, of being without Christ and having no hope in the world." We are glad to see, however, that in the book itself there is no discordant note and that the translators have wisely refrained from obstructing, either by insertions in the body of the book or by footnotes, their own theories.

The story, beautifully told, deals with the fortunes of Thamilla ("the Tortoise-Dove"'), a Kabyle girl, who is sold first to one husband from whom she is divorced against her will and sold to another by an unnatural and avaricious father. The portion of the story which deals with these incidents is not convincing.

Her second husband throws a stick at her in a frenzy of rage and kills his infant child which she holds at the time in her arms; the attempt to fasten the guilt on her fails. Thamilla is once again divorced, this time with the condition that she cannot remarry unless a certain sum is paid into the hands of her husband's family by her or by her.

father. The father repudiates Thamilla and banishes her from his house. Her wanderings from village to village are recounted; she abides first with two charcoal burners in their caves and later falls among a gang of bandits who employ women as decoys, who torture her most excruciatingly, for warning her first husband whom she is instructed to dote, and throw her down a ravine. She is rescued by an old man who tries to sell her to a European brothel-keeper but the tortured broken spirit of Thamilla rises triumphantly above this last indignity and she escapes. Brought before a magistrate she gives vague answers to his questions and departs with a crest of bread. A coin that is given her in charity is snatched out of her hand by a shepherd. At last she arrives at the town at which she lived with her first husband whom she still loves. She sees her own daughter and with great difficulty she is torn from her child and taken before the commissioner. In the military hospital, the interpreter is sent for. He comes. He is her first husband. He bears her in her delirium confesses love for him. Consciousness returns for one brief moment. She recognizes him and dies in his arms.

In this short summary it is hardly possible to convey the beauty and the pathos of the novel. The author is a master deep sympathizer and profound observer, and there are passages in the book that cannot easily be surpassed. Monsieur Duchene who was a Justice of the Court of Appeals in Algiers has had ample opportunity of studying the extreme situations and cruel customs of the Arabs, but it is to his credit that he has not allowed his long association with the darker side of life in Algiers to blind him to the redeeming features of that society. He has further realised that reform to be of any value in community must arise from among the members of that community. His book is not so much an indictment of the men of Kabylia as an appeal to them to change their canons.

WOMEN OF INDIA.

It is not a matter for people to wonder at, if I were to say that Indian women were noted for their intellect, valour and heroism. Endurance is their inbred character. It is not necessary for me, either to give a list of our heroines or enumerate their brave deeds. But one has to admit that, women were in the olden days as capable as men and were given almost the same opportunities as men for their physical, mental and moral development. We find that in many cases, women have an intellect even superior to that of men. This is evident from the fact that almost all famous writers have represented women as faithful and unyielding counsellors, unquestionably just and pure.

The place womanhood holds in our social, and other aspects of life, in our own generation lays bare the cause why India is backward (though it has a start of some hundreds of years) while other nations are progressing and why it has to meet with such fake sympathisers as Miss Mayo and the like. We say that a woman is not to guide, not even to think for herself, but should blindly be in slavish obedience to her lord. The reason, of course is child marriage at educational backwardness of our women. That ‘first marriage is the seal that marks temporary into everlasting love’ can be realised only by the well-educated. So when education is lacking there true happiness will all be lacking. The uses of education are universal known and it is not necessary for me to say much about it. It is enough to say that education enables a woman to exert a queenly power all around her. The needlessness have an erroneous notion that an educated girl thinks much of herself, and so cannot have true filial subjection. A girl’s education to enable her to advise and not to determine as so true filial subjection is possible in an educate girl. It is wrong to think of the superiority of one sex to the other. One is complementary to the other and both should contribute equal shares for the common happiness and perfection. One or be pure and noble if only rightly educate. Having emphasised the need of women education so far, let me consider its state at present. Few girls know their vernaculars, many did not receive an education from schools, while there are lots who never had any education. Even those few who attend school have to discontinue just when they begin to cultivate some taste for their studies, for the marriage question comes and intervenes. Either the consideration of a good bride-groom, dowry or for the sake of a grandmama, or most probably through fear of age and society the parents somehow, manages to arrange a match before the girl is ten or eleven at the most. The part that the marriage brokers play is mighty and no parent belonging to an ordinary station in society can escape their clutches. If the girl is eleven and is not married there will come threats of ostracism and fines from Orthodox quarters, and false rumour play the major mischief. The poor parent has to spend thousands and get- hold of a bride-groom to whom he has to sacrifice his hard earned money and his innocent daughter too. The state of the bride is most pitiable. She is not married either to his choice or with her consent. How can she be responsible if the choice turns out to be miserable? But she is held so and there are no divorce courts. If by some misfortune the little boy were to die, even if it be before she grows old enough to know him she has to lead a life of misery and widowhood. But on the other hand, if the girl were to die the boy is married immediately. What custom is this? Are the people blind to justice or are they selfish? It is not possible in India at least for a girl to marry and proceed with her studies. Early marriage is a curse under the guise of custom. Many faults are excused on the plea of customs, and though early marriage has become customary yet they cannot be absolved, because they are dangerous. The educated in following this only get about to deceive me. This early marriage leads on to a more serious problem of virgin widowhood and widow remarriage, or which subject different opinions have been expressed. If the marriageable age of girls is raised to 16 or somewhere about it this question gets easily solved and we will be effecting a happy reform. But so long as this child marriage persists even by one percent, widow marriage should be allowed whether the holy texts permit such a thing or not.

Early marriage is instrumental in bringing in early seclusion. This early seclusion affects the physical growth of womanhood. Lack of open air exercise at a time when it is most essential to enable the system to withstand the strain that is to be shortly placed upon it, leads to the outcomes of weaklings, and the heavy death rate among children is a standing testimony to the need for raising the age of marriage of both boys and girls.

But let us see what this educational training is which we advocate so much. Along with the elementary education physical training should also be given. How many subjects she knows is immaterial but in what she knows she must be correct, for by what she half knows she only troubles others with her doubts. What she knows must enable her to understand and appreciate what is good. In short a girl’s should be the same as that of a boy’s only a girl should be introduced to the study of serious subjects sooner as her intellect ripens sooner than that of a boy’s. It is a folly to think that girls are meant to be side board ornaments only. They have outdoor duties as well as indoor duties. They should assist in the ordering of the state. Their duty in their homes is to secure order, cleanliness and comfort. The same extends outside also. They should order the state and make it lovely. They should try to render help and comfort to the numerous poor that are outside their homes.

It is customary to talk about the duties and mission of women, as if they are separate from those of men. They are never separate but are complementary to one another. No one is complete without the other.

A Cosmopolitan Indian Ladies Dinner: To meet and congratulate Mrs. Hansa Ammal Dorai-kanni Mudaliyaru, Lady Municipal Councillor, Madura, a cosmopolitan dinner, was held at the Sri Meenakshi Seva Sangam on the 9th Instant at 8 P.M. There was a large gathering of American, Christian Brahmin & Non-Brahmin ladies the dinner being the first of its kind arranged by the Ladies Club. The gathering included among others, Mrs. Hess, Mrs. Ramoos, Mrs. Flint, Miss Swift, Dr. (Miss) M. Roberts, Mrs. Abbu Mudaliyaru, Mrs. Krishnan Menon, Mrs. Gopala Menon, Mrs. Guise, Mrs. Matling and it showed the esteem in which the guest of the evening is held in Madura. The dinner being over, Mrs. Abbu Mudaliyaru garlanded Mrs. Hansa Ammal Dorai-kanni Mudaliyaru and Miss B. M. "MOTHER INDIA"—A PERVERTED VIEW OF INDIA.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I have been reading the Indian Social Reformer with much more interest than ever, ever, since your articles on Miss Mayo’s book “Mother India” appeared. I should thank you for your service of selfless patriotism in writing them. If there is any book in the world which is meaner than the meaniest, it is this book of Miss Mayo. First of all look at the pretentious title of the book “Mother India”. I ask if India her Mother? This woman came to India like a “drain-inspectress” as Mahatma has so aptly said. The pity is that she has entirely misled the Europeans and Americans by drawing a false picture of the country! It is needless to say that she came purposely with a malicious heart to expose all the bad side of the country and its people. The hyperbolic language in which she has written her book is second to none in the history of literature.

In describing the image of Kali she attributes to her such qualities as lead one to suppose without further reference that Kali is the cruelest of all goddesses. Kali in the Hindu conception is the universal Mother who would suck up the blood of the cruel and wicked monsters to save humanity and while doing so has raised her hand of blessing and protection, which Miss Mayo describes as “the hand of menace” to those who are submissive and obedient, to the merciful Mother. It is no wonder that Sivarlings has a phallic origin. The conception of Hindu philosophers of the origin of creation was and is that it springs from the combination of Purusha with Prakriti or Spirit with matter. My object of worship was this very Linga for fifteen years, as I am a Veersva, (Lingayet) by birth but I never knew, until I read about it recently in papers, that it was an object of phallic origin, nor did any one of my community people say that it was so.

I myself had the conception that it represented the All-pervading shapeless Supreme Being.

She cites things which were prevailing ages and ages ago, ignoring the fact that, when all her forefathers were dwelling in caves and on trees, our forefathers were at the zenith of their glorious civilization. This is a country where one could see men of all stages, from the most primitive to the highest, Tagore, Gandhi and Sir J. C. Bose are Indians, and a Bhill and a Lambani who live in jungles are also Indians.

Superstitions exist not only in this country, but all over the world in some form or other. She did not care to observe the humility, simplicity and charity of our village folk.

There are innumerable quotations in her book having no authors. Already many of her quotations which are quoted with authorities, are being proved to be false on their references to the authors for verification.

With regard to politics in one place she says that British rule has done much for the progress of the country and in another place she says that the country cannot progress on account of the Indians being in Councils. Thus turning and twisting she goes on hopping from one point to another. In spite of it being contrary to her nature, she has appreciated the administration of Mysore and again at the end of it she concludes by saying that the Ruler previous and the present was and is trained by the British. Be that as it may, I am a Mysorean. I know the things of Mysore better than any outsider does. Students of politics should scrutinize the fact and find out the reasons for Mysore being progressive and British India being backward. Yet the Maharaja of Mysore is a staunch Hindu.—The history of every nation has recorded the phases of growth and decay.

Above all Miss Mayo has done a great dishonour which is inexcusable to the womanhood of India: "She does not seem to my countrymen and particularly to Christian ladies to love it". Unless she speaks ill of our sisters and brothers in their country, they feel they cannot get the sympathy of the public there. Working under such motives is selling the honour of our kith and kin. I am a Christian who has got as much interest and enthusiasm as anybody has got to propagate Christ. Rev. J. C. Winslow preaching at the Kirkee English Church lamented how unchristian it was to speak ill of others, particularly in connection with "Mother India." Rev. J. P. Edwards and Dr. Stanley Jones who is an American, have clearly expressed the same view did. The Metropolitan of Calcutta and many other great men have denounced Miss Mayo's work as a false commentary, but not the above mentioned Americans.

Now I have done. There is nothing new in Miss Mayo's book unseen by reformers and all that is new is not true. Those who want to write an answer should write not with a spirit of tit for tat, but with a spirit free from anger and jealousy.

Yours etc.

THE REACTION.

(By Mr. N. R. Dighe, B. A., LL. B.)

One of the most striking events of the Non-co-operation period is undoubtedly the rebellion of the Moplahs of Malabar. Hindus, numbering in thousands were forced to embrace Islam by the fanatic Moplahs; so also there were others made of stern stuff amongst Hindus who in that dark period rather than lose their religion, courted death and suffered inhuman tortures. This is not the first time in the history of Islamic religion when blood is split and faith sought to be spread. Whether rightly or wrongly we do not know, but it is a fact that someMahomedans do regard it as a religious duty to seek converts from other religions by force as well as by other means.

Another conversion-loving religion with which we have to deal is a religion of Love, based upon the teachings of the Holy Bible. The torch-bearers of this religion of the East are the so-called civilized sons and daughters of the West—the land of rising prosperity and the land of revolution. There in the West amidst glories of modern civilization the followers of Christ of every European nation, are devising ways and means so far his religion is concerned to augment their fold. So far as India is concerned, the pet dream of christianising this whole continent of the Aryans appears to have been given up. However this marks of conversion from other religions is there in all its forces with all its cruelty.

At the present moment, when the Hindu society has awakened to the danger of indifference shown by it so long only two pulls await our keen attention and deserve a suitable treatment. Hindus have lost many a son and daughter from their religion up to this time by conversion to either Islam or Christianity. The days of these unilateral pulls are numbered; and we Hindus of all castes and creeds are proclaiming this new fact, newly born on a broad scale in this land of Indus to the whole non-Hindu world, not only with our top-most voice but are illustrating the same in no uncertain measure by our propaganda work of reconversion back to Hinduism. In fact the Shuddhi movement of the Hindus is no more than a counter-pull.

Wherever there is a pull, a counter pull will always be there. This is a lesson which we are bound to teach to all those who would try to pull us from our religion. One really fails to see why Christians and Mahomedans should seek material for their faith in the present instrument of conversion. For conversion is nothing more or nothing less than disguised barbarity. If men and women born in a particular religion after the full growth of their minds are taken up with the practices and philosophy of some other religion, which they then seek, that is conversion indeed. But what merit is there, in bringing about wholesale conversions by compulsion or by the lure of better prospects. Of the four great religions of the world viz, (1) Hinduism (2) Buddhism (3) Christianity and (4) Mahomedanism it may be said, that there are few very instances of intelligent, educated and cultured men and women of one religion seeking the protection and practices of another religion. When this broad fact is remembered that ultimately all religions lead to one God and one soul, what meaning is there in quarelling over a label? Yet strange to say, all these religious fights are for the label and not for the law-spiritual which is one and indivisible and everywhere the same that God is one and this world is His creation. Do it said with a pardonable pride that we Hindus alone do not share in this conversion-delusion to which the followers of Islam and Christ are so painfully subject. 'Follow your own religion and you will get the final beatitude,' says the Bhagavad Gita and adds: 'Another religion is highly dangerous.' A challenge may safely be thrown out to all conversion-loving missionaries to show as a single quotation from their religious Books, which will but faintly approach the grandeur and moral sublimity reached by the above quoted, but by our self seeking religious enemies often quoted, dictum of the Bhagavad Gita.

So the re-conversion of the Hindus is a natural reaction of the forces let loose upon our society by others for which we are not at all responsible in any sense. Don't convert so we may not convert—such is the simple position. Come what may we have to face a situation which is not of our making. It is also equally true that the 'Hindu society will so longer allow the forces making and framing of a society in which its vital interests are interwoven without taking the necessary precautions to guard its own interests to secure its own safety.
INDIA THROUGH AUSTRALIAN EYES.

(By Mrs. S. G. Mannering.)

"An Australian friend of mine has been kind enough to provide me with a clipping from a Queensland paper of August 21. For the information of the readers of the "Indian Social Reformer," I append a summary of the article and the headline, "India's Social Blot—Sweeping Indictment of Child Marriages—A remarkable Book"—and this is the summary that follows:

"According to cablegrams received from India yesterday, great indignation has been stirred up throughout that vast country by the revelations of a remarkable book entitled 'Mother India.'"

"The work of an American woman, Miss Catherine Mayo, the book contains a sweeping indictment of the whole social system by which the lives of 300 million people of different races and creeds are governed."

"More particularly, it attacks the age-old thraldom of womanhood and the deeply ingrained custom of child-marriages—a practice bolstered up by the inexcusable ordinances of religious caste laws and superstition."

"The Authoress tells an appalling story of incredible misery, suffering and unspeakable vice created by the mating of immature girls—mere children of nursery age—and of the terrible mortality of their offspring."

"She paints with a scathing pen a picture of decadent, decrepit manhood—the legacy of vicious habits inculcated from the cradle—and of a vast people bound body and soul in chains of slavery to the tyranny of ancient traditions."

"This denunciatory onslaught is not directed against the British administration of India but to the historical characteristics of the races under its sway, which have prevailed despite far-reaching reforms and the beneficent advance of Western Science."

"Following this summary is a long extract headed "Martyred Child-Wives. Horrors of an age-old System, Appalling Conditions of Motherhood.""

"I shall now give the phrases and paragraphs which appear in bold type, "The husband who is rituallyistically Her personal God—Maternity is an unspeakable Oraad—Miss Mayo presents a whole picture of a state of affairs which is well-nigh incredible to the Western mind.—By that light one saw her Witch-of-Endore face through its vermin-infected elf-Locks, her hanging rage, her dirty claws, as she peered with fettered and almost sightless eyes out over the misty-cloud she had raised.—It is not the poor only that suffer like this, Sweeper-girl or Brahman, outcast or Queen, there is essentially little to choose between their lots in that fierce moment for which alone they were born."

"To run counter to the Indian's tenets as to religious duties religious prohibitions, and God-given rights, has ever meant the eclipse of Indian reason in madness, riot and bloodshed. And to enforce a law whose keeping or breaking must be a matter of domestic secrecy is in such a country as India at least, impossible. The British administration of India, be it good, bad, or indifferent has nothing whatsoever to do with the conditions above indicated.—The whole pyramid of the Indian's woes material and spiritual—poverty, sickness, Ignorance, political instability, melancholy ineffectiveness, not forgetting that sub-conscious conviction of inferiority which be for ever barcs and advertises by his gaw militant and imaginative alertness for social affronts rests upon a rock-bottom physical base. This base is simply, his manner of getting into the world and his sex-life thenceforward."

"TheAustralian friend who has been kind enough to forward the clipping to me, sends me some queries and his own personal and American opinion. "What is your opinion of the statements made in the book 'Mother India'? Is child marriage prevalent as this article would have us believe? Do Indian statistics prove that the Infant Mortality rate is as high as stated? I can quite understand that the book is a bit exaggerated. It is written to sell and Americans specialise in sensationalism. The fact that it is printed in America will discount the statements made in it in British countries. We in Australia do not take Americans too seriously."

"That is enough to fire the blood of any Indian. Just think of a woman playing havoc with a mighty nation like India and that too her precious good name. For, the same friend who sends the cutting, also writes, I and thousands more in this country are under the impression that the Indian will not tolerate alcohol drink. Drunkenness in this country (Australia) has often been put forward as an excuse for poverty. And others have often encountered that argument with. 'Look at India, her people do not drink and are poor. Nobody has contradicted that argument.' Yes, nobody has contradicted the argument; but they shall now, if India does not undertake to reap the glorious past, if her sons and daughters undertake not to bring her to the threshold of a triumphant dawn washed clean of the darkness of ignorance—to look on a rosetate future."

"Remember, young men and women of India, that our Hindustan alone of all nations of antiquity is still young, still growing, still keeping a firm hold upon her path, while reverently striving to weave her future. A world of discoveries awaits the student of Ancient Social history. The path leads him across the water along stepping stones that may still be detected."

"Is it not the duty of every man and woman, that is worth the name of Indian, to free mother India from her present economic and social reform? Shall we not say that we will begin in right earnest from to-day? Do we not find around us, things of the past? Is not the life that we live to-day created out of the life and lives that went before? Is not the present the wreck-age of the past? And does not the future wait for us to create it out of the materials left us by the past aided by our own understanding of the inheritance? Even in the twentieth century India cannot escape the conditions imposed by her past."

"Let our young men and women who are in colleges and high schools remember that every system of learning must have some points of contact with lay society. As I have on a previous occasion said, all learning must be a means whereby the individual can adapt himself or herself to his or her moral and social environment. We must remember that our society is ever changing and that we consequently are changing along with it. None of us here is a unit by himself. He is inseparably bound up with his family, his town, his state and consequently his nation. Empire and nation mean organization and an organization whose basis is the consciousness of a unity that transcends the family. Empire and nation demand as their precedent a strong civic concept. The sense of unity can only occur as a spiritual reaction against a manifoldness—search the universe through and through; nowhere will you find isolation, an individual, a thing. The man working by itself and for itself. The men who unite with energy for the attainment of the common goal must be men accustomed to combined action and sustained co-operation; men who know the grounds of their faith in one another; men who are familiar with certain outstanding principles of conduct and constantly dominate by them. The requisite discipline is conferred by the necessity of obedience on peril of death and clear mutual understanding.

COMPAIGN AGAINST COMMERCIAL VICE.

A well-attended public meeting of the citizens of Bombay convened by the local Vigilance Association and 28 other Societies was held in the Sir Cowasji Jehangir Hall, on Wednesday evening to condemn the commercialised vice and urge upon Government the need of the early introduction of legislation to make the keeping of brothels illegal. Sir Purshottamdas presided on the occasion and the audience included several prominent men and women.

Sir Purshottamdas declared that ever since he read the description of a woman being brutally burned to death by a brothel-keeper he had come to the conclusion that any system which permitted such a thing should be stamped out, for such conditions were a disgrace to Bombay. About 1,000 brothels with approximately 10,000 women leading a life of infamy, all for the sake of maintenance—these by themselves, he believed, were sufficient to arouse the citizens of Bombay to a sense of humiliation. It was a disgrace that these brothels existed in the city.

"Our Work that Business."

To allow prostitution on a scale which could be called "commercial" and to allow it to be conducted in a manner which led to the distress of womanhood was a thing which could not be tolerated by those who had any sense of responsibility as citizens, if there is to be prostitution, let it be by free will or by force of circumstances but I do not think that any city or any Government can tolerate people kidnapping young girls and keeping them in brothels as captives, treating them in the most cruel manner that one can think of and pleading before Government that they are only carrying on normal business, though the public meeting is devoted for saying 'out with this business!' declared Sir Purshottamdas. It was stated that prostitution was a weakness of human nature and to that extent it should be tolerated. It was bad enough to tolerate it, bad enough to put up with that physical craving of men. He hoped that the Government of Bombay would without hesitation give effect to the resolution that was put before the meeting.

VICE DISTRICTS. A GREAT EVIL.

Mrs. Sarojini Naidu moved the following resolution:—

(a) This public meeting of the citizens of Bombay desires to express emphatically its opinion that the existence of brothels and of a vice district in the city is a great evil which calls for urgent action on the part of Government, inasmuch as it supports, encourages and facilitates the commercialised traffic in women and girls, offers ample opportunities to pimps procurers and other agents employed in this traffic to entice, reduce and terrorise their victims and constitutes a great danger to the physical and moral well-being of the people of this city. It therefore, urges upon Government the clamant need of the early introduction of legislation which shall make the keeping of brothels illegal. This meeting, however, realises that there are some practical difficulties in the way of the immediate and total suppression of all brothels in the city, and, in therefore suggests that while the keeping of brothels should be made illegal, the policy of closing them down should be given effect to gradually, during an operative period of three years from the date when the proposed legislation will come into force. (b) This meeting further desires to express its firm conviction that the moral law is the same for both men and women, and it accordingly requests Government to take strong measures if necessary by further legislation, for the punishment of pimps, procurers and other agents, men and women, who submit wholly or in part on the earning of prostitution and of landlords who knowingly let their premises for the purpose of prostitution. (c) This meeting also desire to invite the attention of the Government of Bombay to articles 3 and 4 relating to the repatriation of foreign prostitutes, in the International Convention of 1904 as ratified by the International Convention of 1921, to which India is a signatory, and urges that as a first step towards the suppression of the traffic in women and children foreign and Indian, Government should take early steps to deport all foreign prostitutes, and also all prostitutes whose domicile or origin is outside Bombay.

Mrs. Naidu said that the object of the meeting was the abolition of slavery which obtained in brothels. She did not believe that hunger would drive even a most over-sexed woman to continue a perpetual life of prostitution. What they demanded and what they wished to see done was that brothels should be abolished. She declared that men and women must have courage and conviction burning red-hot within their hearts that there should not be one thousand homes of shame and degradation in the city. She exhorted the audience to take a pledge with a determination to extricate the fallen women from a life of vice and misery.

Mr. R. P. Pawar, who seconded the proposition, said it was a matter of deep humiliation that they should hold a public meeting to impress on the Government of Bombay the necessity for suppressing the dens of vice. How could any Government which claimed to be enlightened and progressive, tolerate a system of savage, sexual and criminality, he asked. Government had been sorely apathetic in matters of social legislation in the past, and the speaker declared that it did not adopt necessary measures to wipe out the brothels and the vice district in the city, it would lose all public sympathy.

miracle of grace in the sense of some strange intervention of the Divine. Character is grown; it is builded; it is developed. The best soil that we have yet discovered for the growing of character is the right kind of a home. Here is a little group of old and young, mature and immatures strong and weak, living together in mutual love.

The only educational ministry of the family extends over a vast variety of interests. Picture to yourself a father with house slippers and lounging gown sitting before the fireplace in the evening reading aloud from one of the masters of literature. Picture the walls panelled with book-shelves where every member of the family from the child in the kindergarten to the gray-haired grandmother may find books of interest and inspiration. The ministry of music; the silent eloquence of great pictures; the enlightening conversation at the table on the questions of the day; the flashings of science, the problems and progress of religion; all this makes the family one of the greatest educational institutions in the world.

And then the Educational function of the family has unlimited possibilities. In the life of the race the family was the first and for a long time the only educational institution. Every Hebrew home was a school where the parents taught their children the principles of the Law, and trained them for the practical duties of life. I heard not long ago of a certain Jewish lad who repeated the first five books of the Bible without a single mistake. There is a grave danger in these days when so many parents find themselves going to school to educate their children because of increased facilities for education and of much higher standards that we overlook the educational function of the family. Of course, it was quite inevitable that as human experience accumulated and as knowledge of the arts and sciences increased and as life became more complex and complicated the education of children should become a task beyond the ability of the average parent. The time came when the teaching which the child received from his parents had to be supplemented by the instruction of trained teachers in an institutional environment with material that has been carefully selected and graded with a view to its educative value.

But this does not rob the family of its educational function. The whole work of education can never be accomplished by the schools no matter how wise their administration nor how capable their teachers. The head master of Eton School at one time said that the fundamental issues of character are settled for most boys before they enter public school as a result of the quiet influences and common associations of the home. Moreover the educational ministry of the family extends over a vast variety of interests.
father. The father repudiates Tamilla and banishes her from his house. Her wanderings from village to village are recounted; she abides first with two charcoal burners in their caves and later falls among a gang of bandits who employ women as decoys, who torture her most inhumanly, for warning her first husband whom she is instructed to dope, and throw her down a ravine. She is rescued by an old man who tries to sell her to a European brothel-keeper but the tortured broken spirit of Tamilla rises triumphantly above this last indignity and she escapes. Brought before a magistrate she gives vague answers to his questions and departs with a crust of bread. A coin that is given her in charity is snatched out of her hand by a shepard. At last she arrives at the town at which she lived with her first husband whom she still loves. She sees her own daughter and with great difficulty she is torn from her child and taken before the commissioner. In the military hospital, the interpreter is sent for. He comes. He is her first husband. He hears her in her delirium confess her love for him. Consciousness returns for one brief moment. She recognises him and dies in his arms.

In this short summary it is hardly possible to convey the sympathy and the pathos of the novel. The author is a man of deep sympathy and understanding and there are passages in the book that cannot easily be surpassed. M. 0. Venkatachalam who was a Justice of the Court of Appeals in Algiers has had ample opportunity of studying the extreme situations and cruel customs of the Arabs, but it is to his credit that he has not allowed his long association with the darker side of life in Algiers to blind him to the redeeming features of that society. He has further realised that reform to be of any value in community among the members of that community. His book is not so much an indictment of the men of Kabylia as an appeal to them to change their canons.

WOMEN OF INDIA.

(By Mr. C. Venkatachalam.)

It is not a matter for people to wonder at, if I were to say that Indian women were noted for their intellect, valour and heroism. Endurance is their inbred character. It is not necessary for me, either to give a list of our heroines or enumerate their brave deeds. But one has to admit that, women were in the olden days as capable as men and were given almost the same opportunities as men for their physical, mental and moral development. We find that in many cases, women have an intellect even superior to that of men. This is evident from the fact that almost all famous writers have represented women as faithful and unfailing counsellors, unquestionably just and pure.

The place womanhood holds in our social, and other aspects of life, in our own generation lays bare the case why India is backward (though it has as start of some hundreds of years) while other nations are progressing and why it has to meet with such fakes sympathisers as Miss Mayo and the like. We say that a woman is not to guide, not even to think for herself, but should blindly be in slavish obedience to her lord. The reason, of course is child marriage and educational backwardness of our women. That "true marriage is the seal that marks temporary into everlasting service and faith into eternal love" can be realised only by the well-educated. So where education is lacking there true happiness will also be lacking. The uses of education are universally known and it is not necessary for me to say much about its. It is enough to say that education enables a woman to exert a queenly power all around her. The uneducated have an erroneous notion that an educated girl thinks much of herself, and so cannot have true wisely subjection. A girl's education is to enable her to advise and not to determine and so true wisely subjection is possible in an educated girl. It is wrong to think of the superiority of one sex to the other. One is complementary to the other and both should contribute equal shares to their common happiness and perfection. One can be pure and noble if only rightly educated. Having emphasised the need of women education so far, let me consider its state at present. Few girls know their vernaculars, many did not receive any education from schools, while there are lots who never had any education. Even those few girls who attend school have to discontinue just when they begin to cultivate some taste for their studies, for the marriage question comes and interveinces. Either for the consideration of a good bride-groom, less dowry or for the sake of a grandmama, or most probably through fear of age and society the parent somehow, manages to arrange a match before the girl is ten or eleven at the most. The part that the marriage brokers play is mighty and no parent belonging to an ordinary station in society can escape their clutches. If the girl is eleven and is not married there will come threats of ostracism and fine from "Orthodox" quarters, and false rumours play the major mischief. The poor parent has to spend thousands and get hold of a bride-groom to whom he has to sacrifice his hard earned money and his innocent daughter too. The state of the bride is most pitiable. She is not married either to her choice or with her consent. How can she be responsible if the choice turns out to be miserable? But she is held so and there are no divorce courts. If by some misfortune the little boy were to die, even if it be before she grows old enough to know him, she has to lead a life of misery and widowhood. But on the other hand, if the girl were to die the boy is married immediately. What custom is this? Are the people blind to justice or are they selfish?

It is not possible in India at least for a girl to marry and proceed with her studies. Early marriage is a curse under the guise of custom. Many faults are excused on the plea of custom, and though early marriage has become customary yet they can not be absolved, because they are dangerous. The educated in following this only eat about to deceive us. This early marriage leads on to more serious problem of virgin widowhood and widow remarriage, on

The late Sir Sadasiva Aiyar:- We deeply regret to record the death of Sir T. Sadasiva Aiyar, which took place on Thursday at his residence in Madras. Sr Sadasiva Aiyar belonged to the first band of young men who, under the leadership of Dr. S. R. Rangoonath Rao, unfurled the banner of social reform in Southern India. Rangoonath Rao was a Shastraic reformer, that is, he held that social reform would have to be carried out in accordance with the precepts of the ancient Hindu sacred books. He, therefore, published texts and translations of the several Srutis and Smritis with a view to converting the orthodox people that it was they and not the social reformers who were acting in a contravention of the authentic mandates of the Hindu sages. Sadasiva Aiyar was Rangoonath Rao’s most ardent disciple and continued to be so when nearly all others had enlisted under the flag of rational social reform as opposed to the Shastric school. Later, under the influence of Dr. Besant and the Theosophists, Sadasiva Aiyar’s outlook was greatly enlarged and he became a powerful protagonist of nationalism in its broadest sense. The leading feature of his character was his utter sincerity. He was no mere lip reformer who preached but did not practice. Whatever he believed in became the object of his life and thus he was not merely a great advocate but a great pattern of enlightened Hindudw. The highest tribute to his broad-mindedness was paid by the late Panjagur ministry of Madras which, in spite of his pronounced anti-Brahman bias, viewed him as the most suitable person to work the newly passed Act for the better management of the Hindu temples in Southern India. Sadasiva Aiyar was nominated the chairman of the board of management. He was exceedingly fortunate in his wife who thoroughly entered into the spirit and supported him in his strenuous endeavours to set a practical example of reformed Hindudom to his fellow countrymen. Lady Sadasiva Aiyar is to-day in South India, what the late Mrs. Kamadai Kanada was in Western India, the life and soul of all women’s movements. We send to her and her family our sincere condolences on their great bereavement.

Prohibition in Bhopal: It is most regrettable that the State has felt constrained to give up the prohibition policy which it had inaugurated in October, 1921. The visible loss of seventeen lives during five and a half years seems to have convinced the State that the experiment was a failure and the fact that revenue which under a total prohibition regime would have gone to the State was going to the neighbouring territories which unlike Bhopal did not enforce prohibition has persuaded the Government of that State to repeal its prohibition laws and wait till the neighbouring territories adopt prohibition. This is a very weak policy. We are sure that there was less drink in Bhopal under the Prohibition regime than there will be under the new law, and the Nawab is well advised to carry into consideration the many invisible benefits of prohibition to his people. It would have been far more preferable if Bhopal had not introduced prohibition at all than giving it up in so light-headed a way. That the people indulged in the drink habit by illicit means is nothing surprising when the Government is not sufficiently earnest about the measure as is the Bhopal. The impression is that all the more unfortunate as the State is a Mahomedan one—and one, too, that has been administered by women rulers for nearly a century. We are sure that Her Highness the Dowager Begum would never have sanctioned such a retrograde measure. The incident, however, does not prove that prohibition has few chances of success in India. It only shows that the Government of Bhopal, like that of British India, is not prepared to regard the drink question from any point of view other than the fiscal one.

Pachaiyappa’s Trust and the Panamsas: The Trustees of the Pachaiyappa Charities are to be congratulated on having the courage of their convictions as evidenced by the stand they felt constrained to adopt the depressed classes the benefit of the Trust. The resolution adopted at the recent meeting runs as follows: “In view of the observation made by Mr. Justice Waller, the Trustees of the Pachaiyappa’s Charities resolved to admit the depressed classes into their educational institutions.” It will be remembered that a suit was filed sometime back in the Madras High Court for a direction permitting the trustees to admit the depressed classes into the educational institutions maintained by the Pachaiyappa’s Charities. Last week Mr. Justice Waller dismissed the application as not maintainable under the provisions of Sec. 19 of C. P. C. But in the course of the judgment his lordship observed that he did so with reluctance because of the merits of the case. His lordship felt convinced that the depressed classes felt under the denomination ‘Hindus’ and were therefore entitled to be admitted into the Pachaiyappa’s Educational institutions. Having regard to the fact that the depressed classes adopted Hindu customs and manners and that they were governed by the Hindu Law, his lordship was of opinion that the depressed classes were Hindus. This view gained support from the fact that no objector had brought it to the notice of the trustees that the depressed classes who was also a member of the Madras Municipal Corporation or the Senate to take part in the election of the trustees under the... schoen which provided that two trustees were to be elected by the Municipal Corporation and the Secretary of the Municipal Corporation towards the removal of the disabilities of the depressed classes and its value is enhanced by the fact that it has been taken by the Trustees of the premier Hindú College in South India.

Bomhay Women's Educational Conferences. The year 1922 witnessed the details of the Women's Educational Conference in session this week end. It is gratifying that these conferences are becoming a regular annual feature and the present conference is the second of its kind held in Bombay. The interest and enthusiasm evinced by the women of this presidency are sufficient proof that they are no longer content to be the passive recipients of the rights and privileges extended to them and that they wish to take an active part in shaping their lives as women in other countries are doing. Education is rightly engaging their attention, as it is the root of all progress. The present Conference confines itself to questions of primary education for girls. This does not go very far. Secondary education is as important for the spread of primary education as for higher education. The emphasis on primary education methods, among other things, on the teachers who are entrusted with it and who do not generally go beyond the secondary stage. We hope the Conference will take into consideration this important fact.

Art in East and West: Connoisseurs of Art have always held that no true comparisons can be instituted between the art of the Orient and that of the Occident. Each starts from a different origin, has a different aim and arrives at a different end. It has been held, however, to be possible to define certain qualities of dissimilarity in the two arts and thus arrive at their broad distinguishing features. This is exactly what a writer on “Art in East and West” in the latest number of the Current Thought implies in the course of an interesting article. “What Western music strives to produce,” he remarks, “is rather the state of mind appropriate to the custom, whereas in the East the custom itself is the main consideration. As is well known, Eastern music is melodic and Western music is harmonic. Writing of sculpture and painting, the one great distinction between Western artists and Easterners is that they were too much addicted to formalism and had “no striving after the spirit above and beyond the requirements of this world.” But the statues of Venus de Milo, he avers, is a brilliant exception. Any one wondering with the art-then-savages cannot but agree with him as regards the lack of spirituality in the portrayal of Christ. “The poverty of spiritual satisfaction,” he writes, “is in Western Art, though not a matter for serious criticism is a distinctive feature, and nowhere is it more striking than in the pictures of Christ. I have seen scores of them, many of the world's greatest artists, but in not one did I find any godliness, except the conventional aureola. I could not help recalling the spiritual composure of Buddha in the attractiveness of which the Imperfect or even ugly delineations of the physical frame are forgotten and the Divine enlightenment of Avalokiteśwari which gives so much divinity to grace, and beauty so human. The Christ of Western art is the creation of God by man in his own image. Here is manifest a shortcoming in the art of the West which has not been noticed and formed an Association the object of which is to promote the education of Muslim girls in the presidency. One of the important resolutions adopted unanimously at the meeting was that free and compulsory education be extended to all Muslim girls with suitable religious arrangements. Mrs. Muṣnerudin who presided gave a graphic account of the wonderful progress made by women in Egypt and Turkey whom she had visited recently. We reproduce from the Sarayeys the following:-

“I must confess that I expected to find the Egyptian women in the same backward conditions as my Indian Muslim sisters, but on reaching Cairo my mind was disabused by the pleasant surprise of seeing men and women engaged in the avocations of their daily lives side by side. I interviewed several ladies and distinguished from men, of either art and soul that they, both men and women, were enjoying equal rights without let or hindrance by the arbitrary hand of men as it is unfortunately the case in this country. A noticeable feature which characterises the men was their magnanimous conduct towards women which was animated with respect and charity towards them. I found the women in accordance with the progress of the men. I sincerely hope that the Indian Muslim men will follow the noble example of their brothers in the Near. Now coming to the Turkish women I will conclude my speech by a few more remarks regarding the giant advance they have made over their Egyptian sisters. In Constantinople I met Turkish women without veil, driving, riding and working in the fields with the men. I visited a Turkish bath in which I found Turkish women swimming as cleverly as men. The Turks provide themselves on knowing several languages, such as German, French, Italian and Greek, along with Arabic which they talk with ease and elegance. I was told there were not a few Turkish women in the army who were being trained as aviators.”

Bengal Detainees: Referring to the release of Mr. Satyendra Chandra Mitra, Earl Winterton is reported to have said in Parliament that the “object of detaining all these persons was to prevent them from being used for past crimes for which they had not been tried, but in order to prevent their conspiring to commit certain criminal acts. Commenting on this the Forward of Calcutta shows the absurdity of the reason advanced. “This laboured explanation,” writes our contemporary, “seems to have hardly improved his lordship's position as a sturdy defender of the Bengal Ordinance and all that it means. Conspiracies to commit certain criminal acts forms, we know, the graveness of the so-called charge, formulated by the C. L. D. against the victims of the Bengal Ordinance. His lordship seems to be oblivious to these crimes” for which a man "had not been tried" should not be a plausible excuse for his detention for an indefinite period under the Bengal Ordinance. He, therefore, thought fit to base his theory on the notion of committing "certain criminal acts in the future. His lordship conveniently forgot that all "past crimes" have to be established by legal evidence. The proposed charge and trial did not cease if only the charge relates to some crimes to be committed in the future."
THE STATUTORY COMMISSION.

Nothing can show more clearly that the differences of caste and sect are superficial and that at bottom all Indians feel that they are one, than the unanimity, so sudden as surprising, with which all classes, communities and opinions have joined in the protest against the exclusion of Indians from the Statutory Commission. This Commission has to enquire into the working of the constitutional reforms introduced in 1920, and to recommend what further reforms should be adopted in fulfilment of the pledge of progressive self-government given in 1917. It is an old saying that the wearer knows best where the shoes pinch. No statesman, it might be thought, would think of appointing a committee of total strangers to find out whether the Indian constitutional shoe pinch or not and where it pinches. But the British statesmen who form His Majesty's Government at the present time, think that the opinion of the wearer is likely to be biased and that unbiased opinion on the question whether the shoe fits him or not, can be best secured by appointing a Commission of persons who have never seen the shoe or the wearer in their lives.

In reply to the protests raised against this preposterous proposal, the Indian ‘people’ are told that full opportunities will be provided for them to exhibit their shoes and the corsets on their feet before the Commission, and that that body would judge how far the latter are due to the former or to the constitutional defects of the wearers. The Commission will consider in the light of expert advice, such as Miss Katherine Mayo’s “Mother India,” how far child marriages, the prohibition of widow remarriage and the custom of untouchability, render Indian feet liable to corsets. And it may even adopt her ready-made conclusion that “the British administration of India, be it good, bad or indifferent,” has nothing whatsoever to do with India’s national depression which is entirely due to the “Indian’s manner of getting into the world and his sex-life henceforward.” It has been officially denied both in Parliament and the Legislative Assembly that the Government of India and the India Office have not given any help to Miss Mayo except supplying her with information for the production of her book. Why Government should have supplied information and not Miss Mayo to collect her materials in the same way as other writers, has not been explained. And the kind of information supplied shows that a propaganda adverse to Indians was distinctly intended. However that may be, the hurried publication of Miss Mayo’s book just in time for the Statutory Commission is a fact and we have it on her own authority that the India Office was the first to help her in her enterprise.

Indian leaders have almost intuitively grasped the connection between “Mother India” and the compulsion of the Statutory Commission. They feel that the appointment of a Commission, composed of men whose only qualification is that they know nothing of India, is deliberately intended as a means of damning India in the eyes of the civilized world which is getting increasingly sensitive to imperialistic domination.

The startling unanimity of protest is due to this feeling which every Indian shares. A total boycott of the Commission is the form most widely suggested for the protest. “We should, have nothing to do with the Commission,” is what several distinguished leaders, most of them Liberals, are saying. The Commission, however, has everything to do with us, and it is a question whether the boycott is the best and most effective means of dealing with it. This is recognised, and it has been said by Dr. Besant and others that the boycott by itself is only a step which should be followed promptly by a constructive effort by Indian leaders to frame a constructive scheme for the future constitution. The framing of a constructive scheme, even without the boycott, will do all that is necessary to counteract the Commission, and Lord Birkenhead in his speech in the House of Lords on Thursday expressed his readiness to consider any such scheme put forward by Indians.

The boycott is a purely negative method and its importance does not extend beyond that of a gesture of dissent. Is this gesture necessary? The argument that a complete boycott is impracticable, does not carry conviction to us, ”If a thing is right and necessary, the question of its practicability will not deter earnest souls from doing it. An impracticable thing becomes practicable when several men make up their minds to do it. If even a minority are prepared to undertake a boycott, it should be undertaken, if the course is necessary. It is the necessity and the effectiveness of it, that should determine our decision. We are not aware of any country which gained self-government by the passive method of boycott. Boycott in Italy and America failed to secure self-government which was gained only by active rebellion. The question, therefore, requires serious consideration. Every other means of achieving the object in view should be exhausted before we think of a course which, if it is effective and to the extent it is effective, must take us much beyond the limits we intend for it. Let us not repeat the mistake of Bardoli to work up public feeling to a high pitch and suddenly to call it back to the normal level as to produce instant demoralisation such as overtook the pre-operation after Bardoli.

What then is the alternative? Are we to take the decision of the British Government “lying down” as the phrase goes? Quite a large part of the perplexities surrounding human problems is due to emotional adjectives and phrases. This is inevitable but at the same time it is desirable to sift the emotion from the essence of every question. We need not and should not take the Commission “lying down” which, by the way, seems precisely what is A VYSSA VIRGIN WIDOW-REMARRIAGE.

By Mr. T. A. Curzzi.

I traveled 512 miles each way to be present at a widow marriage, at Ellora on the 17th November. But do I regret it in the least? Not at all.

What would not one give to have seen the happy face of the bride and to have participated in the joy of witnessing the birth of a new consciousness in my ancient but unprogressive Vyasa community? The occasion was not one when the conventional telegram or the letter of good-wisher—a twelve- or oneanna worth—of sympathy as a friend of mine—calls it—ever, a small token of "great" esteem, would have done. The least that a real well-wisher of the community, who has yearned for such events to happen not at long intervals of a year or a decade but as matters of daily occurrence, can do is to attend such functions with the members of his family and to dine with the marriage-party so that others less placed or weaker than him might gather the necessary courage from his example and thereby make such reforms practicable.

True, many of the townpeople kept away under one pretext or other. The Municipal quarrels or some other excuse was greedily availed of. Some who had professed sympathy in the press and on the platform though present at the marriage-ceremony were found missing at the time of the marriage-feast. True also that the women, with the exception of a dozen: or so, were not allowed by their husbands to attend the marriage though much they felt the injustice of the life-sentence sought to be imposed by society on child and baby widows. Still, a large number of Vyases of wealth and leading bade from far and near to bless the marriage of Rukmani before whom a vista of new life and hope was opened on this memorable day.

Pandits there undoubtedly are who can quote texts in support of the great virtue of life-long enforced widowhood. I have neither the learning nor the time to cross swords with them. I am content to take my stand on reason, on instinct and on rough ideas of justice and injustice and of right and wrong, and these tell me thatMahatma Gandhi is right when he says this reform is the least which we Indians owe to our womenfolk, to Hindumdom and to India.

To such a view problems from this standpoint texts and glosses which are transgressed hundred times every day by some people whenever it suits their conveniences but which are trod on by them merely to stem the tide of progress and reform are either out-of-date or are impediments to be brushed aside, in the attainment of a worthy object.

But let us take leave of our pandits. Rukmani who is sitting near her (new) life-partner is worth a few moments of our attention. She was given in marriage by her parents in her eighth year. For has not Parasara said: "ahatvarsha bhavet kanya?" But Parasara did not foresee that the boy-husband, who had seen the bride only during the four days of the marriage would die within the second anniversary of the wedding day. The girl has ever after been branded as a widow. At first, of course, she did not realize her misery. But as she entered on her teens, the utter blank that was to be her lot in life dawned upon her. The parents—and they are very poor—could not fail to note what was passing in the mind of their unfortunate child and had not the courage to break out the truth or to write to the heavens which their inner consciences approved of. A kind gentleman to whom God had denied daughters and whose wife yearned for one came forward and adopted the girl and since then the girl has experienced the joys of life in a cultured household where the word widow was not thrown at her face every minute and where she picked up the elements of music and a good general education. In her fifteenth year, her foster-parents thought of giving her in marriage and were on the look-out for a suitable husband for her. But orthodoxy and reactionarism were soon up in arms and the parents were subjected to various threats such as life-long excommunication in this life and the fire in the next. The girl was hastily withdrawn from the bosoms of the foster-parents. But after months of reasoning and persuasion, the parents give their hearty consent and the marriage is actually taking place to-day.

The marriage-hall is gorgeously decorated. There is music, both indigenous and exotic. The attendance is easily a thousand, consisting of all castes and nationalities. Telegrams and letters of sympathy pour in. The parents of Rukmani are, here awe-struck with what is going on before their very eyes. They can hardly recognize their sorrow-stricken miserable child in the tall and graceful young lady in her golden yellow wedding-inautals and the costly jewels which the bountiful of her foster-parent has found for her. In the evening there is a grand procession.

Dear reader, can you tell me what thoughts are passing in the mind of Rukmani just now as she sits in the coach and pair almost bent with the weight of garlands round her neck, with her life-partner by her side and as she hears the many approving remarks of the ladies of the town as they stand in groups at their thresholds to see the procession pass by? I am neither a poet nor a man of letters and so do not feel I am up to that task. But I ask one favour of you and it is this. Imagine for a moment that Rukmani is your own daughter and in the circumstances what else would you have wished for her?
A NEW SMRITI.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

My humble excuse for this intrusion on your attention is the ardour which I share with you for the all-round progress and reform of Hindu society. As an important and much-needed step in this direction, I have outlined a socio-religious manifesto in the form of a Smruti which should suit the needs and aspirations of all thoughtful modern Hindus. My idea is that this work should be given Sanskrit verses, and accompanied by an accurate version in every literary Indian vernacular and in English, should be promulgated under the authority of as many Hindu leaders of all parts of India—Brahman and Non-Brahman, touchable and untouchable, man and woman—as may be induced to endorse it with imprimatur; it should serve as a New Testament of Hinduism, by which all those Hindus, who have outgrown and wish fellow-Hindus to outgrow the existing socio-religious order, may claim to adjust and regulate their social policy. It should, in fact, be a piece of unofficial legislation of the Hindus by the Hindus—and not by Brahmins alone or the Trivainikas (men of the first three castes) alone or 'the-men' alone for the rest of the Hindus as heretofore. The Smruti, while it will almost be departure from 'traditional' orthodoxy, with a view to reflect the aspirations of the enlightened progressive Hindudom of this age, shall at the same time preserve (if only in a formal way) the historic continuity of Hinduism through the ages. The feeling has been gaining ground that it is no use, may, that it will be dangerous to all concerned, to continue in these democratic days the old state of thi g a into which, as the saying goes in our parts, 'That quarter is the East, which the king so names, and those are the new and full moons, which the priest so names.' This feeling has found expression in many quarters lately, but no steps seem to have been taken in pursuance of it. A rallying point in the shape of a joint 'resolutions' or manifest of all progressive elements in Hindudom has been a felt need. This is sought to be supplied by means of the proposed new Smruti.

There are Smritis and Smritis. The promulgation of a new Smruti by us of this generation will mark our assertion of the principle that we have every right to order our social policy according to our own light and aspirations, even as the Smritis of the ancient and medieval past did according to theirs. There is warrant enough for our venture in those verses from the Yoga-Vasistha which we may take as our motto—

"A Sastra, though man-made, should be accepted, if it appeals to Reason and the contrary one rejected, though claiming to be inspired. We should be guided by our sense of the just alone. A saying sound in reason should be accepted, though it proceed from a child; and the contrary one rejected as a straw, though it purports to proceed from the god Brahman."

Compare also: "A co-option adopted by good men shall be as good an authority as the Vedas."—Makarangya-Vyakhy.

In my draft I have embodied almost all the planks in the social reform movement as conducted so far, and have anticipated some questions likely to crop up in the future as corollaries of equalitarian principles. I have kept scrupulously clear of the supernatural creed and dogmas; so that not only members of all Brahmanical Hindu sects (Jains, Buddhists, S hrs, Brahmos, and Aryas) and Rationalists—all owning the same of Hindu could lend their support to it without any conscientious objections. I have eschewed all modern fads’ on one side, and on the other, all harmful compromises with orthodoxy and old-world reactionarism. Brokey-bochi Castes and gotra are nullified by sanctioning inter-dioing and inter-marriage between members of any Hindu kulas; monogamy is insisted on as well as adult marriage; widow-marriage is allowed; so also the higher age of the bride; the scriptures and the priesthood are opened to any member of either sex of any Hindu kula; animal sacrifice is banned; foreign travel is sanctioned; purdah, untouchability and the keeping of prostitutes as temple-servants are condemned.

After the contents of the work are fixed, I propose to put it into Sanskrit amssuah verses, just like those of any Smruti of old. The work as at present planned will run into about a hundred skulas only. I shall need the collaboration, first, of a good English-knowing (or modern-educated) Sanskritist for the versification, and then, of literates in most of our vernaculars for the vernacular versions.

I need hardly explain to you why the work should be in Sanskrit. Though Smritis is a dead language there is about it a respectability, a prestige which is its own; it is, or is supposed to be, the one medium common to all religiously learned Hindus—being in fact to Hinduism what Latin is to Roman Christianity the world over. And our Smruti should be in verse. If it is to rival the old Smritis in form, but of course it should be accompanied by authorised versions in all our vernaculars and English, before support is canvassed for it previous to promotion. I hope I have explained my object at sufficient length for you to be able to judge on its merits. Some social workers I have consulted have expressed themselves in favour of the idea.

I intend to put my proposal before the coming Indian National Social Conference at Madras in Christmas week and try to have the body’s sanction and backing for the Smruti. But meanwhile nothing would encourage me more than to know that you approve of the idea, and that I might count upon your help in its materialisation; I should be obliged for any suggestions you might have to offer.

Karwari, N. Banarasi,

Yours etc.

BOMBAY’S PROTEST AGAINST THE ROYAL COMMISSION

The public meeting of the citizens of Bombay, at which resolutions advocating the boycott of the Statutory Commission was unanimously carried, will go down in the history of public meetings held in the city alike for its size as well as the representative character of the speakers and the audience. All the leaders and other public men of Bombay were present as well as a large number of ladies. Sir Dinabhan Petit, Bart, presided and the speakers were Sir Chimnial Setalvadi, Sir Phirozeh Sethna, Hon. Mr. Ratnai D. Morjari, Messrs. M. A. Jinnah, M. R. Jayakar, Jammadas Mehta, H. P. Mody, B. G. Horozman, K. M. Munshi and Mrs. Sarojini Naidu. A letter of regret expressing his inability to attend the meeting was read from the Hon. Sir Mammohandas Ramji who was also to have addressed the meeting.

Sir Dinahw Petig in his address said: "We consider it to be derogatory to our sense of self-respect that we should not have any people of our own country on the Commission that is going to decide our own and our country's destiny. But the principle involved is not merely a question of self-respect, but we go further and say that we cannot have any confidence in the findings of such a Commission, for if we would have capable Indians on the same, they would not only examine the witnesses and their statements, from India's point of view, but by persuasion and argument, they would be able to influence the conclusions which the Commission would arrive at, Therefore, it would be futile on our part to associate ourselves with the Commission and its work, as long as its constitution is not changed to the satisfaction of the Indian public".

The first resolution was "This public meeting of the citizens of Bombay emphatically declares that the Statutory Commission which has been announced is unacceptable to the people of India, as it most flagrantly, denis the right of the Indian people to participate on equal terms in framing the future constitution of the country. This meeting further resolves that under the circumstances Indians throughout the country should have nothing to do with the Commission at any stage or in any form.

Sir Chimanlal Sethadal speaking on the resolution said: "The exclusion of Indians from the Commission raises an issue involving a fundamental principle. We cannot possibly agree to the principle underlying the action of the British Government that Indians are not to have equal participation in the work of determining the future constitution of the country. The implication of the action of Government is that there are no Indians available of sufficient ability and impartiality to sit on the commission. We repel this suggestion as both unworthy and untrue. Any Commission composed in the manner this has been, however able and conscientious the members may be, will be very seriously handicapped. They are entirely new to the country and its people and their ways and sentiments will never be able correctly to appraise the value of the evidence that may be placed before them in the absence of Indian colleagues to guide them. The question is what is India to do if the British Government persist in sticking to this exclusion of Indians from the Commission? I think self-respecting India can only give one answer and that is that unless the constitution of the Commission is modified by the inclusion of a sufficiently strong Indian element she will have nothing to do with it."

Mr. M. A. Jinnah who next spoke said in the course of his speech: "The Commission will collect evidence and material, will after investigations make their recommendations to Parliament, Remember that once those recommendations are made, even according to the statement of his Excellency the Viceroy, it is obvious that no material changes could be made even if you are associated with a Joint Parliamentary Committee. Therefore I do ask you to make up your mind, not only in this meeting here but throughout the city and throughout India, to remain united to stand together and say with one voice that this is not acceptable to us."

Mr. Jammadas Mehta expressed the Congress view: "It is not merely to have one or two Indians on the Commission that we have met here. We have come to decide to boycott the Commission, but the Congress would boycott it on grounds other than the exclusion of Indians from the Commission. I may be allowed to declare the position of the Congress in the most unequivocal language. This Commission is appointed by the Government of England which claims the Divine right to rule this country."

Sir Phiroze Sethna, who also spoke in support of the resolution, said in his speech that "it is urged in certain quarters that if we decide to boycott the Commission there will be no further reforms. There need be no fear on that score. More reforms must come as a matter of course, for Government know in their heart of hearts that if they remain stationary or withhold further reforms much longer they themselves will be the losers and not Indians. The British have many good points, but they lack very materially in one, and that is, to give gracefully what they know they must give sooner or later. In the long history of our constitutional fight we have never known them to give anything gracefully or ungrudgingly. It is only when they are co-opted to that they do so and the sooner they cure themselves of this mistake the better for England and India, and one means of curing them is to have nothing to do with this Commission at any stage or in any form."

Mr. M. R. Jayakar next addressed the gathering. He said: "What the resolution asks for is not the appointment of one or two Indians on the Commission, which would be difficult and unsatisfactory at this stage, but, equal opportunities to participate in the work of the Commission. Personally he held the view that the presence of a couple of Indians on the Commission was not satisfactory, because our experience teaches us, that even unanimous reports of Committees are often shelved by the Government. Therefore we Republicans think that what India should ask for at this stage is co-operative opportunities in the work of the Commission, and an equally authoritative voice there. Equality of opportunities and authority and an equal voice in the formation of the conclusions of the Commission are what the Republicans have asked for."

I would remind this audience that it was no use letting this agitation stop at the boycott stage. A boycott is a mere negation. Negations do not fuel patriotism. I am sure, that if left alone all this agitation would soon die out. Our experience in India is that such agitations easily dissipate themselves into nothing. It would be, wise therefore to make use of all those who have and this feeling of resentment and to harness them to a good cause. I would suggest one or two such efforts which I feel are not beyond the capacity of those present on the platform of the meeting. Can we not all put our heads together and evolve a constitution, which could go out to Parliament as containing the united wishes of the Indian people?"

Mrs. Sarojini Naidu then moved the following resolution—that the President be authorised to forward copies of the above resolution to the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for India, His Excellency the Viceroy and the leaders of Liberal and Labour Parties in England."

Mrs. Naidu said that the whole world today was, looking with eyes of eagerness in some parts and with, cynical amusement in other parts, to see whether India would survive the challenge to her honour, her integrity, her manhood, her self-respect and her courage. "In the hour of crisis and danger," she continued, "when the fabric of our national cause is threatened, there is not one man so mean, so diabolic that will stand for the insult and affront which is offered."

The Hon. Mr. Ratansing D. Moraji seconded the resolution.

Mr. H. P. Mody in supporting the resolution, said that it was a matter of satisfaction to him that for once the leaders of different political parties had united on a question of vital interest to the country. It was also a matter of satisfaction to them that the Secretary of State for India had at last done something which was acceptable to nobody in India. He appealed to the Victoria counties that they might find their own the portrait of India, he would show the courage and statesmanship of retracing the steps and producing a commission which would command the confidence of the Indian people.

A vote of thanks to the chair, moved by Mr. B. G. Hornman and seconded by Mr. K. M. Mutahh was then passed, and the proceedings terminated.

INDIA AND THE WEST.

The peril of India, as of other Eastern countries, is the peril of being destroyed by the West, writes Rev. John Haynes Holmes in the Divall Art Annual of the Bombay Samachar.

The West is aggressive, proud, dominant. It has invaded the East fundamentally, of course, for selfish economic purposes. Our whole capitalist system depends to-day, for its success and permanence, upon the exploitation of foreign peoples, and this exploitation is therefore carried on ruthlessly, as a veritable matter of life and death. But there is another motive behind this invasion; and this is an unseemly and noble one. I refer to the conviction upon the part of the Western peoples that their civilization is the only genuine civilization in the world, and that it must therefore be made to supplant other cultures, which are in reality barbaric. That they are mistaken in this conviction—that there are many great civilizations, of which the West is only one and not necessarily the best in all things—does not alter the slightest the Westerners' good intentions and resolute purpose. The very fact that they feel themselves to be benefactors, makes them all the more dangerous to those upon whom they would confer their benefits.

For the supreme virtue of any people, anywhere, is the faithful development of their essential genius and nature, and they may fulfill their own appointed destiny, and therewith make their own distinctive contribution to the universal commonwealth of man. Let the West be the West and achieve in power and glory what it seems best to do and then let it share with others whatever good it may find, whatever truth it may discover. And by the same token let the East be the East and give the world the visions it may see.

It is from this point of view, that I hail the movement for "Swaraj." No nation can fulfill its life save on the basis of national autonomy. Occupation by a foreign power, however enlightened in purpose and benefit in spirit, weakens initiative, sapa energy and effort poisons the springs of character. A century and a half ago, my people found they must be free even from rulers of their own race, religion, and cultural tradition. How much greater is the necessity that India should be delivered from the control of a people so utterly alien to itself. Political liberty is the "sine qua non" of all social good. It is as true of nations as of individuals, that we cannot be ourselves till we are free.

Secondly, from this same view-point I rejoice in every effort in India to preserve and foster native culture. Whether it be movements for spinning cloth within the home, or for fostering native schools and colleges, or for preserving great literary and artistic treasures, or for developing a new literature and a new art—it is all a struggle to save the soul of India from death. India is not a stretch of territory, a mass of human beings, a portion of an empire; it is a light, a spirit, a vision of beauty and of truth. Save it, glorify it, vindicate it for yourselves and for the world.

Lastly, I call to India to be faithful to its religion, not deceived by Christianity. As embodied in the person of Jesus, and as defined by the Sermon on the Mount and the great commandments of the law, Christianity is a great and noble religion. Its precepts of love as taught and lived by the Nazarene, I would commend to all men. But Christianity as preached by churches, as practised by governments, and as carried far and wide by soldiers and missionaries, is an abomination. Have nothing of it. Gandhi has done much wise as well as noble things in his unparalleled career of political and spiritual leadership. In nothing has he been wiser and nobler than in acknowledging his grateful indebtedness to Jesus. But steadfastly remaining a Hindu, I sometimes wonder if religion, as organised anywhere, can ever save the race. Certain I am that if any religion can save any people, it will be no foreign cult or creed but its own faith from the spirit of its own life.

Let India be India! You have much to learn from us, as we have much to learn from you. No race, of country, or civilization, or religion, has a monopoly of virtue. But the first condition of all inter-change of good, is self-culture and self-respect.

THE DEVADASI PROBLEM.

Dr. S. Muthukakshmi Reddi writes:—It is not the Law Member's reply that has disappointed us reformers and also the enlightened public (which reply, I must admit, I had already anticipated) but the revelation that there are others amidst us here who, having approved of such a reply, come forward to defend not only the Law Member, as if he could not take care of himself, but also the infamous Devadasi institution, makes us pause and doubt our fitness to occupy an honoured place in the list of civilised nations.

Surely now, I would not blame the George Town Devadasis for their protest, because naturally these ignorant victims of custom and traditions are afraid they would be deprived of their hereditary rights and means of livelihood, but what surprises me most is that persons who are in a position to see things in their true light should take up the Devadasis' cause and try to undo the good work of others like the Hon. Dr. Gour and the Hon. Mr. V. Ramadas Pantulu.
Coming to the several points in the Law Member's speech, first of all I have stated again and again in my speech that the Penal Code 372 and 373 of its later amendment of 1824 are evaded by the parents or the guardians of these unfortunate girls in this manner, that is, the parents of the guardians wait till the girl attains her 18th or 18th year, then a medical certificate is got from a doctor as to their age, the girl is taken to the temple and with the permission of the Dharmakartha, the dedication ceremony is performed.

The girl may be 18 or even 21, what of that? She has been from her childhood inhaling a foul atmosphere, has been living with an immoral mother and tutored in her very impressionable age both by word and deed that her caste dharma is to be a mistress of some rich man, or failing that, to make out her living by a life of prostitution. So the evil system which is responsible for developing in a certain class of girls a mentality that concubinage is sanctioned by religion and society and that prostitution is no sin or vice has been uprooted in the interest of the individual and the nation at large. I may, by the bye, point out to my people that this practice, having the sanction of the society and the seal of our temples, is peculiar only to India.

Now the votaries of the system maintain that dedication does not necessarily lead to prostitution. Then are they prepared to prove that these Devadasis are virgins? Surely no truth-loving persons will come forward with such a reply. Then naturally the question arises, if these Devadasis are not virgins, if by undergoing the dedication ceremony they are prohibited by their custom or caste laws from entering into a married life then what sort of life do they generally lead? Their friends and admirers may argue that they live an honourable life by being loyal and constant to one man and by being under his protection. But I would like to know if that alliance is legalised and if their offsprings are legitimate. We know that in all these instances the men with whom these women contract such unholy alliances have been already married and are fathers of children and big families. So one can imagine the miserable lot of that married wife when she has been deprived of the affection and love of her lawful husband, because the Hindu marriage, on the part of the wife at any rate, is indissoluble.

I have repeatedly said from a wide and intimate experience of these people's habits that the Penal Code is of no use to them and we want a legislation on the same lines as the enlightened state of Myanore according to which the Devadasis will not be deprived of their lands or other pay, their means of livelihood will be fully safeguarded, and the existing adult Devadasis will not be penalised and only their children will be benefited by this legislation. Again we all know that the Dasi that do actual service in the temples are only 2 or 3 in number, or at the most half a dozen, but in Mint Street, Georgetown, there are over a hundred Devadasis, so also in other districts and towns. I would like to be informed what good purpose they serve, what are the means of their livelihood, why have they all undergone the "pottu" ceremony and thus taken a licence to lead a free unmarried life? I hope some public-spirited citizen will answer me these questions.

The very fact that these Devadasis, as a class, are held in such odium and disrespect by all classes of people that the epithet "Devadasi" is used in a very bad sense— in the scene of a prostitute—by people, high and low, both in public and private, the very fact that girls of respectable families hesitate to learn music and to practise that art in public for fear they may be pointed out as Devadasis and that other communities do not own them, do not want to associate with them except in private and in secret, do not want to enter into marriage relations with any of these women, is proof sufficient that the habits of the majority amongst them are unhealthy and their mode of life is highly objectionable.

I have had reports from the enlightened associations of the Devadasi communities themselves, both men and women, from all parts of the presidency thanking me for getting such a resolution passed, because "the shoe-wearer knows where the shoe pinches." Who can pose as a better authority than the refined and educated members of the very aggrieved and depressed communities themselves? It is not for other people to come forward and proclaim to the world "Don't reform that community and let them continue in their filthy existence" in the face of the above facts. We do not want High Court Judges to pass an opinion on matters which are too well-known to the general public. That this reform is a most urgent one from every point of view, from the health, moral and humane point, and in the larger interests of the nation itself, is admitted by all right thinking and the righteous minded people.

If, in the face of public opinion, this reform is delayed even a single day, especially after the representatives of the people in the Council have recommended with one voice to undertake legislation, the authorities concerned would be incurring a serious responsibility and would be subjecting themselves to criticism from other nations as well.

THE CAMPAIGN AGAINST VICE.

(By Mr. K. S. Ramachandra Iyer.)

The public meeting of the citizens of Bombay held on Wednesday last to protest against the growing menace to the city in the increase of prostitution and requesting Government to take immediate steps to abolish all the brothels was certainly a great success, both from the point of view of the large number of people present and from the number of excellent speeches delivered on the occasion.

But are we really moving in the right direction to find out a permanent cure for this far-lying rooted disease? Mention was made by some speakers that brothels have been abolished in several countries with great success. But no one has been able to say whether such abolition has really resulted in eradicating prostitution as a whole from the midst of the people. The general opinion today is that although brothels have been made illegal, prostitution is on the increase. Cafe and dancing halls have taken the place of brothels and street solicitation has taken the place of intermediaries. Anyone who has visited foreign countries with a keen eye to observe things and to study the conditions of life would have seen much worse things than what prevails in the city of Bombay to-day. And let it be remembered that these things are happening in of Bombay, that street solicitation is openly going on, in some localities (even main roads) it has become a danger for respectable citizens to use these roads even as early as 8 o'clock at night. If one walks through Girgaum Road over the French bridge (and this road is used by children, students and respectable men and women at all hours) one has to encounter a number of prostitutes standing in the open road ogling at passersby. Everyone is not endowed with strong will power, and who knows how many innocent men are falling victims to the evil of these women!

Some remedy must be found to stop this kind of thing and that too very soon. It is easy to talk of wholesale abjuration of brothels by all means, let it be done, but it is bound to take a very long time, perhaps years. What is required just now is the abolition of all brothels from the main roads and to stop at once, without showing any mercy whatsoever, all women from soliciting on public roads. The Government should, without any delay, instruct the Police Commissioner to take stern measures to remove, even forcibly, women of ill-fame from all such places where there are main roads, and the Police Commissioner should even be authorised to take extreme steps against the landlords of such buildings, compelling them to expel this kind of women from their premises. This is the most urgent and immediate step that should be taken if at all any improvement is to take place in this diabolical trade. Side by side, arrangements should be undertaken by the Government to segregate brothels well away from the city until such time as total abolition can be possible. The reform that is required at once is to take away the temptation that is glaringly put in the path of the people of Bombay by allowing brothels to be scattered in almost all parts of the city.

CRUSADES AGAINST UNTOUCHABILITY.

A public meeting of the South Indians residing in West Matunga and Mahim (Bombay) was held on Sunday 13th November 1927, at 9 a.m., in Abdul Sattar Building, Mahim, under the Presidency of Mr. R. Krishna Iyer, to concert measures to strengthen Mahatma Gandhi's hands by collecting funds for untouchability work in Kerala. The President in a lucid speech explained to the audience the object of the meeting and the significance and importance of the subject, and pointed out the impending necessity for mobilising the moral, material physical and intellectual resources to wage a war against the curse of untouchability which stands in the way of our communal solidarity and national uplift. Then the following resolutions were unanimously passed:

1. This meeting of the South Indians residing in West Matunga and Mahim (Bombay) wishes to express its heart-felt thanks and gratitude to Mahatma Gandhi for having decided to fight against the canker of untouchability, which is eating into the very vitals of the nation in Kerala and Tamil Nadu and promises to render him all possible moral and material support in his work.

2. This meeting requests Mahatma Gandhi not to retrace his steps from his present attempt until this menace is completely wiped off from the Hindu society and promises to stand by his side in all weather,
8. This meeting hereby appoints the following Committee to collect funds and present Mahatma Gandhi with a purse when he comes to Bombay next in conjunction with other similar organizations in Bombay.

In the course of the discussion of the above resolutions, great enthusiasm prevailed and speaker after speaker condemned in most vehement terms the institution of caste and the gross injustice. The Caste Hindus were guilty of against their own co-religionists.

One speaker urged the necessity for the education of Brahmin ladies. They were the strongest opponents for the removal of untouchability. Educating the untouchables and making them realize their due and true position in Hindu Society and helping them to rise up to the desired level were the best remedies we could at present conceive of was the unanimous opinion of the various speakers. The consensus of opinion was strongly in favour of wiping out this disgraceful social iniquity, which has stained the fair name of Hinduism, at the earliest possible date. The meeting was representative of all communities, and the sincerity and earnestness evinced by those present only added to the unprecedented success of the meeting, but also threw a ray of hope as to the preparedness of the people to support the movement in all possible and proper way.

The meeting came to a close at about 11.30 a.m. with a hearty vote of thanks to the President and the audience by Mr. N. N. Menon, on behalf of the organizers.

NEWS OF THE WEEK

Soviet Delegates to India: According to the Tass Agency, the Central Council of Trade Unions of the Union of the Socialist Soviet Republics has decided to send to the Indian Trade Union Congress a delegation consisting of M. Lepse, the Chairman of the All Russian Union of Metal Workers; M. Amosov, the Secretary of the Railway Transport Union, and also M. Voronov.

Mr. Spratt Acquitted: The young Englishman, Philip Spratt, who was charged with sedition at the criminal session of the High Court, Bombay, as the author of India and China was acquitted. After about half an hour, the jury by a majority of 8 to 1 found the accused not guilty. The announcement was greeted by the assembled crowd with loud applause, followed by a warning from the judge against the repetition of such a scene. Agreeing with the verdict of the majority of the jury, the judge ordered the acquittal of the accused.

Beggar Home for Madras: The opening of the Beggar Home at Royapuram, which took place on Monday, was a landmark in the growth of the civic consciousness in India. The problem of providing for the necessities of destitute and disabled beggars has been an acute one for some years, and has not been confined to the City of Madras. It is usual, when civic amenities are being discussed, to talk of rate-payers' rights. But 'do those who are too poor to pay rates possess no rights at all'? They are as much part of the social organization as their better circumstanced brethren, and any serious ill which befalls them, such as epidemics, so common in Indian cities, affects the entire population. The Madras Municipal Corporation deserves to be congratulated on the step which it has taken in providing the Home, and it has thereby given a lead to other towns in India which we hope they will not be slow to follow. It is to be hoped that the Budget allotment for the maintenance of the Home will be increased as need is felt, and that the problem will be tackled in a comprehensive manner on the lines indicated by Mr. Varadarajulu Naidu, to whose initiative and earnest labours Madras is deeply indebted in the matter.

The Indian National Social Conference: The Secretaries of the Reception Committee write: It has been decided to hold this year's session of the Indian National Social Conference in Madras during the Christmas week. A Reception Committee of widely representative characters has been formed, with the first lady M.L.C. of our country, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi, Deputy President of the Madras Legislative Council, as its Chairman. Mr. K. Natarajan, Editor of the Indian Social Reformer, has accepted the invitation of the Committee to preside over the deliberations of the Conference. It is needless for us to urge the importance of this Conference for the social well-being of our people and the general progress of our country, nor can we lay too much emphasis on the wide issues involved in some of the present day social problems and the urgent need of their speedy and satisfactory solution by legislation and otherwise. It is therefore in the greatest national interest that all social workers and sympathizers, of all castes, creeds and class and of all shades of progressive opinion should come together, and take part in the deliberations of the Conference and help to make it a success. We therefore earnestly request all men and women interested in social reform in the Madras Presidency to enlist themselves as members of the Reception Committee. We appeal to the workers and sympathisers elsewhere to give us their support by joining the Conference. We also request the Social Reform Organisations all over India to send their delegates to the Conference. The minimum membership fee for the Reception Committee is Rs. 2. The delegate's fee for the Conference is Rs. 1. Delegates only to the Social Conference are requested to give previous intimation to the Secretaries if they require boarding and lodging.

Bombay Women's Conference on Education: The Secretary of the Bombay Women's Education Committee, writes:—Under the auspices of the Bombay Women's Committee on Educational Reform, a Conference on Education will be held on Friday—the 23d and Saturday the 24th of this month from 4 p.m. to 7 p.m. (S. T.) at the Malabar Memorial Hall, Sver Sadan, Gym. devl. Miss Minalini Chattrapathy, B A. (Cantab), Principal of the New High School for Girls, will preside. This will be the 2nd Conference of its kind in Bombay. One of the suggestions made by the All-India Conference of Women on Education held last January in Poona, was to organise local committees in its constituent centres to carry out the resolutions of the conference as far as possible according to the local conditions. Accordingly a Committee of Bombay Women was organised representative of various institutions connected with women's activities. This Committee has been doing its work since last March under the Chairmanship of Mr. W. Krishna Narayana, who represented the Bombay Women's Council on the Committee. Three Sub-Committees were appointed to consider the following problems. (1) Text Books in Primary Schools (2) Medical Inspection in Primary Schools (3) the existing system of Examination in schools. The Committee also approached the authorities of several High Schools for Girls in the Presidency to ask them if they would be prepared to train students for the Diploma in Domestic Science, if such a Diploma were to be instituted by the University of Bombay. In answer to favourable answers received from several schools, the Committee hopes to take up problems dealing with secondary education, questions dealing with the hostel for girls students, etc., etc. It is the ambition of the Committee to help the progress of education, specially of girls' education. The Conference to be held from the month will deal with the question about primary education only. Four papers will be read on the following subjects:— (1) Text Books in Primary Schools by Miss R. Rayab, B.A. Principal, Benaras Girls' School. (2) Medical Inspection and Physical Education in Primary Schools by Dr. A. J. Jeboan, M.B., & M.S. (3) Examination System in Primary Schools by Miss S. D. Dallas, M.A., Lady Municipal Schools Supervisor. (4) Education of the Defectives and Delinquents by Miss Katherine Dun, B.A. (London).

MILLOWNERS' & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 35 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premium in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislation in favour of Companies even, at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is, in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own Institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

Emerent Educationsists, both men and women, have been asked to take part in the discussion that will follow each paper. The discussion will be open to public. It is earnestly hoped that those who are interested in Education will take part in the Conference and make it a success.

Progressive Afghanistan: Their Majesties the King and Queen of Afghanistan are expected to arrive in Bombay on the 14th instant, where they will be the guests of their Excellencies the Viceroy and Lady Irwin for four days prior to embarking on their European tour. The Bombay Municipal Corporation has unanimously voted an address of welcome to their Majesties. His Majesty, from all accounts, holds very advanced views on social reform, as conspicuously illustrated by the fact of his being the first independent Asiatic monarch to be accompanied by his Queen on his travels outside his kingdom. His Majesty has established a Women’s College at Kabul, and holds liberal views on questions affecting women such as the purdah. He has, however, to proceed cautiously as he has to take into his professional advice, retrospective, and the King of Afghanistan is very liberal-minded in another important respect. He makes no distinction between his Hindu and Mussalman subjects who are being equally eligible for the highest offices under him. His Majesty has prohibited the slaughter of cows throughout Afghanistan as a measure of economic necessity. He has in all these ways fully earned the reputation of being a very enlightened ruler, and Indians as Asiatics are proud to welcome him in their midst.

The late Sir P. Rajagopal Charaya: Sir P. Rajagopalacharya whose death took place this week did very much as Dewan of Cochin and Travancore to do away with the disabilities of the untouchables. His name is cherished by progressive leaders in these States as the statesman who had their emancipation at heart and worked to embody it in his policy. Sir Rajagopala was a very able executive officer and one of the outstanding examples in discharge of the charge frequently made that Indians are not as efficient in executive as in judicial and revenue administration.

Indian Women’s Activities: Women are increasingly assuming the field of educational, social and moral reform. In this issue a large part of the space is given over to the proceedings of three important women’s conferences and we have had to hold over those of some more for next week.

We cordially welcome this as the most hopeful sign of our times. If we may offer a word of friendly counsel, it is that as a preparation for the large part which they are destined to play in Indian problems, Indian women should make it a point of studying the important social problems of the day in the light of the experience of India and other countries. The late Sir Surendranath Banerjea, whose no one could accuse of illiberal views, strongly opposed the disfranchisement of women in India, on the ground that all educated and women adopted extremist views in politics without knowing anything about them. This, as a fact, is not correct, but there is certainly need for Indian women to prepare themselves by study and observation to deal with the complex problems of our social life. Take, for instance, Mr. Sarda’s marriage bill. The good intention of the author is beyond question, but as we have pointed out in our articles, the bill has not been drafted after due consideration of the consequences of its being enforced as a law, if it can be enforced at all. Women’s organisations should examine the bill from all points of view, and suggest improvements which will make it acceptable to a large section as possible of the community. All social legislators, men and women, have to bear this in mind.

Are Devadasis Prostitutes? The endeavours of social reformers to stop the dedication of temple women by law have been sought to be countered by the argument that dedication does not necessarily mean prostitution and, therefore, cannot be legislated against as against public morals. A writer in the Hindu of Madras states, in support of this argument, that the Bombay Provincial Committee did not find that there was a single devadasi among the 3000 and odd prostitutes enumerated in the brothels. This writer was a member of that Committee which had necessarily to confine its enquiry to the public brothels, the most obvious haunts of commercialised vice. Devadasis live in families and did not specially come under the notice of the committee. They and the large number of apparently respectable women who contribute clandestinely to swell the volume of sin and disease, had to be left out of the enquiry for want of adequate data. Dr. Mabulakshmi’s proposal that a women’s committee should be appointed to investigate the lives led by devadasis is a perfectly sound one. Its result will be to establish that the legal deduction between dedication and prostitution does not correspond to the real fact. The term devadasi, whatever its etymological meaning, has now come to mean a prostitute under the sanction of a sort of religion. It may or may not be possible to abolish prostitution, but it is possible to disconnect it with religion, and this is what those who agitate for a law against the defiled women wish to do.

Caste in Municipal Schools: A controversy has been going on for some time in the Bombay Corporation over the question of providing common drinking vessels for the caste and depressed classes children in the local Municipal Schools. We are entirely in favour of those who insist that no distinction should be made in this, as well as in other respects, in children on account of their caste or creed. The water supply, of course, should be drawn from a tap and not by dipping the cups into the vessel of drinking water and children must be made to drink the water in the Hindu style as is being done—now in most of the Hindu schools, and not by sipping which is now recognized to be a very insanitary habit. Merely washing the cup after sipping the water does not adequately cleanse the cup.

The National Medical College: The new building of the Bombay National Medical College was formally opened by Sir Leslie Wilson, K.C.B., on the 28th of November. The National Medical College has passed through many vicissitudes. It was first started in the early days of the Non-co-operation movement and it was taken over by Dr. Nair recently. It was recognized by the Bombay University for the L. C. S. examination a couple of years back and there is every chance of its being affiliated to the University as a regular medical college. As the Governor pointed out in his speech, this College is the first institution of its kind in this Presidency that has been established and supported solely by unofficial efforts, and a work so generously undertaken will not lack the encouragement and support necessary to maintain its high standard and efficiency. Mr. Jayakar in his speech gave a brief history of the Institution. He said that the genesis of Guy's Hospital, London, struck the imagination of Dr. Nair and he, with the assistance of his friends, founded a hospital. If the success can be said to be the result of the efforts of any one man, Dr. Nair, who has worked so enthusiastically to attain his object, may be congratulated on this achievement. It was a personal triumph to Guy's Hospital and Missenden's and firstly the building was declared open by His Excellency on Monday last. The institution has the good wishes of the public of Bombay who have reason to be proud of it, and we are sure that the Government of Bombay will give every assistance in their power to ensure its success.

Tagore Number of the 'Indian': The Indian Association of Singapore has brought out a special Tagore number of the Indian in honour of the poet's visit to Malaya and the islands. The number gives in detail the touring receptions accorded to Dr. Rabindranath Tagore, the speeches that were made in his honour by the various associations and the poet's own message of love and unity of humanity embodied in his replies to the addresses. It also contains numerous illustrations commemorating the event, which make it all the more interesting. There is no doubt that Dr. Tagore's visit has added a new touch and the desire to know more about their kin and kin who have kept the torch of Indian civilization burning in Malaya and in the islands. It is to their credit that they have not thought that the suppression of the original peoples was necessary for their welfare but helped and guided them in the path of self-realisation. The profound truth that Dr. Tagore expounded in one of his speeches should be borne in mind not only by those to whom it was intended but by others also. "There were no cultures," said Dr. Tagore, which were diametrically opposite. If it was thought that there were some unity should be found to reconcile them. It was the darkness of ignorance which made things so difficult. Hatred existed not because they knew each other but because they did not know each other. If it was said that there were things which were contradictory in human culture it was said because they did not know. When they knew the different cultures well, then they would have sympathy.

The Censorship of Films: "I do not believe," said Lala Lajpat Rai before the Indian Cinematograph Committee, "that the Indian youth is likely to be led astray by the cinema." His reasons for it were that the influence of the cinema was not greater than that of the novel or drama neither of which had any censorships, and that the Indian youth has a sufficiently high moral standard to resist its influence. He further stated that it was undesirable for any man to lead a life sheltered by his education. The Indian, he observed, must take the risks of life and the educational effect of the cinema are amply compensated for those risks. We are glad to see that, while some of the other witnesses have recommended stricter censorship in the interests of the younger generation, Lala has no fears on that ground. It is ridiculous to say that crime has increased with the growth of the cinema. The average man never believes that what he sees on the screen he can carry out in his own life; to him the film-world is one remote from his own. The censorship of bad films, however, has one evil effect. As it does not apply to the private exhibition of films only prohibits their being shown in public, this prohibition will only serve to place a premium on banned films which will be taken up—and sometimes at an abnormal price—by the purveyor. What we want is not a stricter censorship but one that is worked on more national lines.

The Disarmament Conference: The Soviet representative at the Disarmament Conference in a remarkable speech, said that the disarmament proposals put before his colleagues the Soviet proposals for achieving this object. M. Litvinoff in unambiguous terms stated that the production of armaments should be stopped, and we are sure that the Government of Bombay will give every assistance in their power to ensure its success.
INDIA'S POLITICAL NEEDS.

In our leading article last week, we dealt with the proposal which has been made by influential Indian political leaders to have nothing to do with the Statutory Commission from which Indians have been excluded. We suggested that a better way would perhaps be to face the Commission under protest and state our case for self-government before it. The Commission can thus be made one of a means of giving the widest publicity among British Parliamentarians to the reasons which make a further large transfer of political initiative to Indian hands imperative in the best interests of Great Britain and India. To forego such a splendid opportunity of forcing the attention of the British Government and Parliament to India's immediate needs, is not the part of statesmanship. We do not accept without considerable reservation the claim put forward by the Secretary of State for India that the Commissioners have absolutely no bias one way or the other on the question of further Indian constitutional reform. The Manchester Guardian has frankly stated that the English Commissioners cannot but have a bias in the direction of safeguarding British vested interests in this country—the capital vested, the British services and the Army. How far they will be able to rise superior to this national bias, and realise that the interests of the people of India are paramount and that British vested interests cannot be allowed to impede their march towards self-government, remains to be seen. The Commission itself will thus be on its trial. If it feels reasonably assured that legitimate British interests will not suffer from the transfer of more political power to Indians, their way will be made smoother to carry out the pledge of progressive responsible government to this country. We think that it is quite possible to safeguard these interests while at the same time extending a generous measure of self-government in the Provincial and Central Governments. In fact, the danger to British interests is greater under the present system where these appear in constant and persistent antagonism to Indian interests and sentiments.

The first and most important reason why the present system is detrimental to India's interests and should be changed, is that it is an unelected rule. A comparatively less progressive government which is situated amidst the people over whom it rules is, from the point of view of the permanent interests of the people, a better government than the most progressive governments separated from the country by several thousands of miles of sea and sky. Lord Burkehead in his speech in the House of Lords made the significant admission that communal differences were precisely the same to-day as they were when British rule was established in India. As a matter of fact, these differences were far less acute then than they are now. In the so-called Indian Mutiny, Hindu and Mosalmrn soldiers revolted against the British government. But the important difference between a government functioning from amidst its subjects and one functioning from a distant country, is well brought out by a comparison of the Moghul and the British policies in communal matters. The Moghuls were foreigners like the English in India. But within less than a generation, the Moghul rule, just because it was seated amidst the people, threw up the Great Akbar, whose superhuman efforts to consolidate Hindus and Muslims in one nation, is told in the interesting article in the current "Islamic Culture," by the Right Hon. Syed Ameer Ali, from which we reproduce a large portion in this issue. Akbar realised—what British statesmen still fail to realise—that the first thing he had to do to strengthen his Empire was to unite Hindus and Mahomedans into a single national unit. He did not leave the two communities to settle their differences; he made it his policy to remove all obstacles in the way of their union.

To get British rule controlled from Delhi and not from London, is, therefore, the first step in securing real self-government, apart from the forms of it, for India. A Government seated at Delhi, and not obliged to look for support to London, will very soon realize that the communal cleavage is its greatest peril, and will set itself energetically to obliterate the lines of cleavage. The Western idea of assimilation is freedom to inter-dine and inter-marry. In the East, and especially in India, however, communities have lived for centuries together in the most friendly relations observing at the same time the communal restrictions of inter-marriage. It is quite usual for two men even of the same caste or sect to remain intimate friends in India without having once dined together. On the other hand, men may dine together often and yet be out of sympathy with one another in their ideas and aspirations. Syed Ameer Ali couples the name of Raja Todar Mal with that of Abul Fazal as the two greatest statesmen of Akbar's reign. The Raja was a very strict Hindu; and once, when on a long tour with the Emperor, he starved for three days till the paraphernalia of his daily worship, accidentally left behind, were brought up. The Emperor heard of this and discharged the Raja from his regret, but respected the Raja's scruples and did not think that they unfitted him to be the Finance Minister of his Empire.

AKBAR THE NATION-BUILDER.

In the current number of Islamic Culture, the ably conducted quarterly review, edited by Mr. Marmaduke Pickthall and published in Hyderabad, Deccan, the Rt. Hon. Syed Ameer Ali contributes an interesting article headed "The Islamic Culture under the Moghuls" from which we take the following informative account of Akbar's great attempt at building up an Indian nation—

Akbar ascended the throne in 1556 at the age of fourteen under the guardianship of Bahram Khan, a trusted servant of Bâbar. Three years later he assumed the direct rule of his empire. From that time forward the marvellous genius of the young king was employed in suppressing rebellions, consolidating the disintegrated Provinces, evolving order out of chaos, and in creating a nation out of the heterogeneous ous elements of Hindustan. His attempt to weld together the Hindus and Mahommedans led to the establishment of a new cult which was hoped to bring into one fold the followers of the two faiths.

His rules and regulations for the government are embodied in the remarkable work called the Ayen-Akbari, the "Institutes," or rather "The Ordinances of Akbar." No detail of administration has escaped his notice, while the revenue system, based on Khwaja Ahmed Hasan Mainamandi's and Firoze Shah's system, is Akbar's greatest legacy to succeeding rulers—a legacy on which the British Government is still working. The Ayen-Akbari like the Akbar-nama, is the work of Abul Fazl, unquestionably the most gifted and far-sighted of all Akbar's counsellors. Baburni, in his jealousy of a successful rival and in his intolerant hatred against the liberalism of a true statesman, has bitterly attacked Abul Fazl. But the fame of this philosopher and patriotic statesman grows greater with the lapse of time and the character of the help that he gave his sovereign's beginning to be really appreciated. Akbar was a genius, but probably his labours for the people confined to his care would have ended in failure but for the support and unflinching loyalty of a man like Abul Fazl and his brother Faiz.

Nothing shows so clearly Akbar's anxiety for the welfare of the peasantry or the necessity of making their burdens as light as possible as the minute instructions embodied in the Ayen-Akbari for the guidance of the collectors of revenue. The village officials of the present day are the titular descendants of the officials of Akbar's time; the Kanungs and the PAttwari still perform the same duties; they still prepare the Jummahadis (the Collector's registers), Jummaasami hadis (the balance-sheets of the village transactions); the rate of land is still the Starsh, the standard of land measurements is still the gac and the advance to the raiyats is still the tahari, the old Arabic word handed down from the Abbasides rule to Mosopotamia.

The influence of the revenue system of Akbar was not confined to the realm under his direct sovereignty: it reached lands so far distant as the Carnatic.

For the purpose of philosophical and religious discussions, at which he was almost invariably present, Akbar erected a special building which was named the Mbadat-Khasheh or "The House of Devotion," where learned men versed in all departments of knowledge, theologians, scientists, poets, travellers, assembled regularly on Thursday evenings. Although Is' am has no State clergy nor priesthood, the doctors of divinity who appropriated to themselves the title of Ulama came to be recognised by the public as the sole representatives of the true human knowledge and infallible propounders of religions and secular law. Under the Afghans their prestige was unbounded; the tyrant Abd-Din Khilji tried to limit their powers and frequently put aside their counsel by the remark "religious law is one thing, political expediency another."

But whilst they stood between the tyrant and the people and often tempered the harshness of the rule soldier by quotations from the Koran, in their intolerant dogmatism they refused to liberalise their interpretations or to bring them into conformity with the times. As in Europe, they were the persecuting enemies of non-conformity. Until Akbar broke their power by exiling the most fanatical to distant parts of his empire, they monopolised all judicial offices; Moftis, Kazis and Mir-Adlis were selected from their body and they were the keepers of the conscience of the people.

Akbar soon found from the disputations that they were unsafe guides, that they were not such infallible exponents of the sacred law as they claimed to be. Under the Afghan rule the Mufizahids (the expounders) were all-powerful and insisted on the literal enforcement of the law, a good and beneficent rule at the time, but needing modification and relaxation in view of changes in social conditions or the growth of new political, social and economic conditions. Akbar found it impossible to deal with his dominions on the narrow lines laid down by them. He accordingly in 1579 issued a manifesto which curiously was signed by all the leading Mufizahids and Kazis including the Sadr-us-Sudar and the Sadr-us-Jahans (the Chief Justice and Lord Chancellor respectively). It constituted him the arbiter on disputed legal questions.

In spite of this, the Ulamas were a thorn in his side and Akbar had to get rid of many of them in order to carry out his object of welding the Hindus and Mahommedans into one nation.

Shahib Abdalh, who had been invested with the exalted office of Shaikh-ul-Islam with the title of Makkhum-ul-Mulk in the time of Sher-Shah, and had held it without interruption until the issue of the manifesto, was found to have trafficked in the grants of Aima land (lands granted free of revenue to learned and religious people for their support), and had amassed an enormous fortune, was immediately relieved of his duties. Others who, inflated with pride and intolerance, barred the road of progress and reform were exiled to Eastern Bengal, the Siboria of the Moguls, where their descendants are still to be found. In many cases the lapse of more than three centuries has affected little change in the hereditary characteristics.

Among the administrative regulations of Akbar may be mentioned the abolition of the pilgrim-tax and the capital-tax on non-Muslims, the prohibition of the burning of widows among the Hindus; of reducing to slavery captives taken in war, of the shooting of monkeys or dogs, and the sacrifices of horses.

In Akbar's time tobacco was first introduced into the Mogul capital. There is a quaint account of its introduction in the Wizays of Asad Beg who was sent on a mission by Akbar to Adil Khan or Adil Shah of Bijapur.

Akbar revived in his Court the institution of ladies' Banars which flourished in Transoxian. It was called the Mina Bazar, or the Fancy Fair. In these bazaars beautiful stalls were set up for the royal ladies and the wives of nobles and magistrates to sell fruits, flowers, embroideries worked by themselves, jewellery and such wares. These bazaars were naturally not open to the general public, but the Emperor, the princes of the royal family and privileged nobles were admitted. The wares, of course, were sold at fabulous prices and the return went to charity. At one of these fairs Jehangir who was then Prince Salim, the future Emperor Akbar, who afterwards became his consort with the title of Nur Jahan, "the Light of the World."

Every work in Arabic, Persian, Sanskrit, and the languages of Europe was read to the Sovereign. If he did not understand the language, the work was translated for him. The Singhâna Bâtsî, the story of the legendary Hind King, Vikramaditya, was rendered into Persian by Badauni himself and received the name of Kherad afar. The Mahâ Bharata, the Ramayana and other old Sanskrit works were similarly rendered into Persian.

Badauni has given in his work a complete list of the lawyers, jurists, physicians, poets and musicians who flourished in this great king's reign. Then Saïn and Gobind Das were the two most famous musicians of his time, and the bounties he bestowed on them give some idea of his munificence.

He built Fatehpur Sîkri in the 14th year of his reign and there he held the famous conclave of the learned which gave so much credit to his rule.

Under him India witnessed two remarkable movements for both of which a parallel may be found in Europe. Akbar ascended the throne, as already mentioned, in the year 936 of the Hegira (1556 A.D.). As the close of the century began to draw near a large number of Indian Muslims began to be agitated at the advent of the millennium at which the promised Dîrverur, the Mehdî, was to appear with the Prophet Jesus to redeem the world from sorrow and pain. Several Mahdís, of course, appeared in response to the widespread hope which inspired the masses. They were generally men of virtuous lives and enthusiasts, but suffering from spiritual exaltation.

The Ulama treated them with the rigor which was meted out to heretics in Europe; many were executed and others driven out of the country. The persecution by the ecclesiastical judges of these poor enthusiasts was revolting to Akbar's liberalism and generous disposition and this was one of the main causes which led him to throw off the shackles which had fettered him so long.

The other movement was that of the Ronshania Oult, the Ronshaniots were the exact counterpart of the Illuminati of Europe.

The three great men who deserve prominent notice in Akbar's reign are Âbû Fâzîl, the great Alîami (the scholar, par excellence), his brother Fârîzî, and the Nâjî Tadrâsmî, the Finance Minister.

The great work Âbû Fâzîl did to make Akbar's reign a success can never be overestimated nor can the value of Tadrâsmî's revenue administration be overlooked. Âbû Fâzîl and Tadrâsmî are justly regarded as two of the greatest statesmen of any age.

To Akbar, besides Fatehpur Sîkri and other cities, we owe the establishment of Allahabad which Badauni calls Tahbâs, not far from the ancient Hindu city of Prayag. The immense garden which his grandson Khârâ made there is still in existence.

The sketch of Islamic culture in Akbar's time would hardly be complete without some reference to his clever and accomplished aunt, Gubbadâ Begum, the sister of Hamâyûn, a translation of whose memoirs has been recently placed before the public by the industry of Mrs. Beveridge. Gubbadâ Begum and Nawab salâmî Sultan Begum twice voyaged to Mecca, in those days—when the Indian Ocean was infested by Portuguese pirates—an enterprise attended with extreme danger and difficulty.

THE INDIAN NATIONAL SOCIAL CONFERENCE.

The Executive Committee of the Indian National Social Conference was held on Sunday, 3-30 p.m. at the residence of Capt. Nimhur, Marshall's Road, Egmore, to express the sorrow of the Committee at the sad demise of Sir T. Sadasiva Aiyar. Vice-Chairman of the Reception Committee of the forthcoming conference and to offer condolences to the members of the bereaved family. In the absence of Dr. Mehtab kishôr Reddi, Mr. O. Kandaswami Sethy occupied the chair.

The Chairman paid a glowing tribute to the qualities of head and heart of the late Sir T. Sadasiva Aiyar and showed how he was a practical social reformer, how as a Judge he made liberal interpretations to Shastras and gave rulings helpful to social reform, how he mixed freely with Adil-Dravidas and helped towards their upliftment.

Rao Bahadur Krishna Rao Bhonsle, Mr. Raja Ram Aiyar and Srinath Ahluwaliya Ramnarain also associated themselves with the observations made by the Chairman and made touching references to that departed soul.

Prof. P. A. Subramaniaiayyav moved the following resolution:

This meeting of the Executive Committee of the forthcoming Indian National Social Conference places on record its sense of deep sorrow on the passing away of Sir T. Sadasiva Aiyar, his honoured Vice-Chairman, who both during and particularly after his long arduous and honourable career both at the bar and on the bench dedicated himself to the service of progressive and liberal movements on behalf of Indian social reform and strove, by precept and practice, to uphold the highest traditions and honourable principles of Indian social reform both in his personal life and his public activities and authorisations.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

It was also resolved that the above resolution be communicated to the bereaved family consisting of Lady Sadasiva Aiyar, his helpmate and co-worker in all causes for the uplift of humanity, especially all depressed humanity, and to her sons and daughters.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE CONFERENCE.

The Executive Committee then considered various questions regarding the forthcoming conference. The conference was proposed to be held immediately before the Indian National Congress, the date to be fixed subsequently. Suggestions were also made to approach some Mahomedan and Christian gentlemen and to enlist them as Reception Committee members. They also decided the following as the main issues to be taken up for discussion during the ensuing Conference. They also agreed to publish these points and invite further suggestions.

1. The age of marriage to be raised to 16 for girls and 21 for boys—Amendment to Mr. Sarda's and Dr. Gour's Bills.
2. Widow remarriage—particularly virgin widows.
3. Devadasi legislation—rescue homes for adult women and facilities for educational and other vocational training for young girls.
4. To put an end to brothels and unequal moral standard; the care of the unmarried mother and her child. Consideration of the Madras Vigilance Society Brothel Bill to be introduced in the next session of the Madras Legislative Council.
5. Women's rights, women's education, suppression of polygamy, and divorce law.
6. Child reform and social service. Homes for the destitute, the delinquent and the defective.
7. Caste disabilities arising from the marriage, and inheritance rights; social status in case of inter-caste marriages.
8. Resolution about untouchability and admission of Adi-Dravidas into schools, colleges, hospitals and temples.
10. Repudiation of Miss Mayo's use of Indian social problems for discrediting India's greatness.
11. Urging the principle of freedom and tolerance in the matter of conversion and reconversion and freedom of social intercourse between castes, creeds and communities.

With a vote of thanks, the meeting terminated.

BOMBAY WOMEN'S EDUCATIONAL CONFERENCE.

The Bombay Women's Conference on Educational Reforms was held on the 25th and 26th instant at the Hariabari Model Hall, Gamdevi. Miss Minatul Chatteropadhyaya, Principal of the New High School for Girls, presided. There was a large attendance of ladies of all classes and communities and some members of the Schools' Committee.

THE PROBLEM OF GIRLS' EDUCATION.

Dr. Miss Kashibai Nowrange, Chairman of the Reception Committee, in opening the Conference welcomed the guests and said that except for the last few years, education had been entirely in the hands of men and, though they had all been trying their utmost to formulate different schemes specially suitable for young boys and girls, it had been very difficult for them to grapple with all questions relating to their special needs, particularly those of girls in the different spheres of their activities. The subject was really a very vast one, and divided as they were into so many castes and creeds, so many divergent social customs and such different environments, it was very difficult to come to one common course of action. One province differed from another in details of the right kind of education for the children, and, though very often a lady here and there was consulted on matters pertaining chiefly to girls' education, the suggestions were found to be wanting in many ways. In spite of that there never had been any representative opinion expressed by women on the subject.

Last year after the local conferences held in the different parts came the All-India Women's Conference at Poona which passed a resolution appointing education committees to continue the work of the Conference on educational reform and to cooperate with all educational institutions in their locality and report to the Standing Committee of the Conference. Accordingly a Committee in Bombay was formed in March last and had been working regularly. This year they were confining themselves to Primary Education.

CHILD'S MOST IMPRESSIBLE AGE.

The tender years of a child were the years which acquire those early impressions that go to make the men or women of the future. It was those years that one had to take great care of and the earlier one catches a child the better were the prospects of good influences under well trained and capable guidance. The education of a child began from its very birth, but the generally accepted age for Primary Education, as understood at present, was from 5 to 11 or 12. The education given at that stage and the earlier impressions were the foundation of the structure to be built thereon.

DEFECTIVE SYSTEM OF EDUCATION.

In many a case the child dreads going to school. The regular routine of most of their schools, the fear of scolding from the teacher or the displeasure of the teacher were at the bottom of the dread. Children loved freedom and when they found that that was restricted and not carefully directed, they recoiled from cramming and learning subjects by rote, and the securing of the highest marks was the aim and end of the child's study. The true love of study was not created in that way. When they visit any primary school they found the children of six and seven looking pale and miserable. The lengthy school hours and injurious diet together with the strain told heavily upon children. They must insist upon well-conducted school clinics and proper attention to physical education. Those were some of the urgent needs that ought to be taken up in hand by the authorities.

COMPULSORY PRIMARY EDUCATION.

Referring to the Compulsory Primary Education Bill the speaker said that their premier city found it difficult to put it fully in force. The principle was accepted but when the time had come to put it into practice they were told that there were insurmountable difficulties in the way. If that was the condition in Bombay with its active Corporation and Schools Committee the state in other provinces must be worse. One of the greatest obstacles came through ignorance of the masses. Education of the masses was what was needed to remove such obstacles. The speaker then emphasised the need of teaching domestic science through the University. Concluding, she said that it was not only the text books, subjects and the equipment of the staff that needed improvement but the school surroundings, the home environments, the occupation of boys and girls during the free hours, their friends and companions, their hobbies and such things required careful thought and attention and that was a task which could be and ought to be taken up by all mothers and lovers of social work.
EDUCATION AND RELIGION.

The President then addressed the Conference.

In the course of her address Miss Chattopadhyaya said that the teaching of the religions during school life was to her mind unnecessary. Religion must be taught—that on which all religions were based, viz. the religion of the spirit. The time had come when educationists should be quite clear as to what exactly it was that the human mind sought when it urged with such sincerity the need for what it called religious instruction. Everybody definitely felt that there was something lacking somewhere and that to lack of something might be traced the chaos that existed in most educational systems of to-day. Was that not an expression of a yearning to realise the qualities of the divine in which all human beings were conscious? The use of the word 'religion' was unfortunate; for to quote the great master thinker, Aurobindo Ghose, the word 'religion' was English and smacked too much of things external. He suggests that they gave to religion the sense of the following of the spiritual impulse in its fullness and define spirituality as an attempt to know and live in the highest self, the divine thing that is embracing unity and to raise life in all its parts to the divinest possible values. It was on that line that all education must be based. Education of the child, to her mind, was the drawing out from within the child a 'mystery'. Education of the child, to her mind, was the drawing out from within the child a 'mystery'. Education of the child, to her mind, was the drawing out from within the child a "mystery". The first educator was the mother in the home whose duty was to be ready to build up an educational structure that would last for all time. It was that attitude which she considered the spiritual basis of all education.

CHILD'S MIND NOT A MISTERY.

Western psychologists, as far as she was aware, dealt with the child only intellectually so that all that was not understandable was relegated to the realm of the "mystery" of the child. To those of us who were convinced that every child was born with the knowledge and wisdom gained from its experience in many lives, there was no longer any mystery. The first educator was the mother in the home whose duty was to be ready to build up an educational structure that would last for all time. It was that attitude which she considered the spiritual basis of all education.

DESTRUCTIVE SYSTEM OF TRAINING TEACHERS.

The present system of the training of teachers, she continued, was unquestionably improved but it did not go far enough. The most important fact to be understood by all mothers and those who were to supply the mother's attitude was that "a child is a person bringing with it the experiences of many past lives." Unless that was clearly grasped and accepted the spiritual basis of education could not really be formed.

Concluding, the President said:—"The one and only very real problem before all educationists to-day is to think out ways and means whereby the building of the educational structure will be on the one and only true foundation—that of the spirit—the spirit that will never fail—the spirit which will survive all change—the spirit that will last throughout all time and till eternity."

RESOLUTIONS.

The following resolutions were then moved from the chair and carried:—

"This Conference congratulates Ral Sahib Har Bilas Sarada on bringing a bill before the Legislative Assembly fixing the marriage age of girls. The Conference, however, requests the Select Committee to fix the marriage age of girls to 16 and not 12 as proposed in the Bill and that of boys to 21.

"This Conference is of opinion that H. H. the Sultan Jahan Begum of Bhopal be requested to preside over the All-India Women's Conference on Education to be held in Delhi in February.

"This Conference was moved by Miss B. A. Engineer and seconded by Mrs. Shaffi Tyabji and carried:—

"This Conference requests the Government to remove the embargo on the use of any but the Departmental Readers in Primary Schools and to encourage private enterprise and indirectly to aid in the provision of better text-books for primary schools.

"This Conference requests the Municipal Schools Committee to consider the question of organising a Vernacular Publication Society for the provision of cheap and attractive literature for children."

Several interesting topics formed the subject of discussion when the Bombay Women's Conference on Education Reform was re-assembled in the Malabarli Memorial Hall on Saturday under the presidency of Miss Minamlin Chattopadhyaya.

Two resolutions affecting the health and welfare of school children were passed at the outset. One requested the Bombay Municipal Corporation to expedite its schools' buildings' programme and provide as quickly as possible sanitary premises for the municipal primary schools. Another requested the Corporation and the Improvement Trust to provide more open spaces and play-grounds for primary schools.

DEMAND FOR PHYSICAL TRAINING.

In moving a resolution that more importance be attached to physical education as part of the school curriculum Dr. Miss Matri said that the present system of education aimed at training the mind at the expense of the body. If this grave defect was to be remedied, she added, the building of the sound body and perfect health should precede and not follow the education of the mind. She also advocated facilities for frequent medical examination of children to secure the best possible development, health and happiness of the child and to safeguard against the many ills to which childhood was prone.

The resolution was duly seconded and unanimously adopted.

EVIL OF EXAMINATION.

Miss S. Dallas then moved that the conference was of opinion that undue importance had so far been attached to examinations in primary schools thus hindering the educational progress of pupils and recommended that the present examination system should be abolished. The mover strongly criticised the present system. The resolution was supported by many speakers and adopted.
EDUCATION OF DEFECTIVES.

Miss Katharine Davis then moved that—

"The Conference strongly urges that adequate measures be taken to provide proper facilities for educating the defective and the delinquents."

In commending this resolution to the acceptance of the Conference the mover said a great responsibility lay on the Government as well as society regarding defective and delinquent children. Psychologists were of the opinion that crime was a mental symptom with a mental origin and delinquency an outstanding sample of dangerous and perhaps extreme but common childish naughtiness. Delinquency among children untreated or wrongly treated might develop later into crime. Measures must therefore be taken by society for both its prevention and cure.

SCHOOL FOR GIRL OFFENDERS.

The speaker then laid stress on the necessity of the right kind of schools with well-trained staff in a city like Bombay. Today in Bombay there were no recognised homes for mentally defective children except for two blind schools. The provision of certified schools under the Bombay Children Act was most inadequate. Only one recognised state-maintained reformatory for boys existed. Nothing of a similar nature catered for girls. Madras had grappled with the problem to a lesser extent but Bombay ostrich-like continued to hide its head in the sand and blind itself to the growing requirements for better educational provision for defective and delinquent children.

The certified schools Bombay most needed today were a senior school for girls offenders, a separate school for girls offended against and a medical home for venerealiy infected children.

The Conference then delegated a few ladies to the All India Conference to be held in Delhi in February next.

The President then called upon Mrs. Sarojini Naidu to address the Conference. In the course of her speech Mrs. Naidu said that she was very much impressed with the keynote of the presidential address. She fully endorsed all the implications of that very old fashioned sentiment that all education must be based on the spirit of the child. "Every form of activity in India" she concluded, "hinges on the education of the nation and it is therefore necessary that such Conferences should be held."

With a vote of thanks to the President the Conference was concluded.

POONA WOMEN'S CONFERENCE.

A public meeting of the women of Poona was held under the auspices of the Maharashtra constituent conference, last evening, in the Seva Sadan Hall, Poona, with Mrs. Saralalal Naik, M. A., in the chair, to elect delegates from Maharashtra to the All-India Women's Conference to be held at Delhi early in February next and to consider the resolutions to be sent to that conference. The meeting was largely attended by ladies interested in women's educational advancement.

In opening the proceedings the President remarked that the time had now arrived when the problems affecting the women of India could best be solved by themselves. It was therefore their duty to strive hard with that object in view and then the day would not be far off when their patient efforts would be crowned with success. The principal speakers at the meeting were Miss Sorabji, Mrs. Jankibai Bhat and Miss Balubai Khare.

Six or seven names of ladies were proposed as delegates to be sent to the Conference, but as it could not be decided as to who would be in a position to go if elected, it was resolved to leave the final selection to a committee consisting of the President of the meeting, Miss Sorabji, Mrs. Bhat and Miss Khare.

The following resolutions were adopted at the meeting:

That this conference reiterates the last year's resolution No. VI, namely, Tis Conference deeply deplores the effect of early marriage on education and urges the Government of India to pass legislation, making marriage under sixteen a penal offence. It demands that the age of consent be raised to 16. It whole-heartedly supports, as a step to this end, the Bill for the prevention of child marriage and emphatically suggests that efforts to get the Bill passed into law should continue unabated.

This Conference urges Government to end the Devadasi system by an amendment to the Religious Endowment Act.

This Conference is of opinion that the time has come for Indian women to participate in the administrative work of all educational bodies, and that the staff for the purposes of inspection of all grades of educational institutions should be composed of qualified Indian ladies in as much as they are better calculated to know the requirements and understand the difficulties in the way of development of the same.

As far as possible women teachers should be engaged in the primary stage of education both of boys and girls, which should in fact wholly be the concern of women teachers.

With a view to meet the ever-increasing demand for female teachers in primary schools, Government should be urged to open more Training Schools and to encourage liberally private enterprise in the same direction.

The Conference unanimously recommends the name of the Begum of Bhopal for the Presidency of the forthcoming All-India Women's Conference that meets at Delhi in February next.

This Conference reiterates with emphasis all the resolutions proposed by it last year.

WOMEN'S EDUCATIONAL CONFERENCE AT TRIVANDRUM.

A meeting of the women of Trivandrum was held on the 23rd November in the Victoria Jubilee Town Hall to concert measures for the formation of a branch in Travancore of the All-India Women's Conference on Educational Reform. There was a large and distinguished gathering of ladies, writes the Hindu on the occasion. On the dais were seated H. H. the Junior Maharani of Travancore (mother of H. H. the Maharaja) and also Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyay, Mrs. Bucley and Miss E. Wattr.

H. H., the Junior Maharani presided.

Mrs. P. P. John, one of the Secretaries of the Conference, in the course of her welcome address, said that with regard to the Women's Conference they in Travancore held a very advantageous position. They had a woman at the head of the State. They had more women of academic distinction holding responsible positions in the administration of the State than in any other province in India, Travancore, in fact, was far ahead of other parts of India in respect of women's education. It was therefore, only in the fitness of things that they should hold such a Conference. She (the speaker) would go further and say that situated as they were, they should be pioneers in effecting reforms concerning women's education.

H. H. the Junior Maharani in formally opening the Conference then said in the course of her address—

"We in Travancore are proud of our comparatively high figures of literacy especially as regards women. The position of women in Kerala is much higher than in most parts of India. Great freedom and influence have always been theirs, and this has naturally resulted in rapid educational progress. Travancore women ought to be able to make a special contribution to the consideration of educational problems by the women of India; we should determine to fulfil with enthusiasm the responsibility imposed on us by our special privilege.

That the position of women's education is still profoundly unsatisfactory even in Travancore, will be clear if you realise that those very figures of which we are so proud show that only one out of six of our women is literate. Moreover such figures are in themselves no real test of true education. We must make sure that our girls are getting not merely education, but the right kind of education. I am especially glad to see that the Poona Conference was strongly in favour of organizing the education of girls on somewhat different lines from that of boys. If education should tend to make girls neglect or despise their homes, it would defeat its own object. "The importance of bringing a few highly gifted girls to enter the professions is much less than that of fitting the average girl to be a good wife and mother. She must be able to create a beautiful home with a refined atmosphere."

Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya who spoke next dealt with the aims and objects of the Conference and traced the origin of the All-India movement. The Conference was nearly one year old though its history dated as far back as 1918 when during the sitting of the University Commission at Calcutta, one lady, in the course of her speech, suggested the formation of a committee of women to examine the problem of women's education. The first Women's Conference on Education that was held at Poona in January last was historic. As the close of the Conference it was decided to form a permanent organisation for carrying on the work that was inaugurated there. Continuing, the speaker said that the main point of the present Conference was that Her Highness the Junior Maharani consented to preside over its deliberations. It was a momentous occasion in the history of Travancore. The Conference had had the support of many royalties in many parts of India. In conclusion, the speaker urged that all India should be represented at the next Conference at Delhi.

Mrs. Buckley then spoke on girl guides. Speaking about the aims of guiding, Mrs. Buckley said that it was to train girls to be good mothers, good home-makers, and good citizens. The method of giving this training could be viewed under four heads, viz., (1) character and intelligence, (2) skill and handicraft, (3) physical health and hygiene, and (4) service for others and fellowship. The speaker further said that the girl guide's movement began only 17 years ago. Guiding was a sister movement to scouting but it was entirely a separate organisation. Guiding was inter-national, inter-denomination and non-political.

Mrs. Narayani Amma, a well-known Ezhava lady, then spoke on female education. Incidentally she referred to some of the disabilities of Ezhavas. Continuing, the speaker said that the educated should encourage the uneducated, and should take to industry and manual labour. The speaker dwelt also on some of the evils of ce-education. She then suggested that the posts of primary school teachers should be filled up with women. She further suggested that domestic science should be taught in schools.

H. H. the Maharani then left the ball and Mrs. Chattopadhyaya took the chair. The important resolutions passed were that the conference resolved itself into a constituent unit of the All-India Women's Conference on Educational Reform with power to carry on the work of that Conference permanently in Travancore; that Mr. Har Bimal Sarma's Bill be accorded their support in as much as it attempted to put an end to child-marriages but that the marriage age be 16 for girls and 21 for boys, and the last resolution suggested the necessity for the reform of women's education in the following lines and urged these subjects on the notice of the Standing Committee (a) the university extension lecture scheme to bring as near as possible to the homes of women knowledge and practical demonstration of such science and arts as may be of special interest and use to them; (b) system by which elementary knowledge on such matters as hygiene, sanitation, the care of children, home recreations and occupations be imparted to women of the poorer and working classes; (c) an attempt to give every girl a training in some handicraft by which she can either earn her living entirely or supplement her income in after life.

Mrs. Chattopadhyaya again addressed the gathering and said that there was a fundamental difference between the education of men and that of women. Domestic science, hygiene, etc., were not given the importance they deserved at present. In conclusion, the speaker requested the women of Travancore to send delegates to Delhi.

Mrs. Chandrasekharan, one of the Secretaries, proposed a hearty vote of thanks to the distinguished President and all those who took part in the conference. The function then came to a close.

EDUCATION OF MUSLIM WOMEN,

We take the following memorial addressed to the Minister for Education, Madras Government, by the Pandanashin ladies of Cuddapah, from the Hindus—

"We, the Muslim Pandanashin ladies of the ancient town of Cuddapah, most respectfully beg to approach you with this humble supplication in the hope that you who are evincing a keen interest in the cause of the uplift of Indian womanhood in general will be graciously pleased to extend the same interest and sympathy to us also.

"Speaking generally, Cuddapah district is very backward in respect of education, especially female education; and the education of the Muslim womanhood in particular, to put it mildly, is in the most lamentable condition. Confining ourselves for the present to the Cuddapah town we may state for your information that nearly half the population of this town are Muslims numbering about 10,000 and more than half of this constitute the female section, and the girls of the school-going age number over 1,000. But there are only 3 elementary schools maintained by the municipality for the Muslim girls and it is self-evident that this insignificant number is hardly sufficient to meet the demand of our community.

"Even these are in the most deplorable condition in all respects. They are 'something like cattle-sheds where no arrangements whatsoever for free light and air exist. They are not in sanitary surroundings and are entirely devoid of healthy stimulating educational atmosphere. You are well aware of the fact that our social customs combined with poverty confine us to the four walls of our 'gloomy houses and our lot in the schools in this respect, we are sorry to say, is no wit better. Besides the schools are mostly unequipped and ill-staffed. In this connection we may bring to your kind notice the repeated remarks of the Inspectress of Girls' Schools, such as 'No black-board is supplied to the school even though the attention of the municipality has been drawn to it for the last three years' which speak eloquently of the low conditions of these nomidal schools. In addition to this, they provide instruction up to the fourth class only and the strength does not exceed 200 and the girls who thirst after higher knowledge are handicapped for want of proper provision.

"In order to improve our education and better our lot and to free us from our social and intellectual degradation the local Muslim Association has been persistently agitating for better staffing and equipping of the schools but its cry has been a cry in the wilderness. When we approach the Government for redress they refer us back to the municipality which says that its finances are in a crippled state and so it cannot help us. Thus you will be graciously pleased to observe how hopeless is our situation and we venture to assert that unless our education is taken under the kind and paternal protection of the Government, there can be no salvation for us.

"Recently the kind Inspectress of Girls' Schools and the sympathetic Director of Public Instruction were pleased to visit the town and when they went into our grievances, felt convinced of the justice of our demands and were pleased to promise an early redress but nothing has been done till now in the matter. So we now approach you for the kind favour of your sympathetic support on our behalf of which we are in bad need.

"Our education cannot be improved unless our present schools are removed from this pernicious insanitary surroundings and located in healthy surroundings easy of access to all, well-equipped and raised to middle school standard at least. In this connection, we may state that we requested the Director of Public Instruction for the acquisition of a suitable site where a school may be constructed on sanitary principles with the necessary modern equipment and be wasted, completed, enough to promise to gratify our request as early as possible; but nothing so far has been done and we are thus left helpless.

"We therefore humbly pray that you will be graciously pleased to sympathise with us in our difficulties. Espouse our cause which is no less than the educational advancement of the womanhood of an important community which is backward in education, and see that suitable educational facilities are afforded to us by having the existing schools taken over by Government, removed to healthy surroundings and located in buildings constructed on sanitary principles and by having them fully equipped and raised to the status of middle school with training sections attached to each of them and earn our everlasting gratitude."

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Lady Syndic of Patna, Varsity: Miss Bhalibala Das, daughter of Mr. Madhusudan Das, ex-Minister, has been elected to the Syndicate of the Patna University. She is the first lady honorary magistrate and municipal commissioner in the province.

Late Miss Rajkis ben Mehrotra: We much regret to record the sad loss of Sowbhagwati Rajkis ben Mehrotra, the energetic self-sacrificing and gifted 'Sanchalika' of the 'Stridargam' a long-standing Hindhi Magazine for ladies, at the early age of 21. She lived in the Satyagtra ashram, Sabarmati for a time and was noted for her simplicity. She was an ardent social reformer and was particularly in favour of remarriage of child-widows.

A Reply to Mother India: We learn that Mrs. Chandravati Lakhani P, A. (wife of Prof. Satyavati Siddhantakar, Vag, Gurukula University, Kanger) has rendered the substance of Mother India into Hindi with a reply to all the points raised therein. It is a lady replying to a lady. The book is in the Gurukula press and will be available to the general public before the 20th of this month. Price will be annas twelve only without postage—Alakanar Office, Gurukula Kanger, Bijapur.

Support to Devadaoj Bill: A correspondent writes to the 'Hindu'—Under the auspices of the 'Bhav-rathi Sahodhari Sangam' a public meeting of the ladies of Tiruchinopoly was held on 22nd instant. at 4.45 p.m., in the Municipal Public Hall to support the Devadauj Bill to urge the raising of the legal age of marriage to 16 and 21 for girls and boys respectively. About 300 ladies attended. A few leading gentlemen were also invited to address the meeting and Mr. M. S. Subramaniam Aiyar, M. L. C., President, District Board, presided.

Nagpur Ladies Support Child Marriage Bill: Under the auspices of the Bhagial Mandal, Dhanloti, a general meeting of the ladies of Nagpur was held under the chairmanship of Lady Chitnavis, in the Bhale Girls' School Hall, Sitabuldi, on Sunday last at 3 P.M., to consider Rai Sahib Nasir Madhusudan Das, Sarlabal and Mrs. Shantabai Bhatvadekar explained to the ladies the importance of the Bill for prohibiting child marriages. Mrs. Ramabai Tambre spoke at length pointing out the difficulties that might impede the passage of the Bill into law as it stood. In view of this she suggested an amendment that the marriages of children below 16 in the case of boys and 12 in the case of girls should not be declared invalid or illegal as proposed in the Bill. But the parents and guardians of such children should be penalised. This amendment was passed unanimously.

Women's Educational Conference: The Secretary writes—The Second Madras Constituent Conference of Women on Educational Reformation held on Saturday, the 3rd December 1927, at 10 a.m. at the Women's Christian College, Nungambakam, under the distinguished patronage of Her Excellency Viscountess Goschen. The conference will be presided over by Dr.

NOTES
The Late Mr. Dayaram Gidumal: Diwan Dayaram Gidumal whose death took place on Wednesday last will always hold a high place among the pioneers in the history of Indian social reform. As a Government official and also being of an extremely retiring disposition, his work was always done behind the scenes and often under the guise of a pseudonym. But those who knew the secret knew that it was of a most substantial and stimulating character. Diwan Dayaram was a life-long friend and was closely watched by the late Mr. B. and Malabari in his social reform work. He was, we think, responsible for the direction of the powerful artillery which Mr. Malabari used in his campaign against child-marriages. In his quiet, unassuming way, Mr. Dayaram then and since helped all movements for the uplift of the people of India. He was specially interested in the cause of Indian womanhood and it was his inspiration and support which led Mr. Malabari to start the Bombay Sata, Sadan. Mr. Dayaram, after his retirement, devoted his whole time to the management of the institution and was always on the foundations which he laid that the institution has grown up to its present position. In order to avoid any injury to the institution from the criticisms passed upon him for his unfortunate second marriage, Mr. Dayaram completely severed his connection with the Institution and retired from public life altogether. Since then he has been living a secluded life at Bundra. Mr. Dayaram was also instrumental in establishing a sanatorium for consumptives at Trapanore in conjunction with Mr. Malabari. The late Diwan was a great scholar and his range of reading was very wide. Latterly he devoted much time to the study and practice of homeopathy to which he became something like an expert. He was one of the most gifted, independent and kind-hearted of men and his death will cause a pang in the hearts of all who had ever come in close contact with him.

Andhra University Convocation: The first convocation for the granting of degrees to the students of Andhra University was held on Monday the 5th December when Prof. S. Radhakrishnan of the Calcutta University, and himself a distinguished son of Andhra, delivered the convocation address. He laid stress on the unique occasion to make a brief survey of some aspects of the national movement. In his illuminating address, the Professor said that he saw in Universities the natural opponents of the priests of the narrow conventional type. Contrasting that part of the country with North India he said that whilst in Andhra they were all familiar with the type of mind which upholds privilege, in the north the opposite type, that which seeks universal conformity to its own standards, is the more common. To both of these, said Prof. Radhakrishnan, the University ideal of freedom of thought is strongly opposed. Prof. Radhakrishnan conceived the history of humanity to be an eternal struggle of the spirit of conservation with the creative spirit—the struggle which the two forces alternately gain mastery over each other. Interpreting the history of India in this light, he pointed out that at the present time "we are as one of these periods when humanity pushed back by the powers of reaction is about to make a great leap into the future. Everywhere the same suffocation is felt, the same vital need to pull back the veil, to break freely, to look around on a vaster horizon." He appealed for a deeper study of Indian culture uttering at the same time a warning against the temptation to idealise the past. He ended with a critical study of the past with a view to conquer our national failings and strongly deprecated the tendency to cling to institutions which have long outlived their utility either for sentimental or aristic reasons. Dealing with the reaction of the Indian national ideas, Prof. Radhakrishnan contrasted the conservative mind, which clings tenaciously to old forms and shits its eyes to the merits of modern ideas, with the mind of the radical, who is anxious to forget a past which for him is full of shame and does not realise that "where other cultures may give us light, our own furnishes the conditions for action." Prof. Radhakrishnan rightly observed that the characteristic of the Indian genius is its adaptability to changing circumstances. "It has never," said the Professor, "been too proud to learn from others and adopt such of their methods as seemed adaptable to its needs. If we retain this spirit, we can face the future with growing confidence and strength."

University Ideals: Prof. Radhakrishnan went on to urge the Andhra University to give an important place to Indian culture and to the study of Sanskrit literature. He advised the institution to proceed with caution in its efforts to make Telugu the medium of instruction even in the degree courses. For, while he agreed that the reform was a very desirable one, he held that the students of the Andhra University would be seriously handicapped with the standard of English, which he considered to be the language of international thought and also one of the chief factors in the making of the Indian nation, were not as high in their universities as it was in other parts of the country. He dwelt on the importance of science and the necessity of studying at least one objective science. He deprecated the tendency to mosaic with 'futilism and folded hands' the evils that we find. A nobler piety demands their reduction and their removal." The poverty of our people, he said, was not spiritual but only a sign of the sloth and failure not always of the poor. Turning to middle clas.

unemployment, Prof. Radhakrishnan regretted the tragic waste of human effort. Our connection with Britain has not enabled us to have lead industrially in the East. He referred to British firms which relied on imported skilled labour instead of training Indian youths in their firms, and observed that Britain was following the dangerous policy of jobs. Young lives were cheated of their legitimate to be introduced into the mysteries of shipping as the boys are to learn. In his welcome speech he recognised that hither to no facilities were offered to train up Indian boys to become officers in the merchant shipping. The democratic influence is nowhere so much in evidence as in a training ship which the captain likened to a Scout camp. In course of time, we hope to see our little cadets emerging as full-fledged officers each in charge of a ship.

Prevention of Child Marriages: Dr. S. Muthulakshmi Reddi has given notice of the following bill to get the sanction of the Government to be introduced into the present session of the Legislative Council. Whereas it is expedient to raise the marriageable age of Hindu girls and boys in the Presidency of Madras, it is hereby enacted as follows:—

1. No marriage of a Hindu girl shall be completed if a male, the age of 18 years, or if a female, the age of 14 years, or takes active part in the performance of such marriage or being a guardian of either of the parties to the marriage gives his consent to it shall be liable to simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months or a fine which may extend to Rs. 1,000 or to both.

4. No court shall take cognizance of an offence under the preceding section, except on a complaint made within a period of two years after the offence was committed by any five adult male Hindus or by the executive committee of any society for the examination of which the board was constituted by any five adult male Hindus. or by the executive committee of any society for the examination of which the board was constituted by any five adult male Hindus.

In the course of his speech Prof. Radhakrishnan referred to the national movement for Swaraj. He observed that there was no greater opportunity in our recent history for young men and women than at present. "Swaraj is not a mere change in the form of Government or a transfer of the seat of authority. It is the transformation of the habits of mind of the people. No power on earth can stand against the corporate efforts of a people to was committed by any five adult male Hindus. or by the executive committee of any society for the examination of which the board was constituted by any five adult male Hindus.

A BETTER WAY?

It is now clear that the idea of united and unanimous boycott of the Statutory Commission throughout the country is not likely to be realized. Influential sections of Muslims in the Punjab and in Bengal, and of non-Brahmins in Madras and Maharashtra, are opposed to it. The Ministers in the several provinces have shown no inclination to join in the boycott. The President of the Legislative and the Presidents of the provincial Legislative Councils, are observing the principle of their having no politics with added fervour. The members of Executive Councils do not evidently feel that there is anything derogatory to their self-respect in continuing to hold office. Indian Judges of the High Court, Indian members of the I. C. S. and other superior services take it for granted that the resolutions of public meetings are not intended to apply to them. It is thus obvious that if unanimity is wasted, it cannot be secured on the basis of a boycott of the Commission. Whether it can be obtained for any alternative scheme, it is difficult to say without having such a scheme submitted to and considered by representative leaders. It is, however, possible to make a fetish of unanimity. Most great reforms in the history of the world, have been the achievement not of a unanimous people, nor even of a majority but of an energetic minority which knew that it wanted, and was determined to get it. A boycott of the Commission to be effective need not be unanimous. Even if the Punjab and Bengal stand out, the rest of India can carry on the boycott if—a very big if—it is the best way of serving the cause of Indian political advancement. We are concerned with the merits of boycott as a method, and not with the prospects of its being unanimous or of its being even partially successful. The only thing that a boycott can do, is to show that India resents the exclusion of Indians from the Commission. This, we think, is rather a small matter, the important question being, whether India is satisfied with the present system of Government and if she is not, what other system she would like to have. The National Congress and the National Liberal Federation—the two non-denominational national bodies in the country—may at their forthcoming sessions appoint a joint committee to sit at once and draw up a report on the best future constitution for India.

The boycott of the Commission as we remarked above, is but an expression, a gesture of resentment at the exclusion of Indians from the central body of the Statutory Commission. This exclusion is a fatal mistake on the part of the British Government, unless it is a calculated move to place Indians between the horns of the dilemma—either to bend before the autocratic will of the India Office or to challenge the authority of British rule with consequences such as Ireland had to suffer soon after the conclusion of the war. Lord Birkenhead’s paradoxical attitude to the Irish movements for self-government is well-known, and it may be that he intends to repeat it in the case of India. The question for patriotic Indians, as we conceive it, is, whether they should let Lord Birkenhead or his advisers, whoever they may be, plunge the country into civil war, deliberately or stupidly. The proposal of a boycott has, as shown above, already created a split in the Moslem League which, till now, was able to present at least a semblance of unity, as compared with other similar movements. If some days ago there was a hope that all parties and communities will unite in boycott, the Commission, and that the unity so reached may form the basis of a more enduring and substantial unity, this hope is no longer possible. The persistence in the boycott idea is sure to result in recriminations between Indian leaders as in the days of the non-co-operation movement. We may or may not gain anything in the way of further political rights from the operations of the Commission, but we are certain, as its chief result, to be divided, into rival political factions which will further complicate the Indian problem after the Commission has come and gone. It behoves Indian leaders in these circumstances to change their plan of action so as to bring the largest number of their politically-minded countrymen together in relation to the Commission. If experience of social reform is of any account—after all politics is but a phase of social reform—we should say, accept the Commission under protest and put your case before it in the most convincing way possible. We have done our best to persuade the Pandits of British political to, make the constitution of the Commission acceptable to the Indian people. They have clung fanatically to the text of the preamble of the Statute and turned a deaf ear to our arguments. Mr. Baldwin’s Cabinet has behaved just like a group of orthodox Shastris who attach more importance to the literal text than either to its spirit or to the changed conditions of the country. For the time being, they are in the seat of power, but the most conservative Pandits have had to give way to the working of mighty social forces, and questions which excited the keenest opposition quarter of a century ago, have suddenly passed out of the pale of controversy and the views of reformers have come to be accepted, as a matter of course, by the whole community. In the same way, the reforms urged by the National Congress, for many years ridiculed and opposed, have all been implicitly accepted by the very men who were most bitter in their antagonism. It is along these tried lines that we see most hope of combining the largest section of opinion in the face of the impending enquiry.
KANAKADAS, THE UNTOUCHABLE SAINT OF UDIP.

(By Mr. K. Venugopala Rao, E. A.)

By force of circumstances, the untouchables as a class, inspite of their failings which arise from the fact that spiritual nourishment has been uniformly denied to them, are the true bearers of the Hindu Cross. They are in so far as they weakly submit to revolting indignities heaped upon them with impunity, the real descendants of Harishchandra, the Super-Christ of Hinduism. From times immemorial they have been the unsuspecting whipping blocks of religious avarice, a whole mass of people set apart as some kind of pitch that defiles the superior epidermis. Nowadays in the history of humanity there has been an entire people in unison, so perfectly practised non-violence in thought, word and deed and established their just claim to be called civilized in the true sense of the word, as the untouchables of India. The so-called civilized nations of Europe pay their lip-homage to the teachings of Christ but when put to the test bring out their armory of explosives and poison-gases to destroy their adversaries. And yet these armed devotees of Christ with their light consciences pinned to their shirt-sleeves go about the world preaching His message of Love curiously enough give rise to such incongruities as soldier-saints who are perfect strangers to patient suffering and humiliation. Similarly, the high class Hindus who comfortably lie on a downy bed of superiority of their own making and there-from assert their double claim, on the one hand to incense the untouchables and on the other, to absorb themselves in deep contemplation of the Divine, boast of their saints and prophets too oblivious of the fact that the average untouchable who vicariously takes upon himself all their sins, has inborn saintliness in him. On the whole failure is writ large on every civilization, eastern or western, in that its products sedulously prey upon the backward classes and religion which is supposed to animate it helplessly sequences in their prerogative to do so.

Kanakadas of Udipi like all untouchable saints is dearest to God. Great as other saints are, they have only flat foot-stools given them in heaven for the reason that while in the world they shared with the rest of the caste Hindus the original sin of touchability and therefore immunity from the rigors of social oppression. He sits enthroned in a chamber set apart for those martyrs of society who are in Gandhi's words touching "poems of pity." Somehow the current history of that pure soul is hopelessly mixed up with fable. Like all his compères of his day and earlier days, he has also sunk into partial obscurity. One fact "incontrovertible," that he lived in the fifteenth century at Udipi outside the sacred precincts of that illustrious place of pilgrimage the Shri Krishna Temple. This historic seat of attraction is, by the way, controlled by separate temples by eight different orthodox swamis all of them successors of the ancesotls of Shri Madhavacharya, possessing ample benefits of their own. Local tradition has it that he was a friend as far as his untouchability went and later on when the divine light within him shone forth, the acknowledged preceptor of Swami Vadiraj, the foremost of the successors of Madhavacharya. There stands to this day the earthen mound, the relic of the contemplate thatched dwelling of the saint to mock as it were the transitory grandeur of the neighbouring pile of buildings. There are other important facts connected with him which have gone into the history of the Shri Krishna Temple. By the indomitable force of his devotion which took the form of rich song-offerings -- he made the stone image turn its front to him where he sat the despaired of its devotees far beyond the range of pollution. Shri Krishna to this day retains the same position. This is how the miracle happened. Kanaka had his scuffles from among the ranks of the orthodox, who measured the greatness of the human soul by caste and its perquisites. They laughed at the bare idea that an untouchable could be acceptable to the Holy of Holies. Kanaka however overflowed with love for all and saw only Shri Krishna permeating the world and dwelling even in the hearts of those who treated him with contemptuous cruelty. As an untouchable it was his duty, he thought, to keep within proper bounds and pit his meekness, "the badge of all his tribe," against the insolence of superiority. Once it so chanced that the image of Shri Krishna had been decked out more gorgeously than usual for the special feast of the season. Vast crowds of pious Hindus had assembled round it. Kanaka alone nervously peeped through a back-window from the prescribed distance lost in the praises of the Lord. Lo and behold, just at the time when the fire-offering was being swung round the image, it suddenly took a sharp turn in the direction of its neglected beloved.

Nothing is known of Kanaka's profession in life. All that is known is that he spent all his time in the quiet of his cottage singing the insipid hymns of his own composition to the accompaniment of a crude drum. Krishna was all the company, he had in the world, for at times He danced with jingles about His feet to Kanaka's tunes and at other times communed with him with all the heavenly fondness He felt for His incomparable devotee. It was left to Swami Vadiraj to discover the whereabouts of the Lord who sometimes absented Himself from His usual place. To draw the pointed attention of his degenerate followers to the well-deserved intimacy Kanaka enjoyed with Krishna, he abruptly summoned them into his presence and asked them to name the object he held in his closed fist. All of them in their density made absurd guesses, until at last Kanaka from a distance broke forth into extempore song and declared that it was the phallic representation of the Divine Cowherd. Thenceforward a stronger tie of friendship bound Swami Vadiraj to Kanaka. But this privilege by itself did not bring with it even moderate release from his untouchability. All th sae it must however be said in fairness to the great Swami, that though he observed the pernicious practice he admitted the injustice of it at least as far as Kanaka was concerned. From the very beginning of his acquaintance with him, Kanaka was an object of his special affection. But now he treated him with utmost reverence. He took him into his confidence and through his intervention secured by revelation the sign of the horse, Hayavadana, which he permanently adopted for his domestic worship and that of his successors in his line. Kanaka after a deal of coaxing agreed to persuade Krishna to manifest Himself to Swami Vadiraj and his camp followers. Unaware, a white dog entered the court-yard at mid-day when the goats were absorbed in their sumptuous meals. Maddy-eyed as they were, they took the canine form at its face value and brutally flung it out into the street. At Kanaka’s pressing instance, once again the Lord appeared in the form of a white horse and ate out of a plate from behind Swami Vadiraj by resting His fore-legs on his shoulders.

Centres of pilgrimage are sacred more on account of the hallowed traditions established by those beneficent souls who are canonised on earth than by the mere accident of the image itself. In a sense the miraculous grace surrounding it is engendered by them. If the Christians have a saying that “the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church,” the Hindus is a different way maintain that God is inseparable from His devotees, indeed He is their bond-servant. In a way therefore the life of Kanakadasa is so intimately connected with the temple at Udipi that severally they seem to possess no distinct individualities of their own. In the wider sphere of life Kanaka is the name of God-ward striving. Madhwaism found in him its supreme fulfilment and a new renaissance. Kanaka has particular reason to be proud of him as he has handed down classics of devotional poetry in Canarese equally dignified by those of Prabandhas and Appays, two other saints of the same country.

MISSIONARIES AND MOTHER INDIA.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I hope that you will give me space for a brief reply to a communication from Mr. S. Veerabhadra published in the Reformer of Nov. 6th. In this communication the author while acknowledging that some American missionaries in India have condemned Miss Mayo’s book asserts that some share her point of view. Personally I doubt whether there are American missionaries in India who really share Miss Mayo’s point of view or fully endorse her repulsive charges. In general we Americans have probably been at fault in the matter of making public in India our attitude to this book, confining our efforts too largely to counteracting its effect in America.

The very day on which I first had opportunity to read “Mother India,” I sent to America a brief review of it, which has just been published, in which I said, among other things, that I was ashamed that a fellow American should write a book whose picture of India was a “sinful caricature.” All of us Americans on the Executive Committee of the National Christian Council except Bishop Robinson, whose objection I understand to have been largely technical approved the statement condemning “Mother India” issued by the Secretaries of the Council. I myself had 400 copies of this statement struck off and am sending them to a wide constituency in America.

A group of American missionaries from all over India is issuing a statement, repudiating “Mother India” and sending it to broadcast to the American Press. I have myself gathered what seems to me to be conclusive evidence against many of Miss Mayo’s worst mis-statements and have sent it to Miss Mayo in the form of a letter with an appeal to her, in the name of truth and good-will, to withdraw the book. Mr. K. T. Paul happened to see a copy of this letter and urged me to let him print it in “The Young Men of India,” but I had previously put it into the hands of a representative in America for publication there, if, as I fear may be the case, Miss Mayo’s reply is unfavourable. To my personal knowledge a stream of articles and letters designed to offset the effect of “Mother India” is going to America from the American missionaries in India.

It is hard for me to believe that any such warped and hideous presentation of India as Miss Mayo’s can long have much influence for evil in the world. It is bound to lead to reaction in which the great gifts of India for world civilization will again have emphasis. I share the hope of Mahatma Gandhi that India may be large-spirited enough to accept whatever there is in Miss Mayo’s book of stimulus to fresh efforts for reform. Truth is still stronger than falsehood. Good-will is more powerful than prejudice. No single book however disgusting and untrue can long stand in the way of the movement of the peoples of the earth toward better mutual understanding and greater mutual respect.

In confidence that you share this faith,

Ahmednagar, 5th December 1927.

Yours etc,

A. H. Clark.

MADRAS WOMEN’S CONFERENCE.

The second Madras Constituent Conference of women on Educational Reform commenced its sessions this morning at 10 in the Science Lecture Hall of the Women’s Christian College, Nungambakkam, and Viscountess Goschen opened the Conference. Dr. Muthalalshmi Reddi, Deputy President, Legislative Council, presided. There was a very large gathering of ladies of all creeds and castes. Those present on the platform included Miss McDougall, Mrs. Jinarajadasa, Mrs. Cousins, Sister Subbalakshmi Ammal, Mrs. Malati Patwardhan, Mrs. Yakub Hussain and Mrs. Alamelumangathrayarswami. On her arrival, Lady Goschen, was received by Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and others and conducted to the dais.

The proceedings then began with songs and prayers. The pupils of National Girls’ school, Guindy, conducted the Hindu prayer by repeating a portion of Purushasukham. This was followed by Christian and Mahomedan prayers.

Dr. Muthulakshmi Ammal in a short speech requested Lady Goschen to open the Conference. She said --
"It looks like yesterday when you so graciously opened our first conference last year and assured us of your sympathy and co-operation in this great task of awakening India's womanhood to a sense of their duties and responsibilities. Since then you would have noted with joy and pride that the women of this ancient land have followed your noble advice, have justified Your Excelcency's expectations and a great awakening having come upon all women, high, low, educated and ignorant they have been meeting on a common platform and discussing important educational and social problems vitally connected with their sex without any distinction of caste, creed or race, and can now show a wonderful record of practical work done throughout the year. We rightly feel that our strength and inspiration have come from your noble example and lead which was so loyally and enthusiastically followed even by royal personages in other provinces and thus our cause has gained in strength and popularity in this land of distance."

Lady Goschen in declaring the conference open spoke about the importance of education for girls.

"It is a pleasure" Lady Goschen said, "once again for me to open this educational conference for which I hope great things in the future. I have read the report carefully and I am glad to think that there has been some progress and something been added to the curriculum and also more is being taken in hand for the moral and physical well-being of pupils in the schools.

"Education is a means to an end, not alone for our honour and glory but to make us more useful fellow-citizens, more useful in our generation. It is not always the most brilliant scholars who do the best work in the world but those who love their work. We may soar so high as to forget those who cannot attain such heights. By all means hitch our waggon to a star but does not soar high in that waggon if fellow-service and earthly duties is left behind. The race is not always to the swift nor the battle to the strong.

"Stay to help the lame dogs, and if all cannot be successful in examinations, remember as George Elliot says "The god of the world is mainly dependent on unheroic acts and that things are not so ill with you and me is owing partly to those who lived faithfully hidden lives and now rest in unvisited tombs."

Mrs. Rukmani Lakshmipathi presented a report of last year's conference incorporating the accounts of income and expenditure. The report stated that there was a wonderful response from the women of this presidency to a general invitation issued by the executive committee consisting of eminent educationists and women social workers. The conference was a great success last year being the first of its kind in the sense that women felt that the time had come when they should take the initiative in all matters concerning the education of their children. They still further felt that they had a legitimate share in advising the Government in their educational policy. A generous donation was given by the Maharani of Vizianagram. The senior Maharani of Travancore had become a patroness of their conference. The whole idea of holding such a conference was to formulate a scheme of education which would be in accordance with the needs of their country and which would help to train their girls for better citizenship to inculcate self-respect in them and lastly to awaken their national consciousness.

On the motion of Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi the following resolution was next adopted:—

"That this conference records their loving sympathy in the deep sorrow and bereavement that has befallen their beloved sister and leader Lady Sadasiva Aiyar."

The resolution was carried in silence the whole gathering standing.

kshmi Reddi took the chair. She briefly explained the object of the conference and emphasising the importance of giving education to the girls on national lines. She then called upon Mrs. Margaret Cousins to explain the resolutions passed at the All-India Women's Conference at Poona in January last. Mrs. Cousins read the report of the conference and pointed out that at that conference vital issues connected with education of women were discussed and a number of resolutions were passed suggesting plans of work to carry out the educational advancement of the womanhood of India.

Sister Subbalakshmi Anmal then explained the significance of those resolutions in Tamil and all those resolutions were next ratified by the conference.

Mrs. Malati Patwardhan next moved the following resolution:—

"This conference deeply deplores the effect of early marriage on education. While welcoming Mr. Sarada's attempt to pass legislation prohibiting early marriage this conference strongly protests against the proposed ages of twelve and fifteen in his bill and reiterates the resolution passed at the All-India Conference that the legal age of marriage for girls and boys be sixteen and twenty-one respectively. It also demands that the age of consent be raised to sixteen and supports Sir Hari Singh Gour's Bill as a step towards that end."

In doing so Mrs. Patwardhan said they all knew how harmful early marriage was. They also knew the various troubles that would take place when children were married young. The aim of life was to gain happiness through perfection. Child marriages could not possibly help one to attain perfection. True religion would not advocate early marriage, Mr. Sarda's bill was a step towards an ideal. Personally she was in favour of raising the age still further. If early marriage were stopped, baby-widows in India would be a thing of the past.

Mrs. Ramaswami Sivan in a telling Tamil speech seconded the resolution and Miss Baker supported it. After Mrs. Jayalakshmi Kumar and a few other ladies had spoken in favour of the motion it was put to the meeting and carried unanimously.

After the passing of the resolution prohibiting early marriage, the following resolution was moved by Bhasha-

rathi Sree Ram:—

"This Conference deeply deplores the effect of the present dowry system on the education of girls and urges parents and guardians to abolish this social custom."

This resolution was seconded by Mrs. Swaminathan and supported by Sripathi Aminelumangattbyrammal and passed unanimously.

The following resolution was moved by Miss. N.

Brockway:—

"An adequate playground should be attached to every school and in the crowded areas of cities public playgrounds should be opened."

The resolution was seconded by Mrs. Back.
The resolution was carried.

Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi then moved the following resolution for the medical inspection of girls in schools:

"Systematic medical inspection should be made compulsory in all schools and colleges and in the case of girls the inspection should be carried out by lady doctors and where possible school clinics should be started."

This resolution was adopted at the Poona Conference.

The resolution was duly seconded and carried unanimously.

Miss Van Doren moved the following resolution.

"Alternative courses should be established to suit the needs of girls who do not intend to take up college education, these to include the subjects of domestic science, fine arts, handicrafts and industries."

The resolution was duly seconded and carried.

Mrs. Taffs then proposed the following resolution which was seconded by Dr. Chinnappa and supported by Mrs. Jinarajadasa and carried unanimously.

"It is desirable that sex hygiene be taught in all secondary schools and colleges by competent teachers."

The following resolution was then proposed by Miss Barrie:

"This conference is of opinion that the spirit of social service should be inculcated in every stage of education."

The resolution was duly seconded and carried unanimously.

Miss Palurunissa Begum Saheba of Nellore then moved the following resolution:

"This Conference is in favour of compulsory primary education being given to Muslim girls and requests the Corporation of Madras to extend its compulsory scheme to the Muslim girls with pondash facilities."

The resolution was seconded by Mrs. Yakub Hasan and carried unanimously.

Mrs. Jinarajadasa then spoke in support of Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi's Bill regarding Devadasi. A motion supporting the Bill was unanimously passed.

The Conference next elected the following delegates to the All-India Women's Conference to be held in Delhi next year: Dr. Muthulakshmi Ammal, Mrs. Jinarajadasa, Mrs. Malati Patwardhan, Miss. Swaminathan, Miss. E. K. Janaki Ammal, Mrs. Yakub Hasan, Miss Van Doren, Mrs. Alakeshunamathayaranamal, Miss. Dehavasyam, Mrs. B. Lakshman Rao, Miss Baker and Mrs. Cousins.

Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi, in her concluding remarks, said that the Conference was in many respects a unique success, especially so as a number of Mussalmam sisters were present. She laid special emphasis on the position of women in social life and that girls should be given such training as would ensure them to become loyal wives and wise mothers.

It was the mother that was responsible for the training of citizens, reformers, statesmen, philanthropists and heretics. The Maharani of Baroda had expressed her view in this matter by asking how men could be free when women were slaves. The speaker also spoke about the evils of early marriages and the consequent increase of infant mortality and child widows. Then the speaker referred to the subject of sex hygiene and emphasized the point that both boys and girls should be educated and taught the virtue of chastity. Sex hygiene should form an important place in the school curriculum from the point of view of preservation of race.

Mrs. Cousens then proposed a vote of thanks to Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and also thanked Miss McDougall and Mrs. Yakub Hasan.

The President was then garlanded and the Conference then broke up.

WOMEN'S EDUCATIONAL CONFERENCE.

MADURA.

For the first time in the annals of Madura, writes the Hindu, the Tamil Nadu Constituent Women's Educational Conference met at the Victoria Edward Hall this morning at 8 a.m. The Conference hall presented a beautiful appearance with flags and festoons. A large number of ladies including a fairly good number of delegates from Trichinopoly.

Dindigul and other places attended the conference Prominent among those present were Dr. Muthulakshmi Ammal, M. L. C., and Deputy President of the Legislative Council, M. Doraikannan Chattopadhyaya, the President-Elect, Mrs. C. Kaliyan Krishnan Nair, Mrs. M. Manickavasagam Pillai, Mrs. G. Ramiah, Mrs. Hanum Doraikannan Mudaliar, Mrs. Anna Thomas, Mrs. Alims, Mrs. Hans, Mrs. M. K. Sankaranarayana Aiyar, and others. On the beautifully decked shiamans were seated, Dr. Muthulakshmi Ammal, Mrs. Kamaladevi, Mrs. Kaliyan Krishnan Nair and Dr. Anna Thomas.

The proceedings of the Conference began with prayer offered by two ladis one after the other. Next, on behalf of the Women's Indian Association, Madura, Dr. Anna Thomas, Honorary Secretary of the Association read and presented an address to Dr. Muthulakshmi.

Mrs. C. Kaliyan Krishnan Nair then read the welcome address in Tamil and said:

"I am glad that this conference of our sisters has met here for the purpose of considering about the educational reforms of women. It is known to us all that women in ancient times were highly cultured; but it is regrettable to find that that condition is not prevalent any longer in India much less in Southern Indian. It is said that only two per cent of women are educated. I am sure this conference will make efforts to combat this darkness of ignorance. But this subject of education to women is not an easy task and requires a lot of deliberation. For instance, the question of language has to be solved. The question of the age at which girls should be married will also have to be decided. Another important thing that we have to do is to give our support to the Bill regarding Devadasis which Dr. Muthulakshmi has brought forward in the Legislative Council."

She then requested Dr. Muthulakshmi Ammal to open the conference.

Dr. Muthulakshmi Ammal then formally declared the conference open in a short and elegant speech. She then formally declared the conference open in a short and elegant speech. Dr. Anna Thomas then proposed Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya to be the President of the conference and the proposition being formally seconded by Mrs. Hanum Doraikannam Ammal, was carried amidst cheers and the President took her seat.

The Conference then resolved itself into a Subjects Committee to consider draft resolutions to be passed in the open conference.
When the Conference resumed its sittings in the afternoon at 2 p.m., Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya, the President, delivered her presidential address extemporaneously.

The following resolutions were then passed:

1. This conference expresses its deep regret at the sudden demise of Sir T. Sadasiva Aiyar, and conveys its heartfelt condolences to Lady Sadasiva Aiyar and her family.

2. This conference expresses its deep sympathy with the sufferers in the Nellore District who had sustained heavy losses by the recent cyclones havoc and requests the Government and the public to help the distressed generously.

3. This conference gives its support to all the resolutions passed by the 'Women's Conference with the exception of the sixth resolution.

4. The conference deeply deplores the effect of early marriage on education. While welcoming Mr. Sarda's attempt to pass legislation prohibiting early marriage, the conference strongly protests against the proposed age of 12 and 15 in his bill and reiterates the resolution passed at the all-India Conference that the legal age of marriage for girls be 18 and boys be 21. It also demands that the age of consent be raised to 16 and supports Sir Hari Singh Gour's Bill as a step towards that end.

5. This conference deeply deplores the effect of dowry system on the education of girls and urges parents to abolish this social custom and utilize the amount for the education of girls.

6. An adequate play ground should be attached to every school and in crowded areas of cities public play grounds should be opened. Systematic medical inspection should be made compulsory in all schools and colleges and in the case of institutions for girls inspection should be carried out by lady doctors only. Where possible school clinics should be started.

7. In the curriculum of girls' education in India teaching in the ideals of motherhood and in making of the house beautiful and attractive should be given prominence.

8. Proper facilities should be provided in purdah educational institutions for girls who observe purdah.

9. Primary education should be made compulsory for all boys and girls. The present series of vernacular text books should be revised and supplemented by books suitable for children. Facilities and financial provisions should be made at the same time for boys and girls alike in all schemes of compulsion. Women should be on all attendance committees.

10. Preparatory vocational and manual training suited to the child's needs and daily experience should be included in the curriculum.

The vernacular should be the medium of instruction, English being a compulsory second subject. Hindi or Urdu should be included in the curriculum, and should be an alternative to the classical languages, one of which should be compulsory.

SIND WOMEN'S CONFERENCE.

Mrs. W. F. Hudson, wife of the Commissioner in Sind, yesterday opened the Sind Ladies' Educational Conference and immediately afterwards performed the opening ceremony of the Mrs. Dialdas Mal Chand Ladies' Association Buildings.

The new premises of the association are situated in the Kuchery Road opposite the offices of the Daily Gazette. The conference and opening ceremony were attended by over 600 women from all parts of Sind and S. Tayabji, Secretary of the Ladies Conference, read her report.

Mrs. Homi Mehta, President of the Conference, delivered her presidential address. In the course of it she said, "I feel that within the next five years we will be needing schools in much larger numbers: and if we trust to the authorities to find schools I am afraid we will be greatly disappointed. It seems that the Government educational machinery is hopelessly broken by reason of many obstacles. The reason given is that they have no money to repair it or buy a new plant. It may be so. There is no doubt that they have no sufficient drivers also. If they employed women drivers as council members and ministers and sought their cooperation I feel they will be able to get on better. It will be very necessary for us to struggle hard on this subject; and I am sure unless some of us are prepared to pay our constant and devoted attention to this subject we will have to be sorry for it considerably in the years to come. We must try to get ready for more schools.

"I know, there is a feeling generally that we should ask for a separate university for our sex. It is a step which requires considerable thinking. I know, it is said that women have their own share of life and need all throughout a distinct and separate type of education. In my opinion, I am afraid such a division like cutting sharply a piece of cake cannot be made. It will be risky. There are many common spheres for both the sexes in education and few which are distinct for each. I would much more prefer certain voluntary subjects for women in one common university. Only we should demand for and take our position and place in the university administration. A separate university means to me a constant obstacle in understanding our men. A university is an excellent meeting ground for both the sexes to understand and know each other well. I am afraid and I strongly feel that a finely cut division in university education will make us lose much of those finer emotions and understanding which are necessary for our life.

And lastly, I will lay before you a vital problem which confronts our country to-day. We find each community and caste in our country struggling hard to achieve its own ends. Let men fight for their small gods. May God give them wisdom. Perhaps they are hopeless and will drive our country to rack and ruin I humbly put before you that we can lead them to salvation by our unity. Our aim is our children's edu. cation which practically means their lives. Mothers and sisters, let us unite with one aim to bring unity in our country. Our influence in our homes, our education to our children who are existing, our resolve, faith and desire for unity, which will mean a valuable heritage to our children yet unborn from their very inception, but save the situation which must depend upon how we live in the country of our birth which affords us our daily bread. And my last humble and respectful request is to leave alone our men to fight if they so choose, but to keep ourselves aloof from the turmoil and to let them know boldly that we women shall remain united. We are women of all religions, castes and creeds and if we keep united our children will learn the true meaning of fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man, will live happy and noble lives and remain united. It will not be impossible, if with His name on our lips and in our hearts we strive."

Mrs. P. Punniah, Secretary of Mrs. Giidias Goocbland Ladie's Association, then read her report, after which the whole assembly entered the new building and inspected its handsome furnishings. At the evening sessions of the Conference Miss E. J. Granger delivered an address on "The Objects of our Schools", after which interesting discussions followed in the course of which the following resolutions were passed.

1. That this Conference is of opinion that there should be compulsory education for girls in the larger towns of this province.

2. That this Conference desires that the mother tongue, together with English, be made compulsory in all schools.

3. That co-education be adopted in the primary stages of all schools under capable women teachers.

4. That physical culture and hygiene be made compulsory subjects for girls in primary and secondary schools.

5. That alternate courses be provided for girls leaving school between the ages of 17 and 19.

6. That this Conference urges that the age of consent be raised to 18 for married girls and 18 for unmarried girls, and also that this Conference whole-heartedly supports Mr. Haribidas Sarda's Hindu Marriage Bill.

MINIMUM LEGAL AGE OF MARRIAGE.

The British Home Secretary, Sir William Jowynson-Hicks, spent more than an hour one morning in this week with a deputation representing the most important women's societies, who had gone to him to urge the raising of the minimum legal age of marriage, which is at present twelve years for girls and fourteen for boys. They also asked that the recommendations of the Departmental Committee on sexual offences against young persons should be put into immediate effect. The deputation, organized by the National Union of Societies for Equal Citizenship, claimed to represent the views of millions of women throughout the country.

Sir William, who brought with him a group of departmental heads, including the Registrar General, was not unnaturally taken aback when he glanced at the list of speakers and saw that twelve women were to speak. Miss Rathbone, however assured him that they would all speak very briefly, and her promise was fully fulfilled. It was agreed that Sir William should reply to the speeches on early marriages before going on to the second point, writes the Evening News. Miss Rathbone said there was a tremendously strong feeling on the part of the women's organisations represented that the age of marriage should be raised. It was true that very few individuals in England married under the age of fifteen. During the past three years, however, the number of girls marrying at the age of fifteen seemed tending to increase. In 1924 the total was 13, but in 1928 it had risen to 34. It was regrettable that Great Britain was among the most backward of civilized countries in this matter. The fact discredited us in the eyes of foreign countries, and made it difficult to press for the raising of the marriage age in countries where early marriages were far too frequent, because foreigners did not understand that a law could be on the Statute-book and be almost a dead letter. It was especially likely to have an evil influence in India. She thought it must rather hamper the India Office in pressing for reforms in India when in this country a girl could be legally married at the age of twelve.

Miss Rathbone said she was pleased to find that the Archbishop of Canterbury was warmly in favour of the change. The question was what should be the minimum age. The general opinion of the women's societies was that it should not be lower than sixteen for girls and not lower than that for boys, though some people felt that because of the husband's economic responsibilities the age should be higher for boys. They felt that the age of marriage should be concurrent with the age of consent, and that if the age of consent were raised to seventeen the age of marriage should also be raised. This belief was endorsed by the International Council of Women.

Miss Rathbone also said there was a strong feeling that if the age were raised there should be no dispensations for marriages below that age. In countries where the minimum age of marriage was high dispensation was sometimes granted, usually when a child was expected. But the dispensation was unanimous in its belief that when a man had seduced a very young girl he should not be allowed to marry her. They would rather have a lower minimum age without dispensations than the age of sixteen with the right to make exceptions. Another very difficult question was whether when a marriage has taken place below the legal age it should be made void.

Lady Emmott, speaking on behalf of the National Council of Women, said her Council felt that the present law was a blot on the Statute-book and a very bad example for other countries. They had not discussed whether a marriage below the legal age should be void or voidable, but their last conference had rejected a resolution suggesting that the age should be raised to eighteen. The general feeling was that it should be sixteen.

Mrs. Eichola of the Union of Jewish Women, said there was a feeling in the Jewish law fixing any marriage age, but her people followed the laws of the country in which they lived with regard to marriage and divorce, and the Jewish women in Great Britain supported the demand for raising the age.

Miss. Pictou-Turberville, speaking for the Young Women's Christian Association, which has branches in over the world, said the present law was a stumbling-block to their workers in some countries. She expressed alarm at the apparent increase in very early marriages.

Mrs. Neville Rolfe, of the British Social Hygiene Council, spoke very strongly of the effect the law has in India and other Eastern countries. During her recent visit to India the point was invariably raised by the legal authorities with whom she discussed social questions. It caused great difficulties in our colonies and dependencies where the English law runs and where the custom of very early marriages is much more common than here.

The Home Secretary, in reply, said the arguments put before him were almost insuperable, but there were certain difficulties to consider. He was glad to know that in the last twelve years there had been no marriages of girls under thirteen, and only three of girls under fourteen, and thirty marriages under fifteen. There had been marriages of 192 males of females under sixteen. Between fifteen and sixteen was the difficult year. The figures for the years 1924-1926 showed an increase in marriages under the age of sixteen, but there was not a great increase for the twelve-year period, and the number of 1924 was exceptionally small.

The Registrar General had investigated the cases of early marriage, and had found that in nearly all the cases where the girls were under sixteen there had been urgent reason for the marriage. The deputation wanted the revised law to make it clear that there should be no exemption or dispensation, and that would be much the easier course for him. If there were to be dispensations he would have to grant them, and pressure would inevitably be put on him by the member for the constituency. Then the question might be raised in the House of Commons.

"You tell me," he said, "that you have not made up your mind whether marriages under the legal age should be void or voidable. You must make up your minds. You are so much more widely in touch with the body of public opinion on these matters than I am. I cannot leave it to Parliament to decide. The Government must be prepared to take the responsibility for the legislation it introduces." He fully agreed that the marriage age in England should not be lower than in most of the other civilized countries, and be agreed that it would be for the benefit of the women of India. He and his staff were willing that the law should be altered. He suggested the women's organizations should appoint a small, sub-committee to confer with the experts of his department and decide whether they wished marriages before the legal age to be void or voidable.

Until now everything had been calm and bright, but on the second subject dealt with, the appeal that effect should be given to the recommendations of the Departmental Committee on sexual offences against young persons, which was introduced by Lady Astor, the atmosphere changed. Lady Astor was sitting at the back seats and when she rose the Home Secretary remarked with a smile that he was not used to seeing her in a back seat to which she replied that she had become a modest violet in her old age. It was an unfortunately frivolous introduction for the attack Lady Astor made on "the very feeble circular" sent out by the Home Office, which dealt with only seven out of the 27 recommendations made by the Committee. "Are you going to amend the act?" she asked. "Are you going to introduce legislation recommended by the Committee? There is no subject on which you can raise a greater agitation among the people, especially among men, than this. The country is over-riff for legislation, and we are a little tired of Home Office circulars." She had found the appointment of women police, she added, but in spite of their recommendations women police were not being appointed.

Mrs. Agnew, of Bolton, asked that the legislation necessary to give effect to the recommendations should be passed without delay, that the recommendations which did not require legislation should be carried out, and that the Home Office should urge the importance of this on local authorities or issue statutory orders. Was the Home Secretary prepared to do this in regard to the appointment of women police? "Do you not think," she asked, "that the time has come for the appointment of women police to be made compulsory? Our hearts are getting a little sick and we fear that these offences will continue."

Mrs. Dunwood of the Women's Institutes, the largest organised body of women in the country, and Mrs. Garfield, of the Women's Co-operative Guild, "perhaps the largest body of married women in England?" said the mothers felt very keenly on this point.

The Home Secretary said he had considered the report of the Departmental Committee on sexual offences together with the other report dealing with the treatment of child delinquents. It was no good bringing in two bills, but if the Cabinet approved he hoped to bring in a bill dealing with the important questions in both reports, and careful conferences were being held to discuss them in the Home Office. He was not in the slightest degree penitent about the circular. It was not fair of Lady Astor to talk about the "feeble circular." It was a very good circular.

Lady Astor suggested that he should take a vote on that point from those present.

Sir William said the question was what he thought of it and what the magistrate thought of it. He had been thanked by magistrates for bringing certain points in the public report before the public. He had made no committee on women he had done. Lady Astor knew perfectly well that a bill brought into Parliament ordering great towns to appoint women police, whether they wished it or not, would raise a storm in the House and would never go through. The local authorities formed the strongest body of public opinion in the country and they wielded immense influence. It would be totally against the whole system of local self-government in this country to try to force them to do something they did not want. It would also be totally against English tradition for him to issue a mandatory circular to magistrates on the question of imposing severer sentences for child assault. In both these matters the women must work through an educated public opinion.

Neolithic Remains in Myurbhanj; Information of great interest to archaeologists has just been received in Calcutta. The recent devastating floods have compensated the Myurbhanj State to an extensive measure, by leaving high and dry a good deal of historical remains. The discovery of a building site on the bank of the river Khar Kali was brought to light a few days back. Subsequently, some dilapidated temples, as also some stone implements of the Neolithic age, are said to have been exposed by the last floods in the Valley.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILIONERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading 'counsils' of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own Institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

A Busy Week.

The All India Scout Jamboree. Punjab Advocate Mandal. District School Memorial Prize. Discourtesy in the Civil Service.

NOTES.

A Busy Week: The week in Bombay has been a very busy one. The Viceroy arrived last Sunday and set himself to carry out his engagements on a very strenuous programme. The result was that his Excellency had a touch of fever on Tuesday morning which did not abate in the evening, and he was not able to receive His Majesty the King of Afghanistan who landed on Wednesday evening at Apollo Bunder from Karachi. The Viceroy's health has not improved and all his engagements for the week have been cancelled. He is due to leave Bombay on Sunday evening, but if his Excellency's fever does not meanwhile abate, he may not be able to do so. Their Majesties the King and Queen of Afghanistan had an enthusiastic reception on Wednesday, its spontaneous being its most marked feature. The King has been moving freely in the city with very little ceremony. The Municipal Corporation gave him an address at their Hall on Friday. His Majesty made a suitable reply. The Women of Bombay also presented an address to the Queen at their Gymkhana. The Afghan King's visit has been a great success.

The Failure of the Radio: We reprint today an interesting article from the New Republic on the experience in the United States of broadcasting. In the States, there is no government control such as exists in India over the use of the radio wireless, and consequently there is no country in the world where radio sets are so popular as there. The observations of the New Republic, therefore, apply with extra force to India and other countries where strict official control is the rule over the broadcast stations. The New Republic points out that the growth of the radio has none of the delays it has undergone. It has not supplanted or even supplemented newspapers. Instead of curtailing the scale of newspapers, the radio has increased them. As a news agency, it has failed. The listener-is tied down to the broad-caster both in respect of the items of news selected and in the order in which they are delivered. As an educational device, too, the radio has not come up to expectations. The New Republic concludes, the person who has derived most benefit from the radio so far is the advertiser. These observations apply equally to the diminution of which too expectations have failed to materialise.

Settlement of the Kharagpur Dispute: The prolonged struggle between the B.N.Ky. authorities and the workmen has come to a happy termination. The whole trouble arose from a refusal on the part of the railway authorities to recognise the claims of the workmen to have a voice in the matter of retrenchment which the former were anxious to effect. The situation became worse when the Agent of the B.N. Ky. tried to substitute subsistence for full wages during the time of the lock-out, in defiance of the Government of India. We hope the lesson of the struggle will not be lost on the Railway Administration. The labourers have their rights as well as their employers and the latter will do well to recognise this supreme fact, however unpalatable it may be, if they do not want to repeat the unsanctioned. The Government of India has done well in coming to the rescue and setting matters right by their latest communiqué.

The Marwaris and Child Marriage: A meeting of the Marwaris of Calcutta which was held recently to decide the attitude of that community towards the Royal Commission, gave its support to Mr. Bard's Bill, objecting however to the invalidating of marriages under the minimum age. They also proposed that in the case of boys the age limit of sixteen years was not sufficient. The Marwari Chamber of Commerce of Bombay, in its reply to the Bombay Government's letter in regard to these states: "The Board have carefully considered the Bill in detail and have ultimately come to agree whole-heartedly with the spirit of the measure. They recognise that the present is the most opportune moment for enacting legislation for stamping out the social custom of child marriages, which is a wide-spread evil eating into the vitals of the Hindu society. The Board have also paid due attention to the opinions expressed from time to time in the past by such socio-cumunal organisations as the Agarwal Mahasabha, the most representative body of the Agarwals Vaishyas, and the Maheshwari Sabha, which represents the Magahswari Vaishyas—the two castes which cover practically almost the whole population of Vaishyas of Northern India. Of the aforesaid two bodies the former has fixed the minimum marriageable age of a boy at 16 and that of a girl at 16. They have not, however, gone a bit farther in the case of males and fixed 18 years as the minimum marriageable age." The Bombay Marwari Chamber, however, does not think it desirable to go beyond Mr. Sarda's Bill and accept the age limits fixed by him. Further, they frown upon the retention of the proviso, at the initial stages of the reform, by which a Hindu can, by making an affidavit before a First Class Magistrate in his district, get his daughter or ward married even at eleven years of age. "They do not support the proposal to invalidate marriage below the minimum age because of the Bill is noted in the Bill as one which it will not only defeat its own purpose, but give rise to numerous difficulties in connection with inheritances and allied matters. A little reflection will show that in cases where a man's claim of being the legal heir to the properties left to him by his parents is disputed, the effect of this law would be to place the son in the sad predicament of having to prove that his deceased parents had been legally married. Further, the orthodox sections of the community will ignore the law altogether. Not knowing the full implications of the new legislation, rather than tear themselves off from the custom that rules supreme among them, they would be more likely to honour the law more in its breach than in its observance! They, therefore, advocate that the parent or guardian who celebrates the marriage of his ward or daughter in the absence of the minimum age prescribed in the Bill, should be penalised for his first guilt by a fine of Rs. 1,000 and for subsequent disregard of the law, by a months' imprisonment together with the fine. It is true that by the qualifying clauses with which they have, hedged in the reform, the Marwaris have almost frustrated the purpose of the Bill, but it is a sign of the times that even an orthodox and conservative community like the Marwaris realise that the reform is a necessary one and are eager to give their support to the introduction of a bill like that of Mr. Sarda. The Marwaris are at one with the reformers so far as they agree that the marriage-age should be raised.

The All-India Scout Jamboree:—The march past of the scouts on the Mahalakshmi race course took place on the 11th of the month. His Excellency the Viceroy took the salute as troop after troop passed with their banners. The scouts had assembled from every province and every Indian state and the total number was almost 12,000. Sir Chulialal Mehta, in thanking His Excellency for his presence, observed that the gathering was a thoroughly representative one and that in their 'camp life the boys imbibed the principles of service and democracy. His Excellency addressed the 'scouts in the same strain.

Punjab Aochut Udhar Mandal:—We publish elsewhere copious extracts from the report of the above Mandal which has made the removal of untouchability its mission in life. It will not be an exaggeration to say that as the result of the Mandal's work the position of these much despised people is quite different to what it was before. The propaganda carried on by the Mandal among the higher castes has brought home to them the necessity of looking upon the untouchables as their brethren and, according them humane treatment. Though much has been done in this direction and untouchability is fast disappearing in the Punjab, much remains to be done to raise the social status of these classes by education and by inculcating the principles of sanitation and hygiene.

Dinkar S одна Memorial Prize.—The John Hone Secretaries, Young Theists' Union, Pratuk Samaj announce, that essays are invited from young men and women not exceeding 25 years of age, on "Religion and National Life." The essays are to be written in English, and should be not less than 500 lines, written on one side of foolscap paper. They should reach the secretaries not later than 31st January, 1938. Competitors are requested to designate their essays with a motto or a non-de plume instead of their names, and to send their names and address separately to them. A prize of Rs. 25 will be given to the writer of the best essay. The following have kindly consented to act as judges: (1) V. V. V. N. Nair, V. N. Chandavarkar, Bar-at-law, (2) Dr. G. Y. Chitnis.

Untouchability in the Coohla States:—We congratulate the Eshuva community in the Coohla State on their wise and bold step in embarking within their folds the Pulayas whom they hitherto regarded as untouchables and unjustifiable. It is a necessary step which had to be taken to remove the disabilities of the Pulayas whom the Eshuvas are busy mingling in Pulaya society; and though they had not gone so far as to allow intermarriages between the two communities they are taking the right step in the partaking of the wedding feasts. They have thus strengthened their claim and relieved themselves from the attacks of certain orthodox Brahmins who had been accusing them of their action in the removing of the curse of an untouchability by the ridiculous argument, "let the Eshuvas first remove the disabilities of the Pulayas whom they regard as untouchables and unapproachable and then put forward their claim." Now that the Eshuvas have cleared one stumbling block in the way of their progress, we hope, that these orthodox Brahmins would no longer persist in treating them as untouchables and unapproachable by indulging in false logic, but appreciate their action and take their example and gladly welcome them in their midst as their own brethren belonging to the same religion namely, Hinduism.

The Hindu Annual Supplement: The Hindu Annual Supplement of this year maintains the same high standard of literary and artistic excellence which had characterised those that have preceded it. It affords valuable and interesting study to the politician, to the scientist, and to the artist alike, having among its contributions valuable articles on the leading topics of the day from the pen of such famous English as well as Indian writers as the Rt. Hon. J. C. Weigwood, Prof. Geddes, Mr. George Linsbury, Prof. S. Hearnshaw, Mr. Spencer, Prof. S. Radakrishnan, Dr. Subhadra Bose, Dr. H. Parameswaran and Harindrath Chattopadhyaya, all of whom are recognised authorities on their respective subjects. On the art side it contains valuable colour plates by such renowned artists as the late Raja Ravi Varma and Raja Raja Varma, and they are fairly representative of Indian Art. The photograph section has displayed both aesthetic value and technical perfection. The printing and get up of the Annual is simply attractive. In short it is a production worthy studying and worth preserving in all libraries and coming as it does at an opportune moment it is a fitting Christmas gift to a friend or a relation.
MARRIAGE LEGISLATION.

That there is a widespread feeling in the country in favor of legislation to prevent child marriages, is shown by the fact that three Bills have been drafted by non-official members with that object. One of these is by Mr. Har Bilas Sarma, member of the Legislative Assembly. This Bill, which has been referred to a Select Committee, proposes to declare void all marriages among Hindus of girls under 13 years of age and of boys under 16. Mr. Jalamdas Dalalram has prepared a Bill to be introduced in the Bombay Legislative Council next session. He proposes to make it punishable with imprisonment or a fine or both in any way to take part in or consent to the marriage of girls below 13 and boys below 16 years. This Bill also is applicable only to Hindus and, of course, it will be in force only in the Bombay Presidency. Dr. Mathulakshmi Reddy has drafted a Bill for introductio in the Madras Legislative Council on similar lines except that the age limit for girls in her Bill is 14 and for boys 18. This Bill also is for Hindus only and its jurisdiction will not extend beyond the limits of the Madras Presidency. We have not heard that similar legislation is in contemplation in any other province of India. But it is not unlikely that members of the other Provincial Councils, may be awaiting the result of the attempts that are being made in the Assembly and in Madras and Bombay.

If Mr. Sarma's Bill passes into law there will be no need for any other legislation in any of the Provinces. Marriages will cease to be performed of girls under 12 and of boys under 16, because no parent would run the risk of the marriage of his daughter being declared invalid. The risk in the case of a boy under the prescribed age, will not be so great because he can marry another girl without difficulty but for some time at least a girl whose marriage has been declared void will not find it easy to get any one else to marry her. Mr. Sarma, moreover, has left a big loophole which is likely seriously to complicate matters. He has made it easy for a parent to get his daughter married while she is still under 12, by obtaining a sort of license from a Magistrate who on application is obliged to grant it. The effect of this clause is practically to make 12 the actual age-limit for the marriage of girls under Mr. Sarma's Bill. Mr. Dalalram's Bill fixes it at 13 and Dr. Mathulakshmi at 14. We have pointed out in previous articles that making marriages void is a very serious matter, as the consequences may extend to unborn generations. We also think that provincial legislation on marriage is beset with difficulties. For instance, if both the Bombay and Madras Bills should become law, it will be legal in North Canara and Bijapur to marry girls at the age of thirteen, while in the neighboring districts of South Canara and Bailury it will be punishable with imprisonment, as the age-limit in the Madras Bill is 14 years.

Presumably, the parents of a Madras Hindu girl under 14 years of age who are in a hurry to get her married, have only to travel to Sholapur to get her married without fear of incurring the penalties prescribed in Dr. Mathulakshmi's Bill.

Another point worthy of consideration is the desire ability of extending legislation to all communities. The evil consequences of child marriages are not contingent on the religion of the parties. They are, no less detrimental to the well-being of Musalmans and Christians than to that of Hindu. It is plain from the census statistics that child marriages prevail among all Indian communities, and that the difference between them is only as to the extent of their prevalence. It is demoralizing to punish a Hindu for an act which is freely permitted to Muslims and Christians. There is, so far as we know, no precedent for such legislation, except perhaps the law relating to bigamy which makes it a crime for a Christian to marry more than one wife, while a Hindu and a Musalman may marry two or even three wives at a time. This, however, is not the outcome of a law passed by the Legislature but of the personal law of the different communities. It is most undesirable to extend the scope of such personal laws. To do so, is to transfer the growth of Indian nationalism for which common codes of law are most important accessories. If we may make a suggestion, it would be that the Government of India should appoint a committee to investigate the question and to draft a Bill to prevent child marriages.

A DIVORCE ACT FOR HINDUS.

(BY R. S. P.)

Dr. Gour, in his letter to the Times of India of the 10th inst, had referred me to some Acts bearing on Divorce as applied to certain sects and classes among Hindus, pleading, at the same time, that he could not with one stroke amend the existing law of Divorce and, at the same time, amend the Hindu Law of Marriage by providing against their immobility in certain cases... In this respect, while fully appreciating the significance of his remarks, I should like to add that it was not my intention that Dr. Gour should embark on any impossible task. What I wished to know was, first, whether his proposed Bill would include the case of Hindus, as a whole, and, if it will not, secondly, whether he would not consider the advisability of introducing a similar Bill to serve the Hindus.

Dr. Gour further observed that as Bills of greater urgency and wider utility, such as the Age of Consent Bill, the Civil Marriage Bill, etc., were already occupying his time, he must “leave the task of Hindu Marriage reform meanwhile to others” assuring, however, that he would “take up the subject of Hindu Divorce as soon as his programme gets less congested”. But as far as the reform of Hindu Marriage Law is concerned, there can be hardly any prospect of success if Dr. Gour himself does not take it up in his own skifflet hands. Since, however, Dr. Gour opposes the sort of legislation will not be or is not considered so very urgent as the other pieces of legislation he has alluded to as being on the anvil, it is somewhat incumbent upon me to go into the nature of the urgency of this measure.

Towards this end, I would invite Dr. Gour’s attention to the two articles appearing in the Indian Social Reformer of 18th June. The first one is from one Mr. L. G. Dasmukh (Maharatta side), in which he indicates that the necessity for introducing divorce law among the Hindus, arose so long ago as 1877 or 1888, and complains that even though he had, in his capacity as an Assistant Collector and Magistrate, made the proposal to the Government in his official report, the matter was neglected or perfunctorily shelved. Doubtlessly, it is not that cases such as those mentioned by Mr. Dasmukh are so rare as not to have come to the knowledge of Dr. Gour himself in the course of his wide and varied experience of the actual working of the Hindu social system. To make mention of any specific or general instances would be superfluous.

Again, the second article in the same issue of the Indian Social Reformer is from one Mr. Manoharilal Zatibi (North India). It deals with the same subject from a different aspect, and, as it is a ground too familiar to Dr. Gour, I refrain from any comment. But I cannot help remarking, and Dr. Gour will agree,—the authorities quoted by Mr. Zatibi have remained a dead letter, the customs and manners that have received the status of a God-given law rule the masses, and Section 494 of the Indian Penal Code, which is again referred to later on, comes in the way of calling to one’s aid the various authorities quoted by Mr. Zatibi in any peculiar case that might be brought under one or other of the exceptional circumstances that are amply provided for, which, I trust, is sufficient ground for presuming the urgent necessity of a definite divorce law for the Hindus!

In this connection, I might as well add that the Editor of the Indian Social Reformer, has himself taken notice of the two contributions under the heading “A Plea for Divorce Law”, to which I do not think I can add anything. It is necessary for me, however, to deal with one or two points that call for special notice.

In the first place, Dr. Gour is, I am aware, aware of a recent case of a Hindu-Parsi (Nagin Trivedi-Tehmina) marriage. The details of this affair are still green in the minds of the public. By my reference to this, it should not be understood that I am opposed to inter-community marriages. What I desire to point out in this: As everybody knows, Nagin already had a Hindu wife by lawful marriage, by name Nirmala who, after his second marriage with the Parsi Tehmina, was averse to live with him. As a matter of fact, Nagin by various reasons is reported to have permitted Nirmala to marry again, if she wished. But will she be safe in doing so? So far as Nagin’s own position is concerned, he is safe, but Nirmala’s course is; shrouded in a dark future. Nagin’s permission is as good as no permission. Section 494 of the Indian Penal Code is a stumbling block in Nirmala’s way, even though, according to the text of Pravaprati mentioned by Mr. Zatibi, Nirmala “is fit to be taken as a wife by any man upon a second ceremony of marriage,” she being, in the peculiar circumstances of the case, in the position of one abandoned by her husband. It is here I wish to affirm that, in spite of the permission accorded by the ancient text writers, the section of the Penal Code, alluded to above, comes in the way of any rational effect being given to it, whatever the merits of the case for the strict interpretation of the ancient texts, which clearly brings out the necessity for the introduction of a divorce law among the Hindus, specially from the point of view of the female section of it, which is totally handicapped. And, it goes without saying that the state of affairs as regards Nirmala would undoubtedly have wrought quite a different aspect if there were a divorce law among the Hindus. In this connection, I think it is not too much to say that such or similar instances can be multiplied, more particularly, such as those referred to by Marten C. J., when he remarks “I cannot help feeling that it is the parents on each side that are in some way to blame” (p. 342, Bai Jiviti v. Narsing Jiviti, Bom. L. J. 393) . Of course, there are many cases also of cruelty, infidelity, or adultery, negligence, misconduct; cases where the marriage has been brought about by force, fraud, coercion, undue influence, misrepresentation; and, cases of idiocy, lunacy, impotence, wrong or ill choice. At the time of marriage, in which the only escape out of the impasse is death, as divorce is not recognised by the Hindu law as it is administered now, and this fact again emphasises the urgent necessity for a divorce law among the Hindus. All that is involved is a fundamental piece of natural justice which requires that every ill must have a remedy, but since there are many cases for which there is no remedy so far as the existing Hindu law goes, the necessity for the launching of the Hindu divorce law arises. I do not mean to suggest that the various privileges that are given to the Hindus under their law as at present administered, should be done away with or abrogated for the sake of this piece of sanitary legislation, but I urge that, while retaining those rights, the existing law must be so modified or relaxed as to remove certain kinds of drawbacks and hardships which at present characterise it, the absence of divorce law, being an instance in point.

When I say this I do not mean to affirm that a Bill like the one that is urged for, will have a smooth sailing; but the only way to gather public opinion is by a definite step or attempt to bring a Bill. And the person most fitted to do this piece of service to the Hindu Society is no other than the eminent Doctor with his long standing experience, legal learning and acumen, and the skill of draftsmanship behind him.

I hope I have made myself sufficiently clear as to the peremptory necessity for the creation of divorce law among the Hindus. I have also endeavoured to emphasise the necessity of Dr. Gour’s undertaking the responsibility upon his own shoulders, and, having regard to the importance of the legislation, would not like to see that such a matter is in less skillful hands than the eminent Doctor himself who, it is agreed, on all hands, is the one person so eminently suited to the task. The earlier, therefore, he takes it up, the better it would be in the interests of the sufferers!

CASTE IN MUNICIPAL SCHOOLS.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sirs,

One who reads your note on the discrimination recently discovered to be made in some of Bombay's municipal schools against 'untouchable' boys in regard to seating and drinking arrangements, and who made no further inquiry about the nature of the practice actually obtaining in the schools so far, might, I am afraid, carry the impression that somehow the segregation of the 'untouchable' lad has a justification in hygienic considerations. Now it is the dodges of some straddlers and lip-reformers among us to maintain that there is such a justification for the practice. In fact, the controversy on the subject has been one more means of bringing to light a class of public men of 'Bombay the Beautiful' who may be described as 'reformers in principle, obscurantists in every detail.' They love to befog the question at issue by bringing in every other that may be handy, which in this case happens to be sanitation. With a custom like untouchability bred in our bones, which our intellects have just begun to discard, but which somehow we lack sufficient courage or moral force practically to overthrow, we are naturally prone to take any drug that comes our way, whereby our consciences may be stillied and our weak hearts suffused with the glow of self-complacency.

Now let us face the question squarely like men, and not like ostriches and pettigoggers. Whatever the present practice in regard to the use of drinking vessels and the mode of drinking therein, and whether it be sanitary or insanitary,—it is clear that the majority of the boys in the schools who are of 'Touch-me-not' origin have been practising the same in common. But when it is proposed that the minority who are of Depressed-class origin and who have so far been made to sit apart and drink apart should be admitted to fellowship with the majority in drinking as well as sitting, objection is raised that it would be insanitary. Now, if it be insanitary, it has been so all along, and the joining in it of the Depressed class boys as such does not make it any more so. Clearly, therefore, the sanitation that is in danger only when the D. C. boys are proposed to be admitted to fellowship in a practice which has all along been there without anybody objecting,—such sanitation must be of that 'indus spiritualis' or 'esoterica astralis' kind before which a mere man of reason must stand in pitiful awe.

Well, they talk of 'forcing social reform' on unwilling boys and their parents of the Touch-me-not classes. Evidently they make no bones of forcing sub-humannity on women and fellow-taxpayers. It must be clearly understood that nobody forces Touch-me-not boys to drink out of common vessels. Those who object could make their own arrangements for drinking or even go without their drink. Boys in Compulsory-Education Wards whose guardians object to their sons sitting with D. C. boys could start their own schools, or better remove to Texas and Travancore. Not for this the 'materialist' atmosphere of Bombay!

Before closing, I might as well express to you my doubt whether there is such a thing as the 'Hindu' way of drinking water, which you mention. There may be a 'South Indian Brahmin' or a 'North Indian Pahadi' way of drinking water—as there is a Gujarati Phrasical way, the Madras Theosophical way of swallowing insipid self-complacency potions—but a 'Hindu' way in such things seems to me to be a doubtful quantity.

Karwar,

Your's etc.,

S. D. Nadkarni.

[Mr. Nadkarni, we think, quite needlessly lashes himself into a rage over an obviously innocent suggestion. If an insanitary practice was followed in the past, it is no reason why a more sanitary practice should not be adopted now. Now that the question of drinking cups has been brought up, the manner of using them may as well be improved.—Ed., I. S. R.]

Women's Conference at Mangalore: The South Kanara Women's Educational Conference met here at the Government Girls' Training School on 3rd instant at 3 p.m. A large number of ladies were present. Mrs. Manorama Bai proposed Mr. Schaefer to be the President of the Conference and this was duly seconded by Mrs. Shambavi and the motion was carried with acclamation. The Conference opened with a prayer. The Conference passed the following resolutions:—(1) That in the opinion of the Conference, primary education be made free and compulsory for all boys and girls; (2) that, in the opinion of this Conference, specially qualified teachers be employed to teach the first four classes; (3) this Conference deeply deplores the compleximg of early marriages on education and supports Har Bisar Sarda's Bill and urges the Select Committee to raise the marriageable ages to 16 and 21 for boys and girls respectively; (4) that in the opinion of the Conference, vernaculars be given more importance than at present in all schools and colleges; and one of the classical languages be made compulsory; and (5) that in the opinion of this Conference, the following subjects be added as options, viz., advanced English, advanced customs science, journalism and social science.

DELI WOMEN'S CONFERENCE.

The Hindustan Times writes—The Second session of the Delhi Women's Conference on Educational Reforms was held on Dec. 5th in the Royal Cinema hall at 12 a.m. The hall was so crowded that hundreds of women had to go back because of want of space. Muslim ladies in burda and Hindu ladies in most of their saris and jewellry sat aside by side to devise ways and means for the betterment of their case. Prominent amongst those present were—Mrs. Nebu, Mrs. Raza Ali, Begum Mohammed Ali, Mrs. Diwan Chand, Gomti Devi, Mrs. D. K. Sen, Mrs. Rahim, Mrs. Parichha, Mrs. Raghubir Singh, Mrs. Butani Singh, Mrs. Bedi, Mrs. Indra, Mrs. Bhoomfield, Mrs. Prasun, Mrs. Chatterjee, Miss Talabjee, Mrs. Ram Dev, Mrs. Razdan, Miss Young and Begum Baland Jang. Mrs. S. R. Das on her arrival was accorded a hearty reception. Mrs. Nebu in requesting her to deliver her opening address said, "I feel it a very pleasant duty to introduce Mrs. S. R. Das to you. Ever since her arrival in Delhi she has been taking a keen part in the work of reform among women," Mrs. Das then said in the course of her address. — 'You remember the last conference we had here last year, and it is gratifying to find that the interest it had created has had a wonderful effect. Its results are to be found in the meetings which have been held in all parts of Delhi this year and in the resolutions which have been passed. I am, therefore, encouraged to hope that the league formed to promote the aims and objects of the All-India Conference will be able to work with sustained energy for the welfare of the women of Delhi and the education of their children. It is a truism, not often recognised by either men or women, that the progress of a nation depends largely on the part played by its women; and it is unfortunate that with the exception of a very few of us women have not taken our legitimate share in ameliorating our social and educational condition. It was time that Indian women realised that education is essential for their mental, moral and physical development. Also, if we want to take our place in our national growth, we must make ourselves fit to train our children into good citizens, for in their hands lies the future welfare of India. You will have a number of resolutions before you this afternoon. They include subjects like primary education, the age of consent, the marriageable age for girls, etc. I hope that the resolutions passed in this hall will inspire us in a sense of real unity which will enable us to appreciate better the needs of our less fortunate sisters and to help them to the best of our ability."

After the opening speech of Mrs. S. R. Das, Mrs. Nehru was formally proposed to the chair. Miss Rahiyya Tajiya sang a beautiful song purporting that Hindus, Muslims, Christians and others were all children of one God.

The following resolutions were then unanimously passed:

1. That primary education for boys and girls be made compulsory and free throughout India, and especially the Municipality of Delhi is urged to take immediate steps to bring about this most important reform.

2. That the sex bar be removed wherever it may yet exist, making women eligible for all public bodies on the same conditions as men, especially urging the local bodies of the province of Delhi to remove it.

3. That Sir Harl Singh Gour’s Age of Consent Bill be supported raising the age of consent to 16 years.

4. That the marriageable age of girls be raised to 16 by law.

5. That the physical culture under trained experts be made compulsory in all girls’ schools and colleges and until the service of such experts be secured, organised games be encouraged rather than pure physical drill.

6. That all Municipalities be asked to open centres for the teaching of domestic science and fine arts for married women.

7. That Government be asked to appoint a woman organiser of industries in Delhi as they have done in the Punjab and under her a school of handicrafts for women be established to encourage home industries.

8. That moral instruction be made compulsory in all schools and the practice of saying prayers be encouraged.

9. That provisions should be made for the teaching of Bengali either in existing schools where necessary or that a school for the education of Bengali girls be established.

10. That domestic science comprising cooking, sewing, laundry, music, home decorating, drawing, and embroidery be made compulsory for girls in all secondary schools.

11. That civic and social service be recognised as subjects by educational authorities in all schools.

12. That agricultural lectures and demonstrations be given in villages by experts appointed by the educational authorities.

13. That Government be asked to nominate a lady member on the Municipal Board to represent the requirements and grievances of the women of Delhi.

14. That the Delhi Municipality be asked to improve the Purdah Garden of Delhi and pays its management under a women’s committee.

15. That the study of comparative religions be introduced in all universities as an optional subject.

Mrs. Neenu in her concluding remarks urged women to take greater interest in their reform and to widen the sphere of social interests. “Love,” said she, “is a mighty weapon to win our rights and let us conquer the battle by love.” She further exhorted the audience to love the country and always be prepared to sacrifice their all for the motherland. She said it was the duty of every daughter of India to devote her talents and power for the improvement of their greater house, i.e., their country. She laid great stress on the need of educating every son and every daughter of the land, because education was the most precious ornament. Proper education alone could awake the conscience and brain of an individual and the enlightenment of conscience enabled the individual to make the best of use of his or her energies. “Remember,” said she, “if we fail in our duty at the present juncture we will leave nothing but evil plight for our future generation. It is time enough that we should take our proper share in the emancipation of our motherland, and once again crown her with the glory that she enjoyed in ancient times.”

The Conference concluded with the usual vote of thanks to the President amid loud cheers.

CAN RADIO BE USEFUL?

We print the following article from the New Republic, New York—

A few years ago, great promises were being made as to the social usefulness of radio broadcasting. We were told that it would supplement, perhaps even supplant the newspaper; that our school system would be revolutionised through its use; that new "universities of the air" would give a fresh meaning to adult education. None of these expectations has been fulfilled. Journalism has neither been supplanted nor, in any strict sense, supplemented. Instead of curtailing the sale of newspapers, the radio has increased them. Only a few spectacular events, such as Lindbergh’s homecoming, or a championship fight, have been found suitable for aerial reporting, and the millions who listen to stories of these happenings through the loud-speaker seem doubly eager to have the auditory impression confirmed by cold type. Market quotations are read daily at stated hours, and are said to be useful to farmers, and while trans-Atlantic flights are in progress; the radio renders a service by its half-hourly reports that "there is no news;" conceivably, it might speed up the dissemination of bulletins in another case-like that in 1893, when President Harding lay dying in San Francisco. But its weakness as a news agency are now apparent. One cannot select the items of special interest to himself, as he can with the newspaper; one must take it all, in the order the broadcaster selects; and at the time he selects. Nothing can be clipped and filed for future reference; if you do not catch its significance at the moment it is uttered, it is lost. The reportorial aspect of radio also suffers because it has to be impromptu. Mr. Graham MacNamee and his correspondents work valiantly and with great skill, when they report a football game or a Lindbergh reception; but their best work is inferior to the story written by any good reporter; the best part of the radio description is not what is said into the microphone but the realistic noises which also get in—the roar of the crowd, the clang of the bell and the referee's whistle, unless radio is altered radically by inventions not now on the horizon, journalism seems to have nothing to fear from its competition.

As an educational device, it is also a disappointment. Some colleges are still giving courses over the air, and report a large sale of printed syllabi to accompany them; but there is no way of checking up to see whether any substantial addition has been made to the knowledge of the "students." Americans are notorious for taking first steps toward enlightenment; they are always buying five-foot shelves, and stories of philosophy and Elbert Hubbard scrap-books. In the expectation that they will thus acquire culture in five minutes a day, but it is well-known that the percentage of achievement as a result of these efforts is negligible. There is no reason to believe that it is otherwise with the radio. To the restlessness of the race, which makes it difficult for most of us to sit and be lectured except for very brief periods, there is added the special restlessness of the radio listener, there is something about the artificiality of music and speech from unseen sources which urges the hearer to "tune in and get something else." No range of conscience accompany this set, such as would be felt if one similarly got up and walked out of church. The radio authorities realize that this is so, and try to keep all their serious talks down to a brevity which is really absurd, in relation to some of the subjects; fifteen minutes on the air is regarded as equal to two hours in the class room. It may be true that "no souls are saved after the first fifteen minutes"; it is also true that the truth about the Einstein theory, or population problems, or the Cro-Magnon, is hardly to be learned in a net which is spread for so brief a span of time. Education by radio, except in the one field of "music appreciation," is as yet of negligible importance, and seems likely to remain so.

This appears to be the case even as regards popular lectures for adults. A year or two ago, there seemed some reason to believe that the business of going about the country addressing women's clubs, which has long been such a gold mine for visiting English novelists, might be impaired through the competition of the radio; but the prophecy has proved false. Lecture bureaus report that never was there a bigger season than the present. A glut on for punishment; the patient public seems unlimited in its capacity to sit and listen, if it can only see as well as hear its mentor. And the more it sees and hears, the more it wants. The same thing is true of the more serious and genuine phases of adult education. It is authoritatively reported that they go on at a constantly accelerated pace, which the radio does not help and is powerless to hinder.

In the main broadcasting in America is an advertising device. Other countries—Great Britain, for example—keep it under government controls and an official bureau is charged with the responsibility for giving the people just-as-good material and as much of it as they will tolerate; but in the United States, there are only two possible sources of revenue, the sale of receiving sets and the sale of other goods which can be popularized by having them described, or perhaps merely mentioned, over the air. Not all stations are making a profit on their operations through the fees received from advertisers; and nearly all of them seek at least to diminish their deficit by this means. The formula is like that of the big-circulation magazines—a streak of reading matter, and then a stream three times wider, of advertising. This takes the form of concerts broadcast through the courtesy of some manufacturer of soap or pickles or batteries; or the persistent announcer comes on the air between the movements of the symphony to urge upon you the merits of Glantz's bakery or the Helen's Beauty Parlor Special Facial. How much of this sort of street-begging-in-the-home the listeners will stand for; is still a question which awaits an answer.

An important movement in recent months corresponds to the development in journalism, chain ownership of newspapers. Radio stations throughout the country are now being leased or purchased, or their time bought, and linked up into systems with their material broadcast from a central source. The cost is paid by the owner of the system, and charged to advertising. One such chain of many stations is owned by a phonograph company and others by a vaudeville theatre organization and a motion picture producer. The "circulation" reached by these chains daily or nightly, presumably mounts into many millions. It is not unlikely that this process will force out of business, or their home-talent programmes and its advertising of home-town department-store bargains, will have been forced out of business. Naturally, the programmes offered by the great national chains are very much better. They can afford to employ world-famous musicians to sing or play to the microphone while the local studio is still dependent, for the most part, on the ambitious amateur. If both programmes are on the air simultaneously, the listeners will probably take the well-known stars, ergo, advertising through the local station will no longer be profitable; ergo, the source of revenue will dwindle.

But the chain itself is confronted by the same deadly problem in the long run. Can it keep people listening, not occasionally, but regularly? For if it cannot, the economic organization of broadcasting will break down. Every new owner of a receiving set listens faithfully for a time, to no matter what trash enthralled by the mechanical marvel; but in far too many homes there is today a silent set, resurrected only when something comes along like a Dempsey-Tunney fight. As evidence of this, there is the great demand for new batteries and other equipment during the last few days before such an event. The broadcaster has tried to meet his difficulty with music alone. He has discovered that the public is not exclusively, or even chiefly, jazz-crazy, but welcomes a great deal of good music and even a small amount of very good music. But it is a question whether there is not a surfeit point in this direction, which may be reached long before the broadcaster is ready to have the listener turn off his set. Even the most hardened concert-goer hardly wants to attend a recital every evening, to say nothing of three or four; music critics for the press groan under the burden of hearing perhaps half as much as the radio listener is asked to absorb.

The New Republic has often commented on the timidity of broadcasting in the realm of intellectual and social ideas. That timidity not only continues, but is apparently growing worse as the audiences get larger. With very few exceptions, station managers are deathly afraid of putting on the air novel views of any sort, and course, by big corporations and, particularly, by public listener turn off his set. Even the most hardened social ideas. That timidity not only continues, but is even evening to say nothing of three or four; music critics for the press groan under the burden of hearing perhaps W~dity apparently most of all, those which run counter to the prevailing fact that station managers are usually drawn from the and the editorial technique which presents ideas to the less monopolized by after-dinner speeches from broadcast managers, there is hardly a station in the country which as listener's interest, it is undoubtedly true that the words those present in person) and cranks. These broadcasters are seeking to wake their new and interesting way. As a newspaper whose circu

PUNJAB ACHHUT UDHAR MANDAL.

FIELD OF WORK.
The Punjab Achhut Udhar Mandal as separate department of the Servant of the People Society for work among the Depressed Classes has now been in existence for over a year and half.

In the beginning the Punjab Achhut Udhar Mandal started work only with three centres in Kangra, Gurdaspur and Ambala districts respectively. At present it has got active centres of work, in addition to the above-mentioned districts, in Amritsar, Lahore, Jullundur and Ferozepur where the centre has only recently been opened. This area covers practically the whole of the central Punjab. Among the Depressed Classes which number about three millions in the Punjab, the Mandal activities are mostly confined to the Chuhras, a community numbering a few lakhs and considered socially by the people at the lowest rung in the hierarchy of the Depressed Classes in the Province.

PROPAGANDA WORK.
The Mandal from the very start has attached greatest importance to dissemination of ideas regarding the depressed class uplift movement or what is commonly called propaganda work.

Big conferences of the Depressed Classes of a demonstrative character have been an important feature of the Mandal's propaganda work. Thousands of the so-called untouchables have participated in them on absolute terms of equality with the caste Hindus. Thirty four caste Panchayats of Depressed Classes, of Chamars, Durneas, Ghals and of Chuhras, have been organised by the Mandal in various parts of the province. Education, social reform, thrift, adoption of Hindu Samskaras and customs, the communal life, such have been some of the topics which have formed the subjects of discussion in these Panchayats. Considering the fact that social pressure is still a driving force in the communal life of the lower castes, these panchayats have been greatly helpful in accelerating the progress of reform movement among the Depressed Classes.

The Mandal has prepared a few instructive sets of magic lantern slides of social, educational and religious interest. The workers of the Mandal have delivered about sixty lantern lectures on various occasions.

The Mandal has distributed over thirty thousand pamphlets and leaflets in different parts of the province with a view to popularise the Depressed Class movement among the Hindu masses.

CONSTRUCTIVE WORK.
But no work can flourish on propaganda alone. As a necessity, therefore, it must be followed by some sort of constructive activity. The constructive work of the Mandal has been mainly confined to the Depressed Classes. Some of the prominent features of its work have been these:

HINDUISING WORK.
The Mandal aims at raising the social status of the Depressed Classes frankly with the idea of making them an integral part of the Hindu society. Its efforts in this direction have been successful beyond expectations. The Mandal is at present facing the face with regular mass movement among the Chuhras for embracing Hinduism. They refuse to be called Hindus only by name but want to be fully identified with their social life by adopting Hindu Samskaras and usages in their daily life. Even the Christian Chuhras who have been converts to Christianity for the past two or three decades have in practice expressed their willingness to return to the fold of Hindu religion.
EAST AFRICAN FEDERATION.

The step-motherly attitude of the British Government towards Indians whether in India or in the colonies is becoming more and more apparent. The systematic policy of keeping down Indians and their aspirations, ignoring their rights and sacrificing their interests to promote those of the Whites, has been relentlessly and ruthlessly pursued by the Tory Government. The worst fears of the deputation which waited on the Viceroy in September last to secure adequate Indian representation on the Federation Commission have proved true. The Hilton Young Commission besides being a purely White Commission is to have Col. C. W. G. Walker, the quondam secretary of the East African Governors' Conference which completely ignored the interests of Indians, as its local secretary during its tour through East and Central Africa. In the absence of any Indian representative on it, it is extremely doubtful whether the deputation consisting of Kunwar Mahur-raj Singh and Mr. Eewbank L. C. S. sent to assist the Indians to prepare their case for the forthcoming Commission will be of any material help. The British Government, in their anxiety to placate the White's insistent demand in Kenya for 'power and control', have allowed the Indians' case to go by default. They have surrendered the principle embodied in the White Paper of 1923, for the terms of reference of the Commission gives scope to consider "any necessary changes in the Local Legislative Councils so as to associate more closely in the responsibilities of Trusteeship of Government, the Immigrant Communities domiciled in the country."

The acceptance by the Government of the document of 1923 was in itself a gross blunder, as it restricted the rights of Indians in respect of representation in the Councils, bodies, provision of facilities for education, and the development of their trade and Industries. The Whites in recent years succeeded in depriving the Indians of what little was left and rendering the document a dead letter. Thanks to the Whites and to the connivance of the British Government, further disabilities such as the segregation in Mombasa Township, the introduction of colour bar in Government service and the restriction on the ownership and sale of land have been imposed upon the Indian Community.

Knowing too well the hostile attitude of the White settlers towards Indian immigrants it is surprising that the British Government should talk of sharing their trusteeship with them. This is a distinct move on the part of the White settlers to gradually acquire more power and eventually establish their supremacy over the Indians. There is every reason to believe that the white community is likely to get a majority in the Kenya Legislative Council. Once this is achieved then it is easy to sustain the present policy of prohibiting Indian Immigration into Kenya. If the British Government is beguiled into sharing their trusteeship with these settlers, it will be virtually handing over the Government to them and leaving the "natives" to their tender mercies. From the point of view of two of the important communities such a step would be disastrous. When Indian interests are to such a great extent involved, it is impossible to see how in fairness they could ignore the Indian representation on the commission. In any discussion of political matters in Kenya it should be recognised that Indian settlers are in the same position as European settlers. They have permanent interests in the country and they constitute the permanent part of the population and as such it should be laid down that they should have equal rights with the Europeans. Coming to the natives, it is extremely doubtful whether the primary consideration of the British Government and if they as the children of the soil are not to go to the wall, the benign Government should set its face definitely against granting any further political power to white settlers and no advance towards self-government should be encouraged until the "natives" are able to hold their own against the other communities. It is encouraging to note that there are Englishmen of cultured and enlightened views who feel sympathy for the Indian population and are anxious to see justice done to them. The motive underlying the change in the constitution of mandated territories given with transparent sincerity by Dr. Norman Leys and appears in the Tanganyika Opinion.

He says:—"Many people in this country (England) know what every one in East Africa knows, that these changes, the grant of a majority on the Legislature to the representatives of the foreigners in Kenya, the putting of Indians in a position of inferiority in municipal affairs, the conception while Asians and Africans are not allowed arms, that all these acts of our present reactionary government are the result of the fear. They are desperately afraid, these Europeans in Kenya, who think they have the right to dominate their coloured neighbours, of what a reforming government in Britain would do in East Africa."

Now it remains for the Indian and "native" communities to present a united front and oppose tooth and nail the move towards establishing the supremacy of the Whites in the government of the country and in other mandated territories. Since writing the above, Reuters sends the following message from Johannesburg:—"Speaking at a banquet General Hertzog uttered a warning against any attempts from across to interfere in the native affairs of South Africa, and declared that if interference did not cease, it might cost the Empire one of the greater parts of what was to day included (it in South Africa)." Although General Hertzog speaks only for South Africa, his views will find an echo in the heart of every white man in East Africa also, and the day is not far distant when the White settlers in the East and South Africa will join together in demanding complete control over the native population, the alternative being cutting themselves off from the British Empire.
BAST AFRICAN ROYAL COMMISSION.

The following communiqué has been published:—In a recent Parliamentary paper it was announced that His Majesty's Government authorised the Secretary of State for the Colonies to send a Commission to Africa to investigate the possibility of securing more effective co-operation between the Governments of Eastern and Central African Dependencies and make recommendations on this and cognate matters. The Secretary of State has now constituted the Commission as follows:—

The Right Hon. Sir Hilton Young, Chairman, Sir Reginald Mant, Sir George Schuster and Mr. J. H. Oldham, Members, and Mr. A. F. D'Alwa, Secretary. The Commission will leave England on the 22nd December and will travel via the Nile to Uganda and thence to Kenya, Tanganyika, Zanzibar, Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia visiting the chief centres and hearing the views of the representatives of the different sections of the community. The Commission will also visit Salisbury for the purpose of conferring with the Government of Southern Rhodesia. They will return via Capetown, Colonel C. W. G. Walker, Secretary of the Conference of East African governors will accompany the Commission on their tour through East and Central African Dependencies and will be associated, with Mr. D'Alwa as a Local Secretary to the Commission.

Who's Who in the Commission.

Sir Hilton Young, who is a Conservative Member of Parliament, has been Financial Secretary to the Treasury and has served on financial missions for the British Government to India, Poland and Iraq. He was Chairman of the recent Royal Commission on Indian Currency.

Sir Reginald Mant has occupied many important financial posts in connection with the Government of India, and was a member of the Commission on Indian Currency.

Sir George Schuster was Financial Secretary to the Sudan Government and is Chairman of the Advisory Committee to the Colonial Secretary on East African Loans.

Mr. Oldham is Secretary of the International Missionary Council and is member of the Advisory Committee at the Colonial Office on Native Education in Tropical Africa.

INDIANS TO NON-CO-OPERATE.

A London correspondent of the Indian Daily Mail writes:—Mr. M. H. Malik, Member, Nairobi Town Council, and a member of the Kenya Legislative Council and former Secretary to the Eastern African Indian National Congress, in a letter to the "Times" declares the Indian community in Kenya, Tanganyika and Uganda has determined to non-co-operate with the Hilton Young Commission unless and until at least one Indian member is appointed on it. He states that the European representative of the Indian office would not inspire confidence among Indians and add: Any measure for the grant of European elective majority in the Kenya legislature will be opposed by the Indian community, tooth and nail, by a strongly organised constitutional agitation. He protests of the immorality of banding over the control of the destinies of the Africans and Indians to a handful of Europeans whose interests directly clash with those of the non-European communities.

AN EXPORT COMMISSION.

A Reuters' message states that in the House of Commons Major Ormsby-Gore announced that the Commission which would proceed to East Africa to deal with the Federation and other East African problems was constituted of Sir Hilton Young, Chairman, Sir Reginald Mant, Sir George Schuster and Mr. J. H. Oldham.

Col. Wedgwood asked why the Opposition was not represented.

Major Ormsby-Gore said that this was not a political committee so much as an expert committee. He pointed out that the Commission which could not be enlarged included a member of the Council of India and ex-Adviser to the Sudan Government while Sir Hilton Young's selection was due to his unique experience and knowledge of finance on which the main question for the Commission devolved.

Col. Wedgwood demurred and asked whether the Commission was not going to interfere with the representation in the Legislative Assembly of East African settlers so compared with the natives and Indians.

Major Ormsby-Gore said that was subsidiary and in the event of the Commission devising a scheme of Federation, it was subject to further consideration by all concerned including his Majesty's Government who kept an open mind on the main issue.

ROY-WILSON COMMISSION REPORT.

Indian opinion in British Guiana is at present greatly agitated over the recent appointment by the Governor of a Commission to go into the question of the revision of the constitution of the Colony. This is in pursuance of an important recommendation made by another Commission appointed last year by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. It was charged with the duty of considering the economic condition of the Colony and asked to report on the causes which have so far retarded its development. The Commission came to the conclusion that it was necessary that "the authorities finally responsible for the sovereignty and good government of the Colony should have power in the last resort to carry into effect measures which they consider essential for its well-being" and recommended the examination of the question of how this could be done, by a local commission appointed by the Governor. Under the present constitution the Colony has a partly elective legislature which is split up into two for division of work. One is the Court of Policy which consists of the Governor, seven officials and eight elected unofficial members. The Governor presides and with his casting vote helps to maintain the official majority. This body enjoys full legislative power except in fiscal matters, which are reserved for the Combined Court. All members of the Court of Policy are also members of the Combined Court; but with them are associated six more elected members who are known as Financial Representatives. The Combined Court is invested with the power of imposing taxes and of indirectly controlling public expenditure. It will be seen that in the Combined Court the elected members are in the majority and though they are constitutionally precluded from adding to any provision made in the budget, they can make their voice heard by the power to reduce or reject any item in it, which they enjoy. Our countrymen constitute 40 per cent. of the population of British Guiana and with the 'Blacks' who also number many millions in the Colony and with complete political equality prevailing in the Colony can exercises a powerful influence on the administration. This has been too much for the Europeans in the Colony and one would not be far wrong if one surmised that the underlying idea of the proposed constitutional inquiry is to see how best to dislodge them from their present position of influence and power. The Indian community in the Colony is, quite naturally, quite prepared to hold the position of the Governor in setting on foot the constitutional inquiry in question. The Indian Association has addressed a powerful protest to the Government of India on the subject and has appealed for the support of the mother-country in the fight which seems to be in store for the Indians settled there. Large attended meetings of Indians have also been organised in the Colony and entered an emphatic protest against the intended lowering of their political status, which, they are apprehensive, is sure to result from the labours of the Commission.—The Servant of India, Poona.

INDIANS AND BRITISH GUIANA

Two apparently unrelated messages received within the last few days may possibly be part of a propaganda for the same end. A few days ago there was a lament raised in Britain that the production of sugar in the Empire was not all it should be and a vigorous plea was put forward for satisfying Empire demands by production within the Empire itself. This plea somehow or other synchronised with a speech of the Governor of British Guiana, who happens to be in London at present, in which he expatiated on the suitability of his country for settlement by Indians whom he called "admirable citizens." British Guiana is eminently suited for the cultivation of sugar, and Indians are eminently desirable as labourers. The two things fit each other very well but unfortunately the treatment accorded to Indian labourers in the plantations of that Colony in the past does not produce much enthusiasm among Indians to emigrate in large numbers. It is possible that some attempt may be made in the near future, under influential auspices, to induce the Government of India to send more Indians to that Colony. The latest move by the Colonial Office in regard to the financial powers of the local government has been regarded by Indians as being prejudicial to their interests. Col. Amery, the Colonial Secretary, proposed that the British Guiana Legislature should be deprived of the power of the purse. This was a blow aimed at Indians in the Colony. At present Indians have equal rights with the Whites and in course of time, they progress politically and educationally they will have a large voice in the Government. This the Whites cannot regard with equanimity. When measures like these are adumbrated with a view to undermining the position of Indians it is no wonder that there is serious misgiving in this country. The move to induce further emigration from India needs therefore to be watched.—The Indian Daily Mail, Bombay.

EDUCATION IN TANGANYIKA.

The annual report by His Britannic Majesty's Government to the Council of the League of Nations on the administration of Tanganyika Territory for the year 1927 contains the following remarks with respect to Indian education in the territory:—"Government assistance towards the development of Indian education, has rightly been made to depend on the establishment of a really efficient Central School in Dar-es-Salam. Towards the building of this school an initial contribution of £5,000 by the Government was promised on conditions that an equal amount was contributed by the Indian community. The amount necessary to make a beginning has not yet been subscribed by the Indian community, but it is hoped that the building will be commenced during 1927."

We understand that the sum of money proposed to be raised by the Indian community has been collected and that the community has long been awaiting the announcement of a definite policy from the Government in the matter of education. It will be remembered that the Indian community have unmistakably expressed themselves in favour of education to be imparted to their children right from the infant stage. We believe the Government realises the educational need of the Indian community in this territory. That the Government should now proceed to satisfy this need ought to be quite clear from the fact that the present schools in which, in our opinion, efficiency is essentially lacking mainly on account of financial stringency, are working at a loss and therefore certain to cease to be at no very distant date, if the present state of affairs goes on. In fact, the Tilak Memorial Hindi School, the chief among the Indian schools in Dar-es-Salam did, not long ago, request the Government to inspect the school whereupon inspection was made and it was found that the school very badly needed the Government aid. This will serve to illustrate the fact the Government can now no longer afford to maintain a silent attitude towards the question which they stand pledged to take up in right earnest.

The establishment of a really efficient Central School in Dar-es-Salam is a consummation devoutly to be wished for. Both the Government and the Indian public therefore will do well to see that this is accomplished without any unnecessary delay.—The Tanganyika Opinion.

NATAL INDIANS' DISSATISFACTION.

Considerable dissatisfaction appears to exist despite statements to the contrary among the section of Indians at operation of the Industrial Conciliation Acts and Wages Act. The Natal Indian Association deprecates the attitude adopted by Mr. C. F. Andrews who they state, though cognizant of the reasons that influenced the Asiatic Commission from recommending minimum wage, advocated its adoption and so hastened repatriation of Indians from the Union. With regard to the objections of the Indian community as set out by the Natal Indian Association to the facilities to be provided at Fort Hare College, representatives of the Association state that Indians cannot and will not consent to assimilation with natives of South Africa. They state that Mr. Andrews has long known that Indians have declined facilities offered at Fort Hare College and that they do not understand his statement charging them with colour prejudices. They state that Indians as a whole are not represented by the Congress and that the Indo-Union Agreement has not been properly explained. It is really unfortunate that the Indian community should have been brought to the verge of slow but sure economic, social and political and ultimate ruin" declared the representatives.

Mr. Andrews' Statement.

Mr. C. P. Andrews in a statement to the Associated Press concerning the resolutions of the Natal Indian Association regarding the Indo-South African Agreement and cognate questions, said that "this small society was entirely unpresentative and reactionary. The resolutions themselves clearly revealed its irresponsible character. For example, their objection to educational facilities being offered to Indians at Port Hare College were frankly based on colour prejudices. They regarded it as insulting to take University courses in the same Colleges with Africans. The Natal Indian Congress which Mahatma Gandhi founded, however, warmly welcomed such friendly contact in University life with leading Africans, who attended the college, many of whom were chiefs." Again, their objection to the Industrial Conciliation and Wages Acts was quite untenable both from the labour and also the racial point of view because this new legislation was non-racial in character, and could in the long run materially help Natal Indians by fixing a minimum wage for all skilled industries, thus preventing sweated labour.

Natal Indian Education Commission: The Imperial Indian Citizenship Association understands that Messrs. Acutt and Legett, members of the Natal Provincial Council and ant-Axisites, have been appointed members of the Natal Indian Education Commission. The Commission will investigate educational facilities and conditions of service of teachers, grant-in-aid system and finance.

Communal Franchise Upheld in Kenya: Mr. Phadke, President Unofficial Conference, welcoming the Governor, Sir Edward Grigg, stated that the Indian community is alarmed at the proposals made in certain quarters regarding the future Government of the Colony. The past history and the occasional attempts made have engendered watchfulness and suspicion for constitutional changes. The Governor replying said, being born in India, he knew Indians and emphasised that in Africa, Kenya Indians alone had elective representation. He considered the problems in India most significant to those of the East African Indians. The question of representation was most controversial and therefore the Imperial Government's reiteration of the communal franchise principle was very wise and inevitable for the peaceful development of the Colony. The political power and privileges of the immigrant communities must depend on merit, education, standard of life and contribution to the progress of the country and without external support. The "East African Standard" editorially commenting on the Governor's views advocates western civilisation as the determining factor and Indians' share of responsibility in African trusteeship must logically depend on fitness. The deliberations of the Conference are in camera.

East Africa Commission: Mr. C. P. Andrews, interviewed by the Associated Press in Calcutta on his way back to Orissa, regarding the personnel of the East Africa Federation Commission, stated that he was entirely disappointed with India's representation by a retired Civil Servant without any experience of the East African situation. The same fatal policy of excluding Indians as equal partners had been pursued which had stifled the very outset, the Statutory Commission, and made it a national humiliation. It was, clear that, a retrograde period had set in, and that the present British Government was determined to treat India not as an equal but as a subordinate. Sir Regional Munt had made no serious study of the exceedingly difficult position of Indians in East Africa, and it was too late for him to be coached up by the India Office. He was not an Indian who could instinctively feel where Indian interests lay. On the other hand, Sir Purshotandas Thakurdas and H. H. the Aga Khan were men of outstanding ability and personality, who had both been intimately acquainted for many years past with every phase of the East African Indian question. There was only one single reason for men of this calibre being passed over, and that was that Sir Regional Munt was a Britisher while the Aga Khan and Sir Purshotandas were Indians by birth.

The Liquor Legislation: Writing about the impending Liquor Legislation, the correspondent of a contemporary says: Quite naturally the Bill has upset the Indian community in South Africa, particularly in view of their hopes and expectations since the Cape Town Agreement, that no further encroachment would be attempted on their slender rights. The Indians directly affected are in despair; for most of them were born in the Union and have specialised in the professions they are now engaged in, and they have no other professions to take to even if they could. The Indian Hotel Employees' Unions and the Congress are taking action and making representations. Of course this step of the Government is a handsome windfall to the detractors of the Cape Town Agreement, who have lost no time in "showing up" the Agreement. There can be no doubt that if the section goes through, it will completely destroy the relations of goodwill that now subsist between Indians and the Union, and the Agreement will be thoroughly discredited. The situation requires careful handling and demands much patience on the part of India. The Indian waiter is not without friends. His employers are on his side. Then there is Mr. Maurice Alexander, M.L.A., who stoutly defended him on the last occasion. Mr. Patrick Duncan may confidently be expected to interpose his great influence. The Agent of the Government of India may be expected to use all his official and personal influence on the right side. The Bill itself is not likely to come up for consideration till perhaps February next, and that gives time for persuasion. There is no occasion then for India to give way to despair and throw up the sponge.

"Live Cleaner" Campaign: A Reuters message states that, following the advice of Mr. Sastri to Indians to "live cleaner", an all Indian Social Service Commission has been formed to start a clean-up campaign. Thousands of pamphlets are being distributed throughout Natal by the Natal Congress giving simple rules of sanitation and hygiene.
This is perhaps the most important aspect of the Depressed Class uplift work. With the staff and means at the disposal of the Mandal, it has been trying to do all that it can in this direction. Since its birth, over two hundred committees or Jathas have been organised by the workers of the Mandal. The driving force of these bodies was most evident at the Amritsar Balmik Conference in which the chairmen (now calling themselves Balmiks) participated not as stray individuals but as organised units in right martial array.

ECONOMIC UPLIFT.

The poverty of the Depressed Classes is a patent fact, with the exception of a few artisan castes among them, a large majority of the Depressed Class population is leading a miserable existence as semi-starved agricultural labourers in villages and as submissive scavengers in towns. A private agency like the Mandal, cannot do much in raising them up from this miserable plight; but within its means the beginning has been rightly made. An employment bureau has been started by the Mandal with Mahatma Hans Raj as president for providing lucrative occupations to the Depressed Classes. The Mandal is giving stipends to the deserving boys of the Depressed Classes receiving industrial education. Lastly it is successfully managing ten co-operative credit societies (at Lahore, Amritsar, Batala and Gurdaspur) for redeeming the indebtedness of the poor scavengers of these localities and for meeting their various other demands for money.

EDUCATION.

The experience of Mandal as also of other missionaries, has more than once testified the fact that separate schools for the Depressed Classes cannot educationally be a success. It has therefore never attempted to set up separate schools for them excepting they be as experiments. But otherwise through propaganda and monetary help at times, the Mandal has always tried to stimulate the interest of the Depressed Classes in matters educational. Special efforts in this direction have been made by the Mandal in Kangra, Amritsar and Lahore Districts.

SOCIAL REFORM.

The Depressed Classes socially are healthier communities than the so-called higher Hindu classes. Excepting their dirty mode of life and extravagant habits, more to be seen in towns than in villages, there is not much to complain against them on this score. But a beginning has been made to wipe off even these black spots. Amritsar has taken the lead in the matter where through the agency of the Mandal four better Living Societies have been constituted under the co-operative Societies Act. Resolutions regarding social reform have also been adopted at the various conferences held under the auspices of the Mandal.

VENTILATION OF GRIEVANCES.

The Mandal has always rendered unceasing help to the Depressed Classes in the ventilation of their grievances; press, platform, personal canvassing, official influence, all have been used for making their life livable. At present the Mandal is engaged in carrying on a persistent propaganda for the abolition of beggar or forced labour which is usually taken from the Depressed Classes. Over one thousand leaflets containing the notifications of the Punjab Government regarding its prohibition have been distributed in areas where the rigours of forced labour have been most oppressive. Another instance of a work of this kind is the judgment of the Lahore High Court in a case filed by the Mandal regarding the eligibility of the Depressed Classes to draw water from the Public wells. The work done by the Mandal for ventilating the grievances of the scavengers against the municipalities of Lahore, Amritsar and Batala also deserves mention.

CONCLUSION.

The Mandal is too modest a body to take credit for itself for the mighty social upheaval in progress in the Hindu Society throughout the country regarding its attitude towards the Depressed Classes. But it cannot be denied that the Mandal is also contributing its mite towards its happy consummation. Untouchability is fast disappearing; the spirit of unrest is spreading like wildfire among the Depressed Classes; and the upper strata of Hindu Society has also become alive to the national and communal danger of perpetuating the curse of untouchability. But the process is not complete; much yet remains to be done. The Punjab Akshat Udhar Mandal is seriously engaged in completing the process. Let those interested in the uplift of Depressed Classes sympathise with it and with the Servants of the People Society, which is the main-spring of its activities.

TRUE GREATNESS.

(By Mr. T. B. Shah).

Everybody desires to be great. It is a healthy and natural aspiration. Let us see what are the essentials leading to the realization of this dream.

The first essential is to keep an ideal before our eyes. A great care should be exercised in the selection of the ideal.

After selecting the proper ideal, the next step we have to take is to try to reach up that high standard. It means that one must be ambitious. As interesting a story is told in this connection. It relates of a man who saw a star in his dream. Whenever he looked at the star steadfastly he was being lifted up high above in the heaven, but the moment he cast his look downwards he found himself thrown in an abyss. So is the case with everyone of us. As long as we set our minds on things above we think clearly and act wisely, but the moment we are taken up with our gross selfish motives our outlook gets narrowed down and gradually we sink to degradation. Hence it is very important for young men to see visions and old men to dream. This leads us to our relationship towards one another. Love is the bond which truly binds us closer. We have to look through the eyes of others, have to put in their place in order to judge their actions. The root cause of communal strife is that each community is too busy with its own affairs and altogether forgets the presence and need and conveniences of the other. Otherwise how can all loving and mighty God be truly worshipped by breaking heads and showering bricks and stones instead of flowers or disturbing others by an unwelcome music. Thus we have made our God according to our fashions and prejudices. Truly, "God is but a man's God made by man's guessing, imagining and hoping."

From here we should return to our own personal matters. Once we have found our ideal and laid down our principles we should never make a compromise. A luke-warm attitude does a good deal of harm. But before we come to this pass we should make a diligent search for truth. Truth at all costs must be sought out and firmly grasped. Mahatma Gandhi is the living illustration of this.

Along with this we must have a bright view of things: “Brighten the corner where you are” is a sound advice. The world needs such a brightening every moment. But all these can be done; only when we be the servants of all. “If any one wants to be great let him be the servant of all.” God Himself washed the feet of His creatures in order to set an example to us. Gandhi washed the feet of India and to-day he is the uncrowed king of the land, so also true missionaries in all countries and ages have done the same with the result that a warm corner is left for them in the hearts of men. And the same road is opened to us. There is no royal road to greatness, but the narrow path of service and self-denial. To be lost is to be saved. If we lose ourselves in the service of humanity we will find our real life work. Let us beware lest we measure greatness by worldly standards. There have been many obscure good samaritans, Missioners, Gandhis and Tagores of whom people have never heard but all the same they are doing their appointed task in hidden corners; so let us not be disheartened if the world takes no notice of us.

In conclusion I will like to point out that we must have faith in God. It is this belief which ultimately strengthens and uplifts us. We should not be discouraged if we fail because we fail to rise. Can any better conclusion be found for this thought than the following words of Browning:

One who never turned his back
But marched breast forward,
Never doubted clouds would break,
Never dreamed though right were worsted Wrong would triumph,
Held we fall to rise,
Are baffled to fight better
Sleep to wake.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

First Widow Marriage among Marwaris: The marriage party of Mr. Nawal Kishore Bharatia-Cawповore, was held recently. The couple was well greeted and garlanded on the railway platform by hundreds of prominent Hindu citizens of all creeds including Marwaris. The procession passed through the main streets of the city and was joined on the way by thousands of people who showed their fullest appreciation and sympathy. The bride and the bridegroom were received amid great applause and overwhelming cheers. Marwaris witnessed the procession from the balconies in large numbers. The party was entertained with par sahur and was garlanded at several places. Young Marwaris took keen interest in this widow marriage as it was the first one of its own kind amongst the community. In the end the bridegroom thanked the assembled gentlemen for upholding and sympathising with the cause of widow marriage.

Mary Jamila Mary Sijah-ud-Din:—Among the distinguished arrivals from England by the P. and O. Mail steamer, “Ranpura” on 2nd inst., was Miss Jamila Mary Sijah-ud-Din, M.A., Ph. D. Having come out first in the M.A. Examination of the Punjab University, the Punjab Government granted her a scholarship of £300 a year tenable for 3 years. She was sent to England for the prosecution of her further studies in 1924. She passed the Teachers’ Diploma Examination of the University of London in 1925. She joined the University of Edinburgh in November 1935, as a research scholar for the degree of Ph.D. in economics. Having taken a woolen industry in the Punjab as the subject of her thesis for her M.A. degree, she was asked to take the comparative study of woollen industry in Scotland as the subject of her thesis for the doctorate. In connection with her studies, she visited cottages and factories in the United Kingdom, the Shetlands and the Hebrides and travelled in Ireland and the continent.

The All India Theolstio Conference, Madras: The Secretary of the above Conference sends us the following programme:—Monday, 26th Dec. 1927 at 6 p.m.—Reception Committee meeting to decide about the subjects to be considered at the Conference. Tuesday, 27th Dec. 1927 at 7.30 a.m.—Divine service and sermon at the Mandir, 6 p.m.—Addresses of the Chairman of the Reception Committee and the President of the Conference. Wednesday, 28th Dec. 1927 at 7.30 to 10 a.m.—Conference proceedings, 6 p.m.—Public Address by distinguished Brahmoos. Thursday 29th Dec. 1927, 7-80 to 10 a.m.—Conference Proceedings. 7 p.m.—Priti Bhogas. Friday, 30th Dec. 1927, 7-30 a.m.—Closing service in the Mandir. Babu Prasah Kumar Sen, M.A., LL.M., Bar-at-Law (Ex-judge of High Court of Patna) has kindly accepted the Presidentship. Delegates should kindly intimate promptly the date and the time by which they arrive at Madras to T. S. Singh 97, Anna Pilley Street, George Town, Madras. Accommodation and lodging will be provided to such of them as want the same.

Depressed Classes and the Conferences: Mr. K. Shukaramanaya Rao, President, Sri Narasimha-raja Hostel, Bangalore, writes to us:—I am desired by the Managing Committee of the Sri Narasimharaja Hostel, Bangalore, to bring to your kind notice the fact that it has been decided to take all the boarders of the Hostel (who are 150 in number and all of whom are Adikarnalataas and Adi Dravidas) to Madras during the Christmas Holidays. A number of very important functions like the Indian National Congress, the Social Conference, All India Exhibition and the Theosophical Conference and Student’s Conference will take place when all the greatest men and women of India will assemble. These students will therefore have an opportunity of seeing and hearing our leaders and patriots which is sure to be a source of education and inspiration to them. The total amount of expenditure for this purpose is estimated at about Rs. 1,500 and as the Institute has no funds of its own for such a purpose, we are obliged to make this appeal to the public for their kind and valuable support. Those who are interested in the uplift of these our Adikarnalataas and Adi Dravidas brethren, I am desired to request to kindly subscribe liberally to enable the Committee to take these boarders to Madras. Subscriptions may be sent either to me direct or to any of the following members of the Committee of Management, who are also authorised to approach the public for the purpose: Messrs. (1) P.L. Narasimhabhai, Secretary, Sri Narasimharaja Hostel, (2) R. Gopalaswami Iyer, Elephant Lodge, IV Road, Chalhurajpet, Bangalore City. (3) Women’s Conference at Calcutta: The first Malabar C\textsuperscript{on} of Women’s Conference on Educational Reforms was held at the local Town Hall, on the

MILWIDTHERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.
Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for controlling the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own Institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

5th and the day before, under the presidency of Mrs. Sri Mana Vikarama Raja of Nilambur. The Conference was attended by delegates from all parts of the district.
The following resolutions among others, were passed at the Conference:— (1) This Conference is of opinion that proper facilities for education should be provided for those who observe purdah, especially Numbadars, who are unable to attend public schools; (2) this Conference deeply deplores the effect of early marriage on education and urges the parents and guardians to abolish the custom of marrying girls before the age of 16. (3) This Conference also requests the Government of India to pass legislation making marriage under 16 years of age a penal offence; (3) that pupils of girls' school should be examined by lady doctor, at stated periods, and if possible, a qualified health superintendent should be attached to the staff of each secondary school and to the agency responsible for elementary education in each district; and (4) that elementary education should be made available for all boys and girls between 6 and 12 years of age, irrespective of caste or creed, that in order to make it available for all, it must be free. The Conference approved the election of Mrs. Thomas and Mrs. Powers as delegates to the All-India Women's Conference to be held in Delhi in February next.

For Fitness For Liberty.
Saviour divine,
Who dost ordain unto us, who would be free.
Both inalienable rights and inalienable duties,
Revel fully unto us that our lives are not our own.
To subordinate our own opinions and interests to those of a majority,
To be willing to see our own standards lowered,
That those of the masses may be raised.
To teach us to suffer fools gladly,
To be willing to see our own standards lowered,
That those of the masses may be raised.

NOTES.
The Late Mr. C. S. Deole: We deeply regret the untimely death of Mr. C. S. Deole, one of the senior members of the Servants of India Society. Mr. Deole was a quiet and unassuming personality and he was hampered for a considerable time by indifferent health but the amount of solid work that he managed to do in various spheres was astonishing to all those who knew him. By dint of careful study, in the midst of many distractions, Mr. Deole made himself an authority on questions of Indian Economics and Finance, and he was always ready to place his vast store of knowledge at the disposal of anyone who applied to him for help. Besides this, Mr. Deole was Mr. Deochkar's right-hand man in organising and collecting funds for the flood-stricken areas of Malabar and, recently, of Gujerat and Sind. A simple, sincere and kindly soul, his death will be felt as a personal pang by many who held him in affectionate regard as an untiring worker in the public cause.

The Cap and the Head: We have made room today for a lengthy article stating the reasons for the orthodox opposition to legislation for the prevention of child marriages as contemplated in several bills now before the legislatures. Mr. Natesa Shastriar, we may say, is a sort of survival at the present time. His arguments might have had some force thirty years ago but very few people nowadays are likely to be impressed by them. They have been answered times without number, by people who could certainly speak with as much authority as the Shastriar, and Sir Purushottandas Thakurdas Thakur have accurately focussed the prevalent state of public opinion when he said in the Assembly speaking on Mr. Sardar's Bill that any one who mixes up religion with child marriage is either fit for the lunatic asylum or has vested interests in attempting to perpetuate this crying evil. Mr. Natesa Shastriar says that Brahmins he quite content with enough strength for performing their Vedico religious duties. Apart from the fact that very few Brahmins are content nowdays, with performing their so-called Vedico duties and that they aspire to be 'stationers', soldiers, merchants, marines' and members of council, we may remind the Shastriar of the mighty dictum of the inspired author of the Gita that Vedic duties are not for physical weaklings. There is another factor of which the Shastriar seems to be profoundly ignorant. Even if the Brahman is content to remain all his life a performer of the Vedico routine, the Brahmin woman is no longer inclined to content herself with being his shadow in the uninspiring ground of endless rites, and ceremonies. She has her own ideas of what is due to herself. If the Shastriar's conception of a holy life does not appeal to her. There is, however, one remark in his lecture which points to a real difficulty in the way of parents keeping their daughters unmarried. Much beyond the age of puberty, and it is the duty of the reformers and the State to provide a sufficient number of schools, boarding-houses, and training institutions like the Seva Suman where girls could spend their pre-marriage days acquiring knowledge and training themselves for a life of useful public service. At the same time, the Indian household shd should be remodelled so as to provide a fitting home for unmarried young women. It is absurd to argue, as does the Shastriar, that because the Brahmans household, as at present organised, does not contemplate the existence of unmarried girls beyond the age of ten or eleven, therefore the system of child marriage with all its obvious evils should be perpetuated. The Shastriar must buy a cap which fits his head and not try to force his head into a cap which might have adorned the head of his great-grandfather in the days of the latter's infancy.

Rescue Home for Girls, Cochin: We print below an appeal forwarded to us by the 'members of the Society for the protection of Minors, recently formed in Cochin. It should be noted that the members of the society belong to the devadasi community, and are actuated by a genuine desire for reform. We earnestly trust that the public will extend to them their whole-hearted co-operation and support in their humanitarian work which will enable them to lead free and healthy lives without being a menace to society. "We, the members of the Society for the Protection of Minors, Cochin, feel sure that everyone will recognise the sacred duty of improving the status of our brothers and sisters, some of whom have been by the mereiacs of the law, forced to lead a life, which, according to the rules of ethics and morality, is highly objectionable— we refer to the Devadasi Community. Though Government Interference in the matter may be the fact that dedication and its concomitant evil customs culminating in immoral practices, is undeniable. The only alternative to Government interference for the eradication of the evil is reform from within in the shape of persuasion and material help. But in the case of the Cochin Devadasis, their backwardness in education and the lack of the wherewithal to conduct regular marriage, stand in the way of such reform. Under existing conditions, we make bold to say that a large majority of the members will certainly come round to the conclusion that, and to this end, the Indian Social Reformer, if only it funds sufficient for the upkeep of a "HOME" which will serve as a bureau of propaganda and as a centre of economic, material and educational assistance, or otherwise, it is absolutely necessary to assist those who through no fault of their own, are unable to assist themselves, and to establish safeguards against the spreading of the evil to generations, yet unborn, that have formed an association to do our humble best, and have already addressed Mahatma Gandhi and Dr. S. Muthulakshmi Reddy whose sympathy and support are with us in our movement.

Succession to Sandur Gadi: The Government of India, recognising the rightful claims of Shrimant Sushila Raje, the sister of the late ruler, who is obviously the rightful heir to the Sandur Gadi will be acting in conformity with the tradition of their own country which owes much of its glory and greatness to the brilliant reigns of two women rulers. We commend the views of the United India and Native States on this subject. "Equity and justice demand," writes our contemporary, "that the Government of India should accede to the request of Sandur people that the crown of Sandur should be acknowledged as before and that Shrimant Sushila Raje, otherwise known as Akkasaheb, should be recognised as heir to the late Raja Sahib. Memorials have been addressed in that connection to the Government of India by the people of Sandur and of the adjoining British Districts who have interest in the State. A memorial was addressed to the Government by Shrimant Appasaheb Ghorpade, Junior Judges of Gajendragad, who with rare magnanimity recognises the superior claims of Shrimant Akkasaheb to the Gadi, and will press his son's claims only in case the heirship of the Princess is not recognised. These Memorials make from the legal point of view a strong case in favour of the Princess. It is clear that the State was in its inception treated as a Jajagir free of pecuniary demand of service of any kind. The Sandars do not restrict the succession to male heirs nor is the State hold on any military tenure. Princess Akkasaheb being the only child and the nearest heir to the late Raja is best entitled to succeed to the Gadi under the Hindu Law. The law affords no justification whatsoever to adoption by the Dowager Rani Sundraban Sahib. "In falling in with the wishes of the Sandur people the Government of India will also have taken a distinct step to recognise the claims of Indian womanhood. There have been more than one female rulers in Indian history and the Sandur people are confident that Shrimant Akkasaheb will make a good ruler. The Government of India have in this case no excuse to go against the wishes of the Sandur people, against the desire of the late ruler and against the dictates of equity and justice."

LL. D. for Mr. Hydari: A fitting tribute was paid to Mr. Hydari by the Osmania University when it conferred on him the highest honour in its power. The universal estimation in which Nawab Haidar Nawaz Jung is hold is well brought out by a contemporary who says: "The honourary degree of LL. D. conferred by the Osmania University on Nawab Haidar Nawaz Jung, is richly deserved. Mr. Hydari, the Nawab, is best known to people in British India, is one of the ablest administrators in the whole of India. The skill with which he has handled the finances of the State has been universally recognised. Equally distinguished have been his services to the cause of education in the Hyderabad State. As Maharajah Sir Kishen Pershad, the distinguished Chancellor of the University, remarked, in paying a glowing tribute to Mr. Hydari, the latter has been ever mindful of the very life and soul of the University Council, he had rendered inestimable service in helping the establishment of the Osmania University, he had taken a prominent part in the educational activities of India and was reckoned among the great educational reformers of the present day."

Indian States: A press communiqué states: It has been decided by the Secretary of State for India to appoint a Committee to report upon the relationship between the Paramount Power and the Indian States with particular reference to the rights and obligations arising from treaties, engagements and Sanads and usages, suffering and other causes and, secondly, to enquire into the financial and economic relations between British India and the States and to make any recommendations that they may consider desirable or necessary for their more satisfactory adjustment. The Committee will be composed as follows: Chairman: His Excellency Sir Harcourt Butler, the Governor of Burma. Members: Mr. Hon'ble Mr. Sydney Peel and Mr. W. S. Holdsworth, K. C., Vicenari, Professor in English Law.

Madras Vidya Virah Sabha: The Hon. Secretary of the Vidya Virah Sahak Sabha, Madras Branch, writes: "I have much pleasure in informing you that a central branch of the Vidya Virah Sahak Sabha, Lahore (founded by the late Sir Ganga Ram) has been established here with the Hon. Mr. Justice M. Venkatassabha Rao as president to popularise and arrange widows marriages in this presidency. The head office (Lahore Sabha) has been found enough to send its representative Shanti Swarup, Vidya-Lanka, an experienced and learned worker as an organising secretary for the province. Every now and then Mabia Shanki Swarup, Vidya-Lanker, goes on tour for propaganda work, distributes literature in local languages as well as in English, addresses public meetings, establishes branches with the help of the leading gentlemen of the city and approaches the guardians of the widows—virgin widows particularly,—in order to induce them to get their widowed girls married second time. Besides Madras branch he has hitherto been able to establish as many as 45 branches in all the parts of the presidency. We have got our regular office at the above premises, and have engaged a clerk to watch the correspondence and to induce the workers and branches to take up and more interest in the noble cause. 'We invite applications from the gentlemen and widowed girls who want to take practical steps in this reform and help them to bring forth their marriages. Within this short period of 4 or 6 months we have got more than 80 and 30 candidates male and female respectively who have offered themselves in order to take practical reform. We have arranged to publish at least 10 kinds of literature in local languages for free distribution in the Congress week and at the time of the Indian National Social Conference."

A Rejoinder to "Mother India!: As copies of our reprint of the article which appeared in the Reformer have been exhausted, we request those who want copies of the pamphlet to apply to G. A. Natesan & Co., Madras, who have recently reprinted the rejoinder.
IN THE FUTURE OF INDIAN STATES.

There are in India between five and six hundred states enjoying varying degrees of autonomy under British sovereignty. The affairs of these States are beyond the purview of the Indian legislature, as they are considered to be foreign States. But the subjects of these States enjoy in British India practically all the rights of British Indian subjects. They are eligible for all offices, for membership of local and municipal bodies, and even of the Provincial and Indian Legislatures. One result of this has been to draw away from the States many of the ablest and most energetic men who find in British India greater scope for their ambition and talents. It is for this reason that few subjects of Indian States have distinguished themselves as administrators in their own States. Whenever, the States want competent administrators they have, therefore, to import them from British India. It is not only the educated classes in the States who feel the atmosphere too cramping. The ruling Princes, too, do the same, as is shown by the increasing number of them who spend a considerable part of their time every year in Europe. Some of them have even acquired house property there. Depleted of their educated men and with their rulers away in Europe for several months in the year, the States have little stimulus to progress. The result is that the people of the States are turning for guidance and leadership to British India. They no longer think that they can secure more political rights in the States by appealing to their own Princes. They want pressure to be brought to bear upon them by the Government of India and they want British Indian political movements to press the Government of India to put pressure on the Princes to grant a constitution to their people. They want more intervention not less of the Government of India in the administration of the States. There are, of course, exceptions. Mysore is acknowledged by every one to be the model of a well-governed State. Some other States do not fall far behind it in the purity and efficiency of the administration.

While the people of the States are thus clamouring for more intervention and more systematic intervention on the part of the Government of India to stimulate constitutionalism in the States, the ruling Princes are demanding that their Treaty rights should be respected more strictly than they have been and that the Government of India should leave them to manage the internal administration without any interference on its part. The most powerful Government in the world cannot go against the spirit of the times. The Government of India, which is a subordinate branch of the British Government and even the British Government itself, cannot support a pure autocracy in the face of the overwhelming growth of democratic feeling all the world over.

whatever might have been the contents of treaties, so long as our Princes were content to remain in their own States, they were secluded from public criticism, but now that they are frequently to be seen in the capitals of Europe, it is inevitable that their position and status should become the subject of discussion all over the world. No head of a State spends half of his time in some foreign capital. If the King of England and the President of the United States should spend six months every year, say, in Paris and Berlin, there will be a fierce outcry in the British and American Press. The Viceroy of India till two years ago was not allowed to go out of the country during his term of office. Indian ruling princes, however, think that there is nothing improper in their expatriating themselves regularly for several months every year. Lord Curzon insisted on every Prince who wished to leave the country for any length of time, applying and obtaining his permission which was only accorded on proper grounds. A very influential leader in an important Indian State told us recently that the people of Indian States would wish to have Lord Curzon’s rule revived. Indeed, one of the main causes of the discontent in several Indian States at the present day is the increasing tendency to expensive absenteeism on the part of their rulers. Matters become much worse, when the absentee ruler insists on controlling the details of the administration from his distant domicile. The officials on the spot are afraid to take the initiative in any matter, and the administration suffers from a sort of creeping paralysis. The Chamber of Princes seems to be the only body which could express an opinion on this matter which will carry weight with their order.

“I WAS THIRSTY AND YE GAVE ME DRINK”

(By Mr. William E. Johnson.)

“I was thirsty and ye gave me drink.” That quotation is woven into an exquisite glass window in the Cathedral at Dublin. That window was contributed by a member of the Guinness family, the largest family of brewers in the world. The average Dubliner, not contaminated with temperance teaching, looks on that window as a good advertisement. He sees nothing in it to laugh about. And why should he laugh, when practically every brewer in the world claims to be a “Christian”? Not long since, I was talking with a Moslem friend of mine, a “vakil” or lawyer, at Delhi, India. He was an earnest opponent of drink, faithful to the prophet. “If Christianity were only a total abstinence religion, like Islam, what great things could be accomplished in the world!” I suggested that America, the greatest Christian nation on earth, had outlawed the liquor traffic. “Yes,” he said, “but even your prohibition law provides for drinking intoxicants at the communion table of the Lord.” Then I had a choking feeling in my throat because I could think of no satisfactory rejoinder.

HAS AMERICA GONE MOSLEM?

Some weeks ago I was visiting in the home of a very dear Moslem friend at Alexandria, Egypt, Ahmed A. Galwash, president of the Egyptian temperance society. As the sun went down behind the garden wall at eventide, he laid down his half-drained cup of tea. "Excuse me for a moment," he said, "the time has come to pray." He spread out his prayer rug and went through his evening devotions, while I waited. Later I made some casual remark about America as a "Christian country." Quick as a flash came the retort, "America is no longer a Christian country; she has turned Mohammedan." "How, come?" I asked in the Yankee vernacular. Then came his diagnosis: "The only important difference between Christianity and Islam is in their attitude towards liquor. We worship the same God. We both honour Christ and the prophets. Our ethical standards are substantially the same. America has now accepted Moslem teachings as to liquor and has thus removed the chief point of difference between the two faiths. America has become a Mohammedan country."

Like a soon dog, my friend had me up a tree. I could think of no satisfactory reply except by pettifogging and I quit pettifogging when I became a prohibitionist. I saw silhouetted against the sky the fact that no man in all the history of the world has accomplished so much for the sobriety of the human race as Mohammed, the prophet of Nedj. We can shout and grow parches with zeal, but that fact remains incontestable. For it is now, and always has been, the disagreeable fact that the so-called "Christian nations" of the world constitute almost the sole bulwark of the degrading liquor traffic, and it is useless for us Christians to try to lie out of it.

In every nation on earth where the drink traffic is in power, there you will find a Christian nation, and in nearly every case, some form of Christianity is actually the state church. More than that, every nation that is now foisting the drink upon an unwilling people against their will is a "Christian" nation. Every mandate given by the league of nations, for the government of a "child race" has been given to a "Christian" power; in every case this mandate has been used to exploit the people in the interest of the liquor traffic, and over the protests of the people governed.

There are over 700,000,000 people in the world whose religion is aggressively for total abstinence; 300,000,000 Moslems, 215,000,000 Hindus, 150,000,000 Buddhists, and Sikhs, Animists and others more than make up the difference. "Christian" nations have gone among these people with ships and cannons compelling them to submit to the introduction and encouragement of drink. And after having conquered these races and introduced the drink traffic into every corner of the world, they credit this accomplishment to the "Christian" civilization.

TURKEY AND PROHIBITION.

"What about Turkey?" some one will say who froths at the mouth whenever the word "Turkey" is mentioned except when preparing to gorge himself into acute dyspepsia on Thanksgiving day. One of the first things that Turkey did when she became free four years ago was to enact a prohibition law. This she put into effect at once in that part of Turkey where she controlled. She put it into effect in Cilicia when the French evacuated that section, into Smyrna when the Greeks left there, and into Constantinople when the allied troops left the Bosphorus. Then came trouble for Turkey. Outside "Christian" powers controlled the trusteeship of the Turkish public debt. To this true teetotal the Turkish liquor revenues had been pledged. These outside powers theretofore raised trouble and compelled Turkey to restore the drink traffic. Since then, the Turks have been seeking to rearrange their public debt so as to be able to reenact the prohibition law.

How about Morocco and Algeria? It was the Christian French Government that forced the drink upon these people and turned the littoral of these countries into a vast vineyard, over the protests of the people to whom the drink was so inherently hateful.

LIQUOR FOR CHRISTIANS ONLY.

How about Egypt? It was a saloonless country so far as the people could make it under foreign domination. It was Christian Britain that organised and developed the drink traffic there. It was thus that even the late Mr. Zaghlul began to drink, but later he got on the water wagon and until his death worked for prohibition. Four years ago, nearly, the Egyptian government adopted the policy of refusing to issue any new liquor licenses and of refusing to renew any old licenses except in the "Christian" quarters of the four principal cities, Alexandria, Cairo, Port Said and Suez. Already half of these licenses have been extinguished. Soon there will be no liquor licenses in Egypt except in the distinctly "Christian" quarters of these four municipalities. The drink sellers feel secure under the protection of the "capitulations" with foreign powers, but the Moslems are now preparing to contest this "Christian" privilege when the issue can be raised.

In Palestine under the limited control of the Turkish government only 25 liquor licenses existed for the benefit of the Christian pilgrims. But under the mandate of the British power, exactly 300 licenses are now in force and, of these, 299 are held by Christians or Jews, only one license being held by a Moslem. And the Pan-Arabic federation is now trying to force this lone Moslem to change his ways.

Transjordania was without the drink traffic until Christian Britain was given a mandate over these people. Now a pack of so-called "Christians" have come in and opened drink shops. That is why the grand mufti appealed to me to aid in devising some way to prevent this movement. That is why Araf Bay al Araf, chief secretary of the government, called in a council of chiefs and members of the executive council to confer with me as to how they could establish prohibition without incurring the vengeance of the British mandate power.

Up in Bulgaria, the official Christian state church authorities actively opposed the total abstinence movement, declaring that it was in order to promote efficiency. Two million Germans voiced their dissatisfaction with the beer system by signing a petition, within a week, begging for a democratic local option law, but got nowhere. Catholic Lithuania has driven the drink shops from a tenth of its whole territory. Local option there has become a distinct threat against brewery overlords who will not trust their customers for a drink, to say nothing of all vote.

A PENDIX REVISED.

Part of Canada has decided to adopt the Stockhold's system of selling liquor in spite of the fact that Stockholm last year, in proportion to her population, had ten times as many arrests for drunkenness as did its one wicked city of New York. Several smaller European countries, which have Christianity as their national Church, have adopted national control of the drinks. But in each case, the drink controls instead of the nation. These people have dragged themselves into the belief that they can promote sobriety by selling and drinking liquor under government auspices.

Europe is badly frightened at the perpetual procession of ghost stories coming to them from America, about the failure of our dry laws. Every time an American gets drunk and beats his wife, it is called all over the world as the normal behavior of American husbands under prohibition. Europe is prone to believe any old yarn about America, provided it is unbelievable.

Five years ago, when a wave of idealism was sweeping over the world, I prophesied that in ten years the world would be dry. Prophecy is a dangerous pastime. I am compelled to revise that estimate. The Christian world has not yet suffered enough. More punishment is wanted. So many nations are experimenting with the theory that a bottle of whisky sold by a government official will have a different effect than it would if sold by a horse thief. A generation, and perhaps two is likely before the world will banish alcohol, just as several generations of intense agitation were necessary before the world would yield to the abolition of human slavery.

RELATION BETWEEN SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

The Third Session of the Indian Philosophical Congress opened last Monday at the University Convocation Hall before a large and distinguished gathering of philosophers from all over India. Prof. Radhakrishnan presided. In the unavoidable absence of H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, his inaugural address was read by Dewan Babur V. T. Krishnam Acharia, Dewan of Baroda.

INAUGURAL ADDRESS.

The following are extracts from H. H. the Gaekwar's address:

The history of Indian philosophical thought is not only interesting in itself but the vigour of its best periods in the past should provide us with an inspiring lesson in opposition to the stagnant acquiescence in tradition which has characterized our intellectual life for centuries.

DISOWNERSHIP OF ORIGINATLITY TO DOGMATISM.

Since the time of Saussure's and that of his great opponents, philosophy in India has rarely been able to free itself from the limitations of a merely deductive method. This characteristic of the Indian mental life of the past and incidentally of much of our mental life to-days merits closer consideration and exemplification.

The great leaders of Indian philosophical and religious thought used methods of independent investigation to a large extent introspectively, and always with a large amount of unfettered reflection. Not so their disciples and successors. They have accepted teaching from the gurus and more often than not have treated it dogmatically.

INDIAN AND WESTERN PHILOSOPHY.

The student of philosophy in India must definitely require to make an adequate study of the philosophy of the West. What we have to look for, therefore, in the study of philosophy in India to-day is a broad acquaintance and knowledge of both Indian and Western philosophy and some understanding of their methods with some ability to apply them. From such two-sided education we should hope for genuine philosophical advance in India.

To what conclusions must we come, for example, if, with a truly philosophical independence and acumen, and with sound logic, we examine the idea associated with Varnarana. The ways in which the Indian doctrine of the division of social activities has been and still is interpreted, the prejudices and false sentiments which have gathered around it, have been the greatest obstacle to social advance in India for decades and for centuries.

SOCIAL ADVANCE.

This problem resolves itself into a consideration on the one hand of the facts and things of the actual world in which we live and on the other of that world of ideas which constitutes for us a realm of ideals with which we would like this world of things to conform, or in which we feel more satisfied and at peace. Now, I ask: What has Indian philosophy said concerning this world of things? Has it not said that it is 'mayam', illusion? It is a world of appearances, a world of finites as distinguished from the infinity of the ultimately real. Does this involve that there is a short path to the real and the infinite, from 'jivanatman' to 'paramatman', by the negation of this world of appearances? Is that a truly philosophical interpretation of the Indian standpoint? I venture to think that it is not. The ultimate is not described simply by 'neti, neti', but, in addition, by the twofold implication of the saying: 'Tat tvam asat.' The ultimately real does not shut out any of its appearances, but it must not be thought of as solely any one of them. And ought we not to seek the philosophical significance of that other term, 'iva'? Ought we not to try to see in the richness of the details of this world varied expressions of the joy of existence? It is thus that I would treat this problem. I would say that there is no short path to reality by the neglect of the things of this world. But I would say that in intellectual research in the various forms of art, in the diversity of social relationships, in fact in all that we may call culture and civilization, man is coming into a wider and more comprehensive contact with reality with the ideal, through these different forms of expression of itself.

Social advance in its widest sense, therefore, as I look upon it, is essentially bound up with the broaden-purely mechanical interpretation which makes Biology a branch of Chemistry, and Psychology a branch of Biology is not supported by the qualities of evolution.

The only philosophical explanation of variation is the assumption of creative power from which variations arise. Recent evidence in favour of transmission of acquired characters makes a special purpose; a constant spiritual background which is at once the creative crown and the striving power of the evolutionary march, is necessary. No theory, eastern or western, has up till now solved it.

There is enough work for the Philosophical Congress. What they wanted was not so much independent thought but independent thinkers, who, soaked in the spirit of the past, would face the problems of the future. In the combination of the old and the new lies the future progress of philosophy.

DAYARAM GIDUMAL SHAHANI

We take the following from the Sind Observer —

Dayaram Gidumal Shahani died at Bandra, a suburb of Bombay, on the 7th instant. He was about 72 years of age when he died. How many people of the present generation are familiar with his name? And yet he was a great and gifted son of India, a man of the highest character and unequalled humility, and one who atoned for a single error by long years of penitence and utter self-repression. Dayaram Gidumal was a Sindhi Amil born in Hyderabad, Sind, and belonged to one of the best families in that city. He lost his father while young and was brought up by his eldest brother Dewar Metharam Gidumal, who had no children and left a large property to Dayaram Gidumal.

Dayaram Gidumal joined the Hiphiston College in Bombay and passed the B. A. and LL. B. Examinations with distinction. He was a contemporary of the late Sir Narayan Chandavarkar and Mr. R. N. Mudholkar. He was a particular favourite of Principal Wordsworth who regularly corresponded with Dayaram after he had left the Bombay University. Dayaram Gidumal was appointed Registrar of the Dadar Court in Sind and held that appointment for a few years. In 1885 Sir James Ferguson, then Governor of Bombay, nominated Dayaram Gidumal to the Statutory Civil Service and he was appointed an Assistant Collector, but later on he was transferred to the Judicial branch of the service and became one of the ablest Judges in the Bombay Presidency.

I went to Karachi in 1884 and lived with Dayaram in his house as long as he was in Sind. For two or three years later he was transferred to the Presidency proper. Dayaram wrote for newspapers, he was the moving spirit of the Sind Sahba, a political body recently established at Karachi and he was mainly instrumental in founding a college in Sind. He was a Government servant, but that did not in any way interfere with his public activities. Nothing, however, could ever induce him to take the lead openly in any movement for his modesty and humility were part of his nature. About this time he was very intimate with B. M. Malabari, the editor of the Indian Spectator and a well-known social reformer. He wrote a life of Malabari and helped him in every undertaking.

Of his charitableness no one even knew the full extent; for he never allowed his left hand to know what his right gave away. We lived as brothers and yet it was impossible for me or any one else to know much about his charities. He was a man of the simplest habits and utterly unlike the well-to-do Amils of Hyderabad. His personal wants were very few and he was careless about his personal surroundings. The whole of his income which increased as he rose in the service, was given away in charity. Once an individual or an institution was on his list the promised amount was sent with unfailing regularity every month. Dayaram retained this habit as long as he was in the public service.

No one ever knew the substantial assistance that he gave to the Seva Sadan in Bombay and the sanatorium for consumptives at Dharampur in the Simla Hills. After the terrible Kangra earthquake Dayaram equipped a travelling dispensary at his own cost and distributed medicine, blankets and food freely in the distressed area, but very few people in the Punjab knew of the good that was being done almost by stealth. From his brother he had inherited a large property, but he never touched a pice of this income for his own use. Part of it was occasionally used for charitable purposes, but the entire property was maintained intact and Dayaram created trusts for the administration of various charities from the income of the estates, houses and lands bequeathed to him by his brother. From the day that he took up an appointment up to the end of his life he lived on a small part of his salary, and later on his pension.

The greater portion of Dayaram's service as a Government officer was spent out of Sind, though he was for a short time a judge and officiated as Judicial Commissioner in Sind. He should have been appointed a Judge of the Bombay High Court after the death of Mahadev Govind Ranade, but somehow his claims were overlooked. Later on, a Judgeship of the High Court was offered to him, but he declined it. He wrote to me that he was nearing the end of his service and it was then too late for him to go to the High Court. Meanwhile his silent and tireless philanthropic activities continued unabated and he gave away almost all his income in charity. I met him at Lahore, Agra, Allahabad, and Benares, and noticed a steady growth in his humility and unselfishness.

Then came the tragedy of his life. He had some children but spent most of his time away from his wife and children who lived at Hyderabad, Sind, while he was serving in different districts in the Bombay Presidency. Dayaram Gidumal was one of the ablest men in the presence of women and of a most retiring disposition. He was on very friendly terms with a Gujarati family, the head of which was also a statutory civilian and a judge like Dayaram Gidumal. There was a daughter in the family, accomplished and attractive, between whom and Dayaram grew up a friendship which ripened into love, and they were married in accordance with Anand rites. The young wife died in childbirth within a year of the marriage, but the child, a boy, survived.

For this second marriage in the life-time of his first wife Dayaram Gidumal was violently assailed in the vernacular Press in Bombay and Sind. He wrote a brief reply saying that he resounded everything with which he was associated and bowed to the condemnation of the public. From that day to the day of his death the world knew him no more and he passed the fifteen concluding years of his life in the strictest seclusion. He cut himself off entirely from his family at Hyderabad, refused absolutely to meet his numerous former friends, resigned all honorary offices which he had held, and spent all his time in study and religious meditation. He spent these last years in the eight and the morning of the sea, living quietly in a house on the seaside of Bandra, strolling about in the afternoons by the seashore. For ten years we were almost neighbours, but I spoke to him only once, though we had been on most intimate terms for many years.

If these last years were a tragedy it was a tragedy full of nobility, worthy of a man who was essentially great and whose like I have rarely met with, though I have seen many people in many provinces. Probably he was greatest in his self-imposed trial, his long vow of self-sacrifice, his unflinching determination to put aside everything that had attracted him. The few strangers who knew him slightly spoke of him as a saint and a holy man, and I lay my humble tribute at the shrine of his memory,

THE PAN-ASIATIC CONFERENCE.

We take the following extracts from the Rangoon Mail:—A fairly successful, though rather stormy series of conferences of the Pan-Asianic Congress were held at Nan-tao a suburb of Shanghai, from November 3rd to November 8th. Delegates were present from Japan, China, Korea, Afghanistan, Persia, India, Turkey and Siam. The first session warmed up on the question whether the delegates from Korea should be admitted, the question being raised by the Japanese. Mr. Ima-sato the leading Japanese delegate presided at the first day’s meeting. The Philippines and Indo-China were the only countries not represented. One of the outstanding figures in the Conference was Raja Mahendra Pratap an Indian revolutionary leader who came from Kabul to Tsingtao and then proceeded to Tsinan-fu, hoping to come across the country so as to avoid any possible interference from the British authorities. Turned back from the rail journey owing to the interruption of traffic incident to the civil war in China, he came back to Tsingtao, and boarded a Japanese steamer to Woosung, whence he was safely “smuggled” to Shanghai with the aid of a Japanese friend.

The dominant figures in the Conference were the Japanese. The leader of the delegation was trained in the School of the late Count Osuna whose lifetime slogan was “Asia for the Asiatics”.

In opening the session, Mr. Ima-sato referred to the national awakening of China. He said he admired China’s courage in throwing off the help of the Soviet and conducting its own revolution. He said there were certain nations which made it their business to oppress the Asiatic people and the attitude of the Asiatic people towards them should be one of lofty nobleness.

The question of racial equality was discussed at the first day’s session. This matter was brought up by the Japanese, who strongly protested against any racial discrimination.

The Japanese also brought up the question of the new British naval base at Singapore and the American naval base at Pearl Harbour. The Japanese stated that their position was that all such bases in the Pacific should be abolished if there was any intention on the part of Europe and America to live in amity with Asiatic peoples.

Proposals were made by the Chinese delegation that the Japanese delegates should try to influence the Japanese Government to discontinue encroachments in Manchuria and that senator Borah, Bertrand Russell and Leo Trotsky should be invited to become honorary members of the Conference.

The second session of the Conference proved to be a stormy one. The Chinese and Indian delegates led respectively by Hai Ying, who is connected with the Kiangnan Arsenal at Shanghai and Raja Mahendra Pratap, put it to the Japanese that if they were really in accord with the spirit of Pan-Asianism Japan should set an example for the foreign powers, and clear their troops out of Manchuria and should also generally adopt a more conciliatory attitude towards the Chinese. The ensuing uproar almost broke up the Conference.

The final session of the Conference held on November 9th proved most harmonious. It was decided that the 1928 Conference should be held in Kabul, Afghanistan. The following resolutions were passed at the final session:

(1) The Conference accepts the principle that oppression in any and every form is wrong. Individuals and groups should have complete freedom to better themselves and serve humanity.

(2) With a view to serve humanity, the conference recommends that Asia, the cradle of religions, should send out religious missions to Europe, America, Africa, Australia and other countries to convert the people.

(3) The conference recommends unity among Asiatic nations so that they by mutual co-operation may defend themselves against Imperial aggressions.

(4) With a view to better the condition of Asiatic nations the conference recommends better commercial relations among the different nations of Asia and as a first step toward that end, it shall approach men of business and shall persuade them to open import and export firms in Tokyo, Peking, Hankow, Kabul, Tehran, Angora and other places for purely Asiatic trade.

(5) To promote unity among the Asiatic nations the conference proposes to start an All Asia Educational Centre, (a) to teach Asiatic languages, (b) to impart higher technical education, (c) to give military training.

(6) The conference insists that the Committee of the Asiatic Association should establish a permanent headquarters of its own and to attain this end, a Committee should be formed to collect funds and to buy or build within one year a suitable building worthy of the cause.

(7) A permanent committee of the Asiatic Association should come into touch with all progressive movements in Asia and establish intimate relations with them.

The Asiatic Association should immediately start a weekly newspaper of its own, preferably in English or a page each in Chinese, Japanese, Urdu, Hindi, Persian, Turkish, Arabian, and English.

(9) The Conference accepts the principle that the regeneration of Asia is unthinkable without the salvation of China. The conference therefore recommends that (a) important military units clear respective grounds of all rascial elements (b) important centres of administration send their representatives to meet at a designated place to conduct the foreign policy of China as a whole and try to build up civil institutions in the country. They should demand immediate suppression of extra territorial rights, the complete control of the customs and the abolition of settlements.

(10) The conference realizes that situation in China cannot be improved without sincere co-operation of Japan and sympathy of Red Russia and America, therefore proposes that a committee be formed to secure co-operation with Japan and secure the sympathy of Russia and America.

1927] THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER 185

THE CHILD-MARRIAGE BILL

An Orthodox View.

The following is the substance of a lecture delivered by Brahmat T. S. Natesa Sastri at a public meeting held at Sri Viswanathaswami Temple Mantapam, Mayavaram, on the 15th November, 1927, under the auspices of the local Brahmana Samajam and presided over by M. R. N. Subrahmanya Aiyar, M.A., retired Dewan-Pesikar and editor, 'The Indian Thinker, Trivandrum.

This Bill is now before the Imperial Legislative Assembly. The object of this Bill is that in India the marriage of girls below the age of 12 and that of boys below 15 should be treated as penal. In India the probable age of maturity for girls is between 12 and 14.

The vast majority of Hindu girls other than Brahmins are given in marriage after puberty without any objection. Of the 8 forms of marriage prescribed in Smritis, Brahms and Prajapatyas are the only two suiting to Brahmins. As per these marriage forms, the Brahmin girls should be given in marriage before puberty. It is the 'firm conviction of Brahmins that 'Sruti (Veda) is the divine revelation and Smriti (Dharmasrastra) is the purport of the Veda. If the said Bill is passed into law it will mainly affect the Brahmins who, forming but a microscopic minority of 8% of the entire population, are entitled to special protection.

The vast majority among them are yet ignorant of this Bill. Neither the Brahmin nor the other members of the Assembly have informed the people of the different provinces they represent, of this Bill nor expressed its constituents' opinion on it in the Assembly. They have given their individual opinions only. Of course, the vast majority of Hindus other than Brahmins, and other religions are not going to object to this Bill in the least.

Is it proper to think that a resolution passed in Madras, at a meeting headed by the wife of a retired High Court Judge Sir T. Sadasivayal, an avowed Buddhist, Mrs. Cousins, some native Christian females, some non-Brahmin Hindu females and a few non-Brahmin females, the wives of some Brahmins who live in Madras for eking out their livelihood, as the resolution of all the orthodox Brahmins and others? Hindus affected by these Bills? As aforesaid, this Bill is likely to affect 'the Brahmin community and it ought to be decided by orthodox Brahmins and their wives. Others have not the least right to interfere in this matter. The Brahmin females in other parts of India have not yet attained such a state of so called civilization as to hold public meetings in different parts and to communicate their opinion to the Assembly. May God forbid it!

Mr. Haribas Sarda who has introduced this Bill says that according to Manus, a girl should not be married till 3 years after the age of puberty, that hence marriage should not take place before the age of sixteen and that his Bill was not opposed to any religious doctrine. It is a pity indeed that a few Brahmins who pose as our representatives have neither knowledge of Dharmasastras nor the moral courage to repudiate Mr. Sarda's statements in the proper manner. Mr. Sarda evidently quotes Manus, Chapter IX, verse 90 which he translates as: 'A girl who has attained puberty should wait for 9 years. After that she shall take a husband.' But his interpretation is faulty. As for Smriti verses they should be construed, according to context and in consonance with the previous and following verses and according to recognized commentaries.

Else, wrong meaning will be the result. "The proper interpretation of the above verse is: 'If a girl, not given in marriage by parents before puberty, matures, she should wait for 9 years expecting to be given in marriage. If she be 'not given' in marriage within that time, she shall after 9 years herself choose a husband, but befitting her caste, rank etc. 'The reasons put forward for the introduction of this Bill are that, according to census reports, there are widows below 12 years of age and some ignorant people give in marriage daughters even one year old and that, in other countries it is the law that the marriageable age for girls and boys are 16 and 18 respectively and that in India where there is no scope for the remarriage of widows, widowhood at least below the age of 12 may be averted. Mr. Sarda says that the minimum age for girls should be 11 and for boys 18, i.e. the age of discretion and that the marriage of infants is a recent introduction and has not foundation in Sasthras. He adds that if this evil were not eradicated, the coming generation would not have sufficient strength to fight for Swaraj.

With regard to the age of boys there are not many to object. But, it is the bounden duty of every rational being to consider deeply the marriageable age of girls.
It is anti-Sastric to give the girls in marriage below the age of 8 according to Manus and 'Parasara. On grounds of health, it is advisable to postpone it even up to the 10th year. But if there are people who would not be led by any considerations and have no faith in Sruti and Smriti they are Vratyas (out castes). They are welcome, by all means, to exclude themselves from the Brahmin community rather than remain within its fold and create a bad name to the rest. Those that do have faith in Sruti and Smriti are bound to act up to their dictates and it is their imperative duty to give girls in marriage between 10 and 15 i.e. before puberty.
If after this period, a girl happens by chance to become widowed, it should be borne patiently as the result of past Karma. Are not many other mishaps so borne?

This Bill is not the only fortune that favours the Brahmins! While Mr. Sarda wants a regulation that girls should not be married below 12, Dr. Hari Singh Gour has brought out an 'Age of Consent Bill.' He wants a regulation that a girl should not be allowed to cohabit with her wedded husband before her 16th year or at least the 14th year, if taking a lot of trouble with regard to it. The reason for the introduction of this Bill evidently is that if girls have sexual intercourse with males soon after puberty, weaklings will be born and that on the otherhand if they have the intercourse after 16, strong and healthy children will be the result and, that away will come all the sooner. Orthodox Brahmins only desire to beget good and pious sons who will succour their own selves, their ten ancestors and ten descendants—that is, 51 generations in all—by marrying girls born in unblemished families and that before puberty. Brahmins are quite content with the physical strength needed for performing their Vedic religious duties.

There is another aspect which also deserves consideration. Think for a moment of the difficulties which the parent of a post-puberty girl will have to undergo by keeping his daughters in his house for 4 years from 13 to 16 if the Bill of Dr. Gour be passed into law. We hope Dr. Gour will be satisfied with a legislation for such persons as think with him and wish to have his reforms. May be not include all Brahmins in his Bill is our prayer.

If the Government are pleased to think that this small population of orthodox Brahmins in India forms an important portion of their subjects deserving sympathetic treatment, we pray that they may not entertain such Bills in the Assembly or Councils. From time immemorial this community has been under the patronage of the Indian Rajas and has done immense good in its own way to the world at large. We the Swa-tana dharmsists expect the same patronage to be continued to us by the present British rulers also.

The Child-marriage Bill was taken up in Simla on 15—9—27 and it is now left to the consideration of the select committee. It will take about 3 months to take it again for discussion. The enlightened gentlemen of the different parts of India are requested to hold meetings and to instruct the people in plain words that it is imperative for Brahmins to marry their daughters between 10 and 12 (before puberty)as per Sastra and that other Hindus may if they please marry their daughters after 12 without any prejudice to their existing customs and to memorialize the Viceroy to absolutely veto the Child-marriage Bill and the Age of Consent Bill now pending in the Imperial Legislative Assembly.

The following resolutions among others were passed at this meeting—(1) This meeting is strongly of opinion that social evils, which, though sometimes found associated with socio-religious institutions, are by no means inherent in them, but are the results of the unhealthy enviroring conditions which have to be corrected; and therefore strongly disapproves the attempts of short-sighted reformers to bring in the strong arm of the law such as the Child-marriage Bill, the Age of Consent Bill etc., to correct its social evils by altering the systems themselves and approximating them more and more to western institutions as they are not only unsound but mischievous and respectfully point out that they should not receive any encouragement from His Majesty's Government, pledged as they are to religious neutrality in respect of its Indian subjects. (2) This meeting prays that His Majesty's Government may be pleased to initiate the necessary steps for curing the conditions above referred to and make the institutions yield unmixed good results as in the past.

MYSORE WOMEN'S CONFERENCE.

The Mysore Women's Educational Conference was held on the 13th and 14th December when Mrs. Mirza Isamill presided.
The pumping line was arrested by a depressant and revived by a stimulant. A spasm like that in the human heart occurred under a sudden electric shock. Still more startling was an exhibition of the desperate struggle for life made by a pulsating leaflet of a desmodium plant. It succumbed to an overdose of chloroform. The plant was brought near death under the action of one poison, but was revived by the action of another which acted like an antidote. Sir Jagadis next demonstrated on the animal heart the characteristic effects of several Indian drugs. His cardiograph faithfully inscribed in luminous script the characteristic phases of the heart beat, its variations visible to the whole audience. Under a depressant the pulse beat became feebler and feebler till it almost died away. The extraordinary potency of a new drug was seen in the revival of the pulsations the dying animal being finally brought back to life. The efficacy of some of these plant extracts is far greater than many now in use. Prolonged investigation now in progress will undoubtedly lead to the discovery of a new pharmacopoeia for the relief of human suffering and for a vast industry for the utilisation of indigenous plants for a purposes of medicine.

NOTES

The late Hakim Ajmal Khan: Close on the heels of the acceptance of the communal pact by the Congress comes the death of one who was eminently fitted to strengthen that slender bond and establish a perfect understanding between the two communities. Hakim Ajmal Khan died suddenly at Rampur at two o'clock in the morning on Thursday last. He was talking to the Nawab Sahib till that hour and on retiring felt slightly uneasy and called for a doctor and a glass of warm water. Before either of these could be brought to him he succumbed, it is believed, to an attack of the heart. Hakim Ajmal Khan was a master of Persian and Arabic and his education comprised all the branches of Islamic learning. His knowledge of medicine he owed to his father and his older brothers and he very early enjoyed a reputation which surpassed that of his predecessors. It was in Ajmal Khan's time that the Tihhiyati attained world wide fame. In 1919, when Sir P. S. Srivastava Iyengar was Ambassador to London and on his return he realised the importance of the Hindustani Muslims and set himself earnestly to the task of bringing the two communities together. He did not, however, take active part in politics until 1919 when the Punjab massacres had done their work by Dr. Ansari to whom the loss will be very great as it will be to every one who has had the privilege of knowing the man who placed his country before everything else.

Liberals and the Boycott: Perhaps the most remarkable feature of the movement for the boycott of the Royal Commission on Indian reforms is the uncompromising attitude of the Liberal Party on the question of the exclusion of Indians from the Simon Commission. The All India Liberal Federation which met in Bombay passed a resolution declaring its strong opinion that the official announcement made about the constitution of the Statutory Commission and the functions of the Committees of the Indian Legislatures is unacceptable "as it flagrantly denies the right of the Indian people to participate on equal terms in framing the future constitution of the country, and that the legislatures and Indians thought the country should have nothing to do with the Commission at any stage or in any form." While the resolution leaves room for no doubt as to the attitude of the Liberal Party—which seems as hostile as that of the Congress—the speeches made by prominent members of the party in support of the resolution create just the opposite impression. There seems to be very great anxiety on the part of the speakers to make it clear that the boycott proposed will be something quite different from that proposed by the Congress. Sir P. S. Srivastvany Iyengar who moved the resolution said that he wished to remove any misconception that might prevail regarding the sort of boycott which the Liberals intended to practise. It was something quite different from that which the N. C. O.'s projected. The Liberals had never preached non-co-operation with the Government, and they did not propose now to boycott the Councils, the educational institutions, and the courts. They were fully aware of the futility of such non-co-operation, and the consequences which had followed upon such non-co-operation had fully justified the Liberal creed. All that the Liberals intended was that they would not co-operate with the Simon Commission, and it was difficult for him to see what possible disaster could happen if they boycott the Commission.

Purpose of Boycott: Sir Moropant Joshi was anxious to meet the charge that the Liberals had abandoned their traditions for the weapons of Non-Cooperation and had adopted the policy of the country that all that they intended to do at present was to show the intensity of their feeling against the Commission and let everyone know how far they were prepared to go to obtain some compromise from Britain. It reminds one of Bottom's anxiety to roar as fiercely as a lion and as gently as a nightingale. On the other hand, the manifesto issued by the party is frankly hostile without any reservations whatsoever. It states that the Party have given their closest consideration to the scheme of Committees of the Central Legislatures but have come to the conclusion that there can be no substitute for the direct recognition of India's claim in the framing of a constitution. Concluding, the manifesto states: "In short, in the opinion of the Liberal Party, the Statutory Commission fails to satisfy the test of a properly constituted Commission with an adequate Indian representation, nor does it amount to a sound Liberal Constitution as a bold and emphatic assertion of the right of Parliament not only as the final authority to pass a Constitution for India but also to adopt an exclusively British Agency for exploring the avenues of progress and it is at the same time the negation of India's claim that it should have an effective part in the determination of her Constitution. In these circumstances and for these reasons the Liberal Party have come to the conclusion that they should have nothing to do with the Commission at any stage, to any extent and in any form.

The Muslim League Split: A most curious situation has arisen in the Muslim League by the split on the issues of the boycott of the Simon Commission. It will be remembered that Sir Mahomed Shafl was elected President of this year's session of the Muslim League and that he waived his claim to the chair in deference to the suggestion that His Highness the Aga Khan should guide the deliberations of the League when the momentous question of the Reform Commission would be discussed. Sir Mahomed Shafl was formally re-elected President when His Highness declined the offer, but the venue of the League was changed from Lahore to Calcutta. Sir Mahomed Shafl, however, refused to accept the change of venue on the ground that once he had been elected President, the League could not go back on its decision. Evidently Sir Mahomed Shafl who is a staunch supporter of the Simon Commission has not expected sufficient support for his views at Calcutta and that the Muslims assembling at Calcutta have strong objection to meeting at Lahore. It is clear, therefore, that the split has resulted from a difference of opinion among the Muslim leaders on the question of the boycott of the Commission. Under the circumstances, the suggestion of Maulvi Mahomed Yakub, the President of the Assembly, and others that the question of boycott of the Commission should not be discussed at either session and that a special session of the League should be convened at Delhi for the purpose stated is absurd. At a time when post-pounding decision on an important issue, it is difficult to understand how two sections holding diametrically opposite views can agree upon a common line of action some time later when they cannot meet on a common platform now.

Village Libraries: Among the numerous conferences that were held in Madras during Congress week, was the All India Libraries Conference. A considerable portion of the presidential address was devoted to the organisation of libraries and the extent to which the State assistance for their maintenance should be given. Two important aspects of the question seemed to have been lost sight of, namely, the importance of village libraries as a means of enabling boys in the villages not to forget, and in some cases to improve, the little education they have received in the village school and the very vital part that the library plays in University education. In fact it would be very useful if the State, besides providing well equipped libraries for the villages, were to make some provision for circulating the latest books in the villages so as to maintain that contact between the school and the village which is sorely lacking at present. This isolation is to a great extent responsible for the reluctance shown by young men to work in the rural tracts for the uplift of the masses. While it is true that the task of spreading education must be undertaken at some sacrifice inspired by a strong desire for the progress of the country, it does not necessarily follow that no attempts should be made to reduce the element of sacrifice that minimum. On the other hand, the importance of libraries in University education cannot be exaggerated. Both the student and the teacher are entirely dependent on the library and it may be said that a good and well-equipped library makes a good teacher as much as good pupil. A well-equipped library will enable scholars to keep in touch with the greatest teachers and the centres of civilization of the world. It is a regrettable fact that the library does not play as an important a part as it should in University education in India. This is due to a rather rigid course of studies and the tendency of the professor to confine himself too severely to the text book prescribed and even discourage students to read widely or a subject in order to drill them for the examination which looms large at the end of the academic year.

The Social Conference: The following is a brief resume of the measures adopted at the Social Conference. The Conference passed resolutions relating to marriage reform, the status of women and social inequities based on sex. The Conference favoured the raising of the minimum marriageable age for boys and girls to 21 and 16 respectively, supported the legislation for marriage reform now on the anvil as long as such a large section of the country as Punjab, and strongly condemned the indignities forced on Hindu widows. The Conference expressed the opinion that the purdah system is prejudicial to the healthy development of women and urged its discontinuance. The speakers expressed the need for a free and a fuller life to women of the country, and pleaded for public support. Mrs. Janaki Bai Bhat of the Poona Seva Sadan urged the necessity for the extension of educational facilities to women in increasing measure, while Mrs. Chattopadhyaya deplored the denial of equal opportunities and rights for women. The Social Conference, on the motion of Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, passed a resolution supporting Dr. Mathulakshmi S's Bill for social, moral, and economic emancipation of the Davadasis. Mrs. Naidu deplored the evil consequences of the Davadasi system, and pleaded for an enlightened public opinion to refuse to countenance such social customs.

Dr. Ansari on Untouchability: Dr. Ansari, President-elect of the 42nd Indian National Congress, in the course of his reply to the address of welcome presented to him by the Corporation of Madras, observes:—

"Your Presidency has always been renowned for its intellectual acumen, its advance in philosophy, religion and art. To-day in every sphere of human activity you are in the forefront of Indian thought. It is too early to predict the judgment historians will accord regarding contemporary personalities, but I would venture to predict that whatever credit would attach to the value of work done by men of the present generation, Madras would take a preponderating share of credit for its illustrious sons. Whilst all is said to your credit, you would pardon me if I reminded you of the skeleton in your cupboard—I mean the question of the Untouchables. So long as this question remains unsolved, so long such a large section of the people amongst you do not get their social and civic disabilities removed and are treated as something different from you, as below the scale of humanity, all your intellectual, political and civic advancements would count for nothing, and we as a people would be treated as outcasts by all the nations of the world. I would, therefore, humbly beg of you to remove this blot from your record and do something different from us, as below the scale of humanity, all your intellectual, political and civic advancements would count for nothing, and we as a people would be treated as outcasts by all the nations of the world. I would, therefore, humbly beg of you to remove this blot from your fair name without undue delay."

This appeal, coming as it does, from such an ardent supporter of social reform and a champion of India's liberty as Dr. Ansari, we hope, will have great effect in impressing into the minds of the people the immediate necessity of removing this evil.
INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, DECEMBER 31, 1927.

A STEP FORWARD.

A great deal was expected from the deliberations at the 42nd session of the Indian National Congress and much has been achieved. The Madras session opened under a two-fold cloud—that of communal discord and the relations between India and Britain which have been severely tried by the latest decision of Parliament resulting in the appointment of the Simon Commission. Dr. Ansari and his colleagues set themselves a very difficult task, indeed, when they resolved to endeavour to find a basis of settlement of the differences between the two great communities in the country. Recent events have shown how very essential such a settlement is to the progress of the country and that it should have been the principal item on the agenda is a clear indication that its importance is recognized by the leaders of both the communities. Although the actual terms of the agreement are not clearly defined and, on the admission of those who have agreed to abide by it, it is final, the settlement provides on broad lines a working basis for establishing goodwill between Hindus and Moslems. The leaders of both communities have shown a real desire to promote such goodwill and the resultant agreement will be welcomed throughout the country as a step forward.

It would be idle to claim, however, that the settlement even if it is accepted by the Muslim League will straightway solve the communal problem. The stone has been set rolling uphill and it is only by the concerted and unslated effort of the nation as a whole that it can be poised securely on the top. It is our firm conviction that a perfect understanding between the two communities can only be established by close co-operation in the solution of the numerous social problems with which they are faced. The emancipation of Muslim women and the education of Muslim youths, so as to enable them to contribute towards the political and social progress of the nation, should be a real desire to the hearts of Hindu leaders as those with which they are faced within their own community and vice versa. It must be admitted that in the initial stages such advances will be looked upon with distrust but it will not be long before it is realised that they are well meant. Nothing can bring man and man together more than working at a common task and this is equally true of communities. If Indian nationalism is to attain its full stature it must be from a realisation of this fact. Lord Birkenhead's statement in the House of Lords may have contributed in some degree towards bringing the two communities together, but no lasting unity can be established on so insecure a foundation. It is only by the closest contact that Muslims can accept joint electorates and Hindus welcome the separation of Sind and the extension of reforms to the North West Frontier Province without misgivings.

The relations between India and Britain were dealt with in two resolutions. The first is the resolution for the boycott of the Royal Commission on Indian Reforms which was a foregone conclusion. The other was a resolution moved by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru declaring the goal of the Indian people to be independence with full control over defence and the forces of the country, the financial and economic policy and relations with foreign countries and demanding that this right of the people of India should be forthwith recognised and given effect to, in particular by the complete withdrawal of the "allied in the Act of Co-operation." The resolution thus seems to imply a change in the Congress creed and was objected to by the leader, but Pandit Jawaharlal explained that as even a Dominion had the right to abstain from a war that Britain was wasting for the sake of that same Dominion states in the resolution. The resolution taken by itself is futile while the explanation makes it superfluous, as it does not imply anything more than what is embodied in the Congress creed. It is not surprising, therefore, that experienced politicians like Dr. B. R. Ambedkar, Mr. C. V. Raman and K. J. Venkata Charylu, Babu Rajendra Prasad, and Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya opposed the motion as being quite uncalled for.

Ultimately an amendment defining the goal of the Indian people as complete national independence was passed but it has served to confuse rather than clarify the mind on the issue, for some speakers seemed to think, despite assurances to the contrary, that the resolution was a departure from the Congress creed.

An indication of the true attitude of leading Congressmen on the issue is to be found in the draft Swaraj constitutions which were submitted to the Congress for adoption as the basis of the national demand. In all the three draft constitutions by Mr. Srinivasa Iyengar, Mr. Rangaswamy Iyengar and Mr. C. V. Raman and K. J. Venkat Charylu it is clearly laid down that the proposed Swaraj constitution is within the British Empire. In Mr. C. V. Raman and K. J. Venkat Charylu's draft he states that the King will exercise the power of veto as existing between the King and Parliament in the Dominions. It seems, however, that the Committee appointed to examine the draft constitutions will, if Mr. Jawaharlal's resolution has any meaning, go beyond the Congress creed in search for a Swaraj Constitution.

THE INDIAN NATIONAL SOCIAL CONFERENCE.

The following is the full text of the presidential address delivered by Mr. K. Natarajan at the 40th Indian National Social Conference held at Madras on the 27th and 28th December.

FOURTY YEARS OF SOCIAL REFORM.

It is not easy for me to find words to thank you for your great kindness in calling to preside over the National Social Conference in Madras. Thirty-five years ago as a young man I became associated in this city with a band of earnest and enthusiastic men who had taken up the cause of social reform. Many of them are no more: the names of A. Subba Rao and G. Subrahmanya Iyer, G. Parameswaran Pillai, S. Bonamadaram Pillai, B. Vardharsi, H. Narayana Rao and Venkatesham Pantulu come prominently to mind. Among those who are happily still with us, K. Subba Rao is Minister in Dewas State. Others some of whom I am glad to see here are C. B. Rama Rao, O. Kandaswami, Rameswaran Sivan, Sir Venkataratnam Naidu, and Professor Lokshahal Nares. Sir Sachar Nair, though generally preferring to remain is the background was a tower of strength, and so was N. Subrahmanyan who, notwithstanding that he was a Christian, retained to the full his solicitude for the well-being of the parent community. You will see from this list that we were a very mixed lot. Brahmins and non-Brahmins worked together like brothers inspired by a single zeal for social reform. I venture to think that if the lines of our work had been followed, Madras politics would have had a different and more harmonious history. We were perhaps much too ahead of our time. I do not want to touch upon politics, but it is my honest opinion that even now the only solution for communal difficulties is to concentrate upon social reform. The subject which most engaged our attention then was naturally the education of women, for it is the master-key which unlocks all the doors of progress. I well remember A. Subba Rao, spending his Saturdays and Sundays in arranging for lectures and social gatherings for women, and himself going from door to door persuading parents, husbands and friends to allow the women members of their family to attend them. The seed soon then has borne splendid fruit, and Madras to-day is taking the first place in India in the Women's Movement under the energetic leadership of ladies like Dr. Matulalakhmi Reddy, whom I regard it as a high privilege, to have as the Chairman of our Reception Committee of this Conference.

FOURTEEN YEARS AGO AND NOW.

A rapid sketch of the position of social reform as it was fourteen years ago and now, is not inappropriate on this occasion. For many years Dewas Bahadur Ragoonath Rao had been most devotedly publishing pamphlets and tracts showing that the remarriage of widows was in strict accordance with the Shastras. In a Rajahmundry Veereesingam Pantulu was energetically carrying on a campaign in the same cause. His powerful writings besides advocating the cause of remarriage on rational grounds created modern Teluga Literata. The National Social Conference which was started in 1887 was waverling between the Shastric and the rational methods. The new social reform party in Madras whose views found expression through the Indian Social Reformer started in 1890, threw its whole weight on the side of the rational method. It further insisted on action in pursuance of the reforms advocated. It gave dinners to remarried parties and strongly criticised those reformers who hesitated to mix with practical reformers on social occasions. Later at the instance chiefly of the late Mr. H. Narayan Rao he held monthly inter-caste dinners, called Saha Pankti Sudharak Bhejanam, at which men of all castes sat together at meals. The new party further made total abstinence from drink an integral part of social reform. It inaugurated the anti-waste movement and strongly condemned the institution of Devadasis. It further insisted on purity of private life in men who aspired to high public positions in official or non-official life. In fact, the new party laid stress in its programme so strongly on social purity questions that for so many years it was often contemptuously stigmatised as the puritan party by persons who did not understand that social freedom was in compatible with social license. The social reform party was to a large extent obliged to take so strong an attitude on total abstinence and social purity owing to the fact that social reform had come to be the interpreted at the time as being nothing but freedom to eat and drink whatever one liked and also to a certain extent as being associated with laxity in private life. In my early days in Bombay, I happened to call on the late Mr. Ranade when there was a well-known Parsi gentleman in his company. As we were discussing social reform the Parsi friend interrupted with the question, "Well, Mr. Ranade, what is this social reform of yours except eating meat and gallivanting with women?" The latest biographer of Mr. Ranade, Mr. Kellog, in his admirable book, remarks that Ranade had no sense of humour, but Ranade's reply to the Parsi gentleman showed that he had a very shrewd wit. He told the Parsi gentleman with a twinkle in his sound eye that the items he mentioned were not on the programme of social reform! I mention this incident to show that even ten years after our purity propaganda was started as a sort of chartered libertinism. Our movement has now outlived this reputation. We are neither libertinism nor puritans in the narrow sense of being against everything that meets the aesthetic needs of our nature. But we do hold that no one has a right to any enjoyment at the expense of another human being.

METHOD OF SOCIAL REFORM.

In our attempts to give practical effect to social reform the method we have followed has been one not of rebellion but of peaceful and friendly persuasion. When it was a question of suffering we have preferred to suffer ourselves rather than inflict suffering on others. When we have been obliged to differ from our orthodox kith and kin we have done so with regret and with the greatest consideration for their feelings. And I venture to think that our orthodox people recognise now that in pleading for the introduction of social reforms we have not been actuated by a love of mere innovation much less by a desire for self-indulgence but with the object of conserving all that is good—and there is much that is good—in our ancient system. A state which is without the means of change, said Edmund Burke, is without the means of preserving itself. This is true of society as of the state which in fact is but society in its political aspect.

Has this method, it may be asked, and it has been asked, met with any measure of success? My emphatic answer is that it not only has met with a fair measure of success but that no other method that has been tried has met with an equal amount of success. And I will briefly show that this opinion is fully justified. Social reform in India, it must be remembered, has so far been largely concerned with the removal of restrictions and disabilities. For instance, the prohibition of sea-voyage was one of the most burning questions thirty years ago. Other similar prohibitions against which social reformers had to wage war were the prohibition of marriage of widows, the prohibition of keeping a girl unmarried after the age of puberty and the prohibition of inter-marriage and inter-dining among the different castes and sects. The attempts of social reformers to have these prohibitions removed or relaxed met with furious resistance from orthodox and pseudo-orthodox people thirty years ago. Today the opposition has practically died out. Sea-voyage has ceased to be regarded as anything sinful and every year scores of young men and women, students, businessmen, pleasure-seekers, and politicians, go to distant lands and on their return experience little or no difficulty in resuming their old place in their caste or community. The number of such people would be far greater but for the prohibitive cost of foreign travel. Similarly there are hundreds of unmarried Hindu girls past the age of puberty who are pursuing their studies in our schools and colleges and this fact excites very little adverse comment from the community. Here again the number would be many times greater if there were a sufficient number of institutions in the country for imparting education to girls. Then let us take widow remarriage. The number of widows who remarry is no doubt very small, but the point is that the opposition to remarriage has become greatly reduced and the old orthodox idea that a Hindu widow commits a great sin by remarrying has become largely discredited. If there is not a larger number of widow remarriages it is because the competition for suitable bridegrooms is so severe in the case of unmarried girls as to create an actual market for them. It must also be remembered that even in countries where remarriage of widows is freely allowed only a small percentage of them remarry. While on this point I am glad to note that the late Sir Ganga Ram's trustees have opened a branch in Madras for popularising remarriages. I had recently a letter from the gentleman in charge of the operations of the Madras Branch stating that within the short time that he has been working he has been able to get a good number of widows and men willing to marry them on his register. There are still some people who think, or at least who speak as if they think, that social reformers wish to compel all widows to get married. Nothing can be more absurdly untrue. Not only do we not wish to compel widows to remarry, but we hold that marriage should not be obligatory upon anybody. The days are past when marriage was considered the only suitable career for a woman. We want women to have the fullest scope and the fullest opportunity for developing and using their talents for their own benefit as well as that of society. The increasing field for educated and public-spirited women for social service will require that an increasing number of young women of talent and ability should remain single, because, when all is said, it is only a few exceptional women who can fulfil with equal efficiency the duties of the mother of a family and of, for instance, a teacher in a high school or a doctor in charge of a hospital.

Women's Pauans.

In the matter of the education of women the progress made during the last thirty years has been little short of marvellous, and nowhere more so than in this Presidency. You have now in Madras City two great Women's Colleges, attended by about 'four' hundred students drawn from all castes and communities; the number of girls attending high schools and primary schools has also largely increased, and it is a remarkable fact that while, during and since the war, there has been, owing to the economic stress resulting from high prices and increased school and college fees, some retardation in the advance of men's education these causes have, for the most part, had little effect in checking the steady growth, both numerically and otherwise, of the education of girls. I must not omit to refer here to the Women's University at Higga Bodrak which owes its existence almost entirely to the self-sacrificing zeal of Professor Karre, whose services to the women's cause in India will always be gratefully remembered by social reformers all over the country. Personally, I hold that, in the present circumstances of our country, when a sort of tradition has been set up that intellectual inferiority has held sway for so many centuries, it is necessary, at least till that tradition is wholly destroyed, to make no distinction in the courses of study especially in the higher education open to men and women. I have, therefore, been all along rather sceptical in my appreciation of the idea of a separate University with an altogether different curriculum of studies for women. But I have always acknowledged that every method and every system which promises to bring the benefits of education of some kind to girls and women who would otherwise go without them, is to be welcomed; and from that point of view the Women's University is a very valuable and interesting experiment. Side by side with the progress of Indian women in education, institutions for training them in social service have increased, the most notable of them being the Bombay Svra Sadan, founded by the late Mr. Malabar and Mr. Dayaram Gidmul who died only a few days ago; and the Puoma Svra Sadan which owes its existence to the practical genius of the late Mrs. Ramabai, who was fortunate in securing the collaboration of our friend, Mr. G. K. Devadhar, the President of the Servants of India Society. After Mrs. Ramsah's death, the whole responsibility for carrying on this great and most admirable institution has devolved on Mr. Devadhar, and I need hardly say that it could not have devolved on more worthy and capacious shoulders. This is the proper place, I think, to refer to the great contribution of Mahatma Gandhi...
to our public life. He has by precept and example shown that women have an equal place with men in all departments of the public life of our country, and it is due to him and Mr. Devadah, who is an equally enthusiastic apostle of this great principle, that we at the present day have a large number of trained women social workers in Western India. In Southern India two names stand out in my mind in the same category, those of the venerable Dr. Bassen and of Sir T. Sadasiva Aiyar whose recent death has deprived social workers in this part of the country of a leader of great intellectual eminence, strong convictions, and a high public and private character. Some ten years ago, I was in Madras for a day or two, and my friends here got up a meeting which I was called upon to address. In my remarks on that occasion, I gave expression to a fixed conviction of mine, namely, that the only means of maintaining a high standard of public life is to take our women with us in whatever we may attempt. This thought seemed to appeal to Sir Sadasiva Aiyar who was good enough to be present on the occasion and when I sat down he told me that that was also his own opinion.

MARRIAGE LEGISLATION,

It is not my purpose to give an exhaustive summary of the progress made in the social reform relating to the uplift of women. I should, however, call your attention to the fact which is attested by the census statistics that the age of marriage of girls has been steadily rising in many parts of the country. We should like very much to see it increase more rapidly, and I regard it as one of the most hopeful features of the present times that no less than three Bills have been introduced by non-official Indian members in the Central and in the Bombay and Madras provincial legislatures for preventing child-marriages by fixing a minimum marriage age both for boys and girls. Legislation for this purpose has received the strong support of several women's conferences during the last few months, and what is more significant is the general consent of the great change that has come over public opinion that it has received the support of even such an orthodox and conservative community of the Hindus, namely, the Marwaris. I would call special attention to the reply sent to the Government of Bombay by the Bombay Marwari Chamber of Commerce fully supporting the prevention of child marriages by law.

ESSENTIALS OF A MARRIAGE LAW.

I do not wish to go into details, but I may express my personal feeling that it is the duty of Government in view of the remarkable consensus of opinion to bring in an all-India bill fixing a marriage limit which should apply to all communities. Child-marriages are not confined to Hindus. They are common among Indian Musselmans and Christians though to a less extent than among Hindus. The evils of child-marriages are the same among all castes and communities. I am also of opinion that there should be a provision in the bill for associating monogamy as an integral part of the Indian marriage system. I may point out that every marriage law passed by the Indian legislatures, has, with a single exception, included monogamy as an essential incident of every statutory marriage. An exception was made in the case of the Anand Marriage Act on the plea that it simply removed doubts regarding the validity of marriages in the Punjab under the old Sikh custom. I do not think this is a valid reason for departing from what has been the normal rule of Indian legislation. A custom is a fluid thing whereas the special merit of a law is its uniformity, which admits of no exceptions. I think, therefore, that we must revert to the practice of introducing or at least facilitating the introduction of the monogamous principle in every marriage law that receives the sanction of the legislature.

The evils and hardships of polygamy are moral while those of child-marriage are physical, and therefore, more obvious to superficial observation. But let us not forget that moral suffering is far more exasperating than physical pain, and that the young wife who finds herself supplanted by a junior partner for no fault of her own feels her lot much more unbearable than if she had been a victim of the custom of enforced widowhood. If you educate your girls and postpone their marriage till they come to years of discretion, it is impossible to expect them to feel happy under the conditions which were tolerable to their mothers and grandmothers. This is a fact which many of us do not seem adequately to realise. There are too many cases of unhappiness due to the failure to realise the mental and moral revolution created in a girl's mind by education. Even apart from education our women are becoming more sensitive to conditions which were accepted as normal twenty or thirty years ago. It was the martyrdom of Phulmanide, first awakened our social conscience to the iniquitous possibilities of child-marriage. It was another Bengali girl, Suchala, who by her self-immolation proclaimed to India and to the world the revolt of Hindu womanhood against the practice, which has become a gross abuse in many parts of the country, of the purchase of brides and bridegrooms. There have been cases of young wives being deserted and abandoned by their husbands who have married again though the deserted wife had to live a life which is worse than that of enforced widowhood. We must realise that educated girls cannot be happy in a marriage which is largely based on the assumption that the wife is an illegitimate and ignorant person whose only business is to bear children and look to the comfort of her household. As we are all agreed on the importance of women's education, we must see to it that our marriage system is made suitable and safe for educated women. If there is one incident of marriage which is intolerable to an educated wife, it is the association of another woman in the conjugal bond, and, therefore, I strongly maintain that at the present time it is not less urgent to introduce the monogamous principle in our marriage system than to raise the age of marriage.
THE PROBLEM OF DEVAADASI.

From the question of marriage to the question of devadasis may seem to many, a violent transition. But to me, who was one of those who more than thirty years ago started the anti-nautch movement in this city, it is a natural one. For the great objection raised to our movement to do away with the practice of inviting nautch-girls to our social, religious and even official functions, was that the carrying out of the reform would, by curtailing the profits inevitably lead to the extinction of the nautch-girl as a social institution, and that the result would be the general demoralisation of family women.

The argument was that the institution was a sort of safety-valve invented by the wisdom of our ancestors for the letting off of the superfluous animal passions which, they asserted, was bound to exist in every society, and that if this safety-valve was closed down, there must be an explosion leading to the destruction of family life. In other words, it was necessary to dedicate a class of women to a life of promiscuity in order to maintain the purity of our mothers, sisters, wives and daughters. I am, therefore, justified in treating the nautch-system as a corollary of our marriage system to which I have referred in my previous observations. The answer to the safety-valve argument is obvious and it was promptly forthcoming. The man who is accustomed to look upon one class of women with a lustful eye is prone to turn the same eye towards others also. The main thing is that the nautch-system is detrimental to the cultivation of the right mental attitude towards women which is one of the most important factors of civilisation. Our movement has included not only the devadasis or the temple dancing-girls but the whole class of women (in Northern India they are often Moslemas) who utilise their position as exponents of the great arts of dancing and music as an antechamber to a loose and unregulated life. The meagre allowances which devadasis get from their temples are utterly insufficient as attractions without the earnings which they make from outside the temples. Our aim, therefore, was first to cut off the large incomes which they obtained from social entertainments, and it was conceded by our opponents that that would effectively kill the profession of nautch-girl. I think I may safely claim that the anti-nautch movement has now largely eliminated nautch women from social functions. Indeed a very good friend of mine who has something like a passion for music, referring to the great proficiency attained by some of these nautch-women in music, bitterly reproached social reformers not long ago as being instrumental in extinguishing this class of artists. I may add that the anti-nautch movement by eliminating the nautch-girl has facilitated the study and practice of music by women leading reputable family lives.

Here, too, therefore, the social reform movement has not been a failure. I should not pass from this subject without expressing my sincere satisfaction at the efforts of Dr. Mahatma Gandhi to prohibit by law the dedication of devadasis, and I sincerely hope that they will be crowned with success.

CASTE REFORM.

I next come to the question of caste. Social reformers whether of the shastric or of the national school, had no thought in the past of dealing directly with the problem of hereditary castes in the Hindu community. Hindu reformers, from the time of Buddha, have avoided making a frontal attack on caste and preferred to give effect to their ideas by creating parallel organisations which ignored caste distinctions. Even Islam and Christianity have had to a certain extent to compromise with caste in the same way. The reason is, as pointed out by the eminent sociologist, Patrick Geddes, that the four original castes represent a natural division in all civilised societies. "Poor and rich, labour and capital," he writes, "these two first castes are the ones mainly developed in western lands by our industrial age; yet we also have been increasingly developing the other two castes of the upper castes, while our public schools have especially endeavoured to provide a coarse-caste with its ambitions turned from gain or learning towards an ideal of rule." (p. 25, Dramatisation of History.)—This system of Western castes is being, powerfully assailed by the Soviet system in Russia, so powerfully indeed that the nations of Europe have found it necessary to take extraordinary precautions against Bolshevik propaganda in their own countries. It is obvious, therefore, that our hereditary cast-iron caste-system is wholly out of tune with the spirit of the times, and it is no wonder, therefore, that it is rapidly disintegrating. Such a dogmatic reformer as the late Sir Ramkrishna Bhandarkar thought that only the development among the people of a strong national consciousness could break down the caste system. This phenomenon is going on before our very eyes and we can hear almost every day some part of this medieval system crashing to the ground, as it struck down by unseen hands. The non-Aryan movement in Southern India and Mahatma Gandhi is a sign of the times. It was inevitably that it should seek the line of least resistance, just as the Indian National Congress did by turning its guns first against administrative monopoly and privilege. Like the national movement too, it will soon discover, if it has not already done so, that no caste, or community or nation rose to greatness by filling subordinate offices in government service and that it is only by liberating the mind and soul of the people from the cramping effects of custom and superstition that a nation or a community can make its greatest contribution to the cause of progress.

POLITICAL AND SOCIAL REFORM.

In the early days of the National Congress it was a staple topic of discussion by eminent debaters as well as by school-boy debating societies whether social reform should precede political reform or political reform should precede social reform. I remember the late A. O. Hume, the founder and father of the Congress, himself an ardent sympathiser with social reform, telling a delegation of our party which waited on him that while he fully appreciated the urgent necessity of social reform to build up the Indian Nation, a certain amount of self-respect had to be first created in the people in order to arouse them from their lethargy and that this can move readily be done by turning our attention immediately to politics. The great Dadabhai Naoroji devoted a large part of his address at the first National Congress to a defence of the policy of confining the National Congress to political subjects. Underlying their reasons was the instinctive feeling that social progress was effectually barred under a bureaucratic system of Government dominated by persons born and brought up under a different social and religious system who lived their lives in this country largely isolated from the people and who, looked forward to their retirement on pension to their own native land several thousand miles away. Sir Henry Maine, who was Law Member of the Governor-General's Executive Council seventy-five years ago, has described in his lectures on the Village Communities of India how the introduction of the British rule tended to stereotype all Indian social life and thus to prevent its normal growth under the influence of the changing circumstances. Nevertheless in the early days of British rule the influence of the great emancipating principles which dominated British thought towards the end of the eighteenth century and which found exponents in men like Burke, Wilberforce and Howard, was sufficiently strong over the early British Indian empire-builders to impel them to undertake great social reform measures like the suppression of sati and infanticide and the passing of the Widow-Remarriage Act in the face of strong opposition not only from orthodox Indians but also from the more conservative-minded of their own countrymen in this country. But the influence of this humanitarianism was replaced about the third quarter of the last century by that of Darwinism, Hegelism and Bismarckism, and British rule in India could not naturally remain unaffected by this mental revolution in the homeland. If military imperialism is an evil, commercial imperialism backed by the military is a worse evil. Indian policy slowly but steadily underwent a disastrous change and the time came when one of the greatest British statesmen of the last century, candidly avowed that “India must be bled.” The effort to regulate this bleeding process and to repress the protests of the victim began to absorb the energies of Anglo-Indian statesmen and the idea of raising the people of India, whom the late Lord Salisbury grouped with the "Irish and the Hottentots as being “inherently, incapable of self-Government,” was definitely abandoned. The doctrine of neutrality was interpreted in practice to mean opposition to any alteration in the social status quo. Social legislation became a bugbear to the powers that be. The abolition of caste was even understood to be a subtle form of antagonism to the existing Government. You can well see, therefore, how necessary it was to effect a reasonable amount of reform and to acquire for Indians a certain minimum of initiative in the political field before the propagands of social reform could be given effect to by being incorporated into law and practice. The late Mr. Montagu was perhaps the first British statesman to realise that the Indian system of administration operated as a barrier to social progress and he expressly indicated in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report that one great object in expanding the constitution was to afford greater opportunity for social reform. Whatever might be the defects of the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms, in whatever other respects they may have failed to come up to expectations, they have certainly given a great stimulus to social activity and social legislation, and it is no exaggeration to say that during the last six or seven years we have had more attempts at social legislation than during the previous thirty or forty years. It is the experience not only of India but of other lands that political expansion is followed by social progress. The extension of the franchise in Great Britain and the establishment of effective national governments in Japan, Turkey, and even in Afghanistan, have had this result. I am convinced, and I wish to take this opportunity of expressing my conviction in the strongest manner possible, that we have reached a stage in which further and much-needed social reform in impossible without a large further extension of the rights of self-government to the people of India.

ELIMINATION OF THE DEPRESSED CLASSES. The question of caste naturally leads us to the question of the depressed classes. Nearly forty years ago an eminent South-Indian Hindu administrator left his opinion on record that the best thing that could happen to the depressed classes was to be converted to Christianity. This counsel of utter helplessness was strongly criticised at the time, but nothing was done to show that there were other ways of salvation for these classes. The mass conversions by Christian missions from among these classes, particularly during the great famine which prevailed in this century, alarmed some of the most thoughtful Hindu leaders, the most notable amongst whom was Lala Lajpatrai, and orphanages to receive the famine children were started in some parts of the country. I may repeat here the remark I once made regarding this incident, which I have since seen quoted in many publications, that the fear of the Christian missionary has been the beginning of much social wisdom among us. But a greater fear than that of the Christian missionary soon overtook the Hindus when the plea for separate electorates in Lord Minto's time was sought to be reinforced by the argument that the untouchable classes should be excluded in competing the Hindu population. This doctrine was officially accepted in the compilation of statistics at the Census of 1911 in which there was a sudden and surprising increase in the number and proportion of those enumerated under the head of Animists. This theory, however, has now been discarded and the Census Commissioner of Bombay in particular has, in his report of the 1911 Census, completely disposed of it.
More than that we have the recent striking declaration of the distinguished Dawn of Mysores, Mr. Mirza Ismail, that the unchangeable character of the Hindus is owing to the mental and moral corruption imputed in them by the Hindu religion, and he concluded that there was no hope of salvation for the Hindus. Ranade, though he could not but see that the Abbe's narrative was deeply prejudiced, exaggerated and ill-informed, assumed for the purpose of argument that it was a substantially accurate description of Hindu manners in the days when the Abbe lived in India, and he pointed out that the Abbe's conclusion was entirely wrong as Mr. Beachamp's footnotes showed that several of the customs described by the Abbe Dubois had already ceased to exist in India. Mr. Ranade showed that the British connection and its just and humane administration have brought about a change in our religion, law, and polity, of such a character as not to make it necessary that we should be all turned into atheists and barbarians, to be white-washed again into civilization and manners, and that, if we have not acquired a new nature, we have at least acquired inclinations and aspirations which will prevent our lapse into our former condition.

The spirit of the Abbe Dubois, after a hundred years, has incarnated in the person of an American woman, Miss Katherine Mayo, who recently published a book which she unashamedly named Mother India of which the thesis is almost the same as that of her French prototype. But while the Abbe's object was to prove the superiority of Christianity, Miss Mayo's purpose is to prove the inferiority of the White, especially of the Anglo-Saxon race. The mental instability of this writer is shown by the fact that, though she begins by solemnly professing that her concern was only with the hygienic aspect of things and that she had no concern whatever with religion or politics, she is not able for two pages consecutively to stick to her undertaking and that the whole book is truly an attack on the Hindu people and religion with the object of proving that they are incapable of self-government, and that they will become a menace to the health of the whole world and to her America.

In particular, if their country did not continue to be ruled by her fellow Anglo-Saxons, Miss Mayo has attacked not only the men of India, but she has vilified in the most shameless fashion the mothers of India whom she has charged with debauching their children from infancy. I have tried in a small way to deal with several of the specific statements in her book in a series of articles in my paper, the Indian Social Reformer, which have been reprinted in book form by the well-known publishers of Madras, Messrs. Nateman & Co. It is not necessary for me to go over the same ground again, but I would ask you to remember that several persons who were quoted by Miss Mayo as her authority have repudiated the statements imputed to them, that her quotations from Tagore have been proved to be a deliberate travesty, and that the leading Christian missionary organisations in India, and more particularly the American Missionaries, have publicly declared their disapproval and condemnation of Miss Mayo's presentation of the state of things in India. It is not... that we deny that there are abuses, and grave social abuses, in India as in other countries. Child-marriage we do not defend, and for the last fifty years the social reformers of India, have been exerting themselves to reform our marriage system in this as in other respects. Their efforts, as I have shown above, have not been without results. The Baroda Marriage Reform Committee in their report stated that child marriage, properly so-called, has ceased to exist among the educated classes, and that it prevails at present mostly among the lower castes whose illiteracy and ignorance are a barrier in the way of the propagation of social reform reaching them. The last Indian Census report bears testimony to the correctness of this view, as applied to the whole of India. Mass-education is therefore the key to the solution of this and other social problems. Miss Mayo pretends that the illiteracy of the people is due not to the failure of the administration to discharge one of its fundamental duties but to the low public taste which makes it unfeasible for women to adopt, the teaching profession. A more ridiculously perverted bit of special pleading it is impossible to imagine. Any National Government in India, however incompetent in other respects, would have long ago seen the need of elementary education among the masses as a means of its own self-preservation. That in pre-British India there was some sort of national education is attested by no less an authority than Sir Thomas Munro who in his evidence before a Select Committee of the Commons specifically referred to that fact as a proof of the high civilization of India. His testimony of the state of things one hundred years ago is the most weighty answer to the sweeping generalizations of the Abbé Dubois and his modern avatar, Miss Katherine Mayo. I have quoted the passage in my book but it will well bear repeating here. Sir Thomas Munro said in reply to a question put to him: "I do not exactly understand what is meant by the civilization of the Hindu. In the higher branches of science, in the knowledge of the theory and practice of good government, and in an education which, by banning prejudice and superstition, opens the mind to receive the truth, the Hindu is much superior to the European. But if a good system of agriculture, earned and manufactured skill, capacity to produce whatever can contribute to either convenience or luxury, schools established in every village for teaching reading, writing, and arithmetic, the general practice of hospitality and charity amongst each other, and, above all, a dressment of the female sex, full of confidence, respect, and delicacy, are among the signs which denote a civilized people—then the Hindus are not inferior to the nations of Europe and if civilization is to become an article of trade between the two countries, I am convinced that this country (England) will gain by the import cargo."

CONCLUSION

This is the opinion of a man who had ample opportunities for studying Indian character and who lived among the people for forty years earning their unbounded respect and confidence. The effect of such a book as Miss Mayo's is no doubt disconcerting at present but it will not last, and I think the inevitable re-action which attends all exaggeration has already set in. But whether this is the case or not the leaders of India should go forward undismayed in their mission of raising the country to the high place which her history, her geographical position, her abundant material resources and the varied gifts of mind and heart of her multitudinous population, have marked out for her among the nations of the world. In India, and in India alone, are gathered together representatives of all the ancient religions of the world—Hebrews, Christians, Parsees, and Mussalmans. All these various communities, owing to the policy of perfect religious toleration which India was the first among the nations to adopt, have lived their own life on the lines of their own ancient traditions. I am old-fashioned enough to believe in the theory of history as the unfolding of a great, divine purpose, and it is my firm belief that if ever a universal religion and civilization are to embrace all mankind, that religion and that civilization will have their origin in this ancient and holy land of India. May every one of us, each in our humble sphere, carry that thought deep in our hearts and shape our lives in a way worthy of that high destiny!

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The late Dwayne Dayaram Gidumal's death. The Secretary of the Young Social Worker's Society, Karachi, writes—Young Social Worker's Society, Karachi, record their sincere regret at the sad and unexpected death of Dwayne Dayaram Gidumal, one of the greatest philanthropists and social reformers and a man of great culture, refinement and assuming manners and pray to the Almighty that his soul may rest in peace and may God grant patience to the bereaved family to be resigned to His will.

Sound Advice: Dr. Norman Leys in a letter to the Zanzibar Sansar gives some sound advice to the Indians in Kenya. He touches upon a few social questions, so as to enable the Indians in East Africa to prove themselves fit for liberty. 'He suggests among other things the formation of societies in which all classes of Indians, Hindus, Muslims, Sikhs and others should discuss everything that concerns the common life. Educational and political matters should form part of discussions and debates. Then, further the letter speaks of the important question of sanitation and health. Lastly it points out the necessity of the education of Indian women abroad. 'The chief thing,' says the letter, 'is that unless the mothers in a country are free and educated their sons will not be free and intelligent.'

To Marry Kumal Pasha: Rumours of an impending marriage which may have considerable political significance in the Middle East are current in Cairo, says the Daily News. It is stated there that Mustapha Kemal Pasha, President of the Turkish Republic, is to marry the sister of the Amir of Afghanistan. The Amir's sister is the Princess Kubra, a girl of 24, who is at present completing her education in Paris. Kemal Pasha, the dominating figure in the Moslem world to-day, is 25 years her senior. A link between the Turkish Republic and Afghanistan, which is also a Mohammedan nation, could not fail to arouse great interest throughout the Orient. The Princess Kubra is to visit London with her brother next spring. She is bobbed, wears pants-suit, and speaks English with fair facility. Kemal, at the close of his campaign against the Greeks in 1923, married a 19-year-old heiress, Latifez Hanoum, daughter of a wealthy Smyrna merchant, but divorced her two years later.

Ideal Living: The Hindu Times has the following: On Saturday night, Dr. Stansel Jones explained to a group of young men and women assembled at the St. Stephen's College hall the moral and spiritual ideals he wanted them to live up to. An ideal man like Gandhi, he said, would desire and strive for no more material possessions than absolutely necessary for the maintenance of life. And if people, continued, too much to such ideal living there would be much less poverty and suffering than it was at present. He wanted a Government based on such ideals in which all should be equal and free and no domination of the one over the other. It would begin to start an Ashram where men and women would be prepared to lead life on such a standard. For such an Ashram, Dr. Jones said, he had selected a suitable site at Sat Tal and Naini Tal in beautiful surrounding in an ideal climate. He had already acquired twenty acres of land. This Ashram Dr. Jones hoped to establish next summer. All the ground and buildings of the Ashram would be prepared by the Ashram men themselves and they would have to earn their own living by means of crops and fruit-growing.

Communal Strike in Bombay: A strike of mill workers has extended to about 15,000 at the end of the week commenced on Monday. The reason alleged is that some of the cotton mills introduced a system in which a weaver had to mind three instead of two looms as hitherto, with a proportionate addition to his wages. This measure if exercised was recommended in the textile Tariff Board in their report last year. We do not know if there is any other reason compelling the men to strike, but if there is none, we cannot help thinking that they have been spectacularly ill-advised in succumbing to the strike. It has been invariably the case that the adoption of methods of quicker and larger output, has resulted in increased and not diminished work and wages for workers. We can see with hope that the strike will be soon brought to a close by a friendly explanation of the actual situation by the mill managers to the workers. The Bombay mill industry is just beginning to emerge from the depression which it has been experiencing for the last three years, and it is unfortunate that just at this juncture this strike should take place.

Undoing the Mischiefs: There are welcome signs to show that in Europe and America, it is being realised that Miss Katherine Mayo's book is a treasure of Indian life and there is a growing demand for a fuller and more correct exposition of the competent men and women. A Free Press message from Ahmedabad says that Mrs. Sarojini Naidu has received a call from America for the purpose of undoing the mischief created by Miss Mayo's "Unruffled and lollious production." Write about this in Young India to-day, Maharaj Ganesh says: If Sarojini Davi would respond to the invitation, the visit is likely to undo some at east of the mischief wrought by Miss Mayo's Novel, line as sure by the magic of her eloquence to captivate American imagination as she captivated South African, and paved the way for the Round Table Conference. Let us hope that the way would be clear for her to accept the invitation and that Dr. Ansari would be able to make her the foreign mission that seems to call this gifted daughter of India. Another message from Calcutta quotes the poet, Tagore, as having told a meeting of University students that the book was written with the only object of humiliating us before the world: it is only to lepive Indians of the universal sympathy still felt of their culture by the world. In these terms Dr. Rabindranath Tagore referred to the book "Mother India," addressing a meeting of ladies at the University Institute, held under the auspices of the Saroj Nalini Women's Association. He stated that the production of that book meant the greatest mischief that one could do to a nation in trying to rob its fair name by feeding to lying propaganda. He also urged on the women of Bengal to take up the challenge of Miss Katherine Mayo and extend their sphere of activities. Unless women took part in the progressive movements of the country, the activities of the Indian National Congress or any other political body would not take the country far.

Moslems and Separate Electorates: Indian Mussalims are divided about equally, according to one reliable estimate, on the question whether they should continue to have their separate communal electorate for the Central and Provincial Legislatures or whether they should agree to their being merged in a general electorate of all communities. The Sikhs who have separate electorates in the Punjab have declared that they are ready to give them up, as they have been found to foster communal differences, if the Mahomedans give up their communal electorates. The proposal which is backed up by an influential half of the latter community, to agree to joint electorate, is, therefore, a very important development, as it will probably lead to the extinction of the principle of communal electorates altogether. The Muslim supporters of this proposal, however, complaint acceptance of joint electorates with two conditions neither of which has any organic relation to it. One is the introduction of the system of provincial Government in the North-West Frontier Province as prevails in the other Provinces. This, in our opinion, is a very necessary reform and should be given effect to as soon as possible. There is no sort of connection, however, between it and the electorate question, and even those who are opposed to joint electorates with the conditions attached to it, must admit the justice and, indeed, necessity of this reform.

Communal Provinces: The other condition attached to the proposal of joint electorates, stands on a different footing. It is that Sind should be separated from the Bombay Presidency of which it has formed part ever since its annexation, and constituted into a province by itself. The only consideration which should weigh with the public in considering this condition, is whether the proposal, if carried out, will benefit Sind, and be in accordance with the best interests of the country; its originators, however, have ignored both these considerations and treated the question merely as a concession to Mahomedan sentiment in return for its acceptance of joint electorates. Most certainly, a good understanding between Hindus and Mussalims is vital to the progress of the country, and anything which conduces to it, of course, materially helps it.
Will the Partition of Sind be an improvement of communal electorates as a means of bringing the two communities and some of the Hindus of the provincial or district towns to a political unity? It would appear that Sind is one of the provinces where the Hindus of the majority are more likely to be organized into political units. We, therefore, think that it is better to try communal electorates for some time longer, if the only alternative is to accept the principle of communal provinces. Moreover, Sind for nearly a century has grown up to its present stature under the cultural conditions of the Bombay Presidency, and it may prove injurious to tear it away from it at this stage. In our opinion, Sind must be affiliated culturally either to Bombay or the Punjab. The present arrangement favours Bombay influence while separation must inevitably lead to Sind being absorbed by the Punjab. We think that it will be the general opinion in the country that Sind has more to lose by being cut off from Bombay than to gain from being tacked on to the Punjab.

Good News from South Africa: A special cable to the Imperial Indian Citizenship Association from the High Commissioner in the South African Indian situation. It says: The Mayor opened the South African Indian Congress yesterday. There was a full attendance. A conditional resolution was passed on the death of Sir George Padding. The ascension of the British Indian Association of Transvaal from the Congress was accepted and the Transvaal Indian Congress was affiliated. An appeal was made to Sind for the amendment of the constitution of the illegal entrants into Transvaal is under discussion. The Conference passed a resolution giving an assurance to the Minister of Interior of the acceptance of the agreement and cooperation in preventing illicit entry of Indians in the Union territory. The Conference appointed a sub-committee for negotiating with the Minister on the conditions of the settlement of the Indian characters. The Conference is making enquiries of the conditions of the refugees in India. The Agents explained the present condition. The Congress unanimously adopted the resolution appealing to Mr. Saty to protect his kin in South Africa for such a period as he might think proper. The Congress having full confidence in the Agent-General. The resolution was the occasion for many tributes to the dead Agent-General. The proceedings of South African Indians being represented at the Imperial Conference and at the League of Nations and instructed its executives to take such action as it thought fit.

A Distinguished German Scholar: Professor Luder, the senior Professor of Sanskrit in Berlin University, and a very eminent Sanskritist, began on Thursday a series of lectures at the Bombay University on 'Aryan Civilisation in Central Asia.' He delivered before a large meeting at Poona on the 2nd instant, an illuminating lecture dealing with an ancient Hindu kingdom on the confines of China under the auspices of the Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute, with Dr. D. Subbaiah as his chairman. There was a very large and influential gathering present. The Chairman introduced the lecturer as an orientalist of more than forty years' experience and a pupil of the renowned Dr. Kalhore. The lecturer traced out, in consider- able detail, the story of how emigrants from Western India colonised a portion of China. And amongst other proofs of this surprising event, Dr. Luder added the facts that in the language spoken in those parts of China there were to be found a number of terms and words from the Indian and Persian languages. Three kinds of inscriptions had been found on some old stones. At the beginning of the month but not the year, and probably official orders from the royal family; others on wooden wedge-shaped tablets which were in effect sealed letters; and the remainder on clay masses. There were numerous evidences to be obtained from these that they were directly connected with India, and so he urged a new field for research for Indian scholars was being opened up.

Liquor Law Reform in England: Legislation to enforce the principle of compulsory closing of shops at fixed hours is laid down in Dar (Defence of Realm Act) regulations during the war time are recommended in the report of the committee issued today. The Committee recommends the closing of shops at the hour 6 in the evening except on late days (generally Saturdays) and weekly half-holidays. The principal changes proposed, says a Reuter message, from the regulations in force are the permission to sell confectionery and tobacco at the places of entertainment until the end of the performance, the sale of tobacco at public houses while the latter is used for the consumption of the food thereon or the sale of tobacco and confectionery at the same premises is opened for the purpose of being sold at the general sale of the premises.

The Working Committee of the National Social Conference: At a Subjects Committee Meeting held at Kesari Kutsuroon in Madras on Friday, the 10th December, the Working Committee was appointed to carry on propaganda work on behalf of the Conference. The following are the office-bearers and members of the Committee: Mr. K. Narasann, President; Mr. Mulukhkar, General Secretary; Mr. G. Ramaswamy, Vice-President; Mr. K. Chattopadhyaya, and Mr. K. Narasann, Secretaries; Mr. K. N. Kesari, Treasurer; and Messrs. Ramaswami Sivan, M. Rangayya, E. V. Sarna, G. V. Krupakrshi, A. Ramaswami Mudaliar and Prof. P. Subramiyar, Members.

The Bombay Social Conference: At the Social Conference held at Bombay the following important resolutions were passed among others: the Conference unanimously adopted a resolution recording its sorrow at the death of the following gentlemen who rendered each in his sphere eminent services to the cause of social reform: (1) Swami Sheshadityan, (2) Mr. S. Sidhu, (3) Mr. Dayaram Gidwani, (4) Mr. Ganja Ram, (5) Mr. B. S. Bhajekar, (6) Mr. V. K. Mainkar, (7) Mr. C. S. Deole and (8) Mr. R. B. Joshi. In the opinion of the Conference, the caste system among Hindus as it exists is responsible for the disintegration and weakening of the Hindu society and the effective way to Sangathart is to abolish. The Conference further, urges that active efforts should be made to loosen the bonds of the caste system by encouraging (a) inter-dining, (b) inter-marrying and (c) the common use of temples and other public places by making them accessible to every Hindu. In the opinion of this Conference the complete removal of untouchability is a necessity for the preservation of Hindu Society and the Hindu Religion. It, therefore, welcomes all efforts in that direction, it urges Hindus to recognize the right of the so-called depressed classes to enjoy equal status with the rest of their co-religionists. The opinion was generally expressed at Madras that the fortieth Indian National Social Conference held in that city during Christmas week, marked a new chapter in the history of the movement. The two most important features of the Conference were the predominant part taken by women in organizing it, and the presence and participation of men and women of all communities and political parties in its proceedings. The lady Chairman of the Reception Committee, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi, was indefatigable in her efforts to enlist the sympathy and support of every class and community and she was ably assisted by Mrs. Kamala Chatterpadiya and other volunteers, men and women, in securing the co-operation of a large and enthusiastic band of workers. By a happy coincidence, Mr. G. K. Devadas, President of the Servants of India Society, happened to be in Madras during the greater part of November and December and his valuable advice and suggestions—he was nominated a Vice-President of the Reception Committee—were of great help to Dr. Muthulakshmi and her co-workers.

In more than one direction, the resolutions of the Conference struck new ground. The resolution on caste was a great advance upon any previously passed by the Conference on the subject. The abolition of castes, root and branch, was laid down as essential to national unity, and the Conference undertook to institute propaganda to give effect to the resolution. For the first time in the history of the Conference, the necessity of a law of divorce among caste Hindus in order to equalize the moral standard as between the two sexes was unanimously adopted. Another striking feature of the Conference, is that it placed on record its deliberate conviction that a large expansion of constitutional reform, resting larger political initiative in the hands of the people, is indispensable for the farther progress of social reform. The Conference has appointed an influential committee of eminent lawyers to consider the three Bills for the prevention of child marriages pending in the Legislative Assembly, and in the Madras and Bombay Legislative Councils, and to make suggestions for their improvement, particularly with a view to have the principle of monogamy embodied in the law.

The Bill for the abolition of the system of Devadasis now before the Madras Legislative Council, received the very strong support of the Conference.

A very gratifying incident of the Conference was the warm support extended to it by the leaders of the non-Brahmin party. We have reason to hope that at an early date the basis of the party will be enlarged so as to make opinion and not birth the test of admission to its membership. Its responsible leaders realize that there is a considerable section of Brahmins whose views are, in no essential respect, different from those which they themselves hold, and as patriotic men, they are anxious to remove from their party the stigma that it excludes any individual or caste on the score of birth. The death of Sir T. Sadasiva Aiyar on the eve of the Conference was a great blow to its organizers. He occupied as between the Brahmins and non-Brahmins in Madras, nearly the same position as Hakim Ajmal Khan between Hindus and Mussalmans of upper India, whose sudden death on the morrow of the National Congress cast a heavy gloom all over the country. The future of the country depends largely on the emergence of men and women who by their broad outlook and generous sympathy serve as reconciliators and peace-makers between rival interests and sects.

LET US PLAY!

BY DR. CLIFFORD MANSFIELD, PH. D.

Play and you will grow young. Refrain from play and the chances are that you will never grow old. If it had no other value whatever, play would be a good life insurance. But play has other values, of which not the least is its value as an agency of socialization. One of the biggest lessons that life has to teach is the lesson of co-operation. One of the most successful schools in which this course is offered is the school of organized play. Watch a group of youngsters during the course of a day and see how many quarrels result over disputed possession. Put these same youngsters into a well-supervised playground and see how quickly the “my” desires are subordinated to the interests of the large group. Observe a crowd of boys and see how much trouble is caused by first one and then another endeavoring to take the position of leadership. Take these same boys to a playground and mark the difference after they have learned to play by rule and have discovered for themselves the value of team play. Give careful attention to the undisciplined gangs that frequent the back lanes of every city. Enlist their interest in wholesome sport, and observe the result upon the problem of juvenile delinquency.

In every village and city, boys and young men are getting into trouble because they have nothing else to do. Given idle hands and idle minds and the sure result is social discord. Direct idle hands and idle minds into wholesome channels and the sure result is social harmony. No village is too small and no city is too large to designate an open space or spaces for public play. No neighborhood is so bankrupt of leadership but that some responsible person can be found for the supervision of public play. Every trained village school teacher should know the fundamentals of playground work, and every village school house should be a centre of wholesome recreation. Every city should have its playground system adequately supported by public taxation. Forward looking industrial leaders are fighting the battle for shorter hours in industry. Forward looking social workers must fight the battle of making leisure time safe.

If a nation is to be great it must have clear-headed thinkers. If a man is to think clearly he must have a healthy body. Among the ancient Greeks physical training was an essential part of a youth’s education. Even the smallest town had its gymnasium and encouraged wholesome sport. The great philosopher Plato believed so firmly in a healthy body that in his scheme of education he set apart the important years from seventeen to twenty as the years to be especially devoted to the training of the body. Perhaps the Greeks placed too much emphasis upon physical culture, and yet there is a very close relationship between bodily health and mental acuteness. A man’s state of mind is generally influenced by the state of his health. Depression and morbidly are generally the result of bodily ailments, while enthusiasm and optimism take their roots in physical fitness. In the old days men had the idea that the physical and the mental were distinct areas. To-day we know that man is a unity with the mind influencing the body and the body influencing the mind. They are part and parcel of the same thing.

The objections raised to play are varied. The boy has not sufficient bodily strength. The student has not the time. The elderly man regards play as childish. The ascetic holds before him the ideal of “keeping the body under.” And so it goes. But each objection is easily met. The youngster who receives insufficient food and is undernourished need not indulge in the strenuous games of his more fortunate neighbour. Play can be graded to meet the needs of even the weakest. The student who has not the time for bodily exercise is most likely to discover that he would have saved time by engaging in it. A trained brain is of little value when housed in a broken down body. The man who regards play as childish may well ponder the words of a great teacher advising his followers to become as little children. Children have much to teach even the wisest of us. Modern psychology has dealt a body blow at the doctrine of repression. We develop strength of character not through subduing the body, but through using it to the glory of God and for the good of man.

A simple and yet a true formula for a happy life can be stated in but three words: “Learn to play!”
The Indian National Social Conference, 1927.

The 40th Session of the Indian National Social Conference was held at Madras during Christmas Week under the presidency of Mr. K. Natarajan. We give below a detailed report of the proceedings:

FIRST DAY.

The 40th session of the Indian National Social Conference commenced its sittings amidst great enthusiasm on Tuesday the 27th ult. in the Congress Subjects Committee Pandal, Congress Nagar. Besides a number of delegates from different parts of India, there was a large and representative gathering of ladies and gentlemen interested in social reform movement; prominent among them being the Maharaja of Pichapuram, Sir R. Venkataratnam, Sir C. Sankaran Nair, Sir A. P. Patro, Messrs. V. Ramadas Pantulu, N. Gopalaswami Iyengar, Pattabhirama Rao, C. V. Krishnaswami Aiyar, the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Venkatachala Rao, the Hon'ble Dr. Subbarayan, Messrs. V. P. Rao, V. Govindan, Ramaswami Sivan, T. Varadarajulu Naidu, C. Vijayaraghavachariar, Mrs. Sarojini Naidu and Rev. Bittman, Mr. K. Natarajan of Bombay presided. The proceedings opened with the singing of national songs by Congress volunteers.

Dr. Muthuswami then delivered her inaugural address which we print in the next issue.

President's Election.

The formal election of Mr. K. Natarajan to the presidential chair was proposed by Sir C. Sankaran Nair.

In doing so, Sir C. Sankaran Nair said that Mr. K. Natarajan had been fighting for a long period against any privilege accorded to anybody on account of caste, colour, sect or creed. Mr. Natarajan was a man of indescribable sympathy with suffering of any kind or form. His sympathy was not exhausted, as it was in the case of some others, with mere words. He saw no difference between a Hindu and a Muslim, so far as the rights, privileges and obligations were concerned. Nor did he see any difference between a European or a Pariah or a Brahmin and between Brahmins and Non-Brahmins. They could not have had a better person to preside over the Conference than Mr. Natarajan.

Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, in seconding the motion, observed that for many years Mr. Natarajan had been one of those quiet influences that had helped to clarify the isolation of things. His crystallised honesty and purpose had been a great asset to the nation. On behalf of women she offered her thanks to him for all the generous work he had done. She recognised that without work like his there could be no work like Lokahita's or Mahatma Gandhi's and others. All the ideals and aspirations of a free India that were being reclaimed from the platform of the National Congress could, without such work, be small and void. His work tended to lay the foundation well, and truly, of an office of the house of life for a free nation.

Mr. A. Ramaswami Mudaliar, in supporting the motion, said he was prepared to respect and follow leaders of thought like Mr. K. Natarajan who had risen above all notions of caste, colour or creed. They could not have chosen a better president that Mr. Natarajan. In Natarajan had been recognised to-day as the preeminent of good and great ideals of social reform, hence ideals of social reform were now accepted by the Indian world. Many things and movements had contributed to this. While there were acute differences between Brahmins and Non-Brahmins in South India, the election of Mr. Natarajan, a Brahmin of Brahmins, as President showed that they could all rise to the occasion and show their respect and admiration to those who saw really no difference between caste and caste.

The motion was further supported by Dr. C. R. Rama Rao and Mr. R. Krishna Rao, Bhoysar and it was carried with acclamation.

Mr. Natarajan delivered his presidential address in full text of which appeared in the last issue of the Reformer.

Resolutions.

The following condolence resolution was moved from the chair and was carried in silence, the whole gathering standing:

"This Conference places on record its sense of the loss sustained by the country in the death of Sir T. Sadasiva Aiyar, who both during and subsequent to his career at the bar and on the bench, boldly championed the women's cause and the cause of the 'so-called' depressed classes and helped, by precept as well as practice, to advance the cause of social progress. It also places on record its sense of the loss sustained by the country in the death of distinguished workers like Swami Shraddanandji, Sir Lal Ganga Ram, Dwarakanath Gudumal, Mr. V. N. Bhatkar and Sir P. Rajagopalacheri, who, in their several capacities, rendered inestimable service to the cause of social reform.

"This Conference authorises the President of the Conference to convey to the bereaved family its loyal sympathy with them."

Women's Rights.

After the condolence resolution was adopted, a resolution concerning women's rights was taken up for discussion. Sir C. Sankaran Nair moved the following resolution:

"This Congress asserts its emphatic adherence to the principle of civic equality between man and woman in the matter of rights and privileges and would strongly recommend the abolition of all inequalities in the matter of marriage laws, adoption and guardianship of children and inheritance of property."

In doing so Sir Sankaran Nair exhorted the ladies to agitate for equal rights and privileges, and to carry on their fight till they got what they wanted. He instanced to them how the women of England successfully fought for their rights and privileges. He did not see any reason why the ladies should not enjoy the same privileges as men with regard to the laws of property and inheritance. What the womenfolk needed most was economic independence. When once an independent living was secured by them, other rights would naturally be got. They in Madras already possessed equal rights with regard to franchise and membership in the local legislature. He asked them not to hesitate to claim equality in every respect and if they did not fail in putting forward their demands boldly and fought for it, the speaker was sure that they would get them.

Mrs. Chandrasekhar Iyer of Bangalore seconded the resolution and in a homely speech explained the various difficulties the women had to face and appealed to them to give them equal rights in all matters. If they ignored their rights she assured them they would never get Swaraj. She pleaded that the Hindu Law should be so amended as to give them equal rights with men.

After Mrs. Chandrasekhara Aiyar had seconded the motion Pandit Jahawarlal Nehru supported it. He emphasised the point that social customs and rules could not be considered suited to all times. Surely it could not be said to apply to any stage of society. Times had changed and they must adjust themselves accordingly. Social problems must be considered from a purely scientific and secular ground. They ought not to subject themselves to the thralldom of customs. Arguments based on religion should be imported only when one considered questions of theology and not social reforms. He fully supported the claim of women for equal rights. He would suggest to them to adopt the method of non-co-operation in their struggle for economic freedom.

Mr. Surendranath Arya next further supported the motion. He said that the women were much ill-treated by men and in spite of all their condemnation, what was said by Miss Mayo on that subject was true. (At this there was great uproar among the audience and cries of “shame, shame” “sit down” and “we do not want to hear you” and so on were raised). The speaker went on to speak amidst those cries which were kept up till he finished his speech.

The Chairman put the resolution to vote and declared it carried.

The conference was adjourned till the next morning.

SECOND DAY.

The Indian National Social Conference resumed its deliberations on Wednesday morning at 7.30 in the Congress Subjects Committee Pandal, Mr. K. Narasaj presiding. A large number of ladies and gentlemen was present.

Mr. Natarajan, at the outset, referred to the unpleasantness caused at Tuesday’s meeting by Mr. Surendranath Arya in speaking on the resolution regarding women’s rights made some observations regarding Miss Mayo’s book which raised a storm of protest. In this connection the President mentioned that in all assemblies when the President thought it necessary to intervene, the member in possession of the House invariably gave way. Mr. Arya, carried away by his feelings and without intending any violation of the rules which were absolutely necessary if the proceedings of public meetings were to be carried out in an orderly manner, did not comply with his request and persisted in addressing the assembly amidst loud shouts of protests from all sides. The speaker thought an assembly had a perfect right to decline to hear a speaker, who insisted in expressing sentiments however just or righteous, which nevertheless it regarded as outrageous to its deepest sentiments. In the House of Commons, he said, no less a constitutional authority than Mr. Gladstone moved on one occasion that a particularly obnoxious speaker should not be heard and the motion was carried and the man was not allowed to speak. The right to address an audience carried with it, as every right should, the corresponding duty of expressing one’s ideas in a way which jarred as little as possible on the susceptibilities of the audience. There was no fallacy which had more hindered the spread of truth than the fallacy that truth should be necessarily unpleasant and would cease to be truth unless it was proclaimed in absolute disregard of the hearers’ feelings or convictions. He did not blame the audience for the outburst on Tuesday. Nevertheless he thought that it would have been better to have given a patient hearing to Mr. Arya and the speaker felt sure that in that case Mr. Arya too would not perhaps have lost his temper. The speaker said that he had since had an interchange of views with Mr. Arya who said that it was not his intention to justify Miss Mayo’s book as a whole and that his observations about the truth of her charge, applied only to the treatment of Hindu women.

Marriage Reform.

The following resolution was then moved:

“The conference deems it essential for the healthy and free development of Indian manhood and womanhood that the minimum marriageable age of boys and girls should be raised to 21 and 18 respectively; and it recommends that the monogamous principle with the right of divorce for suitable reasons may be introduced.

“That this Conference further accords its warm support to the principle of Mr. Sarda’s Bill in the Indian Legislative Assembly, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi’s Bill for the prevention of early marriages, in the Madras Legislative Council, and also Mr. Jairamdas Daulatram’s Bill in the Bombay Legislative Council. It appoints a committee, consisting of Sir Sabaraj Naib Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi, Mr. T. V. Narayana Naik, and Mr. C. V. Vishwanatha Sastri with power to co-opt, to consider these bills and make any suggestions for their improvement on the lines of the first clause of this resolution to the Select Committee of the Assembly to Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and to Mr. Jairamdas Daulatram respectively.

“This Conference views with satisfaction the vigorous efforts made all over the country for lightening the hard lot of Hindu widows (1) by educating them so that they may live honourable and independent lives and (2) by affording increasing facilities for remarriage should they choose to remarry. In this connection the Conference records its gratification at the success of institutions like the Women’s Home of Service in Mysore, the Sarada’s Ladies’ Home in Triplicane, the Sarada Niladri in Guntur and the Bombay and Poona Sera Sadans and recommends that similar Institutions be started in other parts of the country for training women in useful vocations.

“This Conference strongly condemns the infliction on Hindu widows of various indignities such as in particular their disfigurement and their deprivation of innocent amenities and urges the adoption of immediate steps to put an end to them, if necessary, by legislation.

“That in the opinion of this Conference the practice of demanding dowries at marriages is pernicious and has caused considerable economic and moral harm to many families and ought to be discouraged by social reformers exerting their influence in public and private against the continuance of this evil.”

In moving the resolution on marriage reform the proposer, Mrs. Jankibai Bhat of the Poona Sera Sadan, said that in order to make women independent, the same facilities for education should be given to girls as for boys. Without education, it was impossible to uplift the status of women. There is no wealth so important or so valuable as education. The first thing necessary for the position of women in society as that of men, was that they should provide ample primary education for women. If they had got primary education they would have some means of knowing what their responsibilities are and they would conduct their lives in such a way as to fulfil their responsibilities. Men and women were like the two wheels of a chariot. Only if the two wheels were set right and kept as they should be could the chariot be made to move. She also referred to the condition of widows. The position of widows in our society is the most miserable and the most undervalue and, therefore, in order to help them to improve their own lot, it is necessary to pay special attention to the education of widows. These widows were compelled to live a life of drudgery, while as a matter of fact, they were the class, from which the largest number of social workers for whom there is a great need in this land was drawn. She also referred to the institute at Poona and pointed out how they had made progress now when compared to their position a few years back.

Srimati Rameswami Sivan, in seconding the proposition, deplored the great physical degeneration which resulted from early marriage. For the sake of making India a land full of strong men and women she condemned the present practice and suggested 18 as the minimum marriageable age of women. She appealed to men for co-operation in this great task which lay before the women of India.

After she had concluded her speech Mr. Natarajan rose to assure the audience that Mrs. Sivan was genuinely enthusiastic in the matter and would do her best to combat the evil if only her husband would permit it (cheers).

The audience demanded a reply from Mr. Sivan. She was seated prominently on the dias.

Mr. Rameswami Sivan stood up amidst laughter and cheers. He said that the women of Madras had already been invited to rebel; and he would therefore cordially endorse the views of his wife. He conceded her the fullest measure of Home Rule to combat the evil which she had so willingly come forward to eradicate.

Dr. A. Lakshmanaswami Mudaliar further supported the resolution. In the course of his speech he said that he was glad that there were present on this occasion representatives of all sections of the people. Many of the ladies put their precepts into practice. He did not want to speak unpalatable truths. Miss Mayo’s book he condemned, because she was morbidity-minded and her book should be ignored. Twenty years ago, social reformers had said that the holocaust of national degeneracy must go. He would look upon the question of early marriage as a question of racial degeneracy. India was stunted in growth and if they wanted India to take her place with other nations, they must raise the age of marriage. The high infantile mortality in India at present was due to the custom of early marriage. They should not tinker with the problem but should approach it with the determination to wipe out the evil which was consuming the vitals of the nation.

Mr. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya next supported the resolution and said that there was no use quoting Shastras as Shastras could be cited in support of anything. The women of India had been keeping quiet all these years but the time had now come for them to assert themselves. She protested against the very idea of widowhood. Social laws must be such as to make the future beautiful. She appealed to the women to rebel against all customs which stood in the way of their growth and which denied them the right to be happy. She would draw the attention of the audience to the clause in the resolution which recommended divorce for suitable reasons, so that they may vote on the question with their eyes open. She regretted that previous speakers had not even touched on the divorce clause.

Mr. Ramaswami Sarma further supported the resolution and condemned the system of dowry.

The resolution was passed with acclamations.

PURDAH.

Mr. S. M. Fossil moved the following resolution:

"This Conference is emphatically of opinion that the system of purdah as it exists among the Hindus as well as Mohammedans is prejudicial to the healthy development of women and urges its discontinuance."

He said there was no necessity to make a case for the resolution as the resolution itself explained it. The system of purdah was foreign to Islam. Mustapha Kemal Pasha had said this and condemned it. This system was neither national nor religious. If at all there is any religion that has assigned a high place to woman, it is Islam. Islam had recognized complete equality to women with men. In old Arabia there was no purdah system. But when the Mussalmans were conquering other nations they came across the civilization of other countries and borrowed this civilization from non-Arabs, viz, Bistanum and Persia. There was no religious support for this behind it. Purdah system is very rigid in India but not so in Turkey and other countries, preeminently Moslem. In those countries they were trying to remove what little custom there remained. If the Muslim community was to grow, this wretched system of purdah must go. Keeping women in purdah killed their aesthetic beauty. A thing of beauty was a joy for ever and unbeautiful things only should be kept in purdah. To keep women in purdah was worse than putting them, their sisters in jail. If it was meant to keep them keep up their morality, he would suggest to have the same system applied to men also. Mrs. Yalub Hassan seconded the resolution and said that she came from Turkey where recently purdah had been given up. The women have had to throw away their purdah system for several reasons. She hoped that the audience was aware that there was war in Turkey almost continuously for the last 20 years. Many lost their husbands, sons and others, their bread winners, in the war and so circumstances compelled the women to take up such employment as they were fitted for by their education. She hoped that female education would make enough progress in India and before long the Indian Muslim ladies would realize their position as their sisters in Turkey had done.

Maulana Shaukat Ali next spoke, supporting purdah.

Mrs. Sarojini Naidu supported the resolution. She said that the question of purdah was not so antagonistic as they might imagine. She explained what purdah meant and endorsed all that Maulana Shaukat Ali said. Purdah, of course, seemed to exist to protect the chastity of women. It was true that there were many places of danger where for the protection of women the system had to be started. But things wanted revision and readjustment. Men needed education as much as women, and what was all the more required was social education. It was the social education that could remove the purdah. She reiterated the need for social education. To her Hindu-Muslim Unity was a better guarantee and protector of the virtue of Indian womanhood than purdah. The purdah that they denounced was only the physical interpretation of the ideal of that modesty which is the natural safeguard of women’s virtue, and as such there should be no hesitation in discarding this mere symbol.

The resolution passed.

Emancipation of Devadasis.

Mrs. Sarojini Naidu then moved the following resolution:

"This Conference regards with disapproval the dedication for temple service of girls or young women who are prevented from living an honourable married life, and extends its support to legislative measures like Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi’s Bill for the social, moral and economic emancipation of the Devadasis."

She said that this resolution was only a part of the bigger resolution and a very big and comprehensive one for the emancipation of all manhood. This system only indicated that the woman had fallen from her ancient place into degradation and indignity and this custom was prevalent more in the South. This was a social and spiritual cancer and how, she asked, dared they to ask for freedom when these malpractices existed in them which they did not fight and remove. She did not for a moment hesitate to condemn every man in South India for this indignity having been allowed to exist. She congratulated Mrs. Muthulakshmi Reddy for the very pleasing and highly needed step she had taken to alleviate all these evils. The dishonour of a single woman being dedicated to the temple, was a dishonour to all women.

Mrs. Chandrasekhar Iyer seconded the resolution and it was passed.

Equal Moral Standard.

Mrs. Malati Patwardhan moved:

"This conference urges the application of equal standards of morality to men and women alike and recommends legislative action to check the spread of prostitution on the lines of the Bill drafted by the Madras Vigilance Society."

In moving the resolution, she said that in India to-day man was the supreme master as husband. Woman from childhood had been taught to look upon her husband as her master and everything. Though this was a beautiful ideal, she deplored that the same did not apply to men. Child marriage was the first and foremost immoral thing which they ought to win over. She appealed to them to support the resolution and put an end to the practice of child marriage. Mrs. Cousins, in seconding the resolution, referred to the growth of the evil to enormous dimensions in Bombay.

The President made a few remarks on the resolution and said that this commercialised vice belonged not to one particular province but that it was a big inter-provincial and almost inter-national organisation. This system of brothel keeping was a great national danger which every one should endeavour to remedy.

The resolution was put to vote and carried.

Untouchability.

Mrs. Parijatham moved:

"This Conference views with grave apprehension the continuation of the practice of untouchability in India and exhorts Hindus of all classes to remove all restrictions imposed upon the so-called ‘untouchables’ in the matter of admission to schools, colleges and hostels, use of public roads, wells, tanks and chowtries, and entry into places of worship and thus bring about a greater solidarity in Hindu Society; and it pledges its full support to these classes for every proper effort by them to get rid of these evils. This Conference is further of opinion that Government grant should not be made and affiliation refused to the educational institutions which exclude children on the ground of race or religion or colour."

She said that untouchability was the greatest blot in society and religion. What was untouchability? A large section of their Hindu brethren were considered to belong to a community with which other communities had nothing to do whatsoever. They were denied the most elementary rights of humanity for the mere sin of their being born in that isolated section. She said there was nothing as untouchability and to keep away a section from us was the greatest sin one can ever do. No constitutional reform or self-government can do anything so long as they kept a section of their brethren away from participating in their Society.

Mrs. Basant seconded the resolution and said that in all questions of changes being made in the life of a nation there was one particular question that came to the forefront. That question was whether in trying to gain rights they did not first make up their mind whether they were going to pull down or to raise up. In all questions where the reforms are to be brought about for that welfare of a nation they had either to carry them out in the spirit of love or in the spirit of hate or in the spirit of her brotherhood or of comfort. It seemed to her that untouchability was putting one man out from society. It has been custom rather than law and the customs that were imposed on some people made them to be kept inferior and others considered superior. Example was more powerful than words and only if they removed untouchability, they would succeed in their social reform movement. She thought that the first thing they had to do was to make it possible for the so-called untouchables to get education and make them physically touchable.

The Theosophical Society had taken in the so-called untouchables and made them gradually touchables. Untouchability was not a matter of birth, but only of habit and she appealed to them to try to raise these brethren who were depressed, up to their own level, to give them the opportunities of showing whatever power and ability they might have in them. They must gradually be lifted up from their degradation and it would be one of the greatest works that the social reform movement could do.

The resolution was not fully discussed when the assembly adjourned till the next day.
THIRD DAY.

Dr. A. Lakshmanaswami Mudaliar who was the first to speak on the resolution on this day, said that he disagreed with much of what Dr. Besant had said the other day on the very same resolution.

He said that since he heard Mrs. Besant's speech the other day, he felt there was some necessity to make his point of view on the resolution clear. He quite disagreed with the view Mrs. Besant had put forward the other day. He said there was no such thing as higher and lower strata in society as Mrs. Besant believed. God has made everyone equal and the image of God rests in everyone's heart. Therefore, there was no question of doubt that this inhuman system of untouchability was incompatible with human Ingenuity. He felt it was nothing but adding insult to injury to tell these so-called untouchables that they had to be pulled up, and so he could not agree with Mrs. Besant's observations. He refused to believe that there was all virtue in one particular community and all vice and degradation in another community. The argument put forward was that the untouchables' speech was repulsaive to others and they were unclean and their habits were such that they had to be kept away from a section of the people. He was surprised that Mrs. Besant, who had worked strenuously for these unfortunate people should have made such an argument. He could not agree that because they were incapable of speaking in the best style, they should be kept away from society.

He narrated an incident that took place in one of the premier clubs in Madras where a member of the so-called depressed classes, a member of the Legislative Council and a professor in one of the Colleges and a social worker, when he sought admission, was black-balled on no other ground except that he was a member of the untouchable class. Till this mentality of this premier club of the City was changed, he was of opinion that social reformers should not rest content. He said this was the only means to solve this knotty problem. They could not pass a general remark that untouchables were unclean and he pointed out that there were many who were cleaner than some of the so-called high class people. So far as this depressed classes problem was concerned, he felt that it did strike at the very root of all unity, and there could be no manner of doubt that so long as they were not prepared to remove this blot on the nation, they would be thinking of only the future unity of their own country.

The President made a few remarks on the resolution and said that he also did not agree with all that Mrs. Besant had said. As Dr. Lakshmanaswami Mudaliar had made it perfectly clear and put his case so powerfully and comprehensively, he did not think any further speech was needful. But that it being a vital question of the day, he had no objection to allow further speech if the audience so desired.

Krishnaswami Swami came forward and condemned the practice of keeping one section of the people away from the rest. Temple-entry was denied to them, and he said that the untouchables cling to Hinduism only because of their faith in temples. If they wanted to purify the temples, they should drive out the brahmins.

The resolution was then put to the vote and carried.

The following resolutions moved from the chair, were next passed:

Social Service and Rescue Homes.

"This conference expresses its satisfaction at the efforts made to care for the unmarried mothers, destitute orphans and delinquent and defective children by providing them with orphanages and schools as well as with opportunities for useful occupation."

Total Abstinence and Prohibition.

"This conference views with satisfaction the growth of public opinion in favour of total abstinence and prohibition and is of opinion that the time is ripe for legislation prohibiting the manufacture, import and sale of liquor and intoxicating drugs in all forms and expresses its approval of efforts made in this direction by associations like the All-India Prohibition League."

Constitutional Rights and Social Legislation.

"This conference expresses its firm belief that the time has now come for the State to address itself boldly and comprehensively to the task of social legislation, regrets the painfully slow rate at which social legislation has been undertaken in the past and expresses its considered opinion that legislative measures undertaken so far have been at the best haphazard, ineffective and half-hearted and urges on this conference the realisation of the fact that the best way of enhancing and accelerating social progress could only be by the Legislative Councils and Assemblies developing into fully and truly national bodies."

Indian Unity.

Mr. O. C. Srinivasan then moved the following resolution on Indian Unity:

"That this conference consisting of persons of all denominations expresses its fervent desire for a free commingling of people of many castes, creeds and races inhabiting this vast and ancient land in the interest of national unity and social progress.

"This conference is of opinion that a simple civil marriage act without any inquisitorial declaration regarding religious belief, be passed.

"This conference further urges upon the legislature the removal of all disabilities in the way of inheritance that
This conference exhorts the followers of different creeds in India not to view with disfavour the change of religion on the part of any member of Indian society and pleads for the principle of open-door in religion, which will make entrance into and exit from any religious brotherhood a matter of catholicity, charity and freedom.

"This Conference is emphatically of opinion that the caste system is the greatest obstacle in the way of national unity and that national solidarity cannot be achieved unless the caste system is abolished root and branch. This Conference accordingly resolves to carry on a vigorous propaganda throughout the country to awaken the 'intelligentsia as well as the masses to the iniquities of the caste system with a view to its abolition."

In the course of his speech Mr. Srinivasan was pulled up by the President twice or thrice and was asked to refrain from indulging in personalities and deal with the issue on the question of principle. Mr. Srinivasan regretted that so important a resolution should have been left to the end and said that until this problem was solved there could be no progress. He said that it was time that the people took up the question seriously and that the whole caste-system should be demolished.

Mr. A. Ramaswami Mudaliar supported the resolution. He said that he did not feel that there was any sinister significance in the fact that the resolution had not been taken up earlier. He was sure that this resolution was more important than the deliberations of the Congress. He said that the caste system was not suited at the present stage of society, though it might have been good in the past. When they passed this resolution, he was sure the Varnaabramha Dharma Conference which was to be held shortly would pass their counter resolution. He referred to the work that the social reformers were doing and said that they should have a type of civil marriage instituted as in other educated and cultured countries of recent times. The resolution demanded that the laws of inheritance should be so modified as to remove all disabilities consequent of inter-marriages. There were other countries where inter-marriages existed and in Ceylon the law of inheritance, be enumerated of the law of inheritance, be enumerated. Inter-marriages existed and Hinduism, Buddhism and so on. Regarding the amendment of the law of inheritance, he enumerated the part played by the Government and Legislative Council and said that Legislative Council and Government were peculiar institutions in this country. The policy of non-interference with religion had been carried to absurdity and he could also show that the policy is not only in the air but not followed, and Government was interfering with religion at every stage. They, the Government, were throwing all the weight of their votes and powers on the side of the reactionaries and the orthodox and they were breaking down the social reformers. They had identified themselves with perpetuating customs. Was not that interference with religion? He said with due deference to the judges that to-day the judge-made law was one of the laws against the progress of the nation and the orthodox pundits would have realised that the changing hour of the moment necessitated a change. He cited instances as to how the Brahmans adjusted the customs to serve their ends and he suggested it would have been better if the judges had relied upon the pundits for interpretation. By these two processes, it was made impossible for the country to advance and the Government on the one side through its judiciary and on the other side through Legislative Councils had openly identified themselves with the party of reaction. Bills were coming in the Council and let the Government withdraw their votes.

President's Remarks.

Mr. Natarajan, in his concluding remarks, said that it was but quite proper that one who spoke on a platform like this one should be asked what his or her credentials were. That question he would boldly answer. He had given up even his holy thread a long time back. He observed no caste distinctions. People of all castes were welcome at his house. He saw no need to go to a temple. Instead, he went every morning to the sea-side and worshipped the beautiful sunrice which he termed "the Daily Miracle".

Women's Rights.

After paying a tribute to Indian womanhood he said the social problems before them were many. Social justice should be the guiding principle which should animate the movement. There should be equal opportunities for men and women, as the progress of society depended upon equal opportunities being given to every man or woman to rise to his or her full stature. The Indian woman must be freed from all the fetters which cramped and kept her down. The Indian woman's outlook had to be widened. Man was only a bird of passage in the home, but it was the woman who was the creator of traditions. On woman, therefore, depended the solution of the vexed problem of caste and, for this too, a wider outlook in woman was necessary.

As to untouchability, Mr. Natarajan was of opinion that much could be done to solve this problem in primary schools. There should be no separate schools for the Panchama children and in Bombay Brahmam teachers were often placed in charge of schools into which Panchamas were admitted. A rapid step could be taken in this way of solving the problem.

Regarding communal troubles Mr. Natarajan said that the press could do a very valuable service by doing nothing which in any manner would stimulate communal passions.

Mr. Natarajan concluded by saying a few words to the women delegates. "Fight against them (men) for getting your rights," he said, "but when National rights are at stake don't divide them, don't go to the enemy's camp, don't try to stab them behind their backs. Stand by them and I tell you that in course of time they will recognise that you are their greatest help-mates and they will give you all that you want and more than what you want. May God bless you."

Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi thanked the President for his kindness in having consented to preside over the Conference. She referred to some of the remarks made by Maulana Shaukat Ali yesterday when he spoke on the purdah and regretted that instead of supporting the resolution as he was expected to do, he only chose to give a homily to women. She, however, declared that women knew how to fight their own cause.
The domeal'la, They not coarse, extension matters the British Parliament to direct that in all social reform, and extending our sympathies for their sympathy and pointed out to them that they should also move the British Parliament to direct that in all social reform matters the official member of the legislatures should be left free to vote, and that the Government should not interfere with these questions as they are purely domestic. They pointed out that the precedent for the course was taken in the case of women suffrage legislation and it worked out very satisfactorily.

NOTES

Unsuitable Propaganda: A meeting held under the auspices of the Arya Samaj for the purpose of carrying on propaganda work in connection with widow remarriage ended in a fiasco. We are sorry for this result which is likely to convey to the outside world a wholly misleading impression as to the attitude of the Hindu community towards social reform in Western India. The widow remarriage movement in the Bombay Presidency has proceeded on the soundest lines, the most welcome feature being that remarriages have taken place in educated and well-to-do families and the remarried parties have been quietly absorbed into Hindu society: In other words the question had almost ceased to be a social problem and had become one of individual choice. This after all is the object of the remarriage reform, namely, that there should be no restriction on the freedom of widows to remarry and of men to take them in remarriage. We do not, therefore, see the necessity of the Arya Samajists undertaking an aggressive propagandism based upon the Vedic texts at this stage of the movement in this presidency where social reform has for many years past been recognised by Hindus generally as a matter for the home society to decide according to modern economic and intellectual environment. We do not want to sit in judgment on the methods of Arya Samajists, but it is the plain fact that they have not commendated themselves to the educated and intelligent classes outside the Punjab, and even in the Punjab, a great change is coming over the movement as illustrated by the conspicuous examples of the late Swami Shraddhangand, Lala Lajpat Rai and other leading men under whose influence a steady rapprochement between the Arya Samaj and the parent religion is taking place. The Arya Samajists cannot, of course, be prevented from carrying on their propaganda in their own way in any part of the country, but, we must say, the social and historic conditions of Western India, require different treatment from that which might have been acceptable to the Punjab. Let well alone is a good motto for reformers as for statesmen.

Social Reform: We are glad that a social reform section was added this year for the first time to the All-India Mahomedan Educational Conference which held its last sessions in Madras during Christmas week. The Hon. Mr. Justice Sulaiman presided over this section and, according to the Bombay Chronicle, delivered a masterly address bearing on almost all questions of social reform among his community. We have not had the pleasure of reading the full text of the address which our contemporary describes as a scholarly production, most comprehensive in its scope. Judging from the paragraphs quoted by the Chronicle, it is clear as we have all along held, that many social reforms which have been advocated for Hindus are also needed among Mussalmans. Something like a system of castes has sprung up among Mussalmans and very often, said Mr. Sulaiman, intermarriages among the different groups are actually avoided. Child marriages, as we have more than once observed in commenting on the Bills for preventing them, are prevalent among India Mussalmans also. "It would startle many of us," Dr. Sulaiman says, "to be told that the proportion of Muslim to Hindu married females below the age of ten is nearly half and that between the age of ten and fifteen is about three-fourths." The Indian National Social Conference has appointed a committee of lawyers to take all the Bills into consideration, and to make recommendations to the Legislature for improving them. If Mussalman leaders agree, a Bill applying to all communities can be drafted and passed as an agreed measure in the Indian Legislature.

We are particularly pleased that Mr. Justice Sulaiman emphasised the adoption of the monogamous principle which is as important as the abolition of child marriages. The learned Judge also pleaded for the abolition of the purdah and for the remarriage of widows. We cordially endorse the observations of the Chronicle in its article on Mr. Justice Sulaiman's address. It writes: "Even a cursory perusal of the existing society to be found more or less both among Muslims and Hindus. The practical conclusion to be drawn from this fact is this, whatever might have been the origin of evils like caste, child marriages, the purdah, and the general backwardness of women, they are common evils at present and affect the progress of the country and should therefore be fought by Muslims, Hindus and Christians in common. The very fact that the Muslims absorbed the customs of caste and child marriages from the Hindus shows that they cannot easily abolish these customs now unless they help in changing the environment about them. It is necessary, therefore, that the efforts made to remove caste evils, early marriages and social abuses generally, should be shared by all Indians without communal distinctions. Some at least of the conferences and other institutions making these efforts should be joined by all communities." The National Social Conference, as its name shows, has been from the first open to all communities, and we are sure Mussalman social reformers will be welcomed with open arms if they make up their minds to associate themselves more largely with it. At the last session, there were some excellent speeches by Mussalman young men on the purdah and other resolutions. We trust that there will be increasingly closer association between Hindu and Mussalman social reformers, for it will be the most effective solution of our communal problems.

An ex-Maharaja's Exploit: Indian ruling princes are just at present very keen about securing their rights in view of the extension of self-government in British India. It will greatly facilitate their object if they at the same time show themselves to be mindful of their obligations to their own subjects as well as to Indians generally. During the last few years there have occurred scandals in which some ruling chiefs have figured prominently. The result has been a considerable lowering of the good name not only of the chiefs concerned but of their order generally and of the people of India as well. It is needless to recount these cases. There seems to be no end to them, however. During the last week, the sensation of Miss Mayo's book was thrown into the shade by the announcement of the arrival in Bombay of another American lady, who, as is well known, is Miss Thakur, the ex-Maharaja of Indore with whom she struck up a friendship during his world-tour soon after his abdication of his gaud following upon the revelations of the Bawla-Maharaja. The ex-Maharaja has two Maharasis living, and the American lady will be the third. Owing to the difficulty of contracting a polygamous marriage in America and Europe, the ex-Maharaja it is said, intends to have the ceremony celebrated according to Hindu rites and with that object he proposes to have Miss Miller converted to Hinduism. We are glad that responsible Hindu leaders are on our side in this. Maharaja must have a poor opinion of his country if he can think that he can prostitute the unity of his nation for immoral purposes by taking as wife a woman solely with a view to evade the legal difficulties in the way of his marriage. If this can be done according to Hindu religious sacrament in the manner contemplated, and it is extremely unlikely that they will sanction the conversion of a woman solely with a view to evade the legal difficulties in the way of her marriage to a man who has two Hindu wives living, the ex-Maharaja must have a poor opinion of his religion to think that he can make it subservient to his pleasure. Religious conversions for the sole purpose of marriage are not unknown among Royal families in Europe, but it is not a practice which is consonant with Indian ideas of marriage or religion. This ex-Maharaja must have friends among the ruling princes, and such of them as are in a position to do so, might try to persuade him to desist from the intended third marriage. Whether they do so or not, we trust no Hindu organisation will consent to convert Miss Miller in order to enable Tukoji Rao Holkar to make her third wife.

Indian Christians Conference: At the All-India Conference of Indian Christians, Mr. B. L. Rallia Ram who presided rightly declared that the community had a definite contribution to make to the life of the Indian nation and that was in the field of social service, education and social reform. The grand consciousness of the Christian community that it is not a separate entity in the body politic but part and parcel of the whole nation found ample expression in the presidential address. The Christian community had in the past uncompromisingly condemned communal electorates and always took its stand on the principle of joint electorates. Therefore it is not a little surprising that Mr. Rallia Ram should deplore the present situation and deem it necessary, though tentatively, to plead reservation of seats for his Community. The Christian community as the most advanced community should set the example, the other communities following the lead. We cannot but commend the words of the Guardian on this subject. The journal writes:—“We believe that this scramble is bad in every way and yet it is said that because the others take part we must also be there. We believe that the Christian community stands to gain more by refusing to have anything to do with communal representation, whatever others may do, and depending entirely upon the good will of the people as a whole than by insisting upon our right to a share in the political scramble. We shall show a path that others will follow. The path of courageous devotion to the best will in the end be the way to political salvation.”

Thomas Hardy: The death has occurred at the age of 85 of Thomas Hardy, the famous novelist, one of last links with the Victorian Era. The greater part of the Hardy’s work belongs to the last century and, although till a couple of years back he was contributing a few poems to English journals, his last great book “The Dynasts” was published in 1906. Nevertheless his influence in modern English literature cannot be lightly estimated. He was a fatalist, in all his books we find the same conception of inexorable nature. At his best when writing of the eternal peasant, Hardy, like the Russian writers of the last century, set his grand scenes in villages. Mr. Hardy, who has immortalised Wessex in his novels and stories, visited in his youth innumerable villages in Wessex. “In the unity of his achievement,” says Mr. Gardiner, “Mr. Hardy stands unique in the history of English fiction. This is due to the deliberate subordination of his art to his metaphysic.” In all his work there is the glorious figure of man fighting blindly and in vain against the forces of destiny. Mr. Hardy has often been dubbed a pessimist even by his admirers but he stands nearer to the old Greek Stoics in his philosophy. In his early days, we believe, he was closely connected with the women’s movement in England and the sketches of women in his novels show his keen insight into their character, Mr. Hardy has gained a secure position among the premier novelists of all time and the various tributes paid to him on his eightieth birthday and now after his death show the high esteem in which he is held not only in the English-speaking world but also in Continental Europe.

Gurkhas for Social Reform: One more instance of how, with the changing times, the need for social reform is increasing felt, is furnished by the speeches and resolutions at the All-India Gurkha Conference. A Gurkha Election Committee, Mr. Thakur Chandan Singh emphasised the need for social reform and urged upon the audiences the great necessity of freeing themselves from the old barriers of false prejudices and superstition and to emerge courageously into the field of modern progress and enlightenment. He deprecated the idea of treating certain sections of their community as untouchables and showed the necessity of foreign travel for purposes of education and general advancement. The same note was struck in the presidential address and in the other speeches made in the Conference. We are glad that among the resolutions adopted there was one inviting the special attention of the Indian and the Nepalese Governments to the alarmingly increasing number of Gurkha girls running away from home and country for immoral purposes by organised gangs and urging on them to take drastic and effective steps to put an end to this illicit traffic in girls. To the Gurkha, the principle of joint electorates is a logical consequence of his status, and naturally the amelioration of the condition of men. With the exception of the above resolution, there is no mention made as to what is due to the Gurkha women. The Gurkhas need to realise that reform among their women is of vital importance to the better for their community.
Divinity is so far as it implies the blossoming of the soul into ultimate perfection is not far removed from humanity. The material condition in itself is a means to that end, in other words, Godhead is its logical consequence. Religions all the world over, even those which are condemned as heathen for not possessing the element of approved revelation, have striven to heal the gross stuff of which men are made into pure godliness. The hard-instructed man has asserted himself in this sphere which really calls for independent effort and experiment. Vast crowds have persisted in following the standard bearer of some one religion or other and in course of time have with true human aptitude taken to man-worship and developed dogmata, morbid associations, eccentricities, and perversities, for engendering parasitical adherence to their particular idol, so much so that the unbiased basic truths have been entirely lost sight of. In India, such pseudo-religious superimpositions have vitiating religions and social life to such a harmful extent that there are a vast number of irreconcilable sects, castes, and caste-mentalities.

Lord Buddha was the first fearless rebel against the unwarranted encroachments and shibboleths, and his revolt took the form of a religion which devoid of esoteric and occult pretensions, was, at once, sublime, rational and simple. This transformed Hinduism initiated by that Arch-revolutionary, ministered to the spiritual needs of the convinced radicals among the Hindus. Such as were opposed to the root and branch reformation of the Buddha but admitted the crying necessity for ridding the prevalent form of Hinduism of its repugnant abuses, paid their homage to the glorious hierarchy of saintly reformers like Ramana, Kabir, Chaitanya, Ramdas, Tulsidas, Tukaram. These immortal soldiers of truth, though lacking the consuming passion of the Buddha, satisfied themselves with removing the superstition abhesions within their reach. Beyond their range, and so far as the majority of Hindus were concerned, Mann, Sankara, Ramana, Madhva and the orthodox Shaivite apostles, working through the exactimonious propensities of their contemporaries, fostered narrow fanaticisms and caste snobbery. Since very early times, non-violent religious wars have been fought between these strong garrisons of orthodoxy on the one hand and the stray reformers on the other. All along the influence of of the reformers though exerted with saintly authority has been either short-lived or not sufficiently assertive to make headway with the result that their teachings have been bodily accepted by the orthodox and rendered impotent by reconciling them with their food beliefs. The turning point in favour of the reformers appeared when there came to their rescue four outstanding messengers of God in the persons of Nanak, Dayanand, Ram Mohan, and Ramakrishna, the first to launch into existence a chivalrous community, sworn to defend, to the point of death, the religious integrity of Sikhism, or the religion revealed to Nanak,—the second, to relegate Hindu theism in terms of the Vedas, and make it once again a vitally proselytising religion—the third, to lift the contemplative theism of the Upanishads into broad daylight, and gather within his high church, all those who insisted upon a thoroughgoing separation of religious and social affairs—the fourth to stand up as the Prophet of Vedanta, which in the hands of Sankara had served as a convenient handle for spreading caste-ridden Hinduism by carrying on a gorilla warfare with the noble religion of the Buddha. By his celestial example and teaching, Ramakrishna taught the soul-stirring philosophy of Raja-yoga and when his mantle fell on the shoulders of Vivekanand, the message of the Master became the main plank of the broad faith of his pupils who drew inspiration from it not only to embark upon propagating it outside India but within her borders to translating it into benevolent action, such as Social Reform and Relief Work.

So much for preface, it is now my purpose to hold up to the gaze of my countrymen the silent and the sweeping hurricane of social and religious reform of to-day emanating from Sri Siddharood of Hubli, whom the overflowing adoration of his innumerable devotees has invested with the halo of divinity. He is the idol of the intelligible worship of his followers who hail from the Southern Maharatta, Telgu and Kerccher countries; with a supreme detachment born of a spirit which partakes of the ethical happiness, he reluctantly submits to the ceremonial tribute paid to him by those to whom he is their soul's delight. Great miraculous powers have been attributed to him to which it would be blasphemy to disbelieve in, as they bear a close resemblance to the wonders achieved by Coubes, psychoanalysis and spiritism—but he is in himself a grand miracle in that his sanctity attracts seven to eight hundred thousands of heavy laden individuals during the festivities held in his honour. To a casual observer, the whole may appear in no way different from the ordinary priest-craft which obtains in an average temple; he sees the Siddharood for all practical purposes, filling the place of an idol and treated to as gorgeous a ceremonial as any imitative object of worship. But underneath the formalism, which by reason of his spiritual eminence, he is unable to forget without causing pain in other hearts, there is revealed the person—the very incarnation of vedanta whose mission is "to fulfill and not to destroy." Born nearly ninety and odd years ago, while yet a boy, he set about "curing the lepers, raising the dead and making the sick whole." In his middle age, he was discovered in a dry well at Hubli and thence installed as the diety of a palatial temple dedicated to him by the worshipful solicitude of his earliest followers. Ever since then, it has been his one endeavour to unify the hostile sects, to discountenance superstitions beliefs, and to instill into the minds of the multitude which seeks him for solace that man alone and in himself is a temple of God and as such a treasure-house of happiness. A liguayat by extraction, he created a sensation by discarding the phallic locket hanging...
Indian National Social Conference, 1927.

Delegates and Friends,

The very pleasant and the very agreeable function of welcoming you, our honoured guests to this beautiful city—a city which enjoys the unique honour and privilege of having first recognised the women's claims and having been the first province in India to grant her political rights that she may share with man the duties and responsibilities of public life—that sacred task of welcoming you has been assigned to me in accordance with the usual Hindu custom and tradition which enjoins on the women of the house the duty of welcoming and attending to the guests of the family.

So, it is my fortunate lot to perform this legitimate function of a woman of extending to you, our delegates and friends from far and near, our colleagues and co-workers that you may participate in our deliberations, give us your experience gained from years of hard toil against prejudice, deep-rooted customs, unjust and unequal laws and help us to arrive at a future constructive programme of most useful and practical work and thus make the conference a complete and unprecedented success.

Again we rejoice to-day that we have been blessed with a president whose love and devotion to this cause has been well known throughout India, a President who had presided over many such conferences and whose selfless labour and progressive views on matters social added to a most liberal and cultured mind which has risen high above all the petty tumults of this little world underground, eminently fit him to direct to guide and even command us to seek the thornless and easy path of social reform.

Dear friends, before I come to the main topics for discussion to-day, I feel we must pay a tribute to the memory of one, I mean our revered countryman Sir T. Sadasiva Iyer, who as vice-chairman of our committees directed our work with so much devotion and ability. Those who had the privilege of knowing him and working with him can never forget that noble spirit which emanated from him; I cannot express in a few words the full worth of that noble, earnest and sincere patriot, that worthy son of India, but his greatest gift was his self-sacrificing love for the lowly and the deprived, his great love and respect for us, women, of which he has given full proof by honouring his own partner and sharing with her all the responsibilities of public life.

Before we begin our work to-day, no longer inspired by that noble presence, let us for one moment pay a silent tribute of remembrance to him whose virtues may well inspire us in our work.

In the annals of no other nation in the world, the divinity of womanhood is so well pictured, is so very well expressed as in our history, art, and literature. But to-day contrary to our ancient practices and to the true tenets of our religion, we Hindus women find ourselves in a different plight, the majority of us being denied education, enlightenment and having been robbed, of our independence and equality. But let each and every one of us bear this supreme truth in mind that the foundation of all communities and nations is the home and it is the mother that makes a home, so if that mother is not cared for, is neglected, the community will not prosper, but perish.

Dr. S. Muthuramalingam Thayarajah.

Indian National Social Conference, 1927.

Delegates and Friends,

The very pleasant and the very agreeable function of welcoming you, our honoured guests to this beautiful city—a city which enjoys the unique honour and privile-
THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,

The System of Child or Early Marriage.

If we want to grow into a robust, strong and self-respecting nation, if we want to teach our full physical and mental strength, the system of child marriage must go because science and experienced observation tell us that a girl becomes a woman only after the age of 16, and her bones take even a longer time to mature and her organs of reproduction can discharge their function efficiently only after that age.

1. No wonder then, that this unnatural practice of child marriage and this trespass upon nature’s laws lead to abortive births and even of the full-sized births, 60% of them do not live up to the end of the first year and it is the experience of medical people in this country that the surviving ones drag on a most miserable, unhealthy and risky existence during the first few years of their life.

2. By a system of early marriage not only these girls are denied the unqualified joy of the most innocent period of their life—that period between their childhood and their womanhood, but also denied the education and enlightenment that is a part of that life that would best enable her to be an efficient housewife, a wise mother and a useful citizen.

Here is the definition of a wife given in the Mahabharata:

- A wife is half the man, his truest friend.
- A loving wife is a perpetual spring.
- Of virtue, pleasure, wealth; a faithful wife is his best aid in seeking heavenly bliss.
- A sweetly speaking wife is a companion in solitude.
- A mother in all seasons of distress.
- A rest in passing through life’s wilderness.

So, could you imagine for any one moment that our ancients expected the above qualities in girl wives of tender age, say 12, 13 or even 14.

In addition to disease, suffering and death by a system of child marriage you deny to yourself all the joys of a happy wedlock and above all you do irreplaceable damage to the future race.

Our Wives.

Again the saddest consequence of all is the large number of child and virgin widows in our midst whose lot is most hard and most deplorable in our Hindu homes. I take this opportunity of expressing our heartfelt gratitude and thanks to all those great men and women from Raja Ram Mohan Roy downwards, who have tried their very best to ameliorate their condition and make their lives less cheerless and less heavy.

Reason and justice require that a system that confines a widow for the death of her husband must equally condemn a widow for the loss of his wife, because the place of a mother to her children can never be replaced in a family and we know that the lot of a widow in the absence of the mother to his children is to be pitiful. So, I think that this is one of those one-sided laws that has dealt ungratefully and unjustly by women, having taken advantage of her physical disabilities, her ignorance and her economic dependence.

Again, friends, it is not unnatural, it is not a violation of human rights, and pay it is not tyranny itself to expect a child widow to lead a celibate life, while the father of that child even in his 50th or 60th year is permitted by our laws and customs and by the sanction of society to take a wife much younger than his own widowed daughter. We must provide them with educational facilities, bring into existence many Homes of service where they will be trained for various useful occupations in life.

Those of them who desire to enter married life should be encouraged, if we do not want to drive them to less honourable methods of satisfying their natural and physiological cravings; also even out of our prudence and foolishness if they do take that step, we should instead of throwing them away protect them for the reason that society is responsible for any lapse on their part.

Legislation to Prevent Child Marriage.

To the proposed Legislative measures contained in the Hon. Mr. Sarda’s bill, and Dr. Hari Singh Gour’s Age of Consent bill it is for our learned President to suggest amendments so as to widen the scope of the bill. I have given notice of a bill recently in the Madras Legislative Council making the contract of marriages below 14 and 18 for girls and boys respectively punishable. You all know the women’s associations throughout the length and breadth of India have been agitating for the last decade or more, for the raising of the age of consent and the marriageable age of girls.

Last year the All-India Women’s Educational Conference met at Poona at which women of all classes, representatives from 22 constituent provinces in India, passed unanimously a resolution demanding legislation to raise the age of consent for girls to 16 and for boys 21.

Since then the committee appointed at that conference have been convening meetings of women and men for this reform in each of their respective provinces. I am sure you will agree with me when I say that enlightened women’s point of view in matters concerning directly the women population of the country ought to be respected and given due consideration both by our representatives in the Council and by the Government.

Even though we, women, are not yet organised enough to come by election in larger numbers into the Councils and claim our rights, still I appeal on behalf of my suffering sisters that in these days of cry for democracy and freedom, our champions in the Legislative bodies may respect our decision and act on our behalf loyally to our cause whether it be in the various local Councils, Assemblies or in the Council of State.

The enemies of social reform try to obstruct our easy progress by putting forth the plea that early marriages being primarily confined to the 13 millions of Brahmins, there is no necessity for any wide legislation of this kind. In my turn may inform those ill-informed and ignorant minds that early marriages are not only common among the Brahmins but also they are prevalent among the Vaiyans, among the Christians, and among Muslims.

Accordingly I intend amending my bill (the Prevention of Child marriage) extending it to all the classes.

I may point out to them that child marriage being an admitted evil, it is the quality of an evil which is with us not the quantity and it is within our power to minimise it by any means whatsoever. It is the bound duty of every one of us, especially our enlightened Government and our representatives in the Legislative bodies to go on with such a reform without any delay and without any fear or favour.

DOUBLE MORAL STANDARD IS AN ATTACK ON THE WOMEN'S DIGNITY.

"Of all the laws, rules and regulations which down the centuries have helped to place women in a position of inferiority none has been so powerful in creating in the minds of men and people a sentiment of scorn and contempt for women as the degrading idea of the double standard of morals."

It is from this that there has sprung that worst attack on women's dignity, that safety-valve theory that a certain number of women should exist, should sacrifice their self-respect, their honour, their comforts, their health and happiness to satisfy the lust of the other sex.

At the present day the continuance of such a doctrine and of the laws which are founded on it is a shameful anachronism unworthy of our civilization.

Both in the past and in the present, women have improved their inferiority, and how then can we at the present day tolerate or connive at a system which transforms a woman of whichever caste or class she may be, into a mere chattel, a piece of tainted merchandise.

So long as the double standard of morals continues to exist not only in law but in the spirit of the moral code also, will the emancipation of women fail to achieve its full object.

So, I may impress upon my country-people that prostitution can never be lessened and much less eradicated by one-sided laws, and one wrong act cannot be put down by another wrong measure.

True it may be that we can never put down evil, but surely by our well directed efforts, just and equal laws and proper legislation we can minimise it to a very large extent as in the case of theft, murder and other immoral habits.

VIRTUE OF CONTINUANCE.

Scientific research and experience has proved beyond any doubt that continence is conducive to the physical and mental well-being of an individual and all extramarital relationships produce very serious consequences such as disease and disruption of family life and is opposed to the higher nature of man.

As such, we have to look upon sexual promiscuity as an anti-social act, a sin and a crime, nay our poets and philosophers have viewed it in that light only.

At the present day expert physiologists and psychologists have arrived at the following conclusion.

Firstly, in the interests of the race and the individual, it is essential that the stability of the family in marriage should be preserved and social habits and customs should be adjusted to that end.

Secondly, there is overwhelming evidence that irregular sex-relationship whether in man or woman leads to physical, mental and social harm. In the face of these experiences of expert authorities and conclusions based upon such experiences, how could we sanction the existence of any caste or class, however ancient it may be, to make a profession of prostitution.

Is it not the duty of parents and teachers to teach the boys as well as the girls the virtue of chastity and the benefits of continence to the individual and the race?
Iniquity has been exposed in all its true colours and attested to by the vote of our Council,

BFTHOL BILL

By the brothel bill, the authority expresses its disapproval that a certain profession on the part of certain individuals is illegal. No evil trade should be connived at or tolerated in the interests of both the individual and the society. So, the abolition of brothels is very necessary. One thing we should remember—offences are offences in whomever it may be. Till now our laws have been so framed to penalise women alone for acts which are also shared by men.

So, it is the unequal and unjust laws framed on the assumption of male superiority, the false and unfounded notion that a certain class of women should always exist to protect the honour and chastity of family women that are responsible for the continuance and increase of the vice of prostitution.

That day, when public opinion changes and comes to look upon male chastity as essential to the well-being of the individual and the society as female chastity, that very day we will see this evil lessen because we know without buyers there can never be sellers and without male chastity female chastity is impossible.

The fight against injustice and ignorance of the human laws has been declared even 100 years before by that noble woman Mrs. Josephine Butler and now has been carried on by enlightened women of every country and will never end till equality and justice is established between the sexes.

WOMEN’S RIGHTS

Even our sacred books, the Vedas and Upanishads, had accorded to women a high and honourable place in society as it has been well said by Louis Jaccollet, the celebrated French author of the Bible in India, India of the Vedas entertained a respect for women amounting to worship.

The Indian legislators realised that both sexes were equal and said before the world that women had equal rights with men for freedom, for the acquirement of knowledge, education and spirituality. So, the laws depriving Hindu women of her rights and privileges and assigning her an inferior place in society must be only of recent origin.

No enlightened woman, no woman with any self-respect can put up with such one-sided laws—laws which have placed us in an inferior position even to our Muhammadan and Christian sisters.

According to the existing codes the Hindu widow is not entitled to any share of her husband’s property; as a “matter of fact the mistress of the house to-day will become slave to-morrow to her daughter-in-law or her reversionary relations on the death of her husband and the daughters are left at the mercy of the brothers and sisters-in-law after the death of their father.

Again our marriage laws which render women a chattel or piece of furniture in the hands of her husband, the vilest sinner and hardened criminal as he may be, need revision according to the changed conditions of modern life. The mother’s claim to the guardianship of her children, to adoption must be recognised and be made equal with that of her husband.

To modify such unjust laws and to make it suitable to the needs of the present day society, a reformed society should be started for the uplift, protection and help of the Hindu women.

PURDAM

Purdah was never a Hindu custom and was adopted by the Hindus and Muhammadans as a means of protection for women during the turbulent period of our history; now to our great regret it has taken such firm hold upon our people. The sooner it is done away with the better for the nation. Men proclaim to the top of their voice that freedom is the birth-right of every human being and no one nation has any right to deprive another nation of its liberty. What do these men do for their women folk? If they imagine that when women are imprisoned and denied the education and enlightenment and liberty and equality, that they can win Swaraj and keep it safe, let me even to-day declare with the force of my conviction that they are entirely mistaken and they are taking a wrong path to freedom. How can man be free when women is a slave?

As a mother, she brings him up, as a sister she is his playmate and as a wife she shares with him, night and day, his joys and sorrows. So let our brothers give some thought to this situation and become wide visioned as to open their eyes to the real issue, before them. Before they even get Swaraj, to make their success doubly sure let them free their women that from this life of bondage. When the women of the country are given their rightful place in society, India’s redemption may still be brought about by India’s women, for freedom, education and responsibility evoke all that is best in the individual regardless of sex. Now one-half of India’s population, I mean her women, being kept in ignorance and servitude, not only are the nation denied their advice, co-operation and sympathy, but they are also a hindrance to the progress of the country.

INDIAN UNITY

It is much to be regretted that the ancient primary divisions into four castes have sub-divided themselves into 3,000 and odd, each caste characterised by a spirit of aloofness and exclusiveness with the sad result that not only the Hindus have become divided amongst themselves but also have begun to look upon each other, a brother on a brother with suspicion and distrust. Again the higher castes want to enjoy all the privileges of those castes without performing the duties originally enjoined on them in the Vedas and naturally the other castes resent at such an undeserved assumption of superiority.

If the Brahmins were surrounded with respect in those days it was because on his shoulders lay the burden of renunciation, sacrifice of poverty and learning. These were the qualities that distinguished him from other people. To take a case from the Mahabharata after reciting the qualities belonging to a Brahmana and the qualities belonging to a Shudra, the teachers declared that these qualities are seen in a Shudra and are not found in a Brahmana, then the Shudra is not a Shudra nor is that Brahmana a Brahmana!"

However it is impossible in these days for any one of these primary castes to limit their activities to the performance of those duties originally enjoined upon them by the Vedas such as the Brahmin to be only teachers of our religion, Kshatriyas to be warriors. Vaishyas to be merchants and Shudras to be only tillers of the soil, owing to the changed conditions of life and the coming together of different culture, civilisation and diverse races. It is nothing short of ignorance, imprudence and short-sighted policy to think in terms of castes and communities when nations are aligning with each other into international unions and associations for greater safety, unity, and for more solidarity. Hence under modern conditions of life castes and communities are out of date and are considered as relics of a primitive age.

The sooner such differences disappear from our midst, the better it will be for the progress ofIndia, because, we Hindus, high and low, worship the same God, eat the same food and wear the same apparel, possess a similar contour and colour. What justification is there for us to be divided into water-tight compartments, one caste claiming superiority over the other for no valid reason, the differences between the Aryan conquerors and the conquered having long ago disappeared by the impact of age?

A wrong and foolish attitude on our part that deserves condemnation from every quarter is this, when the so-called low-caste people as long as they remain within the fold of Hinduism are treated as untouchables, but when they become converts to Christianity or Mohammedanism they lose their untouchability and ascend on the social scale. Further the caste people have no objection to send their children to mission schools where a number of ad-hoc eastern study, but they can never make up their mind to take those very same children into their own schools. This applies both to the Brahmins and the Non-Brahmins, as fact I have met with stronger opposition from the non-Brahmins in the mofussil than from the Brahmins.

Another flaw in our character that provokes criticism is when the high-caste people live outside India, they have no objection to interline and inter-mingle with each other, but on their return to their native land they relapse into the old habits and practice unapproachability and untouchability and blindly follow their ignorant and orthodox relations. Does this behaviour on the part of our England-returned people indicate any moral courage? Does it show that they are true to their convictions? Is there any principle involved in such actions?

To bring about greater solidarity among the Hindus themselves I am strongly of opinion that those caste distinctions must be made to disappear first in our schools, colleges and hostels, in all those educational institutions that train our students so that an atmosphere of oneness may prevail and it is high time that children belonging to any caste should be made to dine together.

Hindu-Muslim Unity

Again it is most deplorable, it is a thing that everyone of us ought to be ashamed of that in the name of our Creator, in the name of our Father in heaven that we Hindus and Muhammadans should be quarrelling with each other and shedding each other's blood. Those who quarrel in the name of religion are only disfiguring the beautiful work of their Creator and incensing His displeasure.

So, the great truth that there is only one humanity must be instilled daily into the minds of our children and our pupils in the schools through a course of comparative study of all religions.

So, let us not any longer waste our energy and our intelligence in mutual insinuations but let us sit down and think coolly and wisely of measures that would bring us all together—Brahmins, Non-Brahmins and Untouchables, Hindus, Muhammadans, Christians, Parsees, Jains and Buddhists that we may all love each other as a brother to a brother so that the name of the Indian nation may stand for unity, strength, peace and liberty.

Till that is achieved let me assure you, friends, that true freedom for India will be a far off thing and will be difficult of attainment.

Social Service and Western Sisters

Women of the West have shown admirable capacity for social work and they are playing a great role in the social life of their countries. Wherever you may go, whether to the Maternity and child-welfare centres, orphanages for children, schools for the blind, deaf and dumb, hospitals for the sick and the infirm, rescue homes, social hygiene centres, you will meet this devoted, selfless, enthusiastic band of women social workers, a very pleasing and inspiring sight for us.

Eastern women who have been brought up under different conditions in a confined home atmosphere. With their help not only diseases have been so successfully fought, but death rates both among the adults and the infants in their countries has become considerably reduced. Their love for humanity and their spirit of service is also demonstrated in our midst here in our own country as is seen in the lives of Dr. Besant, Mrs. Cousins, Miss Van Doren, Miss McDougall, Miss Mopball, Dr. Scudder and a host of others who have given their precious lives' service to our country in the capacity of doctors, teachers, nurses and social workers.

We Indian women with only 2, 5% of literacy amongst us, 8 out of 10,000 having the benefit of higher education, have been able to organise ourselves, have studied the country in such a short space of time with many women's associations doing enormous educational work on the various social problems that confront us to-day, in which work we are assisted ably and wholeheartedly by the progressive type of our Western sisters, who have endeavoured themselves to us by their self-sacrificing love and devotion for our cause. For one Miss Mayo who has done us harm, we have had and we are still having thousands of good and pure women from the West who have given their life service to us and who are devotedly attached to our cause. Let me on behalf of all those assembled here thank those good and noble women of the West.

Government's Responsibility in Social Reform Measures

Few of us, women who have come to the forefront of public life raise our voice on behalf of our suffering sisters and ask for reforms. We have memorialised and petitioned to the Government to strengthen the hands of our champions in the Councils and in the Assembly and we naturally expect a good and enlightened Government to respond readily to our call for help and even if they do not find their way to take initiative in such good, urgent and much needed reform, at least to embrace the very first opportunity given to them when private members bring any bill or resolution to improve the women's lot in this country, but to our dismay and disappointment, what do we find? We all know what the Government's attitude was when Mr. Sarda's bill was introduced. Even at this very last minute of our meetings, inspire of our memorials and petitions, the Government member Hos, Crear brought a dilatory motion to delay such a good and urgent legislation on the plea of religious neutrality even after our Hindu leaders like our Lalaji Lajpat Rai, Mr. Jayakar, Mr. S. Sreenivasa Iyengar and Mr. M. K. Acharya have repeatedly assured that Hindu religion does not sanction child marriages and even after they found that enlightened Hindu opinion was in favour of the bill, even after the native states like Mysore Baroda, and Bharatpur legislated to that effect.

Again in the demand for the Devadasi legislation, the representatives of the Council have been asking for legislation for the last half a century or so to abolish the custom of dedicating young girls or young women to the temples for purposes of prostitution because now-a-days, whatever the original object might have been, dedication of a girl to a temple signifies nothing but dedication to a life of vice, and our revered late lamented countrymen Sir T. Sadasiva Iyer and P. R. Sundaram Iyer in their judgment at the Madras High Court have said that dedicating a girl means alienating her into the life of a prostitute and there is not even in our religion that sanctions such an immoral institution and again in the U. O. of Mysore it is explicitly stated that the Devadasi institution has been done away with in the Mysore temples because of immoral and vicious lives led by these women.

In 1912 and 1913 the three bills were brought by Menjor Dadabhai Nadoliker and Madame, to suppress this evil. In 1924 Dr. Gort's resolution to abolish dedication in the temples had been voted upon unanimously by the Assembly. The 1924 amendment is the penal code having failed to stop the evil why is the delay on the part of the Government to put down once for all with an effective legislation the most heinous crime on earth? Mysore has tackled this Devadasi problem most wisely even as early as 1909. Cannot the enlightened British Government follow in the foot-steps of the progressive native states even if they do not want to offend the orthodox feelings?

The other day what was the reply of the Government to the Hon. Mr. V. Ramadasa Pantulu's resolution to end the Devadasi system? Even to-day after 150 years of their stay with us, our Government seem to doubt the fact that the dedication of a girl amounts to her employment as a prostitute. Have we not given sufficient proof already by the vote of our Councils? I may also point out to them once more that a resolution recommending to the Government to put down this pernicious practice with a firm hand has been unanimously voted upon by the Madras Council at its last session. Again the Government advised the Hon. V. Ramadasa to refer the resolution of the public and women and public associations in the Presidentcy to prosecute the culprit.

"As for educating the public opinion, we have been doing it for the last 60 years and we have wide public support behind us. If people could be so easily educated; in these matters as to take the law in their own hands where is the necessity for any Government or Parliament. Therefore without the help of legislation we will have to wait till the Doomeday for getting rid of these social evils. Even we women have become discontented and have begun to grumble at the hand inaction and uselessness of our Government towards social legislation in general.

I can only quote the words of the social reformers to bring back to their memory the names of those eminent British Statesmen Lord William Bentinck who won the stroke of the principle so-called "Saty" and Mr. Grant who validated the widow remarriage act in the following words, "If he knew certainly that but one little girl would be saved from horrors of Brahmacharya by the passing of this Act, he would pass it for her sake: if he believed, as firmly he believed the contrary, that the Act would be wholly a dead letter, he would push it as far as possible toward the death name," Glory and honour to those eminent and high-minded British Statesmen.

In conclusion, Delegates and friends, regarding accommodation and other conveniences, if we fall short of your expectations, let me in all humility assure you, friends, that our love and respect for you is none the less and with your usual generosity and kindness characteristic of the Indian mind, we fully hope and trust that you would attribute such lapse on our part to our inexperience and ignorance, but certainly not to indifference or disrespect.

Let me on behalf of the committee thank you for your kind response to our invitation and hearty cooperation with us and for your patient hearing.

THE SOCIAL CONFERENCE AT BOMBAY.

The Bombay Session of the Indian National Social Conference was held, on the 30th December, in the Sir Cowasji Jehangir Hall, the Hon. Sir Shankarrao Chhatnivas presiding. There was a fairly large attendance. Among those present were Mr. Pais B. Teyekhi Mr. C. Y. Chintamani, the Hon. Mr. B. V. Fadare, the Hon. Mr. Justice Madgaokar, Mr. B. V. Jadav, Mr. N. M. Joshi, and Mr. V. N. Chandavarkar.

Mr. G. K. Devadas's Welcome Address.

Fellow-Delegates, Ladies, and Gentlemen,

It is with the greatest pleasure that I welcome you to this Session in Bombay of the Indian National Social Conference organized as for the purpose of and in conjunction with the 10th Session of the National Liberal Federation of India. I have no doubt that you will not only profit by attending it but also help it by active participation in its proceedings. I would now like to make a few observations as to how, there come to be held two sessions of this conference in two different places—one in Madras over which my friend Mr. K. Natarajan presided on the 27th instant and another in Bombay which you are attending to-day. Of late the active workers in the cause of organized social reform have begun to feel that time has arrived when sessions of social conference should be arranged independently. But till such policy which has been generally approved comes to be put into force, there has been a General agreement that meetings of the National Social Conference should be organized whenever and wherever large congregations of Indian people meet, so that systematic propaganda is given in social and political matters, and it is carried on vigorously. Thus the more we have such meetings the merrier and brighter it is for the advancement of enlightened thought on matters of social reform.

It is idle to deny the existence of some evident signs of an awakening in important directions of social betterment. And only those who share His Kathiravan's Mayo's pernicious critical spirit or undue pessimism fail to recognize the changes that are steadily taking place. It is a happy augury for India that her soul should feel stirred at the wrong imputations of neglect of reform and the alleged distance for working out desirable changes in the governing environment. The spirit of the age is a powerful factor in social evolution, and the leaven of Democracy is affecting the whole world. Our international position is bound to bring us under its sway. Moreover, the inevitability of social reform has begun to govern the thoughts of the people at large and it is no longer considered a necessary evil of foreign rule. Social reform and need for it, will continue to be an important channel of national activity irrespective of the position of a country, whether their labour under a foreign yoke and national governments so long as human beings aspire to reach a higher and better life. Thus, while on account of the changing environment the meaning and scope of social reform will undergo modifications, the need for it must remain constant. Moreover, Social Reform has today come to be placed on a much higher and wider platform.
and has assumed different forms. It aims at all-round social happiness. Full scope for individual and collective growth, progress, and equal rights and opportunities to work for the same. A reformer of to-day is not merely content with the advocacy for women's education or for remarriage of widows or permission to visit foreign countries. His activities now cover much larger fields of which the publisher recognizes only the large bulk of the improved women. It aims at the improvement of women, and works for the amelioration of the plight of labour, he tries to secure greater facilities for the betterment of the masses as a whole and desires to bring about a social revolution in rural conditions.

The most interesting feature about the recognition of the need for social improvement lies in the fact that a thoughtful social reformer clearly sees the necessity for influencing his propaganda and works the environment without breaking away from them; and the policy of cutting oneself adrift no longer finds favour with the large bulk of social reformers. He thus clearly perceives the necessity for starting institutions and making them active factors of the changing conditions and environments, so as to make the inevitable change less severe. It is a resolute sign of the modern Indian thought and activity that the spirit of enquiry is operating in the minds of the people at large. The readiness for introspection has of late become quite alive and active, and this healthy tendency, it is hoped, will not longer incline people so rest on the comfortable and convenient belief that all their ills are the outcome of wrongs done to them by others. The healthy growth of this habit of self-examination is sure to lead people to the right solution of the problems that confront them. Add it have no doubt that they will marshal all their resources to produce brighter and better conditions, recognizing the overwhelming need of self-reliant effort. In the dispensation of Providence, situated as we are, we are blessed with an opportunity for a great moral struggle and a social struggle to make the Indian a type to maintain the principles and ideals and are fired by the genuine love of humanity, they will have all the backing of the moral law.

heaven and planted it on earth. This is merely a mythological way of saying that cotton was introduced in India from the East, the wife of Taruttuvardan being represented as a daughter of the Sun-god. The Soutras migration to South India was perhaps at the end of the sixteenth century, after Christ. We have taken these facts from an interesting little book entitled "the Madura Sourashtra Community: A study In Applied Economics," by Mr. K. R. Sastri, M.A. Mr. Sastri has studied of the Sourashtars of Madura as being better clothed, more wealthy and better housed than their caste-men in other parts of South India. The members of the Sourashtra community, he says, were dis-distinguished from other castes by their yellow complexion, foreign accent and shy manners. They speak Tamil but it is intermixed with Telugu, showing that they emigrated to Tamil Nadu after a temporary stay in Andhra. The community fact ishes an interesting example of an emigrant group which has managed to maintain many vestiges of its origin amidst surroundings alien in language, customs and manners. Mr. Sastri's book is published by the Bangalore Press, Bangalore City and may be had from the Manager, Mysore Econo-ic Journal in that city.

Wagaries of Censorship: last week's Bombay Government Gazette contains the monthly Register of films dealt with by the provincial Board of Censors during December 1937. One of the films rejected is the cinema version of Nathaniel Hawthorne's "The Scarlet Letter." It is explained that the film is prohibited on the ground that "It is calculates to bring the ministry of the Christian religion into contempt." It is several years since we read Hawthorne's powerful story, but we still remember that the effect of it was felt from that approached by the Bombay Board of Censors.
On the contrary, the book left on the mind, the impression that the ministry of the Christian religion included some men who were ready to crucify themselves to show the power of faith in them.
Bombay citizens have been deprived of the opportunity of witnessing the filmed version of one of the most powerful stories written in a profoundly religious spirit by a great writer, by the crude "censor and thumb" method of the Board of Censors.

NOTES

The Last National Social Conference: We are sorry that Mr. O. Kandaswami Chetti should have started a controversy in the Madras papers regarding certain matters connected with the fortieth National Social Conference held in Madras during Christmas week. He is mistaken in thinking that the Conference ended in confusion after Mr.
Surendranath Arya's speech on the first day and that the President bad to exert himself more than he used to otherwise done in order that the rest of the proceedings might pass smoothly. The exclusion created by Mr. Arya's speech ended as soon as it sat down, and but for the time-limit placed upon the Conference for the use of the Fandit the first day's proceedings would have certainly been continued after the incident. A point raised in the controversy incidentally is whether communal associations can send delegates to the Conference or any of its constituent bodies. Certainly they can. Many of the Social Reform Associations are communal and they regularly send representatives to the Conference. The attitude of a communal body to other communities is not material so long as it has among its objects any of the social reforms advocated by the National Social Conference.

The Sourashtra of South India: Sourasstra is the ancient name of Cutch and Kathiwar.
At some date, which is not settled, colonies from these parts emigrated to South India and settled down to 56 places. The most important centers of these in South India is Madura and other important centers are Kumbakonam, Salem and Coimbatore.
The Sourashtra in these places are known as pathelters which in Tamil means silk-thread people. Their main and only occupation is silk-weaving, in which they have attained great splendor.
In accordance with Hindu tradition, the Sourashtra of South India claim to have been descended from Tartuvardana, the "inventor of thread," whose wife is said to have brought cotton seed from

and those over whom he rules in reality paralyses action. Perhaps the only daring act of social reform, in a hundred years of British history in conquered India, was the abolition of sati. But that was due to the intervention of two men—Lord Bentinck and Raja Ram Mohan Roy. It has never been repeated. The normal course of events since sati was abolished, a century ago, has been for the British ruler to fear the disturbance that might be caused by any social change, wherever religious practice might be even remotely affected. For this reason, the foreign ruler is almost certain to throw himself blindly on the side of reaction. How often, of late, has this been seen when questions of "child marriage" and "age of consent" and such subjects are brought forward! During all the years that I have spent in India, numbering half a life time, I have eagerly watched the course of events seeking the true occasion for humanitarian and social reform. My experience has shown me, that the words "too late" might be written on the gateway of the Government Secretariat time after time. Only when irresistible pressure could not be brought to bear, was it possible to get Government to move. Therefore, without a question, my own conviction is that from the lapse of social reform Swaraj is already long overdue.

Inter-Communal Marriages: There was quite a commotion last year among the Hindus of Maharashta over the marriage of Miss Panandikar with Mr. Khan. The excitement has cooled down. It is announced this week that Miss Ganguli, a relative of Professor Ganguli of the Royal Commission on Agriculture, is engaged to marry Mr. Asaf Ali of Allahabad. It is announced this week that Miss Ganguli, a relative of Professor Ganguli of the Royal Commission on Agriculture, is engaged to marry Mr. Asaf Ali of Allahabad. The remarkable fact about these inter-marriages is that they come at a time when the Hindu Mahasabha and the Mahasabha movement to support the reformation of these subjects is nowhere more earnest than at the present time. Indian and British Marriages: We print to day the first part of the very thoughtful and suggestive address delivered by Mr. P. K. Sen who presided over the Twelfth Conference held at Serampore during Congress week. We reserve our comments on it until the whole of it has been published in the next one or two issues of this paper.
Jesus Christ has been a perplexing problem to India ever since young Hindus began to read the New Testament. The first result of the change of sentiment that any Teacher born outside the holy land of India should have been credited with so much which appealed to the inner consciousness as pure, unalloyed, spiritual and moral truth. We are not, of course, referring to those who accepted the Bible as the word of God and became converts to Christianity. The majority of Hindus who studied the New Testament in earnest spirit did not feel a call to join the Christian church. They made very early a clear distinction between Christianity as taught by Christ and Churchianity as taught by the European Missionaries belonging to various denominations. They accepted, as they cannot but do, the teachings of Christ, and the Raja Ram Mohan Roy who was perhaps the mightiest mind yet produced by modern India, compiled a book which he called the "Principles of Jesus" from which he exculpated everything in the New Testament which, to him, seemed legendary or irrelevant to the spiritual life and teachings of Jesus. This brought on him the bitter hostility of Christian Missionaries who resented a man who resented a Hindu to interpret Christ over their heads to his countrymen. The Raja's example has been widely followed and every religious reformat and, indeed, every Hindu who thinks about religion, has accorded to Jesus Christ a prominent place among his sources of inspiration. It is pretty safe to say that among religiously minded educated Hindus, as a class, the teachings of Christ have become a great constructive influence in shaping personal and national ideals. They see in it the reflection in a clear and crystallized form of the conclusions of the highest Hindu teaching. In fact, some of them have been impelled to trace historical and direct relation between Christ and Indian religions thought. The discoveries during recent years in Central Asia of vestiges of Indian civilization and culture, of which Dr. Lader of Berlin University gave a fascinating account in his lectures at the Bombay University a fortnight back, is sure to prove a stimulus to further attempts in this direction. One Indian at least has taken a bolder line and actually put forward the theory that Jesus Christ belonged to a Tamil colony which had settled in Palestine in prehistoric times. The most common tendency, therefore, has been for Hindu thinkers to try to establish that Jesus was spiritually, if not racially, a son of India.

We were, therefore, surprised to see that Professor Dhiraundranath Chowdhuri in his book "In Search of Jesus Christ" has taken a different line more in accord with the oristes of Christianity in Europe than with the prevailing tendency among Indian thinkers. "The present work sets forth," runs the publishers' note on the cover, "that the life of Jesus, is not historical but only a compilation of the Old Testament and other ancient and contemporary religious literature. It proves to the hilt that New Testament is a miscremon as the Gospel morality scarcely, if ever, goes beyond that of the Old, and always falls far short of the Hindu and Buddhist Ethics, theoretical as well as practical. The book brings to the limelight the startling fact that Christianity, to explain whose origin the tradition view totally breaks down, is, in both doctrinally aged biographically, a combination of older God-smites." This is a very correct summary of the contents of the book. Professor Chowdhuri's studies—no one who reads his book can doubt his sincerity, earnestness and painstaking and careful scholarship—have led him to an even more vehement conclusion. He feels justified in describing the Christian Bible as "a gospel of hatred, a byam of hate from end to end" against the Jews. "It is in the second century," he writes, "after the Jews made their final stand against Rome under Emperor Hadrian and the Christians side with the Imperial Government that a bitter enmty ensued between the parties (the orthodox Jews and the Christians). At this stage the Universal religion that was born of the dispersion of the Jews after the fall of the Temple—a new form of some Jesus cult—was wholly repudiated by the orthodox Jews, though at the outset no distinction could be made between the Chrisiains and the assimilated Jews even, in the metropolis. This repudiation of Christianity, in one interpretation of it, seems to have been dramatised as the crucifixion of Jesus by the Jews. Myths are multifocal. However, in order to save the face of Rome the Jews were painted in the lurid light, of veritable murderers making the New Testament a Gospel of hate. The Bible was engineered to generate a hatred of the Jew for the political reason mentioned above, i.e., to carry favour with the power that be. To render unto Caesar what is Caesar's was never the prevailing Jewish view in the first century."

In his preface to the book, Mr. Chowdhuri gives an interesting account of how and why he has written it. He is a member of the Brahma Samaj and was in earlier days sympathetic towards Christianity. But his regular attendance at the Sunday preachings of Christian missionaries convinced him that the religion which they preached was not a whit less idolatrous than popular Hinduism which he had discarded even from his childhood. "The more I heard them," he writes, "the more embittered I felt within and reaction set in. My disappointment created in me almost a personal grievance against them." But in the Brahma Samaj he found people sympathetically inclined to Christianity. "My bitterness grew from bad to worse when I found the educated people catch the contagion of the Samaj and take their cue in this respect too from the Brahmaos. The conviction gradually possessed me that the Brahma Samaj should undo the mischief unwittingly done by it. But to my utter chagrin I found quite the contrary tendency daily gaining ground in the Samaj. The Christian missionaries showed no sign of measuring their undue orthodoxy in the light of modern scholarship, but they went on merely with their disgusting propaganda to which, against the spirit of the times, even educated Indians succumbed, and for which the misguided zeal for Christ of a certain section of the Brahmo is not a little responsible. Mr. Chowdhurys letter is a sign of a reaction within the Brahmo Samaj against Christianity. Some part of the book first appeared in the form of articles in the Indian Messenger, the English organ of the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj of Calcutta.

WINDOW DRESSING.
(Gr. N. R. Dhola, B.A., LL.B.)

It was said by a high placed British official, not long ago, that a subject nation has no politics. The remark is only too true so far India is concerned whatever be the occasion or motive of that observation. In fact for a great dependency like India tied to the car of British Imperialism, what possible go is there for us against the wishes and dispensations of our mighty rulers? As we cannot have any politics, so we can have no policy of our own. What is the use of initiating a national policy when it has not behind it the sanction of force? All our anger and all our inlust have to express themselves in no other way but in strong protests and big censure resolutions.

We do not know whether India is going to become one nation, or a federation of many nationalities. That is a question which time alone can solve. Let us try to solve our present day problems as best as we can. We have to adjust our conduct, individual as well as national, on a broad basis of self-reliance and self-respect. There is a region of conduct where no alien system of thraldom can bind us. We are free to choose our own lives, unhindered by outside forces. And what is true of individuals is equally true about their group activities.

To put it in plain language, our rulers by their system of government may make it impossible for us to have any other system out of their own choice. We have to submit to it, but let us not join to give it a formative shape in any way in any guise; why be caught in the whirlpool of a Commission that is going to visit our shores shortly? Co-operation, and non-co-operation are one and the same in principle, the opposite and the reverse of the same coin, the positive and the negative aspect of the selfish action. A storm bursts from the heavens—do we try to neuro-operate with it, as being a direct insult from the blue? Similarly, our rulers send us over a Commission which we do not like for various reasons; why be angry over it as being a storm-cloud of insult of the first water and try to boycott it? Our political slavery of long standing is a standing insult for us all. We are more galling in this coming Commission than our every day position of hewers of wood and drawers of water.

The Montague-Chelmsford scheme, embodied into the Government of India Act of 1919 is a judgment allowed to be passed by our British rulers against themselves, in which British honour is sought to be redeemed by extending the hybrid Diarchy.

This decree of 1919 in favour of India, is pregnant with meaning. 'Indian Swaraj' which was lost by us and won by them in 1857, was regarded by the British political counsellors as national honour as an outstanding trust; and hence after so many years of exploitation, the sad trust estate appears to have been squandered away! Our rulers are this day unable to give us back our swarajya! What if they had gone into insolvency?

So this half-way house built in 1919—this hybrid system of Diarchy manufactured in the British Political Laboratory, as being best suited to the infant Administrative genius of India, is shortly going to be examined and sentiied by these wise men from abroad! The Royal Statistical Commission is coming over us in all its Imperial glory!

We did not build this political palace in 1919; its windows and doors are not suited to our Indian style of life. It may show all the glamour of a western architecture; but as our various interests are any how squeezed in it we are bound to murmur at it while we are suffering. The beauty of foreign representative institutions may be there in this house, but there is no simplicity so necessary for us so also any utility. Though the name of self-respect has amply proved this fact beyond doubt.

Lord Birkenhead, the presiding genius of India's destiny for the time being, has ante-dated by two years the birth of Parliamentary inquiry with respect to our political palace built by our gracious rulers for our pleasure and habitation! The gentlemen of the announced Royal Commission, who are none of us, who do not know how Indians live and what sort of a house they require and who are not going to live in this house themselves, are to come here, leaving aside for the while their 'ruling class capacity,' and examine this super-structure from every side, and then make their own suggestion by way of a report to that sacerdotal body the mother of Parliaments! These architects from England therefore are coming to decorate our political palace; they may suggest the painting of a wall or the creation of a new hall. A story here or a terrace there may be one of their plans, though the very base of the edifice be false and insecure. We will have an elegant reading too, though there are big reads in our walls!

There is a suggestion from some of the Indian leaders of note, that a rival scheme be hurled in the face of this Commission; where is the use of it, one may ask? Why does India be allowed to make a copy of its rival scheme? Why then go on scheming for nothing? Sit silent, the Commission may come and the Commission may go, report it as it will, because that is the report of rulers. Though we have to live in the political House they reserve for us, let us take no part, in their sport or politics. By this way only we can keep our mental and moral independence. The body may have to submit, let our spirit be free.

Let us not catch at the straw of co-operation with the Commission, nor unwittingly be caught by the deluding cries of non-cooperation or boycott. In any scheme which our rulers will formulate for us, let not the whole British world say about us that we were seeking a place in it, or we sought our remedy in an ineffectual boycott.

Commissioners will be there in ample measure visiting us like political locusts from the cold-climate of our rulers, but our only mission is to build our own future with a keen sense of self-respect, entirely without the aid or interference benevolent or otherwise of a foreign agency. The process may be slow but the method is sure; and God granting us patience it will not be too much to hope that before long we Indians also will stand abroad as an independent nation of the world.
OUR TRAVANCORE LETTER.

(From Our Correspondent.)

Women Fight for Employment.

Travancore has the unique distinction of being the most advanced state in all India in the matter of female literacy. Whether this is a point for credit or discredit, it has given rise to a movement being started by the ladies of the station. About a dozen lady graduates circulated a notice for a public meeting of ladies and in pursuance of this notice the meeting came off at the Retta Girls' High School. The object of the meeting was to consider the present situation of unemployment among the literate ladies—including graduates and undergraduates—created by the system of education given to women. In the various speeches made pointed attention was drawn to the fact that boys and girls were being given the same system of education but there was not enough scope to make use of the knowledge they had acquired. The Educational and Medical Departments were thrown open to them. They are now filled by women and no more posts are to be found for women in these two branches of the public service. They, therefore, demand that the other branch of the public service should also be thrown open to them. There were already several graduates among them who, having knocked at the doors of the Education Department, have been told that for some time to come there would be no need for 'teachers'. In these circumstances they insist on being treated on an equal footing with men, the only test applied being qualification under the Travancore Service Regulations. With a view to having a persistent and continuous agitation, an association has been formed of which the members are graduates and undergraduates who are qualified under the Travancore Service Regulations.

The Co-operative Movement.

Every visitor has been congratulating the State on the marvellous progress made in the Co-operative movement. The latest additional testimony is from the two competent critics, Rao Bahadur Professor Harsu-manta Ray, late B.B. Presidency College, Madras, and Mr. A. Sivarama Menon, B.A., B.1.a., High Court Yakti, Madras, both of whom have been enthusiastic organisers and promoters of the Triplicane Urban Co-operative Union—the biggest distribution Society in India. In the course of the addresses they delivered at the fifth Co-operative Conference held at Sheshatalli in North Travancore at which 1,200 delegates were present besides 8,000 visitors, the former spoke highly of the enthusiasm of the Travancore Co-operatives and stressed the need for the wider spread of the non-credit co-operation and of consumers' co-operation. Mr. Menon who was elected President of the Conference eulogised the Travancorense on the admirable measure of success attained. But he pointed out one disquieting feature, namely, the communal basis on which co-operative societies were formed and conducted. That 44 per cent. of the total number of co-operative societies should be communal and distributed among 19 communities was a highly undesirable state of affairs. It was against the spirit of co-operation and militated against the very central and cardinal principle on which co-operation was based. He advised the people to have craftsmen's societies and not communal societies. He asked the Travancore Government to establish Land Mortgage Banks as the sole remedy to remove indebtedness of the agricultural population. In conclusion he appealed for continuous propaganda work being conducted in the rural area of the State. The Conference met for two days and was an undoubted success.

H. H. THE MAHARAJAH.

It is gratifying news to us to know that His Highness Sri Chithra Tirumal, Maharaja, who is now touring northern India, is winning golden opinions from every one as a keen-sighted, quick-witted and shrewd observer of men and things. No wonder that it is so, for he is being brought up by a Maharani who is highly enlightened, of broad culture, Catholic views and great powers of observation and adjustment.

The Future of Brahmo Samaj.*

How can you thank sufficiently for the great honour you have done me by asking me to preside over the deliberations of this Conference. I am by no means qualified for the task; and while my embarrassments on that account is almost overwhelming, my grateful appreciation of your kindness is equally true and deep-felt.

Is It a Retrograde Movement?

My first impulse on receiving the invitation from the Secretary a few days back was to say 'No'. Apart from my incapacity and diffidence there were other reasons why I hesitated for a time to accept the office so kindly offered. I think it right frankly to lay before you the doubts and questionings that arose in my mind on receipt of the invitation: 'Is it a conference of theists or is it only a conference of the Brahmo and Prarthana Samajas? Is it even the latter, so as to afford these Samajas a real meeting ground for a heart to heart converse on matters that vitally concerned them? Or is it only an occasion for social and intellectual amenities? I do not suggest for a moment that such amenities are in themselves unwelcome or void of all significance. Yet I cannot help feeling that if those were all, the Theistic Conference would hardly justify its existence before the world. Lastly, are we here for drawing up resolutions regarding Brahmo and Prarthana Samaj propaganda, or is there a wider or higher significance that must attach to it, namely, of drawing all theists closer to each other. I am not satisfied in my own mind that the Theistic conference has so far succeeded, or even attempted to offer a common platform for theists of all shades of thought, faith and discipline to meet and discuss their spiritual needs and aspirations. To my mind all who are not avowed atheists, the Hindu and the Muslim, the Christian and the Buddhist and the Zoroastrian, the Sikhs and the Arya Samajists, the Unitarian and the Trinitarian, the Bahai and the Vahbahnavas, the Shaktis and the Shaktas, have a legitimate place in the scheme of this conference. These are questions which have often distressed me. From the point of view that I have submitted to you, the Chicago Parliament of Religions of 1893 was a move in the right direction, a move forward, onward.

* The full text of Mr. P. K. Sen's presidential address at the All-India Theistic Conference held at Madras on the 27th December 1927.
heavenward; and the Theistic conference must stand condemned as a retrograde movement. When I say this, I obviously take the condemnation on my head as one of you. But I owe it to you to express openly what I feel so that in the deliberations that will ensue we may, as fellow pilgrims, try and realize the position and come to some understanding of each other’s views on the subject.

A CAMPAIGN ON CONSTRUCTIVE EFFORT NEEDED.

This is not all. There are other doubts and difficulties that arise in my mind. Let me make a clean blood of them. The Theistic Conference has so far failed to fall into line with our national endeavours. It has kept aloof from the current of national life and consciousness. The Brahmo and the Prarthana Samajas will, I fear, fail to fulfill their destiny unless they fall into line with the life of the nation and address themselves, in common with all, to the solution of national problems. Pre-eminent amongst these are the campaign against unreasoning orthodoxy and irrationality. In view of the rising generation, the campaign against illiteracy and indifferentism among the masses; the campaign against intemperance and Abkari, the campaign against caste and untouchability and, alas, as is unfortunately the case in this province, even unapproachability, the camaign against prostitution and destitution, the campaign against all manner of evil and unreality. By this I do not mean a campaign of agitation pure and simple, a negative protest without being followed up by actual positive work, but I mean a campaign of constructive effort. Endeavours such as those I have mentioned must necessarily be carried on with the hearty and active co-operation of all, irrespective of the particular religious communions to which they may belong. If those of us who belong to the Brahmo and Prarthana Samajas hesitate to join hands with any but those that belong to our little communions we are undone.

Alas! this is how we have brought isolation upon ourselves and, if we do not take heed betimes and throw ourselves into the life of humanity at large, we are doomed to die the death of isolation.

INDIFFERENCE AND INACTION.

Let me be more explicit. For, frankness is of the essence of a Conference. If there is aught in what I have said and am going to say that does not commend itself to you, and if you do not see eye to eye with me, may I not hope that you will take it as the spontaneous expression of my deepest consciousness and therefore forgive it if you cannot endorse it. There is a feeling in certain quarters that in order to retain the integrity of the Brahmo ideal we must keep clear of anything that savours of idolatry and superstition—anything that savour of unreasoning orthodoxy. Time was when the Brahmo Samaj in the first flush of its protest had to be sterilly uncompromising in its attitude in order not to be misunderstood. That stage is long past. The Brahmo ideal now stands out clear and unambiguous. What was necessary then would be an anachronism now. It is at the present day a mighty tree no longer to be heded round with barbed wire fencing. It should now give protection to all that need it. The Brahmo should now go forth into all ranks and work for the service of humanity unperturbed by the thought that the integrity of his ideal will be affected by conjoint action with fellow-theists of other persuasions.

SOLUTION OF HINDU MUSLIM PROBLEM.

May I be permitted to advert to another phase of our indifference or inaction? If there is any communion well-fitted to take up the question of communal troubles in right earnest, it is the theistic communion. If the Hindu theists and the Muslim theists are not able to solve their differences between themselves, what justification has the theist who claims to be, on principle and by tradition, Hindu as well as Muslim, to keep aloof in indifference? Is not this the most vital question of the hour? Do we not realise that no pact, no understanding, no Congress-Muslim-League Scheme, no Unity Conference, however well organised, can solve the difficulty?
What will solve it is a true and inward appreciation of the mutual cultures and creeds, of a consciousness of truth of Hindu theism, of the truth of Muslim theism as real parts and parcels of the dispensation of God.
Then and then only will the Prophets of all religious Dispositions stand out as the elder brothers of humanity in claiming the homage and reverence of Hindu and Muslim alike. There was a remarkable manifestation of the power of true mutual understanding at Simla during the session of the last Unity Conference. The difficulty arose there about the place at which such a conference could meet. Neither a Hindu institution nor Muslim institution would, it was thought, answer the purpose. But they all unanimously decided on holding Conference in the Nawa Vilhan Mandir at Simla. For they felt that the New Dispensation made no difference between one faith and another, but in its eyes all religions were true. The point, therefore, is clear that by our apathy and inaction in this regard we are proving ourselves unworthy of our true place in national life and abusing our position of trust and responsibility.

PROBLEM OF UNTOUCHABILITY.

Similar is the case with the so-called problem of untouchability. If there is any body or brotherhood that should have taken the lead in this matter, it is the Theistic Brotherhood. What claim have we to be regarded as the inheritors of theistic traditions if we have not done anything to kill untouchability? What right have we to preach universal brotherhood from our Mandirs if we have not as yet put our shoulders to the wheel of that Chariot of Jagnath that is destined to crush the life out of untouchability? With what face do we approach our Father in Heaven when we have done nothing to bring our neglected brothers by the hand to the Shree Khetra the federation of humanity at large from which they are cruelly shut out? Forgive me when I tell you that our self-condemnation cannot be too strong, nor our penance too great, for the culpable indifference we have been guilty of in this most emergent matter.

Now let me ask to look at the other side of the picture. Let me tell you what proved to me an irresistible temptation to come and throw myself into your midst. Even as a meeting ground only for members of the Brahmo and Prarthana Samajas this conference should offer inestimable advantages. It is a season when all who have been nourished by the food of the Brahmo faith—and I include our brothers of the Prarthana Samaj within that description—may meet and exchange Ideas in true brotherly fellowship. Many and varied are the precious truths vouchsafed to us by the Brahmo Samaj and though we may not all have been able to fling our doors wide open and receive the light of that faith in the fullest measure, yet, what we have received is enough to place us under a deep debt of gratitude to Providence for his loving kindness and for the wonderful unfoldings that have taken place in the history of the Brahmo Samaj.
While it is on the one hand a season for united prayer and thank-givings and spiritual fellowship, it is also an opportune moment for severe self-examination. It is meet and proper for us to hold, so to speak, a spiritual stock-taking to cast up our figures in the credit and debit columns and to ascertain our exact position in the balance sheet. It is a splendid opportunity for examining how far our friendships, our spiritual relationships have slackened or cemented, how far they are founded on truth and righteousness and on the other hand, how far they are affected by blind prejudices: unfounded beliefs and unloving detachment from each other. Must we not ask ourselves as to whether we have in our heart of hearts proved true to the best in Brahmo history and traditions or whether we are drifting away from the real ideal of the Brahmo faith?

I plead for a patient and prayerful reading of the history of the Brahmo Samaj. "The past to be known," says Eucken, "must be reappropriated in the form in which it answers our questions. The appropriation of the past, or living into the experience of our predecessors, is also the experience of our personal freedom. The past has its true life as the perennial inspiration of our present experience. The fleeting past is to be grasped spiritually within a timeless present.
The past relives in the conception of an eternal spiritual present with a new spiritual meaning and value in the consciousness that made it its own. A free appropriate activity sustains the immortalized past. History is then a power in the present." History is indeed a power in the present. Could we but put our hearts in the true questioning mood in all matters that vitali-antly affect us, could we but exercise our personal freedom by reappropriating the spacious past of the Brahmo Samaj; that past would no doubt prove the perennial inspiration of our present experience. That wonderful history would then be an untold power for good in the present.

WHAT IS BRAHMO DHARMA.

Many and varied are the phases through which the faith of the Brahmo Samaj has passed in its rich and gradual unfolding. To the ordinary observer, eager to classify but loath to examine deep, every one of these particular phases may appear on the surface to furnish data enough for classification or description of the theistic movement as a whole. The worship of the Ekama-vadwilheyam and the brotherhood of man and Fatherhood of God; or the apothecary of quiet contemplative Upanishadipoetry; or the emphasis on an all round life of thought, feeling and action or the insistence on iconoclasm and social reform, or the spontaneous outburst of Draketi and revivified ritualism; may thus afford an apparently easy standard of classification or differentiation. But truth is thus at best but half understood. What is devoutly to be wished for is a close and careful study of Brahmo history as an organic whole, as distinguished from partial phases of thought, disciplines or activity that are but landmarks in its onward march. Nor is it only the outside observer who is prone to take a partial and one-sided view of things. Even one within the pale of the modern theistic church may be so completely under the influence of a particular idea, doctrine or discipline that he is apt to look upon it as the soul and centre of the Brahmo faith. Hence it comes to pass that while one regards the Brahmo Samaj as a mere movement of protest or dissent from Hindu orthodoxy, another extols it as pre-eminently a movement of social reform. A third confuses it as merely a sublimated form of Christianity.
A fourth welcomes it as modernized Vaishnavism.
A fifth bewails the vanishing of Vedantic Jaanamargami and a sixth pours cold water on it as the religion of drought where there is naught that quenches the thirst and the soul is left to wander on the Sahara of negations. In fact, the truth, the whole truth is in none of these and yet there is a particle of truth in each.
To tell the roots from the outspread branches, to distinguish its basic principles from the varying manifestations, to examine its philosophy and to see how well and truly the foundations of such philosophy are laid in the depth of human nature to watch the march of progress from negation to affirmation, from meditation to devotion, from doing to being, from doctrines to discipline, from the void waste of rationalism to the fertile fields of revivified ritualism; above all, to discern the hand of Providence shaping the priceless gift of a New Dispensation is a priceless reward worth the quest of every Brahmo true to his salt. With a full sense of our shortcomings let us hope we shall be able in the life of each one of us to undertake the quest and press on with it till we reach our goal,
(To be continued).

WOMEN AND NATIONAL LIFE

The following is the presidential address delivered at the Women's Conference at Madras on the 29th December by Mrs. P. K. Sen:—

Dear friends and fellow-workers, I regard it a great honour and privilege to be with you and to open the proceedings of this session of the Women's Conference.
It was indeed very good of you to have asked me to do so. I wish some one else more fitted by knowledge and experience than my humble self were called upon to fill this place, instead of Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, who had unfortunately to leave for Calcutta last night on some urgent business.

At the same time I cannot but appreciate the kindness which led you to extend to me your most cordial invitation.

The subjects which we have met together to discuss are all very important. They go to the very root of our domestic, social and national life. I would prefer to leave the discussion to the persons who are in charge of them and also to other speakers who will follow. You will perhaps permit me however to say a few words generally on them. It seems to me that the most important question of all is education. The more widespread the education of our girls is the more easy and natural will be the solution of our problems. By eduation I do not mean a high standard of university education. What I mean is that education which gives the right equipment and the right attitude for sacrifice and social service.
In all matters of social service,—whether it be maternity or child welfare, public health or prison reform, reformatory or rescue home,—one important question always comes up, namely how far we as mothers should go on behalf of others. I have often heard it said, "Charity begins at home. Let us look after our own families well—that is our first duty. The rest will follow." Or, "the rest will take care of itself." I do not deny that our first duty is to look after our own family, our own children. But it is also true that each one of us after doing our own duty by our own children can still find time and energy for serving our neighbours and thus adding to the joy of service. There are two things needed for it,—the will to do it and the knowledge as to how to do it. The education that we want for our girls is the right type of education which will make them develop the will to serve and also give them the ideas as to how to serve properly. Such education will not only make it possible for them to serve others, but to serve their own children also.

In my humble opinion right education is at the core of the whole education of the right type.

The Example Set by Madras.

In this connection I cannot help paying my tribute of respect to my sisters of Madras for the excellent manner in which they have set the example in matters of education and social service. I do not know whether I am partial to Madras, but to be frank it does seem clear to me that my sisters of Madras have not only made rapid strides in education but what is more important have kept faithfully to national ways of life thought and action.

A Crisis of the Present Times.

The great craving of the moment is to imitate and adopt western manners and customs. There are a great many things that we can with profit learn from our sisters of the west,—for instance we may learn to be truly practical.

Let us emulate their virtues in the fullest measure, but let us take good care to add them to our own and not lose our own national view-point.

The time has come when those of us who have seen social work in other countries, those who have received the advantages of that experience, should give of their best to their less fortunate sisters. We waste a lot of our time, energy and money on pleasures and luxuries which are neither profitable to ourselves nor to anybody else. Is it not possible to deny ourselves some of these and devote the savings of time and money to social service? Our motherland demands it from us and I am sure we shall not turn a deaf ear to the country's call.

With these words I have the privilege of asking you to begin the work of the day.

The Distress in Orissa.

(By Mrs. C. P. Andrews.)

It has been very difficult to get first hand information about the distress in other parts of Orissa. The areas chiefly affected by the flood are not easy to approach. But evidence is accumulating every day, and I am trying to give out that which is very carefully written by eye-witnesses. I have extracted from two personal letters the accounts which are given below. They corroborate much which is given in other letters and which I have seen with my own eyes. I shall be very grateful to the Editor of the Indian Social Reformer if he can find space for them in his columns.

The Rev. W. Boyd Tucker, on November 23rd wrote as follows:—

"I find that the reports of distress and poverty have not been in the least overdrawn. The first village we visited, Alai, has 25 families with only five or six men remaining at home; they have practically no crop, half of the houses were damaged by the flood and the rest in a bad state of repair, owing to inability to procure straw since flood has destroyed their crops for the last 11 years—so they said. This is in the Raia of Kanika's estate, and there are about 11 or 12 other villages in exactly the same condition there, besides miles and miles of others whose crops have been destroyed. Even their water in the tanks is salty since the flood.

In another part, Daspur, a village we visited, we found that out of a total acreage of 400 acres only 30 are producing a harvest and that not more than four annas owing to failure of late rains. In the vicinity of Khagang Bangalow we visited several villages where the crops have been destroyed. In Chataraf we found 30 out of 62 houses damaged and many men gone to Calcutta. These men are reported to have been unsuccessful in finding work and send back very little money. We met the Relief Officer in this area who is waiting now for the money to be distributed to the villagers in this area."

The Rev. H. W. Frost writes as follows:—

"I left here on November 28th and returned on December 1st. I motored as far as Pir Hat, about the 17th mile, and rode on a bicycle the remainder of the distance. From Pir Hat on to Misto the impression of the state of the land, West and South of the road, was that practically no rice had been raised. There were acres of fallow land. On the East side of the road replanting had been possible, but the paddy was on the whole short and the crop cannot be anywhere near a full yield as October rains failed and the kernels did not fill out well.

On the 30th November I went from Chandballi, on foot, nine miles to Chraridla, which is about one-half mile from the Metly River. Over the first two miles I saw that they were cutting rice. From there on, here and there, for the remainder of the distance there were a few patches planted, but for the last three miles I walked over dried mud flats on which there was not even grazing enough to support a buffalo. The area must be at least four miles square for which this can be said. Many planted twice and even three times lost their crop because of the rising of the salt sea water over the area. A reliable Indian friend who accompanied me estimates that the crop for those areas actually cut will be a four anna one. We heard that a very good crop was being harvested at Jagonia, across the Metly River, but a glance at the map shows that this is a small part of the area. It was remarked of one man who had 10 acres that he could not hope to get 11 pace worth of rice.

The Agarwallas and other societies have nearly stopped distribution of relief. Government relief is given once
In fifteen to some, but we met one group whose condition was abject and who had been turned away. There are many people who have absolutely no crop and are, of course, in debt for the seed rice they planted and which was destroyed. I was chatting with one man who has nine people to care for and has no rice nor any work. The failure of rice means failure of work. I predict that starvation conditions will exist before the next ploughing in May-June, when the men can get work. Then all will have to go in debt for seed for next year's crop and for their food. My heart is wrung with concern for the poor people. I believe that there are a majority of the villages in which more than fifty per cent of the houses are those of the outcasts. Even many "well-to-do" men are at their wits' end. More than once we heard it said that they had tried three or four years and not got a decent crop. If conditions are repeated next year they must leave the area.

In the areas which I visited houses are not down for the most part. But from some inquiry I am convinced that where houses are down no walls can be raised and patched to withstand the rains of 1928. For less than Rs. 15 to Rs. 20. This applies to a house about 9ft. x 12 or 16ft. It has to be borne in mind that the crop has failed and straw will be excessive in price. So many have no chance to work that they will have nothing to supplement the grant which is to be given."

CONFERENCES AT ASANSOL.

(By Mr. Siddharantra Roy Choudhury)

This year the Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, held at Asansol, was marked by a distinct tendency toward Indianization of the organization. The Indian members of the conference showed plainly their nationalistic tendencies when they made possible the election of an Indian delegate to the General Conference in America, and the lay delegates in turn were elected an Indian representative. In past years the Indians had failed to accept the responsibilities connected with representation in the General Conference largely because there was lacking among themselves a spirit of unity which would make the election of one of their own number possible. Rev. E. W. Tucker, and Rev. H. E.
Dewey, Missionaries, wore dhoties, punjabi and chaddars most of the time during the conference. Their sympathy with the Indians and their love toward them has made it possible for these two men to get very close to the heart of their Indian fellow-workers and others that they come into contact with. Mr. Tucker spoke one evening about the impressions he had of the Congress meeting at Madras which we had visited during congress week as a guest of Mahatma Gandhi. His portrayal of the fine spirit shown by the leaders, Pandit Malaviya, Moulana Mohammed Ali, and Dr. Ansari, showed a keen insight into the thought of these great men, who through their love of their country, have made possible the unity resolutions accepted by the congress. Mr. Tucker also told fully the implications of the deep religious life of Mahatma Gandhi, and gave an outline of the bearing of the crafts movement upon Indian rural life.

The president of the Conference, Bishop Frederick Fisher, LL. D., Ph. D., F. R. G. S., already well known in the Indian public, was a source of great inspiration to the members and visitors of the conference. He appreciates the spirit of the Indian Christians which is making possible the introduction of new methods tending a towar'd Indianization. The tendency toward reform in which the Indians are taking the initiative, is believed by him to mark a distinct advance in the Christian movement in India.

The Indian Christians are limited very much in their forward movement, because of a lack of adequate financial support. This support has been forthcoming from the missionaries, and the countries from which the missionaries come, and a shortage of funds has tended to lead the Indians to be discouraged, and think that their work cannot go on. Among some of the Indians whose nationalistic tendencies have led them to a new vision of the future of the Church in India, there was a desire expressed that as far as possible the progress of self support should be pushed. There are many of the leaders among the Indians, who are looking forward eagerly to the day when more and more of the load of support may be taken upon their own shoulders. It is hoped that the spirit of self help will increase year by year, as the Indians accept growing responsibilities, and relieve the missionaries of many of their positions of leadership.

An evening was set aside for the holding of a literary programme and Mrs. Fisher was asked to take the chair. The Indians entertained the missionaries in a truly Indian style as they sang songs written by Rabindranath Tagore, followed by Hindi songs. The missionaries on their part sang and recited according to their custom. Mrs. Fisher gave in a very interesting manner, her impressions of Palestine, before the close of the meeting.

On the morning of the eighth of January, the members of the conference were entertained by the Asha-bure Schools, who sang for them songs of Dr. Tagore.

These incidents, together with others that might be mentioned show that the Indianization of the Church is taking place, and that the missionaries are anxious and willing that it should take place. Uskagram, in the midst of which the Conference was held, is a village of a new day, a dream which is becoming a reality as the boys seek training in the fundamental lessons of life in the Indian village, and the missionary stands on the sideline helping the Indian to find his place.

To one from the outside, who was simply looking at the plans for the forward movement of the Church were discussed, there seemed to be a spirit of unrest and disaffectation with things as they are, and a desire on the part of all present to find new ways by which more might be done toward the upbuilding of the Church.
I was glad to note that both missionaries and Indians are looking into the future hopefully, and I know that if the tendency toward nationalization go on, there will be a steady movement toward a greater church in the near future.
THE SOCIAL CONFERENCE AT BOMBAY.

[January 81

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

In the course of his presidential address, Sir Shankarao Chitnavis said:

"We are living in days of intense political feeling when not only political issues appeal to the popular imagination. We have, however, to deal with the realities of life in our day to day relations; during the last few years even those who placed politics above everything else have been forced to admit that a very large measure of our political weakness today is really the outcome of the debilitated condition of our social structure. Had we tackled our social problems before, the task of uniting on the political issue would have been much easier if not quite free from all difficulties. After all those who in the early nineties of the last century insisted that social reform was really the enduring basis for political reform were in the right and that those who opposed them were in the wrong.

All this goes to show, that there is still great need for carrying on the social reform propaganda (of course understanding social reform in its wider application than was hitherto done) with great vigour and persistence. Many problems that loomed large on the reformers' horizon are either solved or mellowed down both by the force of time and the persistent and strenuous work of strong minded reformers and if the well-winners of the country would show strength and courage of conviction and be not awed by considerations of expediency, the ghost of the pernicious caste system would be laid low in a very short time.

It was Agarkar who said that the social reformer would not rest content until every wrong in society is righted, until every individual man or woman was rendered strong and a free agent which alone would make society and the nation strong. Our evils are of our own making and it is in our hands to unmake them. If we want to be stronger than what we are to-day, let everyone firmly believe that our strength lies in removing our weakness and that is the task before the social reformer. Golwalkar said that it is a land well-endowed by nature but ill-served by man. Let us as true reformers resolve and try to serve the country to the best of our ability, making all the necessary sacrifices. It is service and sacrifice alone that would enable us to achieve our desired goal."

The following resolutions were also moved at the Conference:

The Indian National Social Conference accords its wholehearted support to the object, namely of raising the minimum age of marriage, underlying the Bill recently introduced by Rai Bahadur Harballis Sarda in the Indian Legislative Assembly and urges upon all political parties in the country to support that aim. The Conference, however, is of opinion that the minimum ages prescribed in the Bill be raised to at least 18 in the case of boys and 14 in the case of girls. The conference is further of opinion that the provision in the Bill declaring the marriages of parties below the prescribed age as being illegal and recommending that the parties are being made in Hindu Law, is indissoluble. The Conference, therefore, urges that in order to attain the desired object it should be enacted that either of the parties of such marriages, if major, and parents or guardians and priests officiating at such marriage shall be liable to imprisonment, without the option of a fine, for not exceeding six months in each case.

The Conference expresses its dissatisfaction with the present condition of women in India in respect of their status, position and education. The Conference strongly urges Government and public bodies to recognize the urgent need for the speedier expansion of better and higher education among women so as to equip them for discharging effectively their responsibilities in the family and in the Society and for enabling them to play their legitimate part in the building up of the Indian Nation. The Conference further urges upon the attention of the people of India the great necessity of recognizing the rights of women in respect of property and status in the family. The Conference welcomes the great awakening among women for the amelioration of their condition and the efforts put forward by several organizations working for their educational and physical improvement.

The Conference encourages widow remarriage and is of the opinion that the Pandit system should be abolished.

"It is the considered opinion of this conference that the age of consent should be raised to at least 14 and that it approves of the attempts that are being made in the Legislative Assembly to get it so raised; and its considered opinion is that as against strangers, the age of consent should be raised to 18."

"This Conference while it does not think it right to interfere with the religious beliefs or the desire to change them in the case of adults, expresses its opinion that forced conversions should be stopped as far as possible and that in the case of minors conversions should be entirely disallowed."

"The Conference regrets lack of due appreciation, both on the part of the Government and the people of India of the urgent need of social legislation in several directions and, therefore, exhorts the leaders of public opinion to take full advantage of the opportunities afforded by the Reformed Legislatures for initiating measures of social amelioration and also urges Government to support actively such measures in consonance with their early tradition of bold initiation and vigorous action in such matters."

"This Conference commends the efforts that are being made in Madras with regard to ameliorating the condition of Devadasis by Dr. (Mrs.) Muthulaxmi Reddy; and it further urges that similar efforts should be made in other provinces to tackle similar problems."

RUSSIA'S ANTI-WAR SCHEME.

The following measures were suggested by the Soviet Delegation for the realisation of the proposal of complete disarmament to the Disarmament Conference held at Geneva:—

(a) The dissolution of all land, sea, and air forces and the non-admittance of their existence in any concealed form whatsoever. (b) The destruction of all weapons, military supplies, means of chemical warfare, and all other forms of armament and means of destruction in the possession of troops or military or general stores. (c) The scrapping of all warships and military air vessels. (d) The discontinuance of the calling up of citizens for military training either in armies or public bodies. (e) Legislation for the abolition of military service either compulsory, voluntary, recruited. (f) Legislation prohibiting the calling up of trained reserves. (g) The destruction of fortresses and naval and air bases. (h) The scrapping of military plants in general industrial works. (i) The discontinuance of assigning funds for military purposes both on State budgets and those of public bodies. (k) The abolition of military, naval, and air Ministries, the dissolution of general staffs and all block administrations, departments, and institutions. (l) Legislative prohibition of military propaganda, military,

A Public School for India: As we have repeatedly stated in these columns the Indian Educational system is almost the only part of the British Indian Administration which has struck root in the social life of the people. Attempts on the part of the Government to interfere with its natural growth were strenuously resisted by Indian leaders of eminence like Telang, Ranade, Ferozeshah Mehta, Gokhale and Chandavarkar. An attempt was made from the non-official side by the leaders of the non-co-operation movement to upset the system on the ground that it fostered slave mentality and was therefore anathema to the growth of Indian nationalism. The promoters of this movement wished to found a national system of education as they called it, from which all alien elements should be excluded. This attempt too failed rather ignominiously. Now we have a scheme for transplanting boodhi in India the English Public School. The scheme has been sponsored by S. R. Datt, a Law Member of the Government of the India. The total cost of it is estimated, at rupees thirty lakhs of which Mr. Das has announced that more than half has already been raised and the rest is shortly going on leave to England to select head masters and assistant masters. We have no hesitation in saying that this scheme is entirely misconceived and is sure to prove a wasteful failure. The English public school system has come in for severe criticism even in England as fostering the spirit of an exclusive caste. No other country in the world, not even Scotland, has thought fit to adopt the English system. The idea of transforming Indians into brown Englishmen by importing lock, stock and barrel is one which cannot be entertained seriously. The English headmasters and the English assistant masters from whom Mr. Das proposes to appoint will be entirely useless for the purpose of training Indian youths to fulfil their duties to their country and their people. The experience of the Rajkumar colleges is a warning against such futile experiments. The alumni of Mr. Das's public school will at the end of their course find themselves like fish out of water. The large amount of money intended to be spent on this scheme can be better utilised in a hundred other ways in order to improve and widen the existing system. We can safely prophesy that in the course of the next few years Mr. Das's school will become a public purely for European and Anglo-Indian youths. Those Indian parents who want to have this kind of public school education for their sons would prefer to have it in the originals in England and not in the pale imitation of it in this country.

Marwars and the Sarda Bill: We commented a couple of month's back on the attitude of the Marwari community towards Mr. Sarda's Child Marriage (Prevention) Bill. We publish elsewhere the major part of a letter addressed to the Home Department, Government of India, by the General Secretary, All-India Marwari Agrawal Mahasabha. The Mahasabha is representative of the Agrawal Vaishyas and in this letter the Executive Committee has ratified the resolutions in favour of raising the marriage age passed by the various local Marwari bodies during the past two months. The Committee feel confident that there will be little opposition to the Bill seeing that it is a very moderate one. They, however, feel that the validity of marriages performed below the minimum age should be postponed since the orthodox parent or guardian who performed such a marriage will not be affected as this would lead to endless litigation and as, moreover, the very object of the Bill would be defeated since the orthodox parent or guardian will perform such a marriage without considering the possibility of its being invalidated later on. These two objections to invalidation of marriages below the prescribed ages are sound. The third one, however, is based on a misapprehension. The letter says: "In the statement of objects and reasons of the Bill it is mentioned that the main object, by declaring invalid marriages of girls below 15 years, is to put a stop to such girls becoming widows. If it is meant thereby that merely by such declaration the girl who has been once properly married and whose husband has since died will be regarded as unmarried and therefore not a widow, it is a pure misapprehension. Religious rites and civil law can be the ultimate sanction and support of Hindu marriages, particularly the vast majority of them. Therefore even if the marriage of a child widow is declared invalid she will not in the eyes of the Hindu public, by that reason, cease to be a widow. Thus this object also will not be achieved by this provision regarding validity." The Agrawal Mahasabha has here missed the point. There is no question of girls below 15 whose husbands have died being regarded as "unmarried and therefore not widows," because the very purpose of the Bill is to prevent such marriages taking place.

The Sanatan Dharma Mahasabha's Resolution: In strong contrast to the Agrawal Mahasabha's decision is the resolution adopted at the Sanatan Dharma Mahasabha held at Allahabad recently over which Pandit Malaviya presided. Pandit Malaviya has both in and outside the Assembly expressed himself strongly in favour of the Sarda Bill. It is all the more regrettable that a conference over which he presided should have passed a resolution which, while approving of the purpose of the Bill, opposes the Bill itself on the ground of legislative interference in religious affairs. The Allahabad correspondent of the Times writes: "It was unanimously resolved that the Sanatani Dharma Mahasabha, the only representative institution of Sanatan Hindu of All India in which responsible and prominent religious leaders have gathered, considered child marriage detrimental to the religious uplift of the country and advocated its total abolition. But having in view that marriage being a religious ceremony and not mere contract, it strongly opposed the Sarda Marriage Bill introduced in the Legislative Assembly, considering it a serious interference in their religious rights which they could not tolerate." The attitude taken up by the Sanatanaists is difficult and prominent religious leaders. It is not only the women in favour of the principle underlying the Sarda Bill but they advocated the total abolition of early marriages. They do not, however, desire any interference in their religious rights. Marriage may be a religious ceremony but the fixing of the minimum age of marriage is more connected with custom than with religion. The people have every right to lay down the law on such a question, and here, if a religious issue, it is not, to say the least, straightforward for these orthodox gentlemen to advocate so drastic a reform while at the same time officiating at marriage ceremonies of children. The sympathetic attitude of the Sanatanaists to the principle of the Bill is only a ruse to placate an impatient public while, at the same time, they make every effort to retard social progress. For this reason, the Government will not be in a position to accept a reform which has long been overdue.

Madras Women's Home of Service: We are glad that the resolution moved by Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi in the Madras Legislative Council, recommending to the Government to sanction a special and liberal grant to the Women's Home of Service, Mysore, was carried in spite of the Education Minister's opposition. The Home has been providing education and vocational training for indigent women and thus enabling them to be self-sufficient. It has a very good record of work and as it has been maintained so long by the public it is high time that the Government of Madras help to place it on a sure footing. Institutions like these have proved of immense value for the uplift of women. They particularly attract women who have passed beyond the school-going stage and are burdened with household duties. The Education Minister's opposition to the resolution was, so far as we can see, a technical one. He explained that the Government could not do anything in the matter as the institution in question had not applied for recognition and aid. There is every hope that such an application will receive favourable consideration.

Ideals of Indian Womanhood: Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, in her Kamala lectures delivered at the Calcutta University in the course of this week, dealt with the criticisms levelled against Indian men and women by foreign and interested people. Speaking on behalf of the women of India, Mrs. Naidu, true to her tradition and culture, gave the only and the most fitting answer to the critics when she said "No matter whether we are oppressed, imprisoned behind the walls, stilled behind veils, no matter whether we are treated as goods and chattels, our redemption is in our own hands. We shall break through the walls that imprison and tear the veils that stifle us; we shall do all this by the miracle of our womanhood." We do not ask any friend to come, nor any foe in the guise of a friend, merely to exploit while they pretend to interpret, to succour and solace our womanhood." Mrs. Naidu has shown us her own life and example what Indian womanhood can achieve by inspiring the spirit of freedom and remaining true to the ideals of Indian womanhood.

Indians in East Africa: A correspondent sends us from Mombasa a copy of Mr. Tyeb Ali's presidential address at the Seventh Indian National Congress in East Africa. A contemporary, commenting on Mr. Tyeb Ali's speech, says: "The increasing disabilities that are imposed on Indians in Kenya would seem to make their life unbearable. The land policy, which is aimed at dispossessing the Hindus and Africans of their lands in the country, and the constitution of the Defence Force consisting only of Europeans are too well-known to need mention. These were followed by the appointment of the Public School Commission whose proposals seek to introduce the policy of segregation into the domain of civic life. As if these were not enough the Governments of the East African territories, particularly Kenya and Uganda, are said to be consistently shutting out Indians from the public services. The education of Indian children has received no encouragement by the Governments, and it is surprising that in the High School at Mombasa, there are neither decent schools nor hostel for Indians in the whole of East Africa. The Kenya Government, for instance, says Mr. Tyeb Ali, has "placed the guarantee of free and compulsory education but is restricting its benefit to Europeans." The same racial spirit would seem to prevail even in the administration of justice. "IN SEARCH OF CHRIST." *—II.

We gave last week a summary of the contents of Mr. Dhirendranath Chowdhuri's book and of his own account of the circumstances in which he came to write it. That the Brahmo Samaj has been the means of spreading an appreciative estimate of the life and teachings of Jesus is true. Raja Ram Mohan Roy, the father and founder of the Samaj, himself set the example by publishing the "Precepts of Jesus." The Raja, however, was not an indorsentimate admirer of Christianity. On the contrary, he was a severe critic of the superstitions and dogmas of Christianity, and thereby incurred the animosity of Christian missionaries. It may be stated here that the Raja was not merely content with the study of the English Translation of the Bible, but had studied Hebrew in order to make himself sure of his ground in dealing with Christianity. Mr. Chowdhuri rightly called Raja Ram Mohan Roy the pioneer of the comparative study of religion, especially in the field of Biblical criticism. The Raja, though an admirer of Jesus, was dead against the proselytising work of Christian missionaries, and, in fact, the Brahmo Samaj was founded as a barrier against conversions to Christianity. It is due to the Raja's efforts to place before his countrymen the truths of Hinduism, the truths contained in the Hindu Scriptures, that conversions ceased practically among the higher and more "intelligible" classes of Hindus and became confined mostly to the depressed classes. Mr. Chowdhuri, in blaming the Brahmo Samaj for spreading an appreciation of Christ, should also have given credit to it for checking conversions to Christianity.

Mr. Dhirendranath Chowdhuri in his book denounces the historical character of Christ as well as the ethical excellence of his teachings. The arguments against the historicality of Christ are well-known. The only new point which Mr. Chowdhuri had brought forward is that the Jews in the times of Jesus Christ held ideas which were not so seriously in conflict with his, as to provoke them to lay violent hands on him. The author relies for this as well as for his other propositions on ancient Hebrew writers, from whom he quotes freely. The historical character of Jesus, however, is a comparatively minor matter. The more important question to our minds is, whether his teachings represent the highest spiritual and ethical truths known to mankind. We have always thought that the teachings of Jesus Christ give the net result of the highest philosophy of Hinduism to as to be intelligible to a people who were mostly illiterate and without any aptitude for metaphysics. There is nothing whatever in the teachings of Christ that is alien to the Hindu mind. On the contrary, by trying as far as possible to follow the precepts of Jesus, a Hindu is also putting into practice the highest teaching of his own religion.

This, we think, was originally the view of Raja Ram Mohan Roy, though latterly he seems to have decided that it was unnecessary to use the precepts of Christ as an interpretation of Hindu thought and that it would be preferable to base the Brahmo Samaj directly on the Vedas and Upanishads. This has been the plan subsequently followed in the Brahmo Samaj and more especially in the Prarthana Samaj of Western India. On the whole we are inclined to think that Mr. Chowdhuri's book is the outcome of the strong political reaction against the dominance of the West in every region of our thoughts and life. Mr. Chowdhuri's is perhaps the most extreme form in which the protestant movement against European dominance has so far taken.

Mr. Chowdhuri's book is based on a misapprehension of the role of India in the world of religious thought. We do not at all agree with him that the Brahmo Samaj has done a disservice to the country by disseminating a high appreciation of the life and teachings of Jesus Christ among the people. On the contrary such appreciation is essential in order that India may fulfil her mission. As we have said again and again that mission is to work out a synthesis of all that is best in the religious history and culture of the world. From this point of view the Islamic conquest was needed in order to provide a new ingredient, for the spiritual synthesis. But Islam and Hinduism alone were inadequate for the purpose of evolving the universal religion and culture which is the great need of humanity. Christianity and the civilisation of the West have also to be taken into account and their results incorporated into the future world religion. India has not undergone the toil of foreign conquest and alien domination for nothing. Western Civilisation and Christianity have not only made valuable contributions to Indian culture but they have also revealed to Indians the true method of understanding and utilising their own precious heritage for solving the problems which confront them in the modern world. With great respect for Mr. Chowdhuri's industry and enthusiasm we think that both might have been used to greater advantage in an enterprise more worthy of them. It is a mistake to attack Jesus Christ for the defects of Christianity and the mistakes of Christian missionaries. Gautama Buddha and Jesus Christ stand forth as the two most illustrious religious and moral teachers of mankind. Neither of them wished or claimed to establish a new religion. They lived and died in the religious traditions in which they were born and, if their followers, subsequently for their own edification, surrounded their names with a halo of myth and legend, it is unreasonable to lay the blame upon them.

POLITICS AND RELIGION.

(By Mrs. N. K. Vemathawar, B. A.)

Religion in India is a great force. Its tendency to over-power life in all its aspects is unmistakable. Whether it is the right kind of religion that wields this power is a debatable question. However, religion is to the vast majority of Indians ninety per cent of life. If religion is a thing that touches the spirit, that gives satisfaction to the soul, its practice must be marked by a certain reserve and calm. This is particularly needed in a country like India where different creeds, seemingly opposed to each other, are followed. But there are few countries where the practice of religion is attended with greater ostentation. The religions life of India is extremely exciting, dangerously liable to break into effervescence at every passing heat-wave. At such times false totems seize the mind, and harmony and proportion fly from the land. It is a truism that all religions are at bottom one. All seek the same. Just as all waters flow to the sea, all prayers tend towards the Absolute. But it is equally a truism that no two persons can be animated by the same religious feelings. Millions may profess the same religion, but each has his "way of life." The soul has its individuality, and refuses to be reduced to any Procrustean size and hold a severely regimented system of beliefs. It is the soul's birthright to seek its salvation in its own way. Every one is, to a greater or less degree, a religious rebel. There may be uniformity on the surface. There may be group-practice. Ten million breasts may heave with the same thought. Yet the essence of religion is that it functions differently in different minds. It is as well that it does so, because it makes tolerance imperative, and without tolerance the religious life of any country must become an impediment to progress. To unite peoples with the religious ligature is not always a safe thing to do. And this may be said without denying that religious unity has been one of the main levers of human progress.

Since with all men the quest is one and the same, although they may take different roads there is an undercurrent of unity running from each to each. If we forget this undercurrent and fix our gaze on the passing clouds which every wind that blows brings with it, suspicion and strife are ushered into the land. Religions practice to be worthy in the eye of god must be lifted above the contentious and contests to which material life must be subject as long as it suffers its imperfections. Our effort must be to eliminate these imperfections instead of lending them the religious zeal, the strongest of the forces that compose human conduct, to make them the more powerful. Of late politics in India has become charged with spurious religious ferments. With high intentions Mahatma Gandhi tried to alloy political differences by importing into them the religious spirit. He failed. He failed sadly, transcendentally, he might be. It was the noblest purpose that was ever conceived for India's sake. But why did it fail?

There is perhaps a reason, and it may be that the people of India at large, in spite of the very large space in life they devote to religion, are still some way from the correct religious ideal, the true perspective with regard to it. The appurtenances have overshadowed the essence. The great quest is often forgotten in the journey that follows various roads. The temple has thrown into the shadow the delity within. It is this tragedy that has overthrown religion in India, that has made it the cockpit of warring elements. When Gandhiji poured out the meaning of religion the majority of the people must have understood something different. They might have gone home with greater zest to adore the false idols of the heart to which they have been accustomed. True religion may 'spiritualise' politics and raise it to a higher plane. If it is something less than true, politics and religion had best be kept apart. Politics must from its very nature be imperfect. Give it the strength of an imperfectly understood and somewhat wrongly practised religion and politics will have become a curse thing.

Therefore the introduction of religion into public life must be a dubious experiment until religious ideas attain clarity, and make for the development and elevation of the people along united and peaceful lines. The prominence which is given to religious formulism to-day is certainly detrimental to progress. It is time that our leaders ceased to take religion to the political platform. If our missionaries devote their noble efforts to the spread of the true religious spirit which always makes for love instead of preaching stale formulas disguised in the robes of truth, the beginning of the end of a sad story will be seen. Would the people look within in peace of quest of ways pleasing to God and attain their actions to the measure of these ways a new day will break to dispel the darkness that now lies over the land.

Gujarat Women's Educational Conference;

The second Gujarat Women's Educational Conference was held on 8th last, Mrs. Salochana Desai presiding. After Lady Ramabai welcomed the visitors, the president in her address regretted the absence of the national instinct in the education at present given to women. True and national education moulds their individuality and helps them in accelerating their intellectual and physical developments. Self-help, self-respect and independence are the three fundamentals which comprise education in its real sense; The President condemned in vehement terms all marriages under 16 and said that they should be declared illegal. She pleaded for co-education and for opening of technical and industrial classes and including them in the present courses of instructions for women. "The spirit of self-help and self-respect inculcated in women will alone bring our political independence," thus concluded the President. The conference passed several resolutions requesting the Government to utilise the realization of entertainment tax for the purpose of education, recommending local bodies to open nursery schools for young children and to appoint women inspectors, requesting the Government to put into effect a scheme of free and compulsory education. The conference accepted the principle of co-education in primary schools in the first instance. Delegates were then elected for the Delhi Conference.
THE FUTURE OF THE BRAHMO SAMAJ.

The theistic church in India is nothing but the history of God's increasing purpose writ in letters of gold. From its birth through all the stages of development it is a record of wonders—the Divine Message unfolding itself in an increasingly larger and larger measure, an unfolding through the thoughts, emotions and strivings of the spirit. It has broken down all altars that stand between God and man, uprooted all barriers that separate men into fenced acres, subordinated all authority to that of God alone, laid the axe at the root of all miracles and supernaturlam. But the one outstanding miracle it cannot ignore, the miracle of the spoken Word, spoken through the pages of Nature and History, spoken through the hearts of man, eye, spoken evermore in accents clear and unmistakable through God's own chosen message-bearers.

RAM MOHAN ROY: A DIVINE MESSAGE BEARER.

The first of such message-bearers in the history of modern Indian theism was Raja Ram Mohan Roy. His message was the simple message of divine unity. Ekamevadhitoam, and, as an inseparable corollary to it, the unities of all humanity on the common plane of the worship of one God without a second. But simple as it was, it was fraught with meaning for the future of theism. To appreciate the full significance of this message we have to turn for a moment to the era in which he was born and the various forces that determined the sphere in which he was called to work. The 19th century in its closing years was quivering with excitement at the trumpet call of a new era. The era in which he was born and the various forces that moved it was far-reaching. The century wrought an unconscious revolution in the religious outlook was far-reaching. The impact of theism on the social and moral, political, and spiritual frame of Hindu India had always occupied a place of honour. Though the modern idea of equality of woman never had an analogue in ancient India, it had in the Vedic times been a place of co-ordinate authority with man in the domestic and social economy. The name of Gargi, Maitreyi, Arundathi and a hoard of others are household words standing for intellectual and spiritual elevation attained by women. Many of the sacraments to this day are impossible of performance without the wife taking her distinctive part in it. But numerous circumstances, internal as well as external, had conspired to take away from woman the high place which has justly been assigned to her. We find in Manu and various other works a quite different view tending to reduce her to subordinate position. Moreover, centuries of subject and coordinate position and successive waves of foreign aggression had their inevitable effect on the social and domestic frame work of Hindu India. And woman was the greatest sufferer of all.

The Other Side of the Picture.

Such were the negative and positive forces of disruption at work. We have looked so long at the dark side of the picture, but every picture has its light as well as shade. Each of the diverse decadent faiths has its own peculiar excellence which could not fail to touch the soul of the true devotee. Behind the meaningless formulæ and festivals that form the crust there was a kernel, the undying essence—that could not but tell. The nameless sacrifices and the gory worship of the grim goddess Kali could not hide for ever behind the veil the Awful, the Invincible though Dark and Incomprehensible Spirit that in all ages and climates has appeared before the human soul as the Slayer of sin and the Vanquisher of Evil—of the veritable Shakti that thrives throughout creation. The worship of Shakti in spirit and in truth can never fail to inspire the true devotee with Shakti from on High. Nor can true Vaishnavism ever die. The wealth of love and Bhakti in the heart of the true Bhakta is undying and inexhaustible. Despite the overgrown outwardness of rituals and festivals, of beads and rosaries and Sandal and Naamtul, and what not that engage the unregenerate, the supreme inwardness of Vaishnavism is unchangeable and cannot but live on as a leaven for all men. And the spirit of the great Mahadeva worshipped by the devoted Shiva in the numerous temples with which the land is studded, the spirit of the self-forgetful Siva, He that wanders about the outskirts of towns and hamlets, among the homeless and the hapless, the ill-omened and the unredeemed and the ill-visaged, He that swallows up all the poison of the universe to make his creation poison-free. He that with one flash of fire from his eye consumes all carnality as in an Instant—He the primal Bairagi, can He fail to touch the heart of the true worshipper and detach it from the snares of the world? Thus, the forces of Shakti, Bhakti and Vairagya Mukti were all in silent operation as undercurrents of faith in the perturbed stream of religious life in India.

There were yet other forces, we have to consider the unconscious influence of Islam—of its iconoclastic zeal and aggressive propaganda against the overgrown mythology and symbolism of Hinduism. Let us not forget that in the wake of Mohammed's fiery faith there came also the sweet Bhakti of the Sufi mystics and the compact communal life of the followers of the Prophet. All these made a profound impression on Hindu India which was then at the cross roads. Here and there among the many Hindu temples there rose up Musjids and Mosques. Muhammadan Pirs and Pakeezes like Hindu Rishis wandered over the land. Along with the conch and gong of the Mandir were heard the deep tones and solemn chant of the Azan. Beside the elaborate rituals of popular Hinduism, people saw the strange sight of Mussalmans passing in their work for Namaz on the road side, on the boat-top, in fact in any place where they happened to be at the time. Such simple prayers and praise of God made every spot, however secular, hallowed, every ground holy. It was verily the inspired Upasana of that Bhakta Advayseya—The worship of that Vishakara Bhashaya insculpted in the hoary Hindu scriptures. And then the unique fellowship, the beautiful brotherhood, the perfect democracy of the Mahamadan made a profound impression on the caste-ridden Hindus. It was, indeed, as Sister Nivedita says: "a perfect democracy in which the stains of birth, of blood, of occupation are all blotted out by the utterance of the formula of fraternity La Ilaha Illilla." The silent forces of good and evil, above indicated, told upon the fabric of society and brought on a veritable Jugantar and the religious genius of Hinduism was not too slow to take advantage of the new atmosphere in the national environment. In Ram Mohan Roy we see the spiritual genius of Hinduism waking up to the beginnings of a new life under the silent but sure operation of the forces mentioned above. Like the stream that issues from the mountain and yet rushes itself in fury against its mountainous home till it breaks down all barriers and finds an outlet for itself, the spirit of Ram Mohan, essentially Hindu, lashed itself into fury against the Hindutva of the day till breaking down the bonds of idolatry and meaning-less ritualism it found its own bed in the contemplative Reason of the Upanishads and the Brahma Sutras. With the heritage of Divine Unity coming down from the Rishi fathers of ancient India, with the unseen impetus of recent reform movements like those of Sri Nanak, Sri Kabir and Sri Chaitanya and with the unseeable dynamic forces of the environments in British India of the early 19th century there dawned a new era of reform. And Ram Mohan was called to play the part of pioneer in that movement. The essence of the new movement was "Bhakta Advayseya" in its threefold meaning. First, unity of God or Vedantic Monotheism purged of all Puranic contact; second, unity of all religions, in that at the core of them they are all monotheistic and unidolatrous, thus pointing to the universalism of pure theism, and lastly, unity of all humanity or universal brotherhood on the common plane of universal monotheism. This being the view point, how did it manifest itself in work and worship? Worship with him was two-fold in character, esoteric and exoteric. The mode of ordinary worship prescribed by him is a contemplation of the Author and Preserver of the universe who exists as the cause of the universe of phenomena around us. It was thus inferential in character. The other the exoteric, if I may so call it, it is "Atma Sakethkar" which is possible only to the few that can penetrate beyond the veil of phenomena and with whom the universe is naught that exists but mere illusion. The end or goal is to know oneself as the Self, and such a goal represents the vanishing point of the universe of phenomena. Resting his theism on this pre-eminent Vedantic foundation, the Raja, however, did not by any means preach or practise a life of passivity or retirement from the main current of human endeavour. On the contrary, his life and teachings abound with the lesson of Lokasraya, or the pursuit of universal well-being through a life of strenuous sacrifice and service to humanity. Criticise as you may this Vedantic beginning of the modern theistic movement as initiated by the Raja, criticise as you may the universa-lism of the Raja based on the universal of abstractionsthe least common measure that is to be found in all religions—criticise as you may the universal brotherhood which is rested on the common plane of monotheism to be extracted from all the faiths of the world, you cannot get away from the fundamental fact that the Raja represented the dawn of Reason and Freedom in the modern theistic movement in India. It was a courageous breaking away from deep-rooted traditions, from idolatry and superstition and represents the initial stage of the search after Truth which has characterised the Brahmo Samaj right through. Let us do homage to his memory and to the wonderful sublimity of his fruitful life. Verily, in him, modern theism has manifested itself in its primal stage: its stage of Thesis.

SARDA'S CHILD MARRIAGE BILL.

In a letter—containing the views of the Committee of the All-India Agrawal Mahasabha on the Child Marriage Bill introduced in the Assembly by Rai Sahib Haribdas Sarida—addressed to the Government of India, Home Department, the General Secretary of the above-mentioned Sabha suggests the following amendments to the above Bill:

1. The name of the Bill should be "The Hindu Child Marriages (Prevention) Bill.

2. In section 3 the words 'except as provided in section 5, shall be valid' be deleted and in lieu thereof the words 'shall take place' be inserted.

3. The expressions 'take place' and 'sixteen' be substituted for the expressions 'be valid' and 'fifteenth' occurring in section 4.

4. The following be substituted for Clause 5 of the Bill:

"A person who contracts marriage in contravention of the provisions of this Act shall be punished with simple imprisonment for not exceeding one month or with fine not exceeding Rs. 1,000 or both."

5. Clause 6 of the Bill be omitted.

Explaining the suggested amendments be says among other things:

While supporting the spirit of the Bill generally as an attempt to reform a most devastating social custom my Committee differ materially with regard to the method by which this reform should be enforced. The Bill lays down that any marriage celebrated in contravention of the Clauses fixing the marriageable ages of boys and girls be declared invalid. This is undesirable from every point of view. In the first place according to Hindu Shastras a marriage duly celebrated with religious rites cannot be challenged by any temporal authority. From the religious view point therefore, invalidation of a properly performed marriage is unthinkable.

IMPORTANT ISSUES.

This point of validity raises other equally important issues. Take for instance the revolutionary consequences it will produce on the laws and practices of inheritance. The Hindu Law on this subject will be essentially altered. Let us consider the case of an individual whose parents die after the proposed law comes into force, and leave to him all the estates and properties belonging to them. Suppose the right of such person to the said properties is disputed in a Court of Law on the ground that his deceased parents had not been married legally. The difficulties of such a person in proving the respective ages of his mother and father at the time of marriage can be easily imagined.

In the statement of objects and reasons of the Bill it is mentioned that "the main object, by declaring invalid marriages of girls below 12 years, is to put to a stop to such girls becoming widows." It is meant thereby that merely by such declaration the girl who has been once properly married and whose husband has since died will be regarded as unmarried and therefore not a widow. It is a widely comprehended. Religious rites and not civil law can be the ultimate sanction and support of Hindu marriages, particularly the vast majority of them. Therefore even if the marriage of a child widow is declared invalid she will not in the eyes of the Hindu public, by that reason cease to be a widow. Thus the object also will not be achieved by this provision bringing about validity.

Under the considerations such as have been briefly referred to in the foregoing paragraphs my Committee strongly recommend the words "be valid" occurring in Clauses 3 and 4 should be substituted by the words "take place." But there must be some sanction for the enforcement of the law. With this end in view the Committee suggest that Clause 5 of the Bill should be amended so as to provide that any person violating the law should be punishable with fine not exceeding Rs. 1,000 or simple imprisonment for not exceeding one month or both.

I have, however, to point out here that certain safeguard must needs be provided in the Act if its smooth operation is to be ensured. In the first place a provision should be added to the Bill that a complaint against a person celebrating or contracting marriage in contravention of the Sections of this Act shall be only within a year from such celebration, that is, no action brought after a year shall be entertained. Such a provision is required to guard against marriage becoming a perennial source of harassment and discord. If the marriage of a boy or a girl below the prescribed age is suspected to have been performed, the point should be settled within a year after the marriage. It should not be open to a disgruntled member of the family or any outsider to drag at any time he has a grudge to avenge, an innocent citizen to Court on the excuse of the breach of this Law.

Similarly great care should be taken to so frame this Act that all undue intervention of the Police or other agencies may be eliminated. As far as my Committee's reading of the public opinion on this question goes, one important reason of the opposition on the part of the orthodox sections of the Hindu public is the fear rightly or wrongly entertained by them that enforcement of such legislation may take away the individual's freedom in his private affairs. Wisdom requires that legislators take note of this fact and remove all grounds for such apprehension. My Committee, as laymen, do not feel competent to lay down a definite procedure by which this object may be achieved. But they would suggest that the form in which the Act finally enters the Statute Book should be such as not to restrict the inalienable rights of citizenship. At the same time the limitations and safeguards should not be too strict to frustrate the very aim of effective enforcement of the social reform in question. My Committee trust that the legal experts on the Select Committee and in the Government of India will please bear these points in mind and give shape to them in the most suitable manner possible.

My Committee now come to the consideration of the fixing of the ages below which marriage of a boy or girl must not be celebrated. It will be seen from the amendments that my Committee are of the view that the marriageable age of a boy should be fixed at 16 and that of a girl should be 12. As to Clause 6 of the Bill, my Committee do not favour its retention. In fact, the Mahasabha has definitely declared that the minimum marriageable age of a girl should be 12.

Then remains the question of fixing the minimum marriageable age of a boy. My Committee recommend that it must be 16 years. In their humble judgment 15 years are a little too low. The likelihood is that in the beginning people would get their sons and daughters married at the minimum ages allowed under the law. And it should be granted that the mate of the girl 12 or 11 years old should be a bit older than 16 years. Besides a few years at an early time of life is very valuable to a boy for his studies which are likely to be hampered by marriage. Having this point in view my Committee submit that the minimum marriageable age of a boy should be fixed at 18 years.
THE INDUS CIVILISATION.

The remains now laid bare at Mohenjo-daro cover an area of more than 15 acres and belong to the three latest cities on the site. The best built structures are those of the third city, the poorest of the first. All, however, are built of well-burned brick usually laid in mud, but occasionally in gypsum (plaster of Paris), mortar, with foundations and infillings of undried brick.

The remains are, for the most part, private dwelling houses or shops, which tend to confirm more and more our earlier impression that the amenities of life enjoyed by the average citizen at Mohenjo-daro were far in advance of anything to be found at that time in Babylon or on the banks of the Nile. At Ur, in Sumer, it is true, Mr. Woolley has recently unearthed a group of houses which afford a most interesting parallel with those of Mohenjo-daro and supply still another proof of a close cultural connection between Southern Mesopotamia and Sind. But even at Ur, the houses are by no means equal in point of construction to those of Mohenjo-daro, nor are they provided with a system of drainage at all comparable with that found at the latter site—a system by which the sewage was carried by drains into street tanks and thence removed by scavengers.

At Harappa, which is 450 miles up country from Mohenjo-daro, excavations have now been carried to a greater depth and a number of antiquities have been recovered of an earlier type than those found at Mohenjo-daro.

Owing to its close connection with the Sumerian civilization of Mesopotamia, the pre-historic civilization revealed at Mohenjo-daro and Harappa has hitherto been designated by the name "Indo-Sumerian." With the progress of exploration, however, it has become evident that the connection with Mesopotamia was due, not to actual identity of culture, but to intimate commercial or other intercourse between the two countries. For this reason the term "Indo-Sumerian" has now been discarded and "Indus" adopted in its place. We may confidently fix the date of the three uppermost cities at Mohenjo-daro between 3,500 and 2,500. The uppermost cities of Harappa are approximately contemporary, while the lower ones are referable to an earlier period.

Big cities with teeming populations like Harappa and Mohenjo-daro could never have existed save in an agricultural country which was producing its own food on a large scale. The specimens of wheat found in Mohenjo-daro resemble the common variety grown in the Panjab to-day. It is also noteworthy that there are strong reasons for inferring, (a) that the rainfall in Sind and the Western Panjab was then substantially heavier than it is now, (b) that Sind was then watered by two large rivers instead of one, and as a consequence was at once more fertile and less subject to violent inundations. The two rivers are, of course, the Indus and the old Great Mirman, otherwise known as the Hakra or Wbahindih, which once received the waters of the Sutlej and flowed well to east of the Indus, following a course which roughly coincided with that of the Eastern Nara Canal.

Besides bread and milk, the food of the Indo people appears to have included beef, mutton and pork; the flesh of tortoises, turtles and gazelle, fresh fish from the Indus and dried fish imported from the sea coast.

Among the domesticated animals were the humped Indian long-horned bull, the buffalo, a short-horned bullock, the sheep, pig, dog, horse and elephant. No trace has been found of either the camel or the cat.

The remains of wild animals are few; but among those frequently depicted on the seal stones are the tiger, rhinoceros and elephant, the presence of which may be taken as an indication that the climate was damper and the vegetation more dense than at present. The lion, which prefers arid and sparsely covered country, does not occur.

The Babylonian and Greek names for cotton (Sindib and Sindon, respectively) have always pointed to the Indus valley as the home of cotton growing.

Male attire among the upper classes consisted of two garments, a skirt or kilt fastened round the waist, like the primitive Sumerian skirts, and a plain or patterned shawl which was drawn over the left and under the right shoulder, so as to leave the right arm free. Men wore short beards and whiskers, with the upper lip sometimes shaven as in Sumer, sometimes not. Their hair was taken back from the forehead and coiled in a knot at the back of the head, with a fillet to support it. The one and only, head of a female statue that we possess shows the hair falling loosely behind.

The ornaments of the rich were of silver and gold or copper plated with gold, of blue faience, ivory, carnelian and multi-colour stones of various kinds. Some of the small objects is polished to a degree that would do credit to a present day jeweller.

The paucity of weapons at both Harappa and Mohenjo-daro is surprising. It looks as if these cities were but little acquainted with warfare.

Common domestic vessels were of earthenware. Their great variety of shapes—each evolved for some particular purpose—evidences a long period of antecedent development.

The presence of inscribed seals, sealings and other objects in almost every building is sufficient indication that their occupants must have been familiar with the art of writing.

The art of the Indus is distinct from that of any neighbouring country. The best of the figures on the engraved seals are distinguished by a breadth of treatment and a feeling for line and form unequalled in the contemporary plastic art of Mesopotamia or Egypt. The modelling is of a very high order.

That the Indus civilisation extended over Baluchistan and Waziristan as well as over Sind and the Panjab has now been established; and there is evidence to show that it extended eastward over Cutch and Kathiawar towards the Dekhan. It is almost a foregone conclusion that this great civilisation of Indus must have made itself felt far to the east as well as to the west. Whatever the extent, however, of the Indus civilisation, within India itself, there is no question that it formed part and parcel of the wide flung chalcolithic culture of Asia and Europe, which extended from Asia to Japan but was focused primarily in the great river valleys of the Nile, the Euphrates, the Tigris, the Kura, the Helmand, and Indus. This is an important point to have established; for it means that India came within the same cycle of culture as the rest of Asia.

So far as Mesopotamia is concerned, it is abundantly evident that there was much in common between the civilisation of the Indus and Sumer and Babylonia; and that there must have been close inter-communication between the two countries maintained partly by sea and partly by land across Seistan and Persia.—New India.
INeIAN WOMANHOOD.

I

Speaking on "The Ideals of Womanhood" at the Senate House on 23rd Oct., Mrs. Sarojini Naidu delivered the first of this year's Kamala Lectures. The Kamala Lectures were founded by the late Sir Asutosh Mookerjee in memory of his daughter.

Mrs. Sarojini Naidu said:—"At this moment, when no man knows who is a friend and who is a foe, it is all the more necessary that the ideals and aspirations of the Indian womanhood should be set in letters of fire against a sky that will not blot out the flame. Humble as I am, unworthy as I am, I am none the less an Indian woman, I am none the less a Hindu woman, a spiritual descendant of that woman of the past, who has been enshrined in legends and literature. I propose to speak to you this evening of all those things that are our heritage and that we have to do more that any other symbol of the woman in the villages, not the interpreter in accordance with an outside vision of our inward things. I am she, to whom Sita, Savitri, Damayanti and Draupadi have left a legacy to be handed to generations after generations, of that devotion, courage, fortitude, love, wisdom and sacrifice, which were the very pivot of Indian culture. Every woman, who sits on the floor of a lowly hut or on an ivory throne of a marble palace, is the custodian of that tradition.

FROD IN THE GEM OF PHILOSOPHY.

To-day we have amidst us busy people who come in the guise of friends to interpret Indian women to the world. They come with their hands dipped in gold and say, "we will interpret the cow-like patience of our women, the cow that has been trafficked in, the beast and brute, because we are oppressed, imprisoned behind the walls stilled behind wells, no matter whether we are forced on the funeral pyre, robbed, treated as beasts and brutes, as goods and chattels, our redemption is in our own hands. We shall break through the walls that imprison us, tear up the veils that stifle us, we shall do all these by the miracle of our womanhood. We do not ask any friend to come to our help, we do not ask them to lead us in the guise that the symbol to exploit while they pretend to interpret, to succour and solace our womanhood." This is the answer that we have to give. To-day India is in the throes of death, Terrifying Yama is seizing the soul of the manhood of India, and I want the spirit of Savitri, who wedded the man she loved, knowing full well that his death was to take place within a year, to be reborn in every hut and n eyel of this great country. I want the spirit of Savitri to come for the salvation of the Nation, for the courage that we lack to-day.

II

Mrs. Sarojini Naidu delivered her second Kamala Lecture on "Ideals of Indian Womanhood" at the Senate House on the 25th January. Professor S. Radhakrishnan presided. There was a great rush of students for admission. Mrs. Naidu said in the course of her lecture:

"To-day in the march of events, the spirit that is changing the face of the world is also changing the face of our country, and yet I want you to remember, however India may be changing, no matter what her destiny is, no matter what the form her evolution is, or the types of her creation are, that the womanhood remains immutable the same to-day. Be it said to the shame of those who govern the destinies of this country, that the illiteracy of India is one of the major crimes of the world but that imperishable inheritance which is in the heart of every woman like a living stream of water in the desert, has given even the illiteracy of our women the quality of spiritual culture which makes it possible for sons born of them to be heroic in the simplest, deepest, loftiest, and most abiding sense of the word."

Referring to the contributions of Islam to the ideals of Indian womanhood, Mrs. Naidu said that the history of Indian womanhood was to-day associated with the history of Islamic culture. The message of Islam that "Paradise lies under the feet of the mother" was not a new gospel. It was the gospel of a new race confirming the ancient knowledge of this country.

Prohibition League of India:—A reception committee has been formed to make the necessary preparations for the 1st biennial convention of the Prohibition League of India which will be held here on Feb. 18 and 19. Dr. S. P. Shroff is the chairman of the reception committee with Miss Mary J. Campbell, Sir. C. M. C. and Mr. Shri Ram, bar-at-law, as vice-chairmen. Details are now available of the programme which will be gone through on the 18th and 19th. The League will assemble in the Y. M. C. A. building in New Delhi which was opened on Dec. 3 by his Excellency the Viceroy. The meeting will commence at 10.30 a.m. and will last about two to three hours. A welcome to the delegates will be extended by Dr. Shroff and Miss Mary Campbell, the chairman and deputy chairman on behalf of the local reception committee. This will be followed by an address from the president-elect and the meeting will then settle down to the election of officers and executive committee for 1928-29 and the necessary routine business connected therewith. It is hoped that at the latter part of the meeting delegates will discuss the provincial aspects of the Prohibition movement. In the evening a public meeting will be held in Old Delhi either at the Simgham Theatre or failing that, in the town hall. The president of the League will preside and among the speakers will be, it is hoped, Dr. Ansari, Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya Mr. C. P. Andrews, Maulana Mohamed Ali and others. On Sunday, Feb. 19 the League will continue its deliberations at the Y. M. C. A., Raisins, from 10.30 to 1 p.m. Plans for 1928-29 will be the chief subject of deliberations, and the delegates will be given an opportunity to discuss the special problems in their own fields. An open air mass meeting in the Queen's Garden from 3.30 to sunset will bring the public functions to a close. Suggestions have been made to arrange a prohibition procession, such as was successfully carried through two years ago, but the final decision in this matter has not been taken.
THE LATE MR. B. M. MALABARI.

Lady Wilson unveiled the bust of the late Mr. B. M. Malabari, the founder of the Seva Sadan Society, on the 26th instant in the hall of the Society at Gandraj, before a large gathering. The bust has been presented by Mr. Malabari's friends and executed by Mr. B. V. Talim, a sculptor of the city.

The proceedings opened with a song by some girls after which Mrs. M. D. Cama on behalf of the members of the Committee welcomed her Excellency in a brief speech.

Mr. K. M. Jhaveri, Chief Judge of the Small Causes Court, next gave a sketch of the life of the deceased. He said:

Your Excellency,—Mr. Malabari, whose bust your Excellency is unveiling this afternoon, died in 1912 and was born in 1853. The major part of these 60 years of his life were crowded with many events, all tending to the uplifting of his own country. A self-made man in every sense of the word, he knew how the poor suffered, and early in life he made up his mind to help them to the best of his powers. Born in Surat which had few educational facilities and having to be supported by a poor mother, he realised the handicap in his powers. Bora in his early career led him into paths of journalism and he started and edited the "Seva Sadan Spectator" which for many years successfully discussed the burning questions of the day—educational, social and political. Later he founded a monthly called "East and West," with the object of reconciling Eastern with Western conceptions and methods. It was a high class periodical and some of the best writers of India and Europe contributed to its pages.

As a publicist he could not avoid politics, and he had his own views on the relations of the British Government with Indian Princes, but the pivot of his political creed and the view to which he held fast was that the connection between the two nations—Indian and English—could not be severed. His educational and literary activities were many. He was a popular writer of Gujarati verse and prose, and the former has found an abiding place in the literature of his province. He was an idealist and a philosopher, leaning towards the Vedanta. His translation of Prof. Max Muller's Hibbert Lectures was an attempt to popularise the subject with those who did not know English. But the subject, that lay next to his heart amongst his manifold activities, was Social Reform, and he devoted whatever he possessed, of energy, of intelligence, of influence, of persuasiveness and money to the accomplishment of that one purpose. He had seen with his own eyes the disabilities of Indian women and the woes of Hindu widows and he tried his best to ameliorate their fate in various ways.

His friendship with Viceroys and Governors and high officials here and in England, was utilised only towards the fulfillment of this one purpose in his life, the betterment of the women of India. His extensive and frequent travels to England and all over India were undertaken in furtherance of this purpose, and it is his pioneer work which has no doubt facilitated the efforts of his successors in that direction. It is for keeping green the memory of such a patriot and philanthropist that Your Excellency has been requested to unveil his bust, which you have so graciously consented to do.

Lady Wilson then pressed an electric button and unveiled the bust amidst applause. Mr. Talim was introduced to her Excellency who shook hands with him and congratulated him.

Sir Lallubhai Samiladas proposed a hearty vote of thanks to her Excellency which was carried with acclamation.

PROHIBITION IN A JAPANESE VILLAGE.

We take the following from the January issue of the Young East of Japan:

"The people of Kawa-dani, village of Ishikawa Prefecture (numbering 4,000), are strictly observing teetotalism since February of last year, of their own accord. This village is a very small one, its inhabitants having no side work, except the manufacture of charcoal and the raising of silkworms. And yet, by dint of frugality, the village has become one of the richest villages throughout the country. There are in the village only 300 families or a little less. And yet, 672 men have some deposits with the post office, while 430 others have their money in the industrial association. The average amount of money deposited by the villagers amounting to 12,933 yen per capita. These figures show that they could easily defray forty to fifty thousand yen if necessary for the interest of the villages at large. Mr. MoriYMio, head of the self-governing body of the village was, however, not satisfied with the only fact that it was one of the richest villages. He wanted to banish the bad habit of drinking from among the villagers, besides making some substantial addition to the wealth of his village. On January 28, 1896, a Committee meeting, for the Improvement of the Autonomy of Kawa-dani was convened in his name and he laid his idea before them. To his delight, all the attendants readily promised their co-operation in establishing teetotalism among the villagers, and it was unanimously decided that no drink should be permitted in the village for five years beginning from February of last year, when Mr. MoriYMio thought of constructing a new school building for the boys and girls of the village, for the villagers had been drinking 80 koku of sake every year valued at about 9,000 yen, which would make 45,000 yen in five years—a sum large enough for the construction of a fine school building. There was a trouble in connection with the practice of the good resolution: it was 'How to dispose of the eight sake-shops in the village.' The proprietors of those shops were, we are glad to say, as good as any other villagers. They were quite willing to make any sacrifice of their private profits if for the common interest of the villagers. Having heard of the resolution reached at the conference, they at once gave up their business entirely at their own free will.
NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Lady Litleton's Condemnation: A Free Press message says: Adverting to Miss Mayo's denunciation of her attack on the Indian people. Lady Littleton states, in a letter to The Times that the publicity to 'Mother India' was in no way given by the Government, but by a private British citizen who elects to remain unknown.

Dr. Tagore's Disclaimer: Dr. Rabindranath Tagore has issued the following disclaimer in connection with false reports relating to his ancestry, says a Bolpur message to the Statesman—"It has pleased me to find a report persistently circulated in different countries to the effect that there is a strain of Portuguese blood in my ancestral descent. This report is entirely without foundation. I trust, therefore, that in future this false statement will no longer be published."

Young Thiet Union: The Secretary of the 'Young Thiet Union' of Indore sends us the following new item for publication. The members of the "Young Thiet Union" about a hundred in number, were entertained by their President Dr. V. A. Sukhatankar, Ph.D. at his country house, "Shanti-Kunja," at Patial Pani, fourteen miles from Indore. The party reached the place on the night of the 21st and sang "Bhajana," etc., under the mango grove. On the morning of the 22nd after tea, the whole party went out for an excursion to "Menidi-Kunda," a beautiful valley six miles from Patial Pani where breakfast was served. Throughout the day the party had an interesting time. On returning, the Union was served with a sumptuous dinner, after which Dr. Sukhatankar conducted a short service. The party then started back for Indore by the night train and reached on the 23rd in the morning. The outing was a complete success due to the untiring zeal and able leadership of Dr. Sukhatankar.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurability of their own citizens? Governments have helped in--one Company by passing favourable legislation in favour of others--even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotic and business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

Mr. Sen's Address: We print to-day the concluding part of the thoughtfull address which Mr. P. K. Sen delivered at the Theistic Conference recently held in Madras. The Brahmo Samaj began as a protestant movement and is such it has fulfilled its purpose. Its old watch words which once inspired its votaries to do and dare now fail flat more or less on deaf ears. Its social programme has been appropriated by social reformers and nationalists. Its religious message has been caught up by Hindu reformers like Swami Vivekananda and presented in the form of what he often spoke of as 'dynamio Hinduism.' Unless, therefore, the Samaj becomes a dynamic force, it must come to be regarded as an interesting stage in the history of modern India. In our opinion it can acquire this dynamic quality only by linking itself up in a more definite form than at present with the present spiritual culture of India. It is too often the case that preachers and writers in the Brahmo Samaj show a better appreciation of and interest in the Christian than in the Hindu scriptures. Hindus longed as much as the missionaries are realizing that Christianity, if it is to flourish in India, must have affiliations with the national culture. St. John's conception of God is profoundly interesting to the history of religious ideas, but it is not of much importance as an effective spiritual force in the Brahmo Samaj. The long and short of it is that the Samaj must produce great spiritual leaders and it can do this only if it throws itself heart and soul into the deepest currents of national life. This does not mean that it should join some political party, but surely its spiritual energies should not be denied the cause of the country's political progress. Unfortunately, Samajists are very sensitive to criticism even if it is well-meant, and, therefore, many sincere friends find it more pleasant to leave them alone than to irritate them by suggestions which disturb their complacency.

The Harvey-Nariman Case: The Bombay Development Department has been the subject of very general rumours regarding its administration and management, and Mr. K. F. Nariman, in giving evidence before the Committee appointed to enquire into the miscarriage of the scheme to reclaim the Bombay Back Bay, specifically referred to some of them. He was prosecuted for defamation by one of the officers of the Department and after a prolonged trial, the Magistrate has acquitted him on the ground that though he has failed to prove any corruption in the particular officer, the circumstances in which he made the statements were such as to bring them under the exceptions provided by the law. As a matter of general interest, the case has served to bring to light the great difficulties encountered in exposing the defects of Government Departments. The mistakes of the Development Department has involved the finances of the Bombay Presidency in a heavy embarrassment from which it will not be free for years. The poor sufferers in consequence are the nation-building Departments which will be starved for funds till the losses of the Development Department are paid for. The responsibility for this state of things cannot be fixed up on any one as responsibility under a bureaucratic system is so minutely distributed that it practically ceases to exist in any form or shape.

Film Censorship: The Cinema Committee we hope, will take note of the letter which we publish to-day from Mr. S. D. Nadkarni. It is obvious that the Bombay Board at any rate has no definite policy in fulfilling its duties and that it is often acted upon by a very narrow and medieval view of what is right and wrong. We do not know who the members of the Board are. The Secretary is a Professor in a Government College, who perhaps explains the pedagogic note underlying some of the Board's observations. We are not sure that the best thing would not be to abolish the censorship. There is no reason why the freedom enjoyed by theatres to select the plays to be put on their boards should not be allowed to cinema halls also. The public may be left to judge itself the kind of films which it would have, and we are sure that in the long run this would prove to be the best and most impartial form of censorship which can be devised.

South African Liquor Bill: The volume of opinion in South Africa has expressed itself against the Liquor Bill and particularly of clause 104 which prohibited the employment of Indians on licensed premises. Mrs. Roos, in direct contravention with the spirit of the Cape Town Agreement and as the Hindu says the clause should have been scrapped immediately after the settlement as repugnant to the new relationship between the two countries. Further our contemporary has taken the true measure of Mr. Roos and his profession of good faith when it writes: "Mr. Roos has deemed it expedient to make a show of concession by intimating that Indians at present employed on licensed premises would be excluded from the operation of the clause. But he is vastly mistaken if he thinks that he can disarm Indian opposition by this trivial change. The main objections to the clause that it creates a new statutory disability and closes on more avenue of employment to Indians in the Union—still remain. No measure that would have the effect of detracting from the status and rights assured to Indians by the Agreement has the least chance of acceptance at the hands of Indians. A Reference is being prepared to appeal to the Viceroy and prominent men in India sent by the Indian National Congress. "See ind reading of Indian Bills is now going through Parliament notwithstanding the Bill itself is depriving three thousand Indians, their families and dependents of their livelihood and will ultimately drive them from country. The Bill is in direct conflict with the Agreement, and is a violation of the constitutional rights of India. The Government should be made to understand that the Bill is passed at the cost of its representation by its own representatives."

The Sarda Bill: When Mr. H. S. Sarda, after a delay of six months, was able to introduce his Bill into Parliament, it was found that the Bill was not in accordance with the views of the Government and the most conservative members on the one hand and the social reformers on the other. The amendment was in favour of referring the bill to a special committee, while the Government wished to collect public opinion. The bill was defeated and the bill was referred to the Select Committee. Public opinion, however, has been in favour of the principle of the bill. In fact, Mr. Sarda, in a statement to the Associated Press, said recently that many of the provisions of the bill are in accordance with the minimum age of marriage being raised to sixteen for girls and twenty-one for boys. The Hindu community, as a whole, support the bill. Various Indian States, moreover, have passed legislation on the subject of girls' education. We have published, week after week, reports of the various women's associations held all over the country and they have all with singular unanimity favoured raising the marriage age to sixteen. The Indian National Social Congress passed a resolution recommending the fixing of the marriage age at sixteen for girls and twenty-one for boys. In view of this it will not be inequitable to raise the minimum to four and eighteen for boys and girls respectively as we have suggested before. If the clause fixing marriage below the prescribed ages be removed and another rendering the parent or guardian liable to imprisonment without the benefit of a fine be adopted there will be no objection to this. Mr. Sarda in his interview says that the Bill may be lost if the Swarajists decide to abstain from the Assembly on that day. We hope that the Swarajists will withdraw their support to the Sarda Bill at this juncture.

A Tribute to Mr. Dayaram Gidumal: Mr. Javali's speech at the unveiling ceremony of the statue of Mr. B. M. Malabari at the Bombay Seva Sangh, a report of which appeared in the last issue of the Reformer, contained a reference to Dayaram Gidumal who was closely associated with Mr. Malabari for several years in social work. We regret that the passage was omitted last week from this report. Mr. Javali said: "It is a great satisfaction to me to look at the spirit of doing good to others, — of philanthropy, — in his friendship with great visionaries like the Rev. Dr. Taylor and the Rev. Dr. E. A. B. Lord. His heart was full of love for this side of India. The lessons of the Gita in urging men to be serviceable to the poor and not to sleep away their lives. He also had his influence on both and it was in his spirit that Dayaram conceived the idea of a Seva Sangh at home and in the larger community, he materialized it and founded this Home, to the benevolent work of which, your zeal and activity is no stranger."

Reform Among Dayavasi: Writing about the development of Coonada in Young India, Mr. G. F. Andrews, reports that on a visit to some of the villages in Young India, it was found that," it was as clear as possible to me, that those who spoke of the sick Indian and the Indian soul, and talk of the Indian spirit in life, have in their hands a purity of heart still unquenched, and that they are far more sinless against than sinning. The hideous monstrosity of justice was this, that the world's blame and shame fell upon them, while those men, who were the most deeply and most sincerely engaged in the noble work of society, were often blamed and expected of society. As far as I could gather, no society, no social body, was in the least poor innocent men and women. I have talked with them in anger, without any sense of knowing the evil, because the nearest evil did not lie with them, but with those who had brought such a system into being and had produced this sin. Within those who had been born. In one thing I could feel at once, that the consequences of those who have gathered before me and began to make them suffer deeply. They had with them little children of their own, and these children were born before me, seated with their mothers. When I asked the question, would not the mothers wish to abandon their life of misery, they unanimously said yes. Indeed, they told me that it was the very reason for which they had called me! We particularly wish to draw the attention of the Madras Government to the statement, that the state does not wish their daughters to lead a life of shame and misery.

Kanya Mahila Vidyalaya: We publish elsewhere an appeal issued by some prominent citizens of Bombay on behalf of the Jullundur Kanya Mahila Vidyalaya. The institution has been, at the appeal, points out, in existence for the last thirty-eight years. Free education is given in the institution to more than five hundred girls and various primary and secondary schools in the province follow the curriculum of this body. The workers in this institution are cooperative and they have been invited to appeal to the Bombay public to support them. We hope that the people of Bombay will give every help in this deserving cause.
INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1928.

PROGRESS IN INDIAN STATES.

The progress of an early revision of the Indian Con-stitution has been stirring the minds of the ruling Princes who seem to take it for granted that self-government or virtual self-government for British India is in sight. They are anxious about the future position of themselves and their States in relation to a self-governing British India. Several Princes have publicly declared their sympathy with the people of British India in their aspirations for self-government. The Maharajah of Bikanir addressing his Legislative Assembly a few days ago warmly repudiated the allegation that Indian rulers were antagonistic to constitutional progress in British India. He emphatically affirmed on behalf of his brother Princes that they, with negligible exceptions were whole-heartedly in favor of the constitutional advancement of the people of British India. This is not the first occasion on which His Highness has given expression to these views. Similar views have been expressed by other ruling Princes, and, in fact, it may be stated without contradiction, that the trend of Indian rulers would reflect the great self-government in British India belongs to the region of political mythology. Bansi need not say that the heart of India lies in the Indian States, and he watched with great interest signs of progress in them. The people of the States have during the last quarter of a century become largely infected with ideas of social and political progress, and they are demanding, from their rulers a larger share in the administration. Some of the more advanced States are progressing steadily in the same direction as British India. Others are feeling the pressure of public opinion both within and without their borders, and even where nominal constitutional change has been made, the administration is gradually losing its personal character and taking on the attributes of a rule of law.

In several States Conferences that are being held, once or twice a year, testify to the working of the former of whose ideas in the States as well as in British India, Ve should think that the political leaders in the latter do not sufficiently recognize the great advantages they have in comparison with their compatriots in British India. The most perplexing factor in British Indian politics is the racial issue. The governing race is distinctly in religion, language and altars from the people with whom it governs. The Indi- nation problem which, so largely in British India, does not exist in Indian States. This conscious difference constitutes a venture similar to constitutional reformers in the States, which they do not seem adequately to appreciate.

We have before us the administration reports of two of the most progressive States—Mysore and Baroda. The lines of progress in the two States, however, offer distinguishing features which may be worth noting. In Mysore, where the administration is largely modeled on that of British India constitutional development has been long in the air, while in Baroda the social and educational transitions of national progress received earlier attention. The Representative Assembly of Mysore was established several years before representative institutions were thought of in British India. The constitution has been recently revised with a wider franchise which was extended to women last year. Baroda, on the other hand, pioneered by many years the introduction of free and compulsory education in British India and has all along evinced keen interest in social reforms. Both the States have laws for discouraging child marriages, but while the Mysore law receives associate support in the Administration, the Baroda law has been introduced with special emphasis in the working of the Baroda Reports every year.

The Baroda Act has been recently amended in conformity with the recommendations of the special Committee appointed by the Maharajah to report on the working of the law passed twenty years ago. Though, however, the initial impulse for progress came from two different directions in the two States, they have both now come up to nearly the same level as the more highly organized administrations in Indian India. The Viceregal in his recent speech advised the rulers of States to look for their honour resources outside and to fill all important places in their administration. Mysore and Baroda have both practiced this precept for many years, and are practically self-sufficient in respect of their Services. In addition, Mysore by its enlarged constitution has opened up large avenues of non-official leadership, and Baroda will have to do the same at no distant day in order to keep educated and energetic young men in the service of the State and its people. A ruling Prince in the Southern Maharaj country recently said that he did not care to advance higher education among his subjects as educated men left the State and sought wider opportunities of usefulness in British India.

This is a very short-sighted view. Educated men naturally wish to have wider spheres for their activities than those afforded by a medieval Indian State. If the State, itself opens out careers of public usefulness in different directions, for its people, educated men will not leave it, and would, indeed, prefer to remain in and serve their own people and State. The example of Mysore and Baroda are well worth imitation by all Indian and British rulers who wish to see their States taking their place at the head of the other progressive parts of India.

WOMEN'S EDUCATION IN C.P.

It is worthy of note that women's education is receiving the attention that it deserves in the Central Province and Baroda. Taking succession of the backwardness of women's education, the C.P. Government appointed a year ago a Panel on Education Committee to go into the question of women's education in the Province and to suggest ways and means for its improvement. The Committee which consisted of men and women, who have had experience in the field of education has recently brought out its report, which might have been more comprehensive regarding the importance of the subject. Though disappointing in many respects, the report is not without interest specially where it deals with the growth of women's education in the province. As in other parts of India, women's education in G. P. has made much progress during the last ten years but it is only a tiny branch—a very tiny one at that—in the huge wall of illiteracy among the women. This has been fully recognised by the special Committee when it says that the advance has been both slight and slow and that much yet remains to be done. A comparison of girls' education with that of the boys only serves to show that so far as the former is concerned there is much less-to-do to make up.

The Committee's conclusions that "only 61 out of every 10,000 women receive school instruction of any kind and only one out of every 60,000 has yet got beyond the middle school stage," have been based on the assumption that the total female population which is taken from the census report of 1921-22 as 6,961,361 is of 'school-going age. It is absurd to expect the aged and the decrepit, the sick and the 'sorry—in short the total population of women to be in schools and no human effort can bring about this end. The usual method adopted to ascertain the progress or otherwise of ducation is to compare the number of children who are actually in schools with the total population of the school-going age. It does not require any elaborate calculation to get at the latter figure, 15 per cent of the total population being usually reckoned as such. If the Central Provinces Education Committee had taken care to arrive at the true estimate on the basis suggested above it would have found its conclusions more optimistic.

We do not agree with the Committee when it ascribes apathy as the main reason for the backwardness of women's education although we are at one with it in attributing the slowness of progress to social and economic causes. The need of women's education has never received so much attention as it is doing now though it may not be regarded from the utilitarian standpoint. The Committee has laboured hard to show that there is no demand for women's education in its province and endorses the observation, "Female education is carried on in response to a demand which does not exist." Apart from the validity of the proposition which defies the laws of demand and supply, the Committee has gone out of its way to exonerate the Government of all blame for the unsatisfactory state of women's education in the province. It has been observed that wherever facilities exist in the shape of scholarships, girls' schools and colleges, etc., women's education has made great progress; one has only to refer to the Madras Presidency as an instance in point. Yet the Committee maintains that the demand for education cannot be created by Government and should be done through non-official agency preferably by means of committees composed of enthusiasts of women's education and educationalists. In proposing well-organised propaganda for this purpose the Committee says "the kind of work which we have in mind is propaganda somewhat along the lines undertaken in the interests of child-welfare, or the various health-week campaigns which are now well-known in India," but conveniently forgets the Government's interest and participation in the movement. What Government with its enormous resources can do in a matter like this will be much more than a private agency can aspire to.

The Committee has done well to recognise that the same curriculum, without a lowering of the standard or quality, should be followed in the case of girls as that of the boys. While discussing alternative courses for girls who do not proceed beyond the high-school stage the Committee observes: "We realise, however, that although a great deal of lip service might be given to the advisability of instituting courses not leading up to an examination recognised by the University, such courses would, in practice, be unpopular." The reason assigned for the unpopularity is the "one of phenomena of social life of the present day is the value which young men, anxious to find educated brides, attach to the possession by girls of a matriculation or high school leaving certificate leaves altogether out of account the desire of girls themselves for such education. In these days of educational experiments, the Committee has done a great service to the cause of women's education by upholding the view that women's education should not be materially different from that of men. The other provinces will do well to follow the example of the Central Provinces and Berar to take stock of what they have done so far for Women's Education and devise means for its improvement and expansion.

An Urgent Need: For several years past the Bombay Representative Christian Council, representing about a lakh of Indian Christians and nearly thirty mission organisations in Western India, has been petitioning Government to build a Tuberculosis Sanatorium in the Deccan such as would meet the needs of sufferers belonging to all castes and creeds. Until recently a technical difficulty stood in the way which has happily been removed, and the intention is to carry out the scheme with all possible promptitude. Doctors are insistent that one of the most clamant needs in Western India is such a Sanatorium as is now proposed. Tuberculosis would appear to be increasing rapidly in Bombay City, whence it is spreading into the villages of the Deccan through the large numbers of mofussil people who visit the City. In the monsoons especially, with its excessive humidity, doctors frequently have to send tubercular patients out of Bombay, and a Tuberculosis Sanatorium would every year save many valuable lives. For this purpose it is proposed to raise a lakh and a half of rupees towards the detailed expenditure of which is indicated below. The reason why the sum asked for is not much larger is that the main structures required will be of light material and will remain open to the fresh air, and the intention is to begin on a modest scale with a plan capable of indefinite expansion. We regret that we have to hold over for next week the detailed sketch of the scheme sent to us.
VAGARIES OF CENSORSHIP.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

You have done well in your issue of last week to call attention to one instance of the bat-like behaviour for which the Board of Film Censors in Bombay has been making itself so famous.

"The Scarlet Letter" happens to be the work of such a pious Christian of Puritan ancestry as Nathaniel Hawthorne (d. 1864), who is described by an English authority as "the most distinguished novelist which America has produced," and who held the post of an American consul in Victorian England; and the story of it was filmed by Christians, mainly for Christians, and probably in that land which is known as "God's Own Country"—albeit the U. S. A. These are the facts, and notwithstanding the n, our conscience-keepers have in their self-importance chosen to ban that film on the imaginary ground that it would "bring the ministry of the Christian religion into contempt!" A truly Gilbertian situation.

But one question is relevant. What, if their ground was not imaginary? Suppose their allegation was true enough in all conscience, as it would surely be if a work like the Rev. C. Kingsley's historical novel "Hypatia" or Reade's "Cloister and the Hearth" were to be filmed. Do the members of the Board consider it one of their functions to make Bombay safe for Theocracy? Or are they solicitous for one particular brand of it? I say so, because recently (it appears) these same Gilbertian censors were incensed at the title "Har, Har, Mahadev" of an Indian-made film and ordered it to be replaced by "Nimah-baram." Now you know, "Har, Har, Mahadev" is a theocratic invocation comparable to "St. George for England!" But only because it happened to be of another brand than its pet, censorial bigotry would not be satisfied till it saw it replaced by the opprobrious word "Nimah-baram" which means "A Vile Ingrate." Imagine "St. George for England!" being replaced by "To Hell with the Pope!" or "Hang the Kaiser!"

Below I am giving three other examples from our Censors' record published in one old issue of the Bombay Government Gazette which I have preserved for the delightful glimpse it affords into a mentality which may be characterised as more-loyalistic-than-the-King and more-papist-than-the-Pope:

(1) Film: "Lady Hamilton" by Richard Oswald. Film Co. The Censors' endorsement: "Omit the scene showing George Prince of Wales attacking Emma."

[The reference is evidently to an historical episode relating not to the present King George, but to one of the earlier Georges—the Fourth probably—as Prince of Wales; for Emma is the Lady Hamilton well-known to all readers of any unexpurgated life of Nelson. Still they ban it. How else could they show their loyalty?]

(2) Film: "The Santa Fe Trail" produced by the Arrow Film Co. The Censors' endorsement: "Omit the following title in Episode III, part 11—to My people, soon there will be no place for the Red Man. His treacherous, white brothers, step by step, day by day, are forcing his domain, slaying buffalo, and killing his people; how long will the Indian endure if he is driven from the plains?"

[The word 'Indian' seems to have been on the brain of the Censors. The film version of a chapter from American history, made in America, and digested by the Americans, White and Red together, is deemed too hard for the stomachs of the Brown ones in India—and apparently only because those Red ones in America happen to be called "Indians"]

(3) Film: "The Common Law" produced by Selznick. Censors' endorsement: "The title of the film has been changed from "The Common Law" to Beyond the Law."

[Vide the Bombay Govt. Gazette, Nov. 6, 1924, pp. 2726-30.]

[Here the Censors appear to be either lacking in the sense of humour—which is always the case with sour puritans—or desperately anxious, to cover up the weak spots of Western life. For 'the common law,' apart from its technical sense is now Anglo-Saxonism's euphemism for taking the law into one's own hands in certain circumstances, amounting to what Latindom calls 'crimes of passion.' The unwritten law' is also another slangish term of Yankee-land for that scandalous state of public opinion which is reflected in the extreme partiality with which its jurors treat the whites guity of murderous revenge for marital infidelity, on the other hand, and the extreme severity, on the other, with which it treats the 'coco ed,' if spared from the lynching mob, in similar cases.]

THE FUTURE OF THE BRAHMO SAMAJ.

MAHARSHI DEVENDRA NATH TAGORE.

(Concluded from the last issue.)

The next march in the campaign of the Brahmo Samaj was entrusted to Maharshi Devendranath Tagore. Under him the Brahmo Saaj grew into a brotherhood bound together by a covenant. It was no longer the single voice of the N. j a crying as it were in the wilderness. It was no longer the trumpet call of one man only crying 'Awake, Aries.' It was now the sound of many voices going forth in unison to all points of the compass. The cry was the same: "Back to the Vedas. Back to the Upanishads. Back to the faith of the early fathers. Back to simplicity; back to the Rituals of old." Yet, while our cry was the same, in essence it was full of changed meaning. For while the Brahmo believed in the Puramatsam or Brahman, the Supreme "It," that can only be known to exist, but that was in itself unknown, unknowable and unsearchable, the Maharshi brought to the Brahmo Samaj the inestimable blessings of Brahmanajnanam, Brahma-Dikyanam and Brahmananda Rasopanam. He placed Brahmo Dharma on an essentially different plane of worship and spirituality. The Brahmo Samaj entered upon a new phase, the phase of Non-attachment that heralded the advent of thought and introspection, meditation and communion, love and worship. Not to speak of the God vision and God-intoxication of the Maharshi himself, the ordinary Brahmo deemed it the first and foremost endeavour of his life to go back into himself, back into the depths of his soul to find in Brahmo Jnanam, Brahmo Dikyanam and Brahmanandam Rasopanam his ultimate fruition. Such was the thrust for spiritual communion that, as the chronicler of those times says: Young men and old came after their day's hard work and sat up till two or three o'clock in the morning partaking of the sweet of spiritual converse with each other on matters of life, death and eternity, taking care of naught else. Thus, there was a clear departure from the Vedantic Adwaitism of the Raja’s, and a conscious acceptance of the efficacy of prayer and communion with him that Rishis of old had known as Ram Mohan. This was indeed the stage of the Antithesis of the Brahmo Samaj. Did it involve the narrowing, down, of the field of revision? Did it mean a temporary eclipse of the universality of Ram Mohan? Did it involve the supremacy of Atma Pratyaya and the sacrifice of Bhagat authority? Did it yield the pain to quiet contemplative Upnishadjo piety, at the expense of fruitful pursuit of Lokahreyya? You cannot expect otherwise in the stage of Antithesis. Criticise it, as you may, I believe in the supreme inwardness of the second stage of evolution as much as in the stere Adwaitism and abstract universalism of the first stage. I believe in both as the gradual unfolding of the Providence in the history of the Brahmo Samaj.

RABHUNDER SEN

The third stage is marked by a grand synthesis, view- ing life as an eternity and bringing about a living organic union between all faiths, all forms of worship, all sacraments, all disciplines, all saints and prophets, all scriptures, all humanity. The Raja beheld the truth of Divine unity in all religions and therein founded his concept of universalism. The Brahmo Samaj, ever since, continued to call the truths that were in all religions a form of vivid intellectual eclecticism. Thus was achieved what has been called, by Doss Bandhu, “the universal of abstraction.” “There is truth in all religions, said the Brahmo Samaj of old. All religions are true,” said the new Brahmo Samaj under Brahmananda Kesub Chunder Sen. Is it merely, a jungle of words? Is it not a deeper, fuller, more concrete conception of the organic unity of all religious dispensations? It is not what is common to all religions, but what is uncommon and special to each that now appears. It is the crown of its glory, the badge of its authority, the trick of its Master’s voice—yes the patent of providential dispensation. Even as the material univer- verse is the perpetual unfolding of the Immanent spirit of the personal creation to the Master Artist, so is the spiritual history of humanity the daily, hourly creation the perennial dispensation, of the Divine Dispenser. All religions of the world take their place in this grand scheme of Providence, taking mea forward, onward, heavenward. If there is exult in any of the historic theism that savours of evil, discard it by all means. Prof, that is not of God. But discard not the special message of each dispensation for that is of God and, by rejecting it, you disown God and His Providence. There is the scheme of providence that works itself out and through creation, that unfolds itself gradually in nature and history. It may be we are not able to see its unfolding in its fulness, but it unfolds itself all the same and as it unfolds itself, we find these distinctive mes- sages of the world’s dispensations, the world’s prophets, the world’s scriptures, and indispensable parts of that Divine scheme. And all the sacraments and services, doctrines and disciplines, and penances and practices that spring up around each ideal are but the visible manifestations of it. Viewed without the spirit that animates them, they are of the earth earthy; but, viewed as the vestments of the spirit, they are of the heaven heavenly.

So must we discern the hand of Providence in the history of the Brahmo Samaj shaping it and piloting it in all its different stages. The Brahmo Dharma is also theVIDHANA or dispensation of God, the VIDHANA of the age—the New dispensation. As Pandit Shivanath Sastri puts it, “Brahmananda Kesub Chunder Sen has done untold good to the Brahmo Samaj by impressing on the minds of Brahmos the truth that the Brahmo Dharma is an instrument in the hand of God or His VIDHANA (Dispensation).”

“He that thinks that it is we who are doing Lila in the Brahmo Samaj is in essence an atheist. This idea of VIDHANA, therefore, must be accepted as Brahmananda Kesub Chunder Sen’s precious gift to the Brahmo Samaj.”

Is the Brahmo Dharma VIDHANA the New Dispensa- tion of the age? What infinite implications there are in this idea! Does it remain content with accepting all the religions, all the prophers, all the scriptures as VIDHANA of the Supreme VIDHATA? No. It beholds in life, individual as well as corporate, the daily and hourly VIDHANA of spirit, the Lila of Bhagawan. From the Vedantic conception of Brahma the Brahmo Samaj advances to the Puranic conception of the unfolding of God’s purpose in all things, great and lowly, in individual, national, nay, all human life history. This is demonstrated by the following among numerous other passages that may be quoted from Brahmananda’s sermon: “The world in agony,” says he, “saks nature and the Elemen ‘Could you lure our God show Him to us’? They all answered, We only proclaim the majesty of God, but we cannot show Him to you. And the answer? Instead of soothing the. smiting sorrowing world the Vedas and scriptures are powerless. Fallen man has always asked this profound question: ‘Cannot God be brought down to this earth?’ The Vedas cannot answer it; but the true Purana, the tree history of the work answers ‘Yes, God can be brought here. Out of the fulness of his love, God does come and dwell in this world.” And when the world hears this it is cheered and encouraged. The Puranas start with God’s advent to this world. The Purana says: “This world shall become manifest. The hidden God shall become the incarnate one.” The auspicious Purana speaks of this or that incarnation only; but in the true Purana there is no end of God’s incarnations. He who stops at believing in ten incarnations only may be called an idolator, but he is a true Brahmo who believes in countless incarnations. In fact faith will not attain its fulness till you come to this stage. Multiply the number of God incarnation till you find him in every relation of your earthly life.” Then there is now a harmony of the Vedas and Puranas of Yoga, Bhakti, lman and Karma a harmony between the religions of the scholar, between the life of the householder and the life of the devotee. It is no longer merely a concept of universalism, but stands out as the lesson of life for us all—a life lived by Brahmananda Kesub Chunder Sen and left as a priceless legacy to us all, a life that brooks no barriers of caste, creed or colour, annihilates distances of time and space and merges all into a Church Universal. Call it the Kingdom of God, or call it Nava Bra- mbhak or call it the City Celestial or call it what you like. It is all as one. The message is the message of harmony the message of the age.
Crying Need of the Hour.

Friends and fellow-believers, before I conclude, I wish to crave your patience for a few minutes more in order that I may submit to you what I feel to be the crying need of the hour. Each of these messages that have come in the different stages of the Brahmo Samaj through the three message-bearers raised a storm of protest and active hostility. No revolution in the world of the spirit can be a peaceful revolution. It comes with thunder and lightning so as to sweep away the refuse of ages of inertia and indifference and also the inevitable bar of hostile opposition until through the storm we find our passage to calm. As with individual so with social or national regeneration there is negative or destructive work to begin with and construction or synthesis must necessarily follow. In the life of each one of us there is a stage of dryness, of atheism and of synthesis and without a struggle, but it is not without a fight; no, without a storm that we reach from thesis to synthesis. Let each one of us welcome this storm that is awaiting us in the process and development of our individual and Samajic life. Differences in viewpoints there will be, there must be. Differences in the matter of methods of culture, methods of constitution, methods of church government there will be, there must be. The Brahmo Samaj does not believe in a dead level of uniformity. What it does insist on is a conscious-appropriation of truth, individual and corporate integrity and honesty, and in a conscious harmony of religious experiences we often talk of amalgamating the three sections of Brahmo Samaj. We often talk of re-Christening the Prarthana Samaj. Personally I do not believe in it. We often talk of too much of contemplative piety in the Ad Brahmo Samaj, too much of the Navavadhin in the Bharatavarshyana Navavadan Brahmo Samaj, too much of constitution in the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj. One criticises the over-growth of the idea of personality or of ceremonialism in the Navavadindam community, another speaks of the vanishing of Bhakti in the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj, a third dismisses the Ad Brahmo Samaj as antiquated and fossilised, a fourth brands the Prarthana Samaj. Personally I cannot help thinking there is much misunderstanding, much prejudice, much ignorance of each other. I plead for the exercise of our freedom, as Bucken put it, in re-appropriating the glorious past of the Brahmo Samaj as a whole in the form in which it answers our question. Let there be different communions endeavouring to carry on their spiritual culture according to their own lights, their own experiences, their own views as to doctrines and discipless. But let there be a true brotherly fellowship such as will lead each of them to understand and appreciate the viewpoint of the other and then only shall we prove true to the idea of harmony for which the Brahmo Samaj came to this world.

EAST AFRICAN INDIAN NATIONAL CONGRESS.

We give below a report of Mr. Tyeb Ali’s Presidential Address to which we made a reference last week—

INDIANS AND EAST AFRICA.

In view of the constant efforts made by some interested parties to belittle the services Indians have rendered in the development of this country, I feel compelled to give a brief history of the part played by Indians in opening up this great country. Indians were carrying on a prosperous trade with East Africa in the seventh century in which Jesus Christ was born. And as a matter of fact the first British Consulate was opened at Zanzibar to protect the interests of the Indian subjects of the Crown who were then already settled in East Africa.

When the Royal charter was conferred upon the Imperial British East Africa Company in 1888 by Queen Victoria, it was advanced in the preamble of that document as one of the chief grounds for the grant that the possession by a British Company of the coast lines above defined which includes the Port of Mombasa would be advantageous to the commercial and other interests of our subjects in the Indian ocean who otherwise would become agglomerated to reside and trade under the Government or protection of alien powers. Indians have pushed, forward and opened up trade in territories beyond the limits of British administration. In the early days of the Colony their advent was welcomed. They were brought from India in large numbers to construct the Uganda Railway and those responsible for the work have testified that it could not have been completed within any reasonable period without their help. In one instance at Kisii in the Kavirondo country, a settlement of Indians on the land was instituted and that settlement has proved a success. In the Great War the Indian Army was called upon to assist in the protection of Kenya and in the conquest of Tanganyika Territory long before the troops from S. Africa arrived.

INDIAN SETTLERS IN KENYA.

Whilst the Indians were still growing under the disabilities imposed upon them by the White Paper of 1923, Sir Edward Grigg, the present Governor of Kenya, appointed in 1926 the notorious Peetham Commission to make recommendations as to the establishment or extension of local Government in Nairobi, Mombasa and such settled areas as the Commissioners may consider suitable for the establishment of local Government. If one reads the report carefully, one cannot avoid the conclusion that the recommendations contained therein are not founded on the evidence tendered before the Commission or the materials placed before it. It is an unfortunate thing that the author of this report, Mr. Justice Peetham, comes from South Africa, a country which is saturated with prejudice and hatred against the Indians who are domiciled in that unhappy sub-continent. This Commission has enunciated the parasitical principle of predominant representation to Europeans on Municipal bodies on the ground that it is necessary to do so to avoid racial friction, and without paying any regard to the accepted canons of Municipal representation. It is probable that Mr. Justice Peetham in writing his report received inspiration from and acted on the recommendations of the South African expert whom he brought with him to assist him in his work.

HILTON YOUNG COMMISSION.

The absence of any Indian on the Young Commission has been the cause of the gravest dissatisfaction to the Indian community. In fact the dissatisfaction is so acute that some members of the community are openly talking of having nothing to do with the Commission. If, the Imperial Government intended to have and unbiased and independent enquiry, I cannot possibly understand why they should not have appointed on this Commission at least one Indian, if not from this colony, at least from the races of the Indian Civil Service. This gives the Indian Community additional cause to suspect that even the Imperial Government does not wish to deal fairly with them. In my own mind I am firmly convinced that no valid reason exists for such a Commission being sent out.

In the White Paper of 1923 the present Conservative Government after protracted discussion laid down certain principles which were to govern them in their dealings with the Kenya Colony, and there they recognised that Kenya, was an African country and that the interests of the natives were paramount. They said that the Imperial Government was the trustee of the African population. I give below a quotation from the Report of the Ormsby-Gore Commission published in 1923:

"We found little, if any, support in East Africa for the idea of immediate federation, and in some quarters we found definite hostility. All shades of opinion in Zanzibar are hostile to federation. We came definitely to the conclusion that any attempt at federation would be premature."

I need not point out that only 4 years have passed since the White Paper of 1923 was published and only 2 years since the report of the Ormsby-Gore Commission was made public.

What has happened during so short a space of time which led the Imperial Government to appoint this Commission?

Not long after Sir Edward Grigg arrived in this country he probably discovered that the territory which he was appointed to rule was not large or important enough to satisfy his vast personal ambition. He conceives the idea of reviving federation scheme which was laid at rest by the Ormsby-Gore Commission. His first step was to enter into an unholy alliance with Lord Delamere and his henchmen whereby the Governor is promised the High Commissionerate of the proposed Federated States and Lord Delamere's party is guaranteed an Unofficial White Elected Majority in the Local Legislative Council. For confirmation of this view I refer you to the Manifesto of the Convention of Associations published in the East African Standard of 14-11-27. With this bargain concluded and the fascinating vision of a High Commissionership dangling before his eyes the Governor dashes off to London and by means which we can only guess coax or corce the gentle Jbr. Amery into appointing this commission. Ladies and gentlemen, this is not an imaginary picture by any means.

Personally speaking, I do not think our friends the European settlers care for federation. All that they are aiming at is the "grant of an Unofficial White Majority over all parties in the Legislature so that they could be free to pass whatever legislation suits them regardless of the interests of millions of Africans and thousands of Indians and Arabs. It does not require much imagination to foresee that so long as the prosperity of the majority of the European settlers continue to employ on a large scale native labour whereupon rests the prosperity of their agricultural pursuits, it would be something superhuman if not impossible, for them to pass any legislative measures or take any other steps calculated to encourage the Africans in engaging in agriculture or in other independent occupations which will have the inevitable effect of diverting labour into other channels.

I take this opportunity of warning the Imperial Government through the Secretary of State for Colonies against sanctioning the injudicious recommendations of the Feetham Commission. I also warn them, notwithstanding any recommendations that may be made by the Hilton Young Commission, against taking any measures which may be calculated to further infringe the rights of Indians or impair their political status in these territories.

Ladies and gentlemen, the interests of Africans and our own are indissolubly bound up together. In protecting our own interests we are also protecting the interests of the Africans. Quietly and without undue advertising we have done and shall continue to do our bit in the uplift of the Africans—in whose country we live and make money—both by example and by giving them practical training in various crafts and avocations of life. Large tracts of really fertile land are being given away almost daily to new European arrivals, and we very much fear that by the time the natives become sufficiently advanced to look after their own interests there would be little left to look after. There will be no security for native reserves unless and until it is done by Act of Parliament.

In the White Paper of 1923 the Imperial Government recorded its decision that the policy of segregation as between Europeans and Asians in the townships must be abandoned. In total disregard of this policy the local Government only about a month ago sold 29 residential plots at Mombasa restricting the sale to Europeans only, under a flimsy excuse. We strongly protest against the action of the local Government and trust that at least out of self-respect if for no other reason, the Conservative Government will insist upon its local agents carrying out its definite decisions.

Ever since the enunciation of the peculiar principle of communal (more appropriately called racial) franchise we have considerably protested against it. We have never accepted this injudicious measure which gives us an inferior status. We are determined never to rest unless and until we secure the reversal of this policy.

Defence Force.

Only about four months ago Sir Edward Grigg secured Royal assent to the Defence Force Bill whereby all male Europeans from 18 to 50 years of age are placed under conscription. Some two thousand Europeans who declare that they have anything to do with this measure denounce the action of the local Government in forcing it through the Legislative Council as a "rehearsed and staged discussion for the deception of Home Government and public." They declare that the Governor's statement that the measure is in no way aimed at the native population is intended only for "Home consumption" and say that it would be difficult to find words to describe sufficiently vividly the falsity of the impression which the Governor's statements on this subject must convey in England. If this Defence Force is designed to meet any common danger I cannot understand why the Indians are kept out of its pale. We emphatically protest against this invidious discrimition and demand as a matter of right our inclusion in this Force, if it is going to be maintained.

Land Policy of Kenya.

Under the thin excuse of administrative convenience, thousands of miles of rich fertile land in the so-called Highlands of Kenya have been reserved exclusively for Europeans. On the one hand Asians are prevented from possessing land in the Highlands and on the other hand Europeans are giving the liberty to acquire and own land wherever they like, Highlands or Lowlands.

Government Service.

For all practical purposes Indians are excluded from higher appointments under the Governments of these Territories. This is perhaps done from Policy but it is unjust both to the Indians and to the general body of taxpayers, Indian service which is as equally good and efficient as European service is much more economical and should therefore be employed in a larger scale. The recent tendency of the Kenya Government to squeeze out Indians from the Government Service and to fill their places by people who are not even British subjects is to be strongly deprecated. British Indians as subjects of the same Crown are entitled to a share in the civil service of these territories commensurate with their importance and interests. By this demand we do not wish to be understood to say that we want to supplant or come in the way of the Africans. Naturally they have the first claim on the Government of this country. But until such time as they become qualified by education and experience for employment in Government services we ask for a fair share in the administration of this colony.

Education.

With the exception of a High School at Mombasa there are neither decent schools nor hostels for Indian children anywhere in East Africa. People do not seem to realise the importance of this subject which has been, so far, entirely neglected. I need not point out here that no society which is not founded on the bedrock of sound education can ever hope to progress satisfactorily.

I cannot help mentioning here that the Government of Kenya has been niggardly in its contributions towards the educational needs of all communities other than European. The Kenya Government has accepted the principle of free and compulsory education but in restricting its benefit to Europeans only it has provided another instance of open partnership. A recent circular changing the conditions of service of Indian Teachers has already been the cause of very great discontent.

Justice.

It is painful to have to record that racialism in Kenya has not left alone even the domain of justice. Europeans are entitled to be tried by European judges but Asians are not conceded even this elementary right. It may not be out of place to give here an illustration of the solicitude of the so-called Trustees and Guardians of the Natives for the welfare and protection of the Natives. Some time back, an African native was accused of rape against a European Lady. This caused a great storm of indignation amongst the Europeans as the result of which the law was amended so as to create death penalty for rape. In theory this is applicable to all races, but in actual practice, crimes involving violence are tried before European Juries. This does not require any comment as any one who has the experience of colonies knows what it means. These are the people, who, it is desired should be more closely associated in the honourable task of Trusteeship and in whose hands the destinies of millions of African Natives will be placed by the proposed grant of European Unofficial Majority. If it is not all cant and hypocrisy, I do not know what else it is.

Native Labour.

Some of the objectionable methods employed by European Settlers to make the African Natives work for them are given below:

1. Generally speaking natives are being systematically driven out of their land. What is known as the Reserves or Locations is not large enough for their maintenance. The result is that for their very living they are obliged to go out and work for European Farmers.

2. Breach of his contract by an African Labourer is made a criminal offence. The offender is tracked down by the Police and every native labourer is compelled to carry with him identification papers which contain a record of his labour made by his employer.

3. The Africans are subjected to direct taxation which they cannot pay unless they go out to work on the farms.

4. No encouragement or facilities are given to cultivate their own land and in practice native production is actively discouraged.

5. Use is made of Government Officials through native chiefs to apply pressure on natives to go out and work on European Farms.

In 1915, Sir Edward Denham, Acting Governor of Kenya, made the following declaration:

"There is the strongest possible moral obligation on the Government of the country to give the fullest assistance it can in securing to the European settler in this country the benefit of the developments which he has created to the lasting advantage of the Colony. I wish to make it perfectly clear that such is the policy of the administration, and that Government expects every administrative officer to give all possible encouragement to the labour within their district to work on the lands which have been opened up by the settlers."—The East African Standard.

An Appeal to India.

I think it is necessary, nay essential, for the Government of India to immediately appoint an agent; preferably an Indian of the standing and experience of Mr. Sastrl to be stationed at Nairobi to safeguard the growing interests of Indians in Kenya, Tanganyika, Uganda and Zanzibar. I would also draw the attention of the Government of India to the fact that thousands upon thousands of rich virgin country in Tanganyika territory is awaiting development. There are plenty of people in India who would make very suitable colonists. East Africa has been considered and rightly so, to be the natural outlet for the surplus population of India. In view of this fact I would request the Government and people of India to seriously consider the advisability of opening Information Bureau at Bombay, Lahore and Rajput.

Local Government is maintaining an Information Bureau in London. It is only just that it should make a reasonable contribution for opening and maintaining a similar Bureau at one or two centres in India.
THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER. [February 4

MEDICAL FACILITIES FOR INDIANS.

Nowhere in the whole of East Africa is there a Hospital where Indian patients could be admitted for treatment. The solitary exception is Karramba in Uganda where a mission hospital for natives receives Indian indoor patients for treatment when there is room. Often Indians have to go as far as India for treatment of serious diseases, whilst efficient hospitals are maintained at Government expense for Europeans.

In the name of Humanity I appeal to the Government of all the colonies and protectorates of East Africa to lose no time in providing suitable hospital accommodation for their Indian subjects and remove this blot on their administration.

TANGANYIA AND UGANDA.

The two sister communities of Europeans and Asians in the Mandated Territory of Tanganyika and the Protectorate of Uganda live side by side in peace and harmony. They prove that neither segregation nor reservation of any part of the country for any one community is necessary to avoid racial friction.

Legislative Councils have recently been established in both these countries but the Indian representation therein is not in proportion to Indian interests. I would therefore appeal to Sir Donald Cameron and Sir William Gower both of whom are able and far sighted administrators to set this matter right when the terms of the present councils come to an end.

ZANZIBAR.

It is indeed a pleasure to record that the relations between Indians, Arabs and the Government of His Highness the Sultan of Zanzibar are happy. Owing to the rapid development of various ports along the coast of East Africa, Zanzibar has lost her importance as a supplying base. Zanzibar had accumulated a large surplus but the ill-conceived harbour works scheme has swallowed up most of it. Only a few years ago Indians filled with distinction important posts as heads of departments under the Zanzibar Government. But all that has changed now. In 1927 the Government of Zanzibar raised the salary of its European staff at an average of about 40 per cent with retrospective effect from the year 1926 and the salary of Asiatic staff at an average of about 15 per cent but without retrospective effect. After raising its own salary the same wise Government within a few months appoints a retrenchment committee whose recommendations have more or less ended in smoke. To meet this additional expenditure import duty had to be raised from 10 to 15 per cent ad valorem in November 1927. The administration of Zanzibar is top-heavy and until the superfluous superior staff is got rid of revenue and expenditure will never balance.

KENYA.

Recently an Ordinance was passed in Kenya which gives the police and the administrative authorities power to refuse licence to possess arms to any person without assigning any reason. The practical result of this is that Europeans, as a matter of course, get licence to possess arms they like whereas Indian applicants are almost invariably refused. Unfortunately Tanganyika, Uganda and Zanzibar are imitating this policy.

Only recently some Indian shopkeepers in outstations were brutally murdered by armed thieves who could not be traced. These poor Indians were done to death simply because without arms they could not defend themselves.

Indian Traders in outlying districts without effective arms of defence are at a great disadvantage when dealing with lawless and dependent thieves who are not influenced by the knowledge of the helplessness of their Indian victims—tempts them to crimes of violence.

INDIAN WOMANHOOD—III.

Mrs. Sarojini Naidu concluded her lecture on the "Ideals of Indian womanhood" on January 29, at the Senate House when she spoke of the contribution that Islamic culture had made towards Indian womanhood, comparing it with the contributions that had been made by cultures of different old communities now living in India side by side with the Hindus. Speaking of the contributions to the Moslem culture Mrs. Naidu said—"When Islam came to India they had to write anew gospel of their evolution in accordance with the new land and in consonance with the new traditions with which they had to harmonise their ideas. They found that the peculiar glory of the Vedic ideal, the Aryan culture, as interpreted, was embodied and glorified by Indian womanhood and had surpassed all other ideals and traditions. Islamic women brought into the life of India the spirit of courage and independence—this might seem to them a paradox because of the Parda. That was used by the prophet to signify the modesty which every woman however modernised she might be, must value above all things. Parda as was then understood, meant the covering of the hair up to the edge of the forehead, the covering of the arms up to the edge of the wrist and the covering of the feet up to the edge on the ankle. But with the degeneration of ideals Parda had now become a piece of cloth hung 'before the door to stand between the virtue of women and the vice of man.'

Proceeding Mrs. Naidu said that the Islamic women alone had not made their contribution to the ideal of Indian womanhood. There were the Zoroastrian women, the Parsees, who had contributed the spirit of progress, comradeship and a responsible share equally with the men folk which placed the foundation of true citizenship and true nationhood.

After referring to the contribution made by Christian womanhood which she described as the spirit of freedom Mrs. Naidu addressing the young men said—"We talk of freedom but how dare you talk of freedom while those that create freedom out of their life blood are kept in slavery. I want you to realise that the word 'freedom' in your mouth would be a mockery unless there is freedom in your home. The only unit of freedom is in the home. When the woman is free the soul of the nation shall be free. I want you to realise that although Manu said "Woman is dependent throughout her life," he also said that 'where women are honoured there the gods live.'

JULLUNDUR KANYA MAHA VIDYALAYA.

An Appeal.

Founded by Lala Dwaraka in 1909, the Kanya Mahavidyalaya of Jullundur—running a School, a Hostel, a College and an Orphanage and Widows' Home—has grown in size and strength, activity and usefulness, and is regarded as a Model Institution in the whole of India. Girls from all parts of the country and colonies flock to the college and the hostel in good numbers and they are taught besides Hindi, Sanskrit, English, Mathematics, History and Geography, Cooking, Sewing, Knitting, Nursing, First Aid, Gardening, Spinning, Weaving, Music; Drawing and Painting.

Distinguished Indians of all schools of thought have visited this institution, and have expressed complete satisfaction with all they saw there. Amongst them have been H. H. the Gaikwad of Baroda, Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, late Mr. Gokhale, Right Hon'ble Mr. Sastry, Pandit Malaviya, Lala Lajpat Rai Prof. Karve, Principal Rajas, Mr. V. J. Patel, Mr. Abbas Tyebjee, Dr. Kitchen, Mr. Satyamurti and Ministers and Directors of Education in the Punjab.

Free education is given to over 500 girls, orphans and widows on national and religious lines. Purdah is done away with and character building and social service are the special features of instruction. Over 70 ladies are now serving as teachers and preachers in different parts of the country. And 125 primary and secondary schools have sprung up in the province that follow the curriculum of this institution. All teachers use Khadi and all students wear Swadeshi cloth.

It is thus clear how this premier institution in the Punjab is serving the Indian womanhood in the cause of education and how it deserves all your support for its existence and expansion. We therefore, appeal to the citizens of Bombay to give their best help to this model institution and thus help in spreading the cause of women's education on which depends the real salvation of our Motherland.

The late Mr. Ranga Rao: We deeply regret to record the death of Mr. K. Ranga Rao, the pioneer of the movement to raise the status of the depressed classes in the South Kanara district. For many years Mr. Ranga Rao struggled on almost single-handed with his schemes for the betterment of these classes. A few years ago, owing to his age and infirmities, he handed over the management of the settlement he had founded to the Servants of India Society. He then relinquished his work and became a Servant, known by the name of Jawarannah. Mr. Ranga Rao was no half-hearted reformer. He was a thorough-going advocate of higher education for girls, postponement of the marriage age for them, inter-caste marriages, and the removal of all those disadvantages that are in his own family. Notwithstanding his solid work for social reform, he was, owing to his retiring disposition, known to few outside his province. He has come to serve and to his country and his people, and his name will always rank high in the roll of Indian social reformers.

The Statutory Commission: The members of the Statutory Royal Commission on constitutional reform in India arrived in Bombay by the P. and O. mail steamer, Rawalpindi, on Friday the 3rd inst. There were demonstrations in Bombay and several other places of disapproval of the Commission. Public meetings were held—that in Bombay was attended by about 30,000 persons—at which speeches were made by prominent leaders of all political parties condemning the exclusion of the Indians from membership of the Commission and declaring that the Indian people should have nothing to do with the Commission in any form or at any stage. In addition, hartals were organized at several towns by the Congress party. Hartals in ancient days were the recognized means of public protest against arbitrary actions of rulers, and consist of closing of shops and the total cessation of business. Allied to this was the practice of stoning at the gate of the rulers and ministers, and that of inflicting wounds on one's own person as so as to excite compassion in those against whom one had a grievance. At the present day, hartals have only a general import as a sort of public demonstration of discontent. Hartals on the occasion of a public protest and the Commission seem to have been only partially successful in most places, and in Madras and Calcutta they were attended with scenes of disorder, leading to the former formation of the Police opening fire on the crowd. On the whole, the Commission is disapproved of by a large majority of the politically-minded section of the population, but there are sections which have welcomed the Commission. The latter are chiefly the depressed classes and Punjab Mussalmans. Some big landed proprietors like the Maharaja of Darbhanga have also welcomed the Commission. The Committee has a difficult task before it, as it will have to work practically without the co-operation of the classes who could afford it the greatest amount of help. The reasons given for excluding Indians from the Commission are very flimsy and unconvincing. To make up for this position, Sir John Simon issued last week a statement in which he laid down the constitution and powers of the committee of the Legislature which are to act with the Commission. The scheme is defective in some important respects, and has been rejected by the Swarajists, Independent and Liberal leaders in the Assembly. A group of two members of the Council of States headed by Sir Sankaran Nair have suggested to Sir John Simon some improvements in those respects.

All-India Women's Conference: The second All-India Women's Conference was held at Delhi on Tuesday. The delegates were welcomed by Mrs. S. K. Das, the Law Member of the Viceroy's Executive Council, and Her Excellency Lady Delhi opened the Conference with a short address expressing her sympathy with the movement. A report of the work done since the first Conference was read by Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya, the General Secretary, and after that Her Highness the Dowager Begam of Bhopal was elected president and delivered her presidential address. The Conference then held its sessions in pursuance of the resolutions relating to women's education and emancipation from hampering customs. One of these explored the effect of early marriage on education, and emphasized the attempt to pass legislation prohibiting early marriage, the Conference strongly protesting against his proposed ages of twelve and fifteen and called upon him and the select committee to amend his bill in conformity with their resolution. The Committee also recorded that girls’ schools should be inspected by women who had general and technical qualifications.

A Right Move: In the course of the debate on Sir Hari Sia’s Bill to raise the age of consent, the Home Member of the Government of India announced in the Legislative Assembly that Government intended shortly “to appoint” a committee of officials and non-officials to enquire into the question. He incidentally remarked that the question of child marriages was the real problem. We think that the idea of appointing a Committee is an excellent one. It terms of reference should include all questions of marriage legislation which have been agitated in the country. On the basis of the report of the Committee, Government should bring in a comprehensive Bill applicable to the whole country and to all classes.

Religion and Marriage: The ex-Maharaja of Indore is still in Ceylon. Miss Nancy Miller, the American girl whom he wishes to marry, is also there. The Maharaja cannot marry her according to the Hindu law because he has already two wives living and civil marriages can be contracted only by persons who have no husband or wife living or have not been married previously. The conversion of the girl to Hinduism presented difficulties owing to the reluctance of Hindu Missionary organizations to countenance a third marriage to the prejudice of the two prior Hindu wives. At this time a Punja Musalman, according to a local vernacular paper, telegraphed to the ex-Maharaja suggesting that he and Miss Miller should both embrace Islam and thus cut the Gordian knot. This will be welcome by the orthodox in favour of this reform. But there is a crematorium in Bombay, care should be taken that the cost of disposing of the dead in this manner is not prohibitive. We are entirely in favour of establishing a general crematorium by the Corporation which will be open to all communities rather than communal crematia. There is no caste or creed or race among the dead, death being the great leveller.

Women Teachers and Mass Education: A "Professor" writing in Female Education in the Delhi edition of the Bombay Chronicle says:

"No knowledge is possible until there is mass education and for an entire nation the easiest and the surest means, as I have said before, of imparting education to the masses is to educate teachers. If they are educated they in their turn can go wherever they wish to, and see the whole world and the whole world will be glad to be educated as to the utility of the innovation. If there is a crematorium in Bombay, care should be taken that the cost of disposing of the dead in this manner is not prohibitive. We are entirely in favour of establishing a general crematorium by the Corporation which will be open to all communities rather than communal crematoria. There is no caste or creed or race among the dead, death being the great leveller.

Manager’s Notice.

Reminders have been sent to those subscribers whose subscriptions have fallen in arrears and to those whose subscriptions are due for the current year. Those who are in arrears are specially requested to remit the amounts due without delay.
The non-Brahmin movement in Southern India, if we look behind its superficial aspects, represents a Dravidian renaissance which has been in process for several years past. That the Dravidian civilization was the oldest in India and that it attained a high degree of excellence, has been recently made plain by the excavations at Mohenjo-Daro and elsewhere. Even the Rameswara which is to some extent a propagandistic work in the interest of the Aryans reluctantly bears testimony to the prosperity and splendour of the Kingdom of Ravana. Ravana himself is represented as a highly cultivated and capable ruler. Modern researches go to throw considerable doubt on the authenticity of the so-called Aryan conquest of India from the North-West. Pargiter in one of his later works maintains that if there was any migration, it was from India north-westward and not into India from that quarter. The Aryans, according to Pargiter, were a Himalayan tribe, a sort of fire-worshippers who descended into the plains and established themselves as the dominant sect in the country. They readily mixed with the Dravidians with whom, indeed, they had many affinities. The Dravidian influence permeated Aryan thought and life. The reverence for the cow, the recognition of certain trees and plants as sacred, the high respect paid to the mother among Hindus and Indians generally, transcending that paid to the father, are all the outcomes of Dravidian influence. Testimony to the fact that Dravidians at one time were spread over the whole country, is found in place-names such as Kumara-bhatti on the Simla-Kalka Railway, and in Gambuti, Assam, "bhatti" being a Dravidian word meaning town or a large village. The Brahmin in Baluchistan are a relic of an once powerful Dravidian regime in that country. It is on record that proclamations by the early British authorities in Bombay were issued in English and Kanarese.

That the whole of peninsular India, India south of the Vindhayas, was regarded as Dravida, is born out by the fact that even to-day the five linguistic groups of Brahmanas namely Gujarathi, Marathi, Telugu, Brahmi and Tamil, together constitute the Paibha-Dravida as distinguished by the Pancha Gaudas of Northern India. Professor Bhandarkar has found traces of Dravidian influence even in the language and vocabulary of the Vedas. It is an axiom of philology, that grammar and not vocabulary is the test of linguistic affinities. A distinctive feature of the Dravidian language is that the predicate agrees with the subject not only in number but also in gender. Modern Indian vernaculars, even in the South, have a largely Sanscritised vocabulary, but grammatically they are more related to the Dravidian vernacular. It was said of the Roman conquest of Greece that the captive Greek captured the conquering Roman by his culture and philosophy. The same may be said of the Aryan penetration into the South. Aryan religions and social ideas became profoundly modified by contact with Dravidian culture, and all the chief exponents of post-Buddhistic Hinduism were Southerners born and bred. The large majority of the canonical saints of the Great Saiva and Vaishnava sects in Southern India, were non-Brahmins. It was the late Sir William Hunter who wrote of the Indian emigration to Burma as the reassertion after an interruption of a thousand years of the Indo-Aryan expansion in Eastern Asia. A similar movement seems to be taking place in India itself. In Bombay for instance, Tamil and Telugu speakers were very rare twenty years ago. To-day they are to be found in every street. Not only have yootna of the middle classes poured into Bombay in search of employment, but a large and increasing proportion of the working classes are drawn from the South. In the building trade especially there seems to be a large contingent from Andhra.

The non-Brahmin movement of the present day is no doubt immediately and on the surface a movement to secure a larger share of offices in the administration. But there is a deeper significance underlying it of which even the leaders of the movement themselves, do not seem to realise. The genius of the Dravidian race is creative and constructive. The Dravidians invented the art of cultivation. They were the builders of the architectural monuments which are so numerous in the South. They were also the first Indian race to establish a regular system of schools for the young. A race so gifted, has a great contribution to make to Indian nationalism of which, indeed, it is the foundation layer just as the Saxons to British civilization and culture. The non-Brahmin movement has, therefore, a profound interest for all Indians of whatever caste or community, quite apart from its present-day political aspects. The virulent anti-Brahmin sentiments which are to be found in the speeches and writings of some non-Brahmin leaders, are utterly alien to the Dravidian spirit of which a wide toleration combined with a deep reverence for intellectual and spiritual things is the most distinguishing feature. We have, therefore, always felt and expressed much interest and sympathy for the movement in view of its immense possibilities, though we have not been slow to criticise its present shortcomings. We are glad to think that a new spirit is beginning to permeate the movement, a spirit of catholicity embracing Brahmins as well as non-Brahmins.
To say that India needs a comprehensive system of elementary education is repeating only a commonplace and obvious fact. But until we consider, in the light of scientific research and investigation, the object of such education we will be spending our days in the shallows of a shrinking educational tank. Just as it is necessary to keep an irrigation tank dredged out in order to maintain a large enough supply of water in the rice fields it should be evident that invalid reasons for educating children and young people must be uprooted and destroyed in order that adequate space may be provided in the fluid process of effective education. It will be essential to a good beginning to agree that our present system of education in India is unsatisfactory. It is not producing beneficial results. In view of the fact that nothing, comparatively speaking, is being done for the education of three hundred million people, if we still wish to move forward into the field of elementary education—that is, if we are possessed of the urge to teach—the questions certainly arise: What shall we teach? And why? Shall our object be that of giving a knowledge of history, of events of older years? Shall it be merely to continue the building of another nation? We have too many people already living on the reputations of their forefathers. Ancestry is not enough! We have too many nations which, by building up racial, economic, and political walls, have set up the whole world as an armed camp. Nationalism is not enough! What is necessary is the faking of the individual, the developing of his intelligent interest in his worth as a human being in relation to other human beings, and the giving to him of a universal horizon where the mountain peaks of fellowship are always visible. Unless this kind of a world citizen can be created do not care how much reading, or writing, or geography, or physics, or literature, the student may have cognizance of. What shall it profit a man if he earns a crore of rupees and cannot make a better world for himself and others to live in? What shall it profit the world if India becomes only another nation among nations which are reaching, more or less realistically, for each others' throats?

India, like all other nations, has a contribution to make in the world's pageant of progress. How can every child of India learn the best that India has produced and is able to offer to others and then build this knowledge into his own living action thereafter? India is not as diversified as we might be led to suspect. An underlying message is present that declares the moments of an individual life are but fragments of eternity. Since then, of necessity, the movements of human progress are slow a fine educational lesson is exemplified in India. The idea that time must be taken for the production of the highest good is a basic principle in the study of educational psychology. Recognising this a teacher in the India of today should not be simply a nettle ball for the preservation of outworn educational clothing. He must be interested in facts and how to get them acting in the thinking of the students in India. To continue the present stereotyped form of church and government education as found in India, thrust down from western sources, is to close our eyes to facts. Shall we not recognise that we are defeating our own aims, stop the waste of time, effort, and money while we may and go to work along constructive, creative lines? We need to lay aside standardized theories and preconceived notions. Thinking people everywhere are dissatisfied with what may be called the historical method of education—the method that intends to provide for students drinking at the superior wisdom fountain of the teacher. Ancestor worship is going out of date. The mistakes of the forefathers are too plain for us to think of them as beautiful successes. "We are in the midst of the greatest intellectual revolution that has ever over-taken mankind." I covet for India a new realization of the values that come through an educational process that keeps the child in touch with life. The idea is still being perpetuated in many quarters that education is a preparation for life. Education IS life—or it is nothing of social value. "Apart from active participation in the affairs of the community the school has no moral end or aim." Education is more than a pedagogical problem. When all the text books on science, history, and religion are written, studied, and cast aside it will be clearly obvious still that the real educational problem with which we must deal is that contained in the parable of Jesus when he illustrated his answer to the question: "Who is my neighbour?" by the story of the Good Samaritan. This business of living with folks is the most serious educational problem of our generation.

We live in an age of mass production. It seems to many that mass education is desirable. However much it may advisable from the point of view of economy it can never be effective from either a mental or social angle. In educational circles there has come in recent years a cry against standardized education of children against the running of each child through the same mould. The spirit of experimentation is abroad in the world. The assured formalism of the ordinary school must give way to a belief in trying the untried. Schools should no longer be artificial. Since the problem of education is concerned most deeply with the personality of the child it is necessary to bring to bear all the wisdom of modern, scientific, psychological knowledge on the adaptation of each child to his surrounding environment. This involves also the creation of better environments for child and adult. "The ability to meet new conditions intelligently and effectively, to fashion new tools when the old ones no longer do the work, is one sufficient evidence of genuine education." An American poet has a poem centering about the line: "Something there is that does not like a wall."

It is a story of the work of the frost in breaking down the old stone walls of New England hillsides. There could be no better motto for the development of a great new system of education in India. Shall we dedicate our efforts to the cause of destroying old remaining barriers? As a practical demonstration of what can be accomplished by the use of new methods in education in India may I present "Ushagram" with its psychological background, its social environment, its methodology, its aims.

India is an unknown country without a knowledge of her villages. Through them run the currents of life. Within their thatch-roofed cottages center the activities that will designate the direction that India will travel as a nation among the nations of the world. The cities are great and powerful. But they are abnormal products of a machine age. If we are to see India surfacing the road she has been building for a thousand years we must keep our eyes fixed upon the villages. From the villages comes the flowing life of a nation. With over ninety per cent of her population living in and around her villages India is transforming her villages, can remake her national life and stand to make the world. To assist in providing a necessary and vital village leadership Ushagram is dedicated.

Ushagram represents the application of experimental education to the life of an Indian village. If there is one gift the West has to offer to the Orient, and particularly to India, it is that of spiritualized material progress. This involves the teaching of the worth of human personality. It deals with the lifting of the whole social structure of the village to a more comprehensive and practical place where progress will represent cooperative plus individual effort. A passive resistance to evil can never equal the constructive developments of positive efforts toward ends of social benefit. In Ushagram work by each is essential to the success of all. In seven hundred thousand villages-agricultural by nature—there is to be found a massing of the human resources of one of the great nations of the world. Great not only in the past but also great in potentialities for the future. Through the villages have swept religions, philosophies, social customs, taboos, until today there is represented no coherent unity. Only are found the possibilities that are confused alaow within the onlyling ranges of human personality. The sorting over of this mass of human material will require care. The searching demands keen intelligence. The assuming of a national entity demands the supreme effort of the total population. For all this is required leadership. From where shall this leadership come? Shall it come from men who live among the commonplaces—and see it as the commonplace? From young men who view the human race through sectionalised spectacles? From the haunts of political hucksters of outworn wares? Shall it come from sources uninspired and unattracted? From men educated by rote and dogmatic assertion, by memory and a desire for personal advancement? Rather a new leadership must come from those with Faith. Faith in India—her past, her present, her future. Faith in the elemental values of common humanity. Faith that "There's magic all around us, in rocks, and trees, and in the minds of men, deep hidden springs of magic. He who strikes the rock might find them where he will."

Faith in an acceptance of the reasoned good of any people anywhere. Faith that is proclaimed in the face of peril, of criticism, of failur·, of discouragement. In reality faith is the willingness to experiment. In the light of the need of modern India for a trained leadership for her villages we, of Ushagram, are willing to try anything that offers possibilities of serving the interests of village people, and through them India. To this end I am offering some results that are arising from our experimenting, always keeping in mind that an opening of our eyes to hitherto unobserved facts may change not only our conclusions but much of our practice as well.

Simplicity of beginning is essential in promoting a successful enterprise. Since we are interested in training village leaders we believe the boys should live in a village during their period of training. We also must register the belief that boys trained capably in a simple, rural environment will make strong leaders either for city or village, for London or Bombay. Therefore Ushagram is a village of mud cottages. The walls, white-brown against the surrounding hedges, are surmounted with corrugated iron roofs. The windows are arranged for good ventilation. The iron-sheeted ceiling with its over-coating of three inches of mud keeps the cottage as cool as a brick bungalow. Incidentally this method of roofing the cottages points the way to the industrial development which is now taking place in Bengal and indeed in all India.

The Panchayats of eight members elected by the boy villagers has charge of the village morale. In its weekly sessions are settled questions of discipline, assignments of duties, arrangements for taxes. Here the Head Man learns to direct a village, finds out the details incumbent upon him if he is to conduct his office successfully. Here are freely discussed matters of policy and action. Instructors, directors, and boys make their contributions at special meetings. With the gradual breakings of the Panchayats in the villages has come a long series of evils for which will vanish if a revised democratic panchayat system is built up. This is a method of self-development which might well be copied wherever groups of boys or adults are gathered together. A similar project is that of the cooperative store. The shares are held by boys, instructor, and director. A shareholders' meeting is interesting as a practical demonstration of the interplay of combined effort. We are carrying in the store only simple articles that fill the needs of the boys. The two managers of the store, elected by the shareholders, are doing the buying and selling of the stock in trade. Our plan is to train a boy who will expand slowly the store's sphere of activity into dealings with surrounding villages. This business of the boys learning to treat each other to the extent of working together for the group is most important. Each cottage has in connection with it a vegetable garden, a poultry yard, a flower garden, and hedges. The Head Boy assigns the task of the cottage family. Sanitation, ventilation, simple improved methods of gardening, orderliness, a sense of beauty are all emphasised as the boys work side by side in their projects from which are derived cottage and personal bank accounts held in the village bank.

Carpentry applied to the improvement of construction is assuming a larger place in our experiment. Here the boys are learning to create with their hands. When they complete our course of training we are confident that they will be able to construct all the articles necessary for simple, growing life in a village at least from a carpentry angle. Our central agricultural projects are developed from the points of view of cooperative and personal initiative and effort. All the boys transplant rice until all the fields are planted. Then two members of the Panchayat assign a field to each boy. From then on the field is cared for and the rice is harvested by the boy. We are experimenting with selected seed of Indian vegetables, potatoes, peanuts, banana corn, etc. These special experiments are directly supervised by the Director working through the Panpshayat. A large vegetable garden is maintained as the village garden and in which director, instructors, and boys work. We are looking forward to installing a simple irrigation system that we may be able to conduct our farming experiments more successfully this year onward. As a part of the village life we have a middle English school. We are introducing better methods of instruction and extra-curricular subjects such as the teaching of the Bengal system of calculation. This is in line with our aim to make everything the boy studies in the classroom connect up very definitely with what he does in his every day activities in the village. May I risk repeating again that our experiments in this village-centred educational project are and will remain as simple as they can be made and still be effective. The simplicity can best be suggested perhaps by the idea that we have that it is easier to begin improving village agricultural methods by introducing a spading fork and a long-handled hoe in place of a short-handle kodal that it is to break down the slates of a series of rice fields and use a motor tractor for plowing. Or, again, it is better to teach boys to plant seed in a straight line than to insist on the use of a mechanical seeder.

To accustom boys to western standards of living and expenditure—on some one else's money—is a 'lost tragic and futile process, especially if there is no expectation of their return to villages for the building up of the village social atmosphere. It is easier and more effective to give a boy a sense of responsibility for a simple task if that task has about it an atmosphere somewhat similar to that from which he has come. A boy from a village will lose the floor of his own cottage with more understand ing of its value than if he is given the task of measuring the cottage by western arithmetical methods. This latter development should be secondary rather than primary in importance.

A sense of responsibility is necessary for the building of a virile leadership. Hard work, honest effort, apparent failure are essential in securing success. We, of our village, are working hard. We are doing the task nearest at hand, yet not forgetting its relation to the far-off goals. We are failing and building on our failures. As a result we believe that certain elements of leadership training must come our way.

Our village will continue to be founded on advice and experiment. Keeping these things in mind it is our belief that with a bit of land and creative enterprise Ushagram or its principles can be reproduced anywhere in India. The time will come when India will be dotted with Villages of the new day— villages that will be laboratories for experiments in the social and personal maladjustment of the village life about them. Such are some of the projected ideals and aims of Ushagram. There are, of course, other aspects of this educational experiment which are not even mentioned. We welcome reactions and suggestions. If you can visit us, come. Whatever the solutions may be for India's perplexing problems they will be discovered by mutually working together with a common interest.

THE KARVE JUBILEE SCHOLARSHIP FUND

It might be known to many that on the 18th of April 1928 Prof. Karve will be 71. It will be in the fitness of things if this auspicious day is observed with the joy and solemnity which it deserves. It is proposed by the Life-members of the Hindu Widows' Home, that, as in the year 1918, so this year too, (1) the 18th of April should be celebrated as a Jubilee day, (2) that scholarships should be instituted in the name of Prof. Karve to be given to deserving widows and (3) a gathering be held on a more or less large scale of the friends and admirers of Prof. Karve and of the past and present pupils of the institutions started by the inspiration and under the guidance of Prof. Karve.

We might here be allowed to note that the endowment fund of the institution allows us to maintain not more than 69 widows at present and that we have reluctantly to refuse admission to several deserving widows. "To maintain one widow's tree requires a minimum endowment fund of Rs. 2,500." We should like to appeal to the past and present students and the admirers and sympathisers of Prof. Karve to contribute to this Scholarship Fund so 'as to 'enable the Widows' Home to maintain a larger number of widows that it is able to do under the present circumstances. The following are hereby authorised to collect subscriptions on behalf of the institution and to acknowledge the receipt of the sums contributed—His Excellency Mr. V. G. Khadilkar, Esq., Secretary, Hindu Widows’ Home Association, Poona City: Prof. G. M. Chiplunkar, N. A., Superintendent, S. N. D. T. Kanya Bhavan, Satara City: Mr. Kamalrao Deshpande, G. A., Lady Superintendent Kanyashala, Belgium; Mrs. Banubai Abo, G. A., Lady Superintendent Mahila Vidyalaya, Sholapur: Mr. V. S. R. Modak, B. A., Gaj. Saraswati Mandir, Bombay: (1) Mrs. Sitabai Annagiri, G. A., Lady Superintendent, Kanyashala, Khetwadi, Girgaon; (2) Mrs. Malatibai Kalus, 10 Bhatwadi Road, Girgaon.

V. M. Joshi, President, Prof. Karve Jubilee Committee, Poona.

MADRAS SOCIAL CONFERENCES.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sirs,

Your editorial note regarding the National Social Conference is hardly fair to Mr. O. Kandaswami Chettiar. By implication you misrepresent this view on communal associations when you say that they can certainly send delegates to the Conference, as though he said they could not. The point he raised was whether the Madras Non-Brahmin Youth League, or for that matter any, Non-Brahmin Youth League is a communal social organisation such as you have, in view when you say that many of the Social Reform associations are communal and regular send representatives to the Conference. In fairness to him you should allow me to quote his statement which has a bearing on the so-called non-Brahmin movement as a whole not only in this Presidency but also in Bombay and Madras.

"I wish to say that I am not opposed to communal associations being recognised, as members of the Indian National Social Conference. On the other hand I regard social reforms as the legitimate work of communal associations. But one should distinguish between a communal association, which aims at the progress of a particular community, and a communal combination against a particular community. In a country rent by divisions of caste, creed it is one thing for a well-defined community to form an association for its progress; it is quite another for a number of loosely-knit communities or individuals belonging to these communities to form an association, the common bond of union among them being a desire to keep out of the competition of life-members of a particular community. To take a purely hypothetical case, there would be nothing wrong if the Shias formed a Shia association, but it would certainly be wrong if they formed a Non-Sunni association, inviting to its membership not only Shiias but also Hindus and Christians. I do not wish to expand the point further than to say that this is exactly what happens in the Non-Brahmin Youth League of which the leader is, as the local Arya Samaj President has pointed out, an Indian Christian. The legitimate communal associations have at least this to be said in their favour that they start with good will, however circumscribed in area, and need not necessarily degenerate into communal ill-will. But this cannot be said of illegitimate communal associations which start with jealousy and suspicion towards a particular community, and having no scope for raising to high levels of public benevolence degenerate into class-hatred."

It was in illustration of the passion engendered in the minds of young people by such associations that Mr. Chettiar referred to the storm raised by the vehement remarks, on Niles May's book by the leader of the Non-Brahmin Youth League, which resulted in the first day's proceedings ending in confusion and disorder. It is not a straightforward way of meeting Mr. Chettiar's argument to say that the proceedings did not end in confusion. Leaving aside this piece of dialectic tactics and looking at the facts alone—apart from the unintended testimony implied in the notification published in the local papers on the same day by the President of the local Arya Samaj, that "Mr. Arya whose commendation of Niles May's book led to the break up of to-day's sessions of the Social Conference was not an Arya Samajist but an Indian Christian," your own pronouncement from the Presidential Chair (read out from a prepared manuscript) at the outset of the next day's proceedings on "the unpleasantness caused at the previous day's meeting," "the storm of protests," "Mr. Arya's non-compliance with the Chairman's request," his "persisting in addressing the assembly amid loud shouts of protests," and his "failing temper," clearly indicated that the meeting had dispersed with a flush of excitement and a feeling of dissatisfaction which required for its appeasement a judicial and judicial, pronouncement from the chair the following day.

That Mr. Arya had at last sat down (having had to be gently dragged down by a lady) and that the resolution was put and declared carried—the protest against Mr. Arya, being proof of the acceptability of the resolution—therefore the meeting dispersed, does not alter the fact. Nor does the circumstance that the meeting had to be closed at the time the meeting was closed contradict the fact of the meeting dispersing in an unhappy and expressed state of mind. Your mentioning these circumstances for drawing a veil over an unfortunate incident of which we Madrasis are sufferer from the manhood, evils of a cooked-up communalism are utterly ashamed, speaks well no doubt of your chivalry in defending your hosts and hostesses in Madras, but comes as a shock upon those who have always identified you personally, with the motto of your journal—

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice; I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse— I will not retreat a single inch to the public opinion of my country, which I am bound to respect in any other case."

I should not have troubled you with this communication if you had not thought it necessary to comment on the subject. I may however take this opportunity of expressing our appreciation of the efforts of Mr. Kandaswami Chettiar in resisting the exploitation of the communal feeling of young men, in the name of Social Reform.

MADRAS.

S. H. SAEED MOHAMMAD,

Councillor, Corporation of Madras; Member, All India Congress Committee; Member, Reception Committee, Indian National Social Conference.

[We have nothing to add to what we have already written on this subject.—Ed. I.S.R.]

CHRISTIANITY AND THE REVIVAL OF HINDUISM.

If I were to be asked what I looked upon as the most characteristic and the most distinguishing feature of Christianity as a practical religion in India, I would answer at once, that to my mind the most characteristic and the most distinguishing feature of practical Christianity in India lies in its trying to live up to that noble precept—"Love thy neighbour as thy own self!" Translated into the terms of daily conduct, this brief precept is very comprehensive indeed. It is a noble and an exacting and almost an entire way of life. It means—Help up the lame and the maimed, the defective and the decrepit. It means—Uplift the downtrodden; lend a hand to the depressed the outcaste and the untouchable. It means—Bring the light of knowledge to the ignorant. It means—Enable the weak and helpless to stand alone by their own strength.
the downhearted to lead useful lives of self-help and self-respect, reclaim the criminal and the unemployed, serve man in society, and so raise humanity, and spread civilisation, and serve God. It is this gospel of humble and loving and intelligently effective service, which I look upon as that feature in practical Christianity, to which we in India to-day owe more than any human calculations can count up.

But although there is a mighty advance upon what prevailed up to the eighteenth century, it is by no means enough. And militant and rebellious reform, discontented and forceful reform, mainly economic or legal or political, however earnest and however pure in intention, is a double-edged tool cutting both ways. It elevates and it depresses. It removes old grievances and it produces new ones. It solves some problems, remedies some evils, but at the same time cannot but create others: Only the spiritual influence of religion is wholly curative. It heals and strengthens and uplifts, and whatever it does is pure gain. And in the course of the nineteenth century practical Christianity entered upon a crusade of social service, altogether different in kind from the destructive and hate-generating crusades of the middle Ages. Nineteenth century Christianity has carried the spiritual banner of fraternal love and service into the remotest quarters of the globe. From Greenland to New Zealand and from China to Peru, large-hearted Christian men and women are leading dedicated lives in the spirit of their Lord and Master, their Swami and Guru helping the depressed, raising the fallen, washing, teaching and with infinite patience civilising the backward races, healing and mending, reclaiming and serving, inspired by the pure faith that fraternal love is its own surpassing reward.

Look at some of the invaluable services they are rendering in our own country. I do not wish to repeat secondhand what you can read for yourselves in annual reports and similar publications. The work of Christian missions with our little tribes, forest tribes. The work of the middle class in teaching, civilising, helping the depressed, raising the fallen, dealing with old grievances, is itself a unique opportunity in India. This line of thought and such a point of view one does come across now and then. Loving helpfulness does involve any amount of intelligent and efficient scheming. Breathing soul into bodies requires both infinite love and infinite scheming. That is all I care to say in reply to such a point of view and such a temperament.

To return to my theme Vaishnava Gujurat and Hindu India are to-day what they have become through centuries of cumulative degradation and decay. But Vaishnavism and Hinduism were not always what we find them to be to-day. Time was when young Vaishnavas and Hindus were achieving out of it. It was the same with the unattainable Brahman who created them and elevated him. Time was when young Hinduisan was a Universal Religion, with ideals of fraternal love as noble as the Christian to-day. Let me refer you for an instance, to that immortal parable of Love, Charity and Selfcontrol in one of the most inspired scriptures of humanity, the Brhad Aranyak Upanishad.

Time was when this trinity of mutually purifying virtues were not mere precepts in Hindu society. And, in proportion as these virtues come to be realised more and more in individual and in social and in international conduct, Hinduism too will regain its ancient purity and vigour as the religion of fraternal service and sympathy. The concrete object lessons which practical Christianity gives before our eyes at our own doors by its noble and devoted work amongst the neediest of our own people, will in the fairness of time enable Hinduism to achieve this revival from within itself. Ram Mohan Roy and Vivekanand have been the great pioneers of such a revival and, to conclude with a Christian image intelligible in the bumblest kitchen, their leaven will leave the whole mass in due course. And that, to my mind, ladies and gentlemen, is the loftiest and most invaluable service the practical Christianity of fraternal service is rendering to us in our own country at the present day.
WOMEN'S EDUCATION CONFERENCE DELHI.

TRIBUTE TO INDIAN WOMANHOOD.

Lady Irwin opened the All-India Ladies' Conference on February 7th at the Royal Cinema Hall, New Delhi. The large and distinguished gathering including Sir John Simon, Lord Burnham, the Begum of Bhopal, Mrs. Naidu, Mrs. Kamala Devi Chattopadhyaya, Mrs. Sarla Devi, and a number of members of the Central Legislature, and about 150 delegates from all parts of the country.

Welcoming the delegates Mrs. S. R. Das, Chairman of the Reception Committee, referred to the illiteracy, which is attributable to the apathy obstacle. In the face of light, of courage, and of hope, and it was their work to remove. Women made better progress and about the education of their girls. Women made better progress and about the education of their girls.

The Repository of Tradition.

In her opening address Lady Irwin, who was accorded a rousing ovation, said that she had realized in the short time she had spent in India how deep and far-reaching was the influence of women. The were the repository of tradition, and long may they continue to be. They must not be blind leaders of the blind, but the bringers of light, of courage, and of hope, and it was their work to see that the best of the old to what was best of the new. One of the greatest needs in India was a continuous supply of suitable and trained women teachers. Women made better teachers of the very young than men, because they had greater patience and greater sympathy. They needed women with knowledge and vision and capacity for self-sacrifice and a high sense of the great responsibility that was theirs in a country, where the population was mainly rural. It was a problem which must be faced and surmounted before any real and fair spreading progress could be made. The obstacles in the way of women's education in this country were enormous. There were difficulties of language, poverty, ignorance, apathy and hostile public opinion and social customs, and even politics, but Lady Irwin declared that women the world over, were famed for their patience and their dogged courage in the face of daily adversities, and if they kept a stout heart and were determined to go forward steadily she was convinced that they should in due time overcome all their present troubles and win through to their goal. In one respect, India was favoured. Other countries had been pioneers, and had made mistakes by which India, if she was wise, might profit.

Mrs. NAIDU'S SPEECH.

In proposing a vote of thanks to Lady Irwin Mrs. Naidu gratefully acknowledged the illuminating words of her Excellency, which, she said, should be the keynote of their aims and ideals. Amidst loud applause, Mrs. Naidu declared that the East and West had met to-day in the kinship of womanhood, that indivisible sisterhood. India, she said, was the home of Lakeshni. Saraswati and Parvati and did not consist of Hindu ideals only. But ideals of all nationalities who had come into contact in this land. She strongly repudiated the charge that India consisted of narrow idealists.

Her Excellency and other ladies who were assembled then proceeded to the Municipal Hall, where a civil welcome was accorded by the Municipality in honour of the Ladies' Conference. After the guests had been treated with tea and light refreshments Messrs. Johnson and Abdul Rahman on behalf of the hosts welcomed the ladies. Respecting on behalf of the guests Mrs. Naidu hoped that Delhi would not only be centre of legislation but of the regeneration of the Indian nation. She prayed that after the next election the city fathers would also include city mothers in the Delhi Municipal.

THE WANLESS TUBERCULOSIS SANATORIUM.

A UNION MISSION ENTERPRISE,

COMMENDATION BY H. E. THE GOVERNOR OF BOMBAY.

Universal satisfaction has been felt throughout India at the graces of His Excellency to the Government of India in conferring upon Dr. Wanless a Knighthood in recognition of his great medical service among India's people. His Excellency the Governor of Bombay has also been graciously pleased to hand the subscription list of the present scheme with a donation of Rs. 1,000. When the scheme was first explained to His Excellency he sent a letter of warm appreciation. It contained the following passage:

"... I shall be glad to give any support that I can to the scheme, as was outlined to me at the interview, as I am quite certain that a Tuberculosis Sanatorium is very urgently needed. I trust, therefore, that the building funds will shortly be forthcoming, in which case the work can be started at once, as no funds for recurring charges will be required—such funds I am informed, being met from the generosity of those supporting the Mission.

If you will be good enough to let me know when you are opening a subscription list, I shall be glad to send you a donation myself.

I do not know whether the committee have considered the name which this institution should bear when it is completed, but I might perhaps suggest that it would seem appropriate for the name of Sir W. J. Wanless to be associated with it, as some small reminder—even though reminder will never be necessary—of the great self-sacrificing work which he has carried on in India for so many years."

SIR WILLIAM WANLESS.

The Joint Committee responsible for the scheme have unanimously approved of His Excellency's suggestion that the institution should be named after Sir William J. Wanless who himself initiated the scheme and who has set his heart on assuring its success before he had to steer in the right direction, the education of the girls.

The Wanless Tuberculosis Sanatorium.

In proposing a vote of thanks to Lady Irwin Mrs. Naidu gratefully acknowledged the illuminating words of her Excellency, which, she said, should be the keynote of their aims and ideals. Amidst loud applause, Mrs. Naidu declared that the East and West had met to-day in the kinship of womanhood, that indivisible sisterhood. India, she said, was the home of Lakeshni, Saraswati and Parvati and did not consist of Hindu ideals only. But ideals of all nationalities who had come into contact
The present appeal is, therefore, only for the amount required for buildings. As this is to be a Union Mission enterprise those Missiona joining in the organization are to undertake the raising of funds necessary for mainte-nance and upkeep. The Miraj Mission Hospital will provide the Physician-in-charge, and the Asistant Physician. The Miraj Hospital laboratory will also provide the laboratory facilities, required by the institution and will carry out such surgical procedures as may be called for in the treatment of the resident patients.

How You Can Help.

This appeal will doubtless fall into the hands of some of Sir William’s friends and grateful patients who may desire to make a distinctive contribution by providing some entire item in the foregoing list. Some individual donors may wish to provide ‘a Bungalow’, or ‘House’ or ‘Individual Cottage’ or some other part of the ‘Plant’ as a token of gratitude, for benefit received. The intention is that such donors shall have their names associated with the particular portion of the buildings which they donate to the Sanatorium. The Joint Committee will be deeply grateful for gifts from all quarters be those gifts great or small.

DOnATIONS.

Donors may send their contributions to any of the following who will be glad to forward prompt acknowledgments, all donations to be marked for ‘The Union Mission Tuberculosis Sanatorium’.

The basis of organisation will be similar to that of the Union Mission Tuberculosis Sanatorium at Arogyavaram, South India. The Physican-in-Charge of the Sanatorium will be ex-officio Chairman and Honorary Treasurer of the Committee of Management, The Sanatorium is intended for the treatment of in-patients only who will be admitted without distinction as to nationality, caste or religion. For the present the Sanatorium will contain fifty beds, to be enlarged if additional accommodation is required and as funds become available. Those patients unable to pay for treatment will be treated free of charge in the public wards. Small individual cottages will be provided at a small charge for patients able to pay, for treatment and who desire to have family attendants reside with them.

The Staff.

The Staff is to be appointed by the Committee of Management. The message adds: "We, the Maharrattas, being Khatriyas, must always be ready to protect our religion. The Hindu religion at present is really between two fires, one Christian and the other Mahomedan. We must some how fo ward it to the Sathyah-Shodhaka Samaj, and the Maharratta community generally have become prone to religious and social reforms. Your Highness' son, the Maharaja of Indore, has married the daughter of a Mahratta Sande, who was guided by Rajajish Shahi Shabaraj. Social reforms are not new to the Mahratta community. The Mahratta King, Shri Shivaji Mahrat raj, converted Bajaj Nimmalkar to Hinduism. The late Rajajish Shahi Maharaj received a Mahomedan lady and her sons into the Mahratta community. The late Maharaja of Gwalior, Aliya Bahadur Madhava rao Scindia, took into the Mahratta fold his natural brother Balwantrao Bhayya Shikib, whose mother was a Mahomedan, and married him to a Mahratta girl.

"We feel glad that the Maharrattas are not ready to marry Miss Miller, an American girl. We shall be glad that Your Highness wishes to convert her to our Mahratta caste. To fulfill that wish our Mahratta mission will place itself at Your Highness' service. Our mission has converted a Christian girl and married her to a Mahratta youth, who is one of the members of our mission. We will arrange wherever Your Highness wishes to convert Miss Miller. We are ready to convince our brethren in Maharastra to welcome such a marriage.

"It will be very convenient for us to perform it in Poona. We are sure all Mahrattas in the Deccan will feel extremely happy to welcome Your Highness and Miss Miller. Please be strong and do not abandon the Mahratta cause. We know that Your Highness dearly loves our religion. The Mahratta race is well known for its love of religion. We hope Your Highness will candidly think over our offer and communicate to us your approval."

FIRE INSURANCE.
MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.
Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 40 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for controlling the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.
It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

The Assembly Debate on the Simon Commission: The eagerly expected debate on the Simon Commission in the Legislative Assembly came off on Thursday. The "Times of India" correspondent has described the scene: "Never in the history of the growing parliamentary institutions in India has there been a debate of such widespread interest as that which is now to be heard in the Legislative Assembly to-day on the Simon Commission. This is not merely a rhetorical description of the crowded appearance of public galleries. They were crowded to the utmost. The Members of the Council of State filled every bench in their gallery and also sat on its steps and stood. The Distinguished Stra\'nger's gallery was similarly crowded with distinguished ladies and gentlemen from far and near. The gallery on the floor of the House to the left of the Chair contained a party from Viceregal Lodge, the President's gallery was filled and contained such prominent people as Dewan Bahadur Nangachiar, Mrs Benet, Sir Tej Bahadur Saphar and Mrs. Sarojini Naidu. Behind them and directly the Ladies' gallery and the large spaces reserved for the general public were packed with listeners. But the broad interest which the world at large feels in the situation in which the debate is taking part only reflects the most widely indicated by the occupants of the press gallery where, besides the gathering of correspondents, there were visitors specially gathered for the occasion from several countries outside India. There was one correspondent from America, another was an Austrian correspondent representing several newspapers in Austria, a third was the accredited representative of a trio of the most important newspapers in Germany besides one of the largest in the United States.\n
Lala Lajpat Rai moved the principal non-official resolution which was a vindication of the House and that this House will, therefore, have nothing to do with the Commission at any stage or in any form.\n
Lalaji made an outspoken speech in which he charged British rule in India as having been an utter failure in respect of nation-building achievements. He was followed by representative speakers. According to the testimony of the correspondent of the Times of India, the speeches were of a very high level. The proceedings were, however, abruptly cut short by the news of the death on his way in an ambulance car to the Assembly Chamber to take part in the voting of Mr. Harechandra Vishandas, a veteran public man of high character and great abilities, who represented Karachi. The debate stands adjourned to Saturday.

The arrival of the Statutory Commission in India has had an ominous influence. In his demonstrations organised in different parts of the country to express the public disapproval of the Commission, college students took a prominent part. They have been punished in several ways for doing so. As reported in the Times of India, Sir Stanley Jackson, so far forgot himself as to threaten in his Convocation address to withdraw the Government grant to the universities. The high handed way in which officials are prone to treat students in this country is in striking contrast to the consideration they show to them in England, as shown by the following extract from a recent English paper: "Ragging" which occurred in the West End of London on the night of the last Oxford and Cambridge Rugby match, when damage was done in theatres and performances were stopped, has been the subject of communications between the Viceroy and the Indians. The result of which warnings have been posted at both universities. The following was issued at Cambridge: The Vice-Chancellor has been greatly concerned by the reports in certain newspapers describing disturbances which occurred in some London streets, theatres, and musical halls on the evening after the Cambridge Rugby football match, and attributing these disturbances to undergraduate members of the two universities. No evidence has as yet reached the Vice-Chancellor to connect participation in these disturbances by under-graduate members of either University, except in a very few cases where under-gra\n utuates appear to have been charged, and in some cases acquitted, in the Metropolitan police courts. At the same time, the Vice-Chancellor desires to warn most urgently all under-graduate members of the University against any participation in scenes of disorder, particularly such as involve injury to property or interference with the enjoyment of other persons, whether after inter-University contests or at other times. Any member of the University who takes part in such disturbances not only disgraces himself but stains the name of his University and brings its good name into discredit with the outside world. The Vice-Chancellor feels confident that this warning, which he now issues, will enlist the sympathy and cooperation of all undergraduate members who rightly value their position of members of the University of Cambridge.\n
Mr. Chowdhuri on Jesus Christ: We publish today Mr. Dhiren dranath Chowdhuri's rejoinder to our review of his learned work. We cannot claim the great erudition which Mr. Chowdhuri has brought to bear upon his subject. But we have bestowed much thought to it during many years and we hereby state in brief the conclusions we have reached so far—they bear on Mr. Chow-dhuri's thesis. We must say that the question of the origin and date of a great teacher has never approached to the same degree of practical importance. It is a wise saying of the Hindus that we should not play too curiously into the sources of rivers and rivulets.
If the historical tests are applied to the great Teachers of Hindooism, as ficundly as Mr. Chowdhuri applies them to Christ, bow few would emerge unscathed? Because Sri Krishna's history cannot be established are the teachings of the Gita and Bhagavad Geeta. It does not follow as much relevancy to an appreciation of Christ's teachings to ascertain positively his date, his parentage and other details of his mundane life. Jesus would be a great Teacher whether he was white, black or brown, whether he was born in the 1st or the 4th Century, and whether he died on the Cross or on his bed in his own home. As regards his teachings, Mr. Chowdhuri says they were not his, that others had taught the same before him. It is quite true that no man is his own ancestor, and we can always trace an idea to previous sources. But merely Jesus is entitled to credit for having focussed in his own person for the world the collective wisdom of the ages,

Though truths in mankind daily join,
Deep-seated in our mystic frame,
We yield all blessing to the name
Of Him that made them current exist.

But Jesus did not merely reproduce the wisdom of his predecessors. He made substantial contributions of his own to it, as when he rebuked the self-complacency of the woman taken in adultery.
We do not think that Jesus held the last word in ethics or religion. Neither do we differ from professing Christians. But we think that he is unquestionably one of the two greatest World-Teachers, and that Gautama Buddha alone can be mentioned in the same breath with him.

Muslim Girls' Education: No less distinguished a leader of the Mahomedan community than His Highness the Aga Khan has given his considered views in favour of the education of Muslim girls.

The Hindoo Widow Reform League: We have received from the President of the a-sociation the fourth report of the Hindoo Widow Reform League which covers the period 1924-27. The Society is registered under the Societies Registration Act and has its headquarters in Lucknow. The Institute of Hindoo Widow Reform is a separate social organisation with the object of imparting education to Hindu widows and remarrying them if they should desire to do so. The League gives monthly so-called "weddies" to study in the local boarding Girls' Schools at Lucknow. The President of the League, Mr. Kunj Babari Sath, states in the report that the difficulties in the way of widow remarriage are due mainly to four reasons. The guardians insist on a higher qualification in prospective bridesgrooms for widows than for males; they desire to have the remarriages before the widows have completed the age of 18 years; they do not desire to educate the widows; the various sub-divisions in a caste sometimes do not admit of marriages even within the same caste; and, lastly, the pick and flower of younger sons generally come forward as suitors for widow marriages." The President has realised that it is impossible to attempt any one reform without touching on the other social problems that exist in India. The Hindoo Widow Reform League dow marriage being a drastic, serious and major reform, other reforms, as for instance inter-caste or inter-religious marriages, should, as a matter of course, accompany it. The report agrees with another peculiar notion. The ideal of the League is to start 'Widows' Huts' but they have not been able to do so for want of sufficient funds.
The Conference, as its name shows, is primarily devoted to women's education but the problem resolves into many factors of a social and economic character and it is impossible to deal with it without dealing with them by way of a preliminary clearing of the approaches to it. There is to begin with the question of child and too early marriages which effectively blocks the way to any real measure of women's education. The purdah is another great obstacle in a large part of the country. The prejudice against and opposition to the education of girls has largely died out and these two customs are at present the main impediments to a rapid spread of girls' education. The other great difficulty is the lack of a sufficient number and variety of educational institutions. This deficiency is common to the whole field of education, but it is far greater in the field of girls' education. In fact, until about a few years ago, the Government, both Indian and provincial, were indifferent to the claims of women's education. The credit of giving a lead in this, as in other social matters, belongs to the Indian States of Mysore, Baroda, and Travancore which many years before British India took up the subject, established institutions for the higher education of women. More attention is paid to the subject in British India at present and now that woman have started an Educational Conference of their own, we may expect rapid progress. There is one point, however, on which we would utter a word of caution.

Some of the speeches at the Conference seem to show that there is a feeling that women's education should proceed on lines materially different from that of men. This, we think, is a dangerous doctrine which must ultimately result in the undoing of all that has been done so far to advance women to a position of intellectual and social equality with men. Men and women are not two different species or even castes or communities, and there is no possibility of antagonism between the two. Radically different courses of study for men and women will not conduce to the intimate mutual understanding between the two sexes which is essential to harmonious social progress.

We may illustrate this by an example. It is often said that mathematics is not necessary for women and as many of them fail in their examinations in that subject, it is suggested that mathematics may be omitted in the education of girls. The subjects which are taught in schools and colleges are most of them of value chiefly as means of mental training. Mathematics is the subject which trains the mind in exact thinking, and to say that women do not need mathematics, merely means that devotional thinking is natural to the feminine mind.

Incidentally, we may mention that the daughter of the great Hindu mathematician, Bhaskara Charya, Lilavati, was a keen mathematician and his treatise in Arithmetic bears her name, and the problems are addressed to her personally. Indian women are sufficiently expert in domestic management, and what they particularly need is an outlook reaching beyond their families, castes and communities.
IN SEARCH OF CHRIST—A REJOINER.

(By Prof. D. Chowdhuri, Vedantaagis, M.A.)

Please accept my best thanks for publishing the review of my In Search of Jesus Christ in two successive issues (January 21st and 28th.) of your renowned paper as leading articles. But I am afraid I have been misunderstood on certain points. If I have denied the historical character of Christ as the reviewer rightly says then the charge that I have attacked Christ for the defects and mistakes of Christianity does not lie. I have actually contended that Christ is not the maker of Christianity but Christianity has made its Christ. Therefore the defects of Christianity mean the defects of Christ and it is no mistake to attack Jesus Christ for those mistakes and defects. So I still believe and hold fast to my belief that it is a disservice to the cause of spirituality to hold aloft a defective manufactured personage as a spiritual ideal to mankind. The reviewer contradicts himself when he says that the historical character of Jesus is comparatively a minor point but at the same breath stresses for the excellence of his teachings which I have pointblank denied and an historico-comparative study will show that the teachings of the synoptic Gospels instead of giving “the net result of the highest philosophy of Hinduism” fall far short of our puranas which we primarily designed for iliterate persons. And Raja Ram Mohan Roy gave the gospels no higher place than the puranas. The fourth Gospel, really a philosophy under the garb of a fictitious story, had nothing to do with the original Christian propaganda and the Pauline Epistles much less so. It is a mistaken religious enthusiasm that beholds a fictitious person as historical, and falsehood cannot produce good results. Ram Mohan only garnered some precepts from the gospels and those precepts could be collected from any other scripture given in the name of any other teacher. These precepts are common property of humanity. They are true not because taught by this person on the Mount or that person from the Chariot but they are given to the mouth of this person or that person because found true by the universal experience of humanity. This is the correct reading of history.

It is wrong to call my book “the outcome of the strong political reaction,” not because it is not a reaction but because it is not certainly a political reaction. It is a reaction due to the change of the angle of vision caused by the re-reading of history. Formerly we read history made for us by interested parties. Now we have disentangled truth from falsehood. The reviewer has confused the issues by taking Christianity and the Civilisation of the West together. They must be considered separately as they are antagonistic. I have severely criticised Christianity. But to avoid an obvious misunderstanding I must say with all the emphasis I can command that I yield the palm to none in my adulation for Western culture. Taken all in all I consider it to be the greatest current of civilisation that ever flowed in this planet in spite of some of its vital defects. There is no misapprehension in my mind as to the role of India in the world of religions thought, because it is in India that all the religions will be amalgamated into a synthetic whole and the West has to make important contributions. But Christianity proper is an obstacle in the way of realising this far-off end. The Western culture that is to make the contributions has grown in spite of this Christianity. Even today Christianity is opposing the Evolution theory that is by far the greatest discovery of the scientific West in the 19th century—the century that has added more to the stock of human knowledge than all the other centuries put together, as Henry Drummond has said. If I have shown that Christianity is not a thing dropped from heaven to lord it over others and destroy others to exclusively make room for itself but that it is also of the earth earthly and itself a product of amalgamation of other materials, then, Mr. Editor, has it not made Mother India’s path to play the role of synthesis easier? I hope, you will agree with me, that it is an enterprise worthy of much industry and enthusiasm which, if spent in this cause, have not been misapplied at all. My object is to show the origins of Christianity and not what it is to-day.

It is a common knowledge of history how all these ages Christianity has hampered human progress. It did not begin in a tabula rasa, but appeared in a highly civilised Graeco-Roman atmosphere to which it scarcely had anything to add. Christianity did a great disservice to the world by giving a misdirection to this culture in more than one point. It can very easily be shown and it has been shown in the book what mischief Christian fanaticism in its early stages had done by putting down the masterpieces of the Graeco-Roman art and setting on fire more than once the marvellous collection of the famous Alexandrian Library and latterly wholly driving out Greek philosophy from Europe to take shelter in the Islamic seats of culture. It is the return of Greek culture popularly known as the Renaissance that has made modern Europe what it is to-day. Since the Renaissance till Hegel it is the Greek inspiration that has developed Europe and that in spite of Christianity proper. Did not Martin Luther say that if Aristotle had not been in flesh he would have called him devil? Now what is the significance of all this? Christianity was a bankrupt movement from the start. It was its God-appointed mission to turn to the classical culture and begin the modern age all at once. But it abjectly failed in its mission, and instead inaugurated the dark ages, the darkest in the history of the world under which Europe had plied for long fifteen hundred years when the return of the expelled Culture came to its reason. Was Europe a whit better for fifteen hundred years after Christianity than it was for that period before it?

The reviewer speaks of India’s debt to Christianity. He evidently means philanthropic activities, democratic principles, liberation of women and the propagation of education among the masses. But I am sorry to say, if we had had to look to the Bibilcal Christianity, we would have been solely disappointed. Democratic principles were introduced into Christendom by the impact of Islam. It was necessary to set its house in order to successfully combat the new religion. The early Christians were taunted as misanthropes—the enemies of mankind. And it was Buddhism that really organised philanthropy on any large scale. But Buddhism degenerated and the early Christians copied it. As to the part played by Christianity proper in liberating women, the less said the better. Here also it was Buddhism that recognised no distinction between its male and female disciples, and the Buddha gave to his women followers equal status with men. The Church of England is undecided whether women should be allowed the pulpit. The Brahmo Samaj in this regard drew her inspiration more from ancient India than from anywhere else. Early Christianity had scant regard to show to women as evidenced by the utterances of Jesus, Paul or the medieval disciples. All yesterday women in Europe were mere slaves with no right to property which our women- folk enjoyed all along. Supernaturally speaking, if European women seem more emancipated, it is because Western women began to clamour for individual rights as early as the Roman days and Christianity had to surrender. Are we to say the better in matters educational taken as a whole since we have been under the spell of Christianity? I trust not. It is a proved fact that mass education was not initiated from Cambridge to Calcutta but only exported from Madras to Manchester as such. Here also it was Buddhism that recognised no distinction.\n
EVANESCENCE OF CASTE FEELING.

Sir,

From the ecclesiastical point of view, I may be wrong in my conception of the conclusion, but from the social point of view, I dare say that the day is coming nearer and nearer, when there would be no such thing like "Caste Feeling". Not many years elapsed there was an emotional discussion in every Christian home on the act of concubinage, inter-marriage and illegal relationships of our girls with non-Christians. Our brothers tried their uttermost to intercept such connections. But they adopted certain resolutions to obviate such occurrences from our community. They also protested against emancipation to certain extent, but they failed in their mission. It is not only happening in the Christian community but if my brothers care to read newspapers, they will see that the idea of "Caste Feeling" is obviously vanishing from the minds of girls of all denominations and inter-marriages are being approved of by girls of all nations; although at present the opposition to caste is in the minority.

The other day I was reading The Indian Social Reformer, dated the 21st ultimo, in which there is an announcement of two marriages. One of Miss Gasgul with Mr. Assaf Ali and the other of Miss Wadia with Mr. Maurice, (I am not in a position to say if Miss Wadia is Christian or non-Christian but this I know she is an Indian girl). Miss Wadia is marrying a Bachelors, but I must confess, it seems to me now, that sooner or later Christian boys will also prefer their marriages with non-Christian girls, and I do not doubt about it at all some day it has to come into practice. Now emancipation, and high education have been given to non-Christian girls, now they will come out in the light, and will participate with their brothers of all beliefs, in all their activities, and will choose their best husbands without distinction of caste and creed. It is speedily growing in the heart of Christian and non-Christian girls, to give up the idea of Caste Feeling.

Yours etc.,

Salvation Army,

Bombay.

CHILD MARRIAGE REFORM: A deputation of the Women's Conference waited to-day (Feb. 11) on the political leaders at Dr. Anand's house, and pressed them to support in the Assembly the prohibition of child marriages below 16 years, and the raising of the age of consent to 18 years. It is understood that the leaders generally agreed to the proposals made by the deputation. The deputationists included Dr. Besant, Mrs. Naidu, Mrs. S. R. Das, Mrs. Pardasmi, Mrs. Amalal Sarbai and Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya. The leaders on whom the deputation waited were Sir T. B. Sapru, the Maharajah of Mughals, Pandit Malviya, Pandit Motilal, Sir Purushottamdas, Lalit Lajat Rai, Mr. Jinnah, Maulvi Mohammed Yakub and Musabib Ishaq. It is understood that a deputation consisting of 12 delegates of the Women's Conference led by the Raul of Mandi waited on H. E. the Viceroy to-day (Feb. 11).
Second All-India Women's Conference.

H. H. THE BEGUM-MOTHER OF BHOPAL'S PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS,

The following is the full text of Her Highness the Begum-Mother of Bhopal's Presidential Address at the Second session of the All-India Women's Educational Conference held at Delhi on the 7th, 8th, 9th and 10th of February 1928:

The last session of your Conference which I regret I could not attend, was held at Poona. The selection of Poona as the venue for the Conference was indeed a happy one, the women of Bombay and Maharashatra being among torch-bearers of the educational movements in this country. Poona has besides, the credit of being the seat of the first University for Women in India, an honour which no other city can boast of.

This year the privilege of entertaining this Conference falls to the share of Delhi, the Capital of India. From the earliest periods of history down to the present time, Delhi has been the centre of various national movements, the scene, very often, of happenings which have during the last four thousand years decided the destiny of India, and last, but not the least, the birthplace of women unsurpassed for their great qualities of head and heart.

I thank the people of Delhi and hope their assistance in the accomplishment of the objects of this Conference will be as steadfast as it is bound to be fruitful of far-reaching results.

CONFERENCE STILL IN INFANCY.

Your Conference, ladies, is still in its infancy. This is but the second year of its existence. It is premature, therefore, to enter upon a survey of its work and expect any tangible results. But the mere fact of such a gathering of educated and broad-minded ladies representing all the different creeds is an event unique even among the assemblies of the stronger sex. Could there be a more hopeful sign for the future educational and social progress of India than that ladies from all parts of the country should have assembled here, without any distinction of caste or creed, to discuss the problems of education and to find out suitable means for its progress?

It is indeed most gratifying to see that a noble cause has wiped out differences which are the natural outcome of ignorance and narrow-mindedness, the two chief causes of friction and disunion now unhappily rampant among our brethren in India. Even if this Conference were to fail in the fulfilment of its objects, the comradship so much in evidence to-day will by itself be an achievement, the value of which cannot be easily estimated. But no, I am by no means a pessimist. This Conference will doubtless bring about useful results and I would assure you that, by the help of God, our feeble efforts will prove immensely beneficial to our sex and to our country, for anything that is done in perfect sincerity for the good of others carries the blessings of the Deity with it.

WOMEN'S EDUCATION.

The chief objective of our Conference is to bring about reforms in the present methods of female education and to remove the various drawbacks and obstacles inherent in the system. The main cause of the present unsatisfactory condition of female education is that, up till now whatever has been done for the education of women, has been done by men, and although we ought to be thankful to them, we cannot blink at the fact that men cannot fully realise our needs or look at them from the same viewpoint as we can. They simply cannot grapple with our problems to our satisfaction. Why, they have done on entering with our educational difficulties that face the women of India. We can do that ever so much better, and, should ever a situation arise where our needs must depend on men's assistance, let us readily place our suggestions at their disposal.

A COMPLICATED PROBLEM.

Owing to the various local conditions, the problem of providing suitable education for our young men is not free from difficulties and prominent educationists are still groping in the dark to solve it. The problem of the education of girls is far more complicated. While on the one hand the poverty of the people of India and their prejudices stand in the way of a proper settlement, on the other, there are old and antiquated customs clothed in the sanctity of religion which retard educational progress. Due to these reasons the question of female education stands foremost among our internal problems. You alone can solve it, as nobody else can. Our difficulties are two-fold. There are those that beset education itself and means of its progress, and those that are the result of outside influences and conditions. We shall not be able to reach our goal unless we were to tackle both, and it is for this reason that we are assembled here to think over and discuss the ways and means for the achievement of our object. For a detailed examination of the problem you will await the subsequent proceedings of the Conference, but I shall very briefly survey some of the aspects of female education in order to place before you my own ideas of their relative importance and interdependence.

I shall first deal with those difficulties which have to do with external conditions, and they are comparatively of greater importance.

POVERTY OF PEOPLE.

One of the stumbling blocks in the way of female education is the poverty of our people. Even the education of our boys is not free from the harmful effects of poverty, and the facilities for education that are to be met with in other countries are therefore wanting in India. It is obvious that in a country where the income per head is, as low as Rs. 2.40 per month there can be little hope of people taking their due share in the spread of education. That is too small a figure to enable a man to afford two meals a day at the present time when cost of living is so very high and it can scarcely leave a margin for any investment in education. Even so, however, something has somehow been done for the education of the boys, but the need for women's education has not been met so much as properly felt by our countrymen. Their lack of interest and, sometimes, their opposition have prevented the Government from paying due attention to the education of the women of India. That accounts for the backwardness of girls in education in comparison with boys, and for the fact that the ratio of education between women and men is hardly 51:100.

Women's Responsibility.

The remedy for poverty lies mostly in the hands of men, but women too have their responsibility in this respect, the division of work in the society being that man produces wealth and woman spends it. To save society from the evil effects of poverty we certainly have to enlarge our sources of income, but we also have to cut down our unnecessary expenses. Now if women know how to run a household properly, they would keep their income and expenditure evenly balanced and would be able to distinguish between the necessary and the unnecessary items of expenditure. If they know some useful handicraft by the help of which they could supplement their income. If they could realize the national needs and sacrifice a little of their pleasures and luxuries to the adoption of the plain living of olden times, poverty would, to a great extent, disappear from the country. But all these things depend upon proper training and education, and even for this the proper remodelling of our educational system seems to be absolutely necessary.

Early Marriage.

Another handicap to the education of our girls is the custom of early marriage. The evil custom exists practically in every part of the country, and in almost all sections of the people. Owing to it the best part of life which ought to be devoted to the physical, mental and moral growth of a girl, is wasted, and, besides, she often falls a victim to various kinds of disease and physical disability. The rapid increase in disease and mortality, the fall in the average length of life, the poor physique of the children and the physical and intellectual degeneration so evident to-day are all traceable to this baneful custom. Nevertheless it is my firm belief that usage must have had its origin in the quest of something higher, in the exigencies at any rate, of the social order. We must not lose sight of that aspect of the question, lest we wrongly decry our ancestors. We should, on the other hand, examine it most carefully and try to adjust it as best we can. Our country owing to its climatic characteristics is so different from the countries of Europe and America, and our modes of living are not the same as theirs. The age of youth and adolescence in cold climates is very nearly the time when what is known as middle age generally sets in in this country. Probably this and other similar considerations were the causes that led to the adoption of this custom. It seems, of course, to have gone much beyond its limits and has thereby plunged millions of our sisters in misery. What is needed is a middle course, as that indeed is the best course. People have themselves come to realize the evil effects of the custom and I think the Government will not be wrong in finding out the proper means of dealing with it in a way that will satisfy all of us. Last year you discussed this question and passed resolutions on it, but we cannot stop at that. We must go on insisting on our demands till they are properly satisfied. Every part of the country should come forward with its protest and create public opinion in favour of complete reform.

Purdah Custom.

Another custom that needs readjustment is the purdah. Just as early marriage is largely common among the Hindus, the purdah is to be met with mostly among the Muslims. There can be no denying the fact that the present strictness of the purdah system among the Musalmans does not form a part of their religious obligations. It is based on purely local considerations and is not found in other Islamic countries. The motive underlying the system as it obtains in India was perhaps the prevention of an improper association of men and women. The idea was that women should not make a show of their charms, and it was with that object in view that the purdah was introduced in Islamic countries. In some of them it still exists, but nowhere is it as strict as in India. If the system were remodelled according to peculiarities of the environments and placed on a reasonable footing most of the evil effects which it has on female education would disappear, while, at the same time, we should be spared from the situation that is causing a great deal of anxiety in the West.

I have no hesitation to own that the purdah system as observed among the Musalmans of India is not exactly Islamic and is indeed very harmful to the progress of education among our girls. It is a hindrance moreover in the way of their physical and mental development. The Musalmans should coolly and calmly reflect and decide whether by respecting a mere custom they would keep their women in a state of suspended animation and whether they would sacrifice the prospects of their future generations at the altar of blind prejudices.

These briefly, are among the impediments to female education which I have classed as external. There are a number of social difficulties besides, which are in themselves the result of ignorance and lack of knowledge and do not very much affect the progress of education. I do not therefore propose to go into details about them and I feel that they will all gradually die out with the spread of education and the necessary reforms and the acquirement of rights very much in demand will automatically follow in its wake. No power in the world can stop us from getting our rights if we are capable and deserving of them.

Curriculum of Studies.

I now come to those questions that have a direct bearing on the educational problem. The foremost among them is the question of a suitable syllabus for girls, a question which has for a long time been under the consideration of those who are looked upon as leaders of thought in that respect, but it is a pity that nothing much has been done so far. Nothing definite has yet been decided upon and we do not know what to read and what not to read. A certain controversy seems to be going on as to whether the instruction of girls should proceed on the very same lines as that of boys, or whether there should be one system for boys and another for girls. There are some who favour an identical course of studies for both, while there are others who would keep the two systems totally distinct from each other. The former also advocate what are called mixed schools. Personally I am inclined to think of both the points of views as the two extremes to be avoided. I would chalk out a wise middle for the conducted of women's education. I do not pretend to step into the role of an educationist. What I do want to stress is merely that in the choice of a curriculum, the peculiar needs and requirements of women and their mental constitution should not be lost sight of. It should also be borne in mind that the time our girls can afford to devote to their studies is necessarily very limited, and that therefore the course of instruction for them should be such as to admit of the necessary amount of the knowledge being imparted to them within that period. Such of them as have the means of prosecuting their studies still further or are inclined to enter any learned profession, need not be prevented from carrying out their intentions, but generally speaking, the education of girls in India should proceed on the lines I have ventured to suggest.

Women's Domain.

It is not commendable in any case to look upon education merely as a means of livelihood, much less should that be the aim in educating our girls. Woman was not meant by nature to take part in the struggles of life or to compete with men in the domain peculiarly his own. Her education should be such as may enable her, among other things, to help man in his struggles, to comfort him in his troubles, and create a happy home.

It is a pity that the fine arts should have been excluded from the curricula of the schools for boys and to leave them out from a scheme of girls' education would mean the neglect of their educational side the development of which is more important than the training of the intellect.

Due importance should also be given to the physical and spiritual well-being of girls. No system of education can be complete which merely aims at the growth of the intellect and ignores the spiritual and the physical sides of human life. The human mind is a complex of a number of faculties and care should be taken to develop every one of them in due proportion.

With the question of reform in the curricula of girls' education is closely interwoven the question of examinations. As at present conducted they are a source of enormous strain on the minds of students which sometimes leaves a permanent effect on their health.

The need for reforming the present system of examinations is universal and the more our girls are spared the strain by the provision of some other tests of proficiency, the better it would be for them. For until separate universities for women can be set up our national universities ought to take up these questions and do something to improve the situation.

Efficient Teachers.

The next great problem is the supply of efficient teachers. When good teachers are scarce even among men, their scarcity among women is not at all surprising. The reason is that the teaching profession is in spite of its importance and value, the least paying. The best minds have therefore no inclination towards this profession and only those take to it who are compelled by circumstances and to whom all other doors are closed. The teachers of our primary schools are usually very inefficient, although it is they who are entrusted with laying the foundations, both moral and intellectual, of the future generations, and their shortcomings and mistakes cannot be rectified by subsequent effort. To impart good education there should be good teachers from the very beginning, and those who see the standard of their children's education raised should try to improve the lot of their teachers.

For the progress of female education a large number of teachers is required. I would earnestly appeal to my noble-minded sisters to realize the poverty and helplessness of their country; and to contribute their quota of help in the advancement of education. They could easily devote some of their spare time to the teaching of the girls in their neighbourhood. In this way difficulty about teachers can be greatly relieved. I suggest it only as a temporary measure, for as soon as education becomes universal, the want of teachers will not be felt, and good teachers will be much more easily available.

We should never think that something is lacking in us and that we cannot shape our own destinies, or work out our own salvation. The gifts of nature are within the reach of everybody and if we do not take due advantage of them the fault is ours. The members of our sex have performed heroic deeds in the world and the pages of history are full of the records of the marvellous achievements of women, both Hindu and Muslim. Even to-day we are not without women in our midst who would take their place side by side with men in any walk of life. That the bulk of us are backward is due to want of proper training not to any defect in our intelligence and understanding. Given the necessary chances and scope, our girls would surely shine just as their progenitors shone in the pages of history in the days gone by.

Plea for Practical Efforts.

Ladies! Before I conclude, I would crave your indulgence to emphasise one particular point. Mere words are not enough to bring about success in any movement. Practical efforts are essential to the achievement of our objects. Most of the meetings and conferences in India do not go beyond the mere expressions of pious hopes. They are the scenes of some very interesting discussions, and of the passing of some very fine resolutions, but there the whole thing comes to an end, that, in fact, is one of the reasons that inspire of the last fifty years female education in India is still in its preliminary stages.

I admit that it is essential to crystallise and formulate our ideas before any practical steps are taken and this necessitates discussion but once a decision has been reached, let it be acted upon for otherwise success is difficult to attain. Let us make up our minds to act up to what we are saying to-day, and that to my mind is the secret of all success. I am so pleased to learn that meetings have been held in various parts of the country and that your resolutions are meeting with the most enthusiastic support everywhere. This leads me to hope that in the progress of female education this Conference will be an inspiring and stimulating power and will serve as a model of unity and co-operation for the best of the country, unity and co-operation on which every success is dependent. In the end I pray to the Almighty that He may shower His blessings on our efforts towards the attainment of the aims and objects of this Conference.
WOMEN'S EDUCATIONAL CONFERENCE, DELHI,
Second Day.

The second sitting of the All India Women's Educational Conference commenced after lunch at 1 p.m. on Wednesday the 8th February when the following important resolutions were passed:

"This Conference is of opinion that at every stage of education the spirit of social service should be inculcated."

The resolution was moved by Miss Manak Lal Prasad and was seconded and supported by Shirinshuni Bhayambl and Mrs. Munir-uz-zaman respectively.

"A complete course of physical training should be made compulsory in all boys' schools and should include much cheerful recreation out of doors as possible, so as to develop the spirit of outdoor recreations and girl-guiding on Indian lines."

Miss Laxmu moved the resolution in a striking speech assisted by Abraham and Miss Ornaboll. She supported the resolution.

"Systematic medical inspection should be made compulsory in all schools and colleges, and in the case of girls the inspection should be carried out by medical men. Where possible the school clinic should be started and arrangements made to deal with cases of malnutrition."

The resolution was moved by Lady Pannel and speeches were also delivered by Mrs. Baramji, Mrs. Shukla, Mrs. Thomas, Mrs. Kirt, and Mrs. Abre.
