

Dhananjayrao Gadgil Library

GIPE-PUNE-000134

THE HISTORY OF THE SIKHS.

LONDON:
BEWSTER AND WEST, PRINTERS,
HAND COURT, DOWGATE.

THE HISTORY OF THE SIKHS, CONTAINING AN ACCOUNT OF THE WAR BETWEEN THE SIKHS AND THE BRITISH,
IN 1845-46.

By W. L. M'GREGOR, M.D.

SURGEON TO THE HONOURABLE COMPANY'S 1ST EUROPEAN LIGHT INFANTRY.

VOLUME II.

LONDON:
JAMES MADDEN, 8, LEADENHALL STREET.

1846.

V236.M

A846.2

134

CONTENTS TO VOLUME II.

CHAPTER I.

	PAGE.
Death of Runjeet Singh.—Khurruk Singh succeeds, and dies.—Nonehal Singh accidentally killed.—Chund Koonwur endeavours to exclude Shere Singh from the succession.—Dhyan Singh, the minister, exerts himself in favour of the latter, and brings him to Lahore.	1—9

CHAPTER II.

Shere Singh proclaimed king of Lahore.—Besieges the capital, and is seated on the throne.—His character.—Is made a party to a scheme for compassing Dhyan Singh's death.—Is assassinated during a review of his troops.—Successive murders of Bood Singh, Pertaub Singh, and Dhyan Singh.—Heera Singh is sent for, but meets with much opposition.—General Ventura supports him.—Heera Singh acknowledges Dhu-leep Singh as Maharajah.—The British army returns from the second campaign in Afghanistan through the Punjab.	10—23
-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	-------

CHAPTER III.

	PAGE.
Heera Singh's conduct as vizier.—His death.—Soochet Singh's death, and character.—Goolab Singh sent for.	24—31

CHAPTER IV.

Maharajah Dhuleep Singh ascends the throne.—The Ranee wishes to appoint Juwahur Singh Prime Minister.—Goolab Singh refuses to take the office, excepting on certain terms, which are not agreed to.—He returns to Jummoo.	32—38
-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	-------

CHAPTER V.

The Panches become rulers of the country.—The Sikh army determines to wage war with the British.—Tej Singh and Lal Singh join the army.—Goolab Singh remonstrates with them on the supposed attack.—The Commander-in-chief of the British army, prepares to meet the hostile movement.—The Sikhs cross the Sutlej, and the Governor-general issues a manifesto of war.—The British army advances.—A great battle fought at Moodkee.—The British, without large guns, are at a disadvantage.—They capture the Sikh artillery, and achieve a victory.—Commentaries on the action.—The efficiency of the Sikh artillery.—The Sikhs resolve to make a further stand.—The British force increased.—Lieute-

CONTENTS.

iii.

	PAGE.
nant Biddulph's perilous position as a prisoner.— Anecdotes of the battle of Moodkee.—Tej Singh's proceedings as Commander-in-chief of the Sikh army.—Forward movement of the British army from Moodkee.	39—68

CHAPTER VI.

A more detailed account of the action at Moodkee.— Extracts from the despatches.—The ground of the confidence of the Sikhs, in the probable suc- cess of their own proceedings.—Reasons why Feerozpoore was not attacked.—The Mussulmans and the Sikhs.—The Sikh army under Runjeet Singh.—Major Broadfoot and Captain Nichol- son, the political officers.—The present state of the Native army.—The irregular cavalry.	69—98
----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	-------

CHAPTER VII.

The disposition of the British army at Feerozshu- hur.—The battle of Feerozshuhur.—Dangerous position of the British infantry, in the enemy's camp.—Comparison between Native and Euro- pean soldiers, when deficient of water and sup- plies.—Incompleteness of the medical arrange- ments in the field.—Invincibility of the British bayonet.—The wounded.—Kindness of the Go- vernor-general and Commander-in-chief.—Tri- bute to the memory of officers killed at Feeroz- shuhur.	99—128
-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	--------

CHAPTER VIII.

PAGE.

The Sikhs, still determined to contend with the British, construct a bridge of boats at Hurreekee, and recross the river preparatory to other operations.—Wudnee and Durrumkote fall to the British.—Sir Harry Smith advances with a division to relieve Loodianah.—The panic at Loodianah, Umballa, and Simlah.—Sir H. Smith disregards the attack upon his flank at Budeewal, and still advances.—Desperate battle at Allewal, in which Sir H. Smith drives the Sikhs under Runjoor Singh across the Sutlej.—European deserters.—Effect of the victory at Allewal.—The Sikhs occupy Little Sobraon.—The good fortune of the British.—The Sikhs entrench themselves at Sobraon.—The British resolve to attack them.	129—153
------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	---------

CHAPTER IX.

Sir H. Smith rejoins the Head-quarters of Sir H. Hardinge with his force.—The British batteries open upon the Sikh entrenchment.—The whole of the army advances, after the cannonade.—Dreadful battle.—Complete and glorious victory gained by the British.—Sir Robert Dick, Brigadier Taylor, General Gilbert.—Notice of gallant young officers killed in the action.—Conduct of the Sikhs at Sobraon.—Criticisms on the action.—Brigadier Orchard, Dr. Macleod, and Dr. Walker.—Usefulness of amputation.—Necessity for attention to field hospitals.—The killed and wounded on both sides	154—195
--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	---------

CONTENTS.

v.

CHAPTER X.

	PAGE.
The British Army crosses the Sutlej, and captures Kusoor.—Proclamation of the Governor-general.—Goolab Singh sent by the Ranees to mediate between the Sikhs and the British, and prevent the advance of the latter to Lahore.—The Governor-general refuses to listen to any terms, and meets Dhuleep.—Commentaries on the possibility of subduing the Punjab.—Contrast between the Sikh war and the invasion of Afghanistan.—The Governor-general's forbearance.—The British army reaches Lahore.—Outline of a treaty.—Cashmere given to Goolab Singh.—Majors Lawrence and Mackeson.—The British protect the Sikh Government.—Sir Charles Napier visits Lahore.—Note of a conference.—General orders.—The proceedings at the Durbar.—The treaty of peace.—The state-visit of the Governor-general.—Articles of agreement with the Durbar of Lahore.—Treaty with Goolab Singh.	196—250

CHAPTER XI.

General remarks on the chief features of the campaign, and the effect of the victories upon the Sikhs.—The Punjab, as an independent kingdom, destroyed.—Speculations on the power of the Lahore Government to exist independently of British aid and countenance.—Goolab Singh's views and position.—Discussion on the composition of the British army.—The Europeans and the Natives.—Necessity for more cavalry	251—274
--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	---------

CHAPTER XII.

	PAGE.
The difficulties of the British garrison at Lahore.— An éméute —Importance of combining political and military authority under one head.—The poverty of the Sikhs	275—292

CHAPTER XIII.

The Governor-general's views of the Sikh invasion, and the preparations of the Commander-in-chief, examined	293—308
-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	---------

CHAPTER XIV.

Movement against the Fort of Kangra.—Disturbance at Lahore the result of Sikh discontent.— Speculation upon the possibility of the Sikhs surrendering their fortresses.—Destruction of the temporary barracks at Loodianah.—Kote Kangra surrenders unconditionally	309—322
---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	---------

CHAPTER XV.

Further particulars regarding the battle of Sobraon, —Sir Joseph Thackwell and the 3rd light dragoons.—Captain Lumley's error.—Death of Major-general Lumley.—The history of the operations of the cavalry division at Sobraon.	323—337
-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	---------

CHAPTER XVI.

The British artillery at Feerozshuhur and Sobraon.— The division at Sobraon.—The Jalindhur Doab described	338—348
---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	---------

CONTENTS.

vii.

CHAPTER XVII.

PAGE.

Further particulars relative to the march against, and capture of Kote Kangra.—Education of European children in the hills.—The second division at Feerozshuhur	349—362
---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	---------

CHAPTER XVIII.

Sir Harry Smith's account of the operations of his division at Feerozshuhur.—Conclusion.	363—376
--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	---------