CONTENTS.

CHAPTER I.

NERVA.—A.D. 96-98.

	PAGE
Nerva raised to the throne by the murderers of Domitian	1
Treats the agents of past tyranny with forbearance, though Pliny and others cried for vengeance	3
Nerva's measures for the poorer citizens	4
The mutiny on the Danube appeased by Dion Chrysostom	5
The violence of the prætorians caused the Emperor to choose Trajan as his colleague and successor, A.D. 97	6
Death of Nerva, A.D. 98	7

CHAPTER II.

TRAJAN.—A.D. 97-117.

Trajan avenges the outrage done to Nerva	7
After a year's delay enters Rome without parade	9
The simple bearing of his wife Plotina	—
His respect for constitutional forms	10
His frank courtesy and fearless confidence	11
His thrift and moderation excite the surprise of Pliny	12
His economy could save little except in personal expenditure	14
Large outlay on roads, bridges, ports and aqueducts, baths and theatres	15
The charitable endowments for poor children	18
Which lead others to act in a like spirit	20
Trajan's policy with regard to the corn trade	21

His treatment of provincial interests as shown in the correspondence with Pliny, A.D. 111-113
He would not meddle needlessly or centralize too fast
His war policy
On the side of Germany he had strengthened the frontier with defensive works
The rise of the Dacian kingdom and threats of Decebalus
Trajan declared war and set out, A.D. 101
The course of the campaign
The battle of Tapæ, advance into Transylvania, and Roman victories bring the first war to a close. A.D. 102
Peace did not last long
Trajan's preparations and bridge of stone across the Danube
The legions converged on Dacia and crushed the enemy, A.D. 106
The country was colonized and garrisoned
The survival of Rome's influence in the Roumanian language
Trajan's forum and triumphal column
The conquest of Arabia
War declared against Parthia, A.D. 113
Trajan arrives at Antioch, and marches through Armenia
Parthamasiris deposed and slain
Submission of the neighbouring princes
The great earthquake at Antioch, A.D. 115
Trajan crossed the Tigris and carried all before him as far as the Persian Gulf
But the lately conquered countries rose in his rear, and he was forced to retire
His death at Selinus, and character
Taken as a type of heathen justice in legend and art

CHAPTER III.

HADRIAN.—A.D. 117-138.

The earlier life of Hadrian
His sudden elevation to the throne caused ugly rumours
His policy of peace accompanied by personal hardihood and regard for discipline

Contents.

vii

	PAGE
He travelled constantly through the provinces	53
We hear of him in Britain, Africa, Asia Minor, and in Athens above all	55
And in Egypt	56
The death and apotheosis of Antinous	57
Hadrian's interests cosmopolitan more than Roman	58
The levelling influence of the 'Perpetual Edict,' A.D. 132	59
Hadrian's frugality and good finance	61
The dark moods and caprices attributed to him	61
His suspicious temper, system of espionage, and jealousy of brilliant powers	63
His fickleness, superstition, and variety of temper	64
Reasons for mistrusting these accounts of ancient authors	65
His villa at Tivoli	66
Struck by disease, he chose Verus as successor, A.D. 135, who died soon after	68
Antoninus was adopted in his place	—
Hadrian's dying agony, and fitful moods of cruelty	69
His death and canonization	70
The mausoleum of Hadrian	—
The outbreak in Palestine was at last terribly stamped out	71

CHAPTER IV.

ANTONINUS PIUS.—A.D. 138—161.

The reign of Antoninus was uneventful	73
Why called Pius	74
His good-nature was free from weakness	75
He did not travel abroad, but was careful of provincial interests	—
Wars were needful with Moors, Dacians, and Brigantes, yet he gained more by diplomacy	76
His homely life at Lorium	77
His easy and forgiving temper	78
Tender care of his adopted son, to whom he left the Empire at his death	79

CHAPTER V.

MARCUS AURELIUS ANTONINUS.—A.D. 147-180.

	PAGE
The early life of M. Aurelius	80
His correspondence with Fronto, his old tutor	81
His conversion from rhetoric to philosophy	82
The jealousy of Fronto	83
Offices of state and popular favour did not turn the head of the young prince	84
He looked to the Stoic creed for guidance, but without loss of tenderness	85
Fronto, like Faustina, had little love for philosophers	86
On the death of Antoninus M. Aurelius shared his power with L. Verus, A.D. 161	87
Ominous prospects, floods, dangers on the Euphrates	—
Verus starts for the East, where the soldiers were demoralized	89
The Parthians were humbled, and Verus claimed the merit of his generals' successes, A.D. 166	90
Fronto's courtly panegyric	91
M. Aurelius meantime endows charities for foundlings, appoints juridici , and guardians for orphans, and works unremittingly	92
But he is called away to the scene of war	94
The fortune of the Roman arms in Britain	95
Both Emperors started for the Danube, where the border races sued for peace	96
The ravages of the plague, A.D. 167-8	97
The war begins again, but is checked by the spread of the plague	98
Verus dies, and M. Aurelius rules henceforth alone, A.D. 169	99
The long and arduous struggle on the Northern frontier	100
The Marcomannic war followed by the campaign against the Quadi, in which we read of the marvel of the 'Thundering Legion'	102
The revolt of Avidius Cassius, A.D. 175	103
Contempt expressed by him for the Emperor as a ruler	105
The speedy failure of the insurrection	106
The Emperor showed no vindictive feeling	107

Contents.

ix

	PAGE
He went to restore order in the East, and Faustina died on the way	108
His short rest at Rome, and endowments in memory of his wife	109
Recalled to the war in the North, he died at Vienna or Sirmium, A.D. 180	110
Grief of his subjects, and monuments in his honour	110
His 'Meditations' reflect his habits of self-inquiry and gratitude	112
There is no trace in them of morbid vanity or self-contempt	116
He tried to be patient and cheerful in the hard work of life	117
Nor was he too ambitious or too sanguine in his aims	119
His anticipations of Christian feeling	120
The thought of a Ruling Providence stirred his heart with tenderness and love	122
His delicate sympathy with Nature	123
His melancholy and sense of isolation	124
The austere Stoic creed could not content him	125
The contrast of the contemporary Christians	126
M. Aurelius was unfortunate in his son Commodus	126
Was he also in his wife Faustina? Reasons for doubting the truth of the common story.	127

CHAPTER VI.

THE ATTITUDE OF THE IMPERIAL GOVERNMENT
TOWARDS THE CHRISTIANS.

The Christians at first regarded as a Jewish sect, and not disturbed	129
In the time of Nero we trace dislike to the Christians as such	131
They were regarded as unsocial and morose fanatics, accused of impiety and of foul excesses	132
Christianity was not made illegal till the time of Trajan, whose answer to Pliny determined the law	135
The reasons why the government might distrust the Christian Church	137
Succeeding Emperors inclined to mercy, but the popular dislike grew more intense	139
The rescripts of Hadrian and Antoninus very questionable	140

	PAGE
The martyrdom of Polycarp	141
The persecution at Vienna and Lugdunum	142
Lucian's account of Peregrinus Proteus reflects some noble features of the early Church, A.D. 165	144
The attack of Celsus, A.D. 150, was answered in later days	145
The line of argument taken by the Apologists of the age	148
The life of Justin Martyr	149

CHAPTER VII.

THE CHARACTERISTICS OF THE STATE RELIGION, AND OF THE RITES IMPORTED FROM THE EAST.

The Emperors respected the old forms of national religion	150
The Collegia or brotherhoods	151
The official registers of the Arval Brothers, containing a full description of their ritual	152
We may note (1) their punctilious regard for ancient forms	154
(2) The absence of moral or spiritual influence	155
(3) The loyalty to the established powers of state	156
The old religion was cold and meagre, and supplemented by exotic creeds	157
The civil power only feebly opposed the new rites, which were welcomed by devout minds like Plutarch and Maximus Tyrius	159
The mystic reveries and visions of Aristides in his sickness, A.D. 144-161	160
New moods of ecstatic feeling, self-denial, and excitement, and mystic gloom encouraged by Eastern religions	161
The rite of the taurobolium	163
The new comers lived in peace in the imperial Pantheon	164

CHAPTER VIII.

THE LITERARY CURRENTS OF THE AGE.

The enthusiasm for learning, but want of creative power	165
The culture of the age was mainly Greek and professorial	166
The various classes of Sophists	167
1. Moralists and Philosophers	168

Contents.

CHAPTER IX.

THE ADMINISTRATIVE FORMS OF THE IMPERIAL GOVERNMENT.

The Emperor was an absolute sovereign, and his ministers were at first his domestics. afterwards knights	194
The most important officers were, (1) a rationibus (treasurer)	195
2. Ab epistulis (secretary)	196
3. A libellis (clerk of petitions)	196
4. A cubiculo (chamberlain)	197
The Privy Council	—
The Præfect of the city	198
The Præfect of the Prætorian Guard	—
The provincial governors and their suite	199
Local magistrates and local freedom	200
Few guarantees of permanence	201
The municipalities courted interference	202
The governors began to meddle more	203
The Cæsar was more appealed to	—
The actual evils of a later age	204
1. The pressure of taxation, moderate at first, became more and more intense	204
2. The increase of bureaucracy was followed by oppressive restrictions on the Civil Service	207
3. The municipal honours became onerous charges	208
4. Trades and industries became hereditary burdens	210
