YOUNG PEOPLE IN IN INDUSTRY I750-1945

MAURICE W. THOMAS

Charter for Youth Series

One of the most dramatic chapters in the social history of Britain is that which relates the story of the emancipation of youth. The long and bitter struggle of reformers during the past two centuries to achieve decent working conditions in factory and mine, to regulate the whole field of juvenile labour, and to secure proper facilities for education is here described in its grimness and pathos.

In these days when the needs and aspirations of young people insistently claim the attention of the nation, it is well to review the struggle and to realize the considerable progress that has already been made.

CHARTER FOR YOUTH SERIES

The object of Government is not to change men from rational beings into beasts or puppets, but to enable them to develop their minds and bodies in security, and to employ their reason unshackled. In fact, the task of Government is liberty.—Spinoza

A school can make its contribution to an "Enlightened and Instructed Public Opinion" if in response to the naturally widening interests of its pupils it makes them aware of the problems which will engage their attention later, and if it promotes an attitude of free inquiry and develops power of independent judgment and intellectual alertness.—Norwood Report

Why is this new series of books, addressed to Sixth Forms and intelligent youth generally, called the Charter for Youth: For two reasons. First, the Atlantic Charter enunciated the principles that will govern the reconstruction of the democratic commonwealth in the post-war world, and all its terms demand as a sine qua non the establishment of Freedom of Speech. But freedom of speech is of greatly inferior value if not fortified by an educated and critical intelligence that will operate to maintain a high level of thought and expression. Knowledge and its application, science and its findings, and with them the scientist and the scholars themselves, must acquire a position of first importance. The Atlantic Charter connotes a respect and demand for Truth: its implementation requires informed citizenship.

Second, Youth to-day is no longer kept in blinkers, and its need to face the problems and responsibilities of a new world demands that it should have access to the latest knowledge in the chief fields of thought and action—the history of peoples and institutions, the arts and sciences, invention and industry, logic, philosophy, ethics, and religion. It should also have training in right thinking and clear expression, and all that leads to sound judgment and moral poise. Youth has a Charter of the City of the future, and the new series of books is intended to open the gates of one division of that city—Knowledge.
