Current rupees. ‘The sicca rupee’ (i.e., the rupee bearing the Emperor’s stamp) ‘varies in value in the proportion of 116 to 111. The natives take the 116 as their unit of account, being the sicca rupee during the first year of circulation. The English, to avoid fractional numbers, take the decimal 100, by relation to which they calculate and estimate all their coins. Thus, parts of the sicca rupee constitutes that money of account to which the English have given the name of current rupee’ (Verelst’s ‘View of the Rise, Progress, and Present State of the English Government in Bengal,’ p. 89). From this quotation it is evident that the English current rupee was not a coin at all
